Yes! Lloyd clenched his fists. The historical reclamation project of the Maritz Wetland.

Lloyd did get the feeling that the sense of excitement and anticipation in the fiefdom was building up as the construction neared its end. There was a change in the way the engineers and people viewed him. Their gaze wasn't just full of surprise but was mixed with admiration. There was respect in the way they looked at him. So, Lloyd came to naturally expect this kind of reward. It is just as I expected. This is perfect.

The reclamation project was a success and he was awarded a whopping amount of RP.

He felt he had become rich overnight. For the first time, I have over a thousand RP.

The mere thought of where he should spend and invest the points excited him.

However, he didn't force himself out of his happy reverie. This wasn't any time to bask in joy over some temporary rewards. This kind of construction needs a good finish more than anything else. Lloyd lifted his head and looked at the sky. The hot summer was going away. The sky was still clear and sunny, but it felt more distant than before. The sunlight that burned his and the soldiers' backs throughout the construction appeared to have weakened too. This meant one thing, Autumn was approaching.

It will be raining soon.

The region the Frontera barony sat in received a lot of rain during the spring and late autumn. The summer and winter were dry with comparatively less rainfall.

Thanks to the climate, the reclamation happened in a breeze with barely any rain.

Things will change from now on.

Once it was mid-autumn and the winter approached, the whole place would be battered with rain. At that time, the embankment and water drainage system in the reclaimed land would be put to the test. Meanwhile, Lloyd thought to himself that the drainage facility had to be perfectly constructed.

"When it rains, the water must be drained properly. Otherwise, this reclaimed land we worked so hard to build will be submerged once again."

"Is it because the ground level has lowered?"

"Yup, that's the answer." Lloyd nodded his head at Javier's question.

He went on, "This land was built after we compressed the peat deposits."

The murky wetland was now completely hard because the heavily drenched water in the strata had been completely drained. In the process, the space between the sand particles narrowed, hardening the overall strata and at the same time, they collapsed. It was only natural for that to happen.

"The ground settles as much as the water is drained out."

"By settle, do you mean that it sank down?"

"Yeah, and since the ground level has lowered, the water will easily stagnate when it rains. Thus, it'd be equally difficult for it to be drained."

“That does not sound good. How about we pour more sand to elevate the ground level?” Javier tilted his head as he spoke.

Lloyd chuckled. “No, that method wouldn’t work. Know why? Because the ground here is made up of peat deposits.”

“I am not sure what you mean.”

“Given the peat deposit’s characteristics, the additional layer of earth and its weight would sink the ground again. So it’s in vain even if we add more earth on the top. Similar to how you can go out on tons of blind dates, but you won’t get a girlfriend. It just doesn’t happen like that.”

“What is a blind date?”

“You don’t have to know. Some things just won’t happen even if you try hard.”

“Just like your face, Master Lloyd?”

“Yeah, and just like your insomnia.”

Skillfully parrying the unexpected verbal blow, Lloyd smiled.

“Anyway, that’s why you need a waterwheel.”

The waterwheel used water to power its movement and the Maritz Wetland was surrounded by two currents of the course river. This meant that the waterwheels could be run all year round since water was easily available just outside the embankment.

“Why do you think I dug several waterways in the reclaimed land?”

“To make sure that the stagnated water will flow to one place?” Javier asked.

“Yeah, exactly. I’m making sure that the water will flow to one area. And I’m going to push the water out using the screw-type of pump waterwheel.”

Lloyd happened to be aware of an excellent model to follow to manage reclaimed land after finishing a reclamation project. It was the reclaimed land of the Netherlands, the Kinderdijk.

*Kinderdijk was similar to this place.*That wetland used to be made of peat deposits and the Dutch drained the water and built the embankment after working for a long time. Once the consolidation phenomenon took place, the land hardened and became lower at the same time. When that happened, the lowered ground level became flooded with water.

So Dutch people decided to build a windmill to prevent the deluge, making smart use of the country's geographical features and climate. It was a wise choice because the Gulf Stream that surrounded the land ensured its winter to be warm and snowless and due to the impact of the westerlies, the wind blew hard all year long.

The perfect role model. It's the best source of reference, except for the windmills.

The Maritz Wetland didn't require any windmills. The waterwheel, which used the hydropower of the tributary, was enough. Moreover, the Frontera Barony had a talent who could make a traditional screwed-type pump waterwheel, just like most of the fiefdoms.

"Anyway, the waterwheel construction will begin soon. I already placed an order."

It was true. Lloyd had summoned the talent on day one of the reclamation project. He had prepared a heft down payment for him in advance. He should be here soon. The engineer was slated to come today but the man was nowhere in sight. Instead of him, a group of unwelcomed and uninvited guests arrived.

What is that?

From the South of the Maritz Wetland Lloyd noticed a group of people. There were about twenty people, and everyone rode horses.

The engineer? No, they're not.

They were neither civil engineer soldiers nor workers. Among the group of people, there was a guy in the front draped with a fancy cape, riding a white horse. Just then, a portion of the story in The Knight of Blood and Iron came to his mind. Viscount Lacona? The South of the Frontera barony was home to Lacona viscounty. The novel mentioned in brief that Viscount Lacona was a man of extreme extravagance.

A cape in this weather? Yeah, it has to be him.

While Lloyd continued to think, the unwelcome guests continued to approach. As soon as they closed in on Lloyd, one of the men tossed a question at him without any sort of introduction.

"Are you in charge of the construction site?" The voice came from a man riding a black horse.

He was dressed simply but based on his muscular build, the sword tucked into his waist, and adept horse riding, Lloyd could ascertain that the man was a knight. Javier stepped forward and said, "Watch your manners. This noble gentleman here is Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Baron Frontera, the owner of the Frontera fiefdom. Who do you serve, and what business does your master have to come all the way here?"

"Lloyd Frontera? Hmm. We have a business with the baron of the fiefdom. Pray, where is he?"

Javier's eyebrow twitched and he had all the right to react that way. He had made it plain and evident that the son of the baron was present. The man, who certainly was a knight, paid no manners to this. Moreover, he even spoke without getting off the horse, unilaterally requesting to meet the baron. His manners bordered on brutishness. However, Javier failed to lash out at the man for his impertinence as he failed to grab the chance to do so. That was because Lloyd immediately cut in before Javier could hurl the harsh words that were just at the tip of his tongue.

"Could it be perhaps that you are Leonero Viscount Lacona?"

“Yes, he is. The eldest son of the Frontera barony better mind his manners to the viscount…”

“Hush. Stay out of this lowlife. The nobles are talking here. Are you Viscount Lacona?”

Lloyd ignored the knight and looked at the man draped in a cape. The knight on the black horse instantly grimaced. The same thing happened to the twenty knights behind him. When he saw their changing faces, Lloyd plastered a bigger smile.

“It is a pleasure to meet you. As my knight has introduced me to you already, I am Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Baron Frontera. To what do I owe the pleasure of your visit?”

Viscount Lacona stared at Lloyd instead of answering. Lloyd, in turn, locked his gaze without looking away. Silence blared between them as they stood under the fading summer sun. The viscount was the first to break the silence.

“So the rumors are true about Baron Frontera’s eldest son’s eccentric and impudent manners.”

“Have you heard rumors about me?” Lloyd asked.

“Of course I did. I realize that the rumors were indeed true as we speak at this moment.”

“I am honored. My reputation is soaring through the roof.”

“Anyway,” Lloyd went on, “to what pleasure do I owe your visit?”

“I would like to discuss the matter with your father as much as possible.”

“I would like to find out first what your business is as much as possible.”

“Tsk. You always have a response for everything, don’t you.”

“Thank you,” Lloyd said flatly.

“I came to talk about the territory.”

“By territory, what do you mean?”

“This place, the Maritz Wetland.” The viscount spoke, then looked around.

His goatee twitched as he spoke.

“As a vassal to the King, I hold a duty to manage and protect my fiefdom. However, news of misfortune continued to disturb my spirit in recent days. And it pertains to this place, the Maritz Wetland.”

“What news could that be?”

“That the Frontera family is developing the wetland without any prior negotiations whatsoever with me.”

The viscount continued before pausing for a second.

“You would know it, too. That the Maritz Wetland sits in between the territories of the Frontera barony and my viscounty.”

“Yes, of course I do.” Lloyd nodded his head.

It was true. The Maritz Wetland was sandwiched between the barony and the viscounty.

To be more exact, the north of the wetland belonged to the barony, and the southern part belonged to the viscounty.

In a grave, dignified voice, the viscount said, “Therefore, the southern part of this wetland is under my sole right and ownership. Think about it. What is a fiefdom? It is a land entrusted by the great King for governance.”

“Yes, indeed.”

“Thus, whose duty is it to rule over the land?”

“The lord’s.”

“Yes,” the viscount said. “Now we are talking.”

The corners of his lips rose upward in contentment. That got Lloyd to smile bitterly.

He couldn’t hold it. It came out by reflex. Haha, now I know. Lloyd had speculations in the back of his mind. So he wanted to hear the viscount out to confirm his suspicions. Lloyd saw through why the viscount, who was living in the south, had come all the way up to visit the fiefdom.

It was for a simple reason.

The Maritz Wetland was useless for generations. But he must have heard that his neighboring fiefdom is developing the place. He’d have been dazed at first but not after he calculated the potential profits. And he’d have decided to wait until the development was over. Why? He wanted to wait until the apples fell from the tree. That way, he could demand that a portion of the land belongs to them. Classic free-riding tactic. What a vermin. He’s a true pest.

These kinds of pests were everywhere. They were like flies that dived into poop whenever they found opportunities to make a profit.

It was the same case in South Korea. The swindlers that scammed his father and destroyed his family were like this viscount. Not only that, the phishing scammers were just the same bunch. It wasn’t exclusive to crimes. Such people could be easily found in daily life, too.

Those sly bastards who constantly took more than their share. Those players stayed safely hidden for the entire game except when it was time for the final kill.

That’s just how the world is. Conscience? This place is rife with selfish individuals whose self-interests come first before their conscience.

Lloyd thought this world wasn’t much different. The Maritz Wetland he was newly developing...He had expected that he would attract a swarm of dirty flies and the viscount right in front of him was one of the pests.

So obvious and plain.

This whole situation was already foreseen by Lloyd.

He had seen through it ever since he first planned the development. So, in other words, you picked the wrong person to mess with. Lloyd sneered as he stared at the viscount. How puny and dumbfounding. He had shed sweat, blood, and tears to develop this wetland and how dare this viscount try to freeload on him? Lloyd resolved that he had to act extremely ruthlessly to ensure that such a disgusting idea would be completely wiped out from the viscount's mind. However, the viscount was kept absolutely private to Lloyd's swirl of thoughts. He simply kept blabbering, his saliva splattering out of his mouth.

"Therefore, it is only right and proper that you give me the southern half of the Maritz Wetland. Why? Because this holy fief has been bestowed by the great King to me, I must fulfill my loyal duty to look after the land. Am I clear?"

Lloyd didn't respond.

"As such, you must call the baron immediately. Do not make me waste any more of my time."

Lloyd remained silent still.

"Do you not hear me?"

"I do very well. There is just a pest in my ears that's buzzing very loudly."

"Excuse me?"

The viscount grimaced as Lloyd picked his ears and looked around. It was quiet around him.

Was no one there? No, there were a lot of people surrounding him. The twenty knights brought by the viscount, the civil engineers, and the waterwheel engineer who arrived late, were standing around awkwardly. More than a hundred people were gazing at his side.

Everyone remained wordless, their ears ready to catch every word of the conversation.

A huge crowd meant that the game was on. It's good that people are around because conflicts like these must-have witnesses. He was happy with the spotlight he was in.

Lloyd brightly smiled. He looked up at the viscount, who was still on his horse.

"I heard you, Viscount. Loud and clear. And what you are claiming as well. As I was listening to you, it just dawned on me that you are well-versed in the art of speaking nonsense. Tell me, was there no one to educate you in your formative years?"

"What...?"

"From now on, we shall have a fruitful time wherein I go over your nonsense one by one to legally illustrate that the words you just spewed are more worthless than dried-up wet wipes."

Lloyd maintained a bright smile as he spoke and with that smile, Lloyd started to barrage the viscount with sharp criticisms, thus beginning the blitz of merciless truth bombs.

Chapter 48: How to Make Land (3)

It hurts. It hurts even though no one punched, kicked, or whacked me with a club. This numb, stinging pain is real.

Viscount Lacona thought to himself. However, his pain was inevitable. After all, Lloyd had dropped a massive truth bomb on him in front of more than a hundred people. He was caught off-guard.

“Alright, so let’s go over it one by one. You claim that half of the Maritz Wetland belongs to your viscounty, am I right?”

“Of course.”

“And so, you claim that half of the recently reclaimed wetland must be under your ownership, yes?”

“That is right as well.”

“But there is a grave loophole in such a claim.”

“A loophole?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied. “The loophole is that you have forgotten that this land has been long abandoned.”

“How is that a loophole?”

“For your claim is violating the Royal Land Act of the Kingdom, which the most revered King protects.”

“What...?” The viscount flinched.

Lloyd chuckled. “Land Act of the Kingdom, Title 321. My proof is in the special exemption regarding the development of barren land.”

“Land Act? Title 321?”

“Yes, the act dictates the ownership of barren land that’s been abandoned if it gets reclaimed. Now, let’s walk through the act one by one, shall we?”

“What are you...”

“Article one states the purpose of the law regards the development of long-standing barren land and the establishment of ownership of the reclaimed land.”

“Excuse me?”

“Article two states that barren land is land that has been abandoned for over 100 years without any residential or cultivation activities transpiring on the land.”

“Listen to me first…”

“Article three states that any and all land that meets the requirements listed below will be recognized as belonging to the developer of the barren land. First, the land must be developed with a clear purpose through the investment of capital and labor. Second, the land must be able to support a residential building. Third, the land must be able to support long-term agricultural activity. Fourth, the land must have produced at least one harvest of a crop variety specified by law.”

“Come on, listen to me first…” the viscount muttered, his voice in a rush.

However, such a protest was immediately silenced by Lloyd’s eloquence which spared him no second to rebut

“Article four states that in the case the developed land meets all the requirements listed in Article Three, the land shall be owned by the developer, and it can be registered in the land registry of the Kingdom following the proper procedures.”

“Article five states that the items required to enforce the law shall be determined by the royal law regulations. That’s all. If you want to listen to it again, please press number one. No customer service agents to help you out, so why don't you shut your mouth and accept defeat?"

Lloyd chuckled as the viscount was at a complete loss of words.

What kind of brat is this?

Viscount Lacona stared hard at him, his gaze dismayed and dumbfounded. The eldest son of Baron Frontera was an incorrigible hooligan. The viscount had heard rumors about this person. Everyone said that he drenched himself in alcohol every day and wreaked havoc on the fiefdom. They also said that reason was recently knocked into him but no one knew what had happened. That's why the viscount had thought lightly of Lloyd. Even when this notorious hooligan stopped him and started to refute his claims, the viscount thought that a fledgling boy like him wouldn't know much of anything.

The viscount had decided to shut this pesky kid up at once and head to meet the baron.

However, it turned out that he was wrong. T*his boy. He's not an ordinary kid.* Lloyd, in fact, was more than ordinary. He may be young, but the viscount knew better now than to try to take advantage of his young age. The viscount would surely go back home penniless.

He swallowed, his throat dry.

There was a law like that in the Kingdom? It is my first time hearing about it. But he's full of confidence, so I doubt he is making things up. Wait a minute. Could it be that he had prepared beforehand because he knew I'd come here? Is that how he studied the law in advance?

At that instant, the hairs on the viscount's arms rose. If his presumption was true, he could not think lightly of this eccentric bastard, who was horrifyingly meticulous. What is this guy?

The viscount collected his thoughts. He couldn't back out like this. The Maritz Wetland was a vast land, and half of it took the southern landmass.

This posed a perfect opportunity for him to usurp the land for free. With every fiber of strength left in his soul, the viscount racked his brain. Think. Find a loophole in that boy's words. Rebut him with a perfect reply...Oh, wait. That's it.

An idea hit him and the viscount's eyes brightened. With eyes overflowing with confidence, he stared down at Lloyd.

"The Land Act of the Kingdom. That is an interesting story."

"Isn't it? The law is always fair."

"Yes, I'm sure it is. It is fair that it gives a fair opportunity to a person like me. Just like now."

"What is it that you want to say?"

"What do you mean? Well, let me explain it to you. You see, it appears that you have yet to meet an important requirement for this developed land to be yours."

"An important requirement?"

"I'm talking about crops! Crops! Wahaha!"

The viscount smiled in utter satisfaction. He looked like a predator that had found its prey's weakness.

"You mentioned it loud and clear while you were narrating the act. You said that the barren land must meet several requirements in order for it to be regarded as developed. I believe one of the requirements was that the land must have yielded crops at least once."

"Yes, I did."

"Hahahaha! This is why you have a lot to learn, boy! Child, have you harvested any crops in the land?"

The viscount beamed, smiling like a winner. I won, you brat! The viscount was content. Here came a fledgling brat who attempted to fight back using the law and the viscount used the very thing against the boy to silence him. Yes, yes, the viscount thought so to himself.

That was until Lloyd let out a scoff.

“That is really funny.”

Not a hint of embarrassment flickered across Lloyd’s face. He only smiled but in amusement.

He looked like a sadist seeing someone struggle.

Putting on a bright smile, Lloyd said, “Actually, I just wanted to show you something. Hold on. Could you please rein your horses to the side? Just a little bit?”

“What...?”

“Two steps, that’s all.”

“What are you...?”

“There you go. Good, good.”

Lloyd stretched out his hands while the viscount was left in dismay. He stroked the white horse’s head and gently tugged the rein to the side, causing it to neigh and move two steps to the side. It happened so spontaneously that the viscount hadn’t had the time to stop him.

“What are you doing?!”

“Please, just a second.”

The viscount protested, but it was useless. Lloyd threw a half-assed answer and bent his waist forward, reaching toward the ground.

Humming a happy tune, Lloyd said, “Whew. Thankfully, it’s unharmed. You have no idea how worried I became when I saw you had to stop your horses right over here out of all the places. I was afraid that you would step on these.”

“Here, do you see this?”

Lloyd, all hunkered down, pointed at the ground. The viscount’s incredulous gaze traced Lloyd’s fingers and there he saw it.

“Weeds?”

“Wrong. It’s onions.”

Lloyd grabbed a chunk of green leaves that sprung up out of the ground and carefully dug the earth, pulling it up gently. A luscious red-brown onion was plucked, looking delicious and sweet. A bright smile formed on Lloyd’s face, the corners rising all the way up to his ears.

“Oh, my. Congratulations. You just watched the greatest moment in the history of the reclaimed Maritz land. Its first crop ever. I won’t ask you to pay for my show. I am not stingy. Anyway, I am so glad the onion grew to a good size, hahaha.”

The viscount’s face darkened. He was dazed. Lloyd brushed off the dirt that had smudged around the onion. He held it out to the viscount.

“So, I’ve proven to you now that we do meet the requirement of having to yield crops. So what now? Here you can take this. You’ve come a long way. Take it as your souvenir. I just think it would be improper of me to send my guests back empty-handed.”

The viscount didn’t take the onion. To be more exact, he couldn’t. In shock, he could only gaze down at Lloyd, trying to make sense of what was happening. The viscount wasn’t alone in his trance. The knights were the same and no one had time to get angry. Lloyd chuckled and tied the onion around the viscount's horse saddle.

In a firm and cold voice that sounded like nails on a chalkboard, Lloyd said, "Then take care then. Javier?"

Lloyd's voice searched for Javier.

"They are our valuable guests. Make sure you walk them out."

"Yes, your word is my command."

Javier quickly read the room and moved forward. He had already figured out the exact situation. Not only that, he understood more than anyone else the very steps Lloyd had taken to prepare for this moment. He knew because he was the very person who had planted the onions. Whew...Planting onions was quite challenging. Javier lightly sighed.

It must have been around the time when they were installing vertical drains. If Javier remembered correctly, it was either the morning after he had drilled holes in the designated areas or the time he told himself that his job in this construction project was finished.

Lloyd had summoned him and given such a random order, "Grow some onions. Start from today."

At first, Javier thought this was some sort of a secret signal. He wondered if he had failed to find the special meaning hidden behind those words. However, that wasn't the case as the command was literal. Lloyd was ordering him to grow some onions. When Lloyd shoved a small pickaxe and a bag of fertilizers into his arms, Javier realized once more that he wasn't joking. Of course, Javier felt defiant. Up until that day, he had accepted to work in construction because it was for the development of the fiefdom, but growing onions was another thing.

"I wonder why you are entrusting me with such a task."

This task wasn’t fit for a knight as it was a farmer’s job. However, why was the young master ordering him this task? He wanted to find out why, at least. So he asked and Lloyd chuckled and answered in a nonchalant manner. His words were far from being nonchalant.

“Because the onion you’ll grow may come to protect the Maritz Wetland in the future.”

What Lloyd said sounded important. He couldn’t just brush it aside and ignore him. Now that he had heard what it was for, Javier couldn’t refuse to obey. He must have a reason. There must be a hidden motive he isn’t telling me.

Thinking that in his head, Javier obediently took the pickaxe and the bag of fertilizer. He planted the onions. Of course, the job wasn’t easy as he had never farmed before. I had no idea that growing something involves so much work. Javier was an orphan. His parents had died in a war when he was five. If it weren’t for the saving grace of Baron Frontera, he would have died on the streets.

To repay his debt, he gave all of himself to mastering swordsmanship. It was his attempt to fulfill the promise of protecting the lord by acting as his sword. With everything going on in his life, he wasn’t able to gain farming experience and the same went with growing onions.

I had to get a lot of help from farmers.

They offered him endless advice and nagging as well. Thanks to them, he was able to grow onions successfully. Today, that single vegetable saved the reclaimed Maritz land from the viscount. Did Master Lloyd really predict this situation would happen? There was no other explanation for his behavior. The more Javier thought about it, the more impressed he was with his young master. However, there wasn’t time to be impressed. It was time for Javier to dance to Lloyd’s brazen and perfect tune.

“I am Knight Javier Asrahan, who serves Baron Frontera. I will escort you out on your way back.”

Javier quickly jumped in with expert manners while the viscount was still lost in confusion.

He then naturally led the viscount and his men before they could voice opposition.

“Let us go, Viscount. Over there.”

“Uhm…”

Finally jostled out of trance, the viscount shuddered, but he was too late. Soldiers and other men that belong to the barony were gazing hard at him, intently paying attention to every word he said and he was completely beaten by the brat’s arguments. What if he continued to persist and refused to move away or blew his fuse, not accepting his argument?

That would be the same as throwing his reputation to the ground. That would be the same as tainting his own reputation. I got properly served. Viscount Lacona licked his lips, his mouth growing bitter. He shot a glare at Lloyd before turning away, and he gritted his teeth as he was escorted out by Javier. Once the viscount was gone, Lloyd stood with a content expression on his face, and the soldiers murmured among themselves in excitement as they looked at him.

“Did you see that? Did you just hear that?”

“Of course I did. Viscount Lacona’s face was priceless.”

“He was entirely beside himself. Wahaha.”

“I know, right? How dare he try to steal this land when we endured this murky place to build everything.”

“Whew! You’re right. We’ve shoveled all day to make this land. How dare he try to freeload off us.”

“Zero conscience, really. And Master Lloyd wonderfully served him, that heartless bastard.”

“Gosh, that felt so good! I know I can sleep well tonight.”

The civil engineer soldiers giggled happily. This vast land used to be a murky wetland, abandoned and useless. Who changed this place? They did it with one shovel in their hands and beads of sweat dripping down from an entire day’s worth of work.

This land was the product of their persistent effort and labor under the burning sun. They could never look at the viscount favorably as the noble demanded to give up half of the land for free. They secretly cheered for Lloyd when they heard the dispute between their young master and the viscount. So, Lloyd’s victory felt like theirs.

My young master is the best! The soldiers clenched their fists, their thoughts unified. They were proud and content. The very object of their pride and contentment, Lloyd, grimaced as he looked at them.

“What are you all looking at? Something funny here?”

As soon as Lloyd scolded, the soldiers jumped to action right away. They resumed shoveling at lightning speed, showing zero signs that they were watching the dispute. Since these soldiers worked with Lloyd through various construction projects, they somewhat had some hazy understanding of what Lloyd was like.

It’s bonus time soon! Keke.

Despite his sharp tongue, the young master cherished his men very much. Despite his severe scolding, the young master guaranteed break time. Despite the hard work, the young master gratefully presented each of them with a thick bonus. The soldiers’ faces brightened as they imagined the bonus they would be receiving. The Frontera barony was a rural province in the eastern region of the kingdom. The biggest construction in the history of this fiefdom was waiting for its finale.

But of course, the people didn’t know. They didn’t know that the construction wasn’t over.

That it was just the beginning of a larger transformation. Lloyd didn’t have any plans of stopping. Everything he had done up to this point was for reclamation. From now on, it was time to develop their work.

Before manufacturing the waterwheel to finish off the reclamation project, Lloyd went to the baron to propose a new plan. Once the plan was laid out, the baron nodded happily in agreement. The following day, the barony announced the “The Reclaimed Maritz Land’s Migration Plan.” Upon hearing the plan of his northern neighbor, Viscount Lacona hurled the piece of onion he was fiddling with at full swing against the wall.

Chapter 49: The Perfect Completion Ceremony (1)

“What did you just say?!”

Viscount Lacona’s arm swished violently in the air. The air brushed against his veiny wrist and fingers. He threw the weighty onion in his hand with full strength. As it was hurled into the air, friction occurred as one side of its ruddy skin slightly latched onto the tip of his index and middle finger.

Just like a baseball thrown by a strong-armed pitcher, the onion started rotating.

Then it drew a trajectory of the two-seam fastball. It flew and cut across the office room, nothing to interrupt its travel and then, it smashed against the wall. The onion was crushed.

Sir Javier Asrahan’s blood, sweat, and tears were poured into this very vegetable. Now, it had turned into an avant-garde pattern on the wall of the viscount’s office. However, Viscount Lacona did not give a hoot about it. His angry gaze traveled toward the innocent administrator.

“The report you just gave me. Repeat it.”

“Oh, yes...”

The administrator carefully opened the paper, and his shoulders shrunk. It was the pamphlet the Frontera barony had produced and distributed.

“As I have mentioned earlier, the Frontera barony distributed the pamphlet which lays out the policy encouraging people to migrate to the reclaimed Maritz Wetland. But what it contains here...” The administrator paused for a second.

“Whew. Keep on reading,” the viscount demanded.

“Yes, of course. The following is the migration policy announced in the pamphlet.”

The administrator started to read.

“All residents who migrate to the reclaimed land will be protected for three years. Seeds of crops will be provided for free, and taxes will be exempted in full. Moreover, in case of a bad harvest year, each household will be provided with the grain worth a meal a day.”

Afterward, he paused and narrowed his eyes into slits.

“Furthermore, those who move to the reclaimed Maritz Wetland are required to stay and live in the land for five years, and external migration during those years will be restricted. Uhm, that part is written at the bottom in tiny fonts,” said the administrator.

“Ugh.” A deep frown was formed on the viscount’s forehead.

His blood pressure surged when he heard it for the first time. And now, the same thing was happening again. He couldn’t help it. Those nutcases, really! The viscount could feel that they were extremely serious about this migration policy. Did he think so because the pamphlet listed out the overly generous policies? No. The crux of the pamphlet lay in the last line, which was in very small fonts.

This means that anybody who decides to migrate there will have to settle there for at least five years.

People could move in by volition but not move out as they have to be there for a minimum of five years. That’s how long people would be bound to reside in the reclaimed land. What about the seemingly lavish benefits? The benefit will cover only the first three years of migration. That’s the thing with this policy. The protection benefit only lasted three years and yet, the migrants were mandated to reside for five years. What about the two years left once the timeline for the benefits passed?

They must hold up without any support at all. And what would happen on the off chance the farming flops? They’ll have to starve to death just like that.

That was what was scary about the barony's migration policy. That was the very part that made him nervous. However, he wasn't worried for the villagers who might migrate there. His nervousness absolutely had nothing to do with them. He wasn't worried about them because he could already anticipate the villagers' reactions toward the policy.

They will only see the massive protective benefits that will be provided for three years. And those two years where they will have to live without it would be completely brushed aside, even if they know about it. No, they will think that it will be okay. They will believe that they can hold up those two years if they work hard for the first three years.

That was how human psychology worked. People believed that they could do well even if others failed. They would argue that they are the exception even if you showed them countless statistics that proved otherwise. Objectiveness was thrown out the window in exchange for baseless confidence. That was how businesses failed after turning a blind eye to all the dissuading words of concern from others. Some tried out various forms of investing and ended up losing their fortunes. This human mentality was powerful among us. We believed that any risk or burden could be set off by the immediate benefits in front of us.

The barony manipulated that mentality very slyly.

At first glance, the policy was seemingly full of amazing benefits. However, one deeper look would reveal the disastrous burdens one had to shoulder. The peasants would be happy at first once they moved to the wetland but as time passed by, it would hit them that things weren't as easy as they believed. Thus, they would dedicate their entire lives to making the farmlands fertile.

That's what the barony is after in the first place.

The barony's goal was to pressure the migrants in the last two years after alluring them to migrate there with the benefits. This pressure would push them to be at their maximum efficiency and five years later... The reclaimed Maritz Wetland would turn into a perfectly fertile, abundant land. That was why the viscount was green with envy. The jealousy was so raw and sour that his stomach churned and it became more acidic when he thought about how half of the wetland used to be his possession. I can't back out like this. The land should have been mine.

The land was too valuable for him to back away without a fight. He didn't want to give up.

He yearned to take back his portion of the land, come hell or high water before the reclaimed land became settled into the barony's ownership. He nibbled his fingernails.

Just then, an idea popped into his head. Yes. That's it. The viscount lifted his head.

Looking at the self-conscious and nervous administrator, he said, "Go at once and bring me the dye workshop supervisor."

A corner of his lips rose as he gave the order. His smile beamed with certainty that his plan would be victorious.

A few days passed. Meanwhile, Lloyd's plans took place like clockwork and the Maritz Wetland was nearing its completion. Lloyd spread the migration policy far and wide to the people. He received considerably more applications than he expected. Among them, however, some expressed concerns about the migration. Those concerns had nothing to do with the last two years, where they would have to live without the three-year protection benefit.

What if it rains, and the water isn't drained?

They were worried about that the most. Such concern was actually a non-issue. After all, this place had been a wetland for the longest time. As the land sat very low, nearby rivers flooded in each time it rained, creating pools of still water. That was how this land became a wetland, and it had been so since the distant past. However, such a place was turned upside down by human labor. Lloyd and the soldiers built embankments, drained water, and transformed it into dry land. Even though the migration applicants knew this, they were nervous that it might not hold up.

Besides, they were used to calling this place the “Maritz Wetland,” not “Maritz land.”

This place had always been a swamp ever since they were young. More time was needed to change its impression on people. Of course, Lloyd was acutely aware of the villager’s concerns. So he decided to prepare a show for everyone: The completion ceremony.

“Alright! Get in line!”

It was the day a total of six screw-type pump water wheels would be completed. The baron, baroness, civil engineers, and most residents in the fiefdom gathered up at the embankment.

The heavens must have been on Lloyd’s side, for there was heavy rain. The entire wetland got soaked in an instant. The rainwater stagnated through the meticulously designed drain. And it traveled to the drain facility where the water wheels were installed.

The water in the drain facility entered the waterwheels. The new waterwheels, which still gave off a woody odor, turned with great force. The screwed pump rotated to draw the water up from the drains. Going against gravity, it pushed out of the drain pipes. The water, which was discharged through the drain pipes, gushed out into the river courses flowing outside the embankment.

At the same time, the water level in the drain facility quickly dropped. The waterwheel had properly demonstrated its functionality. Then, the rain stopped and afterward, Lloyd led the baron, baroness, and people to tour every corner of the reclaimed land by foot. Of course, this land was still an empty plain with red clay soil. It was completely empty save for the sparsely grown weeds. However, it meant more than that for the peasants who looked around the place. To them, this land looked more luscious and promising than anything else.

Filling up the empty land with new crops...This was what they wanted the most.

“Honey, don’t you think this place is better than we thought?”

“Yes, indeed. It had rained a lot a while ago, but...”

“No stagnation. I do not even see a puddle.”

“Yes, it is,” the husband replied. “Is it because several drains are installed all over the place?”

“It appears so. But it is amazing. Look how moist this land is all the time.”

“It looks like only the necessary water remained once the excess water was drained during the construction.”

“Yes, it has. Plus, look at the soil,” the wife said as she pointed.

“Let me see it. Hmm... This wouldn’t even need to be fertilized.”

“Right? I have never seen land more fertile than this. It appears anything planted here will grow well.”

The husband didn’t respond, sensing where this conversation was heading.

“Honey, we can’t always live as tenant farmers working for others for the rest of our lives, right?” Her eyes glimmered. The husband didn’t reply once again.

“The eldest one wants to study. For that to happen, he must be sent to the city, but the money is just...”

“I see...I will seriously consider it,” said the husband at last.

The peasants touched the lands and looked at the drain facilities with their own eyes.

The drains were constructed like a spider’s web, covering all corners of the land. Each drain was delicately placed according to Lloyd’s calculations. Thanks to that, no matter how much it poured, the land remained just wet enough without getting stagnated. Just the right amount of water remained in the soil for farming. Anything leftover flowed out through the drains.

Moreover, the soil on this land was excellent for farming. For tens and thousands of years, a huge amount of dead plants and organisms piled underneath the water. As they decomposed, their remnants eventually turned into soil after accumulating in mass over time. Thus, this place was a rich and fertile land that didn’t require any fertilizers with robust and worry-free drain facilities. The fertile land that any farmer would want. The villagers’ hearts pounded in real-time as they toured the reclaimed Maritz Wetland and Lloyd was never going to miss this perfect opportunity. Now, those who were finished looking around the land walked out to leave. However, they found Lloyd nearby, welcoming them. He was sitting at a makeshift table with a paper contract.

“Here. Come over here and take a seat. Enjoyed looking around the reclaimed land?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes. All thanks to you...”

“How was it? Oh, sorry. Do you want some water?”

“Thank you.”

“No problem. It’s hot, isn’t it?”

“Not at all. Uhm, how should I say this? I didn’t feel hot at all going around the land.”

“How so?” Lloyd asked, his one eyebrow raised.

“Because I kept thinking about all the crops I could plant right away,” the farmer replied.

“Haha. Is that how much you liked the land?”

“Yes, Young Master,” said the farmer.

“Does that mean you are interested in moving here?” pressed Lloyd.

“Uhm...Of course, I want to, but...”

“But what?”

“Young Master may not know this, but I am currently a tenant farmer in the field owned by Sir Hans...”

“Aha, you’re talking about the guy who runs an orchard, right?”

“Yes.”

“Why? Did he say that he won’t let you go?”

“Uhm, sort of...” trailed the farmer.

“If that’s the case, say no more. It’s solved. You have heard about the migration policy, haven’t you?”

“Yes.”

“That is officially provided by the fiefdom.” Lloyd leaned back to the chair and grinned.

This made the farmer lean forward toward the table. “What do you mean by official assistance?”

“It means that no one can stop a tenant farmer who wants to migrate.”

“But what about the field I am in charge of...”

“But it’s not like you are going to move in here right away tomorrow, right?”

“Yes, that’s true,” replied the farmer.

“Then you can move after you finish up your job in the land. Hold on, do you want to spend the rest of your life plowing someone else’s land? Is that what you wanted?” Lloyd asked, his voice slightly high-pitched.

“Ah, no.”

“Good. Good. And now you have a chance right in front of you to own your own land”

“Surely, it won’t be easy,” Lloyd warned. “You will have to give your best for the first five years.”

“Yes, I am aware of that.”

“So what now? Do you think you can handle that?”

The farmer remained silent.

“I guess you don’t want it,” said Lloyd and motioned to stand.

“No!”

“No? Are you in then?”

“Yes.”

“Are you sure? You can’t back out. This is your last chance.”

“I will sign it.”

“Good… Since you want it so bad, I guess there is nothing I can do.”

Lloyd slipped his hand under the table, feigning his reluctance. He pulled out a piece of contract paper very skillfully.

Pointing to the items one after one in the contract, he said, “Let’s sign it. Sign here and here and here. Just your name.”

“Uhm, I don’t know how to write...”

“Then you can thumbprint it. Give me your finger.”

“Yes.”

“Stamp here. There you go. Good job. And here next. Good.”

“Thank you.”

“No need to thank me,” said Lloyd. “Starting next year, you’ll find yourself working hard to plow this land.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

“Alright then. Take care. Next!”

The farmer rose from the table and bowed. He went away. Behind him was a long queue of people. Most of them were tenant farmers who didn’t have their own lands. Good. Reclaimed land migration. This is perfect. The corners of Lloyd’s mouth slowly crept up.

That day, he signed away all the migration contracts. It was the perfect completion ceremony. On top of that, more rewards followed suit, which he never expected to receive.

[Monumental achievement in construction!]

[Your reclamation of a land that was historically a swamp has been impressive. The Maritz Wetland will now be cultivated by the hard work and passion of the farmers into a land of promise and abundance.]

[You have left an indelible mark in the history of civil engineering on the Lorasia Continent.]

[Your achievement in civil engineering has been recorded in the construction history of the kingdom.]

Chapter 50: The Perfect Completion Ceremony (2)

Lloyd opened his eyes wide. The completion ceremony of Maritz Wetland. It was right after he had finished signing the contracts with all the villagers who wished to migrate here. An unexpected message cascaded in front of his eyes as he was organizing the contracts.

“Is something wrong, Young Master?” Javier asked while helping Lloyd organize the papers beside him.

Javier must have thought it was strange when Lloyd stopped moving and stared into the space out of nowhere.

“If you are tired, take a short break. I will finish up here.”

“Yes. I’d appreciate it if you do that.”

Lloyd left the paperwork for Javier to finish and he turned to the side, pretending to massage his eyes. As he did so, he read down the messages that floated in front of him.

[As a reward, you have received a large amount of skill experience.]

[The survey skill has been upgraded by two levels.]

[Intermediate Surveying: Lv. three]

[Area that can be measured at once: 3,600 square meters]

[Skill Options: One: Land Cost Appraisal, Two: Subterranean Scanning]

[The design skill has been upgraded by two levels.]

[Intermediate Design: Lv. three]

[Volume of structure that can be projected at once: 216,000 cubic meters]

[Skill Options: One: Map Printing, Two: Floor Plan Marking (Two Dimensional) Three: Simulation Mode]

Wow. What is this?

It was just in time. Lloyd had been thinking of investing his RP in enhancing his survey and design skills. He felt the need to do it as he developed the Maritz Wetland. His current skills proved to be lacking in covering the vast lands and just when he had the thought, he leveled up.

What's more, I didn't even spend any RP. It was completely free.

There was no such thing as a free lunch, people said. Lloyd believed that was crap. He believed that he should drop anything he was doing and run to get a free lunch. That was Lloyd's principle. However, that wasn't the end of his reward. The truly valuable ones followed.

[You have gained a unique experience from designing and constructing a land of massive scale.]

[This experience is having a strong effect on your <Skill: Design>]

[Skill Option Two: Floorplan Marking (two-dimensional) has been enhanced.]

A message about the optional skill, Floorplan Marking (two-dimensional), appeared in front of him. The letters that explained the skill were erased in real time to be replaced with another. The explanation changed according to the following:

[Skill Option 2: Floor Plan Marking (three-dimensional) - You can see the three-dimensional floor plan of your designed output on the actual land. (Note: Only you can see it.)]

Without any words, Lloyd squeezed his fist without realizing it. The skill was nuts, Lloyd thought. This skill is absolutely and truly overwhelming.

This means that I can create a complete aerial view of the land in advance if I use this design skill before construction.

A three-dimensional aerial view projected by a hologram would be incredibly realistic.

Lloyd would be able to see all his models in advance. What's more, I can always modify the floor plan at any time. If I use it with the simulation mode, I can inspect the safety of a structure in real time during the actual construction. Jackpot. No, the word "jackpot" fell short of the luck he had just found himself in. This was because its potential was infinite depending on how Lloyd used it.

But let's test it out because you never know.

Lloyd quickly turned his head. Javier was on the opposite side, arranging the paper contracts so Lloyd quickly surveyed a portion of the embankment slope. He then designed a simple mud hut in the surveyed space as a test. Then, he added the model of the mud hut he had designed to the embankment slope.

[Design Skill Option 2: Floor Plan Marking (three dimensional) has been applied.]

Points and lines emerged in the embankment slope in real time. They expanded and connected. At last, a three-dimensional hologram of a mud hut was erected.

"Hey, hey." Lloyd stretched his hand and tapped Javier on the shoulder.

Pointing at the embankment slope with the hologram mud hut on it, Lloyd said, "Will you look over there?"

"Excuse me?" Javier turned and looked straight ahead.

"There. Is there anything there?"

"There is the embankment."

“Anything else?”

“The tip of your finger comes to my view. Young Master, you have ugly fingers, which is something I notice often.”

Lloyd stared at Javier before saying, “Nothing else...Right?”

“No, Young Master.”

“Okay. Perfect.”

“Perfect? What do you mean, Young Master?”

Javier cocked his head to the side.

It was a look of absolute confusion. Lloyd became convinced as he looked at Javier.

Even if the optional skill of Floor Plan Marking got bumped up to three-dimensional, it’s only visible to me. Additionally, some more small rewards came. Could it be because he shoveled every day to construct the embankment? One of his tool skills, the shoveling skill, leveled up to basic level three. This meant that his shoveling would consume 20 percent less stamina, the shovel’s movements would become faster and stronger by 10 percent, and there would be a 30 percent less chance the shovel would slip out of his hands.

That wasn’t all. Even the RP?! He was given a generous amount. He received five points of likeability with the baron and baroness each, three points of likeability with Javier, and two points of likeability with Sir Bayern. On top of that, his likeability with all the villagers in the fiefdom went up by three points. Thanks to those points, he gained 206 RP.

I’m going to be drowning in rewards at this rate.

The reward messages appeared in front of him one after another without any end in sight. Even on his way back home, he had to read through the messages in front of his eyes. All sorts of rewards and special incentives flooded his sight, and it was disorienting. It was the same when he returned to the estate but this time, what welcomed him weren't messages of rewards shown in obscure numbers. Instead, emotional rewards that directly touched his heart awaited him.

"Young Master, welcome."

"Welcome home, Young Master."

"Please let me know if you need anything, Young Master."

The administrator who did the job of the butler, the male servants who were in charge of the physical work in the estate, and the female maids who took care of the housework all tried to beat one another as they welcomed Lloyd. A long time ago, they used to go aghast and pale every time they bumped into me in the corridor. They plainly displayed fear, nervousness, and even genuine hatred. They used to flash all shorts of antagonistic emotions on their faces.

Now, things had drastically changed. Their attitudes were poles apart. They smiled as they looked at him. They didn't smile just because they were in front of the fiefdom's young master. Their smiles were sincere and natural, something people only made when they were truly happy to see someone. Lloyd was a bit dazed by this, to be honest.

"Ehem! I am quite charming, yes. Ahahaha."

Lloyd had to put on an embarrassed smile on his way to his bedroom. His awkward reaction was understandable, given that he had never received this kind of treatment before. Not just in this world. But in South Korea as well.

He had always been a nobody. He was nothing but a poor college student. It was especially the case when his family was ruined. He absolutely became a nobody. When his parents passed away after suffering from the heavy burden of debt, he became a scum that lived at the bottom of the social ladder. He was always donned in ragged clothes as he couldn’t dare afford new clothes. He sustained himself with the free rice and kimchi in his dorm. As such, he always looked sickly and his face was perpetually yellow and lifeless. His confidence tanked and his expression became gloomy with it. He never dared to adorn himself in those years.

So, wherever he went, he was barely welcomed. Whenever he had meetings with his classmates in college, he was subtly cast out. Since he didn’t have any money, he never attended special events at school. Group projects flustered him the most. Paying for a cup of coffee burdened him whenever they wanted to meet up in coffee shops. He shook in horror when he learned that a single cup of iced black coffee cost more than one dollar. Thus, he was reprimanded for acting like a beggar by his group mates.

It was the same outside college. In convenience stores, the cashier clerks threw suspicious glances, thinking he was a burglar. The manager of his dorm warned Lloyd not to miss his rent with a sharp glare every time they bumped into each other. Such degrading treatment reached its peak during the time he applied for a part-time job at a lab. He needed quick cash. The part-time job consisted of doing a physiological clinical trial for a new drug awaiting its release. He was locked up in a hospital for a few days, forced to take drugs and sit blankly for several hours while someone came in to draw his blood every hour. He felt like he had become an experimental livestock.

And the only person who welcomed me in those days...Hmm, there was only the old woman from Gimbap Heaven on the first floor of my dorm.

He was a regular in Gimbap Heaven, and he occasionally bought one line of plain gimbap.

Each time he entered, she greeted him by saying, “Welcome, my dear,” and such an ordinary greeting was the most welcoming word in the whole world. That was his life back then but he didn’t necessarily consider it tragic. The fact that his existence was on the same level as a dirty floor mat could be surprisingly taken with nonchalance.

Instead of settling there, he strove hard. He put his nose to the grindstone to make a living.

Day and night, he worked his head off to not fall behind in his studies. He often got at least seven nosebleeds a week from stress and exhaustion. Even so, he clutched to the faint hope that things would be better someday, that his life would turn out for the better once he graduated and acquired his license, and did the best he could in his life. His compact room was his papal cocoon, and he worked his way through his life.

Well, thanks to my life back then, I was able to adapt to this world pretty fast from the beginning.

An unwelcomed presence no matter where he went. Lloyd was used to the glances mixed with aversion and mockery. Even if they were filled with contempt, he was fine. People insulted him that he was a brutish young master. They gossiped that he was a dirtbag, but he was completely unaffected. Compared to the constant ridicule he had to withstand back in Korea, what he went through here was a tiny scratch that made him itch. No, the mere fact that he didn't have to worry about eating three meals a day made him happy. He didn't care if people insulted him or not.

That was how he had felt then, but...*I guess this is what it feels like to be popular...*There were no more glances filled with aversion or ridicule. There was no more contempt or gossip. They were all replaced with gazes of respect and admiration and words of welcome. The same thing happened when he ate dinner with the baron and baroness.

"I hope you came hungry. Here, eat this."

"Oh, okay."

"Do you want to try this?" The baroness urged.

"Oh, sure." Lloyd chewed his food.

"Why are you not eating the meat?" She asked right away.

"I am eating it right now..."

"You need to eat more."

The baroness glued herself beside Lloyd throughout the meal. Whenever she noticed his plate starting to empty, she called the maid and ordered her to bring up various types of meat, bread, fruits, and cookies. If Lloyd dared to eat the salad for two bites in a row, that immediately triggered the nagging from the baroness to eat some meat. Goodness, I'm going to have indigestion. His stomach was already warning him. His stomach was so full he felt like it would burst at any second, but the baroness continued to egg him on with no end in sight. She was partnered by the baron, who threw a happy look across from the table.

"It must've been hard to lead a big construction project all this time. Look how much weight you lost."

"Uhm, I didn't lose any weight," Lloyd quietly refuted.

"Yes, you have. Your face is now half the size that it used to be."

"Uhm, that is because…"

"Eat some more. Take big bites. It's not manly to peck at your food with a fork," the baron stated.

"Ugh...I am now…"

"Craving for a grilled duck? Here you go." The baroness cut in.

Kill me instead.

Lloyd wanted to cry, but he did the opposite. He laughed. Though his stomach was strained, his heart was warm. It was especially so when he thought about The Knight of Blood and Iron and the ill fate the barony goes through at this point in time.

By now...Originally...Yes, the baroness falls ill.

In the novel, around this time, the baron and baroness could no longer stay in the estate.

They were kicked out of this estate and forced to live as guests in an acquaintance's house.

Embarrassed and ashamed to stay without paying back, the baroness rolled up her sleeves.

She cleaned the house and washed the dishes in an effort to pay back the help they received.

She was someone who had never worked a day in her entire life before then. What’s more, the house owner, who was grateful for the baroness’s kindness in helping out in keeping the house clean and tidy, eventually started taking her for granted, so the house owner tossed more work in her way. This continued from summer to fall until the stress and physical labor from the unfamiliar housework finally made her ill.

It was pneumonia. Every night, she coughed blood. The moldy and murky blanket became soaked with tears. Though she managed to escape death, it was a torturous experience.

Eventually, the baron, who looked after the baroness, contracted pneumonia as well.

Dejected and despaired, the two eventually returned to their original estate in secret.

In the place they once called home, the two ended their own lives right here at this very place where they were having a meal together. It’s a relief that things didn’t pan out that way, Lloyd thought to himself.

It had been about six months since he arrived in this world. Lloyd was relieved that he had been productively spending his time. A sense of relief flooded him that the misfortune in the novel didn’t happen to this family. Just like that, Lloyd was able to smile at ease as he looked at the baron and baroness.

“No, we have eaten enough already.”

“Do you not like the food?” The baroness asked, wary.

“No, it’s not that, but…”

“Aha! You must want to eat pork, I presume. Just as a man should. Here, there you go. Help yourself all you want.”

“Hohoho. Why don’t you try the steak? It’s freshly grilled.”

I’ll take back what I said about my heart being at ease.

That day, the overeating got Lloyd to clutch his gurgling stomach and make several trips to the bathroom throughout the night.

The following morning rolled around.

“Ugh...”

Lloyd got up from bed, clutching his spinning head. His body felt like it was weighed down by a ton of rocks. Is it because I couldn’t sleep well last night? He had an awful stomach ache throughout the night. Thanks to it, he had to frequent the bathroom several times.

So he was left to roll around in bed but could never fall asleep. I can’t just laze around in bed all day. Time to get up! The reclaimed Maritz Wetland was just in its initial phase of development. He needed to hurry and maintain and divide the land before the migration happened. The fiefdom itself and the roads needed repairing as well. In short, he still had mountains of work to do.

“Hey, wake up.” Lloyd, who had gotten up and dressed earlier, tapped Javier on the shoulder.

He smiled, a bit dumbfounded by how the tables had turned, and he was the one acting like an alarm for Javier ever since the lullaby service began.

“Hmphh...” Javier frowned as he opened his eyes.

Lloyd’s smile widened as he heard him.

“You don’t even get out of bed until I wake you up now.”

“Uhm, I am sorry, Young Master,” Javier groaned.

“Forget it. Wake up. We have a lot of work to do today as well.”

“Okay, Young Master.”

Javier fumbled out of his seat. But there was something off about his face. Lloyd cocked his head to the side.

“Hey, you.”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“Is everything okay with you?” Lloyd frowned.

“Yes, Young Master.”

“Then what’s up with that grimace on your face?”

“Ah, I apologize. My head is pounding for some reason.”

“What? You too?”

“Yes. Wait, Master Lloyd, you too?” Javier’s frown deepened.

“Yeah, this headache has been killing me all morning too.”

“Let us have breakfast first...”

Both of them smiled at the ridiculousness of this strange coincidence, but when the maid entered the room later carrying a tray of breakfast, their wry smile instantly wiped off their faces.

“Hey, are you upset? Why are you frowning too?”

“I am sorry, Young Master. For some reason, I’ve had an awful headache all morning...”

The grimacing maid replied as she flinched in surprise. Lloyd and Javier’s faces hardened at her worrying response.

Chapter 51: We Dig Together (1)

“Haha. Son, what brings you here at such an early hour?”

They were eating breakfast as usual. There was nothing particularly special about the menu either. A loaf of whole-wheat bread and a chunk of homemade sausage. A tiny portion of salad, a fried egg, and a chunk of goat cheese.

The baron and baroness were having a modest breakfast for a noble. They were looking at him, all smiles. But their smiles were a bit different from usual. They were beaming, but there was a shadow overcast on their faces. If their smiles were composed of 100 percent happiness on any other day, right now, they were composed of 90 percent happiness and 10 percent pain.

Lloyd spotted that tiny but significant difference. Without beating around the bush, he went straight to the point.

“Are you,” Lloyd asked, “suffering from a headache?”

“Huh?” The baron flinched.

Surprise washed over him. His gaze wondered how Lloyd had found out.

The baron let out soft laughter and answered, “Haha. How did you know that? My headache has been bothering me since early morning. Isn’t that so, my love?”

“Yes. Maybe we need to change our pillow, seeing as how we both have a headache.”

“Hmm...I have a feeling the problem isn’t just our pillow,” the baron said seriously.

“Then what do you think is causing it?”

“Perhaps,” the baron said, “it is because we are a couple.”

“Are you saying that couples become like one another?”

“Haha, why, I certainly am. How do you understand me so well? We get sick at the same time because I think about you, and you care for me.”

“My, dear, you embarrass me,” said the baroness, her cheeks growing red.

Even in sickness, the baron and the baroness showered, no, bombed each other with love and affection.

Looking at them, Lloyd couldn’t help but smile wryly. The conversation made one thing clear for Lloyd.

Looks like all the people in the estate somehow got a headache.

Lloyd had suffered from a massive headache since he woke up that morning. At first, he thought he was the only one. However, that wasn’t the case. Javier had it, and so did the maid who brought in lunch. The three of them had the same symptoms. A severe, throbbing pain on both sides of their temple.

That’s when the possibility hit Lloyd that there was something more to this. He told himself that this may not be a simple headache. So he skipped his breakfast and came to this place. On the way to meet the baron and baroness, Lloyd checked on the health of the maids and servants he met.

Every single one of them was frowning. Lloyd stopped them and asked if their heads ached.

Everyone gave the same answer. They had a crushing headache ever since they woke up this morning. Now, the baron and the baroness were showing the same symptoms.

There is something behind this.

This situation where everyone in the house was suffering from the same headache… Something was definitely off. But Lloyd smiled instead.

“Haha, all right. Please excuse me.”

“Hmm? Leaving so soon?”

“Yes. I was just stopping by. I still have a lot of things to get done,” Lloyd said.

“Don’t overwork yourself. Make sure to take breaks.”

Lloyd left as the baroness walked out with him. Even then, he didn’t remove the beaming smile on his face. He didn’t feel it was necessary yet to inform them about the current situation. It was too early to report to them.

Right now, nothing’s going to change, even if I tell them about the headache at this point. It’s not like they can give me the solution.

Not only wouldn’t they be able to come up with any solutions right now. The moment he shared the current situation with them, all hell would break loose, and everything would descend into chaos.

First, I need to figure out what is causing this.

He had to know the cause to find a solution. He would tell the baron and baroness afterward.

Thinking that, Lloyd walked out to the hallway.

Javier, who was waiting for Lloyd outside, looked at him with a glimmering gaze.

“How are they both?”

“Are they suffering from a headache as well?” Javier asked.

“Yes.”

Javier’s expression became darkened.

Lloyd tapped his shoulder.

“Don’t droop your shoulders like a sad puppy.”

“Excuse me? I am not a puppy...”

“Let’s go. We have a lot to do.”

“Yes.”

Lloyd led the way, the two exiting the estate. It was early morning, and the weather was getting ready for fall. They walked down along the paved road that led downtown. The place bustled with people as it had the biggest traffic in the fiefdom. A farmer passed by them to do his morning chores. A woman hauled the goat milk she had milked early in the morning.

A young boy chopped down the firewood for the day. A lively morning view stretched in front of Lloyd and Javier.

However, aside from this, there was a commonality in all of them. A slight frown on their faces.

Hmm…

Lloyd frowned, his forehead wrinkling. They were obviously enduring a throbbing headache.

Lloyd walked closer to a farmer working in the field.

“Hey there, mighty fine morning to you.”

“Oh! Young Master Lloyd?”

The farmer stopped for a moment when he realized who it was. His face instantly lit up. Grabbing Lloyd’s hand right away, the man beamed and said,

“Pray, what brings you here so early in the morning, Young Master? How have you been?”

“How have you been? Lloyd retorted. “We met yesterday. We signed the contract for the reclaimed Maritz Wetland.”

“Oh, yes, we did. Right.”

“So, will you please let go of my hands? Thank you for greeting me, but I’m a bit overwhelmed.”

“Oh? Ah! Whoopsie-daisy!” The farmer jerked his hand away.

Lloyd looked at the farmer with a loaded gaze.

“By the way, do you have any complaints against me?”

“Excuse me? Oh my… Why… I don’t.”

“Then, why are you smiling and frowning at the same time?”

“What? Me?” The farmer’s eyes widened.

“Yes.”

“Are you serious?”

“Yeah, I am very serious.”

“My goodness...It’s just that this terrible headache has been bugging me all morning...I am sorry, Young Master.”

“You’ve had a headache all morning?”

“Yes.” The farmer nodded.

“It’s not just me. My wife and kids, too. Everyone started complaining as soon as they woke up about a headache. But what can we do? It’s no wonder I had a nightmare last night.”

“Aha, you think it has something to do with your nightmares?”

“Yes. I am thinking of praying tonight before going to sleep.”

“Good. Make sure you do that,” assured Lloyd.

“Yes, Young Master. Please excuse me now. I should go.”

“Alright. Hang in there.”

“Yes!” The farmer bowed down before hurrying away.

Lloyd smiled and waved at the farmer, but his expression turned icy a second later. Lloyd turned to Javier.

“It must be the same thing, don’t you think?”

“Yes, Young Master. It appears so.”

Javier's face was serious as well.

“Since it’s not just the farmer but the entire family too, I presume...”

“The same symptom is being experienced not just by the people in the estate but also by the people in the fiefdom.”

Something fishy was definitely going on.

Even after that, Lloyd and Javier went to meet more people. Lloyd cleverly framed the questions so that he wouldn’t rouse suspicion and fear over what was happening. The investigation narrowed to one conclusion: everyone was suffering from the same thing. The same headache. That is, everyone in the fiefdom showed the same symptoms. Lloyd and Javier’s expressions grew serious.

“This is serious. What do you think is the cause?”

“An infectious disease?” Javier speculated.

“Hmm, perhaps. Or it could be something environmental.”

“By environmental, you mean...”

“The only environmental factors that could affect the whole fiefdom would be air or water.”

Lloyd had already been weighing in on the possibility that something in the environment could be responsible for this. He was right to speculate so. The two of them became convinced when they heard from a shepherd boy.

“Yes, my head hurts. But that is not the problem,” the shepherd boy grunted.

“What do you mean by that?” Lloyd asked back.

The boy frowned as if he didn’t know how to explain himself. “My peeps haven’t been drinking water since yesterday.”

“Peeps?”

“Sheep and dogs.”

“Aha, your animals refuse to drink water?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, but I don’t know why. They have been like that since yesterday. I tried forcing them, but they kept turning away.”

“Is that so...? That happens with not just one or two animals but every single one of them?”

“Yes, and it’s driving me nuts. What’s their problem? My goodness,” the boy huffed.

“Okay, I get it now. Thank you.”

“What?” The shepherd boy cocked his head to the side.

Lloyd left the boy and hurried his steps. Walking next to Javier, Lloyd sucked in his breath.

“Whew. I found it.”

“The cause, Young Master?”

“Yeah, seriously, that viscount’s a bastard, really!”

“Excuse me?”

“I mean Viscount Lacona. That man with a goatee who demanded half of the Maritz wetland because he used to rule the southern part of it.”

Lloyd gritted his teeth as he turned back to return home.

“This is his doing.”

“What makes you presume so?”

“Presume, my foot. It’s obviously him with this much evidence,” Lloyd snorted.

He had learned of this information while reading The Knight of Blood and Iron. Remembering what he learned from the book, he began to speak what he deduced out loud.

“Let me ask you one thing. What was the specialty of the Lacona viscounty?” asked Lloyd.

“Uhm, I believe it’s their beautifully dyed fabrics.”

“That’s right. The fabric possesses a deep, eye-catching color, which doesn’t get washed away easily. But how does the viscounty dye their special fabric?”

“I think I heard it used the Ladona berry.”

“Correct. More precisely, they concentrate the juice of the Ladona berries to dye the fabric.”

“But what does that have anything…”

“Those berries. They induce headaches as they are toxic. The one we are all experiencing at the moment.”

Javier’s eyes widened slightly.

Lloyd continued to explain. “And the Prona River that crosses the fiefdom from north to south. You know how this river passes the viscounty from the south to flow into our fiefdom, right?”

“Yes.”

“There is our answer. Do you understand what I mean?”

“Yes, though I hate to believe it...” Javier trailed.

“There’s no other explanation. The dye workshop uses the Ladona berries, and they dumped the wastewater into the Prona River.”

“Do you mean on purpose, Young Master?”

“Yes.”

“But why...?”

“To threaten us. And what’s more, this threat is extremely effective. No other fiefdom sits to the north of our fiefdom, where the water passes by. It’s just a rugged valley. So by the time the water reaches other fiefdoms far away from here, the toxins are diluted already. This means that we’re the only ones who are directly impacted. So first, we need to head back to the estate as soon as possible.”

Lloyd hurried his steps. Was he hurrying to inform the baron? No. He hurried because he assumed that someone the viscount had sent would have already arrived at the estate, should his speculation be right.

And my hunches are never wrong in times like these.

So Lloyd speed walked back to the estate.

At the same time in the baron's office. The situation was unfolding exactly as Lloyd predicted.

There was a visitor who had come to see the baron. It was a knight sent by Viscount Lacona. He was not large but had a muscular build. stable posture and sharp eyes. It was Sir Curno. The senior knight of the viscounty, the guy who blabbered his mouth on behalf of the viscount when they came looking for Lloyd the last time. Sir Curno was arrogantly flapping his lips again, just like before, but at the baron this time.

"My master, the viscount, demands only one thing. It is for you to return half of the Maritz Wetland, which your family has developed without our permission, to the viscounty."

The baron grimaced. "Without your permission? Nonsense. I imagine my son explained it to you the other day. The Maritz Wetland was abandoned for several generations, and we have especially used our funds and workers to renovate it. In that case, the developer gets to own the land by law. Does this still not make sense to you?"

"The viscount does not care much to understand it. Therefore, he ordered us to dispose of the concentrated juice of the Ladona berries from the dye workshop into the river."

"What...?"

"It is just as I said. Have you not been suffering from a splitting headache since this morning? I think this clearly sends the viscount's message.

"What is that supposed..."

"Listen carefully. I will spell it out for you. The viscount declared that he would not stop dumping the Ladona berry concentration until you forfeited half of the Maritz Wetland. I am sure the baron must know very well, given your status. What side effects the toxins from the Ladona berry can cause, that is."

"What do you say? Are you starting to think about giving us half the land?"

"Sir Curno. Let me ask you one question. Could you possibly be blackmailing us right now?"

"Yes." Sir Curno nodded explicitly.

The baron became speechless and a second later, he gritted his teeth and said, "This is such a pathetic threat. It appears that your master has no fear of the law. Did you think that this would make us succumb and give you half of the land my son has worked so hard to restore?"

"You will have to eventually," the knight said coolly.

"I shall file a complaint to the Royal Court before that happens."

"By all means."

"What?"

"Do it, I said." A sneer escaped from Sir Curno. "You can sue us. Fine, it is fine. You may win at the end of the day."

"And yet you are not scared of it?"

"Not at all. You will not be able to hold on for that long."

"What..."

"It is going to be at least a year until the trial comes to an end. And the Royal Court is notorious for being expensive. Are you still confident that you will be able to hold on all those months?"

"I reckon your financial situation is not very bright at the moment."

There was explicit contempt in Sir Curno’s gaze. The baron unknowingly bit his lips.

What is this... He wondered if this was what it felt like to be smacked in the head with a hammer. He was enraged but he couldn’t think of anything to respond with.

The only available recourse was to sue them and bring the matter to the Royal Court.

But as though they had seen it already, the knight was mocking him over it.

What should I do? The baron felt stuck. Come to think of it, the knight was speaking the truth. His financial stability was at rock bottom. Even though Lloyd had been resorting to various means and helping him pay off the interest, the future was still bleak for the fiefdom.

If they had to shoulder the fees for suing the viscounty at the Royal Court on top of everything? We won’t last. The baron strove his best to make the most objective judgment.

However, the only conclusion seemed to be that a lawsuit would be too much. His barony wouldn’t be able to last a long and tedious legal fight. It is not like we can keep drinking toxic water. Enduring the headache was far from possible. Right now, the residents in the fiefdom probably thought that this was just an ordinary headache.

Once the cause for their headache was revealed over time...It’s impossible to live without drinking water from the river. People won’t just put up with these painful headaches. Eventually, they will migrate to another fiefdom one by one. He knew where they would go, the viscounty. So right now, his fiefdom was left helpless to fight back. Therefore, the baron thought there was only one way to avoid the worst scenario. Is succumbing the only option I have? His train of thoughts arrived at one destination which was to give what they wanted, half of the Maritz land.

The baron found himself clenching his teeth. If he could, he wanted to throw a punch at Sir Curno in front of him. However, he couldn’t as he was the weak one. He was in the position to give what they wanted. He had no other choice, given that the life of the people and the stability of the fiefdom were at stake.

Fine. It was originally a useless piece of land anyway. I should be thankful that we get to use even half of it.

Rage rose in him, but he could not do anything about it. I must be content with this. He controlled his boiling emotions. He lifted his head and looked at Sir Curno, who was still sneering at him. After hesitating a few times, he finally opened his mouth.

“Whew. Okay, I will give...”

“You the middle finger. Scram!”

Just then, the door of the office room slammed open. The baron and Sir Curno jerked up and gazed at the door. There they saw...

“I am sorry. I was a bit in a hurry. I was talking to that man over there.”

Lloyd was panting and sweating as if he had run all the way home. He plastered a wry smile and pointed at Sir Curno. He spoke aloud the plan he had prepared on his run to the estate.

“There is a way where we won’t have to hand over the land to those pests. I will walk you through it slowly, so why don’t you kick out that haughty troll first? Better if you beat him before he leaves.”

Chapter 52: We Dig Together (2)

“There is a way to escape this situation without handing the land to those pests. I will walk you through it slowly, so why don’t you kick out that haughty troll first? Better if you beat him before he leaves.”

“What...?”

The baron was taken aback by Lloyd, who had kicked the door open as he entered. The baron found himself engulfed in despair and dejection due to a persistent headache that had commenced in the morning. Sensing an unusual occurrence, he could not quite grasp the extent of it until he realized that Viscount Lacona was the orchestrator behind the unforeseen events. As such, he was caught unaware by Sir Curno’s message from Viscount Lacona. His message was clear: the viscount would wittingly dump toxic wastewater from the dye workshop into the river. That wastewater would make everyone in the fiefdom suffer from a headache.

That’s going to last until I hand over half of Maritz land to him?

The viscount was demanding half of the Maritz land from him. The viscount made it clear that he planned on continuing to dispose of the water until his wish was granted. It was a threat, an explicit and unreasonable one. However, the baron lacked ideas on how to fight back. He warned that he would take the matter to the Royal Court, but it was useless. Sir Curno had only responded back with a snicker and questioned if he could last through the trial. He was angry and mortified.

However, his hands were tied. Of course, aside from taking the matter to the Royal Court, he could request for a “fair arbitration” with Count Cremo, the great lord who ruled over this province. However, that hardly looked like a promising idea. After all, there is no way Count Cremo will actively resolve the dispute. Heck, there was even the possibility for the wealthy Viscount Lacona to bribe the count behind his back. That would spell results worse than raising the white flag. In situations like these, the world was likely to side with the rich and powerful, not those who were in the right. That was the dirty way of the world. The baron sighed thinking about all of this.

The situation was very bad as this was a fight he couldn’t win. So, at last, the baron decided to come to grips with reality. He persuaded himself that this was all for everyone’s sake in the fiefdom, that he was making a reasonable choice before the situation worsened. After all, he was left with no means to fight back. Just when he was about to voice his defeat to Sir Curno, Lloyd barged into the office.

The baron jumped out of his skin. This exchange unfolded within the confines of his office, occurring directly between Sir Curno and the viscount himself. What’s more, it was being discussed in real time. So there was no way or time for the talk to be leaked outside the room. As such, it shocked the baron to see Lloyd being aware of the discussion between him and the knight. He wondered for a second if his son had been eavesdropping just outside the room. It seemed far-fetched as Lloyd was soaked in sweat from head to toe, completely out of breath. So it had to mean that he ran over here in a rush.

“Huff, huff. Thank goodness. It appears that I am not late. There’s no need to be surprised. I surmised this would be happening after going around the fiefdom trying to figure out what is causing headaches.”

“You surmised it?”

“Yes. Tell me, this man here was threatening you just now, wasn’t he? How the viscount plans to toss the toxic wastewater of the dye workshop into the river should we not give them the Maritz land.”

Lloyd’s speculation hit the nail on the head. The baron clamped his lips.

Lloyd went on. “So I say this again. We must never give them the Maritz land, not even an inch of it. No, we don’t have to hand it over at all.”

“The reclaimed land? To Viscount Lacona?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd wiped the sweat dripping down from his forehead to his cheek. Collecting his breath, Lloyd walked into the center of the room and stood face-to-face with Sir Curno.

He stared into the knight's eyes and said, "Why should we concede to freeloading beggars who are trying to usurp the land we worked so hard to develop?"

Could it be that Lloyd's words provoked him as Sir Curno's eyes flashed with anger? Lloyd disregarded the change in the man's emotion and continued.

"So there is only one answer we should give them. It is to tell them that they must put in the hard work themselves if they want more land and don't even think about leeching off us like a clingy parasite."

"Wait, are you speaking to me right now?" retorted Sir Curno, his lips twitching.

Lloyd's lips curled up into a sneer. "That's right. You know, you're pretty smart for a parasite."

"Are you insulting me right now?"

"Oh. It looks like you can take a hint as well. Do you want a pat on the back?"

"You are making a mistake here," Sir Curno snarled.

"Aha. I know what you are saying. You are here to send the message to the viscount, and since you represent him, mortifying you is the same as mortifying the viscount. That's it, right? But guess what? I am insulting your viscount."

"Do you mean that?"

"Yes."

Lloyd’s voice was so confident and laid back that Sir Curno found himself at a loss of words.

Meanwhile, Lloyd kept whamming the knight with his willy insults.

“Hey, let’s be honest here. Aren’t you a bit tired? Come on. Are you sure you’re fine when you’re serving that kind of master?”

“My lord is, of course...”

“A corrupt man,” interrupted Lloyd. “The man will live the rest of his life without even bothering to fix his conscience.”

“No, but I...”

“Yet you can’t cut him out of your life? Really? Do you still have loyalty left for him? I guess you’ll never need to move up north.”

“Why would I go north...”

“Because things are going south for you.”

The knight clamped his lips.

“What do you say? Have a slight change of heart?”

“No, not at all. Lloyd Frontera. You continue to greatly insult my master by making a joke out of him.”

“Tsk, tsk. Bastard, you’ve changed your entire attitude in a split second.”

“So scamper back to your fiefdom and tell your master this loud and clear. We are not handing over the Maritz land. We will not concede with even half of it. Heck, not even an inch of the embankment or a tiny speck of the soil will be given to you.”

“We shall be throwing away the wastewater into the river then,” Sir Curno reminded. “I suppose this does not scare you at all.”

“So what if you do that?” Lloyd rolled his eyes. “Hey, man. I’ve survived working for an entire year breathing in asbestos without a mask.”

“What are you saying...”

“Got anything more to say? Goodness, you are clingy! Go now. Be gone.”

Annoyed, Lloyd made a shooing motion at the knight. Sir Curno’s face instantly grew icy.

“You shall regret the behaviors you have shown today,” he warned.

“Who cares?”

The knight was dumbstruck.

“What? Something wrong?” Lloyd mocked.

Sir Curno remained silent.

“Good gracious. Why are you still here?!”

“Haa...We shall see how this goes.” Sir Curno spoke and turned back, the muscles in his jaw twitching.

He slammed the door shut as he left. The banging noise jostled the baron out of his trance.

He grabbed Lloyd’s sleeves.

“What in the world...Are you sure this will be fine?”

“Excuse me? What do you mean by fine?” Lloyd asked casually.

“I am asking if we do not have to worry about what comes next. We not only turned down the viscount’s request but also humiliated his messenger.”

“Yes, well.” Lloyd grinned.

It was a huge relief for him. He was glad he was suspicious of his headache this morning and worked hard to find the cause of the pain. He also came up with a solution on the way to the estate.

“I told you a while ago. I have a plan that will save us from handing over the Maritz land to those people.”

“A plan? Let me hear it. But first, let us sit down.”

The baron got Lloyd to take a seat. Once Lloyd, Javier, and the baron sat at the table, the disordered atmosphere in the room died down into calmness. The baron’s head cleared as well.

“Yes, it appears that you do have a sure-fire plan, given your confidence. Am I right?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head.

“Things have gone this far. So let us just lay a water supply in the fiefdom,” Lloyd said.

“Excuse me?” The baron cocked his head to the side.

He didn’t know what Lloyd meant by this water supply.

“Please explain more.”

“Uhm, to put it simply, I am talking about using the pipes to directly source clean water from a distance right into the fiefdom.”

“Clean water from a distance?”

“Yes,” Lloyd spoke and nodded.

The baron furrowed. “Bringing in water...I have never heard of such a method before.”

“I have been thinking about it for a while.”

“You have?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded again after he replied.

In actuality, he lied about that part. The classic water supply system was a technology the Roman Empire employed during ancient times in Lloyd’s previous world. Rome introduced a system that allowed them to draw clean water from a distance into the city, and the empire managed to prosper without any shortage of water needed for living. Lloyd planned on introducing that water supply system now that he had the chance to. Of course, he didn’t forget to be thick-skinned about the whole thing.

“Sometimes, I wonder to myself. There are times when we struggle because we solely rely on the river branches for water, right?”

“Hmm...That is right,” the baron agreed.

“Yes. When there’s a drought that dries up the river or a flood that makes the stream muddy, it gets hard to drink the water. That’s why I always thought that it would be nice to build an intake station where water could be stably supplied all year round so that we can draw water from there.”

“Hmm, that is certainly an excellent idea. However...”

The baron cocked his head to the side and asked, “Do you know how to build such a thing?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied. After all, I have been thinking very hard, nonstop, and passionately about this.”

Not me, of course, but countless civil engineers who lived in the ancient days.

Lloyd brazenly answered without including the last part but the baron’s face was still dark with little sign of brightening. Even if the amazing water supply system was built, there still existed the ongoing conundrum that troubled everyone, and that would take some time to resolve.

“Yes, your idea is truly outstanding and bold as well. However, I am still worried. I suppose this water supply system will take quite a lot of time to complete, right?”

“Yes.”

“Then where should we source clean water for the time being?”

The method to acquire clean water right now was the part the baron was concerned about.

Regardless of how fantastic the system was, it was useless until its completion and it meant that the people would have to drink from the poisoned river and live with severe headaches until the water supply system was fully built. The baron’s concern, however, was unnecessary. After all, Lloyd had thought about the issue already. What’s more, he even had an answer for it.

“There is also a solution to that.”

“A solution? What is it?”

“Do you remember my summoning partner Hamang?” asked Lloyd.

“Oh, the summoning partner that grows into a giant once he drinks water but who is breathtakingly round and cute on normal days? The pink baby hippo with peach fuzz on its sides?”

“I see that you remember even the littlest details.”

“Ehem. Hmm! I find him quite cute.”

“Anyway, I suppose you plan to use this summoning partner?” asked the baron.

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head.

“I am going to have Hamang carry a large amount of water. We will fill up a temporary reservoir with it.”

“Amazing as usual. That would resolve the water shortage even when the construction for the water supply system is going on.”

“Yes. Speaking of it, I have a request to make before I begin this project.”

“A request? What is it?”

“I want you to issue a declaration to the villagers under your name as the lord.”

“A declaration?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd continued to explain. “Then, lend me your ears for a second… So… Blah blah blah… Blah blah blah... Yes.”

“Hmm, amazing.”

Lloyd explained with fervor while the baron nodded. Meanwhile, the anxiety that washed over the baron started to fade away and later, it was completely gone. His confidence in Lloyd slowly grew. This dispute he had thought he was too disadvantaged to win...The tables were turning now, and he even started to have some hope of getting revenge.

That afternoon, the people in the Frontera fiefdom read the lord’s declaration. It was concise. It revealed, in brief, the cause behind the headache everyone was experiencing.

“What? So we have been suffering from headaches all day because of Viscount Lacona?”

“That’s what I’m saying.”

“Where did you hear it?”

“Where else? I read it in the declaration the baron has issued.”

The farmers, woodcutters, shepherd boys, women, and the neighboring grandmothers all read the declaration. The contents of the declaration spread in a flash.

“Did you hear? It’s about the dye workshop. The river’s been polluted with toxic waste from there.”

“Oh my! Was it by mistake?”

“No. On purpose.”

“Dear me! That is nuts. What kind of humans are they?!”

“I was thinking the same thing. What is more, the viscount demanded something strange from the baron.”

“A demand? What could he have demanded?”

“Do you know the Maritz land?”

“Of course, my son is a civil engineer soldier there.”

“He asked for half of the land.”

“The viscount or whatever said that?”

“Yes.”

“What kind of demand is that?! My son spent all this time shoveling under the sun to build that land! Hand it over for free? Dear me, the world has come to its end for sure!”

“Yes, indeed.”

Rage swept over the fiefdom. Some cursed the viscount as they clenched their fists in rage.

Another angrily complained, asking why they were letting the viscount lash out at them. Perhaps that’s why when news spread the following morning that Lloyd Frontera was starting a construction project to overcome the river poisoning incident, most people who had enough strength to work volunteered to help, with the number of recruits reaching an unprecedented level.

Chapter 53: We Dig Together (3)

“Young Master Lloyd!”

“What do I have to do?!”

“My lord! Give us something to do!”

“We brought everything we have, our shovels, pickaxes, and everything!”

“I also brought my sons!”

“We came as a couple!”

“We are here, too, oink!”

The area was bustling with people. It was early morning. It was normally a tranquil time people used to get ready for the day. It was when people ate breakfast amid the fog of the early fall and washed their faces as they stretched their slightly stiffened bodies.

However, today was different. There was a noisy crowd in front of the baron’s estate. Hundreds of villagers assembled in the area. Each shouted aloud, raising up their shovels, pickaxes, and other tools. At first glance, the scene resembled a peasant revolt that would instantly make any lord turn pale as a sheet. However, that wasn’t the case. It wasn’t a revolt. It was a group of villagers who gathered up to volunteer for the construction. Baron Frontera looked outside through the window in his office and became aghast.

“Did you expect this to happen?”

“Hmm...To be honest, I never thought it would be this much,” Lloyd confessed.

Lloyd gave a wry smile in response to the baron’s question. It was true. He had absolutely no idea that the declaration issued the previous afternoon would be this impactful. Lloyd had suggested to the baron to write the declaration. He advised the baron to transparently inform everyone about how underhand Viscount Lacona was and what he demanded using his threat.

But the baron turned out to be a better writer than I imagined.

To put it plainly, the baron had an amazing talent for writing. It was just a regular announcement, and yet it tugged at the readers' heartstrings. When Lloyd read through the declaration, he found his heart pounding with emotion. He clenched his fist in anger, and his throat choked. If it had such an effect on Lloyd, who had grown cynical as a result of his difficult life, it was no brainer what it would bring about once the naive farmers read it.

Maybe the baron was born at the wrong time and in the wrong world.

Just then, Lloyd wondered what would have happened to the baron if he had been born in South Korea. He wondered if he might have become a popular author on platforms like NAVER. Pushing such a trivial thought aside, he spoke. "Regardless, the declaration had a great impact. It appears that our work will go smoother."

"Do you mean the one we talked about yesterday?"

"Yes. I am thinking of starting the construction for the temporary reservoir right away."

The time was ripe as there was an enthusiastic atmosphere among the villagers. A sense of commonality was formed among them, the rage against the viscount binding them as one.

It would be a waste if Lloyd missed this time. No, he would be a fool if he did. Lloyd went out of the baron's office right away, exited the estate, and stood in front of the people.

He didn't give a speech filled with unnecessary flowery words. Without any words, his actions revealed to everyone what would come next. He raised a metal shovel in front of everyone. It meant only one thing. The start of the construction!

The human villagers and orc miners. Everyone lifted their shovels as high as they could.

They followed Lloyd, walking across the fiefdom. No, they weren't walking, they were marching. Lloyd pointed at a spot and they got to work right away. Lloyd had already finished surveying and designing the area they were in the night before. Lloyd brought out Ppodong first. He fed a red sunflower seed to him.

"Hey, Ppodong."

"Ppodong?"

"Time to eat."

"Ppo-do-dong!"

Ppodong grew thirty feet. The people cheered at the appearance of the most reliable heavy equipment, the summon partner. Basking in the cheers and praise, Ppodong began to burrow the ground.

"Ppo-do-do-dong!"

His chubby fat wriggled, each time bringing his huge forearms to move like the wind. The ground was excavated in huge scoops. The dirt explosively splattered in all directions and about thirty minutes later…The empty lot formed a rectangular pit whose width, length, and depth were 164 feet, 328 feet, and eight feet, respectively. It looked like a swimming pool. Lloyd gave out his next instructions.

"Alright, the first group of civil engineers will refine the pit Ppodong has dug. Flatten the surface and shape the corners at a right angle. Let's go!"

"Yes!"

The soldiers in group one threw away their shirts and jumped into the pit. Lloyd's gaze traveled to the ordinary residents in groups.

"Alright, group two and everyone else. Find flat rocks and bring them here! The larger and wider, the better. Do you see this? Rocks flat as these are the best. Make sure you don't get hurt. Don't overdo it. Okay?!"

"Yes, Young Master!" everyone shouted.

The people began to move around. The work wasn't divided by gender or even occupation.

Old farmers, young woodcutters, shepherd boys, and hunter girls spread around in search of flat rocks. One brought a rock as large as a dining table, while another brought a pile of palm-sized rocks. Even the small, waddling children brought tiny stones in their little hands, their other hand holding their mother's. Lloyd joined them to collect and gather the rocks.

About two hours later, thanks to everyone's efforts, a large pile of rocks was stacked beside the rectangular pit.

"Great. Groups one and two, and the villagers should take a break. Group three and the plaster workers, transfer the rocks into the pit and carpet it on the ground and the sides. Let's go!"

"Yes!"

Group three and the plaster workers moved. They laid the flat rocks as though they were laying tiles in a swimming pool. They laid the rocks and they plastered them with mortar.

Of course, the job wasn't done haphazardly.

"Over there! Too high! Lower it! Maintain the slope!" Lloyd instructed.

This facility was meant to be used as a temporary reservoir. It was the place to store potable water for everyone and for hygiene's sake, the water needed to get drained.

As such, Lloyd made a slope in the ground. It was the same when he instructed the others to lay down the rocks and make a drain where the water would travel outside through the reservoir.

It's obvious. Otherwise, the water will stagnate.

Stagnated water would rot. It wasn't an exaggeration. Moreover, the rotten water would fester with various bacteria and algae. Anybody who thoughtlessly drank from it had a good chance of contracting all sorts of diseases. That was why the importance of the drain system of the reservoir could not be driven home enough.

"Alright. Orcs, bring in the rock for the sluice gate!"

"I have been waiting for this moment, oink!"

Lloyd shouted after creating the drain. The orcs, who had been dying to get to work, yelled back. Three orcs walked in, carrying a huge rock the size of an elevator. They set it down at the area that connected the reservoir and drain. The size of the rock fit just right with the drain, like the cork cap to a wine bottle. This rock would serve as a cap that keeps the water locked in the reservoir. When the water in it had to be drawn out, Lloyd could allure these gym rat orcs to slightly lift the rock up. With that, the 184 by 328 feet swimming pool, no, the temporary reservoir was completed. The construction had kicked off in the morning, but it took only half a day for it to be finished.

Woah. The speed of construction is unreal.

The residents hollered. Lloyd clucked his tongue amid the excited cheers. However, he still had more work to do. Now that the reservoir had been made, it was time to fill up the empty space.

"So, wait here, everyone. Oh, right. You might get stomped by Hamang if you're too close to the reservoir. So take a couple of steps back. Javier?"

"Yes."

“Come draw some water with me. Bring the horse.”

“Understood.”

Lloyd hopped on the horse Javier was on. They galloped south, following the river branch of the Prona River that divided the fiefdom north and south. They passed the reclaimed Maritz land and the Lacona viscounty. Eventually, they arrived upstream where the river water wasn’t contaminated. Lloyd placed Hamang down in the clear river.

“Alright, Hamang. You know what to do, don’t you?”

“Hamang!”

Hamang’s eyes were shining the moment he laid his eyes on the flowing river. He shook his butt in excitement. He looked like a puppy about to go on a stroll he had been waiting all day. He was super ready to jump right into the river. Lloyd gave exactly what Hamang so badly wanted.

“Okay, take it in one shot!”

“Hamang!”

Hamang threw his fist-sized body into the river but he didn’t flow down the river with its current. Instead of him, it was the water level that started to go down.

“Hamamamamang!”

He quite literally devoured the water. Sucking in the river water, Hamang grew gigantic in real time. He grew to an incredible size, going over his previous 160-foot height record. He was ninety-five feet tall now.

Good. His one-shot skill has improved more as he reclaimed the Maritz Wetland.

Hamang’s one-shot skill level was three. It increased by two levels. His previous maximum height was one hundred and sixty feet, but now, it was one hundred and ninety-five feet. Specifically, this meant that he was able to store almost twice as much water in his mouth.

“If you’re done, let’s move! Off we go!”

Lloyd tapped Javier, who was sitting in the front saddle, on the shoulder. Javier spurred his horse. She gave a neigh and galloped at full speed. Behind them, Hamang followed as he rolled and smashed everything in his way with his body.

“Hamamamamang!”

The 195-foot tall living water balloon rolling forward was a terrifying sight. Perhaps that was why Javier’s horse ran at full speed and Lloyd learned what it would be like if his pelvis got dislocated and smashed on the saddle. A strong impulse swept over Lloyd at one point.

I want to make Hamang charge right into the viscounty.

He wanted to go into the viscounty with his blood ally, the Sand and Steel orc tribe. However, he fought against the idea. The bad guy was Viscount Laconat and the people living in the viscounty were innocent. So Lloyd didn’t want to unnecessarily harm them out of anger. Besides, realistically speaking, such behavior could bring about disastrous results. It would obviously be the case legally or financially.

“Alright, this way!” Lloyd instructed the way to go as he clutched Javier’s shoulder from the back of the saddle.

Unlike the road he had taken coming up here, this route took a detour around the viscounty.

At last, they safely arrived at the barony. The people cheered and shouted for joy at Hamang’s grand appearance. When the water Hamang spewed out of his mouth filled up the reservoir in one go, overfilling it to be exact, the cheer developed into a roar. They roared because they now had enough clean water for the foreseeable future. Of course, this is just a temporary measure. Countless people roared in excitement.

Lloyd didn’t allow himself to be carried away and lose his composed expression. Instead, the work he would soon have to do flashed through his mind.

I was able to finish building the reservoir because more people joined the project than I expected. It’s good but not enough. Temporary measures have a limit.

Building a reservoir and mobilizing Hamang to fill it up with clean water looked like a good solution at first glance. But. it had a flaw and that was that this required him and Hamang.

Hamang only listens to me because he’s a summoning partner. It’s not an understatement to say no one can control him. This would mean that Hamang and I must regularly go up to fill the water in there.

In other words, he wouldn’t be able to vacate the fiefdom for more than a few days. If something happened to him or Hamang and the reservoir didn’t get the water it needed as a consequence? Everyone would suffer from headaches after drinking the contaminated water again. That’s why this method is a temporary solution. I must build the water supply quickly. Time wasn’t on his side and he didn’t have the luxury to idle around.

So, Lloyd began preparing for the water supply system construction the following day. First, he began by surveying the site. He climbed the eastern range of the land with Javier.

Their destination was clear.

“We are going all the way up to Lake Kapua,” Lloyd said as he climbed the uneven mountain road.

The lake sat in the mountain, and it was located halfway up to the eastern range. Javier cocked his head as he trailed behind Lloyd. “I see Lake Kapua. But I have a question, Young Master.”

“A question? What is it?”

“Out of all the lakes, why did you choose Lake Kapua?”

“What do you mean by that? Is there a problem?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, there is,” said Javier gravely. “Have you ever heard of King Storma?”

“King Storma? Of course, I did. I heard he’s a very strong and ferocious monster.”

“Then, do you also know that the lake is in the monster’s territory?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd nodded his head.

He added, “I also know that King Storma is currently in hibernation.”

“Hibernation?”

“Yeah, he’ll probably be sleeping for the next fifty years or so,” said Lloyd.

“How do you know that?”

“The knight of blood and iron told me,”

“The knight of blood and iron...?” Javier’s eyebrow arched a little.

“Yes.”

“Who is that?”

Well, who else? You, the main protagonist in the novel.

Instead of replying, Lloyd smiled. And he recalled the story in the novel.

It probably was around the time Lloyd dies in the novel and when Javier leaves the fiefdom.

It must have been around then. At the time, Javier was a wanted man.

It happens right after the baron and baroness die. At their funeral, Javier slays the two loan sharks.

It was only some time after the loan sharks' corruption was revealed that he was found to have been loyal. He was cleared of all the charges. At least at the point when Lloyd died in the story, Javier was a wanted man. He was one even while he dug a grave for Lloyd. The guards barged into the cemetery and threw themselves at him to arrest him.

Of course, Javier overpowered them without causing any harm. To avoid the search group, Javier hid in the eastern mountain range. That hiding place was no other than Lake Kapua.

And I think he says something like this to himself, "What a relief it is that King Stoma is currently in hibernation."

Proving his words right, Javier was able to safely hide in the lake for a month. He eventually lost the chasing guards and crossed over the range.

"Anyway, Lake Kapua is the best intake station. Thanks to the permanent snow in the peak that melts regularly, the water level is consistent all throughout the year. The water is clear, and the turbidity is low. Plus, the foundation to install water pipes from the lake to the fiefdom is stable and straight."

Lloyd was now taking a break and sitting on the edge of a rock. Wiping his sweat off, Lloyd looked around the land. Just like he had said, the mountain slope was mostly straight and easy except for one place. Javier pointed at the very area. A look of doubt played across his face.

"Then how do you plan on putting the pipe in that area?"

The silver-haired knight pointed to a valley that seemed to sharply disconnect the terrain from the others. The valley was about two hundred and sixty feet wide, sitting between two towering cliffs that faced each other. Lloyd motioned with his fingers and drew the route of the water pipe, so it went over one cliff to the next.

Javier grew curious. He's going to make the water pipe go over the valley? How? He couldn't wrap his head around this and questioned if it was even possible. However, he didn't doubt Lloyd. After all, his young master had shown extremely mysterious and amazing methods of construction multiple times. From the heated flooring system, paved road, mine, seokbinggo, and the Maritz land. Lloyd produced unbelievable results. So this time as well...

"Do you have anything planned?"

Javier thought that he probably had and his assumption was proven right when he heard the following answer from his young master, the former hooligan, Lloyd.

"Of course. I'm going to build an aqueduct."

"What is an aqueduct?"

"There's something like that. The siphon effect isn't going to be enough to pull the water from here across the valley anyway."

The corners of Lloyd's lips rose slightly. The method to overcome the mountain valley's geography and stably place the water pipes over the stream...It was no other than the arched Roman aqueduct, the gift and legacy of the brilliant Roman Empire that once existed on earth.

Chapter 54: The Fiefdom’s First Accomplishment (1)

The Roman-style aqueduct. It was a major civil engineering feat that transcended the period of the Roman Empire. The Aqua Appia was constructed in 312 BC. The Anio Vetus was completed in 272 BC and Aqua Marcia was finished in 144 BC. Aside from these, countless aqueducts connected Rome to the outskirts of the city. Some stretched as near as dozens of miles, while some drew water from areas as far as over sixty-two miles away. Thanks to them, almost a million Roman citizens enjoyed a stable water supply regardless of the season.

What’s more, is that most of them remain today. They’re still being used to supply water even now.

Just then, a memory of when Lloyd was a college student suddenly came to mind.

Lloyd recalled when he was active in his club that investigated and researched traditional architecture. The investigation wasn’t exclusive to those in the country. It explored those that existed across the world as well. One time, he had once looked into the Roman-style aqueduct.

W*hat surprised me the most was Aqua Julia.*

It was like any other aqueducts that were built before the common era. However, it was functioning properly even to this day. He was utterly shocked when he found out that such an ancient device still provided water to the Piazza di Spagna and Trevi Fountain of Rome and other older city districts.

“So, in short, a well-built aqueduct can easily last decades and prevent many generations from worrying about water. But, of course, it needs to be regularly maintained,” Lloyd spoke as he pushed away his memories.

His hands moved to point twice at the cliffs that were standing like a folding screen.

“So if I am to put the aqueduct here, it’s best if I lay it from there to there. The ground is good enough. The elevation is low. Plus, earthquakes aren’t a problem in this place.”

Javier, who was listening to Lloyd, didn’t say anything.

“Also, it looks like I can acquire the limestones needed to build the aqueduct around here. Look, do you see the bedrock slightly protruding over there? Those are all limestones.”

“We can use the wood from a nearby forest to build the foundation of the arches. This place isn’t too far from the fiefdom, so the workers will hardly have any difficulty coming up here. Don’t you think so?”

“Hey, why are you so quiet?”

“Master Lloyd...”

It was only when Lloyd called him out that Javier spoke.

“Where did you learn all this?”

“All this? What do you mean? Construction?”

“Yes.”

Javier continued to talk.

“I cannot understand it. From what I remember, you were never such a capable person,” he said.

“Dang. Really?”

Lloyd stared at Javier blankly.

“You’re telling me straight to my face that I’m incapable?”

“I am speaking the truth.”

Javier replied adamantly without an inch of concession. He continued to hit Lloyd with unreserved candor.

“You were lazy, indolent, lax, and slow to learn. Oh, there was one thing that you liked learning, actually.”

“Could it be math?”

Lloyd asked, expectant.

“Not at all. Who do you think you are?”

“A pure talent envied by the heavens.”

Javier grimaced.

“Hey, there’s no need to put on such a disgusted face.”

“You were only interested in playing around. You gave yourself to drinking and boisterous talks. Your attention was spent on nothing but playing drinking games I had never heard of with a drunkenly flushed face.”

Javier spoke as he sighed.

“So I cannot wrap my head around you these days. This knowledge. Where in the world did you learn all of it?”

Javier’s expression and gaze were serious without any hint of a joke. They were laden with genuine doubt. To be honest, Lloyd understood the confusion Javier was feeling at the moment.

The Young Master Lloyd Javier knew would have been a good-for-nothing alcoholic.

However, the man started to demonstrate incredible knowledge he could never even fathom. It wasn’t as if the young master ever had a phase of fervent studying either. I’m sure Javier will think that something’s going on with me, something he doesn’t know. Lloyd sighed at length, and he put on a serious expression.

“Are you asking where I learned all this?”

“Yes.”

“Are you going to believe me if I tell you?” asked Lloyd.

“I will judge after I hear your answer.”

“Hmm, is that so...”

Lloyd sucked in his breath. With a serious expression, he then said, “University of Korea.”

“Excuse me?”

Javier arched one of his brows.

“I told you before. University of Korea. Actually, the place appears in my dream every day. I don’t know why. In my dream, I am a student there learning various things, and I simply make use of that knowledge.”

“What kind of...”

“I’m not lying. That’s why my head is filled with new knowledge every morning I wake up. The constructions I have finished, the techniques, and the things I recite in your lullaby... That was how I obtained all of it. So what now? Can you believe me now?”

“Not really. I cannot believe you.”

“Right? I was just lying.”

Javier stared at Lloyd without uttering a word.

“It’s the truth if you believe it. It’s a lie if you don’t. That’s the way it is, isn’t it?”

“In other words, you don’t have the intention to give me a proper answer.”

“Well, maybe it’s because you are not going to believe me anyway.”

Lloyd chuckled and shrugged. At times like these, Lloyd thought to himself, he needed to put on a thick skin and come up with an adequately brazen lie. He also had a backup plan in case he needed to escape the conversation. Perhaps that was the reason why Javier shook his head.

“Truly, Master Lloyd. I feel like I never really know you.”

Just then...

[Javier Asrahan thought that your response was perfunctory.]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has decreased by one point.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -nine]

[Even though your relationship with the major character has worsened a little bit, your RP remains unchanged and will not be forfeited.]

[Current RP: 1337]

Dammit. What is this?

The message that popped up in front of him. Lloyd read down the message with a dumbstruck expression. He had made up the story about learning everything by going to university in his dreams on the fly. He didn’t think much of it. The response was also meant to confuse Javier. So, he didn’t have an iota of expectation that Javier would buy it. He was right to expect so because Javier didn’t trust him anyway.

It must have offended Javier in some way. Lloyd, however, gave no thought to Javier’s petty reaction. His mind was more focused on the RP that remained unchanged even as his likeability with Javier lowered. Hahaha. This is amazing! Lloyd found himself smiling, the corners of his lips reaching his ears.

RP also called Relationship Points was the greatest source of strength for Lloyd. It was so when he fought a duel with Sir Neumann, the former senior knight of the fiefdom, and when he got trapped in the ant cave. Even when he picked summon partners for construction, his RP always acted like a secret weapon that equipped him with the most appropriate power at the most critical moments. So, in truth, Lloyd was slightly concerned about it. He predicted that earning RP would gradually become more difficult down the road. That's because there's a limit to how much one can be liked by others. A case in point was the baron, baroness, and Javier. At first, his likeability with them was negative. So even a slight positive change of attitude got Lloyd to receive a message saying his likeability increased.

But that changed when he started to become liked by everyone. Lately, it's been becoming harder to acquire likeability from people. Humans surprisingly got used to things fast.

Even an initially shocking event would become boring with repetition. It was the same case when you were interested in someone. If you had one good interaction, you needed to do better afterward. Otherwise, people became unimpressed as they were tyrannized by familiarity. This psychological trap was the very thing Lloyd was worried about.

Right now, I'm not feeling it because the likeability is not that high. But once it starts to get really high, I'll have to put in a lot of effort to gain even one likeability point.

Of course, he could always expand his social circle and build friendships with more people.

That, however, was tiresome work. And it's not like I'm super popular or cool. Besides, he couldn't be liked by everyone forever. This meant only one thing: earning RP, his ultimate weapon, was bound to be difficult as time passed by. This concern had been lingering around in his head for a while, but the message that just popped in front of him cleared all the worries and burdens off his heart. I don't lose my RP even if my likeability lowers! This was an excellent thing. When his likeability with a particular individual became too high, and it became a challenge to improve their relationship to gain points...

I can intentionally make the person not like me, only to improve the relationship later on to increase my likeability.

Lloyd swallowed. Will it work? Lloyd turned and looked at Javier. He decided to test his luck.

“Hey, are you upset because I didn’t answer your question properly?”

“No,” replied Javier.

“Hmm. Yes, you are. You are upset.”

“I doubt it. I didn’t expect much from you in the first place.”

Could it be the decreased likeability? For some reason, Lloyd sensed a slight change in Javier’s response. It was colder than usual. However, Lloyd didn’t care. He simply decided to act thick-skinned. I am going to test it out regardless of how you respond. With that thought, Lloyd licked his lips.

“You didn’t expect it in the first place...Hmm. That’s too bad. I was actually expecting a lot from you.”

Javier turned and gazed back at him, his eyes filled with confusion. Lloyd then locked eyes with him and enduring the embarrassment that was welling up from deep inside his organs, he said, “Although I never said it out loud, I am relieved and thankful that you always help me out.”

“Hey?”

Javier didn’t respond. He simply gazed at him.

“Why are you quiet again?”

“Haa. Nothing, Young Master. I just suddenly got goosebumps all over my body.”

“Were my words that bad...?”

“Yes,” Javier said flatly.

“Wow.”

Javier nodded without a second of hesitation.

“For a second, I thought you lost your mind, were struck by a great blow, took some weird drug behind my back, or got bitten by a rabid dog.”

“Hey,” Lloyd called.

“I’ll just assume it was a slip of your tongue.”

“Tsk. Let’s just say it was.”

“What do you mean by ‘Let’s just say it was’?”

“It obviously means that I misspoke, you bastard.”

“Whew. What a relief.”

Javier ran his hand over his chest with a sincere expression on his face. At the same time, a new message popped in front of Lloyd. Ding Dong.

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by one point.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -eight]

[You have earned 18 RP by improving relationships with the main character.]

[Current RP: 1355]

Nice, I guess?

Lloyd clenched his fists, hiding them from Javier. The experiment ended with success. His theory worked. Since it works this way, I won’t have to worry about earning RP anymore. Lloyd simply needed to be a jerk and then act nice afterward or he could act heartlessly and comfort them again.

By manipulating people’s feelings over and over again, he would be able to earn RP in a stable manner. An eerie smile escaped from Lloyd as he thought about it.

“Fine, it is such a relief, eighteen-RP man”

“Excuse me?” Javier stopped in his tracks. “Did you just curse at me?”

“No, not at all. Never.”

“It sounded like you did.”

“Come on. You must have heard me wrong. Anyway, let’s get moving. We have a lot to do.”

“Yes...”

Lloyd dusted off his pants and got up. Javier, who still wore a suspicious look on his face, rose and followed him. A mountain of work awaited them and Lloyd wasn’t the type of person to procrastinate.

“Let’s set the route again as we go down over there.”

There was a place to bury the water supply pipes and a place to create stable routes. Lloyd had considered all of these factors. The Underground Scanning, Floorplan Marking (3D), and even the Simulation Mode. Lloyd’s gaze grew now more serious than ever as he used all of these optional skills at the same time. Javier’s gaze toward Lloyd became more perplexed as he protected his young master. The young master he served felt more complicated the more he stayed around and learned about him. Just like that, the first day of surveying for the water supply construction passed by.

The surveying continued a few days later. Thanks to his hard work, Lloyd was able to finalize the best route for installing the water supply pipes from Lake Kapua, which sat in the middle of the eastern mountain range, to the fiefdom. Not only that, Lloyd spent time designing almost every night, using the Floorplan Marking (three dimensional) and Simulation Mode skill.

Thanks to these skills, I can use a hologram to see the final design on the actual land and run a simulation test.

In real life, when the final construction output was actualized on land, the results were often different from the floor plans. No, the reality of it was there were subtle differences between the design and output the vast majority of the time.

But I'm different.

It was thanks to his two optional design skills that Lloyd could test his design models as many times as he wanted through a simulation. He could even set several physical conditions, such as landslides and earthquakes, to figure out how much the pipes could hold out. He could perform all sorts of experiments and evaluate their results. It was only after multiple all-nighters and running dozens of experiments and calculations that Lloyd became convinced.

"This will be enough."

The Frontera barony that sat in the remote corner of the eastern region of the kingdom… That worthless fiefdom was close to making history with the first water supply system of the Lorasia Continent.

Chapter 55: The Fiefdom’s First Accomplishment (2)

“Dig, carpet, cut, transport back, polish, and bury. These are your tasks starting today.”

In the deep part of the mountain spring, Lloyd stood on top of a small rock. His speech began amid the chirpings of the mountain birds. The human soldiers in the civil engineering group and muscular orc miners gazed at Lloyd. Lloyd continued his work briefing which was disguised as a speech.

“As every one of you would know, we are not in a safe place. We’re up in the eastern range. So what should we watch out for?”

“The wild animals!”

“The monsters!”

The soldiers and orcs yelled, trying to deafen one another. The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled up in satisfaction.

“Yes, everyone is right. You’re correct. Wild animals and monsters may appear. So make sure to move in groups. Each group will be composed of twenty members, ten humans, and ten orcs. I believe you remember which group you belong to, right?”

“Yes, oink!”

“Great,” said Lloyd. “Let’s check the roles assigned to you then. Groups one through six, each composed of twenty members mixed with humans and orcs. What’s your job?”

“To cut the giant bamboo and prune them out!”

“Okay. What about groups seven, eight, and nine?”

“We will transfer the smoothened giant bamboo to the site where the pipes will be installed!”

“Then what about groups ten, eleven, and twelve?”

“We repair the site where the pipes will be laid!”

Lloyd asked, and the soldiers answered. The Q&A session went by without a hitch. Lloyd’s smile deepened as he looked at them.

I’ve raised them well.

Just then, Lloyd remembered the first time he had mobilized the soldiers in the fiefdom to transfer red clay for the heated flooring system construction project. At that time, they were essentially a civil militia made up of ordinary soldiers, average young men you could see in any neighborhood.

But now, things have completely changed. At this rate, I can throw them into construction sites in Korea, and they’ll adjust quickly. The commonplace youthful civil militia was long gone. Their white complexions had completely changed, and now, everyone was tanned under the sun. A slight furrow wrinkle sat in between their brows, which was a result of habitual frowning from the sun’s bright glare. A slight mark of dignity could be noticed in their thick and rough mustache. Their clothes had changed as well as their work clothes were ragged but special. Each had various shapes embroidered on their left chest. One was a burned rock, which symbolized the ondol, or the heated flooring system. Another showed a flat surface, signifying the paved road. There was also an embroidery of a deep pit that symbolized the coal mine and a rectangular rock that represented the seokbinggo.

The majority of them carried embankment embroidery, a symbol for the reclaimed Maritz Wetland.

Every single symbol was proof of participation in various construction projects. It was also a form of medal that stirred pride in each soldier. Plus, their stamina has gotten really great.

They weren’t muscular and buff the way the gym rats were.

But when it came to strength, Lloyd could ascertain that they were stronger than any other fiefdom’s soldiers. That was because they spent all day moving bricks, soil, and other construction materials. Hammering, sawing, and shoveling were basic construction tasks. The hard labor that came with each task gifted them with tenacious and godly muscles. In other words, they had grown to become seasoned workers who could easily be hired as supervisors on any construction site out there with just a small adjustment period.

“But don’t ever let your guard down and do something idiotic. It’s always the experienced workers who get hurt first because of their stubborn ways. Am I clear?”

“Yes!”

“Okay, everyone except for Group thirteen made up of only civil engineers. Get to work with a shout!”

“Woah!!!”

There were a total of twelve groups. One hundred and twenty civil engineer soldiers and one hundred and twenty orcs held up saws, axes, and various other tools. Each rushed in order toward their respective places. The first six groups headed toward the nearby woods. That was where a huge forest of giant bamboo, each one wider than the body of an orc warrior, was located. The soldiers and miners became one, and their tools glinted against the sunlight that shone above the giant bamboo forest.

“Let’s start chopping from here!”

“I love using the ax, oink!”

The human soldiers charged forward with their hand saws. The orc miners swung their stupidly large ax with one hand. The huge stalks of innocent bamboo were cut down by a storm of loggers. At the same time, the groups beside the loggers smoothened and pruned the chopped bamboo. They cut the stalks in unified lengths and smoothened the outside. The same was done to the inside. The smaller soldiers entered the bamboo stalks to sand any rough edges and drill holes inside. Once the cutting and smoothing were finished, the giant bamboo was shaped into pipes of equal lengths. After that process was over as well, groups seven, eight, and nine on standby entered.

“Grab them up. One, two!”

The human soldiers and orc miners teamed up to transport the giant bamboo pipes.

They traveled, walking over rough mountains, creeks, and rocks. Along their way, they shooed away growling wild animals and fought drooling monsters. They delivered countless bamboo pipes to the site where the water supply system would be built and once they arrived, groups ten, eleven, and twelve received the bamboo pipes. There, right on the spot, Bangul and the blacksmiths worked together to add the stiffeners to the pipes.

“Bangul! Hng-!”

Bangul, who had eaten soil in advance, violently shook her chubby tail. Her bell attached to the tip of her tail blared a loud warning. At the same time, she tightened her bottom.

Splaaash!

Hot metal bars of poop got discharged from the area under her uplifted tail. The blacksmiths rushed toward the metal bars. It didn’t matter if they didn’t have a furnace. The bars were hot and soft because they were just made, allowing them to easily process the bars. They looped the metals around the bamboo pipes that groups seven, eight, and nine had delivered. The stiffeners would hold the pipes strong and sturdy against the water pressure that could make them crack or burst otherwise. Meanwhile, the workers in groups ten, eleven, and twelve assisted Ppodong.

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-do-dong!”

A sandstorm appeared wherever Ppodong went and once the storm left the area, a large pit was created in its wake. That was where the bamboo pipes would be installed. Of course, Ppodong hadn’t dug the ground haphazardly.

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong!”

Ppdodong dug the areas Lloyd marked on the ground. His digging was precise according to the depths and widths he was told in advance. It was perfectly in line with Lloyd’s design plan. Lloyd had to consider several factors for the foundation, including its earth pressure, surcharge load, vulnerability to earthquakes, water pressure, and surface load. Moreover, Lloyd’s design was also the result of carefully calculating the bearing power and expected subsidence. When Ppodong’s amazing feat left a huge hole in the ground, groups ten, eleven, and twelve followed behind.

“Okay, clean up the ground!”

“Woah, oink!”

The human soldiers and orc miners flattened the surface. They painted on a generous amount of stiffener to prevent any potential flooding or sinking. Once the ground was flattened, they laid out the rocks. Then, they pasted the rocks with a thick layer of limestone-mixed mud. On its very top came the pruned and processed giant bamboo pipes.

They added the paste of limestone-mixed mud around the pipes without missing a single spot. On top of that, the pipes were covered with tightly packed dirt. This method was called the backfill method. With that, they had finished one section of the pipe.

Of course, amid the ongoing construction, everyone strove hard to meet the exact measurements Lloyd had given them. When one section of pipe was over, they moved on to the next section. This process was repeated over and over again. While all this happened, Lloyd commanded group thirteen, which was composed of sixty civil engineer soldiers. He brought them to the lake that sat in the middle of the mountain range. Here, they proceeded with constructing the aqueduct. The first one to start the construction was Javier.

“Alright, Javier. You know what to do, don’t you?”

“Use the manablast to blow out the areas you marked?”

“Obviously. This isn’t your first time doing this.”

“Were you about to say I should run back after the blast, or else, I would whine in pain under the crushing weight of the crumbling rocks?”

“No, I wasn’t going to,” Lloyd said and looked away.

“Then?”

“If I see you crushed under a rock, I’ll be kind enough to set up a tombstone for you there.”

“I’ll be back...”

Javier then walked off.

It was pure luck that there was a bedrock of limestone that lay bare and plain near the construction site. Javier drew his sword and stood in front of the bedrock. He pointed at the mark Lloyd made.

He wielded his sword, which swung dozens of times in the air at lightning speed. He then contained the explosive power of the mana circle that collided at the same time. Combined it resulted in a precise yet deadly act of destruction. The bedrock, which had been there for hundreds and thousands of years, exploded a dozen times from the inside. The power blast split the hard bedrock. The bedrock was blasted into dice-sized chunks of rocks. Masons and soldiers held out their chisels and hammers and rushed toward the rocks.

“Okay, don’t space out now! Make sure you don’t get any shards of rocks into your eyes!”

They split, broke, and divided the rocks by following the marks Lloyd drew for them. The tranquil valley suddenly turned into a limestone bonanza. While the masons and soldiers were at work, the carpenters were busy as well with the aqueduct floor plan Lloyd had given them. Their mission was to build an arch support frame according to the plan, which was where the stone arches would be built.

Everyone wielded their tools strongly and powerfully. The wooden support frame was finished. In the shape of a rainbow, this firm support frame was topped with a block of limestone. Once the blocks fit perfectly, they created an arch. After that, the support frame was dismantled and reassembled right beside it. Another limestone block was added on top of the support frame again. Thus, another arch was constructed.

As such, the cycle of construction continued to repeat. On one side, the workers logged giant bamboo, made them into pipes, and laid them under the ground. At the valley, an arch-shaped aqueduct three floors tall, with a height of fifty-five feet, and twenty-nine feet in length, was erected. Each time a bead of sweat streaked down on workers' faces, another pipe was connected one after another. Each time they shouted, the height of the stacked limestone block got taller. About two months later, under the drizzling rain of late fall, the two tasks finally merged into one masterpiece.

"Okay, be careful! Slowly! Make sure you fasten it tightly!"

Lloyd stepped forward, his tool belt wrapped around his waist. He climbed up the finished aqueduct himself and commanded the installation of the last bamboo pipe. It was fifty-five feet from the ground. The peak of the narrow aqueduct was slippery due to rainwater.

It was the perfect position to accidentally fall off. That was the reason why Lloyd was doing the most dangerous task.

I must do this by myself. Otherwise, the atmosphere among the workers will be dampened.

No matter how much Lloyd showered them with bonuses and rewards, the dangers of their work didn't change.

The mood of the construction site would quickly be ruined if he pressured the workers to do dangerous jobs. They'll calculate whether the money they receive is worth the risk of their job. This will make them decide how much their lives are worth. That was the natural thought process for those who had dangerous jobs. Lloyd didn't wish for his soldiers to make such decisions. It's not a good feeling. I know because I thought of it too. He knew the feeling very well. Truthfully, it was an awful one. Valuing his life based on money made him feel like he was just an object that could be replaced at any time. Once someone felt that way, they became distrustful of construction work. That was the reason why Lloyd led the riskiest part of the construction, which was standing on top of the aqueduct top and leading the process.

But he was with the most reliable individuals among the workers.

"Okay, carefully take a step here. Javier. Sir Bayern. Arosh. Count now."

"One."

"Two."

"Three, oink!"

"Let go!"

Lloyd, Javier, Sir Bayern, and Arosh moved as one group. They lifted the bamboo pipe above the aqueduct. They moved it, let it down, and connected it. At last, the last pipe was laid and linked. However, that wasn't the end of the job. The final verification is still left. Laying the pipes wasn't the end. There had to be a final check-up to determine whether the water flowed correctly.

So Lloyd climbed up to Lake Kapua and arrived at the intake station that would direct the lake water to flow through the pipes. He turned the valve affixed to the intake gate. Creak! The steel intake gate opened up. The lake water passed the muck frame made out of bamboo to flow into the pipe. Lloyd's gaze acutely studied the water flow. The water is moving just right. It's just as I had designed it. Lloyd designed that the velocity of water flowing through the pipes from Lake Kapua's intake station to the fiefdom to fall between 0.5 to three m/s. If the velocity was slower than that, sand and other sediments would block and clog the pipes. However, if the velocity was too fast, the water pressure would eventually damage the pipes.

But at the current velocity I'm seeing… I won't have to worry about it for the time being.

Lloyd continued to observe the flow of water and he waited. What did he wait for? He was waiting for a hopeful message from the foot of the mountain where his fiefdom was at.

Sometime later…*I should be hearing from them right about now...*It was when Lloyd was nervously biting his bottom lip.

A series of shouts started echoing up from the foot of the hill. It was the shouts from the line of soldiers who were stationed in the interval from the fiefdom to the intake station. They were shouting the message that started from the fiefdom, relaying it to the one next. Their shouts slowly traveled up to Lloyd.

At last, a full message arrived to Lloyd.

"The fiefdom's purification plant has water! There is no leakage in between!"

Everyone cheered aloud. It was the end of the long construction. Everyone clenched their fists as they finally saw the results of their hard work. They exchanged gazes of satisfaction with those beside them. Just like that, the construction site erupted with joy and excitement.

Everyone except for one: Lloyd.

"Whew! Done. Let's go collect the construction fee now."

Lloyd smirked and casually touched Javier on the shoulder like he was brazenly asking to go to a local arcade or for a complimentary drink at a restaurant. Thus, Javier was left in confusion.

Construction fee? Collect what?

Chapter 56: The Devil's Contract (1)

"Let's go collect the construction fee now."

"Excuse me?"

Javier stared at Lloyd, feeling bemused.

Construction fee? Collect what?

Javier didn't know the nonsense he was hearing out of the blue.

"I am not sure what you mean."

He couldn't wrap his head around this. Instead of answering, his young master simply scoffed.

"Don't you know what a construction fee is?"

"Of course, I know."

Construction fee referred to the money used for construction. It referred to the overall expenditure for the construction, including the cost of the supplies, equipment, labor, and facility management. So Javier thought it was strange.

"Who will you collect it from?"

He tried to guess from whom the money would be collected but no one in particular came to his mind. The water supply system wasn't commissioned by a paying customer. It was started voluntarily to overcome the river contamination crisis and establish a safe system for acquiring clean water. Just like how people replaced old and shabby windows and repaired weakened roofs, this construction was initiated by necessity in the fiefdom. Therefore, there was no party to milk money out of. Javier slightly furrowed his brows.

“Are you planning on demanding a construction fee from Viscount Lacona as a form of compensation?” asked Javier, tossing the question that seemed likely.

“Hm? No, I’m not,” said Lloyd.

His young master then curled one corner of his lips and continued, which only confused Javier all the more.

“Compensation? How could you say that? Do you think we’ll be able to make ends meet with that?”

“Something better and more abundant than that awaits us. So just be quiet and follow me. Hey, you.”

Lloyd scoffed and then called Sir Bayern, who was cleaning up the construction site.

“You called for me, Master Lloyd?” answered Sir Bayern.

“Yes, I did. I need you to run some errands.”

“I’m at your service.”

“Okay, let’s see. First, Sir Asrahan and I will be off somewhere. So please take charge of wrapping everything up. Make sure all the workers and tools are in the right place. Get rid of all the food waste. We want this place cleaned up. Otherwise, it’s going to attract wild animals around here.”

“I understand,” replied Sir Bayern.

“Does that mean you will be missing the construction completion ceremony?”

“Why would you say that? Of course, I’ll be at the town celebration.”

“Then...”

“Tell the baron that I’ll be back soon. I already told him where I’m going in advance.”

“Yes.”

“Oh, and one more thing,” said Lloyd, turning back to Sir Bayern.

“Yes?”

“Tell him not to pop the champagne without me.”

“I will keep that in mind. Have a safe trip.”

Sir Bayern bowed and paid his respect. Accepting his farewell, Lloyd turned to Javier and said, “Alright, let’s go.”

Javier followed behind Lloyd without saying anything. He still had his grimace on his face even when he descended from the mountain. What in the world is he up to? The direction Lloyd was heading most definitely didn’t lead to the fiefdom. This path takes us to the Lacona viscounty. He was familiar as he had taken this road a few times and so, greater curiosity and nervousness washed over Javier.

“Master Lloyd,” Javier spoke as he walked behind Lloyd.

Lloyd didn’t stop despite his name being called. He replied as he kept walking down.

“Yeah, I’m listening.”

“Are you really going to the viscounty?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied.

“Are you by any chance planning on meeting Viscount Lacona?”

“Yes.”

“What do you plan to do once you meet him?”

“Why? Are you worried that I’ll make a scene?”

Indeed, that was his greatest concern.

Javier collected his thoughts for some seconds before speaking.

“To be honest, I understand you, Master Lloyd.”

“Oh? Do you understand me? That’s rare. We’re off to a good start. Continue.”

“Yes, Viscount Lacona is obviously in the wrong for dumping the toxic water in the river. Blackmailing the lord afterward was extremely petty and unscrupulous of him. His actions led us to spend an unexpected amount of funds and labor on building the water supply system. That is the truth, without a doubt. However...”

Javier paused for a second before continuing.

“It is my personal opinion that sometimes we must hold back and be content with the fact that we avoided such harm.”

“Hmm, are you suggesting that I must be a man of great patience?” asked Lloyd.

“No. I am suggesting that you make an objective and realistic judgment.”

“Objective? Realistic?”

“Yes.”

Javier’s voice sounded more forceful this time. Staring at Lloyd's back still ahead of him, Javier said, "Yes, we can meet Viscount Lacona once we arrive at the viscounty and we can raise issues with the dirty tricks he pulled. What would we gain by doing so?”

Lloyd kept listening in silence.

“Nitpicking our opponent’s wrongdoings and raising issues with it...Thinking objectively for a second would prove that it is worthless, and we would gain nothing except emotional satisfaction. What’s more, it would stir unnecessary disputes.”

“Right, now that you mention it, it does seem like that,” replied Lloyd.

“So, are you willing to change your mind now?”

“No,” Lloyd flatly answered and continued to walk ahead.

Javier caught a slight tremble in Lloyd’s shoulders. He must have laughed for a moment.

Surely, when Lloyd replied back, Javier noticed a wry smile on Lloyd.

“Hey, Javier Asrahan. Do you think that I’ll push ahead with something that doesn’t benefit me?”

“Excuse me?”

Javier’s voice contained a little bit of surprise.

“Tell me, do I look like that person?”

“May I be frank?”

“Yes.”

“The Master Lloyd I know is a petty, vindictive, and small-minded tight-ass who never lets himself be in a position of loss,” declared Javier.

“Wow.”

“That is why I believe that this way of blowing off your steam is not like you. Please behave like you usually do.”

“Ha!” huffed Lloyd.

“Is that what it looks like to you? Blowing off some steam?”

“Then...”

“Just be quiet and watch me.”

Javier clamped his mouth shut. He had somewhat zealously given the advice to dissuade his young master. However, Lloyd didn’t take it. Javier thought that saying something more now would simply be crossing the line. I guess he’s going to let his emotion take control and throw it against the wind. They would soon arrive at the viscounty.

Even if Lloyd sat down with the viscount, what would he gain? Javier wondered to himself.

What good was there even if he eloquently went over the viscount’s wrongdoings one after another? Be it the compensation or construction fee… The viscount would never give a penny to them. After all, the viscount had no reason, cause, or necessity to do that.

Thinking such, the silver-haired knight followed Lloyd without a word. About three or four hours later, they got down from the mountain. No conversation took place in between.

They finally arrived at the viscounty. A savory smell permeated the village. It was the smell of dinner getting ready. Lloyd and Javier walked past two villages as they indulged in the savory smell of the food and arrived in front of the viscount manor.

“Stop.”

“The visitors must reveal their status and name.”

The two gatekeepers stopped them at the gate but Javier didn’t have the chance to say anything because Lloyd spoke first.

“I am Lloyd Frontera, the official successor to the Frontera barony, the neighboring fiefdom of yours. Relay back that I am here to meet Viscount Lacona.”

“Is this an official request for an audience with the viscount?” one of them asked.

“Yes.”

Lloyd’s confident tone and attitude softened the soldiers. One of them stayed at the gate to protect it while the other one ran into the manor to relay the message. A short wait ensued.

During this time, Javier internally said, It’ll get rejected. A request for an audience with the viscount. It was a reach and much too reckless at the same time. Normally, one would visit a noble after contacting them in advance about the nature of the meeting, and only then would the meeting be permitted after it was properly scheduled. It was rare for anyone to appear in front of the gate out of the blue without any prior message. It was also considered ill-mannered among the nobles. So even if they got rejected, they weren’t in a position to complain. Actually, it’s obvious that he’ll get rejected.…

“The viscount has agreed to meet you.”

What? Javier’s eyebrow twitched. Why did he not reject it? Of course, it was good that the viscount didn’t. It was just beyond him how the request for an unplanned meeting didn’t fall through. It didn’t make any sense but that very senseless event was taking place at the moment. What was more, the person who came to escort him and Lloyd looked like the viscounty administrator. How? Why? Countless questions floated in Javier's head as they entered the manor even after the administrator guided them to walk through the hallway.

The incomprehensible situation continued even after that. They were now at the end of a hallway.

“The eldest son of the Frontera family, Lloyd Frontera, has arrived,” reported the administrator in front of the reception room.

“Let him in.”

And the voice that came from inside belonged to the viscount.

Javier's eyebrow twitched once more. The viscount is already in the room waiting for us?

This was another incomprehensible turn of events. We are uninvited guests who came without any warning. Yet, the viscount not only accepted our request but is waiting for us in the reception room? The door opened, and the viscount was sitting in a chair inside as he stroked his goatee. Something was off about the viscount's gaze and attitude toward them.

"Haha. It's been a while, my friends."

"Nice to meet you."

"Come and take your seats."

"Thank you."

The viscount was glowering their way, at Lloyd to be exact, with a murderous look in his eyes.

His gaze resembled a spiteful viper but it looked like the viscount was forcibly repressing his venomous spite for some reason. On the other hand, Lloyd was...

"I do not know how to thank you for welcoming us with open arms."

Javier was terribly flustered whereas Lloyd was relaxed and in control. He was full of confidence and so, Javier was thrown into great confusion. What on earth is happening right now? This situation was poles apart from what he had in mind. Surely, Master Lloyd should be angry, and Viscount Lacona should be relaxed in this situation. That was only natural. Lloyd was supposed to be here to complain about what Viscount Lacona had done. Viscount Lacona was supposed to jeer at Lloyd for doing so.

The tables were turned for some strange reason. Lloyd was brimming with confidence.

Viscount Lacona was fuming with anger. This was truly and sincerely strange. What is happening? Something was going on. Something he didn't know.

Thinking that to himself, Javier's eyes sharpened, and he tried to understand the connection between the two men. While Javier was deep in thought, Lloyd and Viscount Lacona continued their strange meeting.

"By the way, Viscount Lacona," called Lloyd.

"What is it?"

"Do you have any concerns these days?"

"There is nothing of the sort," replied the viscount.

"Are you sure?" pressed Lloyd once more.

"Of course."

"Doesn't the whole world grow black, or don't you feel terribly nauseated when you wake up in the morning?"

"Not at all. There is nothing wrong with my health."

"Hmm...What I just asked are the symptoms of extreme mental stress."

"What is there for me to be concerned about?" The viscount shifted in his seat.

"Are you sure? Really?"

"Why are you harping on something so obvious?" The viscount's eyes narrowed.

"Can I not ask?"

The viscount glared at Lloyd. Lloyd shrugged.

“I already know everything. Be honest with me.”

“Be honest? With what?”

“Aren’t you desperate now, regardless?”

“I don’t know what you mean,” the viscount said.

“Haha. There is something urgent that's desperately in need of a solution, but you are absolutely in the dark about its cause. But at the back of your mind, you have someone you suspect. That’s why you are here to meet me. Am I wrong?” said Lloyd in a casual tone.

“What do you…”

“I am saying that you want to confirm something with me.”

The viscount shut his mouth. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rolled upward.

“That is the thing with concerns. They are hard to share with others but drive you mad with frustration if you keep them to yourself. Am I wrong?”

“I am never…”

“Come on. Lay down your shitty pride.”

“I do not know what it is that you want to say,” denied the viscount.

“What I’m about to tell you will sound very familiar to you.”

The viscount didn’t reply.

“I know that your heart drops each time I keep speaking like this because you have a feeling that your agonizing fears will be confirmed. Now you know for sure that I am the source of the incident that tortures you to this day. Am I wrong?”

Silence.

“Are you still going to not talk?”

Silence again.

“Just accept it now, and give up. Think about it. Your efforts may betray you, but giving up will never fail,” pressed Lloyd.

“What kind of gibberish are you sp...”

“I can’t believe that you’re still trying to keep your pride even at this point. Nothing will be solved like this. It’s time to negotiate. That’s why I’m here to relieve your burden. Think about it. There is no kinder neighbor than me.”

“I never consider you my...”

Cutting in once more, Lloyd said, “Your dye workshop has been going terribly, hasn’t it?”

Lloyd then tossed a harmless question, flashing a smile as he said it. At that moment, Javier saw very clearly. He saw the way the viscount’s face turned red. The way his goatee trembled. How his glare grew bloodshot. Silence. Sometime later, the viscount asked back, growling as he gritted his teeth. “I knew it was you.”

Chapter 57: The Devil's Contract (2)

The atmosphere in the reception room sank in an instant. The viscount's eyes burned with rage. Lloyd's expression, however, grew more casual as he received such gaze.

"What do you mean by 'I knew it was you'?"

Lloyd shrugged. He tilted his head to the side.

In a brazen manner, he asked, "It looks like you still haven't put down your pride, viscount. You suspected that it was me a long time ago, and your heart must have sunk earlier when you confirmed your suspicion. Yet, you say, 'I knew it was you'? Come on, isn't that reply too contrived?"

"What..."

"I like the expression on your face right now. Let's keep it that way," ordered Lloyd.

Lloyd raised his hand as he buried into the sofa, and with a slight gesture, he flicked his fingers.

"Look now. You were already suspicious of me, as I thought. How nice would it have been if you just came clean when we first met?"

"So... you are indeed the one who messed up my dye workshop?"

"Yes, I did it," admitted Lloyd.

"What have you done?"

"Are you asking about the method?"

"Haa. Of course."

The viscount heaved a heavy sigh as he glared at Lloyd. He was curious for a good reason.

The dye workshop. The mere thought of it brought a sigh out of the viscount.

My most precious dye workshop…

The workshop was the viscount's golden goose. Laconata was a fabric that was specially processed with the Ladona berry extracts. The Laconata fabric was extremely beautiful. It was luxurious and multicolored, to say the least. Its fine and deep gloss was indescribably unique. Other fiefdoms could never copy the product even if they used the same Ladona berry. The unique color could only be obtained when the Ladona berry was harvested from the western area of the eastern mountain range. One could try to plant the berries elsewhere, but the color and gloss would be lost. Not only that, those berries could not be used because of how they changed during the transportation process. The color of the fabric reflected this change as well.

What was more, the viscounty had special knowledge from producing the Laconata for over a hundred years. Thanks to all these factors, the Laconata fabric was considered a valuable specialty that could only be produced in the Lacona viscounty. So, it became the backbone of the Lacona viscounty's economy and livelihood. It was a priceless golden goose but one day, the goose started to act strange. No, it died.

That...was something that didn't make any sense.

One morning about fifty days ago, the supervisor of the dye workshop came to the viscount, and he started begging for his life the moment their eyes met. The supervisor said that he was sorry. That he committed a capital offense. He explained that the Laconata cloth came out strange. Once the cloth was dyed, the color turned out terribly. The distinguishing gloss was completely gone.

At first, I thought the problem wouldn't last more than a day.

The viscount thought that the output for the day was a spoiled batch. He figured that something must have gone wrong with the raw materials, the berries or the cloth went wrong. He had thought so but that wasn't the case. The following day, the day after that, and for one whole month, the Loconata’s identifying gloss and color did not come back. Instead of the beautiful color, now, it was dull and bland. The fine gloss could not be traced at all. It was just gray and muddy. It was a defective product that wasn’t fit to be sold in the slightest. It had become total trash.

That’s when it started.

The dye workshop was in a state of emergency. So they decided to start anew by disposing of the concentrated juice in the storage and making them from scratch. Even so, the Laconata’s color didn’t return. They tried out changing the fabric in its entirety but the result was the same. There was no gloss Naturally, the merchants who regularly purchased Lacotana turned and went away. Even the customers who had done business with the viscounty for a long while stopped their purchases one by one. What was the viscounty’s reliable source of income for so long was gone.

Even as things spiraled out of control, no one could figure out the reason behind the death of the Laconata’s color and gloss. Regardless of how many attempts the viscount made or how much effort he put in, the reason still remained a mystery.

The viscount flew in rage as the situation drove him mad. He developed bald patches on his head from severe stress. Add to that, his kidney ached every night, and bile rose up his throat. Despite this, all the viscount could do was form fruitless doubts. Yes, that bastard. Lloyd Frontera. Suspecting him was all that I could do! Actually, his doubt was purely circumstantial without any actual proof. It was impossible not to doubt the boy. After all, he had unilaterally disposed of the wastewater into the river, greatly damaged the fiefdom, and threatened the baron.

At this point, the biggest grudge holder against him would be the people of the Frontera family and the most likely suspect was Lloyd. This kid is young but meticulous. The boy had proved countless times his preparedness and shrewdness. With such character, the boy was absolutely capable of plotting something like this. Lloyd was the person that came to his mind no matter how many times he racked his brain. The mystery, however, was how the boy managed to master such a scheme. That was exactly why he had agreed to grant an unexpected audience with Lloyd. He wanted to confirm what trick the kid had employed in his dye workshop. The viscount yearned to find out how he did it.

“What in the world did you do to my workshop when you are nothing but a penniless beggar?”

The viscount gritted his teeth and he glared at Lloyd. Curse? Dark magic? There were no other explanations other than that. Lloyd chuckled.

“Hmm… First, I would like to say kudos to you for figuring out that I was the cause. Your reasoning power exceeded my expectations. But my, my.”

He shrugged.

“What happened in your dye workshop...Technically speaking, I didn’t do it on purpose.”

“What do you mean?”

He didn’t do it on purpose? What joke is trying to say now?

The viscount’s face grew serious. The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled further up and at last, Lloyd moved his mouth to reveal what had taken place in the workshop.

“That was collateral damage when we built the aqueduct.”

“Aqueduct?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied.

“We built it in the valley. Very nicely.”

“What does that have anything to do with my workshop?! Speak properly! Stop beating around the bush like you are mocking me!”

Finally, the viscount flew into a rage. He was seated on the close edge of the sofa, and he leaned forward toward Lloyd. Lloyd instead leaned far back.

“Tsk. You don’t have to be so impatient. Do you, by any chance, know the characteristics of limestone?”

“What...?”

“The limestone is one of the sedimentary rocks composed of calcium carbonate.”

What gibberish is he spewing now?

Lloyd continued to explain, “The bones and shells of clams, reefs, sponges, plankton, and many other organisms are made up of calcium carbonate. And when they die, the compound collects at the bottom of the sea. Over time, they accumulate and harden into one. That’s what limestones are.”

“What are you talking about?”

“Shh. Listen until the end. Anyway, the limestone formed in such a way is quite an excellent construction material. Just like for building the aqueduct we created in the middle range of the mountain. Oh, and the limestone foundation turns the water into limewater.”

“Limewater..?”

“Yes. It sounds grand, but it’s actually simple. The calcium and magnesium ions in the limestone get dissolved in the water, slightly altering the mineral ratio of the water.”

“What does that have anything to do with my dye workshop?”

“It is related in many ways.”

“How so?” The viscount’s eyes widened.

“Because the very water of the valley the aqueduct is located at is upstream of the Prona River, which flows from the viscounty to the barony.”

“What...?” The stoic expression of the viscount turned dazed.

He looked like someone who had received a blow to his head but Lloyd continued to explain, his voice sounding casual and nonchalant.

“Are you starting to get the picture now? We conducted a long series of explosions to build the aqueduct in the valley. We blew up the limestone bedrock buried in the valley slope and extracted and brought them out. Oh, in the process, we used our tools quite often to process and cut the limestone into small pieces. Eventually, that led the valley to be carpeted with a huge amount of limestone crumbs and shards. So many that counting them would be like trying to count grains of sand. Thanks to that...”

The smile that Lloyd had on his face was gradually turning evil.

“The valley water slightly became closer to limewater.”

“Then could it be that the reason the color of the Lacontana’s dye has changed is...”

“Yes. It’s because there was a minute change in the chemical makeup of the Prona River.”

“What...That cannot be...” The color drained from the viscount’s face.

“Of course, you would be completely unaware of it. After all, the change was very small and subtle. You couldn’t have even detected it from drinking the water. And it surely isn’t going to have a big effect on the people and environment.”

Lloyd’s evil smile deepened. It was just what he had said. However, it was difficult to say that the blasting and processing of the limestone in the valley had inundated the valley with other minerals. The impact it had on humans, organisms, and the surrounding environment was menial. It was comparable to the impact bananas had on humans with their potassium and radioactive elements.

The potassium in bananas contains radioactive isotopes, but in order for a human to be exposed to radiation, one needs to consume at least one hundred million bananas a day. The same applies here to how the minerals in the Prona River impact the human body. I don't know. It might take drinking around one hundred million liters of water for someone to die from a mineral overdose.

The limewater hardly affected humans. Of course, it was exclusive to humans and the natural environment.

"But it would be a different case for your dye workshop. I presume you use the river water to make your dye and dispose of it. That's how the wastewater that flows to the fiefdom was made. Am I correct?"

"It is what it is. That's a chemical reaction. Oh, maybe you don't know what chemistry is. Anyway, even a slight change in the river that hardly affects people leaves a great impact on delicate undertakings such as dyeing."

"That's..."

"Aw, what do I do? My heart is about to break. I liked the Laconata cloth. It was pretty."

"But I suppose you can say goodbye to your Laconata forever. The river is going to stay in that state for at least a decade. It's not like you have any other method to draw water from somewhere else. You can try making distilled water to get rid of the lime, but that's still going to change the composition of the water, so Laconata's signature color won't come back regardless."

"I'm going to sue you!" bellowed the viscount at last.

"I will raise this unreasonable matter to the Royal Court!"

"Yes, you go sue me," Lloyd replied greasily.

"If you want, sue me as much as you want. But do you think you will win?"

“What?!”

“Limewater is not a pollutant in the first place and obviously not toxic.”

The viscount was at a loss of words and so Lloyd mercilessly attacked him with the truth.

“And what can we do? We didn’t intentionally disperse the limestones and pieces of rocks into the valley. It happened in the process of developing the place. You do know that this doesn’t satisfy the ‘intentionality of action,’ which the Royal Law considers important, right?”

“Intentionality?”

“Yes, the intentionality of action. It refers to acts committed without a clear intention to harm. Plus, if we dig into the matter, the root cause of all this can be traced to you, viscount.”

“To me?! How?!” yelled Viscount Lacona.

“Well, you unilaterally dumped the toxic wastewater into the Prona River that passes my fiefdom. That’s why we worked hard to build the aqueduct in the valley. In the process of doing so, we had no choice but to blast the limestones for quarrying. And that changed the valley water into limewater, which eventually caused your precious Laconata cloth to be the color of poop.”

“What are you...”

“Do you get it now? Don’t cry.”

“No way. No way...”

The viscount, who was leaning forward as he spoke, helplessly sank into the sofa, his back hitting the chair. He let his body fall limp. With dazed and disappointed eyes, he looked up at the ceiling. At last, the cause of this incident was made plain to the viscount. His eyes already lacked focus. He got me this time. It felt as though he got hit by a hammer in the back of his head. However, no method to free himself came to his mind. He strove to come up with something. His wheels turned, but nothing good was there. Bring the matter to the Royal Court? The viscount knew it was useless. *I can't win. He's right. The limewater is not toxic. It's just water. So I can't file a complaint against him. E*ven if he did so, even if he won the case with the blessing of god, the future of his viscounty would still be bleak. It'd take at least a year until a verdict is reached. The Laconata cloth would be in the same state as right now.

All of his customers would leave him. He would lose his specialty product and become a beggar.

That devil!

Lloyd was smiling in contentment as he looked at him. The sight of his devilish smile made his skin crawl. The viscount couldn't place a finger on how much of the situation was calculated and planned out in Lloyd's head. The viscount was afraid that the brat would do more damage if he did anything more. It felt like Lloyd already had a plan in mind in case he fought back.

It's surely going to be the case, given it's him.

The tip of his fingers trembled against his will and a sense of defeat enveloped him. Despair swept over him. He wondered if this was what it felt like to be an ant trapped in an ant lion's pit. Someone once advised him to calmly close his eyes when things grew difficult in life. He did, only to feel that the darkness ahead of him was his future.

I can't win. There's no way out.

So, at last, the viscount gave up. He racked his brain for a solution but he came up with nothing. There was only one option left for him.

"I shouldn't have done it."

The viscount bowed his head. With a look of distress on his face, he said, "I will immediately stop throwing the wastewater into the river flowing to your fiefdom. So I plead with you. Can you please...forgive me just this once?”

“Forgive you?”

Lloyd arched his one eyebrow.

“Yes.”

The viscount lowered his head further down. He fumed with anger internally but there was nothing he could do. Lloyd, on the other hand, tossed the answer the viscount never expected to receive.

“Hmm...But what to do? The limewater river can’t be changed back.”

“What...?”

“You can clean up the pieces of limestones scattered in the valley, but that won’t do anything. The blasting exposed too much of the limestone bedrock.”

“What are you saying...”

“I mean it. Originally, the limestone bedrock was lightly covered with a silicate rock formation, which is a clastic sedimentary rock. To put it simply, there was a layer that blanketed the limestone. However, all of that broke, exposing the limestone in the water. There’s nothing you can do now.”

“What are you saying? Then…”

“It means that the river water will always be like this from here on out.”

The viscount became utterly speechless. He had thought that an apology would bring about some solution. That was the only hope he had left but it was fading away now. Just then, this devil, no, Lloyd Frontera, put on a smile.

“Well, but since you are asking for my forgiveness, I’m going to tell you that it isn’t completely impossible to revive your Laconata.”

“What is it?! How?!”

The viscount spoke hurriedly, grabbing Lloyd in the sleeve.

“Woah. Let go of my sleeve, please.”

“Oh, I am sorry. I was just in a hurry...”

“It’s alright. I understand anyway. Let me make you an offer.”

“An offer?”

“Yes, an offer.”

The viscount nibbled his lips as he looked at Lloyd and he waited. At last, Lloyd opened his mouth.

“This is my offer. Viscount, you consider your dye workshop and Laconata fabric very important, right?”

“Yes.”

“You wish to revive it no matter what, right?”

“Yes, of course.”

“Good. Then...”

Lloyd’s eyes curved in contentment. He then laid out the big plan he had been polishing since two months ago when the wastewater crisis first swept over the barony.

“If you wish to bring back the Laconata cloth and continue your beautiful tradition, use my fiefdom’s water supply. Of course, you’ll have to pay a generous monthly water bill with it.”

Chapter 58: The Devil's Contract (3)

"Of course, you'll have to pay a generous monthly water bill with it."

The viscount's heart sank heavily but he didn't know why. To be honest, he didn't even understand what "water bill" meant. Despite his ignorance, he still had a bad feeling. Nervousness began to creep from the bottom of his heart the moment he heard the word.

The sense of crisis, that pestering feeling that he's winded up in a bad situation, wriggled inside him. Mustering up the courage, the viscount asked,

"Uhm, I am sorry, but...what is a water bill?"

"Oh, is this your first time hearing it? It is simple. You use the clean water from the water supply, and you pay for its usage in return."

"So, payment for using the water?" the viscount asked.

"You do understand fast," said Lloyd.

"Are you placing a tax on water?"

"Yes."

Lloyd grinned, his smile implying why the viscount was asking such an obvious question.

"From the intake station, the water travels through the clean pipes to arrive at the reservoir of the fiefdom. We provide our clients with a stable supply of the highest quality filtered water. It is so clean and pure that grandfathers can drink it, and grandmothers can wash their faces. And mothers and fathers can make stews, and children can lap around in the water. What do you think? Doesn't your heart jump in excitement at the thought of it?"

The viscount didn’t say a word. Lloyd chuckled. Yeah. Your heart should definitely jump out.

Lloyd was confident that the viscount’s heart was racing at sixteenth beat per measure at the concept of taxing water usage. You messed with the wrong person. Lloyd’s smile became slightly more vicious.

Just then, the time when he first planned out the water supply came to his mind. It was about the day when he was climbing the eastern range with Javier to survey the site. At first, Lloyd was preoccupied with the thought of overcoming the impending crisis. He comforted himself that he would be able to avoid major damage from the whole crisis if he took this opportunity to come up with a stable water supply system, despite the cost. However, deep down, he was enraged. Creating the water supply was good. It really was. Taking comfort in overcoming the crisis wasn’t enough to satisfy this deep-seated grudge sitting in his heart.

Come hell or high water, I wanted to give this viscount a big, fat middle finger.

The viscount sitting across from him had done terrible things as he demanded the barony to return the Maritz Wetland. He dumped toxic wastewater into the river. When Lloyd raised issues with it, the viscount huffed and acted brazenly. The viscount even blackmailed them. The knight he sent snarled at the baron, saying they would continue dumping toxic wastewater unless half of the Maritz Wetland came back into their possession.

They had no manners and no etiquette. Their actions crossed into being tyrannical.

That’s why I could barely sleep during those times.

Each time he lay down to sleep, gold glittered in front of him. The heated flooring system was continually being constructed and sold to people one by one. Even while he was paying off his interest, he still had some money left in his pocket. That was where the money for the construction came from. Lloyd then stingily saved up what was left of the money.

Thanks to you I had to spend every penny in the end.

Lloyd's gaze toward the viscount was icy. The emotions, which were still raw, surged once again, making his blood boil. Perhaps it was because of this rage that he found himself clenching his fist when he discovered the limestone bedrock in the valley of the mountain range on the day he and Javier went out for surveying. It was because of that boiling emotion that an exclamation, "This is it!" erupted in his heart.

A small glimpse of the limestone bedrock had been exposed and the water was flowing to one side of the wide valley. When Lloyd realized that this water was upstream of the Prona River that flowed down to the viscounty and barony, his head added everything up at lightning speed. He saw his chance at once. The plan was drawn out. It was no longer a simple construction for a water supply system. It was also a revenge plan to get back at the viscount.

That's when it started.

Lloyd reset the nature of the water supply construction. It was no longer for the sole purpose of developing the fiefdom. It quite literally turned into a secret weapon to attack the viscount. That was the reason why Lloyd could remain confident.

"Do not worry. There will never be a shortage of water. Why? It's because, from the moment I prepared to build the water supply system, I designed the size of the water supply pipes and intake station to be large enough to cover your dye workshop."

Yes. Everything was planned.

"And I already looked into the route where the water supply pipes can be installed, so it will travel from my fiefdom to your workshop. The foundation is very stable. And the slope is enough for me to conveniently determine the velocity of the water in the pipe."

"What are you saying...?" asked Viscount Lacona.

“It simply means that the survey and design are all completed. Give me the go-ahead, and we can begin construction first thing tomorrow. If we’re fast, it’ll take about fifteen days before you can start receiving clean water for your workshop.”

A nonchalant smile escaped Lloyd but it was the opposite for the viscount. That flushed and trembling expression on the viscount’s face. How much Lloyd had wanted to see it!

“So think about it wisely and consider your current position, viscount. You do not think it is unreasonable to tax water usage, right?”

“That is...”

“Yeah, I know it’s an unfamiliar term, so you might feel a little repelled by it. But, well, you’ll have to give up on your dye workshop and Laconata cloth if you say no.”

The tips of the viscount’s fingers trembled terribly. Lloyd’s smile widened just as much. Javier, watching the two of them, found himself clenching his fists. How terrifying. Javier ran his fingers through his arm to calm the hairs on his arm. Javier was well aware of how much of a twisted man he was and how petty and foul he could be.

But Javier didn’t think he was this evil. I never imagined he was hiding such a plan. The possibility never occurred to him when the water supply system was finished and when Lloyd suddenly suggested going and collecting construction fees. Javier was absolutely in the dark that this would happen. He didn’t understand what was happening. It was still the case when he descended from the mountain range with Lloyd and when he visited the viscount’s manor and requested the impossible audience with the viscount.

I’d thought all along that Master Lloyd meant to blow off some steam.

So he tried to stop his young master. He had adamantly dissuaded Lloyd, arguing that what he was about to do wasn’t reasonable and that it was going to swirl him only into another controversy. But I was wrong. Javier admitted his mistake without a fight. He couldn't not admit it.

My young master is seriously...shrewd and cunning to the point of perfection, to the point I pity the viscount I have hated all along.

That was his thoughts on the current situation. He revered his young master but pitied the viscount just as much. To be honest, he didn't hold nice feelings for Viscount Lacona. After all, the man had persecuted his lord.

He felt pity for that very man at the moment. The viscount could not be any more pitiful, sorry, and miserable. Even as Javier was watching the situation unfold, the viscount's fingertips, lips, and brows were shaking terribly. Truly, the viscount felt like he had become an ant in an ant lion's pit.

A sense of dread swept over him. I'm trapped. There is no way out of this. Who would have imagined that the bastard was so meticulous? Who would have thought he would be pressured like this? He never imagined this would happen, even in his wildest dreams. No, he didn't even know how Lloyd came up with such a plan. A water supply system to draw clean water from a distance? Furthermore, Lloyd had even calculated beforehand how much water the dye workshop would need!

That brat planned on sucking my blood dry from the very beginning.

The viscount's gaze traveled to Lloyd. This young brat was smiling as he looked at him but now, the viscount no longer thought Lloyd was a reckless youngster. Chills ran down his spine each time he looked at the young man. I messed with the wrong person. If he could, the viscount wanted to turn back time to two or three months ago. He wanted to slap himself hard for making the decision to call the workshop supervisor and order him to dump the wastewater into the river. It was too late. There was no way to turn back time and there was only one way to revive his dye workshop.

"I get it."

At last, Viscount Lacona nodded his head in despair. A corner of Lloyd's lips curved upward.

“By I get it, you mean...”

“Your offer. I will take it.”

“My offer to install the water supply in your dye workshop?”

“Yes...”

“You made the right choice, viscount.”

As soon as he finished, Lloyd moved and brought out a rolled paper from his embrace and spread it out on the table. The viscount’s eyes trembled.

“Well, of course. It’s the water supply contract.”

The viscount was at a loss of words. He wondered what kind of schmuck Lloyd was. Once again, he felt another wave of dread wash over him. He couldn’t believe that Lloyd had come with a contract. It seemed to him that Lloyd came prepared and determined to suck him completely dry down to the marrow of his bones. The viscount’s dejected eyes moved as they read through the contract. It was like he was reading a statement declaring his loss in the war. Just then, his eyes shook visibly once again.

“What is this?”

“What is what?

Lloyd asked.

“Here. This part.”

The viscount pointed at the contract, perturbed. His finger was pointing at the part that mentioned the water bill the viscounty was to give to the Frontera family every month.

“Are you sure you put the right number down here?”

“Why? Do you think you are seeing two more zeros than what you think is correct?”

“Yes...” admitted the viscount.

“It appears that there seems to be a mistake...”

“It is the correct number.” Lloyd’s voice was firm.

“The cost on the contract is correct.”

“What...” the viscount trailed.

“Could it be that you think it’s expensive?”

“Well, of course...”

The viscount trailed off again and went back to reading the contract. An absolutely unreasonable price was marked down as the water bill. But it’s just water. The mere act of placing a price on water was flabbergasting enough. But the price itself was so ridiculous that he felt like he was slapped three thousand times across the face. Then, Lloyd started scolding the dazed viscount with an expression of pity.

“Goodness. Do you still think water is free? Even now?”

The viscount stayed silent.

“You thought you could use it all you want because it flows down the course of the river, right? But let me break it to you. It was you who taught our barony the importance of the river water.”

The viscount clamped his mouth shut. The toxic wastewater release he had ordered. His face darkened as he thought about it and Lloyd continued to speak.

“Thanks to you, the entire population in my fiefdom came to a realization that day. We realized that water is not free. It’s a resource that can be destroyed anytime. At times, it’s also something that can be acquired after paying a cost.”

It was true. The majority of the population in his fiefdom had to roll up their sleeves and work for one sip of clean water or one glass of potable water. Even the children helped move rocks to build the temporary reservoir. The heated flooring system construction was completely put to a halt, and all the civil engineering soldiers climbed the eastern mountain range. They cut giant bamboo sticks and shoveled the earth with sweat dripping down their body to build the aqueduct. It was only after that process that the residents in the barony were able to enjoy clean water again. This bone-crushing lesson was that water was, at times, not free. It was time for Lloyd to teach the viscount that lesson.

“Therefore, I cannot understand in the slightest what you mean. How could you think this is expensive? Think about it. Do you not consider the effort of drawing clean water into this place?”

“Do you think the water pipes can be designed and installed in a zap? It requires a tremendous amount of skill and labor. And what about after it is installed? What about management? Who do you think will manage it?”

“Well, that’s...”

“Yes, me. I do it. The Frontera family will be responsible for it. We must make sure that the pipes are sturdy, and without any leaks. Any floating sediments or dirt needs to be managed in the intake station. At times, the old pipes ought to be replaced. Do you think this is a child’s game? Now, can you still say that the water bill is expensive?”

“That’s...”

“Well, then. If you don’t want it.”

The contract on the table was gone. Lloyd quickly rolled the paper back up, and it was making its way back to his embrace when the viscount moved by reflex.

“Hold on!”

Without realizing what he was doing, the viscount held out his hand and clutched Lloyd’s wrist before the contract left his sight. That was when it dawned on him how desperate he made himself look to Lloyd.

“Ahahaha.”

The viscount laughed in awkwardness. Lloyd plastered a bright smile at the viscount and asked, “Did you change your mind?”

“I think I did.”

“Very good. You are a wise man.”

The rolled-up contract was placed on the table again. Lloyd spoke.

“I will make it short. Sign here, here, and right here. Sign your name on these two copies.”

The viscount held up his pen. His face was laden with distress as he dipped his pen in the ink bottle. He was desperately and keenly aware that he was at an impasse.

With a deep sigh, the viscount signed his name. While he was signing the contracts, elation swept over Lloyd, and his heart started to soar. It’s over. We’re now completely free from paying the interest to the loan sharks. Lloyd clenched his fists. His thoughts traveled to the debt the barony owed to the loan sharks. He recalled the devastating amount of interest that needed to be paid every month.

He didn’t need to worry about the interest from now on. The reason was simple. The contract Lloyd had handed to the viscount. The water bill would come in every month.

The bill was the same amount of money as the interest he paid to the loan sharks. In other words, the viscount would be shouldering the interest on behalf of the barony. He had secured an interest-free future. From now on, Lloyd would be able to diligently save money and pay the principal debt!

To be honest, I wanted to engulf the dye workshop of the viscounty or demand them to hand over the technology. The viscount would have never said yes to such an offer.

It went without saying. Such an offer would be rejected and could possibly bring about bigger resistance. In the worst-case scenario, the viscount may not tap into the Royal Court but to the king and send him the petition himself. Lloyd had changed the river water's composition and ruined their specialty product. There was a massive difference between wanting a water bill in compensation for reviving the workshop and demanding the dye workshop itself. The former bordered on business and the latter bordered on blackmail.

There's a chance I might get sucked into a scandal if I get greedy. Besides, having the king turn against me would bring greater harm. Politically and realistically, taking this much is enough. Besides, I am stuck with this viscounty as my neighbor.

He was not in a video game, conquering land by warring against his neighboring countries. Using the water bill as an extra large straw into the viscount's bank account and sucking it dry...This was the best and most realistic outcome Lloyd thought he could get from this deal.

"Do I have to sign here?"

The viscount was almost done writing his signature. Once the viscount signed his name on the area he pointed to, the contract would be finalized. As Lloyd had that thought and was about to reply back...

"Please, hold on a second, lord!"

The door of the reception room was roughly slammed open. A man with a rigid face entered.

He shouted, "You cannot pay out a water bill or whatever to that deceitful punk! So please do not sign the unreasonable contract and drag out this unscrupulous man right now, lord!"

The sincere outcry came out in between his thick beard. He wasn’t big but robust in build.

It was Sir Curno, the senior knight of the viscounty.

Pointing at Lloyd’s side, the knight solemnly yelled, “Lloyd Frontera! Do you still think you will be safe even after you treat the lord with such contempt?!”

This was an unexpected entrance, a disturbance to an almost-finished deal. As such, Lloyd sent a warm gaze to Sir Curno. To respond to his words, Lloyd decided to be sincere. So he said, “Yes.”

At the same time, Lloyd thought to himself that he had forgotten how much of a nuisance this man was and that it wasn’t like him to forget about this prick. And just in time, he waltzes into the room and begs me to deal with him. How nice of him. Lloyd’s smile deepened with a greater sense of reward and satisfaction as he looked at Sir Curno.

Chapter 59: The Devil's Contract (4)

How he shows up in the most timely manner is beyond me, but seriously, kudos to this guy. He never fails to impress me.

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction. Sir Curno had just barged into the reception room on time and stopped the viscount from signing the contract. Thanks to his interruption, Lloyd was able to recall one fact he had been forgetting all along.

Ah, that prick has been getting under my skin for a while now.

It probably started when they first met, when the construction for the Maritz Wetland was in full swing. Lloyd recalled the knight's impertinent attitude as he came escorting his viscount. That was just the beginning. He later relayed the viscount's threat to dump toxic wastewater and his rude attitude that showed zero respect for the neighboring lord. Lloyd did not forget a single act of his. He had buried these feelings deep in his heart.

It's only natural. Why would I forget about a grudge?

Lloyd lived by a simple yet powerful principle: to cherish and remember every grand gesture of kindness, yet always stand ready to counter even the smallest acts of misfortune with resilience. Just in time, Sir Curno, the thorn in Lloyd's eyes, appeared in front of him. The knight even managed to bring back all the unpleasant memories of the past. As such, Lloyd had no reason not to welcome him.

"Hey," Lloyd said. He flashed a smile at Sir Curno and even waved his hand.

"What brings you here? Are you here to witness the contract?"

"Ridiculous," Sir Curno retorted, and his gaze toward Lloyd grew solemn.

"I heard everything from outside the door. How you mocked and held my viscount in contempt, Lloyd Frontera."

“You eavesdropped?”

“I heard you,” Sir Curno corrected.

“That’s the same as eavesdropping.”

“Anyway, did you just say that I held your viscount in contempt by coming here? Do you really think that way?”

“Certainly.”

A deep set of wrinkles formed on Sir Curno’s nose.

“You used the Laconata cloth, our fiefdom’s specialty product and biggest source of income, to threaten my lord. Moreover, in order to satisfy your desire, you shoved the unfair contract onto him. If this is not contempt, what else would be?”

“If this is not contempt,” Lloyd mulled, “ Maybe I should call it a threat, just like the thing you all did to us the last time.”

Lloyd’s gaze quickly traveled to the viscount, who flinched. A sneer appeared on Lloyd’s face.

“I’m holding the viscount in contempt? I had no idea. I was just doing the exact thing you people did to our baron the last time. Are we not allowed to act this way?”

“You used the river, the biggest lifeline and most important source of water to my fiefdom, to threaten the baron in this same manner. You demanded that he give you half of the Maritz Wetland. That was the deal, you said.”

Sir Curno didn’t say anything.

“You know, I was impressed. I thought, wow, that’s how you strike a deal! That’s the way to succeed in life! Right, this is the generous and heartwarming trade you should make with your neighbors! That's what I learned."

"So I am doing exactly the same thing."

"Why? Am I not allowed to?" Lloyd tilted his head sideways.

Sir Curno, who was dumbstruck, gritted his teeth.

How can he respond back so quickly…?

Sir Curno found himself without an answer. Of course, he knew very well that what the viscount did to the barony was an obvious act of blackmail. It was truly over the line.

The viscount is my lord, the person to whom I swore my allegiance for life. So I don't make moral judgments and consider if his actions are right. I simply act as a trustworthy sword and protect him!

It was the same right now. Lloyd Frontera was threatening his viscount, forcing him to enter a deal that was disadvantageous on their part. It didn't matter in the slightest that he had blackmailed the barony. The only justice for Sir Curno lay in the viscount's power and fortune.

So I must stop him. I must ensure that the lord does not enter this wrongful contract.

Sir Curno had heard the entire conversation just outside the reception room. He had heard the tricks Lloyd pulled to mock the viscount, the way he pushed forward the wrongful contract in the end, and how viciously high the water bill was. He had heard and understood everything that was said. He became keenly aware of one thing: I must block the contract come hell or high water. That contract was a sharp and massive straw the Frontera barony was sticking into the viscounty to slurp all its resources. Once it got stuck, it would be impossible to remove. Thus, the viscounty would economically be shackled to the barony well in the future. A large portion of the profit the viscounty earned from the Laconata fabric would be continuously taken away.

Moreover, that's not the end of it.

The viscounty would be incapable of producing the Laconata fabric without the water provided by the barony's water supply system. That meant even if the barony unilaterally raised the water bill in the future, the viscount wouldn't be left with any other choice but to agree. The Laconata cloth would be held hostage. Realizing the viscount was on the brink of signing the papers, Sir Curno, driven by urgency, forcefully pushed the door open to make his entrance into the room. He could get reprimanded by the lord later or receive harsher punishments for his interference. However, he had to stop the signing, even if it required him to behave impudently. It was this eagerness that put him into deep thought at the moment.

I can never win against him in an argument.

Sir Curno was not an eloquent speaker who was good at arguing. He was a man of action. However, he wanted to win this dispute. He wanted to use every means possible to drive Lloyd Frontera away. Thinking that it was the only way to serve the lord, Sir Curno sought ways to fight Lloyd.

And just then, an idea popped into his head.

I'm going with the method that suits me best.

He was a fighter. A fighter used swords, not words. That was an unchanging truth even at this very moment.

"Lloyd Frontera."

Sir Curno lifted his head and glared at the young master.

"I, Lugno Curno, the son of Vargo Curno, formally request a duel with Lloyd Frontera, the successor to the Frontera family."

He spoke with confidence. The room instantly became hushed. The viscount was struggling to figure out a way to stop his knight. Javier was watching the scene beside Lloyd, and Lloyd was standing opposite Sir Curno. They all clamped their mouths shut. The viscount looked terrified, Javier looked intrigued, and Lloyd furrowed his one eyebrow. Everyone stared at Sir Curno.

It worked.

Sir Curno smiled faintly. The request for a duel. This was the most powerful move he could make at the moment. It was also the most surefire plan.

Of course. That prick is a noble, after all.

Sir Curno was confident that Lloyd would not be able to turn it down. One of the greatest shame for a nobleman was avoiding a duel. Saying no was the same as announcing to the world that he was an unworthy coward. Sir Curno thought that Lloyd would be the same.

He'll have his pride as a noble, so he's going to accept it. He has no choice. Plus, I heard that he had already won against Sir Neumann before in a duel.

Just then, Sir Curno remembered the rumor. At first, he was shocked to hear it.

Though he wasn't as good as me, Sir Neumann wasn't an easy opponent. This brat had to have gotten confident after winning against him. There's no chance that he will reject a request for a duel.

No, even if he was not confident, he would say yes nonetheless. Instead, he would send that youthful silver-haired knight to fight for him. Sir Curno expected that to happen. Thus. he planned on his next move. He would demand that vicious bastard nullify the contract if he won.

So take my request for the duel now...

"Hm. No thanks."

Lloyd's casual response rang aloud, tapping Sir Curno's eardrums. Dumbfounded, Sir Curno blankly let out a noise.``Huh?"

"Didn't you hear me? I said no," repeated Lloyd.

“What...”

Sir Curno’s eyes enlarged. Lloyd looked at the knight with a sneer on his face. “Let me ask you one thing. Why should I take up your request for a duel?”

“Well, of course...”

“Because that’s the way to protect a noble’s honor? Are you a fool?”

Sir Curno didn’t answer.

“Why would I duel you right now?”

“But if you don’t accept it, you are...”

“An unworthy coward? Well, fine. I’ll be an unworthy coward then,” said Lloyd with nonchalance.

“What?”

“Didn’t you hear me? I said I would be an unworthy coward.”

“Goodness, you scare me. What’s wrong with this neighborhood? I try to strike a mutually constructive deal, and a knight barges into the room and challenges me to a sword fight?”

“Hey! Lloyd Frontera!”

“Eh? Why?”

“Accept my request for a duel!” bawled Sir Curno.

“I said no!” said Lloyd defiantly.

“But!”

“But what?”

Sir Curno couldn’t come up with anything to say.

“Is that how much you want to fight with me?” demanded Lloyd.

“Why are you acting so clingy? Do you have anxiety issues?”

“That’s because...”

“Stop being so dependent on others, okay? Buddha said it, too. Be your own lamp, seek no other refuge but yourself. So, mind your own business.”

“Never did I hear...”

“Just listen, man. This is the reason why you study when you are young. Haven’t you ever heard that the knowledge you acquire from books in your teenage years lasts a lifetime?”

“I knew the only thing you’d be good at is wielding some swords and nothing else. Tsk.”

“Wait, I...”

“So will you piss off now? I don’t think you’re understanding the current situation, so let me just spell it out. Your lord and I are having an important business meeting, and look how you put him in a difficult place. How so? It’s because if your lord doesn’t seal the deal now, he has to shut down his beloved Laconata dye workshop forever.”

“So, do know that your master will be more miserable the more you act like this. I don’t know if you know, but Bobby McFerrin once told us to not worry, to be happy. Know what that means?”

“I don’t know...”

“It means concerns about your money will make you unhappy,” interrupted Lloyd again.

“I’m telling you, the more you act like this, the unhappier your lord will become. Do you still not get what’s going on?”

Sir Curno was at an absolute loss of words. Lloyd's sneer deepened. Once he had Sir Curno under control, he turned to the viscount. Cocking his head to the side, Lloyd asked, "Tell me you didn't feel a slight ray of hope or anything like that in what your knight just did."

"If you expected me to take the offer for the duel, then I am telling you to throw that thought away. It's better for your mental health to let go of useless hope as soon as possible. So, let's get back to business, shall we?"

Lloyd sat down and held out his hand. Lloyd tapped the contract paper on the table with his index finger. The place he had tapped was the last signature block. That was where the viscount stopped because of Sir Curno's interference.

"Now, please sign it."

As though he was a war victor forcing the losing country to sign a treaty, Lloyd patronizingly spoke with a smile on his face. The viscount, looking sour, grabbed his pen. His pen trembled as it moved toward the signature block. Perhaps, that was the reason why Sir Curno, who was treated like he wasn't there, made up his mind to cross the line and take drastic action to prevent his lord from signing the contract.

How dare you! Anyone who holds my lord in contempt will never be left alone. Even if it means my knightley status is stripped off!

He clenched his teeth and glared at Lloyd, the foolish young master from the neighboring fiefdom, the man who sat with his back exposed as he forced a wrongful contract to the lord.

Now is the time!

Sir Curno was sure Lloyd would be caught off-guard. Sir Curno's eyes flashed with ferocious animosity. His right hand moved and clutched the hilt of his long sword tucked into his waist. He then subtly lowered his body, shifting the center of his weight to the ground.

At the same time, he twisted his waist. All of the muscles on his upper body, abs, chest, shoulders, and arms, jerked to the right. A large sword was drawn out from its sheath on his left waist. He didn't merely use his arm strength to pull the sword out, the sword was pulled by planting his muscular upper and lower torso against the ground. He demonstrated as much speed as he did strength.

The sword was stretched out the moment it drew from its sheath. The blade glinted sharply against the light, making a beeline toward Lloyd's back.

Deep, but not enough to kill him! I shall slay just right!

He wanted to injure him just enough to keep him unconscious for days or keep him bedridden for months. He would shed blood to buy some time in order to stop the contract from being signed. Guided by such determination, Sir Curno's sword violently swooshed against the air. However, just before it slayed Lloyd in the back, his blade was slashed in half.

Sir Curno snapped open his eyes. It happened in a matter of seconds, so he didn't have any time to respond. Before he knew it, a sword blade flashed beside him. It slashed through his own sword in one stroke. The sliced blade twisted and flew in the air, brushing against his cheek before it plunged into the wall behind him. At the same time, Sir Curno heard someone put their sword down along with an icy warning.

"Next time, it will be your neck."

Javier confidently put his sword back as if he did nothing. Though hazy, it just dawned on Sir Curno what just happened. His snapped sword, the wound on his cheek, and the sword shard stuck to the wall were all caused by Javier. Terror instinctively swept over his whole being, and just like that, Sir Curno wet his pants.

Chapter 60: The Devil’s Contract (5)

The viscount finished signing the contract. It was done in a snap, his pen marking the paper without a second of hesitation. This was understandable coming from the viscount, after all, the last of his hopes were crushed into nothing.

“Sir Curno, was it? I could tell from the moment the knight came in and threw a fit that the viscount was waiting to see how the situation panned out. He was just too transparent.”

Lloyd spoke as he sat on the back of the saddle. They were on their way to the barony.

Javier, who was in the front, nodded. “I thought the same as well.”

It really was the case. Sure, there was no way of stopping Sir Curno from throwing himself into the reception room. What happened after could have been handled by the viscount. He could have yelled or lashed out at the knight to keep a tight rein on him, but instead, he did nothing.

“He was betting on the senior knight to turn the tables. It was his last hope, and you struck it down,” said Lloyd.

“As expected, I was right.”

“Yeah, so how do you feel about getting a new title?”

“What do you mean by a new title?”

“Urinator Creator.”

“It’s true, isn’t it? You wielded your sword and sliced Sir Curno’s sword in half. That made the knight weep in panic and wet his pants. Right?”

“Anyway,” continued Lloyd, “that shameful event is going to keep Sir Curno humble. He won’t be able to stand up straight for a while. Surely, it’ll keep him tossing and turning in bed all night. If I were him, I’d pack my bags and move to another fiefdom tonight. No, I think I’d cross over to another continent where no one knows me. Anyway, good job. You were awesome.”

“I simply stopped a coward from striking someone from behind, that’s all.”

“Exactly! You are the Urinator Creator.”

Javier didn’t say anything again.

“Why? Do you not like it?”

“I do not think that deserves an answer.”

“Can I assume that you like the nickname then, huh?”

“Never. I do not like it.”

Javier clutched and gave an unnecessarily hard pull at the horse's reins. Lloyd smiled mischievously.

“Anyway, rumors of your swordsmanship will spread to all corners of the world.”

It was true. Javier had cut Sir Curno’s sword in half. Slicing through a sword in one stroke was definitely not an easy feat. Heck, it was hard to do even if one struck against a flat surface. Sir Curno was the senior knight of the viscounty. The man had a reputation for possessing decent sword skills.

“Rumors say that Sir Curno is bordering on being a mid-level sword expert. What do you think? How did it feel to clash swords with him?” asked Lloyd.

“He was better than what the rumors said. I felt that the man’s skills were clearly beyond a mid-level sword expert. That’s for sure.”

“And yet, you sliced through his sword in one stroke.”

“Is that so?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, thanks to that, the rumor will spread not only to the viscounty but to nearby provinces.”

“What kind of rumor do you think it will be?”

“Perhaps,” said Lloyd, “it will be something to the effect of Javier Asrahan, the youngest knight of the Frontera barony in the corner of the eastern region, defeated a mid-level sword expert of a neighboring fiefdom.”

“Then I will receive the qualifier that I am a high-level sword expert,” said Javier.

“I would assume so.”

That probably would happen. It was only possible to slice through an opponent’s sword when you were one level higher. As such, from now on, the Frontera barony would be known for having a high-level sword expert as a knight.

“It will come with both the good and bad,” announced Lloyd.

“The good and bad?”

“First, it will reduce the number of people who look down on our fiefdom. We now have a fatal and destructive weapon.”

“Then, what is bad?” asked Javier.

“You.”

“Excuse me...?” Javier glanced slightly behind.

“A lot of people will want you from now on.”

“Want me? Who in the world does?”

“Who else? The countless lords, great merchants, and such nearby our fiefdom.”

“Do you mean that they will try to hire me?”

“Of course,” Lloyd said as he nodded before continuing.

“Think about it. You are a high-level sword expert. And what’s more, you’re a young twenty-year-old who's still wet behind the ears. If you were a powerful lord or great merchant, what do you think you would do after hearing the news?”

“I would want him to be my right-hand man...”

“Right?”

“Yes.”

“Yeah, so they’ll try to make you their aide and pour money into your training. Why? It’s because you are only twenty. After just ten years of diligently investing in you, they could obtain a sword master who’s only about thirty years old.”

A thirty-year-old sword master. That would be groundbreaking news. Especially when all the existing sword masters were over forty years old.

It’d be like having twenty-year-old Guan Yu, Zhao Yun, Michael Jordan, or Messi around me.

If anybody succeeded in bringing Javier to their side, he would easily be able to serve for at least two generations. There was no possibility for the other lords, influential merchants, and perhaps even for the king to leave this man of talent alone.

“We might go through some rough times,” said Lloyd.

He looked at Javier in the front. He could only see the back of the knight, so he could not read his expression. However, Lloyd could feel what expression Javier was making.

“I see, rough times. It does not matter. I do not have any intention to serve any other lord.”

Of course, Javier has always been this kind of man.

His character was the same in the original novel, The Knight of Blood and Iron. He wasn’t swayed by people around him. That was true even when the Frontera barony was falling apart in the novel. He could have left the dying fiefdom if he wanted to at any time and gone to serve a more powerful and promising lord and live a comfortable life.

However, Javier didn’t do that. Even when the baron died, no, even after his death, Javier remained loyal. He didn’t serve another lord until the very end, even after he became a sword master. Powerful princes, kings, and emperors stuck out their hands to work with him, but he declined all of them. Instead, he savagely said that the only lord he would serve in his lifetime was Baron Frontera.

Anyway, this guy is just something.

It wasn’t easy living like him. No, it was realistically impossible. However, that impossibility was possible for Javier, who stubbornly stuck to this principle his whole life.

I won’t have to worry about him running off to other masters.

However, the competition for Javier would still exist. So it was imperative for Lloyd to make sure that the barony would not be affected by it. Lloyd was mentally planning for the future when he suddenly let out a chuckle. He chuckled because he remembered another knight who stayed loyal to Baron Frontera in the novel.

“Oh, by the way, did Sir Bayern say anything to you?” asked Lloyd,

“I do not know what you mean.”

“Of course you do. I’m talking about the mana blast you’ve been using during every construction.”

“Oh.” Javier nodded, finally understanding what Lloyd meant.

“Yes, Sir Bayern did say something to me after he saw me use the mana blast.”

“What did he say?” asked Lloyd.

“That it was excellent.”

“That’s it?”

“Yes.”

“He didn’t react by saying something like he wants to learn the skill himself or wants to check your sword fighting level?”

“Oh, he did say once that he was envious of me,” Javier replied.

“That was all.”

It was just like the novel. Lloyd recalled what had been said a few times in the novel about Sir Bayern.

The novel says that he’s mediocre in terms of talent, but he’s steadfast, fair, and unselfish.

Just as the novel had described, it appeared that the knight didn’t feel much envy when Javier got stronger and better. No, it appeared more like he welcomed it.

He must be thinking that it is better for the fiefdom now that Javier is getting stronger.

The man prioritized the development and betterment of the fiefdom over his competitive spirit. Lloyd told himself that he made the right choice to entrust him with the task of managing the civil engineering group. At the same time, Lloyd thought that it was about time that he helped Sir Bayern get stronger.

“By the way,” said Javier.

“Hmm?”

“Why did you do that a while ago?”

Javier’s sharp question pierced into Lloyd’s trance, instantly shattering it. Lloyd tilted his head.

“A while ago? What do you mean?”

“I am referring to the request for a duel by Sir Curno.”

There was an edge in Javier’s voice. It was as if he was pointing out a mistake.

“It was quite rash of you.”

“Wait, because I said no to the duel?” said Lloyd.

“Instead of flatly saying no, it is my opinion that you should have given him a clear reason behind your rejection.”

Javier went on.

“You will only become the center of gossip if you reject a duel without any evident reason. Of course, Master Lloyd, I know that you are not the type of person who cares about that. But you are not an ordinary individual. You are clearly a member of the Frontera family, therefore…”

“My perfunctory and flat rejection of the duel will only affect the reputation of the fiefdom and the barony. That’s what you want to say, right?” Lloyd said, finishing Javier’s sentence.

“Yes...” Javier nodded in front of Lloyd. He then added, “If it was Master Julian, he would have dealt with the matter more sophisticatedly.”

“Julian?”

“Yes.”

“Tsk, why do you have to bring him up?”

Lloyd couldn’t help but chuckle. That was because he suddenly recalled another character in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Julian, Lloyd’s younger brother was five years younger than Lloyd and the second son of the baron. Unlike the drunkard Lloyd, Julian was hard-working and kind. He seemed to only take after the good traits of the baron and baroness.

That’s why the baron has high expectations for him, and he’s now studying abroad in one of the academies in the capital.

In the novel, he met a tragic end. He was kicked out of the academy because he couldn’t pay the tuition. Later that same night, he bumped into a burglar in the back alley, much of his bad luck. Julian refused the burglar’s demand to hand over an old pendant from his mother, the baroness. In the process of protecting the jewel, the boy was stabbed. In the dark, solitary alleyway with no one passing by, he pitifully passed away. That was the fate of Julian Frontera in the novel.

But of course, it will be a bit different now.

Since the barony didn’t go under, Julian wouldn’t be kicked out of the academy. He wouldn’t be roaming around the backstreet like in the novel and bumping into a burglar. While such thoughts kept Lloyd in a state of trance, Javier continued his nagging by throwing truth bombs on him.

“...fore, you should be a little more mature like your younger brother, Julian Frontera. Your behaviors and actions have bigger consequences than you think. You need to have a sense of responsibility for how the reputation and honor of the Frontera family depend on your actions.”

“Oh, sure,” Lloyd agreed.

“Of course, I cannot deny that you have achieved a great accomplishment this time. It is deserving of praise, surely. It is exactly for that very reason that I dare think your more noble-like behavior would be icing on the cake.”

“So, are you saying that I should act more honorably the next time I reject a duel request?”

“Yes,” said Javier.

“Instead of provoking the other party like a maverick and leaving my back unprotected?”

“Yes.”

“But Javier, I have you.”

“Excuse me...?”

One seemingly casual remark caused Javier to flinch as he heard it. Lloyd tittered.

“You were beside me. I trusted that you would have my back no matter what situation I found myself in. After all, you are just that much capable and reliable.”

For some reason, Javier didn’t respond. Lloyd cocked his head. “Hmm. No reaction, eh? Didn’t my words give you the chills?”

Silence.

“Hey?”

Silence again.

“Did you pass out?”

“I didn’t pass out. But-”

“But?”

“I barely held myself from throwing up.”

“Wow. You almost threw up?”

“Yes.”

“Was my sincerity that awful?”

“Yes.”

Javier’s head nodded up and down as if that was obviously the case.

Just then, however, a completely contradictory message popped in front of Loyd’s eyes.

[Javier Asrahan is moved by your sincere words.]

[The uncomfortable doubts Javier Asrahan has been harboring toward you are disappearing.]

[Your countless kind and considerate gestures are finally being interpreted by Javier Asrahan as they are without any misunderstanding.]

The cascading message appeared, using the back of Javier’s silver hair as the background.

Lloyd widened his eyes as he looked at it.

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by fourteen points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: plus five]

[You have earned 252 RP by greatly improving relationships with the main character.]

[Current RP: 1607]

[The intimacy level with Javier Asrahan has increased two levels from <Awkward> and <Everyday Strangers> to <Average Regard>.]

[You have earned fifty RP as a bonus for the two-level increase in intimacy.]

[Current RP: 1657]

Lloyd earned more than 300 RP in an instant.

This is almost like when I achieved a great social achievement.

The pack included a total of eighteen RP. Lloyd heartily stared at the back of Javier's head as if he were looking at a bar of gold. If he could, he wanted to stroke Javier's chestnut-like head.

At the same time, Lloyd realized one thing.

There was a reason why my likeability with this one increased only menially.

Honestly, Lloyd had done a lot for Javier up to this point. He had cured his malignant insomnia for him, helped complete the Asrahan Core Technique when Javier was stuck and risked his life and piggybacked Javier out of the ant cave. Not only that, he had taught Javier the mana blast, which was an advanced skill for the Asrahan Core Technique. There were more than a few things that Javier should be grateful for. As such, it wouldn't have been strange if his likeability soared through the sky.

But it was different in reality.

His likeability barely increased with this man for some strange reason. Whenever he saw an increase, the change was as small and minute as an ant's eye booger. At first, Lloyd was confused, but eventually, he accepted it.

I'd thought that it was because of his uniquely cynical attitude.

But looking back, that wasn't the case.

It was because he didn't trust me and doubted my sincerity.

Javier had literally built a wall around his heart. That was why Javier took all his kind gestures with a grain of salt.

You petty brat!

That was one thought he had. However, on the flip side, Lloyd somewhat understood when he put himself in Javier's shoes.

He was saved and then raised by the baron as a child. H*e's seen all of Lloyd's foolishness throughout the entire time.*

From kindergarten to when he came of age. Javier grew up to witness and watch all sorts of nasty things Lloyd did for many, many years. As such, Javier must have decided that Lloyd's vile and horrid behavior was almost like an ancient tradition that couldn't be discarded. A few months of acting like a changed man wasn't enough to make Javier come around.

Javier isn't a softie who opens his heart to others that easily.

It was Javier's personality. He was inherently a careful person, careful of getting attached to others. He showed his true sincerity when he opened up, but that didn't happen easily. His heart had finally started opening, though it was just by a few millimeters. Lloyd grinned at the back of Javier's head.

"Hey," Lloyd called.

"Yes."

"Did you hate me that much?"

"May I be frank?"

"Yeah," permitted Lloyd.

"I hate you even now."

"Wow."

“Do you remember the first time I grabbed a wooden sword when I was six?” asked Javier.

“No, not at all.”

“Master Lloyd, you broke the first ever wooden sword the lord had bestowed on me right in front of my eyes.”

“Woah...” gasped Lloyd.

“Actually, I have not thrown away the broken wooden sword.”

“Did you keep it in your room?”

“Yes.”

“Why?” asked Lloyd.

“As a way to never forget your gratitude toward the baron or something?”

“No, I keep it to not forget what you have done.”

“Ack...”

Hah, Lloyd Frontera. Seriously, how much of a piece of trash were you.…

Lloyd became speechless. Now, he understood the reason behind Javier’s grouchy attitude all this time. Javier continued to speak.

“So I still horribly despise you even now. I ask you, please try your best not to act as if we are friends.”

“Ah, is that so?”

“Yes.”

[Javier Asrahan is throwing a tantrum.]

[Javier Asrahan is letting go of the deep-seated resentment in his heart.]

[Javier Asrahan, unlike his seemingly cynical attitude, feels slightly favorable towards you for listening to his words.]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by one point.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: plus six]

[You have earned 18 RP by slightly improving your relationship with the main character.]

[Current RP: 1675]

This lying bastard…

A bitter smile escaped from Lloyd. After that, Javier's nagging and grouchy mumbling continued. The complaints didn't sound cold in Lloyd's ears anymore. It was grouchy but not cold. Lloyd happily accepted his tantrum. The two of them were on a galloping horse, so they couldn't read each other's expressions.

However, they were wearing a similar smile. The sun had already set by the time they arrived safely at the barony. When they arrived, they found the fiefdom holding a modest festival to celebrate the completion of the water supply system. Aside from that, fresh and welcoming news awaited Lloyd.

"Right on time. Did your meeting with the viscount go smoothly?" asked the baron.

"Yes."

The baron walked up and welcomed Lloyd first.

"Good job. You did very well."

"Thank you," replied Lloyd.

"All right, tell me about it a little later since everything went well. For now, I want you to take a look at this."

The baron then pulled something out of his pocket. It was a message written on a rolled piece of parchment paper.

“It came in this afternoon. Do you remember what you asked of me the last time?” asked the baron.

“What I asked of you?”

“Yes.”

“Oh, do you mean my request for you to look into potential buyers for the treasures I obtained from the orc tribe?”

“That is right. An answer came earlier this afternoon.”

The baron flashed a big smile.

“Count Cremo in Cremo, the city of commerce, expressed his willingness to purchase all of the treasures at once, and he sent you a message asking you to bring them there.”

The baron opened the letter with a smile. Lloyd smiled the same when he read it. At last, Lloyd had the chance to sell all the treasure sitting in the storage.

Chapter 61: Erecting the Statue (1)

Cremo, the city of commerce, was the central city of Cremona, the eastern province of the kingdom. It went without saying that Count Cremo was the great lord of the province. In other words, he was the senior boss of Baron Frontera.

To compare it with South Korea, the guy is, hmm... a governor?

He wielded the greatest influence in the province. The count's power could even be seen far into the kingdom. Thus, Lloyd cocked his head in curiosity.

"Hmm... The count will really be purchasing the treasures?"

"I was told he is. Why else would he send this letter?" the baron replied.

"But why?"

"What do you mean?"

"Those treasures don't actually hold much value because the orcs treated them as fitness tools and horribly wore them down. They are chipped and cracked in several places."

It was true. Regardless of how precious a treasure was, it needed proper maintenance.

The prolonged years of using them as fitness tools ran them down pretty bad. At first glance, they did look valuable. If they were wiped well, they even became nice and glossy. However, it was a slightly different story upon a closer look. There were dents and chips here and there. There were quite a lot of them, actually.

"So," explained Lloyd, "I actually thought our customer would be one of the provincial nobles who wish to purchase treasures at a low price and boast around or the merchants who benefit by acting a middleman to such customers."

That was what Lloyd had in mind. After all, these were used treasures. That was why Lloyd was confused all the more.

A count with his status wouldn’t need to buy these used-up treasures.

Certainly, if he desired, he had the means to splurge his money away on new and shiny treasures. He could even call for a jewel master to personally make them. Instead of doing that, he was trying to purchase these used treasures. Something certainly didn’t add up. It was like if a CEO of a multinational company purchased a used car because he wanted a luxury vehicle, or a rich lady going through thrift shops to get her hands on designer bags.

“Is the count planning on using them for another purpose?”

Lloyd asked. The baron shrugged.

“I do not know. But...”

The baron stroked his chin as he frowned.

“According to rumors, the count has recently been planning to build a huge statue in Cremo city.”

“A statue?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“I am not sure about that. This is my presumption, but it looks like he plans to decorate the statue by detaching the gems he buys from us.”

“Oh, that makes sense.”

Lloyd nodded his head at last. Small jewels would be used to decorate parts of the huge statue. Lloyd could understand the count after hearing that explanation.

It’ll certainly save him some money if he detaches the gems from the secondhand treasures and reuses them. After all, statues are meant to be enjoyed from afar, so even the lightly-scratched jewels won’t be much of an issue.

Lloyd recalled the chandelier among the treasures stored in the storage. It must have once been used to lighten the hall of a noble estate. However, when it came into the hands of the orcs, it turned into a giant hula hoop. Thankfully, the gems densely studded around the chandelier were mostly in one piece save for some. The count would be able to take quite a large number of gems from it.

What a frugal count he is.

No matter, Lloyd was happy that he secured a buyer. The news was even more welcomed since he could sell all the treasures to one buyer. Lloyd was greeted with good news upon arrival. To give what he owed, Lloyd shared his own good news with the baron.

“Then, is it my turn now?”

“Is it about your visit to the viscounty?” asked the baron.

“Yes, I’m referring to the water bill I told you about this morning.”

“How did Viscount Lacona react?”

“Whew, you should have seen it yourself.”

Lloyd began to chat, walking through what happened in the reception room with the viscount. Lloyd shared in detail how pitiful the viscount made himself look. As the baron listened to the story, the corners of his lips curled upward in overwhelming happiness. His expression looked like someone who finally cured their century-long indigestion. His cheekbones rose, reaching to the sky. Honestly, his reaction was understandable.

It must have been terribly humiliating when the viscount sent Sir Curno to threaten him.

The threat had pushed him into a corner. That day, the baron was mortified not by the viscount himself but by a menial knight sent by the viscount. There couldn’t be anything more humiliating than that.

But right now...He was listening to the story of how the viscount, the very enemy that shamed him, signed the contract in tears. As if that wasn’t enough, Sir Curno wet his pants. These events would become a painful memory for his tormentors who’d humiliated him. How could he not be elated when he heard the story?

I’m sure the words flow into his ear canals like honey.

Lloyd became happy at the sight of the joyful baron and the sight of his people enjoying the town festival comforted his heart as well.

That’s why I must pay off the debt fast.

Lloyd recalled the first day he came to this place. It was a ruckus as his manor was on the verge of being foreclosed. Ever since then, he had worked very hard.

I’m almost there. Just a bit more.

Little by little, he started to believe that he could pay off the debt. Just like his rising hopes, the night of the small festival deepened.

The following morning, Lloyd began to get busy. Time wasn’t on his side. That was the truth he always held tight in the corner of his heart. It was no different today even though he had fallen asleep once the sun started rising.

I’ve got mountains of work to do! All right! Let’s go!

Rising from bed early and getting ready for the day was a habit Loyd had cultivated since he was in Korea. He always woke up at the same hour. When it became bright outside, his eyes opened, and he woke Javier up. He started preparing for his trip to Cremo, the city of commerce.

“I fear it will cause trouble if I have too many people with me. Please keep the size of security to a minimum,” said Lloyd.

“Are you certain that it will be fine? If you consider your safety...”

“It is all right,” said Lloyd.

“I have Sir Asrahan with me.”

Lloyd planned on personally going to Cremo City himself. Knowing that, the baron had put together a delegation of one hundred members. Lloyd was obviously shocked.

“The more mouths we have, the more supplies we will need. Besides, the civil engineers need to stay here and keep constructing the heated flooring system.”

It was true. The amount of food and other cargo they needed would increase when there were too many mouths to feed. Their pace would decrease in proportion to the increase in items they had to carry. Moreover, winter was drawing near.

“The contract I signed in the spring specifies that the ondol construction will be finished before winter arrives. We should have finished up the entire construction by now, but we didn’t,” explained Lloyd.

It was because of the construction of the water supply system. The unplanned project required the mobilization of workers on the ondol construction, putting it to a halt.

“So I will bring the bare minimum number of civil engineers with me. I must finish the ondol construction before winter arrives, even if it means I have to put everyone on the project.”

“Then, how many do you plan to take with you?”

“I believe about twenty people would be enough to guard and load the treasures on the carriage”

“Are you sure that’s sufficient?” asked the baron again.

“Yes.”

As per Lloyd’s adamant will, twenty civil engineers, Javier, and Lloyd were the ones chosen to travel to the city of commerce. However, the final decision on the delegation size didn’t mean that Lloyd would set off for the journey right away. There was a task they needed to do before departing. It was constructing the pipes for the water supply system for the dye workshop in the viscounty.

Regardless of anything, I did sign the contract with him.

Lloyd needed to hurry and install it. That way, he would be able to get the large water bill as quickly as possible.

“All right, do not rush yourselves. Take it one step at a time. What’s the number one priority in construction sites?” asked Lloyd.

“Safety!”

“Good. You’ve done this an awful amount of times on the mountain, yes?”

“Yes, Young Master!”

“Then let’s get right to it!”

“Woah!!!”

Lloyd mobilized a portion of the civil engineering group from the purification plant of the fiefdom to the dye workshop of the viscounty. They repeated the job they had done over and over again in the mountain range. Ppodong dug the designated route and the soldiers smoothened it. They inserted, connected, and buried giant bamboo pipes. Everything took place in one unified flow.

The work was so smooth because I had everything planned out beforehand.

From the survey to design, Lloyd had finished everything before visiting the viscount and getting the contract signed.

The same went for the giant bamboo. He had already acquired the extra bamboo stalks in advance when he constructed the facility for his fiefdom in the mountain. Lloyd had already pruned them up and added stiffeners around altogether. In other words, everything was set.

Thus, all they needed was for Ppodong to dig the ground at the site and the soldiers to smoothen it up. The pipes could be installed right away.

Working my ass off back in the mountain felt like grilling for a barbecue, but this job feels like I'm tossing some frozen meals into the microwave.

It was very convenient and quick. Within fifteen days, Lloyd was able to construct almost all of the pipes. There was a difference in elevation between the Frontera fiefdom and the viscounty, which Lloyd adequately overcame with the eastern mountain range. Thanks to that, the average elevation of the overall pipes was approximately 0.7 percent.

This is good enough.

On the last day, when the pipes were connected, the viscounty's dye workshop finally saw the provision of the first water supply system. The water wasn't limewater anymore. It was the water that directly flowed from Lake Kapua. That eventually revived the viscounty's specialty product, the Laconata.

Its former color and gloss returned. Viscount Lacona was obviously overwhelmed at the sight.

"Finally. Finally..."

He gasped out between his sobs.

"How do you like it? Don't you think you made the right decision to install the water supply system?"

“Truly, yes. It is beyond me why I hesitated to sign the contract for this...”

“Well, of course. It was because of the water bill.”

“Please make sure that you do not get behind on your water bill from the first month.”

“Understood,” said Viscount Lacona.

The viscount had been overwhelmed with emotion and hugging the recovered Laconata cloth. But the word ‘water bill’ instantly dampened his spirit, and his face turned gray and sullen. Lloyd’s lips curved into a villainous smile.

Oh, pushovers like him are always welcome.

Not a single cell in him felt sorry or pity towards the viscount. The crisis was turned into an opportunity. It was the viscount himself who first put Lloyd in crisis. By overcoming it, he used the water bill as a straw to suck the viscount’s wallet dry. It was a titanium straw that no one would dare think of even touching for at least a couple of decades. Those weren’t the only things he earned.

The moment Lloyd turned around, abandoning the sullen viscount, a clear alarm rang with several messages sliding down in front of his eyes.

[You have succeeded in establishing a water supply system.]

[This marks a significant milestone in the history of the Lorasia continent.]

[The water supply system and its usage will be recorded for many years as one of the leading examples of civil construction in the kingdom and continent.]

[Your name will be recorded in the history of construction for the kingdom and continent.]

[For your first-ever continental achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have earned 600 RP.]

[Current RP: 2275]

Lloyd stopped moving, but the messages kept appearing.

[The rumors about your great achievement will spread to nearby regions.]

[In particular, the bureaucrats and civil engineers of the kingdom will be deeply interested in the engineering and social value of the water supply system.]

[You have started to become famous as a developer.]

[Those who come across the rumors about you will show greater trust toward your construction plans than before.]

My reward for introducing the water supply system, huh.

Lloyd grasped the meaning of the messages as he slowly read them.

I was wondering why I didn't get any rewards after I built the water supply system for my fiefdom.

That was something Lloyd was actually curious about.

But when he saw the messages popping in front of him, he was able to guess the reason.

This time, it wasn't just about installing the water supply system. I had to meet the condition of properly using the built structure.

He couldn't just lay down the water supply system. The condition for the accomplishment was to actually provide water using the installed facility and ultimately introduce a system that would be 'used' to collect water bills.

Good. Excellent.

The reward messages beautifully adorned the front of his eyes. Lloyd smiled in contentment as he looked at them.

I'm overflowing with RP.

This was the largest amount of RP he had ever received at once so far. But there was more.

Authority and credence as a developer is a huge reward. Though it wasn't expressed in numbers, I'm sure it's the largest reward I received.

Lloyd wanted to continue getting big construction projects down the road. That was how he would be able to make a lot of money and pay the debt of the baron. Just now, in the process of doing so, he had gained authority and credence as a developer. As such, it would be easier from now on to win over clients for construction projects.

This reward will help me throughout the future.

He liked it very much. Behind it, there were smaller rewards that followed. He earned five points of likeability from both the baron and baroness. Two points from Sir Bayern, who oversaw the construction. Four points from all the residents in his fiefdom. Thanks to that, he garnered over 126 RP, and people started to have fonder feelings toward Lloyd.

"Travel safely," the baron said.

It was the day after the water supply system was connected to the viscounty. Lloyd departed to Cremo, the city of commerce. The baron couple escorted Lloyd on his way. The baron showered Lloyd with endless words of concern.

"Be careful all the time, and do not act rash wherever you are. Do you understand?"

"I'll make sure to remember your words."

"And if something happens, make sure you hide behind Sir Asrahan."

“Yes, I promise that I will do that.”

“If you are in danger, make sure you run away before anything else.”

“Then, what about the soldiers?”

“Uhm, then run away with them together.”

The baroness was no better than her husband when it came to showering Lloyd with endless concerns.

“If things get hard, come back anytime. Promise me that you will never go on a strange, dark road or anywhere dangerous like that.”

“Yes, yes. I promise I won’t.”

“Make sure you do not skip meals.”

“Yes, I will eat on time,” said Lloyd again.

“And keep your blanket on when you sleep. Do not kick it away.”

“Mhm, yes.”

“And take this,” said the baroness.

“What is this?”

“This cutesy pink doll is a talisman...?”

The baroness held out the talisman, and Lloyd slightly frowned when he took it. It was a teddy bear, too cute and chubby to call a talisman. Not only that, the color was pink, the pastel shade that teenage girls loved. However, the look on the baroness's face was serious as she handed it over to Lloyd.

“Do not doubt its power. You should watch your words, Lloyd.”

“Uhm, but...”

“Your mother spent all night making that.”

“Oh...”

“Come on. Take it instead of just standing there.”

“But what power does it have, really?”

“I heard that it keeps away nightmares if you sleep with it every day.”

“Woah.”

“You see, sleep is necessary for a good life and luck naturally follows behind it. So I want you to tightly hug this at night while you are away. Okay?”

This was the baroness’s way of showing concern for him. He couldn’t bear to reject her efforts. At that moment, Lloyd was suddenly hit with thoughts about his mother back in Korea.

I guess all mothers are the same.

Even when things seemed unnecessary and at times pestering and embarrassing, they never stopped embracing and taking care of you. Why he thought he didn’t need any of it at the time was beyond him. He didn’t know why he thought they were a cumbersome existence. Lloyd regretted it as he looked back.

I should have accepted her when she reached out. I should have thanked her more.

Lloyd regretted that he didn’t do so in the past. So, maybe that was the reason behind his current behavior.

“Yes, thank you. Sincerely.”

He beamed and took the doll. He tightly hugged it to relieve his mother, trying to compensate for the hugs his biological mother missed out on because of his immaturity. Just like that, escorted by the baron couple, Lloyd left the fiefdom. Up until this point, nobody knew. Lloyd was simply heading to the commerce city to dispose of the old treasures. Nobody saw the future wherein the noble young master and knight of this rural province would accomplish something legendary in Cremo, the city of commerce.

“Whew... So this is Cremo.”

Lloyd, standing on the hill, sighed, and a cold air puffed out of his mouth as he exhaled. The air immediately dissipated as it appeared. Before he knew it, winter was creeping near already. The city that stood tall and thick against the blanket of the gray sea came into Lloyd’s view.

This world also has some great cities.

That was the review of Cremo, the city of commerce. To be honest, Lloyd had been skeptical about the size of the city. He didn’t think it could be very big. He had a hazy idea that the cities here wouldn’t be comparable to the modern cities in South Korea, and even if they were big, they would be the size of small cities in the province.

However, that proved to be wrong.

Now that I’m here, I can see it’s bigger than expected.

Of course, the city didn’t have any skyscrapers like Seoul and Busan. Most of the buildings were two-stories tall, and the large ones were three or four-stories tall. Despite that, the size of the city was impressively large.

This place feels like Busan during the Middle Ages.

The hill overlooked the vast shore. The city was formed along the coastline, and a group of sailboats went in and out of the pier on the shore. The workers busily working around the pier resembled a colony of ants, and surely, the size and vitality reflected the city’s location at the center of the province.

And I was able to learn some quite useful skills on our way here.

He suddenly recalled his journey after departing the Frontera barony.

“Hey, Javier?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“Teach me how to ride a horse.”

It was three mornings after they set off on the journey to Cremo. Lloyd, who had been goofing around in the carriage, spoke to Javier. He thought that it’d be good to learn the skill since he was traveling anyway. Besides, he was getting unbearably bored of dozing off in the carriage.

Not to mention, it’s so burdensome to ride behind Javier every time I ride the horse.

In fact, Lloyd didn’t know how to ride the horse. Suho Kim of South Korea and Lloyd Frontera, the owner of this body, didn’t know a thing about horse riding.

The reason was simple

Lloyd chose to drink and party over learning how to ride a horse.

However, he coincidentally received a chance to travel afar. It was the perfect opportunity to learn the skill.

“So teach me horse riding. How about it?”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Javier nodded. Lloyd cocked his head to the side.

“Huh...? Why are you agreeing?”

“Is there a reason for me to deny your request?”

“No, there isn’t. But why are you being so complaisant?”

“Javier, is that you? You’re not him, are you? Tell me honestly. Where is Javier? Where did you hide him?”

“Do you not want to learn how to ride a horse?”

“Tsk. You are such a buzzkill.”

“I do not want to exchange jokes with you, Master Lloyd.”

“How much?”

“I’d rather scrape the dirt off my foot and eat it.”

“Wow.”

Lloyd wondered if he truly hated it to that extent, but his words betrayed his face, which had a faint smile.

“Then come over here. Before we get started, I will teach you the basics of horseback riding.”

That was how Lloyd started to take horseback riding lessons with Javier. Their journey was slow but steady. Winter came closer with each passing day. As the wind blew colder, Lloyd’s riding posture stabilized.

The better he became at horseback riding, the closer he got to Cremo city. And today at last...The delegation safely arrived at Cremo after enduring fifteen days of the cold and bitter winter wind.

“Now, let’s find a place to rest,” instructed Lloyd.

They went down the hill and entered the city. Just like its name as the city of commerce, the roads were wide and crowded. People from all over the region bustled through the streets as carriages and humans passed alongside each other. Merchants and customers yelled at each other to settle on a price. Beads of sweat streaked down the faces of the porters, who were flushed red. The streets rippled with a wave of people moving through the crowd, and everyone shouted from all directions. The City of Cremo was a chaotic mixture reminiscent of bibimbap. The sight dazed everyone in the delegation. The twenty civil engineers became dumbfounded and speechless as they experienced their first encounter with a bustling metropolis like Cremo. The same went for Javier. No, in his case, it was worse for him.

His eyes constantly scanned around the area nonstop. He strove to take in all the sounds that came around him. The sword master's position an arm's reach from him, Javier's senses were incredibly sensitive even giving him insomnia. When the man was thrown into the congested streets, his senses became overwhelmed. He felt the congestion clearer and more vividly than anyone else in the area. Lloyd's wry smile became just as wide.

"Hey," called Lloyd.

"Yes, Master Lloyd."

"Loosen up."

"I am loosened up."

"It doesn't look like it."

"I really am."

"Then why do your eyes keep rolling to the sides?"

"Excuse me?"

"You're practically scanning the entire area right now. It's like you're in the middle of a war."

Javier flinched but remained silent.

Me? I was that tense?

Lloyd continued to speak.

“I understand this is your first time in such a chaotic place, but can you please be a little more natural? It’s so obvious you’re a country bumpkin.”

“Don’t just stand there. Let’s go.”

Lloyd tapped Javier on the shoulder. Javier followed, a little bit confused.

“Master Lloyd.”

“Yeah.”

“Are you okay, Master Lloyd?”

“Me? What do you mean?”

“I am asking if you are not feeling overwhelmed by the chaos.”

“Yeah. I’m fine. This place isn’t too crowded.”

Lloyd let out a chuckle. It was true, compared to his old home country, South Korea, the congestion of this city felt like nothing.

If you think about the rush hour in Sindorim station, well, this place feels like a peaceful park.

Sindorim station produced an infinite number of human sandwiches as passengers constantly flooded in and out of the train. Anybody could get a free taste of someone’s armpit as it rushed toward their mouth. Everyone was indiscriminately shoved against each other by force. Sindorim Station during rush hour was a hellish place. Lloyd had a plethora of experiences with the chaos and congestion of the Sindorim Station. He was a veteran there.

I had to ride from the Sindorim Station if I wanted to get home from school. Oh, my eventful past.

Lloyd put away his memories as if he were bestowing a medal on his old self. He tactfully led the delegation, which was left half-dazed by the congestion.

“Stop spacing out everyone, and come over here.”

They moved to one side of the bustling road. By asking the merchants for directions, they were able to find a decent inn without wandering around for long. Lloyd then lightly unpacked and cleaned himself. Afterward, he took Javier with him to the center of the city. They moved toward the large mansion that stood tall above the others. It was the manor of Count Cremo, the great lord of the Cremona province and the owner of this very city.

He is also my kind customer who will buy all of the treasures I brought today.

Whatever the case was, the purpose of coming to this place rested on selling the treasures from the orc tribe to help pay off their debt. Thankfully, getting into the count’s mansion was easy.

“I am Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Baron Frontera. I am here to show you the items you have expressed your desire to purchase via letter.”

He showed the necklace, which was engraved with a symbol of the Frontera barony. It was also the identification that proved his membership in the noble family. Just like that, Lloyd passed through the gate. Past the vast stadium-sized garden, he walked into the main building of the estate.

It’s gigantic.

The mansion undoubtedly had the size befitting its status. It couldn’t be compared to the one in the Frontera barony, which just barely passed as a mansion. This, on the other hand, was the type of estate owned by Hollywood celebrities shown on TV, or closer to the elegant mansions that belonged to the European nobles. That was the kind of mansion Lloyd and Javier were standing before.

“The count is currently at the parlor. Please follow me.”

The old man, who looked like the butler of the mansion, led the way from the main building gate. Lloyd walked around, guided by the old man. The butler began to speak.

“It must have been a long journey from the Frontera barony. Given your distance from the city, allow me to share with you some special precautions as you may not know the count’s current situation.”

“Precautions?” asked Lloyd.

The butler spoke as he continued walking. “The count’s spirit is not very well these days. Therefore, when you meet him, I ask you to keep the conversation to the minimum outside of formalities.”

“Do you mean I should speak only what is necessary?”

“Yes. For there is no need to utter something unnecessary and be nitpicked for your words.”

“Is that how disturbed he is?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Excuse me, if it is not too much, may I know why?” asked Lloyd carefully.

The count was the most powerful man in this province. What would happen if Lloyd made a mistake in front of him and he got on the count’s bad side? The consequences would be devastating and Lloyd didn’t want that to happen. Thus, it would be best if he acted carefully. To Lloyd’s relief, the butler explained without putting up a fight as if he understood where Lloyd was coming from.

“It is because of the series of delayed constructions.”

“Construction delays? What do you mean?”

“The count is currently pushing ahead with the installation of the statue in the sea, but things have been slowing down lately.”

“Installation of the statue...”

Oh, I know. The reason the count decided to purchase my second treasures in the first place was to get cheap jewels to adorn the statue with.

“Things are slowing down, I see. But what is behind the delay?”

“No developer is coming forth to lead the construction.”

The butler continued to explain.

“From the very beginning, the count has always planned on erecting a giant mermaid statue on the shore. It was the solution to a long-standing problem of ours.”

“A long-standing problem?”

“Gigatitan.”

“Oh.” Lloyd nodded.

Lloyd recalled something when he heard the name.

Gigatitan is, as far as I can remember, a giant monster that looks like a lobster.

In The Knight of Blood and Iron, the monster was described as having a 295-foot-long body and a shell so hard and thick that no cannons from the warships could penetrate into it.

It’s normally known to reside in the deep sea, but I remember, this city was an exception.

The only exception, actually. It must have been about ten years ago. One Gigatian appeared in the sea of the peaceful Cremo port. It instantly demolished two passing merchant ships. Because of that...

“The count requested help from the Royal Navy. His Majesty accepted it right away as soon as he realized the gravity of the situation. The navy fleet confidently took off to take care of the giant monster.”

The butler continued to explain.

“However, all three attempts to kill the creature failed. It was so because there was no means even for the navy to lay an attack on the Gigatian in the water. In fact, the navy turned back home after losing three ships.”

The old man’s explanation was the same as described in the novel. Lloyd nodded in understanding.

Afterward, the Gigatitan goes to inhabit the coast of Cremo. The Royal Navy decides to wait and see, and the count has no choice but to accept the fate of uncomfortable co-existence with the giant monster.

Thankfully, however, the monster appeared only about three or four times a year, and it never attacked the city on land. That was what made it possible for the city to bear the discomfort of living with the monster. The city then made observation posts across the nearby coasts. They were meant to observe the emergence of the Gigatitan. The observation posts used beacon fires and reflectors when they noticed the emergence of the monster. Once the news was received, the port issued an escape order to all the ships on the coast. When that happened, the ships sailed far away into the sea. Thanks to such an alert system, there were only a few instances of ships getting wrecked in the decade following the monster’s first emergence.

As such, the palace entirely scrapped its plan to kill the monster. There was only one reason. The loss that would be incurred during the process of killing the monster looked to be greater than the loss in continuing their uncomfortable co-existence with the monster.

In fact, their evaluation was spot on. It certainly was the case overall. Losing one or two ships intermittently proved to be less damage than deploying a massive number of navy capabilities to the monster. However, Count Cremo begged to differ.

“And just like that, it has been ten years since we last decided to coexist with the monster. We have since seen a forty percent reduction in trade.”

The butler sighed at length. Lloyd nodded in understanding.

He’s right. Ten years later, the city will be overshadowed by another port for its role in commerce.

This was all because of the Gigatitan. It didn’t cause any immediate damage in the moment, but it was a disaster that was waiting to blow up at any time. From the merchants’ shoes, that alone was risk enough of losing a ship.

I think that’s why they all went away to use other ports.

That was likely why the count decided to put up the statue. It was his way of going against the Gigatitan. Lloyd cocked his head to the side. “So, will erecting the mermaid statue drive away the Gigatitan?”

“Yes, it is likely,” the butler nodded as if it was obvious.

“This is not a simple myth. The mermaids are the most powerful tribe in the sea.”

“Ah, I am already aware of that.”

It was the indisputable truth. In the background of The Knight of Blood and Iron, the mermaids in this world were truly powerful. They weren’t the same as the weak and frail creatures who sang songs under the sea in cartoons. They were so muscular and strong that swimmers with Olympic gold medals looked like a child compared to them. Their shoulders were as wide as the Pacific. Their pecs looked firm enough to bounce off flying meteors. They had prominent six-pack abs. Their thick veins look like worms. Literally speaking, they were unrivaled swimmers who spent their whole lives doing hardcore, extreme training. If the orcs were the buff tribe on land, it was the mermaids in the sea.

“Does it mean that you can receive help from the mermaids if you put up the statue?” asked Lloyd.

“We will not be receiving the help, but we can scare the monster.”

“Scare the monster?”

“Yes. Sometimes, the mermaids form a giant army and hunt down the Gigatitan.”

“Aha. So you mean that putting up a giant version of the mermaid would discourage the monster as it will be led to think that it has met its nemesis.”

“That is right. It may possibly go somewhere else once it feels threatened.”

“Hmm, that does make sense.”

This wasn’t a surefire method, but it did hold some potential. The count must have thought that alone was reason enough to erect a mermaid statue.

“But did you say that there are no developers? That is a little strange.”

It indeed was strange. The count was pushing ahead with the construction for the prosperity of the city. The compensation would certainly be massive, so why did no one step forward to take the job? With a short sigh, the butler explained and answered Lloyd’s curiosity.

“The required construction is extremely difficult and esoteric. No, it is almost impossible.”

“How so?”

“What do you think is necessary to put up a statue in the sea?”

“Of course,” said Lloyd, “you need firm ground.”

“Yes, that is right. But the count has added a condition in constructing the foundation.”

“What was it?”

“He wants the ground the statue will be on to be vertically stacked to the surface.”

“Phew.” Lloyd licked his lips in regret.

He finally understood why no developers had volunteered to take the project, and it was because of the statue’s foundation.

An ordinary reclamation method will never satisfy his condition.

Generally, creating land on top of the sea required a ginormous amount of soil to be poured into it. That would cause the ocean floor to become the shape of a pyramid.

However, the count raised opposition to this common method. He had set this ridiculous condition for the construction, but this term was just one of his desperate attempts. Lloyd was able to guess somewhat why the count made such a condition.

“Did he put such a condition because he didn’t want the construction to interfere with the navigation of the ships?”

“Is that your guess?”

“Yes, though simply put.”

The butler widened his eyes when Lloyd asked the question. Lloyd silently put a smile on his face.

Yes, this port didn’t have a wide waterway at the entrance.

He recalled the geography of the shore on his way here. It was sunk in the shape of a half-moon. Compared to the size of the natural port, this one didn’t have a wide waterway.

That must have been the reason why the count flustered everyone by setting such a peculiar condition for construction.

The waterways are already narrow enough, it’ll get even more difficult when the reclamation process narrows it further. The water level around the reclaimed land would become seriously shallow.

The current waterway was extremely narrow, and it was going to get narrower. That would affect the navigation of the ships, and if they were struck with bad luck, they'd be stranded or crash. One wrong decision to drive out the Gigatitan could blow up into a ludicrous disaster if the waterway got narrowed and became avoided by everyone.

But it's not like the statue can be put up far into the sea. The water would be too deep in the first place to start construction if that's the case.

Lloyd could see the dilemma the count was going through as he tried to put up the statue to drive away the Gigatitan and preserve the waterway.

"Can't it be built on land? There seems to be enough space beside the port."

"That will be difficult."

The butler made a bitter smile at Lloyd's question.

"It must be erected on top of water. Do you think the Gigatitan will fear a mermaid resting on land? The mermaid had to be in the water or at least in shallow waters. That was how the mermaid would look real and threatening to the Gigatitan."

"Aha."

So that's why they're trying to build it in the sea instead of comfortably on the land.

However, the construction was not going as well as he thought it would go. Lloyd understood at last why the count was in a bad mood.

"Anyway, this is the reason why no developers have come forth to start the construction for several months now."

Before Lloyd knew it, he was already in front of the parlor. The butler stopped in the hallway and turned around to face Lloyd. His gaze was serious, and his voice sounded firm.

"You will now be meeting the count. So, make sure to refrain from making any unnecessary remarks. In particular, be careful that you do not mention the words 'Gigatitan,' 'statue,' 'construction,' etc. Please keep my advice in mind. I answered all your questions to make sure that we are on the same page. Do you understand, Young Master?”

“Yes, I will keep it in mind.”

Lloyd nodded with a sincere expression on his face. The butler smiled in satisfaction and knocked on the door.

“Thank you for understanding. Well then.”

At last, a clear ring of a bell signaled them to come inside. The butler opened the door, and he elegantly motioned his hand. Lloyd entered the parlor guided by the butler. A middle-aged man with a strong build stood inside the parlor. He looked highly dignified and was dressed luxuriously. He was Count Cremo. Lloyd bowed in respect as soon as he saw the count.

Recalling the very words the butler had said a while ago, Lloyd courteously introduced himself, saying, “I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family, am honored to be in your presence to be given the opportunity to suggest a new ‘construction’ method for building the foundation where the ‘statue’ will be put up to drive the ‘Gigatitan’ away.”

Chapter 63: The Impossible Construction (1)

“I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family, am honored to be in your presence to be given the opportunity to suggest a new ‘construction’ method for building the foundation where the ‘statue’ will be put up to drive the ‘Gigatitan’ away.”

As soon as Lloyd’s voice filled up the parlor, the room instantly sank into silence. The butler who opened the door for Lloyd turned pale. Javier’s brow twitched as he stood behind Lloyd.

Count Cremo, the one who turned to face Lloyd, was...

“Young man, what did you just say?”

He tilted his head.

It worked. He didn’t get angry. I have his attention.

Lloyd, who had spoken such drastic words for that very purpose, immediately replied.

“I mean every word, Your Excellency. Coincidentally, I heard about your concern on the way here, and I realized that I have the solution.”

“Continue speaking,” said the count as he slouched into the parlor chair and looked at him with a sharpened gaze.

It feels like I’m presenting a group project before the professor.

Lloyd, however, didn’t tense up. He suddenly grew oblivious to the count’s status and power. He then considered the count as only one thing.

That man is money. He’s a client who will open his wallet for me.

Lloyd had to figure out a way to win over the client. He had to come up with a method that would prompt his client to sign a contract with him. Like a chef looking at a dish of his ingredients, Lloyd resolved in his heart and spoke casually.

“To put it bluntly, the current developers don’t have the correct reclamation technique to meet your demand to vertically raise the foundation.”

“Are you saying that it is impossible for them?” asked the count.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“But it is possible for you?”

“Yes, Your Excellency,” said Lloyd and nodded his head.

In moments like these, showing confidence was essential.

So, Lloyd continued, his voice filled with conviction.

“In order to make a great, solid foundation with the little land mass in the narrow waterway, I must combine the friction pile and Box Caisson method, Your Excellency.”

“Pile? Box Caisson?” repeated the count.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Hmm, it sounds fine.”

“Your Excellency, are you familiar with those methods, by any chance?” asked Lloyd in surprise.

“No, not at all.”

The count shook his head. He grinned like a huge bear.

“How should I know them?”

“If that is the case...”

“No one was willing to take the construction anyway,” explained the count, “Yet that pesky monster Gigantitan continues to stick around the coast, and my port is continually losing trade deals because of it. Here you are brimming with confidence, so I am entrusting it to you. If you succeed, good. If you fail, I still have nothing to lose. Oh, but you do know that if your construction fails, you will have to shoulder the cost of the construction, yes?”

“Of course.”

In the case Lloyd succeeded, he was set to make an obscene amount of money. Not to mention he could potentially grow close with Count Cremo, the most powerful man in the province. This meant that Lloyd would be getting reliable supporters.

Just perfect.

Lloyd discretely clenched his fists.

I just devised a plan when I heard the predicament from the butler, and it worked like a charm.

The construction was on a halt, and no builder was coming out to take the job. That was where Lloyd smelled money. The smell was thick, like a cup of espresso. So he racked his brain during the short walk to the parlor. He calculated the chances of the construction ending in success the benefits he would be attaining and the loss should it come to failure.

Lloyd included all the potential factors in his calculation. Once that was done, he quickly drew a conclusion: It was worth taking the challenge. On top of his mental calculation, he remembered the part in the novel that talked about what the count was like.

He’s a man with machismo and who isn’t afraid to take on challenges. He thinks highly of capable people, and he doesn’t allow himself to be restricted by superfluous formalities.

The count didn’t care what people were like as long they were skilled. That was why he treated Javier with respect in the novel, even when the latter was a wanted man. Even in the middle of the story, he still became a reliable supporter of Javier.

The count must be the same now.

That was why Lloyd opted to be direct and straightforward instead of beating around the bush. He had informed the count that he had a solution and drew his attention. Now, Lloyd’s attempt worked wonders.

Lloyd said, “Thank you for trusting me, Your Excellency.”

“Do not thank me. By the way, I didn’t hear everything because you jumped right into talking about the construction. Who did you say you were?”

“Oh, I am Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family.”

Lloyd bowed in respect. At that moment, the warm smile on the count’s face disappeared.

His face looked way worse than when Lloyd tossed the words “Gigatitan,” “statue,” and “construction” as he ignored the butler’s advice.

“What an insolent prick you are.”

Count Cremo rose from his seat with a straight face and trudged toward Lloyd’s way. He brushed past Lloyd, stopping instead right in front of Javier, the count harshly glared down at the knight in front of him.

“Yes, I knew you seemed awfully confident while speaking about this fascinating construction technique for some reason. You are the infamous eldest son of the Frontera family. I have heard quite often about your excellent construction skills these days. In fact, I even thought about sending a man to commission you for the project. However, I have never imagined you to be this bold and show such disregard for manners.”

The count’s voice turned rougher.

“I let it slide when your subject spoke on your behalf in regard to the construction. How dare you have him pay his respect to me instead of facing me directly and formally introducing yourself? Ha! I have never fathomed that I would live to see such impertinence.”

Anger flooded through the count, which was evident in his eyes. Just behind him was Lloyd, who was left feeling embarrassed and awkward. He found himself scratching his chin.

“Uhm, Count Cremo?”

“Subject! Do not speak anymore and stay quiet!” bawled the count without turning back.

“Now, do explain, the eldest son of the Frontera family. Did you come here to be rude to me today?”

The stern gaze of the count’s face pierced into Javier’s placid face. Lloyd chuckled in sadness.

“Uhm, Count Cremo?”

“Did I not tell you to stay quiet?” his voice sounded sterner.

“Uhm, I am sorry, but—”

“If you are sorry, shut—”

“I am Lloyd Frontera,” interrupted Lloyd.

“Hmm?”

Count Cremo froze and finally, he turned awkwardly and faced Lloyd again.

“You are?” asked the count.

“Yes,” replied Lloyd.

“You are the eldest son in the Frontera family?”

“Yes.”

A wry smile was formed on Lloyd’s face. With a confused face, Count Cremo pointed at Javier.

“What about this fellow?”

“He is my personal knight,” answered Lloyd.

“Really?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Really?”

“Yes, really.”

“Hmm. But this fellow over here has the appearance of a noble, not you.”

Lloyd didn’t know what to say.

“I’m not lying,” pressed Count Cremo one more time.

“Well, anyway. I am glad to meet such a skilled and famous developer as yourself.”

“Yes...I am honored.”

Once they settled into their seats after a handshake, the count let out a loud chuckle. He gazed at Lloyd with eyes full of fascination.

“You must be a fairly wise man,” said the count.

“Excuse me?”

“I mean that you are magnanimous and generous.”

“I do not know what you mean.”

A wise man? Magnanimous?

Those words puzzled Lloyd. With another burst of laughter, the count spoke. “I’m saying this because you let such a handsome knight who looks more noble than you stand by your side. Go and ask anyone you meet for the first time. Ask a hundred people, and every single one of them will think that fellow is the noble, and you are his subject.”

“Eek.”

“Why? Do you believe otherwise?”

“No, Your Excellency. It’s just you’re very direct with your words.”

“Hahaha. You know the truth as well, and yet, you still have him beside you so casually. My, you are a man of character, indeed.”

Can we please get back to talking about the construction now? Lloyd wished in his heart. Thankfully, the count’s verbal attacks stopped there.

“Shall we continue talking about where we left off about the construction?”

After that, Lloyd was able to turn the topic and discuss constructing the foundation under the sea. Most part of the discussion revolved around Lloyd explaining to the count the technicalities of the construction, and the latter simply nodded. The count promised to provide Lloyd with laborers, to which Lloyd expressed his gratitude. With that, the construction contract was signed. The very purpose of traveling all the way to the city, selling secondhand treasures, was achieved without any problem as well.

“Hand the items over to the butler, and get the payment from him as well,” instructed the count.

“Thank you.”

“No need to thank me. Please make sure that the construction ends in success. If you do, I will make sure to reward you with a hefty sum.”

“I will keep that in mind, Your Excellency.”

Treat clients with your utmost courtesy. Recalling this principle, Lloyd sincerely conveyed his appreciation to the count. A long time ago Lloyd had suggested building a heated flooring system to the pub owner. That day was his first day in this world, and he came up with a grand vision for the future. His bold future vision was that he would someday be commissioned with a large-scale civil engineering project and build ports and bridges to pay off the crushing debt that weighed heavily on the baron family. Now, that determination was slowly turning into reality. This marked the first construction contract from an upper-class noble and the beginning of a new construction that would earn him thick stacks of cash.

The following morning rolled around. Lloyd began preparing for the construction to lay the artificial ground under the sea. It was time to survey.

“Hmph.”

Waves of the coast splashed against the port. Lloyd and Javier were on a hard wooden boat on the sea. Lloyd struck his head out its ledge and drew in a heavy breath. He put on a pair of goggles that looked like a large soap case. He held his breath and leaned forward, putting his head into the sea. The seawater felt cold against his face.

Ugh... It feels like my face is being torn off.

It was early winter. So, when he dove his unprotected face into the water, it felt like his skin was being ripped away from him.

Lloyd didn’t pull his face out. He couldn’t because he had to survey.

No construction can take place without surveying. In order for me to activate the skill, I need to “see” the site with my own eyes.

The construction for this project would take place at the bottom of the sea. This meant that he had to directly see the seabed.

Thankfully, the water is clear.

Lloyd snapped open his eyes under the cold water. The turbidity of the shore in Cremo City was low. This meant that the water was pristine, almost transparent, with extremely few sediments floating around. On top of that, the goggles the count provided were pretty decent. Thanks to all of these factors, Lloyd could get a somewhat clear view of the seabed almost thirty-two feet away.

The surveying skill activated and informed Lloyd about the information on the seabed.

I'm relieved that the slope is almost nonexistent at the bottom. It's flat. Plus, the surface of the bottom is rich with a sedimentary layer and is adequately soft. As for the weathered rock layer and soft rock layer... Hmm. I don't see the latter.

The soft rock layer referred to the comparatively solid ground far under the surface of the seabed.

Lloyd could not see it down under. To be more correct, Lloyd could not detect the soft rock layer within the sixteen feet of the ground he could see using the Subterranean Scanning skill.

It'd probably be deeper down. But it doesn't matter. Anyway... Argh...I've reached my limit.

Lloyd grimaced as he surveyed the sea. Was it because he couldn't hold his breathing any longer? No, it was because of the icy water. It felt like his face was vanishing. At last, Lloyd jerked his head out of the water, unable to endure any longer.

"Phew! Huff, huff! Towel!"

Lloyd shouted the moment he got out. A towel was immediately handed to him.

“Here it is.”

Javier held out a plushy towel. Lloyd removed the goggles and took the towel. He then wiped the seawater off his face. It was much later when the senses in his skin started to come back.

Ugh. I hate it. I hate it so much.

Holding his breath was bearable but the seawater was too cold. He feared that he’d get frostbite. As the self-deprecation began to eat him up inside, Lloyd stared at Javier.

“Hey.”

“Yes?”

“Can’t you do the surveying for me?”

Lloyd meant every word he said. If he could, he wanted to pass the buck to Javier, but Lloyd himself and Javier knew very well that it couldn’t be passed.

“Of course, I wish to do it for you, but-”

“I don’t want to.”

“Why?” asked Lloyd.

“I am enjoying how things are now.”

“Enjoying it? Wait, you...” Lloyd trailed off.

“Yes, I am extremely elated to see you struggle through your efforts.”

“Hey...”

“I am joking.”

“Ha... I didn’t know you knew how to joke.”

“I am very happy right now unlike usual.”

“Because you can see me struggling and scuffling around?”

“Yes.”

“That, of course, was a joke too.”

This punk is having too much fun.

However, on the other hand, Lloyd could feel something else. He could feel that Javier wasn’t blindly enjoying this situation very much.

“Anyway, do you think it will work out this time, too?” asked Javier.

“Work out? What do you mean?”

“The construction.”

The way Javier said it was full of concern.

“To be honest, I cannot imagine what it will look like in the slightest.”

“Imagine?”

“Yes.”

Javier continued to explain.

“The water is not very shallow down here. So it makes me wonder if it is indeed possible for anyone to make land without pouring soil and rocks over it.”

“Are you skeptical?”

“Yes, this place is entirely different from the Maritz Wetland.”

Those were Javier’s honest thoughts. The Maritz Wetland was drained of water and turned into farmland. However, this sea was poles apart from that place.

“I also wonder if you plan on having Hamang drink the seawater. But, even then, it still looks impossible,” said Javier again, his voice dripping with doubt.

Even if Hamang could drink buckets of seawater, it barely changed anything. After all, the sea held an unimaginable amount of water. Hamang could endlessly drink without stopping, but the water would never drain. So, the method they used for the Martiz Wetland was impossible here.

With sincerity, Javier asked, “Master Lloyd, do you have any magic in place, by any chance?”

He asked because this project seemed impossible without the help of magic. Javier heard the various methods Lloyd enumerated to the count, but it was all still a mystery. Since Lloyd understood where Javier was coming from, he shrugged.

“Magic, you say. It’s similar,” said Lloyd.

It was indeed similar. Something magical was brewing up. So it was natural for Javier to be curious. Thinking that in his head, Lloyd spoke to Javier.

“This time, we are going to use the most magical ingredient in construction fields.”

“Magical ingredient? What do you mean?”

“Have you ever heard of cement?”

Lloyd grinned softly as he said the ingredient out loud. He thought to himself, Yes, indeed. Construction sites are nothing without concrete.

Chapter 64: The Impossible Construction (2)

Cement was a mixture that was used in putting up buildings and was an indispensable ingredient for construction.

“The word comes from the Latin word, ‘cementum,’ which means ‘small broken rocks’.”

“Latin...?”

“Oh, yes, there is a language that’s called Latin,” added Lloyd.

“Is that an ancient language?”

“You’re right.” Lloyd nodded his head. He chuckled as he stared at Javier rowing the boat.

“Anyway, I am thinking of making cement from now on. Without it, this project isn’t going to go anywhere.”

“So you mean there is no magical power involved then,” said Javier.

“Of course. We can’t go under because of this one project,” said Lloyd straightforwardly.

What he said was true. Magicians were highly valuable. It wasn’t anything surprising that they were obscenely expensive. If there was a magician that held enough power to materially impact large-scale constructions...

They would be more expensive. I could scrap every penny of my fiefdom’s budget, and it still wouldn’t be enough to cover them. After all, they would be on the same level as the kingdom’s senior magicians.

It was impossible to mobilize a magician for this project. Lloyd never even considered hiring them in the first place. He continued to speak. “We don’t need magic. Thankfully, the survey back there confirmed that my technique will work.”

“Do you mean...the friction pile or whatever?”

“Yeah,” Lloyd said as he nodded.

Just as he said, this technique seemed to be the perfect fit for this part of the sea. It was more so because there was a soft rock layer deeply buried beneath the seabed.

It’s just like the bottom of countless buildings built around the great canal Canal Grande in Venice.

The foundation of the Venice buildings Lloyd had come across in his club years came to his mind. Venice was a city built on water, and its foundation was pretty similar to this place. A thick mudflat and mud covered the seabed, and a soft rock layer sat much further below it.

It was so deep that the base of a typical building wouldn’t be able to reach it. Amid such circumstances, the people of Venice came up with a wise solution.

They stuck dozens, hundreds, and thousands of long piles under the seabed. Once the piles were solidified in the mud, they worked to build the foundation of buildings on them.

Fast forward hundreds of years. Those ever-sturdy piles supported the buildings just fine.

This was the traditional method of friction pile.

Of course, the technique got developed in the modern days.

The fundamental principle remained almost unchanged. The only change was the replacement of materials. From the wooden piles, they were changed to larger and sturdier ones, such as concrete pillars or H-beams. Lloyd mapped out one more technique used in the modern days on top of the friction pile method.

“I will be mixing the friction pile and box caisson method together since the water here is deeper than in Venice. The mudflat and mud layer in this place is thicker and softer, so it’s perfect for the caisson to be sunk by its own weight.”

Javier simply sat staring at Lloyd without saying anything.

“Not a clue what I am talking about, eh?” asked Lloyd.

“No.”

“Well, anyway, if I want the box caisson to be a success, I must make cement. All right, let’s go.”

Before they realized it, the boat was already touching the pier.

The two of them walked out of the boat and got to the pier when a soft voice welcomed their arrival.

“You are here.”

A velvety and gentle voice.

The owner of the voice warmly greeted them with crinkled eyes. There was also a light pink flush on her cheeks. A beautiful young lady was standing on the pier. She was looking at them as she greeted them with a sheepish look.

“Hmm?” Lloyd cocked his head to the side.

He had no memory of her. It was his first time meeting her, but her dress wasn’t anything ordinary. She was donned in an extremely luxurious dress, which stood in stark contrast with the gloomy pier. Moreover, the people she was surrounded by sharpened the contrast all the more. Five knights clad in silver armor protected her side.

“Excuse me, may I ask who you are?” asked Lloyd.

She was definitely not a commoner. Lloyd’s careful question was received with silence.

That was because she wasn’t smiling at Lloyd. She was smiling at Javier.

“Although I am overcome with shyness to say this, I have been waiting for you, Sir Asrahan.”

“Waiting for me?” asked Javier.

“Yes. And this...please take this.”

The lady hung her head as her cheeks flushed in a pinkish red.

She then held out something tightly grasped in her hands.

“I sincerely hope you will take it.”

Lloyd vividly recognized what it was. It was a letter in a light pink envelope. Even more, the letter was signed beautifully with the name “Christine Cremo.”

Hold on. Christine Cremo...? The only daughter of Count Cremo? She came down here all of a sudden to give a letter to Javier?

This was a monumentally ridiculous situation for Lloyd. On the other hand, Javier was...

“Thank you, my lady.”

He took the letter casually and put it inside his pocket like a seasoned lover.

He looked natural and casual, as if he had experienced this many times. The sight made Lady Christine blush furthermore. She whipped around as if she couldn’t take the embarrassment welling up in her. She quickly walked ahead, almost running away, and distanced herself from the pier. The knights were taken aback by her sudden behavior, so they followed suit in a quick manner.

Now, Lloyd and Javier were the only ones left on the pier. The sea wind swished around them.

“Hey.”

Lloyd broke the silence first.

“What in the world just happened?”

“It looks like I have received a letter,” Javier deadpanned.

“Yeah, I know that part. I am asking why you are receiving a letter.”

“It appears it is because of what happened as we departed the count’s manor yesterday.”

“Yesterday? Did something happen when we went out of the manor?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“What happened?”

Lloyd tilted his head to the side.

Nothing had happened the day before. He simply met the count, proposed a new plan, and signed the contract. Afterward, he handed over the secondhand treasures to the butler. Once they were appraised and appropriated for their value, Lloyd was given a satisfying sum of gold coins. That was all that happened. It was the version of events Lloyd remembered about the previous day. But Javier’s version was slightly different.

“It was around the time we walked out of the mansion after receiving the payment from the butler. At that time...”

“At that time? What?” Lloyd said impatiently.

“That lady was strolling around the garden when she turned around to our side. Our eyes locked at that moment for a second.”

“So?” Lloyd asked.

“That is all,” said Javier.

“Hold on... Your eyes locked with hers for a moment, and that was all? The next day, that noble lady hands you a letter with a blushing face? Do you really see nothing strange about this situation? Really?”

“Yes.”

“How so?”

“What do you mean, how so?” Javier looked at Lloyd and cocked his head.

It was as if he couldn’t understand the fuss behind something so natural. And, his words reflected his attitude the same.

“Our eyes were locked,” Javier said.

Lloyd was lost for words.

“Master Lloyd, has this never happened to you before?”

“I have no words.”

“The number of love letters I have received like that... Let me count,” said Javier.

“Don’t count.”

“Forty... Fifty... One hundred... 150... Hmm...”

“I said don’t count.”

“It appears I have about 537 letters, including the one I just received.

Lloyd hated handsome bastards for this very reason. He was thoroughly annoyed by them.

Dirty and guileful handsome men.

Lloyd let out a scoff. “Let’s drop the subject and get back to where we left off.”

“By where we left off, you mean-”

“Cement.”

Lloyd spoke as he turned to walk toward the inn.

“I will be heading back to the inn. And you should go and meet the butler.”

“What should I tell him?”

“Tell him to send ten kilos each of limestone, sand, and volcanic ash to the inn. Oh, don’t forget to tell him to hook us up to a forge we can borrow as our workshop.”

“I understand. Is that all?”

“No, there’s more,” said Lloyd.

“What is it?”

“Look at the ground when you walk and cover up your face.”

“Excuse me?”

“I am telling you to stop alluring innocent girls, man.”

“Could it be that you are jealous of me?”

“What?”

“I am saying this because it appears that you have been jealous of me since earlier. There’s no other explanation.”

“Haha, no way. No way at all.”

Lloyd shrugged, his attitude relaxed.

“The type of person I look down on the most are those who flirt with any girls they see on the street.”

“Flirt?”

“There’s such a thing. It happened before. So, I was on the street near my school, and a boy walked up to a girl and asked her for directions. The girl shouted, ‘I have a boyfriend!’ and she ran off at lightning speed. Goodness, can you imagine how humiliated he was? It was just so funny looking at it, but goodness, the man felt so embarrassed and hopeless that he couldn’t get a wink of sleep for several nights... Dammit...”

“Oh... This is your story...”

“Haa, if you know, then go.”

“Cheer up.”

“Shut up. Scram.”

“I will be back...”

With that, Javier trodded off to the manor. The items he had asked from the butler arrived at the inn around nighttime. Volcanic ash, however, was excluded from the bundle, and it came with a letter that the ash could not be acquired.

“Tsk.” Lloyd licked his lips in regret.

Volcanic ash. The most crucial ingredient in this project was missing.

I need that to make Greek or Roman-style cement.

He was disappointed. Was he disappointed because he liked Roman-style civil engineering?

No, he was disappointed because there was a clear benefit to using Roman-style cement.

It’s the sturdiest kind among the types of cement I can make now here.

In fact, the history of cement was very deep.

The item held more than 5,000 years of history. This ancient cement was already being used to build pyramids in Egypt around the time Dangun established the Gojoseon. In particular, the cement that boasted the most robustness and reliability was Greek and Roman.

People battered pozzolan cement, sand, and volcanic ash with seawater.

The resulting cement was truly sturdy. It was so sturdy that even the cement breakwaters built over 2,000 years ago stood tall and effective to this day. The secret behind such sturdiness was in the volcanic ash.

It’s thanks to the tuff in the ash. It tightens the space between the aggregate and mortar, and it prevents fissures from spreading in the structure.

So, that was the reason why Lloyd wanted to use Roman cement as much as possible. That was also why he had requested volcanic ash from the butler. However, it didn’t come.

Well, it makes sense. It’s not like there’s a volcano nearby, and no one would think to store it after traveling far away to a volcano. Is Portland cement the only available option for me? That seems like a much harder option.

Portland cement was considered the beginning of modern cement. Lloyd had somewhat of an idea of the manufacturing method.

You crush and dry limestone, clay, silica, and oxidized steel. After that, you filter it with water, bake it after mixing in some coal powder, and once it’s frozen, mix it up with the plaster and disintegrate it.

He only had a general idea of the process. So it looked like he would need to repeatedly experiment until he had the exact formula. From that moment onward, Lloyd engrossed himself in producing cement.

He ground and mixed the ingredients he had gotten from the count. He fired it in the forge and dried it in the early winter sea breeze. Grind, mix, and pour water. Rinse and repeat. But despite his efforts, he didn’t make any cement.

No. It keeps crumbling to pieces.

The mixture’s ratio of the ingredients might have been incorrect, or there could’ve been a defect in the process of baking or freeze drying the mixture. He didn’t know what the issue was.

The cement looked decent, but it didn’t do its job. It seemed fine when Lloyd mixed the water and sand. But when it was out to dry, a long crack was formed on its surface.

I can’t use this for the project.

Fifteen days passed. As time progressed without any fruitful result, nervousness started to creep into his heart.

I wish I could get my hands on volcanic ash. Then, I wouldn’t even have this worry.

If he had a large amount of volcanic ash, he’d only have to experiment with the proportions of the limestone and sand.

Then, he could produce cement in a much more convenient manner with more satisfying results. He was wistful that it wasn’t the case. At one point, he thought of going to a volcano himself to get the ash.

But...No, no. There’s nowhere near to get volcanic ash, and it would be too inefficient if you consider the loading expenses. Not to mention the time it will take to get there.

It was realistically impossible.

I guess the only available option for me is to bite the bullet and get on with this experiment.

He would succeed eventually if he kept trying. Until then, he would not stop.

With such a resolution in mind, Lloyd threw himself in the experiment, giving up sleep at night. He wasn't getting any good results even as his eyes turned bloodshot with exhaustion. Later, he was so strained that his nose started to bleed.

Drip. "Eh...?"

Lloyd, who was grinding the silica in the corner of the dark forge, stopped what he was doing when something was felt under his nose. He casually brushed his nose with his fingers. Blood was smeared on them.

"Ugh, dammit."

He covered his nose with his sleeve and pressed down. Just then, the current predicament made him think back to his past, and a wry smile naturally formed on his face.

It's just like when I was in Korea.

Back then, he had seven nosebleeds a week. His unignitable spirit wasn't quenched. He convinced himself that tomorrow would be better if he just endured one more day, that the following month would be better if he made it through the next day. He told himself that he'd be able to live just like anybody else and land a secure job and get married and start a loving family.

He pushed through each day with such convictions in mind. It was all thanks to the memories of his past...

Okay, let's try some more. No giving up. I can't give up so easily. Not yet.

Lloyd grabbed the silica once again as he made these resolutions in his heat. Just then, he found a clue to the solution that he had never thought of before.

Chapter 65: Leveling Up Summon Partners (1)

“Ppodong?”

“Eh...?”

A soft noise came beside him. It was almost a whisper, and it was followed by the sound of something rolling softly.

Lloyd was jostled out of his thoughts. He looked to the side, still pressing his nose against his sleeve.

“Ppodong?” called Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong was standing on top of the work table. He was looking up at Lloyd with his puffed cheeks and dark eyes. He wasn’t alone.

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

Behind Ppodong was Bangul, who slithered near Ppodong from the corner of the table. Hamang, not wanting to be left behind alone, rolled and came into Lloyd’s view. They all looked up with their round and dark eyes.

“Hmm? What are you all doing here?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

“What? You want me to play with you?”

“Ppo!”

“Bang!”

“Ha!”

The three creatures stood in one line and nodded with all their might. It was already late into the night, and Lloyd was preoccupied with the experiment. So he was slightly flustered by their sudden demand to play with them.

“Uhm, I’m sorry, but can we play next time?” said Lloyd, apologizing.

“Ppodong?”

“Bangul?”

“Hamamang?”

“Really,” said Lloyd, “I am a bit slammed today. I’ve got a lot to think about and experiment with. I really need to pull this off no matter what.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“Bba-bangul?”

“Hamang...?”

“I’m sorry. So let’s play another time. Okay? I’m actually working right now even though I have a nosebleed. In all honesty, I just want to put this work behind me and play with you all.”

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

“Hamamang!”

“No, no. I’m not saying that we can rest and play now...”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“I wish I could, but my hands are tied. I’m sorry for getting your hopes up. Truly. So let’s play next time.”

Lloyd smiled, not knowing what to do.

He indeed wanted to rest.

He wanted to go out and play just for a bit.

But that was impossible.

He had confidently told the count that he could do it. He had bragged to the count about his special construction method and how he could use it to erect the statue.

He had put himself in this position by making those grand declarations. However, he was already stuck in the preparation stage. Making cement was much more complicated than he’d thought. He didn’t want to imagine the whole construction ending up in a failure after being unable to overcome this obstacle.

“So, I need to hold on and move forward even if times are tough right now. Don’t worry about me. I can do it. Okay? Let’s have a lot of fun after this project is finished.” Lloyd smiled as he patted his three friends.

They were naturally obedient creatures, so Lloyd thought that this explanation would be sufficient for them. However, that wasn’t the case this time.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

For some reason, they resisted firmly, and making things worse, they simply lay down in stubbornness and started rolling on Lloyd’s notes where his ideas on the cement mixture were written.

“Ppo-do-do-dong!”

“Bangul! Bba-ba-bangul!”

“Hamamang! Hamang!”

“Eh? You guys?”

Lloyd continued to soothe his friends afterward, hugging, patting, and rocking them in his arms. However, none of it worked. For the first time ever, they completely turned a deaf ear to Lloyd and obstinately demanded to go outside. Their eyes later started to grow moist as they all looked up at Lloyd.

“Ppo-do-dong...”

“Bangul...”

“Hamaaang...”

They were just seconds away from breaking into tears and writhing in sadness. In actuality, these three summons had their own reason for doing this. It wasn’t a simple stubborn and childish tantrum. It was their desire to protect Lloyd. That feeling was what was moving the three of them.

Ppo-do-dong. Ppodong...

Pets noticed what was going on with their owners surprisingly better than the latter thought. There was only one reason behind it. They spent all day looking at their owners. So, these three summons knew Lloyd’s current state better than he knew himself.

Bangul…

They noticed how Lloyd had been pushing himself too much lately for the past few days. They saw how Lloyd hadn’t properly slept for many nights now and how he was preoccupied with the experiment at every waking moment.

Lloyd was overworking himself to the point of exhaustion. It was, in turn, narrowing his view and compromising his ability to think.

Hamang...

So they had to force Lloyd to take a small break. He needed to put down his work and have a change of pace for at least a moment. So that was why they acted more obstinate in resisting Lloyd. They wiggled their butts really hard. They rolled around, whimpering. They licked the back of Lloyd's hand and his cheeks. They wagged their tails and stretched out their short legs. They looked like dogs demanding their owners to take them for a stroll. That was how they appeared in Lloyd's eyes. As he gazed at the three summons, they reminded him of an old fluffy friend in the past.

Gaeul.

Gaeul was his childhood dog. The dog was no longer with him and perhaps that was why he blurted out something he used to say every day to his pet.

"Then shall we go for a walk?"

"Ppodong!"

"Bangul!"

"Hamang!"

The three summon partners nodded their small heads. Ppodong and Hamang high-fived with their short hands in celebration when their operation succeeded. Bangul, who had no hands, joined with her fat tail.

"Goodness, are you guys that happy?"

The sight put a wry smile on his face. Lloyd swooped all of them in his embrace and walked out of the forge and into the dark street.

It's cold.

It was early winter at the pier. The wind was abnormally cold here. Lloyd raised the collars of his coat and looked down.

“Are you all okay?”

“Ppo!” “Bang!” “Ha!”

They answered in unison as they were tucked inside his inner pocket. Lloyd’s wry smile deepened.

“Hey, you three. I don’t think anyone can call this a stroll, don’t you think?”

“Ppo?” “Bang?” “Ha?”

“I’m the one walking, and you all are just being carried by me. Not to mention, for free.”

“Ppo-o?” “Baang?” “Ha-a?”

“Oh, yeah? You’re going to tilt your heads and play dumb, eh? You know you look cute like that. Fine, you are cute. So cute. Haa.”

This is more like I’m being walked by them, not the other way around.

Lloyd found himself letting out a chuckle. The creatures gazed at him with their beady eyes, and they reminded Lloyd once again of his old dog.

Gaeul was just like them.

He was a puppy with white curly fur. A mixed breed of a Poodle and Maltese. The previous owner explained that he was immigrating to the United States, and therefore, could not bring the dog with him. Gaeul was less than a year old when he became Lloyd’s family.

This happened when Lloyd was in middle school. He thought that the puppy would stay by his side forever. Gaeul whimpered and threw tantrums all day, even when he took him out for a stroll and played ball.

It was especially the case when Lloyd studied for an exam. He asked the dog for a raincheck each time it happened. He smiled and refused to take Gaeul out, saying, “Next time.”

He thought that he’d always have the luxury of time, and it would simply remain static and unmoving.

I should have played with him more back then.

He went to high school and entered university. Gaeul grew just as Lloyd did. Before he knew it, Gaeul was already old, and by the time Lloyd got back from the military service, the senile dog had a hard time going out on a stroll.

Even so, Lloyd wasn’t able to pay much attention to him. The shadow of debt hung heavily over his family. It made everyone suffocate and suffer. Their days were tough and hard. Everyone no longer had any time or care to give for the small puppy. On one clear day, when it was as chilly as the early winter of mid-November, Gaeul quietly died in peace.

Lloyd was filled with nothing but regret for not taking care of him.

Shoot. I was trying not to think about him.

He became upset every time he thought about it. So he decided to push away from the memory as much as possible. Brushing off the sudden burst of emotion once again, he walked along the street at night, sometimes blowing his hands against the cold winter and chatting with the three summon creatures in his inner pocket.

Each time he did so, Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang gleamed in his eyes. They smiled in joy as if they were basking in the moment. At that sight, Lloyd thought to himself, and he reflected on his past behavior.

I might have been just taking advantage of them.

Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang had feelings. They could feel emotions. Up until today, he only sought them when needed, treating them as nothing but tools and construction equipment.

If this continues, it'll be the same as when I said goodbye to Gaeul.

Come to think of it, he realized that he had been acting selfishly. Clenching his fists, he accepted that he did them wrong and decided to do better. He then turned around to get back to the forge when a message appeared in front of him.

Ding dong.

[The summon creatures are acknowledging your sincere feelings.]

[They consider you a part of their family.]

[Your relationship level with these creatures has increased from <Master-Servant Relationship> to <A Member of the Gang>.]

Lloyd never ever expected to receive this type of message. It didn't end just there. Lloyd's eyes moved fast to read more messages.

[A new feature has been activated following the increase in relationship with the summon.]

[<Summon Partner Upgrade> has now opened.]

[<Summon Partner Upgrade> requires 500 RP.]

[<Summon Partner Upgrade> gives a new skill to the creature.]

[Once activated, the <Summon Partner Upgrade> cannot be reversed. Please be discreet when you are making the decision.]

What in the world is this... Wow.

Lloyd's eyes widened.

Upgrading summon partners and new skills?

He had no idea that this could be possible.

Who'd have thought I'd bump into this luck during my stroll with them? Well, it's a blessing in disguise indeed. Some say detours are shortcuts, and indeed they were right. This requires only 500 RP?

Lloyd wondered what kind of skill would come out. Feeling curious and exhilarated, he gazed into his pocket, where the three summons were wriggling inside his pocket.

They were looking at him, so he asked, "Hey, you all."

"Ppodong?"

"Bangul?"

"Hamang?"

"Uhm, did you feel that, too? The message I just read?"

"Ppo!" "Bang!" "Ha!"

The three of them nodded in unison. It dawned on Lloyd that they must know as well that they can be upgraded. Just then, "Bangul! Bba-bangul! Bangul!"

Bangul strangely jumped up and down as she gazed at him with an extra sparkle in her eyes. She was saying that Lloyd must pick her, that she was the one.

She resembled a chirping baby bird with her mouth wide open. There was more.

"Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong!"

"Hamang! Hamamang!"

Ppodong and Hamang lifted Bangul up. They pushed her up like they were raising a trophy as if they were signaling that Lloyd must select her.

Curious, Lloyd asked, “Do you two think that Bangul should be upgraded?”

“Ppo!” “Bang!” “Ha!”

“Wait, can you by any chance feel what kind of skill will come out once you level up?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppo!” “Bang!” “Ha!”

“What? Bangul will be able to help me out big time?”

“Bangul!”

It was Bangul who responded.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

“Are you saying that I should just trust you and go, because I wouldn’t lose anything?”

“Bangul!” Bangul excitedly nodded up and down.

Seeing that, Lloyd thought to himself, Maybe it’s worth putting my hopes in her. She must be this confident for a reason.

He started to become more convinced. After all, Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang had done nothing but help in a myriad of ways.

They fulfilled their roles at the most needed times. Now, they were confidently recommending Lloyd to upgrade Bangul. Thinking that they must have a reason, Lloyd decided to trust them.

Yeah, I got nothing to lose.

Even though the upgrade required more than 500 RP, he had enough of it.

No, he had more than enough. It was practically overflowing.

Okay, let’s try it out.

If it failed, then he still had nothing to lose. If the skill he needed popped out, then it was a jackpot. Lloyd selected the menu “Summon Partner Upgrade.”

[You are now upgrading a summon partner.]

[Please select the summon partner you wish to upgrade.]

Bangul.

Lloyd placed Bangul on his palm. That was how he chose the creature for this feature.

[The summon partner you have chosen is “Bangul.”]

[The cost of upgrading Bangul: 500 RP]

[Current RP: 2401]

[Would you like to start the upgrade?]

[YES / NO]

Yes.

Lloyd nodded his head.

[Upgrading the summon partner.]

It started from then.

“Bangul?”

Bangul was enveloped in a mysterious, transparent light.

Some seconds later, the message he had waited for appeared.

[You have succeeded in upgrading Bangul.]

[Upgrade level: plus one]

[As a reward, Bangul has received new skills.]

[Bangul’s Skill Log]

[Chomping Dirt (Level three)]

[Accelerated Dirt Digestion (Level three)]

[Steel Dung Launcher (Level five)]

[Volcanic Blast (Level one)]

What...?

Lloyd carefully read through the message, and his gaze reached the last part.

Volcanic Blast?

Lloyd’s eyes widened in surprise as he processed the name of the new skill.

Chapter 66: Leveling Up Summon Partners (2)

Oh. Volcanic blast?

Lloyd’s eyes trembled. Literally speaking, this meant that the volcano would erupt. No, it meant that Bangul could make the volcano explode.

This can’t be true, can it?

If a volcano erupted as the skill’s name suggested, that would only spell disaster. He feared that it would only become a monumental nuisance to people if that was the case, so it couldn’t be used. Lloyd’s gaze traveled to Bangul.

“Bangul?” called Lloyd.

“Bangul?” Bangul lifted up his head.

Despite the upgrade, she still looked as cute as always. Her beady eyes glimmered, ready to answer any question. Beaming at her, Lloyd asked, “It’s about the new skill that you just got.”

“Bangul!”

“What does it do? Like, can you really make a volcano explode or something?”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul? Bangul!”

“Uhm, it’s similar but different?”

“Bangul!”

“Can you be more specific?”

“Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

“Hmm... Boom, and it explodes?”

“Bangul!” Bangul nodded her round head up and down.

Similar but different? It goes boom and explodes?

Her answers weren’t detailed enough for Lloyd to figure out what it specifically did.

I think the surest way for me to know what it does is to see it myself.

Lloyd tucked the three summon creatures back into his inner pocket. He put on his coat again and went out of the forge.

I need to go a bit further.

Lloyd decided to go somewhere with zero people, somewhere without any houses around.

He needed to get to a place where no damage would be done, even when the explosion went off.

I don’t know what the skill does yet.

It was best to exert utmost caution. He stopped by the inn and woke Javier up.

“Hey, wake up.”

“Uhm...”

“I said, wake up,” said Lloyd again.

“Hmm...” Javier didn’t budge.

“Open your eyes and get up, Lady Asrahan.”

“What in the world did you just say?”

“Gosh, look at you, snapping your eyes open at that.”

“I couldn’t help it when you mocked me like that,” Javier said, his voice husky.

“That means you were already awake before I mocked you,” pointed out Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“You were just pretending to be asleep because you didn’t want to wake up, weren’t you?”

“Yes.”

“Wow. You don’t even deny it now.”

“I wanted to sleep in as much as possible.”

Javier stretched his neck and sat up from his bed.

He rubbed his heavy eyelids, and it looked like he was forced to wake up from his deep sleep. The sight made Lloyd realize that he had just committed a mischievous act of waking an insomniac in the middle of the night. A regretful smile was formed on Lloyd’s face.

“Well, there’s nothing we can do. The situation calls for it.”

“Situation?”

“I need you to protect me for a second,” said Lloyd.

“Protect you? What do you mean?”

Javier, who was struggling to fight the assaulting grogginess, instantly woke up. Lloyd’s smile deepened.

“From a volcanic explosion.”

“I need you to protect me from the volcanic explosion.”

“Hey?” Lloyd called.

“Why are you so quiet?”

“May I be honest with you?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.”

“I was silent because I was just figuring out a way to defend you against mental illness.”

“I need you to protect me from a volcano eruption, not mental illness.”

“I’m becoming even more desperately worried.”

“Excuse me? I’m telling you the truth right now,” insisted Lloyd.

Lloyd brought Bangul out. She flashed a big smile at Javier when she saw him.

“She’s going to create a volcanic explosion,” explained Lloyd.

“Excuse me...?”

“It’s true, isn’t it, Bangul?”

“Bangul!” Bangul excitedly nodded up and down.

Javier’s gaze sharpened.

“I knew it was true,” affirmed Javier.

“Hey, do you trust Bangul more than you trust me?” asked Lloyd in disbelief.

“That is because Bangul, Ppodong, and Hamang never lie. They are not like someone here who wickedly smiles after duping someone.”

“Tsk.”

It had been a while since Javier dropped a truth bomb. Lloyd thought that the knight truly had a wonderful talent for knocking someone out with his words. Yet, because of his serious and solemn attitude, it made things more difficult for Lloyd to parry that blow.

He’s a prodigy, indeed.

Suppressing a smile, Lloyd said, “Well, anyway, it looks like Bangul here has learned a new skill. She can erupt a volcano or do something of the kind.”

“And you are testing the new skill?”

“Yeah. I can’t gauge the power of her skill just yet.”

“I understand.”

Javier took the coat and sword, following Lloyd who walked out of the inn.

They walked through the dark alley, cutting across the city district. They headed towards the opposite way of the coast and entered the inland. Here, they passed the gate without being noticed by the guards and entered the unpopulated woods in the middle of the night.

Later, a large plain lot came into view.

This seems appropriate.

Lloyd put Bangul down at the center of the lot. He handed her the red sunflower seed.

“Hey, Bangul,” called Lloyd.

“Bangul?”

“Dear Bangul, would you like some midnight snacks?”

“Bba-bangul?!”

“Here you go. Sunflower seeds,” said Lloyd.

“Bangul!”

Bangul, who sniffed the smell of the sunflower seeds, wagged her short and fat tail. He put the sunflower seed in her mouth and quickly jumped back a few steps.

The transformation occurred in a flash.

Boom! Bangul, who was previously less than half a foot, turned into a 16-foot giant snake.

Lloyd called, “Bangul?”

“Bangul?”

“If you don’t mind, can you use the Volcanic Eruption skill later?”

“Bangul!”

“Yes, thank you. When I give you the signal, use it.”

“Bangul!”

“By the way, your skill,” said Lloyd.

“Bangul?”

“It’s not going to wipe out this forest or anything, is it?”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

“What? It depends on which direction you use it?”

“Bangul!”

“So does that mean you can set it in a particular direction?”

“Bangul!” Bangul’s gigantic head nodded in excitement.

She feigned to cover her ears with her fat tail.

“Bba-bangul. Bangul!”

“Oh, are you telling me to cover my ears so they don’t get hurt?”

“Bangul!”

“Does that mean I don’t have to stay far away?”

“Bangul!”

She nodded once again, and that was when it occurred to Lloyd that this blast skill seemed to be a bit different from a literal volcanic eruption.

Feeling a little relieved, Lloyd said, “Okay, so use the volcanic eruption skill when I send the signal. Got it?”

“Bangul!”

Bangul lifted her tail up as if she were raising a thumb. Lloyd distanced himself away from Bangul about thirty feet. He hid behind Javier, who drew his sword.

“I am ready,” said Javier.

Lloyd guessed that Javier planned on making a shield out of the sword aura by wielding the weapon at lightning speed. That was why he didn’t need any shields. Feeling confident and reassured, Lloyd shouted aloud at Bangul, “Okay, Bangul! Let’s begin!”

“Bangul!” responded Bangul, who was far away.

She then got to work, devouring the dirt on the ground. Her chubby body then trembled, seemingly digesting it, and she wagged her tail forcefully.

The bell attached to her tail rang aloud a clear warning.

She lifted her tail all the way up, and this process was nothing different from her usual skill of excreting metals. What came after was drastically different.

The area thundered as if a real volcano was erupting. At the same time, a fierce, violent phenomenon took place from her stomach and bottom.

Magma made from the earth she had just eaten, discharged out, and underwent a dramatic change as it touched the air.

Unlike the high pressure and temperature of her body, the world outside operated in a different setting.

The pressure was extremely low, and there was a difference in temperature by hundreds of degrees at least.

So, the magma that erupted out of her body saw a dramatic decrease in pressure and temperature, plummeting the body pressure of the magma.

The inflammable material melted inside, as the magma swirled. The water boiled and the carbon dioxide went berserk. The same thing happened with chlorine, fluorine, sulfuric substances, and carbon monoxide. All of the gasses vaporized at the same time, bursting out of the magma like an explosion.

A great implosion. The magma shredded to pieces at once to micrometers, spraying out in the air into millions and billions of volcanic ashes.

Even though it was a long process for the magma to turn into volcanic ash, the reaction actually took less than a second. The explosion was followed by a series of others.

A fart held for long didn’t stop after one time. The volcanic explosion occurred three consecutive times until it finally stopped.

“Wow.”

Lloyd unconsciously let out a sound of admiration.

Wow. This is nuts. It's nuts!

Lloyd tapped both of his ears with his palm as they had become numb even with the cover on. When Lloyd looked straight ahead, he realized that his deafening ears weren't the real problem.

The trees have fallen.

The trees that stood right in the course of the volcanic explosion were pummeled to the ground like a domino.

He roughly counted it to be over fifty. He didn't run toward it right away. He had something else to check first before seeing the result of the volcanic eruption.

"Hey, you okay?"

"Hey?"

Javier didn't answer. So Lloyd tapped his shoulders. That was when Javier flinched his body and turned his body to Lloyd's side.

Javier then said, "Did you call me?"

"Yeah. Hey, can't you hear anything?"

"I cannot hear what you are saying well."

"Oh... I'm sorry. I forgot to tell you that you should cover up your ears."

"Excuse me?"

"Nothing. It's going to be all right soon."

"Excuse me?"

"Should I get you some hearing aids?"

“Excuse me?”

“Never mind... Just wait here.”

The dude has super sensitive hearing senses because of the sword master symptoms. The blaring must have hit him hard when he took that in without any protection.

Lloyd motioned to wait here and walked over to Bangul.

“Bangul. Are you alright?”

“Bangul!”

“What? You feel completely refreshed?”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

“Uhm, I don’t think we can do that again now. How about we do it next time?”

“Bangul!”

He then headed to the explosion site, leaving Bangul in her wistfulness. The place had turned into an ashen world. The ashes still rained down from the sky like snow, carpeting the whole ground in gray.

The patches of grass, flowers, and trees all turned gray, looking much like...

It’s like the whole place is covered with volcanic dust.

Lloyd’s eyes stung. So he covered his mouth and nose with his sleeve. He then narrowed his eyes as much as possible and observed the ground, activating the surveying skill.

Once the skill was activated, various information on the surface floated in front of him.

He saw the clear slope of the ground, as well as the bedrock and soil.

At last, he saw the layer of gray ash on top of them.

My, it really is the ash from the volcanoes!

Lloyd's narrowed eyes widened in surprise. He instinctively bent over, stretched out his hands, and touched the gray ash covering the ground.

It felt soft, much smoother than the flour.

It's real.

It was the volcanic ash he had wanted to get his hands on for so long. It was the key ingredient that would instantly solve the cement issue. Now, that very material was sitting in front of him by the handful. Plus, he could make more at any time as he wished! His heart began to beat violently.

Jackpot. Wow, this is awesome. First, she gives me metal bars, and now, she's making volcanic ash that will become the major ingredient of cement.

Lloyd sweetly gazed at Bangul as if he were looking at a gold-laying goose.

After that, their work progressed smoothly. It was all thanks to Bangul's new skill that was acquired after upgrading her. The following day, Lloyd headed to the shipbuilding yard at the dock. He purchased five huge sheets of masts and had people tightly knead them together.

The final output looked like a large cylindrical diaper. At one end of the diaper, Lloyd attached five dense sheets of sifter that would filter out tiny particles from the air. On the opposite end, he made a hole that was about thirty feet in diameter. Bangul put her waist into the hole. She was now wearing a balloon-shaped diaper that was about ninety-eight feet long. Then, she ate the earth in the center plaza of Cremo city, shaking her body as she digested it.

The bell affixed to her tail rang.

It signaled the implosion. Lloyd instantly cupped his hands over his mouth when he heard the ringing and shouted at the top of his lungs toward the people in the plaza, “Cover up your ears! It’s going to blast!”

Bangul’s volcanic skill happened right inside the diaper. The extreme heat of the ash and gas caused the diaper to inflate, and they were filtered through the five sheets of sifters attached to the other end.

The gas slowly traveled out of the diaper, leaving only the ash in.

And Lloyd shouted once more. “Another one incoming!”

The skill created a series of explosions one after another.

The people in the city exclaimed at the rare sight each time. The passing merchants and ship crew members widened their eyes at such an exotic sight. Later, even the guards of the city and Count Cremo himself came out to observe the scene.

“Is this why you asked for permission to blast something in the middle of the city?” asked Count Cremo.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Hmm, I didn’t know you could tame summon creatures.”

“I was just lucky,” said Lloyd.

“Lucky? No, summoning is not as easy as you say it is.”

Count Cremo was right. Taming a summoned creature required magical talent and rapport with the creature.

Plus, I heard the rarer the creature gets, the harder it becomes for the owner to control them.

Even though the count was an erudite man, he had never seen anything like Bangul before. He was amazed at how this giant rattlesnake could chomp the dirt and blast volcanic ash. She was something he had never heard or even imagined before.

This friend is not an ordinary fellow. Likewise, for the young knight he takes along with him.

Suddenly, the rumor he had heard recently interrupted his thoughts. The rumor was about how two skillful young men from the eastern mountain range began to make their names.

I vaguely remember that it was about the eldest son of the baron who consolidated the whole barony using his mysterious construction skills and the knight who was already at the level of a high-level sword expert at twenty.

The baron intently gazed at Lloyd and Javier. His gaze wasn't laden with envy or avarice. It was more filled with satisfaction.

I need to watch over how this project goes.

He would be taking a keen eye on those two and find out if the rumors were true.

Once he saw the boldness and tact in their works as the rumors said they were, he decided that he would report to the king in detail.

It would only be a loss for the nation if two talented individuals were made to rot in a rural province. They had to find a bigger playing field where they could fulfill their wildest dreams. The kingdom would become stronger as a result. The mere thought of it overwhelmed his heart. The count thought to himself that he had just discovered today their very talents.

A sense of satisfaction swept over him. Each time his smile deepened in contentment, the louder Lloyd's shout rang aloud throughout the plaza. Each time Lloyd's voice rang louder, the stacks of the volcanic ash grew higher. Lloyd's construction of artificial ground in the sea was a stage that would introduce his name to the whole world. Now, that stage was starting to take shape in full force.

Chapter 67: The Luxurious Completion Ceremony (1)

“Watch out! Take it slowly now!”

The biting winter wind blew through the coast of the Cremo pier.

The wind brought the winds to be washed toward the port. They were blocked by the flank of a sailboat, whose large body tittered up and down in the water as a result.

The crane, which sat on the deck of the sailboat, naturally trembled along. Lloyd’s gaze turned sharper each time the boat was hit with another wave. Leaning over the ledge of the sailboat, he laser-focused as he stared at the sea underneath. The captain walked over to Lloyd.

“Did it move to the side?”

“Yes, it moved about twenty inches to the left.”

“Twenty inches? Do I have to realign the distance again?”

“Of course.”

Lloyd lifted his head and turned around to face the captain.

“We cannot allow a single inch of error here, especially when you think about the size and shape of the Caisson hanging in the air by the crane right now.” Lloyd spoke and pointed above.

The captain’s gaze followed his fingers, and at last, the captain was able to spot the two cranes installed on each deck of two sailboats.

There was a huge structure lifted in the air by the two juxtaposed cranes. The structure was called ‘Caisson’ according to Lloyd. It was fifty-two feet in length and width.

With its ninety-eight foot height, it was a huge box made out of thick wood.

The top and bottom were empty and open. The antique and huge wooden box that was nothing but frames was being transported in the air as it dangled along in between the two sailboats. The captain thought to himself, What is the use of it?

According to the one in charge, Lloyd, it wasn't to have it afloat. It was to be sunk down.

Then, what's the point of transporting the box and having it sink to the ground?

The captain could not wrap his head around this project. The corners of Lloyd's lips rose.

"I am sure you can't guess it. That Caisson was designed and produced to fit the area where it should be placed on. What do you think will happen if the box is placed at the wrong location?"

"Uhm, maybe..."

"The whole construction will be ruined, don't you think?"

"And Count Cremo would be filled with an emotion that is far from happiness, yes?"

"He will kindly invite you over and hold you accountable."

"Do you think you would have the guts to be held responsible for that situation?" asked Lloyd.

"Of course not."

"I thought so, too."

"Them, uhm, I just have to move twenty inches to the right?"

"Yes. That's perfect. Thank you."

"No problem."

Lloyd grinned. The captain then jumped to his feet and started urging his crew, and everyone began to run about doing their work.

The two sailboats shifted to the right. Now, with a gaze that grew sharper than before, Lloyd observed the sea. He activated the survey and design skill at the same time.

He observed the subterranean land with his survey skill to find out how it would turn out.

The optional skill of survey was then activated.

[Skill Option 2: Floor Plan Marking (3D) has been activated.]

A hologram footage overlapped in front of his eyes. The artificial ground Lloyd had mapped out by using the design skill and simulation skill was shown in a three-dimensional floor plan under the water.

Thanks to it, the accurate location of the Caisson was identified.

Lloyd held up his thumb at the captain. The captain yelled something, and the rope in the crane loosened to bring down the large Caisson into the water.

The water splashed as the box became submerged.

The box kept going down until it finally touched the bottom.

Not a single inch was missed. It landed exactly where Lloyd had designed it to.

We’re off to a good start.

Lloyd felt relieved now that the location of the Caisson was perfect. Two days later Lloyd had ordered hundreds of wood piles.

“It needs to be fifty feet long, and one foot in diameter. The wood must be a poplar tree, and please remove the skin and prune them up,” instructed Lloyd.

“Poplar tree?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded his head at the butler’s question.

“Because it’s the easiest to find and is resistant against humidity.”

It was true. Poplar trees had been used in building the foundation in the city of Venice. In particular, it was used in building the St. Mark Basilica, the landmark in Venice. The poplar tree was historically known for its durability.

“So please get the most sturdy ones. It would be best if you could get them as early as possible.”

“Huh? Haha, I see.”

Lloyd hurried the butler, following the Korean way of working quickly and fast. The butler was taken aback at the fast pace. Anyway, thanks to his urgency, Lloyd was able to receive the wood only three days later. Around the time, the Caisson was already settled well into the bottom of the sea. It was all because of the weight of the box.

Plus, the seabed is flat and muddy.

Thankfully, the bed of the sea was extremely soft. Once the heavy object was placed on the soft floor, the sheer weight of the structure pressed deep into the mud.

It was the same principle with the car in the swamp or sandy beach getting its wheels stuck because of the weight. Just like that, the large box Caisson dug into the soft layer, penetrating as far as the Caranto layer where the clay and sand were mixed.

This was the reason the box was designed to have an open bottom. On the other hand, the reason for the open top was to drain water.

“Alright, Hamang,” said Lloyd.

“Hamang!”

“How do you like salty water?”

“Hamang! Hamamang!”

“You like it because it’s salty, eh?”

“Hamang!”

“Great. There’s tons of salty water here just for you.”

“Hamang!”

“Do you see the water in the Caisson over here?”

“Hamamang!”

“Yes, you can drink it all.”

“Hamang!”

Hamang jumped into the Caisson which looked much like a swimming pool.

He opened his mouth wide and began chugging the sea.

A whirlpool appeared around him.

Hamang’s body bloated like a water balloon. The water level inside the Caisson dropped immediately. It dropped from 150 feet to one hundred and to fifty... until the bottom appeared.

“Hamamang! Hamang!”

Lloyd had prepared a bamboo straw for Hamang who had gotten gigantic in size. Thanks to the straw, Hamang was able to drink every single drop of the seawater in the box without anything left.

“Hamaang!”

As Hamang happily smiled, the inside of the Caisson turned soft and all dried up. Now, the bottom of the sea, where the artificial ground will be constructed, was completely revealed. The water could not enter from the outside because of the upper block of Caisson that prevented the wave from splashing into the box.

As for the bottom, the penetration of hundreds of feet deep into the Caranto layer made it impossible for the seawater to enter. In other words, a dry construction site was made available right in the middle of the sea.

I succeeded. It’s a relief that it ended well.

Lloyd clenched his fists. The Box Caisson method was a modern thing, and it worked quite perfectly for this situation.

There was a time once when nervousness flooded into his heart. He feared that the new technique might fail, that the water might come into the box.

So he ran countless simulations and touched up the design to perfect it. As the result of painstaking efforts and research...

No water is coming in. The box is completely sealed. It’s perfect.

The first stage of the construction was a success. Up next, he moved on to the next part of the construction, the insertion of friction piles.

“Alright, Javier.”

“Your turn has come at last.”

“Excited, yeah? I bet your heart is racing,” said Lloyd.

“Not really, whew...”

Javier sighed at length. He gazed at the wooden mallet he was holding up. He wasn’t sure if he could call it a mallet.

It looks more like a battering ram.

Javier was right indeed. The hammer was ginormous. Its head was more than thirty feet long. Its handle, which was as thick as an arm, was made of steel. The overall length reached over sixty feet. No matter how many times he looked at it, he came to a conclusion that this wasn't for human use. So, he started to develop feelings of dislike for Lloyd who had handed him such a mallet in his hands.

"Could it be that Young Master Lloyd is..."

Javier's voice became sharpened when he turned around to face Lloyd.

"Do you consider me as nothing but a construction tool?"

"Mhm, of course," replied Lloyd matter-of-factly.

"I have been thinking so, and I always will be."

"But I am a knight," defied Javier.

"Yes, I know."

"I did not learn sword fighting to do this kind of work every day."

"Then you better change your mind from now on."

"By that, you mean..."

"Change your mind to think that you've learned how to use the sword for this kind of work. All right?"

"Wow, so rewarding, don't you think?"

"What in the…"

"Hey, the world depends on how you look at it. Have you ever heard of Monk Wonhyo?"

“No, I have not. And I do not wish to change my mind that way,” retorted Javier.

“My, my. How pessimistic you view the world, young man.”

“Please correct the word in your sentence. It’s not the world but you Master Lloyd that I am perceiving with pessimism.”

“And yet, you are holding up the hammer so obediently.”

“Well, that’s...”

“I presume it’s in your best interest to not lose the lullaby service.”

“Anyway, enough with the grumbling. Shall we get to work?”

Lloyd picked up and straightened the huge pile, placing it down and holding it still.

A normal person would have strained so badly just to hold it.

Lloyd managed to endure through his use of the Asrahan Core Technique.

Lloyd, with his face all sweaty and wet, grinned.

“Do it in one try. Precisely. Okay?”

“Yes...”

Javier reluctantly fixed his grip on the hammer. He looked up at the wooden friction file. Soon after, the silver-haired knight leaped in the air.

He jumped in a flash.

He raised the hammer that was similar to a battering ram. As his blue eyes glimmered, he brought his hammer down hard.

The hammer hit right on the spot.

Javier, the high-level sword expert. He had utilized all the mana in his manaheart and the mana that had been amplified by the triple circle. The result was marvelous.

The fifty-foot pile drove right into the roots.

The corners of Lloyd's lips stretched up high.

"There. I knew you'd do a good job."

"Alright, one more."

Lloyd held the second pile vertically. With another sigh, Javier lifted the hammer. This process was repeated several times. The fifty-foot-long poplar tree pile was driven into the ground two feet in intervals.

Great. The pile is getting driven into properly.

Each time it dug right inside, the corners of Lloyd's lips rose further up in contentment. The wood pile was being dug into the ground of the sea. Lloyd was absolutely not worried that the pile would rot. He knew that there was zero chance for the woods to be in contact with the air as they were driven deep down.

Even logs of wood won't rot in the water as long as they are tightly dug into the earth. As long as they are not exposed to air, they will hold for at least a couple of centuries.

There were countless buildings in Venice still holding up to this day.

Javier jumped.

He then brought down the hammer that resembled a battering ram. Each time he did so, each pile dug deep into the ground.

"Good! Continue!"

"You do not have to hurry." Lloyd encouraged excitedly, while Javier gave a cold retort.

As the two made the exchange, another pile was stuck in the seabed. The statue Count Cremo wanted to put up held his hopes of reviving the dying port. The piles became firm ground for the statue to stand on.

A few days passed. By now, over 700 piles had been driven into the seabed. The construction took a relentless pace without a pause. The upper sides of the piles were leveled, and afterward, they were looped with metal.

The workers then gradually added more rebars. They poured the cement into the Caisson. The cement was Roman-style, which was made possible by mixing the volcanic ash gathered thanks to Bangul.

Then came the deposit and cure process. The weather was perfect just in time. There was enough sunlight in the early winter. The wind was sufficiently dry. The deposited cement dried up decently, and after that, the workers removed the outlines of the Caisson.

They cut it up according to the height of the solidified cement ground. Once it was gone, the artificial ground that was fifteen feet by width and length and with a landmass of 2755 square feet was made.

“By the way, the height of the artificial ground was decided by design.”

“By design? What do you mean?” asked the count.

“Do you happen to know what time it is, Count Cremo?”

“Yes, I know it very well. It’s time for the high tide.”

“Yes, it is. I have set the elevation of the ground to be exactly 1.6 feet higher than the water level at high tide.”

“Haha, did you? I see.”

Lloyd confidently explained, and the count nodded as he heard it. The day had enough waves. Its head almost touched the top of the artificial ground but didn’t.

“This is excellent enough. If the Gigatitan sees from afar the mermaid statue that will be put up, it will certainly think the statue is floating on the water.”

“That is exactly what I aimed for.”

It was true. Moreover, the high and low tides here didn’t have a large difference in water level. This meant that even if the surface level lowered during the low tide, the artificial ground would be unrecognizable from afar as long as there were just enough waves.

“Great. Very good. But you do know that there is more work to be done, yes?” asked the count.

“Of course, Your Excellency.”

Lloyd caught on to what the count meant in a snap. His job was technically finished as the artificial ground had been successfully put up.

But the job wasn’t over yet.

The statue hasn’t been put up yet.

After all, the artificial ground he had created was nothing but a ground to erect the statue.

“I suppose it is my turn to wait,” said Lloyd.

“It won’t take long.”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

The time had come for the artists to come forward and make the statue. Lloyd would get paid only after the statue was completed. He had foreseen this already, so no explanation was needed.

It’s obviously understandable from the count’s shoes. He’s going to find himself in serious trouble if he pays me in advance only to find that the foundation of the statue is crumbling.

In other words, Lloyd needed to stay in the city for a while to make sure that he would be there when there was any need for repairs.

I should take this chance to rest for a few days. It had taken fifteen days for Lloyd to arrive at Cremo from his fiefdom.

He dove right into the construction preparation and got to work, putting his nose to the grindstone.

Therefore, rest was imperative. So throughout the period the statue was being put up, he rested very well.

He stayed in bed all day in the inn. Sometimes, he played word and riddle games with Javier. Javier received seven more letters from Lady Christine meanwhile. Each time Javier got one more, Lloyd shouted in frustration, “This is unfair!”

And finally, fifteen days later...The gigantic mermaid statue was completed. That night, the whole city held a grand completion ceremony. The count had six sailboats docked under the foot of the statue standing on the shore. It was a boat party. Of course, Lloyd and Javier were invited too. They dressed the part by putting on the tuxedos they had purchased downtown.

Well, what do you know, this statue looks just like the Statue of Liberty.

From where he was standing, the statue exuded its magnificence and beauty, and the sight made him proud and happy that he had designed and built the foundation of such a structure.

But there was something Lloyd was oblivious to. No, it was the same for everyone in the party and every worker calling it a day at the port. Not a single person could even imagine what was to come.

No one fathomed that a 295-foot-long, five-million-ton gigantic monster was studying the structure with monstrous ferocity in the distant sea.

Chapter 68: The Luxurious Completion Ceremony (2)

The Gigatitan remained distant from the Cremo port. A huge tidal wave rushed and hit the monster’s eyes, which were as large as a rock.

The Gigatitan didn’t even blink. No, this ginormous monster didn’t have any eyelids to blink in the first place.

The Gigatitan’s eyes held a ferocious glare amid the splashing waves.

Its protruded eyes resembled that of a lobster or crab. Its two eyes used a total of sixteen colors, from the infrared light spectrum to the UV spectrum. They observed the sea near the port of Cremo with an eyesight dozens of times better than a human’s. As they watched, something that distressed its spirit came into view.

Its appendicular trembled violently.

It definitely saw a mermaid. The figure standing straight in the sea near the Cremo port was definitely a mermaid. It was a giant one it had never seen before.

The Gigatitan began to ponder.

The mermaids always made even this giant monster pause. Each one of them was powerful. Dozens and hundreds of soldiers teamed together to wage a large-scale hunt.

It wondered if it should swim away. After a few seconds, it shook its giant head. There was nowhere to run. There was only the deep sea waiting for it outside this offshore area. Something as uncomfortable and powerful as mermaids inhabited the place, its fellow kind.

The Gigatitan shook its tail in distaste when it recalled its fellow beings. A shameful memory assaulted his thoughts. There had been a war among its kind. It had to fend off its territory from the younger and stronger generations.

The humiliation of losing its territory.

So it couldn’t turn around and go back to where it came from. It’d only be shoved away by the younger and powerful ones.

If it is unlucky, one of them might smash its head and eat it up. So sticking to this place was imperative. For ten years, this part of the sea had served as a comfortable habitat for the aged and weakened monster. It was the ideal place of residence save for the downside that it could not meet its mate. Besides that, it was perfect as mermaids barely approached around here because it was near the large port run by humans.

There was no retreat. It couldn’t give up its habitat. Its large rock-like eyes flashed with incredible determination. Looking around the areas of the mermaid statue that stood offshore from the port, it was struck with a happy realization.

There were no other mermaids around. Only one strangely large mermaid stood in the area. Several things became clear in its head. One, it stood a chance against this mermaid left all alone herself. Second, it had to take care of that mermaid before she brought her own kind down here. Therefore, the Gigatitan decided to fight.

Its careful gaze started to grow ferocious. Two of its curled forearms began to tense up, simultaneously plunging its gigantic body into the water.

It hid underneath the violently splashing waves and began to charge forth assisted by the bottom of the sea.

It was bent on protecting its territory. It headed toward the waters near the port, where the giant mermaid statue stood.

The hundreds of people enjoying the party on board had zero clue what was coming.

“Hmm?”

Javier paused, but he didn’t know why. The fruit drink in his cup trembled when he was about to drink it. Several drops of the drink splashed out of the cup to ruin his scarf. Javier didn’t give a hoot about the smudges. His eyes simply focused straight ahead. He narrowed his eyes to slits with a frown on his face.

“What are you doing? Are you going to the bathroom?” said Lloyd, shattering Javier’s focus.

When Javier heard Lloyd’s question, he was provoked for a split second. He mustered up enough patience to reply, “I do not think the bathroom is the problem.”

“Then what is the problem? You’re frowning like you are upset.”

“Something is wrong.”

“Something is wrong?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“What is?”

“Look over there.”

Javier lifted his hand and pointed at the far distance in the sea. Lloyd looked at it and shrugged.

“I do not see anything except for the beautiful night sea that dances under the dusk.”

“I agree. There is nothing visible there. But something is...”

“Something just feels wrong.”

Lloyd tilted his head to the side a little.

When he stared at Javier’s face, he could feel it right away. Javier wasn’t joking. He meant it when he said that something was off.

Javier is like that. He’s always serious and prudent.

Lloyd’s face and gaze turned serious as well.

“Be more specific.”

“Something seems to be moving...underwater.”

“Right down here?”

“No, far in the distance.”

“Could it be a whale or something?” asked Lloyd.

“It is way larger. And...it seems to be heading toward this direction.”

“What?”

No way.

Lloyd asked, “Can you sense how big it is?”

“Yes, but just an estimate. By length, it seems to be larger than Hamang when he turns gigantic.”

“Are you sure about this?”

“Yes, I am,” said Javier as he looked straight into Lloyd’s eyes.

Javier’s that serious. It’s gotta be true.

Lloyd trusted him wholeheartedly.

Javier will soon become a sword master. He’s experiencing sword master syndrome, which heightens his senses to an unnecessarily max level.

So it was possible for Javier to sense the incoming creature from dozens of miles away. That was even more true for Javier if the creature was larger.

I have a bad feeling about this.

Lloyd gulped dryly, an ominous image taking over him.

He could only think of one entity that was larger than Hamang in these waters.

The Gigatitan. What else?

The monster was swimming near? Lloyd looked around, and he saw dozens of people enjoying the party on deck luxuriously decorated with ornaments.

An orchestra was playing soothing music in one corner, and everyone was donned with expensive clothes as they chatted with one another. Some sipped their drinks with elegant smiles on their faces. Some adored the magnificence of the mermaid statue. There were also some couples dancing slowly to the music. Lloyd's gaze scanned around the groups of people fast, and he finally spotted his target among them.

His target was no other than Count Cremo, the host of the party and owner of this city.

"Hey," said Lloyd, "you didn't drink, did you?"

"Of course not."

"Okay, that clears out the possibility that you're drunkenly talking. Alright, wait for my instructions."

Lloyd then walked away after giving an order to Javier. Lloyd passed through the crowd and got near the count.

"Well, well, well. Look who we have here. The man who built the foundation of our joy today. Welcome, welcome." Count Cremo broke into a guffaw when he saw Lloyd.

He motioned to the people around him and said, “I got too carried away by the joyous occasion that I forgot to introduce this man to you all. He is Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera barony. He is also the one who built the sturdy foundation that sits beneath the statue.”

Count grabbed Lloyd’s shoulder and introduced him to everyone. The old men and women, who seemed to exert considerable influence in the city, began to focus on Lloyd. But none of it mattered to Lloyd at the moment.

He pretended to cough. “Ehem. Hmm! Your Excellency. May I have a word with you?” asked Lloyd.

“What?” The count’s eyebrow twitched, his gaze wanting to know what it was about.

Lloyd’s voice grew more serious, sounding heavier. “It appears that the Gigatitan is heading this way.”

“What is that?”

This time, both of his eyebrows lifted upward.

“Gigatitan is coming near?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Are you certain?”

“The least we can do is to check it right now.”

Lloyd continued to explain. “My personal knight felt something suspicious. He said that something gigantic is coming towards us underwater.”

“You think it is the monster?” asked the count.

“Based on the size he can feel, yes, it is.”

“Hmm.”

The count’s head cocked to the side. His gaze looked doubtful.

“By any chance you are drunk?”

“No. I have not had a sip.”

“That makes it even stranger. Your personal knight and his senses. Can he ascertain it to be true?”

The count’s gaze traveled to the side. A sharp-looking middle-aged man was standing there.

“This is Sir Genovan. He is my personal knight and a talented man who is almost at the level of a high-rank sword expert. In other words, he, too, is suffering from the sword master syndrome.” Directing to Sir Genovan, he said, “Sir Genovan, do you feel anything strange in the distant sea?”

“Nothing, Your Excellency,” replied Sir Genovan with confidence.

Count Cremo’s gaze returned to Lloyd.

“Did you see? According to Sir Genovan’s senses, nothing is wrong. Moreover, if the Gigatitan was truly drawing near, countless coastal guard posts should have already set off the alarm. Are you, by any chance, distrusting the alarm system in my city which lived with the monster for the last ten years?” The count looked intently at him.

“No, that’s not it, Your Excellency.” Lloyd shook his head immediately.

Then, he plastered a salesman-like smile on his face.

“It appears that my personal knight and I have acted out of line because this is the first time we have attended such a fancy event like this.”

“Haha, it is all right. I can understand. Anyway, it does not change the fact that you have helped the city in a great way.”

“I am honored to hear that, Your Excellency,” replied Lloyd.

“Well, well, showing such humility. What a man of great character. Everyone, did you see that?”

The count turned around and faced the powerful men and women in the audience. They all replied to him with satisfied smiles. The count tapped Lloyd’s shoulder with his thick and large palm.

“It must have been considered difficult,” said Count Cremo, “to give such a warning under this kind of environment, but he worked up the courage to do so. It shows how much care he has for this city. Haha. I have never imagined meeting such a young man in a remote province. What a blissful day it is today. Everyone, raise your glasses. Now, raise it too, young man.” He paused and looked at Lloyd and then continued, “Today, take pride in your work and enjoy it. I shall make sure that you will be paid generously, so do not worry about anything.”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

Lloyd couldn’t help but smile in dismay.

Crap. This is bad.

Lloyd took the glass from the count and lifted it up to cheer with everyone, stealing a quick glance to the side.

Javier was looking at Lloyd. He nodded slightly. Lloyd understood right away. Javier was certain about what he felt. Lloyd bit his underlip without the count’s knowledge.

I can’t insist that the monster is coming when the count has made such a loud and clear announcement. I’m going to make a bad impression on the man. What should I do?

Lloyd trusted Javier more than the count’s big talk. He did so even when the count’s personal knight Sir Genovan said he didn’t feel anything.

Javier’s senses would be more precise.

Lloyd recalled the story in The Knight of Blood and Iron. He couldn't remember reading anything about Sir Genovan. It only meant one thing, then. Sir Genovan was a nobody until the end of the novel. In other words, the knight wasn't good enough to become a sword master. Even if Javier and Genovan were both the same high-level sword experts, the latter would seriously fall behind in fighting.

So it goes without saying that Javier's senses are more precise.

"Cheers!"

Lloyd heard the count shout aloud. He put the glass to his mouth and pretended to drink it. After excusing himself, he quickly removed himself from the group. The plan to warn the count and respond to the danger failed. So now, it was time for Lloyd to take the matter into his own hands.

What should I do...Oh, that's it.

Lloyd was looking around when he stopped at the sides of the boat. There were thick ropes that tied the sides. The ropes were tied to the metal stakes installed at the foot of the statue. They were holding down the boats from drifting off by the waves and tides, making sure that they remained at their own places. Lloyd scanned his surroundings. No one was looking at him.

The musicians were engrossed in their performance. The waiters were busy serving drinks and food. The nobles and merchants were enjoying the party. Not a single person paid attention to Lloyd. The same thing was happening on the decks of the other boats where the party was going in full swing.

It's a do-or-die situation.

Lloyd quickly moved to Javier, and they exchanged glances.

Lloyd held out his hand and grabbed the hilt of the sword Javier tucked around his waist. He pulled it out.

The long sword glinted sharply against the light of the fading sun.

Lloyd quickened his steps.

In one stroke.

Not a moment was spared for the others to respond. It happened so fast that no one knew Lloyd had drawn a sword. Lloyd jumped over the side and landed on the cement ground of the statue. Then he struck down the ropes tied to the stakes.

The six ropes, which were as thick as arms, began to cut one by one. When the boats lost the ropes that kept them fixed and rooted, they began to stagger by the waves. People enjoying the party reeled just then, and the music came to a halt. Wine glasses dropped to the ground, shattering.

Amid the such ruckus, however, Lloyd didn't stop. He jumped back to the boat. He passed the side and sprinted toward the stern, where there was a capstan that pulled up the anchor. Lloyd lifted his sword high once again.

The rope connected to the device got torn. He had cut off the rope that was connected to the anchor, the ropes and anchor for docking, and the front and rear of the boat. The ropes that tied the boat from the front and back were now gone. This got the large boat to stagger and move at full force. It didn't take long until the waves and tides started drifting them off the statue. The whole deck went berserk as a result.

"Eh? Eh? What's going on?"

"The boat is moving!"

"Ahhh!! That man! He's holding a sword!" A lady shrilled and pointed at Lloyd among the crowds. Her shrill pitch was raised when she saw the long sword in his hands.

Lloyd didn't care. He instead got on the ledge of the boat and yelled at the five others still lingering around the statue.

"If you want to live more, then cut off the ropes right now and disperse as much as possible!"

Just when Lloyd shouted and just when the count was about to bawl at Lloyd and ask what in the world he was doing...

At that moment...

A ginormous silhouette shot out from underneath. It crashed down on the five boats left around the statue, creating explosive waves as a result.

Chapter 69: A Runaway and a Fighter (1)

An explosive spray burst up beneath the water. A gigantic silhouette rushed out in between. It was the sea monster, who was 295 feet tall and weighed about 2,500 tons.

The Gigatitan roared as it straightened its curled body. Breaking the splashing waves in one stroke, the Gigatitan hurtled forth like a giant meteor, striking the waist of the mermaid statue with its leviathan head.

Its head was dense with dentin and chitin, and its body weighed 2,500 tons kilograms. As such, the statue couldn’t hold out against the weighty blow. The statue was huge, sure, but its height was a mere ninety-five feet. It was nothing but a toy compared to the gigantic size of the sea monster. So, the blow snapped the statue in the waist like a twig.

Half of its upper torso was sent flying away like a rock shooting out from a catapult.

It cut across the sky of the Cremo pier and flew almost a mile. It crashed right in the middle of the plaza of Cremo city that basked in the tranquility of the night.

The abrupt descent of the statue sent several tons of rocks falling from the sky. The pavement and fountain were instantly destroyed, and the statue bounced and rolled toward the edge of the plaza.

As a result, five peaceful buildings, including the bakery, flower shop, and fruit store, were crumbled to dust. However, it continued to roll on and cut across a major road to finally get stuck in a bell tower. Screams followed right after.

“Arghhhhh!!”

“Eeeek!”

“What?! What is that?!!”

“Over here! Right over here! Someone passed out!”

“Somebody help us!”

The statue dropped like a dead fly and smashed nearby buildings. People became stuck under the debris, and their screams for help were mixed with the shouts of their rescuers.

Some terrified people ran for their lives amid the thick clouds of dust and debris. It was chaos. The terrors of the night could not come any more unexpected. Such horrors were clearly visible from the offshore sailboat.

“What...What is this...?! Christine! Hold my hand, and don’t let go!”

The middle-aged man, Count Cremo, was tightly holding his daughter’s hand as the great disaster swept over the city. His eyes widened in horror. A shocking noise spilled out of his gaping mouth. He couldn’t believe what was unfolding at the moment. The disaster before his very eyes felt unreal. It was beyond his imagination and shattered his grip on reality.

Why? Why did that monster come all the way here and attack?

He couldn’t understand it, and it was for a good reason. The Gigatitan appeared only at the front of the sea for the last ten years. When it did, it just attacked the ships navigating around the area. It had never come so close to attacking the city before.

Could it be...because of the mermaid statue?

The count’s frowning eyes traveled to the statue. The statue that stood with overflowing dignity was now gone. The only remaining portion of the structure was below its waist, and even that was still smashed to pieces. The count’s brow furrowed all the more.

I had wished that the Gigatitan would move its habitat after being intimidated by the statue.

The situation appeared to have taken a different turn. Instead of moving somewhere else, it seemed to have decided to attack the mermaid statue that was judged to be a threat.

This realization grieved the count’s heart.

It is my fault.

His gaze fell heavily. Things started to piece together in his head.

This is because of the mermaid statue. That’s why the Gigatitan acted differently and the coastal posts failed to discover its emergence earlier.

The monster wasn’t acting as it usually did. Each time it had revealed itself in the past, it roared from the distant sea. Thus, its imposing roar allowed the guards to detect the monster’s emergence easily. For the past ten years, the monster emerged in this pattern: it warned and roared whenever the ships crossed its turf.

The guards only had to raise the alarm after detecting its presence above the sea.

However, today was different.

The monster approached underwater. It was shockingly discreet yet determined.

This time, it didn’t act to simply reaffirm its territory and show off its power. It didn’t parade. It attacked. It wasn't a threat. It retaliated against the intruder. That was a new behavioral pattern the monster manifested today.

And the only ones that saw it coming were them.

The count’s gaze moved to the other side of the deck. Two young men were standing there, Lloyd and Javier.

The personal knight of the confident fellow over there. Did he sense the approaching Gigatitan under the water?

His own knight, Sir Genovan, had missed it, but that silver-haired knight felt it. What it meant was evident.

“It’s dangerous, my lord! Do not let go of my hand!”

A strong grip was stretched out toward the count, who was deep in thought. The grip then grabbed his wrist hard and gave a tug as if it were trying to save a drowning man. The grip forcefully pulled him in. Thanks to it, however, the count and his daughter were able to stand strong on the tumultuous deck without tumbling to the ground.

“Please forgive me, my lord.”

The voice trembled as it yelled. It was Sir Genovan, the personal knight of the count.

He was gazing at the count with dolorous eyes. A regretful smile faintly formed on the count’s face.

“Do not beat on yourself,” comforted the count.

“But my lord, I…”

“You have tried your best. It is simply that your best was not able to be as good as the silver-haired knight over there. No one in the city felt the Gigatitan approaching. I, too, missed it. So the fault does not lie upon a single man,” said the count.

“Lord...”

“You have done nothing wrong in this situation. If there is someone who’s at fault, it is me.” The count’s voice grew more distressed.

Just then, a sharp, pointy scream pierced his ears.

“Your Excellency! I am sure it’s nice building trust with your faithful knight, but could you please hear me out for a second?”

It was Lloyd. Grabbing onto the ledge on the other side of the deck, Lloyd spoke aloud.

“People have fallen into the water! Please call the captain at once!”

Lloyd was pointing at the sea, and there, the count saw the mess in the area. Five sailboats that failed to move away from the statue were smashed to pieces. The majority of those on board were now in the water. Making things worse, the waves crashed up and down violently. It was all because of the Gigatitan. Currently, the 295-foot body of the monster was violently tumbling in the water, and the area near the violent ripples was pure chaos. It had created a swirl of flailing people and boat debris in the sea. Lloyd continued to shout.

“We must save them first! Quick! Please commandeer this boat and save as many people as you can! I shall head to the city!”

“City? What are you talking about?!” yelled the count.

“It looks like the port is going to meet a large unwelcome guest!”

Once again, Lloyd pointed somewhere. He was pointing at the Gigatitan whose head was now shot up. It was staring intently at a fixed point as its body stood amid the rippling waves. At the end of its gaze was no other than the mermaid statue. A few hundred feet away, the upper torso of the mermaid statue was laterally stuck in the spire.

“It looks like that monster thinks the mermaid is still alive!”

“Wait a minute, do you think it will rush into the city to break the rest of it?” screamed the count.

“I wouldn’t be surprised if it does!”

Some moments after Lloyd’s answer rang aloud, the Gigatitan began to move as if to prove that he was right. After lowering its body, the monster moved forward, dividing the waves and swimming toward the city.

“Once it gets to the city, the damage will be unimaginable!”

“Then, what do you suggest we do?!” shouted the count.

“I will go!”

“What?”

The count doubted what he had just heard.

Go there? What does he mean? Is he going to swim over to the place?

Lloyd didn’t explain anything more. As though he couldn’t waste his time elaborating, Lloyd exchanged a glance with Javier and rushed toward the stern. He threw something in the air. Three huge summon creatures appeared in the air.

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

Jumbo Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang dove into the sea. They were followed by Lloyd and Javier, who leaped on the back of Bangul.

“All right, everyone! Before we leave, rescue as many people as possible in the water!”

“Ppo!” “Bang!” “Ha!”

Bangul, who was carrying Lloyd and Javier, as well as Ppodong, and Hamang hurried. They saved the people in the area flailing their arms in the water. Once they rescued the elderly, Lloyd got Ppodong and Hamang small again and put them back into his embrace. He started moving toward the city.

“Hey, Bangul.”

“Bangul?”

“Let’s go!”

Lloyd patted Bangul’s side several times. Bangul, who drank seawater, shook her tail. Some seconds after the clear ringing of the bell, a massive explosion took place from her behind.

The volcanic eruption skill was activated. The gas belched out, hitting the waves hard. The repulsive force thrust Bangul’s body forward against the water. Her body was sent almost flying on the water like a missile in the air or a banana boat cutting the waves.

In a flash, Lloyd and Javier distanced themselves. That was when the count was jostled out of his reverie.

“Everyone! Bring me the ropes! Captain! Move your crew! Quickly!”

Now wasn’t the time to space out. They needed to use this time to rescue people. The count threw off his cumbersome coat. He commandeered the captain and crew members, shouting at the top of his lungs. Thus, the long, tiring, and disastrous night began.

The orange sky of the dusk was slowly fading, giving way to darkness. As if to drive out the darkness, however, a blaring noise was sounded in the air. A cannon belched fire.

About 5.5 inches in diameter, the twenty-pound metal marble flew in the air at the speed of 408 m/s. It flew across the dark sky over the sea and hit the target. There was motion energy of about 600kJ in the hit.

However, the target simply flinched when it received a blow. It felt a small itch. The Gigatitan shook its head when its forehead was hit with a culverin cannonball. The injured area was itchy, and it continued to be so for a long time.

The coastline was occupied with several posts, and each of the large culverins built for coastal defense belched out fire. The dark cannon balls flew to knock down the monster’s body. Of course, no damage came from it. The cannon balls were not nearly strong enough to penetrate the monster’s shell composed of dentin and chitin. They failed to even lay a scratch on it.

The monster roared aloud. It wasn’t long before it made its way inland. The waves split. The monster walked on the coast, creating an onrush of waves. Six pairs of centipede-like legs walked on the coastal rocks. They crushed one of the posts.

“Everybody, run!”

The soldiers protecting post twenty-three of the Cremo coast yelled as they struggled to not get crushed under the falling post.

The post commander shouted, “Everyone, out! Run!”

The middle-aged post commander shoved the soldiers out to the open lot. Unlike his outcry, the commander didn’t evacuate. He simply remained alone in the post after sending his men out. He looked through the destroyed post roof and stared at the monster.

My mission is to protect this place. Did you think I’d let you go so easily?

The commander quickly grabbed a flaming torch. The floor beside him was littered with powder kegs. The commander hurled the torch toward the kegs, and after making sure that no one was left behind in the post, he rushed out. He sprinted as far as he could with all his remaining strength.

Meanwhile, in the post, the fire touched the kegs. Post twenty-three exploded with a loud roar. The cannons, cannon balls, and brick walls crumbled to countless shards and flew out in the air. The impact tapped the lower body of the Gigatitan.

“Hahaha! How do you like that?!” The commander, who just barely managed to avoid being engulfed by the explosion, shouted.

He glared at the Gigatitan as he wielded his fists.

This must have given it enough damage!

The commander thought it was obvious. After all, every bit of the gunpowder stored in the post blew up. The explosion happened right under its body. So it would have been a hard blow to any living organism.

It’s an explosive bomb! It’s entirely different from cannonballs!

The hard shell had to have been burned by the fire and shattered into a myriad of pieces. Therefore, the monster wouldn’t dare step another foot into the city...

The Gigatitan looked down below. Then, it shook off its ninth leg. The fire on the end of its toe was instantly put out. It was over. The Gigatitan resumed moving again as if nothing had happened and it didn’t have a single wound.

The eyes of the commander of post twenty-three trembled. He could not believe it. Even while he was lost in his daze, the mammoth body of the Gigatitan continued to stride ahead. The commander felt like he was having an unimaginable nightmare.

What was happening in front of his eyes was real. Those giant eyes of the Gigatitan that stared at the busiest area of Cremo city were real. Its movement toward the mermaid statue stuck at the plaza spire was real as well, and so were the unprotected citizens and his family despite the impending danger.

This is nuts!

The commander of post twenty-three gritted his teeth. His family was in the city district. His wife, who finally succeeded in bearing a child after ten hard years of trying, was there as well. Now, the monster was closing in on the very place where his wife was.

I must stop it, come hell or high water.

The commander’s eyes gleamed with determination. He lowered his body. He picked up a rock. He ran forth. He threw it high.

“You bastard! Stop there!” he shouted.

He hurled a rock again. He didn’t care whether it reached the monster. He didn’t care whether it failed to do any damage. Even if it meant he would be killed here, his goal was to stop the monster or stall it by at least a few seconds. He believed that those few seconds could save his wife.

“Stop! Stop right there!”

He yelled on and on. He hurled a stone, one after another. Maybe it was the working of his determination, but just then, the Gigatitan stopped dead in its tracks like a miracle. Then its giant head creaked as it turned toward his side.

“Grrr?”

“Ha, haha...”

Their eyes locked. The commander let out a pathetic laugh. Then he saw one of the monster’s ginormous feet lift up high right over him. He grimaced.

I’m going to die.

He clenched the stone hard in his hand. He stared at the incoming foot.

Just then, “Hamang!”

All of a sudden, out of nowhere, a giant 196-foot water balloon, no, a hippopotamus hurled his body to whack the Gigatitan in its side.

Chapter 70: A Runaway and a Fighter (2)

“Hamang!”

A giant water balloon, no Hamang, hurled himself into the air and attacked the side of the Gigatitan.

Hamang was heavily bloated after gulping down the seawater. His weight reached hundreds of tons. Of course, his weight was incomparable to the Gigatitan, which weighed over 2,500 tons. However, it was enough to make the monster stagger.

The Gigatitan’s legs tripped over one another. Like a tap dancer suddenly staggering by a gym ball from the side, the monster stumbled to balance itself without falling down. That saved the commander of post twenty-three.

The leg that was about to trample on the commander was pushed to the side by a few feet. It drove deep into the earth as it smashed a rock. The impact showered the commander with several fragments, but he didn’t get hurt. He was unhurt because he had a protector.

“Get down!”

A shadow appeared to protect him right after the shout was heard. The man seemed to lift something flat high up, and he began brandishing in a grand manner. Soon, sparks of fire bounced off in all directions. A flash of light was emitted from the object in the dark, which allowed him to see his surroundings clearly.

Someone was wielding a shovel. And the man was standing in a strange posture the commander had never seen before as he grabbed the shovel with both of his hands.

But there was something extraordinary about his movement. He was like an arrow that was directly hitting its target. He blocked every piece of rock that flew in his way. The man ruthlessly whacked, blocked, bounced, and pushed the rocks with his shovel.

He’s like... a shield with a handle.

That was what the commander thought of the scene. At last, the shovel handler turned around.

“Are you alright?”

“Uhm, I-I...”

“You looked fine. Please follow me.”

The man was no other than Lloyd, and he spoke to the commander as he slung the shovel over his shoulder. The dazed commander trailed Lloyd.

“Where are we going?”

“Where do you think? We’re running away.”

“Didn’t you hear me?” asked Lloyd. “We’re running away.”

Lloyd’s voice dripped with casualness. The commander’s face hardened.

“I cannot run away. I must protect this place,” replied the commander.

“But you won’t be able to.”

“Still, I have to protect this place.”

“You don’t have to.”

“Eh? What do you mean...”

“Because I will protect this place for you.”

Lloyd, running on his feet, pointed toward one side. The gaze of the commander traced Lloyd’s finger. He spotted fire that was developing all over the destroyed post, where the pile of ammunition had blown up.

Amid the plume of fire stood tall Javier, the silver-haired knight. He was holding only one object in his hand: a long sword. Confidence reeled off him as not a single lash of his eyelid quivered in the face of the giant monster who was dozens of times larger than his body. Instead, he raised his sword high and aimed at the monster. He leaped from the ground.

He charged forward like a tornado. Leaping over the rocks, he jumped over the blazing fire. Right in front of it, there was the eleventh leg of the Gigatitan. Javier brushed past its leg. His sword became a ray of light, sweeping its leg.

Sparks gave off from the friction. A tiny scratch appeared at the end of its leg. Javier's eyebrow quivered after pulling his sword back.

It wasn't slashed?

He had expected that at least half of its leg would be sliced in half. However, his attack rendered a different result.

One more time.

The mana of the manaheart fluctuated. The rotation power of the triple circle shot up. Javier's movement became faster.

Javier moved too fast for the Gigatitan's gaze. He rushed into the monster's blind spot and he jumped and stepped on its leg. He used the kick to leap up to its knees. That part looked vulnerable and defenseless compared to the rest of it.

Javier's sword glimmered. Cutting across the space, he thrust his sword into the leg joint. However, he failed to slash the shell.

The sword attack, which was loaded with the mana blast, bounced off. When his attack was repulsed, the silver-haired knight's eyes were filled with surprise. Lloyd, who had run away prior and just turned around, grimaced instantly.

Oh, come on, Javier. I told you we shouldn't fight.

Lloyd’s heart pounded aloud. Just then, he recalled what happened earlier in the day.

“All right! Bangul.”

“Bangul?”

“Eat this.”

“Banguuul?”

Lloyd held out the blue sunflower seed to Bangul. This had taken place right after they swam through the sea on Bangul and safely arrived at the shore. First, Lloyd downsized Bangul. He gave a quick scan of his surroundings.

“What do you plan on doing now?” asked Javier seriously.

Lloyd replied matter-of-factly, “What else? We’ve got to hide.”

“Excuse me?”

Javier slightly furrowed his brows.

“By hide, do you mean ambush the monster?”

“No.”

“Then what do you mean?” asked Javier.

“Ambush? Why would we ambush anyone? We need to hide.”

“Excuse me?”

“Hold on, are you thinking of fighting that monster?”

“Well, of course…”

“Don’t even try. You’re going to get beaten and die.”

Lloyd threw off the tuxedo that had become heavy from being drenched in water. He continued to speak as if he couldn’t wrap his head around why this conversation was even taking place.

“This place isn’t our city. Besides, they have armed forces here. So why on earth should we fight with a gun, no, sword?”

“Um, well...”

“For justice? Something like that?”

Lloyd cocked his head to the side. Javier’s furrow deepened.

“Then what did you mean when you shouted earlier?”

“When did I shout?”

“You replied that you would go yourself when the count had asked you what your plan was now.”

“Yeah, I did shout that.”

“Then why are you not taking responsibility for your words?”

“I said that I’d come here. I didn’t tell him what I’d do after getting here.”

“Right? So, who cares if I go hide now? Why should I put my life on the line for someone else?”

“But, Master Lloyd…”

“Do you think I’m a Superman?”

“Eh? Superman? What do you mean...”

“What, do I look like a hero who’s going to save the world?”

There was no way Javier saw him that way. Lloyd had never thought of himself like that either. He wasn’t Superman nor a hero in a movie who could perform extraordinary feats.

I’m just a normal guy who wants to pay off his debt and live the rest of his life in peace.

He was nothing but a hardworking young man who lived every day to achieve such a goal in mind. He worked hard to win business contracts and make money. An ordinary, hardworking man. That was what Lloyd was.

“Fighting that monster that’s as big as a building? Do you even hear yourself?”

The monster had sent the large statue hundreds of feet in the air with just one blow. It destroyed five sailboats by bumping into them just once. Dozens of cannon balls hit it, only to not even lay a scratch.

Fighting that monster?

Lloyd would have tried if he had stood a chance, but every fiber of his being said that it was impossible. In all frankness, Lloyd was scared. He couldn’t even muster the courage to try.

So, he concluded that what cannot be done cannot be changed, though it was painful to imagine the harm the monster would cause to the people. To Lloyd, the encouraging words to fight the monster as a group sounded the same as a suicide pact.

Lloyd thus spoke. “Let me be very clear. I do not intend to fight. That’s why I spewed some vague words and got out of the sailboat. Now, I will find somewhere safe to hide. I will hide until this chaos calms down a bit.”

“Then what do you plan on doing after the situation settles down?” asked Javier.

“Well, obviously, the count needs to pay me.”

“Once I get the payment for the project, I’m done. Yeah, yeah, I know, this is cunning and sly. However, my hands are tied. There’s nothing I can do. What do you expect me to do here? What more can I possibly do?”

Lloyd argued that there was nothing he could do. Javier’s gaze turned icy as he looked at Lloyd. The words that came out of his mouth were equally icy.

“Is this the kind of person you were all the time, Master Lloyd?”

“What?”

“I am disappointed.”

That was the end. Javier turned around. He drew his sword. He asked Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang, who were all befuddled as to how to act during the argument.

“Do you wish to fight with me?” asked Javier.

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

The three summons nodded in unison. A faint smile of satisfaction spread across Javier’s face.

“Great. Shall we go?”

“Ppo!”

“Bang!”

“Ha!”

Javier hugged the three creatures and ran off. They quickly disappeared into the distance.

Just then, messages cascaded in front of his eyes.

It appeared that Javier was indignant this time. Lloyd bit his lip.

This is nuts.

He didn't want himself or Javier to fight the monster. Of course, Lloyd understood that Javier was strong. However, none of this was in The Knight of Blood and Iron he had read.

In the novel, Javier never fought this Gigatitan. Moreover, he wasn't a sword master like in the novel. Even though he had the triple circle with him, technically speaking, he was still a high-level sword expert. This meant that he could meet his end if he got unlucky and recklessly charged forward in the name of justice.

That can't happen.

Lloyd didn't want to lose Javier like that. Was it because he liked Javier?

Of course not.

Why? It's simple. He's the most useful person here!

Javier was set to become his biggest asset. His talent would become the backbone of the fiefdom's prosperity once he was a sword master. On top of that, he was a great equipment for construction at the moment. His mana blast had made quarrying and boring holes in the ground extremely easy.

Plus, I don't have to pay for his labor!

Lloyd needed to just feed him, and he'd work like a mule. So Lloyd didn't want to lose such versatile construction equipment like this by throwing him into danger.

That was why… Oh, come on! You have no idea how hard I worked to make you strong! Lloyd ran after Javier, grumbling countless times in his head. He tried to talk Javier out of it. One thing led to another, and that was how Lloyd ended up saving the commander of post twenty-three. Lloyd lashed out at Javier as he ran away with the post commander.

"Hey! That's enough! Let's run away!"

"No, thank you."

Javier, who had already landed on the other side, casually rejected him as he ran in the same direction. The veins on Lloyd's forehead popped out of his skin.

Lloyd bellowed, "Hey!"

"Yes, Young Master."

"Does this turn you on? Do you have a hero kink or something?!"

"Excuse me?"

"Excuse me, my ass! Am I wrong? You really think you can stop it?"

"I don't know. But..."

Javier, who was running at full speed, stopped. He then turned around. The giant monster was charging toward his way. Its foot was shooting down from the sky. Javier positioned his sword toward the incoming foot and used the mana blast.

Javier's body was sent back along with the fierce shockwave. He was pushed about sixty feet back. Barely recovering his balance, Javier's eyes blazed with determination.

"It appears there is no one who can stop that thing other than me." His voice was soft, but it rang aloud by the mana.

"Wow."

Gosh, he sure acts like he's the main character of the novel. His meddling and sense of justice are unhealthy at this point.

Lloyd didn't have the time to blame it on that nor to dissuade him.

"Hey! Dodge!"

Javier must have been annoying the monster with his mana blasts. The Gigatitan started to shower Javier with attacks. It wielded its club-like forearms, its main weapon.

Javier quickly dodged the attack. A string of attacks followed, giving no time to rest for Javier.

Each time its forearm struck down, the ground cracked, and the rocks turned to powder. The formidable shockwave and pieces of rocks shook the whole area. Javier closely managed to avoid the attack each time. He became farther from Lloyd and drew the Gigatitan to his side.

It appeared that Javier was worried that Lloyd would get hurt by the attack that was meant for him.

That idiot!

Javier was drawing all the attention to himself. It looked like he wanted to die. Lloyd's heart pounded harder as a result.

This is the reason why I said we should hide instead of fight.

However, it was too late to pull out. Lloyd needed to come up with something, otherwise, Javier would be done for. If he was unlucky, Lloyd himself would be dead as well, like a combo deal.

I can't let that happen.

Lloyd shook his head hard. He strove to calm himself.

First, I need to analyze my surroundings if I want to overcome this situation.

He wiped off the drops of sweat streaking down his eyes, and he quickly scanned the area.

He collected his thoughts

The biggest problem is that Javier isn't doing any damage to the monster.

Javier could slash through steel, but at the moment, his sword strike wasn't working against the monster's thick shell.

The Gigatitan looks just like a mantis shrimp. Or a lobster with club-like forearms.

The biggest problem of crustaceans was their hard, sturdy, distinctive shell.

Javier might be able to do something if he can get through its skin.

Lloyd looked into the Gigatitan's body.

The night was too dark. Furthermore, it was difficult for him to find the gigatan's weak spot no matter how many times he scanned the monster.

Oh, how I wish that thing was a rock or a ground so I could get a full scan of its shallow layer... Wistfulness flooded his thoughts. Just then, Lloyd was struck with an epiphany.

Eh? Hold on.

Lloyd, who was sighing at length, paused. A new idea hit him. His fragmented thoughts exploded into a fully developed plan.

Survey. The skill that surveys the ground. The skill that sees which part of the ground is solid and weak. That sweet skill analyzes all geographical features of the land up to sixteen feet underground. But will it work against that thing?

He wondered if that could be possible. Surveying a live organism was something he never tried before. He had never expected it to work. On the off chance that it was... It'd be an amazing win for him. Even if it failed, he'd lose nothing. This was a bet he couldn't lose.

Let's give it a try. Survey!

Lloyd squeezed his eyes in excitement. Activating the surveying skill, he looked up at the Gigatitan.

[Surveying will begin.]

Along with an unbelievable message, various data points of the Gigatitan's body parts appeared in front of him.

Chapter 71: Attack the Weak Point (1)

[Surveying will begin.]

Lloyd's eyes widened. He looked at the message that popped right in front of him. He had his doubts. However, it was working. It truly worked.

Wow, I never expected this would work.

This wasn't the time to be impressed. This wasn't the time to ponder why on earth this skill worked on the monster. He could be impressed later. He wouldn't miss out on anything if he analyzed why it worked later.

Right now, it's time for me to make good use of it.

Ask later, use now. Lloyd focused on the message that popped right in front of him. His eyes moved rapidly.

Every spot his gaze touched turned into augmented reality. Every inch of the large Gigatitan's body was scanned, analyzed, and turned into a data point in front of him. Lloyd felt like he was using a microscope to look over every single one of the Gigatitan's pores.

Thanks to it, he was able to identify the secret behind the monster's impressive defense power.

Okay, so the survey is done, and its shell is composed of... hmm, chitin and dentin.

It wasn't a simple mix, however. The molecules were intricately structured like a triple-layered honeycomb. Those tripled-layered honeycomb structures were overlapped and woven into a helix. It looked just like a high-end bulletproof vest made of kevlar fiber.

What's more, its average thickness is three feet.

The Gigatitan had naturally possessed a three-foot thick advanced bulletproof vest. That wasn't the only secret behind its defensive capabilities.

There is a subtle wave pattern all over its shell, and it's going in a unified direction.

The pattern mixed together and flowed toward its forehead, which had a giant protruding thorny horn.

Lloyd's gaze sharpened.

That horn doesn't look like a mere decoration.

His gaze sharpened all the more. The wave patterns were concentrated on the horn, but its inside was empty. Lloyd thought that there must be a reason it was there.

Surely, it can't just be a piece of decoration. Maybe this will work as well. Design!

Lloyd activated his design skill. He also activated his skill options.

[Skill Option Three: Simulation mode has been activated.]

[The topographical data of the current virtual design will be available for simulation.]

The background of the virtual space brightened. A plethora of dots and lines floated and connected with one another, like a graphic composed of polygons. A large form appeared in the air.

It was the body of the Gigatitan that was just surveyed.

Okay, it works.

Lloyd's glance traveled to the side. The Gigatitan was jumping all about to catch Javier. It synced perfectly with the one that floated in the simulation mode window.

Just perfect.

Lloyd lifted his two hands. He operated the simulation mode as he touched the air.

What I want to find out is the relationship between the wave patterns on its shell and the empty horn.

Lloyd zoomed in on the screen and focused on one part of the Gigatitan's back.

Then, he bent his finger.

The power of physical impact I want to test is, uhm, about thirty tons.

Lloyd flicked, and the end of his index finger tapped the back side of the Gigatitan displayed in the simulation mode. A force of thirty tons, which Lloyd had just set, was applied.

Lloyd watched the direction of the waves of impact. A red shockwave was created at the center of the impact point. The impact failed to dig deep into the shell. Instead, it flowed and gathered along the wave patterns marked countless times on the surface. After that, it was concentrated on the thorn-shaped horn. Just then, the empty space inside the horn resonated.

This is it. The impact was resonating inside the empty space of the horn. That's why most of the impact settles down into a vibration.

Lloyd's eyes shone. Lloyd was naturally impressed. He felt like he had just witnessed a miracle of nature.

But now's not the time for that.

He wasn't surveying and designing right now to answer his curiosity. He needed to unearth the Gigatitan's weak spot using his skills. Lloyd's gaze became more hectic and tenacious.

Endure for just a little longer, Javier!

Lloyd wouldn’t have been able to use the skill on the monster if Javier hadn’t bought him some time. Knowing this very well, Lloyd ran an experiment on every part of the giant creature. He scanned for its physical characteristics and durability. At last, he was able to find what he was looking for.

There it is.

Narrowing his eyes, Lloyd focused on one point. It was the area that connected the carapaces eleven and twelve in between the space where the monster’s stomach led to its chest.

It’s not accurate to say chest and belly because the Gigatitan is not an insect, but who cares, that part is its greatest weakness.

The test had rendered such a result. It wasn’t that its shell was shallow. It was actually thicker than its back. But once it satisfied two conditions, it held the potential of being destroyed.

The horn and the attack angle. Those two factors are key.

They were the conditions that needed to be met to penetrate its shell. The first job was to get rid of the horn.

That’s how I’ll make sure the impact doesn’t disappear and goes through properly.

Erasing the detailed wave patterns on the shell surface was impossible, but the horn could be discarded. Once the horn was gone, the impact power that flowed along the wave patterns would not resonate through the horn. If it didn't resonate, it would come back to the path it had followed.

The second condition was the angle. The connecting part between the carapaces eleven and twelve. Javier had to thrust from the tail to the head exactly at a forty-five-degree angle. Of course, the blow needed to be hard and mighty.

It will work if Javier uses the mana blast.

With those conditions in mind, Lloyd ran the test three times. Each ended in success. The mana blast had been strong enough to divide the granite bedrock. Penetrating the shell would be easy as long as the conditions are met. He was able to penetrate the dorsal nerve cord and various tissues at the same time.

It's going to leave a critical hit. He can do it.

Lloyd turned off the simulation mode. He lifted up his head. He spotted Javier in the distance, who was losing out to the continuing attacks of the Gigatitan.

Lloyd sprinted in that direction, and about 200 yards away, he shouted at the top of his lungs, "Hey! Can you hear me?!"

Javier didn't answer. It looked like he couldn't hear him.

Oh, crap.

He didn't want to move closer.

But at the same time, he feared that Javier might really die if he stayed like this. Lloyd bit his lips hard.

Ugh, this man and his damned hero syndrome! This is the reason why I never want to be the main character in a novel. No sense of reality whatsoever, seriously.

It was a mystery to Lloyd why Javier decided to fight head-on against such a monster. Why, Lloyd thought to himself, did he volunteer to fight for the strangers? Lloyd was honestly impressed by Javier's spirit. At the same time, the fact that such a hero was his personal knight felt bitter like a cup of espresso.

Crap, really!

Resolved, Lloyd rushed forward. 150 yards... one hundred yards... Lloyd narrowed the distance between him and Javier. At last, he entered the shadow of the Gigatitan that heavily fell over him.

He shouted very loudly, “Hey! Dude!”

This time, he heard a response. The voice wasn’t a shout. It was soft and yet clear as if Javier had used his mana to speak.

“Master Lloyd?”

“Yeah! It’s me, you punk!”

“Do you plan to fight the monster with me?”

Lloyd seemed to catch a slight sense of gladness in his voice. Shuddering, Lloyd retorted, “Fight with you, my ass! Why would I do such a thing?!”

He paused for a second before continuing to speak.

“You’re all jittery because you can’t lay even a scratch on its shell no matter how much you slash and stab it, eh?”

“No.”

“No?”

“No, Young Master,” Javier said.

“Why?”

“I was attacking the horn first, not its body.”

“What...?”

Dazed, Lloyd lifted his head. The Gigatitan’s shadow fell over them, and Lloyd caught a glimpse of its head over its giant body. To Lloyd’s surprise, its horn was cut in half!

“This is just my gut feeling, but I feel like that horn is working to dissipate my blow. So, I intend to cut the horn first.”

“Wow.”

Javier’s voice was calm. But contrary to his composed voice, he moved like a storm. Seeing that, something struck Lloyd to his core.

This is what a true prodigy looks like.

Javier was truly different as he was set to become the one and only grandmaster in history. It had taken using the analysis and surveying skill for Lloyd to discover the monster’s weak spot. But Javier managed to pinpoint it in the process of fighting against it head-on.

“Then, did you also figure out that the monster has a weak spot on its belly?”

“No,” Javier replied, “I did not know that.”

“That’s why I am here!”

Lloyd shouted triumphantly. Whatever the case was, the only person who could drive into the weak spot was Javier. And so, it was imperative for Lloyd to tell him about its weak spot.

That was the only way for him and Javier to make it out of there alive. Lloyd’s shout was immediately returned with a response.

“I wish to hear more about it.”

Javier landed right beside Lloyd. He unilaterally stretched out his hands.

“So please excuse me for a moment,” he added.

“Eh?”

Javier grabbed Lloyd by the back of his neck and jumped off the ground. The movement made Lloyd feel like he was riding on top of a high-speed train.

Lloyd snapped his eyes open. His feet felt detached from the ground. The ground swooshed past him at that moment. The stormy noise of the wind beat his ears. Lloyd couldn't lift his head because of the mighty wind. Right above him was the Gigatitan, attacking them!

The rocks in the cliffs were being destroyed and crumbling, and the shards fell from the sky like rain. Javier charged forth like a storm in between. Dangling in the air like a popsicle wrapper, Lloyd shrieked when he was being hoisted in the air only by Javier's grip on his collar.

"Aaack! Hey!! What's this? Do you have something against me?!!"

"Yes, I do. Why ask such an obvious question."

"Please be more specific about the monster's weak spot."

"Argh! Can we talk after you let go?"

"I'm doing this because I'm nervous that I'll mishear if I stay far from you."

"Aaack! Dammit!"

Javier kept drastically shifting their direction and moving faster.

Striving hard to not vomit, he shouted, "It's just what I explained to you a while ago! It's the space between the carapaces eleven and twelve that connects the chest and belly. Do you see that?"

"Yes, I can."

"From the tail to the head! Stab the center point at a forty-five-degree angle! Use your mana blast!"

"Will that work?"

"Probably. But you have to cut that horn first!"

"Yes, Young Master."

Javier didn’t inquire where Lloyd got the information. He didn’t have the time to waste his time on trivial questions. Right now, they needed to trust each other.

“Then please stay here.”

Javier finally let go of his grasp after he landed. Lloyd’s nape, which was continually shackled, was finally liberated. Javier leaped once again.

With that, Lloyd was left alone in between the rocks of the coastal cliff. He stared at the back of Javier, who was going back to hurtle toward the Gigatitan. Afterward, he thought to himself. Regardless of when he saw it, Javier’s combat style was an art form.

One of the Gigatitan’s feet stomped on the ground. It meant to aim at Javier, who was charging forward. He was already gone as he had leaped high. He was actually “flying,” using the Gigatitan’s leg as a spring.

He kicked the pillar-like leg and shot up like a flash of light. Then, he used his sword to whack another leg joint that tried to block his movement, leaving the repulsion power of the weapon’s aura to take control of his body.

The impact made him fly out sideways, and he used the mana blast downward. After slightly getting elevated, he gave his body a twist. Five appendages of the Gigatitan rushed toward him all at once, but he simply slid past and avoided them. When he finally climbed up its back, he sprinted forward.

Javier quickly charged toward the monster’s head like a gust of wind or a lightning bolt coming down from the sky. Before the Gigatitan could shake its body, Javier leaped in the air and transferred his energy to his sword. It was added along with the rotation power as he twisted to the right midair.

He brandished his sword and gave a slash. The area he stabbed had already received dozens of hits in the same angle and direction. His blade shone coldly and dug right into the spot again. Right as the blade seemed to brush past the horn...The horn was cut off the Gigatitan’s forehead.

“Grrrrrr!”

The Gigatitan, now infuriated, flung its body toward Javier. However, Javier had already landed and shifted his direction. As the monster charged ahead in a fury, the whole ground was overturned.

Javier, having closely avoided the attack, sprinted. He stepped only on the peak of the protruded and overturned ground. His eyes glimmered again.

Right over there.

He spotted the weak point Lloyd had shown him. Moving as swiftly as the wind, he jumped right into the large body of the Gigatitan.

Got it.

Javier needed to be at a forty-five-degree angle from the monster’s head. Keeping that in mind, he fixed his sword high. He created a collision from the mana circles and pointed his sword. Mana blast. Right before the blast could dig into the Gigatitan’s weakness…

Out of nowhere, Javier was swept over by the powerful storm from the left. It was the Gigatitan’s forearm.

“Tsk!”

Javier redirected the direction of the blast by reflex toward the rushing forearm. The two powers, the strong forearm club and the powerful mana blast, crashed together in the air.

*J*avier’s body was sent flying by the explosion. His body took a nosedive and got stuck in the ground.

“Argh!”

His foot dug into a rock. But he didn’t have any time to waste.

The forearm club struck down again much more fiercely than it did previously. Javier immediately jumped, but the rock became crushed to dust. Javier then attempted a counterattack amid the sandstorm of broken rocks. He laser-focused on the Gigatitan's weak spot. The monster was doggedly protecting its weak spot. This was a fight between the silver-haired knight, who was about to become a sword master, and a monster that was the size of a high-rise building. The two gave their all fighting each other.

Lloyd was about one hundred yards away, watching the battle.

Ha, he'll lose at this rate.

Lloyd thought that Javier would die if he left him alone. So, it was harder for Lloyd to give up and leave now. For some reason, he thought he needed to do something to make sure that Javier would be able to attack the thing's weak spot.

So today, my job is to draw its attention here.

Drawing attention. He needed to bait the monster. Lloyd wondered what would be the best way to do so. He turned his head. He looked around. Just then, the city district of Cremo appeared in his view. In the corner of the plaza, Lloyd vaguely took a glimpse of the mermaid statue stuck in the spire.

That was what got the Gigatitan to frenzy in the first place, right?

After the mermaid statue was thrown toward the city, the monster ended up treading into the land to lay another attack. What would, Lloyd wondered, happen if the mermaid statue started happily dancing in front of the Gigatitan?

His eyes wouldn't be on Javier.

Lloyd chuckled. He remembered one of the most important rules he had learned by playing video games in Korea. What was the best way to draw attention? It was to pester and annoy his opponent until they insulted his gameplay.

Chapter 72: Attack the Weak Point (2)

“Move! Move!!”

“I’m here, help me out!”

“Start helping from over there! Everyone, move!”

The night had been a typical one. Everyone had finished working for the day. They returned home and ate dinner with their family. They were finally resting at home after a long day.

It was just another ordinary night in Cremo City. That would have been true if it was a normal day.

Today, however, was different. A catastrophe seemingly dropped from the sky. It was a crumbling mermaid statue that had appeared out of thin air. When the destructive mishap torpedoed the city, the normal lives of the people crumbled to dust. Thus began the disastrous night.

“I’m here! My leg is stuck! Someone get me out!”

“Hold on for a second. I’m going to get some help!”

All hell broke loose near the plaza. People under the crushed buildings shouted for their lives. Saving them proved to be a difficult job. It was because of the fire. At first, it was only an ember that spilled out of a furnace of a building. However, splinters of wood and furniture littered the area, and the fire quickly spread to them and developed into a fierce blaze in no time. The blaze then engulfed the building and started to spread, which eventually became a large fire.

“Fire!”

“Bring the water! Water!”

Civilians and guards moved hurriedly, panting. They cleaned up the debris in the building, rescued people, and brought buckets of water. The sea wind and dry winter climate made the rescue difficult.

The fire, once caught on, was tenacious. It drifted along the dry wind and spread in a flash. It was useless no matter how many buckets of water were poured over the fire. The speed at which the fire spread was much faster than the speed at which it was being put out. At this rate, it was likely that the blaze would spread across the entire city district.

“Battalion one. Focus on the rescue efforts near the plaza. Are Battalions Two and Three still not here?”

“They’re gathering up.”

“They’re late. We should be constructing the firebreak right now,” said the guard commander of the city as he gritted his teeth.

The situation was bad. It was getting worse every hour.

This is an emergency. We can’t handle this.

His lips dried. The situation was that desperate.

Why is the wind this strong today out of all days? The fire can’t be contained. And the majority of the soldiers in the force are serving the lord at sea and aren’t coming back.

The blazing fire couldn’t be contained. The guards, who were in charge of putting them out, weren’t moving as smoothly as he wanted. It was because the commanders of small units had gotten on the sailboat with the count. Making things worse, the situation outside the city was gloomy as well.

No, it was worse than gloomy. It was transcendentally despairing.

That monster has climbed up to the land... Just outside the city was the cliff near the coast. Every time he turned to look there, he felt as if he was stuck in a nightmare. The 295-foot monster could be vaguely seen, and it was going berserk under the moonlit night sky. It was the Gigatitan.

The growl, low and threatening as if it was scratching the ground, blared clearly even from where he stood. It tapped his eardrums as if it was rushing in his direction.

If that monster gets here... We're done for.

He could ascertain it. The city was already in chaos due to the fire. If the Gigatitan came here and wrecked havoc once again, the damage would be tremendous. The guards and the count's army could sacrifice their lives to protect the city, but that might not be enough.

And yet, there's no news from the lord. Who knows if the monster has gotten the better of him already? The fate of my city... Is this how it falls tonight?

A shadow of despair hung over his heart. With a serious gaze, he looked at the city district. He stared at the spreading fire that started from the plaza and moved into the city district. So, he was able to see it. He saw the blaze of fire expanding. He saw the night sky glowing red. A giant pinkish water balloon shot down from the sky.

"Hamang!"

Hamang shouted and opened his mouth wide at the same time. More than 26,000 gallons of seawater gushed out of him.

The seawater splashed against the air resistance across the sky and split into hundreds and millions of droplets. The water sprayed over the plaza and the entire city district. It was like a local torrential fall. With just one move, the fire that blazed across the city district was extinguished. The spark that was starting to spread to the next building was instantly killed as well, and the heat that burned the pillars and roofs cooled at once. Hamang, now reduced to the size of a fist, fell down from the sky and landed on Lloyd's palm.

"Hamang!"

"Good job."

Lloyd stroked Hamang. He had wondered if this would work. He had wondered if Hamang would be able to leap from outside of the city and above the city district when he held so much seawater. It turned out that he had worried for nothing. Hamang was much more capable than Lloyd thought he was. His body bounced like a ball even when it hit the ground several times.

“You did a very good job. You saved a lot of people today,” said Lloyd.

“Hamang!”

After stroking him once more, Lloyd put him back into his inner pocket. Lloyd then shouted.

“Run faster, Ppodong! Let’s go!”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong galloped faster as he carried Lloyd on his back. He cut across the main road, jumped over the dried fish store, and passed through the plaza. Finally, he saw.

He saw the spire that stood tall at one side of the plaza. The mermaid statue was stuck on its side. Lloyd immediately directed Ppodong toward the foot of the spire.

He then shouted, “Ppodong! Pluck it out!”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Ppodong jumped right then, using the momentum he got from running with Lloyd. Then, he grabbed the mermaid statue that laterally protruded from the spire and dangled on it. He tensed his forearms as he wiggled his chubby butt.

The mermaid statue that was stuck deep into the building was plucked out. Lloyd’s eyes shone. The mermaid statue was badly smashed and broken, and its messed up state wasn’t anything surprising given that it flew all the way here after Gigatitan hit it.

Its outline and silhouette were somewhat visible. Lloyd spotted the broken head and two arms lying around in the area.

“Alright, can you carry this?”

“Ppodong!”

To Lloyd’s relief, Ppodong could carry the giant mermaid statue that was bigger than his body without any problem. Lloyd was also relieved that he could carry the two arms himself, though it was a bit of a struggle.

“Alright, let’s go!”

“Ppodong!”

They dashed off, leaving the plaza. He was a little worried about the people left behind at the plaza, but his hands were tied. Extinguishing the fire took care of the most urgent issue, so the rest of the rescue efforts would be manageable for the rest of the guards and people. Believing that, he directed Ppodong.

“Over there! To the shipbuilding yard!”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong shifted as Lloyd motioned. The shipyard was where he built the Caisson needed for constructing the artificial ground in the water. So he was used to the path as he frequented it to give out orders and look over its progress. Thanks to that, he arrived at the shipyard in no time. There, he easily found the object he had in mind.

I think a large cart was always put up over there... Yes. Found it.

Lloyd’s eyes shone. The shipyard had an especially large cart that carried ginormous logs or small ships to the sea from the land. The thick wheel spindles were designed to bear the massive weight of the cart. There were six wheels in total, and they were as tall as a human. Because of its sheer size, Cremo City, despite its riches, could only own two carts.

“Hey, Ppodong. Over there!”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Lloyd pointed at the cart, and Ppodong started moving as he caught on to what he meant. Ppodong put the mermaid statue he was carrying on top of the cart. The cart tumbled once, but all was good as the monstrous cart successfully bore the weight of the statue.

Right afterward, Lloyd began to perform an emergency surgery on the statue.

Okay, it has to be as real as possible. It’s gotta look real in the eyes of the Gigatitan.

He had brought enough of the ropes for docking and tightly wrapped them around the statue’s body.

Next, he connected the two amputated arms. Its two arms were broken by joints, which meant that it was cleanly divided into sections of shoulder, elbow, and wrist. Lloyd connected all of them using the rope. The connected joints dangled like a nunchuck. The broken neck was connected in a similar fashion, but it was tightened harder than the arms. It was tightened just enough for a slight tilt and thus, the makeshift mermaid statue was completed.

It looks realistic.

This would allow the joints connected with the ropes to limply move each time the cart rattled. Somehow, it looked more real than when it wasn’t smashed apart.

Next, I gotta put it up like this... Whew!

Thankfully, the cart was designed for the bottom to have a slight slope, just like how modern dump trucks would push out the soil by tilting their open-box bed downward.

The device allowed the logs and other cargo to be spilled all at once. Lloyd turned the lever up and down without rest. The device made a squealing noise each time he turned it. The ground of the container began to slope. As a result, the mermaid statue was made to rise up on its own. At last, the corners of Lloyd's lips rose in satisfaction.

This will do.

The angle was perfect. The statue was perfectly slanted in an upright position. Before he finished, he used the rope to firmly tie the body of the statue and cart together. It was meant to hold the statue from falling even when the cart tumbled and shook violently. With that, everything was good to go.

Since the rope can withstand ships weighing hundreds of tons, this should be enough.

Confident in himself, Lloyd tied the rest of the rope around Ppodong's waist, which was loosely connected to the cart.

"Hey, Ppodong."

"Ppodong?"

"Ready to run?"

"Ppodong!" Ppodong's dark eyes were filled with determination.

"Let's go then! Off we go!"

Lloyd tapped Ppodong in the back. His chubby body pushed forward with explosive determination. The ginormous cart got dragged by Ppodong's dominating power.

At first, it was slow, but things started to speed up. After some more acceleration, his speed explosively revved up.

"Let's gooo!"

“Ppodong!”

Rattle! Rattle! Rattle! Dirt flew in the sky each time Ppodong kicked the ground. The cart raced amid the violent storm of dirt. He ran out of the shipyard, and it didn’t take much time for him to leave the city. Ppodong zoomed toward the cliff in the west, where the Gigatitan was at.

“To the front!”

“Ppodong!”

He hurtled toward the Gigatitan’s face. The cart let out a strange noise as it dragged behind Ppodong on the rocky ground. The road wasn’t paved. It was rocky and rough. The cart noisily raced forward like a bumper car. It rattled and clattered and trembled as it moved. The mermaid statue violently rattled with it.

The neck of the statue cocked up and down restlessly. Its two arms flailed like it was doing a body wave. The loud clattering noise prompted the Gigatitan to shift its gaze toward this side. There, it caught sight of what was going on. It saw the mermaid, its nemesis and archenemy. It saw the intimidating mermaid that was unusually large. The mermaid was rushing toward it, fantastically hula dancing at a fast beat.

The Gigatitan shifted immediately. It instantly forgot the enemy it was trying to kill, Javier. That dancing machine mermaid charging toward it was recognized as a bigger threat. The monster reacted like a child rushing to get their hands on a free balloon from a store event or an unemployed person rushing to get a discounted meal combo. It bolted in the direction of the incoming cart, roaring out a ferocious growl. It wielded its giant, club-shaped forearm.

“Turn!”

Lloyd shouted as he pulled Ppodong’s right ear. Understanding his instruction, Ppodong instantly turned to the right. The cart that connected to him with several layers of ropes was turned to the right as well.

A blaring noise rang aloud like a bomb was exploding nearby. Lloyd almost felt the ground shaking. The area was wiped out by one stroke of the Gigatitan, but Ppodong didn't care as he continued to gallop. Lloyd was the same on his back.

I'm so glad that I asked Javier to teach me how to ride horses!

He had learned how to ride the horse on the way to this city. He was able to remain on Ppodong's back even when he galloped off like a wild horse. However, it was too early for Lloyd to be relieved.

"Faster!"

"Ppodong!"

The powerful mermaid statue was doing an impressive hip-hop dance. The sight caused the Gigatitan to pounce on it. Each time it did, Lloyd's heart raced as though he was walking on a burning tightrope.

"A little faster! Run! Javier, hey! Get on with it!"

Lloyd's shout became hurried. He had succeeded in drawing the attention of the Gigatitan. So, it was time for Javier to kill it.

This is exactly the reason why I didn't want to play this role!

Lloyd just wanted to pay off his family's debt. That was why he worked so hard every day. Today as well he had planned to stay quietly hidden all day.

It was beyond him how he ended up in such a risky position. Lloyd blamed his destiny as he let out a sigh that just come out.

It's all because of you and your hero syndrome, Javier!

Lloyd gazed up with his blame-filled eyes as he busily directed Ppodong. He spotted Javier leaping in the air like a ray of lightning.

The Gigatitan had become defenseless as it pursued Ppodong. Javier charged toward its weak spot with a long sword in his arms. Once he was ready to thrust it upward, he slashed it down at lightning speed. Javier used his ultimate move. The mana blast went off.

Chapter 73: Attack the Weak Point (3)

The long sword was pointed forward with great force. More mana was added to the sword through his grip. It wasn't ordinary mana that spurted out through the manaheart. This time it was much more explosive and destructive.

The three circles spun around his heart at an incredible speed. They staggered as the rotation power maxed out. One circle wrapped around the heart. The other two collided, creating a fierce blast.

The explosive power raced along his blood vessels. Afterward, it rushed through his body, passed his shoulders, and ran along his arms. Then it jumped into the sword's handle through the end of his fingers. The blade amplified the mana once more. At last, it burst out. It burst out toward the weak spot of the Gigatitan, the area between carapaces eleven and twelve.

The mana blast flew toward its point of weakness. At that moment, Javier's blue eyes glimmered.

It's a success.

The twenty-year-old silver-haired knight was confident. The mana blast could not be any more of a success. Javier's blasting power was delivered perfectly. The hitting spot and angle could not be any more precise. He hit right at the location Lloyd had told him to capitalize. The explosion took place at last.

A destructive power swirled in between the Gigatitan's carapace. It slashed and tore everything that was within the blast range, including the carapace. It dug right in.

The monster screeched, writhing its huge body in agony. The explosive power of the blast drove into the Gigatitan's carapace. It became torn up. It rushed further in. It torpedoed towards the monster's critical point. Then it stopped. It was just two inches short of cracking the shell. That was how much thickness was left. The penetrating power dissipated.

Javier’s eyes widened in disbelief. At the same time, a repulsive power worked from his shoulder, which was the consequence of failing to drive into the shell perfectly.

The influence of the explosive power rushed back to him from the small opening he had dug with his mana blast.

Javier’s sword bounced off. His body jerked violently, and the right shoulder, which gripped the sword, opened wide. The same thing happened to the leg on the other side. His left hand that was grabbing the appendicular of the Gigatitan relaxed by reflex. His hand fell loose, and his body started to fall from the sky. No, he was thrown into the ground because of the repulsive power.

Shoot...

Javier clenched his teeth. He would be hitting the ground soon. That was when it hit him why his blast had failed, why the weak spot of the Gigatitan couldn’t be penetrated. He understood why he lacked the power to blast the said part.

Every condition was perfect. The targeted area and angle were precise. But I lacked one thing. Strength. I must have grown tired without realizing it.

Javier’s suspicions were right. In the first place, Lloyd had run the mana blast simulation with the greatest amount of energy Javier could harness. So, the condition to penetrate the monster’s weak spot would be to use the mana blast with all the power he had.

That was the key to crushing its weakness. He failed to make it happen, and the reason was simple.

I didn’t know my stamina was this bad.

He had been dealing with the Gigatitan for over twenty minutes all by himself, running around without a second of break. He sprinted, turned, leaped, and wielded his sword. Countless rocks hit him, the series of shockwaves making his stomach churn too many times to count.

He fought alone, again and again, enduring the painful agony and damage. As such, it was natural that the fight would take a toll on him.

But that can't be an excuse.

Javier tightened the grip of his sword. He couldn't give up after failing once.

Master Lloyd had trusted me.

Lloyd had taught Javier the weak spot. That wasn't all. His young master was risking himself and keeping the Gigatitan distracted from him so that he could attack its weak spot. So, he had to return the trust he was given. He wanted to.

So, just once more!

Javier turned his body in the air right before he hit the ground. His two feet landed safely on the ground, crushing the earth beneath them. Then he leaped high.

His body shot up in between the crumbling rocks. There was an intense light emitting from his eyes, which were fixed only at one point. The weak spot he had failed to penetrate by two inches.

Just one more thrust!

Javier would be able to penetrate the shell accurately. Then, he would finally pierce the monster's heart which was protected by a shell.

One more time!

Just then, a giant forearm swept over Javier. Javier, who immediately noticed the danger, wielded his sword, but it was too late. His sword and its forearm clashed, creating several fierce sparks. His sword was pushed away and his body was sent flying down. The onrush of force proved to be indomitable, and it was extremely overpowering.

Javier was catapulted into the air even when he was just brushed by the mighty blow of the Gigatitan's forearm. With his consciousness lost, Javier plummeted to the ground like a kite with a cut string. His limp body passed by the coastal rocks and took a nosedive into the shore.

Lloyd let out a shriek as he saw what had happened.

Is he dead?

His heart sank. He had worked so hard to keep him alive. He risked so much danger he couldn't afford.

He can't die like that!

His heart raced. It felt like the blood in his body was cooling down. But the situation was growing worse.

The Gigatitan roared after knocking Javier out with its forearm. It moved on, unobstructed. It moved toward the sandy beach where Javier was plunged into. This only meant one thing.

That monster is definitely trying to kill him.

Though he had failed, he almost succeeded in piercing its weak spot with one blow and had he succeeded in his ruthless second attempt, Javier would have made it.

For that reason... It currently considers Javier as its greatest threat. That's why it's trying to get rid of him.

Lloyd didn't know how badly injured Javier was. He wasn't even sure if he was still breathing. But if he was alive... The monster intended to ensure that he was dead.

No. I must stop him.

Lloyd gulped dryly and then hurriedly tapped Ppodong's back.

"Ppodong! Run! You can do it!"

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Ppodong must have been thinking the same as he watched the same scene. He ran at full speed when he was urged by Lloyd. The cart rattled more violently as Ppodong zoomed toward the head of the Gigatitan. Lloyd was creating a ruckus in the open area, but the monster didn’t even turn around.

Dammit!

It looked like it had grown out of the mermaid statue. It looked like killing Javier should come first before dealing with the mermaid. In other words, the attention that was originally focused on the statue had completely shifted to Javier.

What should I do?

Lloyd racked his brain. He could only come up with one conclusion.

“Ppodong! We need to save Javier first! Here we go!”

“Ppodong!”

“Then I’ll cut this rope now, okay?!”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Lloyd lifted his shovel and wielded it. The rope that connected the cart to Ppodong fluctuated when Lloyd hit it with his shovel. He brandished it several more times.

“Come on! Rip now! Argh!”

After several strikes, the rope began to tear. At last, it was fully torn. The cart loaded with the mermaid statue was left behind when the rope tore. This made Ppodong’s movement lighter and faster.

“Let’s go! We should be faster than the Gigatitan!”

“Ppo-do-do-dong!”

Ppodong’s speed increased now that the load was off. He ran faster than the Gigatitan. He jumped over rocks, got down the cliffs like a gust of wind, and cut across the beach. Javier was lying limp on the beach, his body swaying by the waves. Lloyd rushed on his way. Hanging beside Ppodong’s side, Lloyd stretched out his hand and grabbed Javier’s sleeves.

“Got him!”

He then gave a strong pull and got Javier lying on Ppodong’s back. Javier was still unconscious. First, Lloyd checked if he was breathing.

“He’s alive...!”

“Ppodong!”

Thankfully, Javier was breathing. But it didn’t look like he fractured something. This was a great miracle, given the impact he had received. Or maybe it’s the work of his power.

He must have distributed the impact of the forearm with his sword when it struck him. He’s alive because he avoided the full blow. What a guy, really.

He was still unconscious, but Lloyd felt relieved. Since he wasn’t injured very much, he could only get some rest.

It’s going to be hard just for a few days, but he’ll be alright since he has the triple circle!

It was the same case when he fought against the wild ants. His recuperation was fast. So it’d probably be the same thing today.

“So, let’s get out of here. Ppodong! Run!”

Lloyd thought that he had done his part. Javier was now lying unconscious, so Lloyd no longer wanted to deal with that skyscraper-sized monster.

I have stalled for over thirty minutes already. The city must have had enough time to fight against the giant lobster. Now, I just have to run and hide until things calm down a bit.

Lloyd would simply need to nurse Javier from time to time, and he'd get what he owed from the count after this disaster was kept in check. Then, they would return to the Frontera barony. Thinking such, Lloyd tapped Ppodong's back.

"Let's get out of the beach, Ppodong. Go into the woods!"

That seemed like a smart choice because of the thick woods that would hide their bodies.

However...

"Ppo-do-dong. Ppodong...!" Ppodong panted, letting out strange noises.

Lloyd's heart sank.

"Ppodong?"

"Ppo-do-dong?"

"Wait, are you exhausted?"

"Ppo-do-dong..."

He did notice that Ppodong had slowed down a while ago. The sand seemed to be the cause behind the slow down, but now, Lloyd noticed that Ppodong's breathing had gotten harsher.

He's tired.

It was obvious why. Ppodong had been sprinting while he carried the huge cart and the mermaid statue. Just a while ago, he gave all of his strength to get to Javier before the Gigatitan could. Ppodong was a summoning partner, and yet, it was obvious that he would get tired as he was an animal as well. Making things worse, the Gigatitan wasn't slowing down as it came in his direction!

Dammit!

Lloyd gritted his teeth.

I just had to run. That was it.

However, running away was impossible now. Ppodong's breathing was growing raspy with every moment. His speed was slowing down, and Lloyd could feel it. On the other hand, the Gigatitan was striding across the land as it closed in on them in its mantis shrimp gait, without any sense of fatigue.

At this rate, we'll be caught in a few minutes.

At most, he had five minutes. A feeling of dread began to flood his heart. Lloyd quickly racked his head.

What should I do?

He ran through all the scenarios that he could think of.

Make Bangul giant and get on her back. Use the volcanic blast skill to compromise the vision and run. Make Hamang drink seawater and run toward the sea.

Lloyd came up with various potential plans, but he shook his head at all of them.

No. It's going to fail.

Bangul was only fast when she used the volcanic blast. Her slithering speed was slow because of her short and chubby physique. Even if she could move on the water like a banana boat, she'd be slower than the Gigatitan.

It was the same for Hamang.

I don't have any way to escape. I can't get out of this situation. The monster will catch up to us if I don't give up Javier.

A pessimistic thought intruded his mind. Lloyd's gaze traveled to Javier, who was still unconscious.

Should I leave him?

He pondered for a second. At this very moment, what the Gigatitan wanted was Javier. So abandoning him would allow Lloyd to get out of this place safely. He was sure about that. But he shook his head.

Then Javier will die. I can't let that happen.

Javier was set to become a sword master and protect him. So, losing Javier in a place like this would be a serious loss for him.

I mean, abandoning him is the right choice for my safety at this moment… No. I can't be shortsighted. My gut is telling me that it's a terrible choice.

He didn't want to miss out in the future by making a myopic judgment at the moment. When he thought that way, there was only one method left.

The most doable plan looks like exchanging roles.

Lloyd, who had captured their attention, and Javier, who targeted the vulnerabilities, found it was the moment to swap roles.

Shoot! This is why I told him we should hide instead of fighting!

Lloyd clenched his teeth. Overcome with annoyance, Lloyd slapped Javier's cheek just once. He opened the system window to equip himself with the weapon needed to fight against the Gigatitan.

Right now, I stand zero chance of winning. The only way for me to leave damage on it is to hit the same hole Javier had almost bored with his mana blast.

The only way for him to leave a precise attack on the Gigatitan was the mana blast.

I need at least three circles to use the blast.

Two circles for the collision. One circle to protect the heart from the impact. So, Lloyd decided to make the triple circles.

Let's give it a try. I have enough RP.

Determined, Lloyd selected the skill menu window. The Asrahan Core Technique, the skill he had created in the dark ant cave that plunged him into despair… The time had finally come to upgrade it into a triple circle.

Chapter 74: Triple Circle (1)

“Grrr!”

Tremble! A loud roar thundered in the air, shaking the ground. Each time it happened, a shadow reflecting against the moon closed in on them. There was a giant silhouette rushing toward them as it blanketed the moonlight and the night sky.

The Gigatitan bellowed as it ran, and Ppodong rushed ahead of it. Ppodong heaved a heavy sigh and took each step forward, his leg feeling heavy. But the distance between the Gigatitan and Ppodong was gradually narrowing. Each time the monster’s leg moved in a queue, its thunderous roaring came closer to him.

We don’t have much time. Lloyd quickly glanced behind. At most, he had three minutes. If he was lucky, he had five.

After that, Ppodong will be caught by the monster. He and Javier wouldn’t be safe, either. Lloyd’s gaze sharpened. Skill window. The Asrahan Core Technique. He opened the skill menu and selected the Asrahan Core Technique. The skill information appeared in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Double Circle Lv. 4]

[Mana amplified to: 260%]

[Skill Options: ① Energizer / ② Latent Power Surge / ③ Power Saving Mode]

[Current RP: 1901]

Great. He had spent quite a lot of RP to level up the Asrahan Core Technique back at the ant cave. And so, he was able to advance to double circle level one. Afterward, he leveled up once again when he filled the ice in the seokbinggo back at the orc village. Finally, after some continuous training in his skills from time to time, he was able to reach the fourth level.

Whew... I hope I have enough RP. Lloyd checked his remaining RP. 1901. He had a feeling that he would need more.

500 RP was enough for me to quickly advance in the past, but now, it isn't going to cut it. He needed to spend a whopping 190 RP just to level up. However, his RP usage would continue to rise as he leveled up more.

Let's just give it a try anyway. There's no other way around it. As such, Lloyd selected the menu below the skill window to level up his Asrahan Core Technique into a triple circle.

[Would you like to invest your RP in the Asrahan Core Technique?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes. He didn't have any time to hesitate now. Lloyd nodded right away.

Ding Dong!

[Skill Level Up!]

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Double Circle Lv. 5]

[Mana amplified to: 280%]

[Current RP: 1711]

Hmm... I've got a bad feeling about this. Several pieces of information appeared in front of him. Lloyd opened and closed his fist a few times as he read them. He quickly calculated the numbers he saw in his head.

I leveled up once, and now I need 30 more RP to level up again. At this rate, hmm... I might need more RP. He had a bad feeling about it. Regardless, the situation didn’t change at all. He still needed to ramp up his number of circles to three, which required him to level up once more after reaching double circle level 10.

The problem was that he might be a tad short on RP. If the demanded RP continues to go up like this... I might lack 51 RP in the last stage. But he didn’t have any means to check that in advance. No, there was actually just one way, and it was to continue to level up his skills.

I’ve already begun. I can’t back out now. Don’t know how it will end, but we’ll see! Lloyd was already in a do-or-die situation. Determined, he splurged his RP in the skill. The level of the Asrahan Core Technique continued to go up.

From level five to six. From level seven to eight... From level nine to ten... And the limit was reached.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Level Up!]

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Double Circle Lv. 10]

[Required RP to level up: 370]

[Current RP: 319]

“Tsk,” Lloyd clicked his tongue. His ominous gut feelings were never wrong and was proven correct as expected. The predictions he had made in advance turned out to be perfectly accurate.

Whew... Is this for real? The problem was that it was real. Resentment swelled over him.

I had worked so hard to collect RP until now. He had collected every single RP like a wretched miser. He increased his likeability with Javier, the baron couple, and the others, scraping up whatever he could save. He set out to amass various construction projects and accomplishments to earn large amounts of bonus RP.

Each time, a strong impulse to use the RP took over him. But he held back, convincing himself that a day would come where he truly needed it. He believed the asset would become a powerful weapon for him. So, he had worked hard and saved as though he was putting a portion of his income in a 10 or 20-year retirement plan or collecting coupons for a restaurant.

And yet, I don't have enough. Truly, Lloyd thought that it was unfair. But he knew that it wasn't the time to seethe in resentment.

Roar! Grrrr!

Lloyd noticed that the distance between himself and the Gigatitan had narrowed once again. On the other hand, Ppodong was running slower than a while ago. He was getting fatigued. Lloyd had to come up with a plan. His half-baked double circle level 10 wouldn't cut it.

I must level it up to a triple circle. That's how I'll be able to use the mana blast! It was the only possible way for him to drive into the thick carapace of the Gigatitan, and in order for him to make that happen...

RP! I need RP! Now! Lloyd racked his brain in a frenzy. He went over every possible option he had, and at last, he arrived at one conclusion. The young master lifted his hand up with all his might. His palm forcefully slapped Javier, who was unconscious, across the cheek. Slap!

Lloyd shouted, "Hey, you! Wake up!"

Slap! Slap! He threw more blows. And this time, he grabbed Javier's collar and shook.

"Wake up! Open your eyes!"

Slap! Slaaap! Lloyd continued slapping one spot on Javier's face. The knight's cheek was flushed red. A few more slaps finally got Javier to squint his eyes open.

"Uhm..."

Javier frowned as if he was in pain. Bemused, he gazed at Lloyd's side.

"Master... Lloyd?"

His voice was soft and feeble. Lloyd's face beamed at once. A welcoming, grateful expression swept over his face.

"Yes, it's me. Do you recognize me?"

"Yes, a little... Argh."

Javier fell back when he tried to rise himself up, panting heavily.

"Don't move."

Lloyd quickly held out his hands and helped Javier lie back down. Then, he tapped the man, who was still harshly panting, on his shoulder.

"You're badly hurt."

"But, Master Lloyd, I..."

"I know," Lloyd said, "that you wish to keep fighting."

"Yes, so I must…"

"No, no. Rest."

"Master Lloyd?"

"If you try to fight now, you're going to die. Do you really want that to happen?"

“Obviously I do. If I don’t do anything, a lot of people will get hurt.”

“What about me? Don’t you care that I’ll be in grief?”

“Excuse me...?”

Javier flinched. Lloyd smiled bitterly.

“If I lose you, I’ll be like an eagle with broken wings.”

“Master Lloyd?”

“To be honest, I don’t want to lose you. I hate to see you overwork yourself like this and try to sacrifice yourself.”

“…….”

“So from now on, fight only for me.”

“But, Master Lloyd, right now…”

“Leave it to me. I’ll pick up the fight from here.”

“Master Lloyd?”

“Do you trust me?”

“I...” Javier trailed off.

“I asked if you trust me.”

This time, Javier was silent. Javier’s eyes traveled up to him, which seemed to be asking him if Lloyd was serious. Lloyd received the gaze with nonchalance. Instead of replying back with words, he simply closed his lips and answered with silence. With a solemn and heavy gaze, Javier nodded.

“Master Lloyd...”

Javier seemed to have felt Lloyd’s sincerity as well. His anxious eyes calmed down. The tension all over his body relaxed. Relieved, he heaved a sigh.

“Then, I will trust you... Master Lloyd...”

“Yes, rest.”

“Yes, Master Lloyd...”

Javier’s eyes closed, and he started to breathe with ease. As his muscles began to relax, Javier passed out again. At the same time, the message Lloyd anxiously waited for floated in front of his eyes. Ding Dong.

[Javier Asrahan wholeheartedly trusts your decision and is now relieved.]

[Javier Asrahan is deeply touched by your willingness to fight for a great cause.]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by four points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: +5]

[You have earned 72 RP by improving relationships with main characters.]

[Current RP: 391]

[Your intimacy level with Javier Asrahan has increased from <Everyday Strangers> to <Average Regard>.]

[You have earned 25 RP as a bonus for the upgrade.]

[Current RP: 416]

Awesome! Lloyd clenched his fists. His operation to cash out RP on the spot worked.

Whew, I have goosebumps all over my body. Lloyd just barely woke Javier up, and the knight was close to falling back unconscious. He didn't have much time left.

That was why he threw every cringey word and expression he could think of to Javier before he passed out again. He had to give everything to hold himself back from vomiting as he spewed those words. The toe-curling cheesiness affected every fiber of his being, but he had to endure it.

But it paid off in the end. Javier completely bought the sugarcoated words Lloyd had thrown, saying that he trusted him before heroically passing out.

Lloyd had improved his likeability with Javier, and not only that... I received a sum of 97 RP too. His last hurdle was upgrading to a triple circle. He was held back by his lack of RP earlier, but now, he had enough.

Lloyd opened his skill window and went on to spend his RP without any hesitation. The message he had waited for appeared in front of him. Ding Dong.

[Skill Class Level Up!]

This is what I'm talking about! Lloyd cheered in his head. He felt like he had overcome another challenge. He read through the message that popped in front of him.

[Your Asrahan Core Technique class has been increased to <Triple>.]

[Your optional skills have improved following the increase of skill class.]

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Triple Circle Lv. 1]

[Skill Option 1: Energizer - Maximizes the efficiency of the double circle. You can move for 20 minutes without experiencing fatigue. (Limit: You can only use this twice per day.)]

[Skill Option 2: Latent Power Surge - Drives the amplification of the circle to its far limit. You can triple your mana amplification for 30 seconds. However, after one use, you will be drained of all energy, and you will not be able to use the Asrahan Core Technique for a day. (Limit: You can only use this once per day.)]

[Skill Option 3: Power Saving Mode - Even in extreme exhaustion, you can use the Asrahan Core Technique, albeit weakly. The mana amplification rate is fixed at 25% at this state.]

[Current RP: 46]

Wow. This is amazing. Lloyd opened his eyes wide. The amplification rate of the technique soared to 500%. As if to serve as evidence, a new ring was formed around his heart.

Ziiing! A third circle wrapped his heart around, and it began to resonate and rotate around the two circles. The result was marvelous.

Thud! Thuud! His heart started to pound with unprecedented strength. Blood coursed through his blood vessels at an abnormally high speed.

That wasn't all. His breathing felt different as well. One breath filled his muscles with strength, even when he was just breathing like he always did. It was like he was constantly taking in steroids through the air!

This is absolutely nuts. Is this the power of the triple circle? Lloyd's body felt the massive difference of a circle. And my optional skills have improved as well. The three skills in his options have comprehensively upgraded. The Energizer could last and happen twice more. The Latent Power Surge could last 10 more seconds. The amplification rate jumped five-fold. The same was true for the Power Saving Mode.

It has upped from 10% to 25%. It was a 15% bump he could utilize even when he was completely drained of energy. That difference would become the deciding factor between life and death during critical moments. That wasn’t the end of his upgrades. There was something else that truly amazed him.

Ding Dong. The notification noise rang in his ears once more. Soon after, a completely unexpected message popped in front of him.

[A new skill option has been made available following your change in skill class.]

[Skill Option 4: Circle Shift - Allows you to adjust each of your circle’s rotation per minute (RPM) in six stages (1-6) and fixedly maintain it. This option will significantly help novices in using the mana blast.]

What is this... The message was a total surprise. A new opportunity he had never expected surfaced out of nowhere. Lloyd’s eyes filled with excitement for his future success as he read them.

Chapter 75: Triple Circle (2)

What in the world is this... Lloyd opened his eyes wide. A new fourth optional skill? Circle shift? This was a reward Lloyd had never even dreamed of. The description of the skill seemed a bit familiar.

Rotation per minute? RPM? Gear from one to six? It looked like an explanation of an automatic transmission, and Lloyd thought he'd be able to adjust the rotation speed of the circle just like how he could change a car's gears.

Moreover, it's all separate. I can individually adjust the three circles.

Thump. Thump. His heart pounded as he read the skill description once again. He couldn't help himself. It was that amazing.

This is massive. Controlling the rotation power of the circles was difficult. Furthermore, what was more difficult was keeping a consistent, desired rotation speed for as long as he wanted.

To put it simply, rotating a mana circle around his heart was similar to twirling a large ring on his finger. Anyone could rotate the ring using one's finger, and the same went for controlling the rotation speed. However, keeping the rotation at a perfectly equal speed was a challenge. Almost an impossible challenge.

Of course. One can make it rotate at a similar speed, but perfect means keeping it exactly down to the millisecond without losing consistency. But now, with the circle shift made available, Lloyd was able to consistently adjust each of his three circles all at a different speed.

This optional skill is just out of this world. Lloyd gulped dryly. Until a while ago, he only had two circles. And so, he knew very well how tough it was to rotate several circles at differing speeds. Making that happen with two circles was more complex than twirling two rings on each of his hands at different speeds. It would be even harder now that he had three circles.

It’ll be like adding a ring on my ankle while keeping the two rings on my hands. And controlling each of them separately? That alone was beyond the scope of the skill. It almost bordered on a circus trick.

That was why Lloyd considered Javier a monster. He freely controlled the circles as soon as he created them. B*ut now, I can do it too.* He’d certainly be rougher and less refined than Javier. It would be impossible to adjust the power beyond the six stages.

Regardless, this is good enough. Controlling the gear through the circle shift and adjusting the rotation power using the gears...

Thanks to it, Lloyd managed to use the mana blast without going through any difficult training. I must make the circles collide to use the mana blast. But the circles held a repulsive force that pushed each other away. They were like two opposing poles of a magnet. And so, creating contact was extremely difficult.

Offsetting such repulsive power required high-speed rotation of the mana circles. But at the same time, the job required a more detailed and meticulous process than simply increasing the rotation speed.

I must have two circles rotate exactly at an accurate proportion. The rotation number was two to three, I think. Lloyd looked back on what had happened some time ago. The two to three rotation ratio... It was something Javier had off-handedly mentioned to him. He had said that it was the most ideal condition for collision. Lloyd remembered that Javier told him this, saying that he should refer to the ratio when he gets another circle. Just then…

“Grrrrrr!”

Something roared from behind. No, it came from above. Astonished, Lloyd lifted his head and looked up. He couldn’t see the night sky. Instead, he saw the mammoth body of the Gigatitan. This only meant one thing.

It’s here already?! Slam! Boooom! The Gigatitan banged the ground with its foreleg, crushing the spot where Ppodong stood just five seconds ago.

This is bad, really. Lloyd gulped dryly. He was out of time.

Grabbing onto Ppodong's ear, he yelled, "Ppodong!"

"P-Ppodong!"

Pant! Pant!

"Hey, you! You can run away without me, right?!"

"Ppodong!"

"Yes! A little more! I'm going to knock him out with one hit! So hold up until then! Okay?"

"P-Ppodong! Huff, huff!"

Ppodong nodded as he panted for air. Lloyd leaped from Ppodong's back. Fwoosh! His body floated in the air, and Ppodong's chubby back became far at once. It seemed his pace grew a bit faster because Lloyd's weight was off him. Just then, the pillar-like leg of the Gigatitan rushed from behind like greased lightning. Fwoosh!

Lloyd sucked in his breath. His body was still in the air as it was falling, and the leg of the monster charged fast at him. Lloyd braced himself for the impact.

Bam! He crashed against the leg of the monster like he was hit by a pillar. At that instant, Lloyd opened his arms wide and hugged its leg, catching on to the little protrusions of its shell. He was able to stay dangled without falling off, though his stomach churned a bit.

Urgh! The impact hit Lloyd right in the gut, and he could barely breathe from the intense pain. However, Lloyd clenched his teeth.

Goodness, it's not like I'm a star of an action movie or something! Lloyd stretched his hand out as he cursed his current situation. He grabbed on the protrusion above and started to crawl up as if he was rock climbing. Thankfully, he had enough stamina because of the triple circle.

Hundreds of yards stretched before him until he got up to its body. Making things worse, it continued to move nonstop. Even in such an unfavorable circumstance, Lloyd managed to quickly move like a cockroach crawling on top of a sink.

Faster! Quickly! He didn't have much time. The Gigatitan had almost caught up with Ppodong. If I'm late, Ppodong and Javier will be done for. And at last, Lloyd succeeded in going up the back shell of the monster. He rushed toward the direction of its head.

As he ran, he hastily practiced using the mana blast. I don't have many chances. I must succeed with one try. Basketball, soccer, dancing, swimming, and even walking required some practice to be proficient. It went without saying how much practice would be needed for the mana blast, which was one of the advanced skills in the Asrahan Core Technique.

The rotation ratio is two to three, right? Lloyd recalled Javier's advice and activated the Circle Shift he had just earned.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 4: Circle Shift has been activated.]

Since I'm just practicing, the gear should be set in one, two, and three. The gear set up was complete, and the three circles reacted instantly.

[The Alpha circle is set to gear 1. Fixed at RPM 1,000.]

[The Beta circle is set to gear 2. Fixed at RPM 2,000.]

[The Gamma circle is set to gear 3. Fixed at RPM 3,000.]

Ziiing...! The three circles rotated according to each of its powers.

Between them, the second and third circle showed an unusual reaction. He didn't have to push the two to collide. They automatically started to draw near.

Eh?! He jumped out of his skin and moved the first circle, hurriedly wrapping it around his heart, which was going at 1,000 RPM. The collision took place afterward. Kaboom! The Beta circle and Gamma circle collided around the heart.

"…!"

This explosive pressure was something Lloyd had never experienced before. A destructive power rushed through him from the inside and hit his heart, which was wrapped with the Alpha circle.

"Argh!"

He wondered if this was what it felt like to have a seizure. Lloyd collapsed on the ground as he clasped his heart and stopped running. He quickly moved his two arms to carry the shovel hung around his back. Then, he dug into the ground and sent the destructive power to the shovel.

Crash! The mana blast shot out of the flat shovel, hitting the back shell of the Gigatitan. The impact sent Lloyd 150 feet in the air.

"Ack!"

He almost fell from its shell. Closely recovering the balance, he landed safely on the monster's back and clenched his shovel hard.

It's working. I succeeded. He successfully used the mana blast with his first attempt. No, it was more than just successful. I didn't have to collide the circles by design. I just had to set the RPM according to the golden ratio, and the two collided on their own.

It only meant one thing. He would be able to use the mana blast whenever he wanted.

Let's go! Lloyd jumped to his feet, feeling confident, and ran along its back. He neared the area near carapaces 11 and 12, where its weak spot would be. When he got there, it was time for him to do acrobatics.

"Huff! Huff!"

Lloyd crawled down to its side from the back of the Gigatitan and latched on to its carapace. Come on, it's not like I'm going through military training right now! The carapace was vast and wide, with a lot of thorns here and there. Lloyd grabbed one of them. And, dangling in the air, he grabbed the next one. He continued to move forward just like that.

Above him were the carapace and thorns. Hundreds of feet down him was the ground. Don't look down. He feared he'd get dizzy if he did so.

Fixing his gaze above, Lloyd dutifully moved from one thorn to another, and he approached the monster's fatal flaw like a mosquito in the summer secretly trying to latch onto a human body for blood. And at last, he arrived at the weak spot.

That's it. The connecting part between carapaces 11 and 12. Lloyd saw the hole in between. It was about 20 inches in diameter, and the dent was formed in the direction of the monster's head.

It's the place Javier hit with the maba blast. Lloyd tightened the grip around his shovel. He just needed to pierce into this area one more time. He collected his breath and fixed his shovel head exactly at the same angle as Javier did.

It needs to be done in one try. With such resolution in mind, he rotated his circles and set the speed using the Circle Shift. Three, four, and six.

Ziiing...! The circles reacted as soon as he activated the skill. The RPM was set at 3,000, 4,000, and 6,000 for each. Each of them went around this time much more fiercely.

Lloyd wrapped his heart with the Alpha circle with 3,000 RPM. The last step is the collision. Lloyd needed to immediately extract the power after the Beta circle with 4,000 RPM and Gamma circle with 6,000 RPM collided together.

He opened the path of the mana that travels to his right hand, ready to send the explosive power to the shovel. Ziiing! The Beta and Gamma circles resonated, and each narrowed in harmony. The collision would happen soon. Lloyd waited for it to take place with his shovel aimed. It was just at that moment.

Grrrrrr! The Gigatitan let out a ferocious roar. It stopped charging ahead, letting go of Ppodong when it almost caught him. Instead, it drove into the ground with its club-like forearms. But before they hit the surface, it simply curled up the legs, and the rocks that crashed against the impact were sent catapulting in every direction.

The rocks flew up, each of them damaging and fatal. It was like the area between the carapaces 11 and 12 were bombarded with explosives. Booom! Boom!

Lloyd's eyes were on stalks as he got ready for the mana blast. It occurred to him that the monster might have noticed there was an enemy approaching its weak spot. It appeared so, indeed. That was the only reason why it would smash rocks in his direction.

Bam!

"…!"

Just then, a huge force knocked Lloyd's head. His head shook violently, and his upper torso bounced terribly. Blood spattered as his head was shoved to the side by the blow.

Was I hit? A sense of daze overcame him. He felt like time had frozen around him. Amid such circumstances, Lloyd's eyes moved, and they caught a rock that was falling to the ground. It was a little larger than a fist. It had blood on its side, which was smeared after it hit its head.

I can't fail... now... The mana blast. He wanted to succeed. He had boasted to Javier that he'd succeed. However, the strength in his grip loosened, and he let go of the protrusion he was grabbing with his left hand. His body then started to take a nosedive to the ground. A free fall.

No, I can't let that happen. Lloyd's eyes traveled up. Time still seemed to have slowed down. And in such slowness, the carapace of the Gigatitan was slowly growing distant. There, he saw the closely bored hole that seemed strangely visible.

One more time. He just needed to stab it once. Not even twice, just once. Just once, and nothing more. Let's stab it. Rotate the mana circles. Use the Circle Shift. Keep the ratio Javier taught me... two to three...

Lloyd murmured unconsciously. The concussion was taking over his consciousness, and only one piece of memory was stuck in his head. Two to three. The mana circle rotation had to be kept at a ratio of two to three, and it had to be maintained when it collided.

Two to three... right before he lost consciousness... The Circle Shift was activated. It was the working of Lloyd's stubborn determination. There were no more detailed adjustments. Just two to three.

Reiterating the words over and over again in his head, Lloyd adjusted the gear out of his instinct. The Alpha circle was set to gear two, and the Beta and Gamma circles were set to gear three.

They rotated in a ferocious manner. Ziiiiing! With the Alpha circle at its center, the rest of them rotated. The three circles reverberated in 2:3 proportion. They drew near at a great speed as they reverberated. There wasn't a circle that protected the heart. The three of them collided altogether. At that moment, Lloyd, losing consciousness, stretched out his metal shovel the way his body remembered.

Slam! A massive destructive force discharged out of it with a loud noise. It dug into the Gigatitan's weak spot, ruining the muscle tissues and internal organs protected by its carapace. But the force continued to move. It penetrated. It charged. It smashed every bit of the organs that lay in its way. Then, it blasted and pierced the carapace.

Just like that, the force that was like a tsunami penetrated from the stomach to the back in one stroke. Twack! The marvelous blow was created out of Lloyd's determination and efforts. For the first time in history, a triple mana blast shot out.

Chapter 76: A Miracle or an Opportunity? (1)

Crash! A massive force burst out like a powerful wave. It was the first triple circle mana blast in history. The force cut across everything that stood in its way as it rushed forward.

Grrr!! The Gigatitan let out a painful groan for the first time, and its monstrous body was penetrated at once.

The chitin and dense layers, which were hard on their own, had comprised the carapace shell from a molecular level. Then the honeycomb structure that was overlapped in three layers interwoven together one more time. So in short, its thickness and sturdiness was beyond extraordinary.

And that ridiculous structure was over three feet thick, so the monster's shell was a highly advanced natural bulletproof shield that was miles better than kevlar fibers or a composite armor. However, despite such defensive layers, it was useless against the triple circle mana blast.

Wham! The three-layered honeycomb structure cracked. The interwoven molecules melted.

The blazing heat of the mana blast forcibly penetrated the carapace shell that was three-foot thick. The tissue inside the sturdy and tough shell was relatively weak. The powerful storm of the force shoved its way, shattering and tearing every tissue there.

Tear! The first that got penetrated was the muscle tissues right inside the carapace. When the jellylike muscle tissues were exposed to high temperatures, the protein heated up, and the moisture within the tissues boiled away. It caused extensive damage to the surrounding tissues.

And yet, the blast's force was not diminished. It kept pushing forward, and this time, it hit the internal organs. Crack! The dorsal nerve cord that ran along its lower body like a spine was pierced through. It snapped, and the huge nerve tissue let out a fatal cry.

The same thing took place with the tissues behind it. The coiled heart just above the dorsal nerve cord was penetrated, as well as its lungs which provided oxygen to its vast body. A portion of the kidney that was bigger than a house and its hormone glands, the muscle tissues on its back, and finally, the three-foot thick sturdy back shell was smashed to pieces. They were melted and ripped apart. They were shattered and penetrated.

Kaboom! The violent and rough force of fire burst through the back of the monster. Shredded strands and pieces of internal organs spurted out in all directions like fireworks as the mana blast continued to charge forward.

Then, they fell down like rain. Lloyd rained down with them. He was sinking into a state of total unconsciousness as he fell.

I'm tired... The distance between the carapace and the ground was about 200 yards, and Lloyd plummeted to the ground like a kite with a cut tail. He could neither balance himself nor brace for an impact. No, he didn't have the mind to. Everything felt numb in his head. It all felt like a dream. Lloyd's looked straight ahead with a vague gaze. The bottom of the coastal cliff clogged up with gray rocks came fast into his view.

'…….'

He wouldn't be safe if his body continued to plummet down. That was his last thought before Lloyd passed out. His body, on the other hand, continued to fall. But right before he hit the ground, Lloyd's body became buried under fluffy hair.

"Ppodong!"

Plop! Ppodong, who zoomed to his side just in time, caught Lloyd with his fluffy and chubby back. The thick and soft bed of hair allowed Lloyd to remain uninjured, and he was saved from being bounced off to the ground. But Ppodong couldn't smile in satisfaction for his feat or be relieved for catching Lloyd. It wasn't the time to laugh or be relieved.

"Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!"

Pant! Pant! Instead of being relieved, Ppodong strove to run faster, his breath getting shorter as he ran. Just then, a giant shadow flooded behind Ppodong. Grrrr...!

Bam! Then, Ppodong heard a loud bang along with a roar near the rocks he had passed by earlier. More rocks smashed to pieces, and the blaring noise of breaking rocks mingled with the death throes of the dying monster.

Grrrrrrrrrr! It was the noise the Gigatitan made as it violently moved. The connecting ligament between carapaces 11 and 12 held a weak spot, and a large hole was bored through it. A part of the dorsal nerve cord was snapped, and the heart and respiratory organs burst had out.

The critical hit would inevitably kill the monster. Despite that, the monster stubbornly struggled, and with an amazing show of stamina, life, and savageness, it delayed its inescapable death by a few seconds. Thus, it was going berserk, squeezing out every strength left in it as death closed in on it. Madness swept over the monster. It rushed to destroy anything in its sight. The rocks in the coastal cliff and Ppodong rushing ahead of it were all objects to be destroyed.

“Grrrrr!!”

Slam! Crash! The club-like forearms doggedly rained down, and Ppodong hurried all the more. His breathing became short, and his legs gave way. And yet, he continued to run.

He jumped over rocks and moved on, struggling to get as away from the Gigatitan as much as possible. But the monster’s determination was a bit stronger than his speed. Crash!

“Ppo...?”

Its forearm propelled down, blocking the front of Ppodong. Ppodong stopped dead in his tracks in surprise and hurriedly tried slip out through the left side. However, his attempt was blocked again.

Crash! The other forearm blocked his escape route. Ppodong's round eyes swelled with frustration.

"Ppodong?"

There was no way out. His right and rear were blocked with a giant rock. Certainly, Ppodong could climb up the rock, but he wondered if the Gigatitan would sit and wait while he struggled to climb up the rock. The answer was no. There was no way out. Climbing over the rock would get him caught. Therefore, Ppodong thought there was only one method left in him.

"Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong! Hmphh!!"

He glared at the Gigatitan fiercely, revealing his front teeth and growling aloud. The monster's upper torso fell down in the direction of Ppodong. Its wide-opened mouth rushed to his side, and it plunged right onto the ground.

Boooom!

"……!"

Ppodong's buttock flinched hard. A little later, this loyal and chubby summon creature was able to witness a surprising spectacle. Thud... Thud... Amid the splattering of rock powder and dust, Ppodong saw an outline of the giant monster.

But the giant body was not moving. It was neither moving nor breathing. That only meant one thing.

"Ppodong?"

The monster's breathing had stopped. Ppodong's eyes widened as he realized that it was dead. But despite the fact that he was alive and safe, he neither congratulated nor rejoiced in being alive.

Instead, he ran on. He left the monster and ran ahead without halting for a second. His heart was almost bursting with exhaustion, but he went on. He did so for Lloyd on his back.

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong!”

Lloyd was on his back, and his heartbeat was very faint. His breaths were extremely faint. There was no time to waste. He had to save his owner.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Pant! Pant!

“Ppodong!”

Just a little more. Just endure a little longer. Ppodong ran as if he was encouraging both himself and Lloyd. He was heading toward the city district of Cremo, where the chaos had died down. And behind him was the dead body of the giant monster that shone under the moonlight. The disastrous night was drawing to a close.

Six days later. The citizens in the city were starting to recover from the shock of the incident following the death of the monster.

Everyone became one in clearing the broken rocks and restoring the crumbled walls. The injured ones received appropriate treatment in time, and those who lost their homes got help from their neighbors.

But no one forgot what happened that night. They couldn’t forget about it. Everyone could still see a giant silhouette lurking on the ground, immobile and dead, whenever they turned their heads as they cleared the rocks, built walls, or nursed others. The carcass of the Gigatitan. It was left at the coastal cliff as if it was sleeping. People recounted the night of the disaster as they looked at the giant carcass.

At the same time, they were relieved. The disaster was uncalled for, and yet not a single one died despite the frenzied chaos.

“It was a miracle. I never expected that someone come to my rescue this fast when I was flailing my arms in the water.”

A middle-aged woman was getting treated in the infirmary as she spoke.

“It was like thunder. The noise. The boat fluctuated violently, and I felt my whole body turn upside down at that moment. The next thing I know is that I was in the cold water, struggling to swim. Yes. The moment the monster hit the boat, I was sent flying away into the water,” she continued to speak.

“So? How did you get out of the sea?” asked a volunteer.

The other volunteers pricked up their ears. The middle-aged woman smiled faintly and said, “that man held out his hand.”

“That man?”

“I do not know his name. He is the one that summoned the large creature at the plaza last month.”

“Oh, that man. I know him. The snake-like creature belched out a large amount of gas into a large diaper.”

“Yes, him. He didn’t hesitate to come down and help me get out of the water. I wasn’t the only one. He saved an old man who was losing consciousness and sinking and a struggling child beside him. The man saved them all.”

“Woah...”

The volunteers let out a sound of adoration at her story. Another talk was taking place at the central plaza beside the infirmary.

“Hey, did you hear?”

“Hear what?”

“The story about the young man.”

“What nonsense are you talking about? Give me some context.”

“Oh, the young man, you know. The one who boasted around that he’s going to construct something near the shore.”

“Oh! That fellow.”

They were at the plaza that was partly destroyed by the statue that fell from the sky. The workers were chatting as they repaired the place.

“What about the young man?”

“I heard that it was him who put out the fire.”

“Fire? How?”

“He called a summon partner. I heard the chubby creature splashed water over the fire or something.”

“That was how he did it?”

“Yeah. And thanks to him, the fire was put out.”

“Haha, really? Is that possible?”

“The story must be going around because it is possible. There are many witnesses.”

“Is that so?”

Some workers had their ears to the ground as they worked while some shared the stories they’d heard with a glimmer in their eyes. However, the story wasn’t being spread around just in infirmaries and plazas.

“I saw it myself. It is all true.”

“True? Be more specific. Are you saying that Lloyd Frontera bore a large hole into the Gigatitan’s huge body?”

“Yes, he did.”

The conversation was taking place in the meeting room of Count Cremo's study. A follow-up investigation was underway, which was led by an investigative committee.

The commander of post 23, who appeared before the body as a reference, nodded his head. "If you do not mind, may I walk you through what I saw one by one?" he asked.

"Yes, please do."

"Thank you."

The commander collected his breath and continued to speak.

"To be completely honest, I resolved to die that night. The post was smashed, and the Gigatitan had already made inroads to the land. So, I decided to take action."

"What action?" one of the committee members asked.

"I blew up the gunpowder in the post."

"Gunpowder?"

"Yes, I meant to attack the Gigatitan but failed."

"Did it not get hit?"

"No, it wasn't hurt at all. I was on the brink of death, and that man showed up to save me."

"Lloyd Frontera did?"

"Yes, he did." The commander nodded.

His gaze then traveled the people present in the room, from the count to the other members of the committee. Putting more force in his voice, he said, "He saved my life, and not only that, he evacuated me to a safe place and fought head-on."

“Do you mean the Gigatitan?”

“Yes. Technically speaking, the silver-haired knight fought first, and he came later to help.”

The commander of post 23 continued to explain. He shared the story of Javier fighting against the Gigatitan. And how Lloyd drew the monster's attention with the repaired mermaid statue. How Javier passed out, and Lloyd ran and fought back. And lastly, he shared the mysterious explosion that penetrated the Gigatitan’s body.

While the story was being revealed, the count and every committee member clenched their fists, gulped drily, and let out intermittent moans and made sounds of adoration. The story was too impressive to believe right away, but it was impossible to distrust it. That was because of the smoking gun. The huge hole drove into the Gigatitan’s body.

The count asked, “Did you get to take a closer look at how Lloyd Frontera created that hole in its body?”

“No, he was so far away from me, and it was dark. I couldn’t get a closer look at how it was done. However, it was very...”

“Very?”

“It looked like he was shooting a powerful cannon.”

“A cannon?” repeated the count.

“Yes.”

“Hmm, a cannon...”

The count furrowed his brows. None of the cannons he owned managed to penetrate the monster’s shell. And yet, Lloyd had looked like he was shooting a cannon?

“Could it be that he secretly used powerful magic?” the count speculated.

“I have a feeling that he did,” the commander seconded.

“I see. Thank you for sharing the story. Good job. You may go now.”

“Yes, Your Excellency. Thank you,” he said before he went out.

The members of the committee, now left to themselves, chatted with one another. Meanwhile, the count quietly closed his eyes.

Whew... I hope he wakes up soon. The count thought about Lloyd. The very young man who came from the Frontera fiefdom that sat in the corner of the east. The count counted the handful of accomplishments that the young man achieved overnight.

If it weren’t for him, I’d have died that night too. He was telling the truth. It must have been some seconds before the Gigatitan emerged and crushed the statue. At that moment, Lloyd had sliced the anchor ropes of the boats. It was thanks to his actions that the boat the count was on narrowly managed to avoid Gigatitan’s ambush.

There was more. They were able to rescue a countless number of people in the sea because they had an intact sailboat. And not only that, he extinguished the fire that spread in the city district and killed the monster with his hands. I can’t count the amount of debt this city's people and I owe him for this. A sense of gratitude flooded his heart. Please, wake up, dear friend. The count sincerely wished that. Lloyd was the reason that miraculously no one had died in this incident, and the count wished that a miracle would fall on him as well.

After the night of the disaster, Lloyd’s heart stopped. It didn’t beat again. But he wasn’t dead. He was still breathing. His heart stopped, but his breathing continued. This lasted for the past six days.

It was a mystery no one had ever heard of or seen before. As such, the count was absolutely clueless. No, it wasn’t just him. Everyone in the city was left in the dark. Lloyd’s heart, which seemed to have stopped from the impact of the mana blast, was going through something strange, unprecedented, and miraculous.

Chapter 77: A Miracle or an Opportunity? (2)

“I have never seen anything like this before,” said the physician as he gazed up.

There was an evident look of confusion on his face.

“His heart is clearly not beating. It’s only natural for him to die. No, he should have been dead already. But he’s alive. He’s even breathing...”

“Very perfectly, yes?” said the count.

“Yes,” replied the physician.

Lloyd was on the bed, and the physician’s gaze toward him was beyond dismay. It was chaos. It made sense. After all, it only made sense for a person whose heart stopped to die. That was the law of nature. But right in front of the physician was an exception.

At first, he wondered if he was looking at an undead creature. He thought the man was a freshly made zombie. But that wasn’t the case. This patient was well and alive! The count smiled in a wry way.

“Could you please explain some more?”

“Oh, yes, Your Excellency.”

The physician wiped his half-balded head with a handkerchief. Then, he continued to explain, “As you are aware, the heart is an organ that provides blood all over the body. Therefore, there is no pulse when the heart stops. Dead. But this patient is...”

“What is it?”

The count asked.

“His pulse is still there, even when his heart has stopped.”

The physician’s words went on.

“That’s not just it. He’s even breathing. His body has a slight fever, but overall, his body temperature is just normal. So that makes me wonder all the more. Tell me, Your Excellency, has this patient received some sort of magic treatment?”

The count shook his head as he replied, “No, he has never received such a thing.”

Since the Gigatitan wreaked disastrous havoc on the city that night, Lloyd wasn’t able to receive proper treatment after losing consciousness. Perhaps, the more accurate words would be that there was no method to cure him.

After all, no one dared to even try. Lloyd’s current state certainly was a mystery. His heart wasn’t beating. However, his pulse was all right and breathing was even as well. Each time the count brought in physicians, they were flustered, terrified, and shocked after assessing Lloyd. The same thing was happening today.

“Actually, I called other physicians before you came,” confessed the count. “You’re the 11th one to see him.”

“…….”

“Everyone showed the same reaction as you did. No one could find a cure since they couldn’t find the cause. Is that the same with you?” asked the count.

“I...”

“You can be frank with me. This is such a mysterious case, so no one is going to question your capacity.”

“I am sorry.”

“It is as expected, I see.”

“Yes, I have never seen a patient like this before...”

“It’s all right. It must not have been easy to travel all the way here. Thank you for visiting. Go now. The butler will take care of your compensation and reward,” said the count.

“Yes. Please excuse me.”

With that, the 11th physician left the place without any fruit. The count’s face darkened.

No one has found a way to wake him up. Lloyd Frontera was lying on the sick bed. Count Cremo didn’t want to lose him. The night of the disaster. The count wanted to save Lloyd the more he thought back about his debt to his unconscious friend.

Countless people are indebted to this young man. I, too, am indebted to him. If it weren’t for him, I wonder if I’d be fine as I am now.

He wouldn’t have been fine had it not for Lloyd’s determination. The sailboat he was on would have been attacked by the Gigatitan. He would have lost his life along with his only daughter.

The mere thought of it was awful. Shaking off the goosebumps, the count moved his gaze as and asked, “are you not tired?”

“I am fine, Your Excellency.”

The count was gazing at the corner of the ward. There, the wordless silver-haired knight faintly shook his head.

The count’s smile turned more bitter.

“I know that you’ve not healed completely yet.”

“I have enough strength to protect Master Lloyd.”

“How amazing.”

“You exaggerate.”

In actuality, Javier was wearing a splint on his left arm. He wasn't fully healed from the injury the Gigatitan gave him that night with its forearm.

"I am perfectly fine as long as I can use my right arm."

"But, you see, I think you have been staying up four straight days."

"Insomnia is keeping me awake every night," replied Javier.

"Is it the sword-master syndrome?"

"Yes, it looks like it," Javier replied as he nodded.

At first, he had no idea. But thanks to Lloyd, Javier learned somewhat about insomnia that he was having now.

"You are experiencing the syndrome at such a young age. How amazing."

"It is all because of my lord's generosity."

"Do you mean Baron Frontera?"

"Yes," said Javier.

"I envy him."

"Should you want it, I can relay the message to my lord."

"No, don't."

The count waved his hands.

"What a close-minded fellow you are. The baron would be terrified if you told him that. I am not the kind of person who covets someone's aid. Never do I wish to be misunderstood that way. But..."

The count paused, his eyes meaningfully glimmering.

"However this incident gets concluded, it looks like you will be a bit busy."

“I’m not sure what you mean.”

“His Majesty.”

The count continued to talk.

“I am bounded by the duty to report this matter to His Majesty. That is because all the lands of this kingdom are under His grace. And so, I cannot omit the story of your people.”

“……”

Javier faintly nodded. It was obvious. Javier had prevented the Gigatitan from getting into the city. And Lloyd finished the monster after. That was a fact they could never hide, even if they tried.

“His Majesty will show great interest in you. Anyway, what we can hope for right now is for him to wake up without any problems. His Majesty wouldn’t want such a talent to never open his eyes again.”

“The feeling is mutual,” agreed Javier.

“Anyway, I have been ranting. I shall go now. I’ll come here again at this time tomorrow with another physician.”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“If you’re tired, have someone tell me. My knights can protect him just as well.”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Whew, how rigid you are.”

“Thank you.”

That got the count to burst into a fit of laughter. He shot a worried glance at Lloyd the last time before he left. Now, only Lloyd and Javier were left.

“Whew...”

Javier finally let out a sigh, which he had been suppressing. Then, he threw a confused gaze toward the bed. Are you okay, Master Lloyd? Lloyd was lying on the sickbed as if he was sleeping. Javier’s blue eyes grew dismayed as they watched him.

Just then, he recalled the event of the previous day. It must have been after the tenth physician visited. Like the others before him, he wasn’t able to figure out what was going on with Lloyd. The mere sight of it frustrated Javier. And so, when he was left alone with Lloyd, Javier inspected Lloyd’s state in secret. Unlike the physicians, he resorted to using his own mana method. What he found out from it completely shocked him.

He has reached the triple circle stage. Javier could feel it as soon as he injected the mana. There were three circles wrapped around his heart. Lloyd had always remained at the double circle stage, but he had created another circle after passing out from fighting the Gigatitan.

There was something more that was shocking. The three circles are spinning at lightning speed. It was an unimaginable speed. The rotation speed was near the limit of the Asrahan Core Technique. Thanks to it, a powerful mana had completely enveloped Lloyd’s heart.

As such, Javier couldn’t look into the circle. He could neither look how his heart was. There was no way for Javier to guess what was going on in there. His confusion didn’t end there.

The carcass of the Gigatitan I’d seen two days ago was... worse. Javier could clearly recall the gigantic carcass that had fallen off the coastal cliff. He had taken part of the investigation to examine the monster, so he got a vivid view of the fatal wound in its body. There was a giant hole in the weak spot of the monster, the area between carapaces 11 and 12, which Lloyd had mentioned.

Javier knew right away as soon as he saw it. It was the mark of the mana blast. So, he was even more confused. The size and power of that mana blast was... too different from what I’m familiar with. The size was alarming. The power was maddening. A torch and a candle. A cannon and a marble. That was how much of a difference there was between his mana blast and what he saw. The more he observed it, the more awe he felt. Whatever the case was, one thing was for sure. That out-of-this-world mana blast had been used by Lloyd.

How in the world... Javier thought that there was some kind of connection between that massively powerful mana blast and Lloyd's current state. But there was no way for him to figure out the details.

What on earth did you do on that day, Master Lloyd? Javier tossed a gaze that was filled with deep curiosity and worry. But Lloyd didn't answer from the sick bed. The only response was his soft breathing.

Javier continued to watch over Lloyd, and the winter sunlight streaming into the tranquil ward curved in silence. But of course, Javier was absolutely in the dark about something. He had zero idea that an unprecedented miracle was starting to take place inside of Lloyd as he was looking at his young master.

Thump. Thump. Lloyd's heart pounded. No, it was the mana that did. His heart had stopped. It was obvious.

A few days earlier, his heart had received a great shock. It was exposed to the blow of the mana blast without any circle to protect it. What was worse was that it wasn't an ordinary mama blast. It was the product of three circles. And the fierce collision and its power struck Lloyd's heart without any protection.

If it was Javier or any other knight, the blow would have killed him in an instant. But Lloyd was different. He didn't die. His heart didn't burst. The manaheart in his heart didn't explode. The reason was simple. He had no manaheart.

Thump... Thump... Lloyd had never managed to make a manaheart. That was also the case back when he started to prepare for the duel against Sir

Neumann. He had no manaheart. To be accurate, he had no time to create a manaheart. In the first place, it wasn't easy to make. The process demanded a great amount of time and effort. Even a rare genius needed at least six months and protege would take at least two years to create one. Thus, it was obvious what the case would be for ordinary people. At best, they would need five years, and a slow person could need more than ten years.

Obviously, Lloyd wasn't a genius or a protege. He was a person who learned the Asrahan Core Technique just to fight Sir Neumann. And once he learned it, he thought that was enough. There was no need to be hung up on developing a manaheart. That was excessive. As such, Lloyd didn’t have a manaheart.

Unlike the flashy sides of the mana circles wrapped around his heart, the inside of his heart was like any other one. That was what saved him. It had saved his life from the force of the mana circles.

Thud! Thud! In the first place, a manaheart inside a human body wasn’t natural. It was the product of purposeful training. People shoved an unnaturally large amount of mana into their hearts to exert more force and power. That was the essence and identity of the manaheart.

But Lloyd didn’t have that. In other words, from the mana perspective, Lloyd’s heart was almost an empty space. There was no manaheart to burst. There was nothing. The blow of the mana blast worked instead to fill up that empty space, and the explosive power filled and coagulated. And once it got coagulated, it created the nucleus, the core of the special skill. Afterward, the mana storm was recomposed with the nucleus at its center, and it landed inside the heart.

Carefully, Slowly, but firmly. Thump...! Thump! Inside the fast-spinning circles, a completely new manaheart was coming into existence.

A few days passed. Meanwhile, Cremo, the city of commerce, was cleaned up. Everyone worked hard to move on from the disaster, and the central plaza was restored. The broken buildings and bell tower were repaired, although haphazardly. The destroyed post 23 was stacked up again, and most of the injured people had got back on their feet.

Various rumors spread throughout the day. One of the rumors said that there was someone who saved people from drowning after the sailboats crashed and sunk because of the Gigatitan. Another said that a man put out the spreading fire near the plaza by using his summon partner. Additionally, there was a rumor about one man heroically fighting against the monster. There was also word about how the man who killed the Gigatitan was currently in a coma.

Just like that, many rumors spread around, each story and word piecing together like a puzzle. The truth was naturally revealed little by little. The man, who saved people from drowning in the sea, had also put out the fire. The same man, who put out the fire, had also killed the Gigatitan. And now, after killing the monster, the man was in a coma on the sick bed.

At last, everyone became enlightened. Lloyd Frontera. That was his work. Everyone was safe, thanks to him. Since that day, one by one, people started to gather at the plaza. It was for one reason. They all had one wish.

“Are you asking why we’re gathered here on such a cold day? It’s obvious. We wish for Lloyd Frontera, the man who saved us, to wake up alive.”

That was why they had gathered here. The biting cold of the winter couldn’t dampen their spirit. The wish of the people for Lloyd’s recovery was bigger and hotter than the icy wind. They prayed and sang with their hearts together as one. They thought that was the way to repay their debt to Lloyd, who had given his life for the city.

Ten days passed. The last day of the year rolled around. The winter was especially icy that day. And just as everyone wished, Lloyd opened his eyes.

Chapter 78: A Miracle or an Opportunity? (3)

Where am I? And what am I doing here on this unfamiliar bed?

"..."

Lloyd blinked several times. He wondered how long he had been asleep. His eyes felt heavy, and his neck and back ached as well. Lloyd thought to himself, I wish I possessed a new body. Seriously, I wish I was transmigrated into another person with a silver spoon whose parents are loaded. Seriously.

Of course, his current situation was much different. That was something Lloyd knew very well. A cascade of messages floated in front of him the moment he opened his eyes. As he read them through, Lloyd vaguely formed an idea of what had happened to him.

[You have saved a number of people from disaster with your sacrifice and valor, setting an example. The citizens of Cremo, the city of commerce, are deeply moved by your selfless action.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

I did what? Sacrifice, valor, set an example? Saved a bunch of people from a disaster? Haha. Lloyd gave a laugh as he looked at the message in front of his eyes. Setting an example? Sacrifice and valor? No, thank you.

Even if people asked for them, he'd have flatly rejected them. And yet, here he was, reading the message that he had done those deeds. But that wasn't the end of the messages. There were more.

[The people of the city of commerce are praising you as the “Guardian of Cremo.”]

[Your steadfast valor, determination, and sacrificial spirit tugged at the heartstrings of many.]

[Current RP: 1,546]

Wow. Looks like I’ve struck gold. The flood of messages continued without a break, and Lloyd was almost lost in it. At the same time, Lloyd realized one thing. I vanquished the Gigatitan. I did.

The monster was too ferocious to fight against. There seemed to be no way of killing it. So, he had tried to hide somewhere while it wreaked havoc on the city. And yet, it was Lloyd himself who finished the Gigatitan.

It felt unreal. But it looked like it was true. Just then, the image he saw before losing consciousness came to his mind. The gigatitan. Its weak spot. Getting ready to use the mana blast. And the barrage of rocks that flew out of nowhere.

And I got knocked in the head. The sensation still felt raw. He vaguely remembered something hit him in the head with a thud. And the whole world suddenly moved in slow motion. It was the process of fainting. And amid that he...

I used the mana blast in the most foolish way possible. Two to three. That was the ideal rotation proportion of the mana circle when using the mana blast. He had obsessively repeated the ratio in his head even while he was passing out. And so, he did something utterly irrational.

I didn't protect my heart. He had used the circle needed to protect his heart in the mana blast. And the three circles collided altogether. The overpowering shock shook his body, and that impact was the last thing he remembered.

And yet, I am alive. He didn't die. In fact, Lloyd was perfectly fine. His heart pounded with vigor. No, it felt more vitalized than before.

However, Lloyd didn't panic or become dazed. Instead, he observed the messages that had been floating since a while ago. And they were kindly walking him through what was happening now.

My manaheart skill has developed? Lloyd knit his eyebrows. A manaheart. He didn't have one yet, and he never thought he would even in the future.

The required training is much too tiring and tedious. Even the fastest learners take at least five years. That's why I'd decided to do away with the manaheart training. t was true. The manaheart required intense and consistent daily training. Thus, he gave up on the idea. He had decided it would be more profitable for him to do another construction project rather than spend time training.

Plus, I had the mana circles that could replace the manaheart. That granted him to have about an equal amount of strength to the knights. Beside him was Javier. Lloyd fully trusted Javier's swordsmanship, and he was confident that he wouldn't get stabbed to death. He decided that was more than enough and settled on the decision.

But I guess I have a manaheart now. He felt like he had received a surprise gift. He closely looked at the skill descriptions like he was opening a gift box.

Ding Dong.

[Opening the skill information.]

[Skill Name: Manaheart.]

[Stage: Mana User Lv. 1]

[You can artificially save highly dense mana in your heart. The stored mana can be used freely at any time. This will greatly help your physical ability, and your storage and efficiency will increase the more you level up.]

[Physical ability improvement rate: 150%]

[Current RP: 1,546]

Dang. This is nuts. This is absolutely nuts. Lloyd clicked his tongue. He truly had a real manaheart. Deep down, he always wanted to create one but gave up because it required too much time and effort. However, he had gained one through unlocking a skill.

His heartbeat felt a bit different. Thump! Thump!

Each time his heart pumped, Lloyd sensed a lump of mana the size of a plum gathered in it. However, its capacity was closer to a straight-four sedan engine despite its size. Strength overflowed his heart, like he had built an engine in his heart. Plus, the energy felt natural like it was part of his body. He felt like he could send it to his arms and legs if he chose to.

I really became a mana user. Using mana was the yardstick that distinguished someone from ordinary people. So, what would happen if such power was linked with the triple circle? Lloyd thought he would be able to exert more power than most mid-level sword experts. If he was lucky, he might be able to narrowly match with a high-level sword expert.

However, that wasn't all of the gifts he received. The real deal followed soon after.

Ding Dong.

[Your manaheart was born, not as a result of regular training but from the impact of the mana blast.]

[As such, your manaheart has been given unique capabilities.]

[A new skill option has been opened.]

[Skill Option 1: Shock Neutralizer - Neutralizes any impact from a mana blast without additional protection. Therefore, your manaheart does not get any damage from the mana blast. This optional skill will greatly help you overcome the limitations of having one circle protect your heart when you need to use the mana blast.]

Shut up. His eyes widened in wonder as he read them. He even had an option that made him gulp by reflex. His mind started ticking.

So, let me just get this straight. Now that I have obtained the manaheart as a skill, I can invest in RP to become a high-level sword expert or higher. I can also unlock more optional skill in the meantime. Plus, now, I'm equipped with a fantabulous optional skill that protects me from the impact of the mana blast. In short, he had hit the jackpot. No, he had hit the biggest jackpot ever.

This meant that he didn’t have to protect his heart when using the mana blast. He would be able to use the triple circle collision, which he used against the Gigatitan before passing out, anytime he pleased.

It was the triple-collision mana blast that killed the Gigatitan, I suppose. Does this mean that the power of the blast will increase exponentially as the number of collisions go up? If that’s the case, then my blast is going to exponentially get more powerful... It was just when Lloyd was engrossed in his calculation. A familiar face slipped in between the floating messages, and he talked to Lloyd.

“Are you alive by any chance.”

“...”

It was Javier. He tossed the question to Lloyd, with his ever-the-same indifferent gaze and stoic face and in his usual chilly voice.

“Any plans on falling back into a coma again?”

“Do you really want that to happen to me again...?”

“Hmm, to be honest...”

Javier tilted his head to one side, thinking.

“I think I do.”

“...”

“I lived a very comfortable life when you were out.”

“Comfortable?”

“Yes.”

Javier continued to respond in an unconcerned manner.

“I only had to stay beside you while you were asleep. I didn’t have to split rocks or blast the ground. I didn’t have to drive stakes into the ground with a hammer. There was also no need to do any dreadful shoveling anymore.”

“Haa. Looks like you’ve been having the time of your life.”

“That is perfectly correct.”

“That’s why you’re now upset that I’m awake, eh?”

“Yes.”

“Wow. You don’t even try to deny it.”

“When a leader starts excessively working, it’s natural that those that work under him get tired too.”

“So, what is the meaning of your right hand that’s raised in the air?”

“...”

“You’re not going to knock me unconscious with it, are you? Like you’re going to smack me to sleep or anything.”

“...”

“Look at you sneakily opening up your fist after my words.”

“That is ridiculous. I would never dare to.”

Javier stretched his hand and propped Lloyd’s nape and back firmly. Then, he slowly helped Lloyd sit up. Lloyd had lied down for too long.

“Argh.”

Lloyd felt a bit dizzy, but he wasn’t in a bad mood. He felt even better when he saw the smile on Javier’s face, which betrayed his playful words.

“I am relieved, Master Lloyd.”

“Indeed. It’s a relief. I can torture you again.”

“Yes, it is. I am relieved that your years of being single can be extended.”

“Yeah, it really is. I think I can tell the baron about how you are trying to walk all over me.”

“Is it possible you’re being serious?”

“It depends on how you behave.”

“That means you won’t do it.”

“Dang. Don’t be so confident.”

“Am I wrong?”

“You better wish that you’re right. You should pray every night from now on.”

Lloyd then laughed out loud. It was sincere, and he was relieved. He and Javier were safe.

Lloyd grinned, thinking that it truly was a relief. This prompted Javier to be deadpan and put on a straight face. And that made Lloyd laugh again.

That was when everything finally felt real. Everything was over. It was now time to reap the awards of his hard work.

The rewards were more enduring, out-of-this-world, and comprehensive than he expected. The news of his recovery brought a queue of visitors. The first person that sprinted to his ward was no other than Count Cremo.

“Are you interested in being my son-in-law?”

“Excuse me...?”

The count, the moment he stepped into the ward, asked if Lloyd wanted to get married to his daughter. And, of course, he had a huge bouquet of flowers that wished Lloyd a fast recovery.

“I’m not sure what you mean.”

“Of course you do. Should I repeat myself?” asked the count.

“...”

“Be my son-in-law.”

“...”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut. At first, he wondered if the man wasn’t in his right mind. But his gaze and voice weren’t playful. Just one nod. That was enough for the count to bring his only daughter and rush them into the wedding ceremony. So Lloyd flatly shook his head.

“Please forgive me.”

“Why is that?”

“I am indeed grateful for your good will and offer, but...” Lloyd trailed off.

“But?”

“I don’t think I can handle it.”

It was the truth. Getting married so suddenly? And with the only daughter of the count? On the outside, it could come across as an amazing opportunity. But the reality would be different, Lloyd thought to himself.

Getting married at this point in time? It would be a nightmare. I’d have to spend money to keep up to their noble stature, and the wedding ceremony is going to cost me money, too. And if I have a child, the diaper, the milk, the education, all of it will cost me another sum. I won’t be able to pay off the barony’s debt then.

Certainly, the count could pay the debt for him. But it would never be for free. He'd be just making a new form of intangible debt to the count. Lloyd didn't want his hands to get tied that much to the count. All he wanted in life was to clear the debt from the loan sharks and goof around and enjoy life in freedom. Live modestly in peace and without anything lacking. Just live a simple life. That's all he wanted. So, tying the knot with a count's daughter and such nobility wasn't much of a noble decision. Lloyd hung his head down again.

"I am sorry, Your Excellency."

"Tsk. Is that so?"

"Yes, but I appreciate your kind words."

"You should appreciate both my words and proposal."

"I am really sorry, Your Excellency."

"Well, then. There's nothing I can do."

Count Cremo licked his lips in regret. After that, quite a lot of people visited him. A business family in the city. A tycoon in the shipbuilding industry. An opulent moneybag who made riches by offering private guard service. All of them were influential people in the city, and they all asked the same question during their visits.

"Do you want to become a member of my family?"

The marriage proposals disguised as a hospital visit, continued. Lloyd shook his head each time. He had already said no to the count. There was no reason for him to accept their suggestion for marriage. But instead of a flat rejection, he did so with courtesy, making sure that he still maintained good relationship with them.

"Yikes. It's another marriage proposal this time too. I feel like I've become a hot local celebrity."

It surprised Lloyd how everyone who visited him had the same goal in mind. However, it only meant that his reputation had gone up that much. It also meant that he was now the most sought after bachelor across the whole city. The thought elated him as this was something that he could never even dream of happening to him back in Korea. Javier, who was tending to Lloyd in the ward, let out a laugh.

“A celebrity? Congratulations.”

“Hmm... Why do I have this feeling that you’re mocking me?”

“Absolutely not.”

“No?”

“Yes.”

“Then, how do you explain that?” asked Lloyd.

“Excuse me?”

“The bundle of letters in your hand.”

“Oh,” Javier said as he looked down at his hand.

“Could it be...”

“Yes, it is.”

“Seriously?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Those are the love letters you received while I was passed out?”

“Yes.”

“...”

“Do you want me to count how many?” asked Javier.

“No, don’t do it.”

“Five... Seven... Eleven... Twenty...”

“I said don’t count.”

“39 in total.”

“Dammit.”

“Speaking of this, you received about 12 proposals, correct?”

“...”

“Hmph.”

“...”

Lloyd realized once again that he should not brag before gorgeous men. He shuddered as he accepted his reality. Just then… Knock knock.

“Someone is here to see you. I will open the door.”

The knocking sound was followed by the voice of one of the maids in the count’s manor.

The door opened. Lloyd thought until then that it was another stranger asking for his hand in marriage like everyone else. He turned to the hospital door believing that and found himself flinching when he saw his visitors.

“You scoundrel!” shouted someone abruptly.

The stranger strode fast across the room and pulled Lloyd into his embrace without leaving any time to think.

“You brat, what did I tell you? I’d reminded you so many times not to take part in dangerous affairs.”

Hug!

“Eh...?” Lloyd snapped his eyes open.

It was Baron Frontera who came along with his wife. Lloyd never expected to see them here. Two of them were whimpering, tightly hugging Lloyd in the ward.

Chapter 79: Rise to Fame (1)

“My goodness, what did I tell you? I’ve reminded you so many times not to take part in dangerous affairs.”

“Eh...?”

Lloyd couldn’t make sense of things for a moment. He wasn’t in the Frontera barony. He was in a sick ward in Count Cremo’s manor in Cremo, the city of commerce. So he had to ask...

What’s the baron couple doing here? Feeling flustered, Lloyd gazed up to find the baron couple smiling at him as though they were about to burst into tears. Lloyd wasn’t spared any moment to ask questions. The baron hurried and forcefully wrapped his hands around Lloyd’s cheeks.

“Let me see,” the baron said, “Are you hurt?”

“I, uhm, it’s...”

“Speak now,” the baron demanded.

“Do you feel uncomfortable anywhere?”

“Eh, uh, uhm. Nothing really in particular, but-”

“But?” interrupted the baron impatiently.

“I can’t really breathe well because of how you’re smashing my cheeks.”

“Oh... Oops,” said the baron as he flinched and released the grip of his hands. His behavior instantly invited a wave of nags from his wife.

“How could you act like that when he’s sick? What if you hurt him more?” scolded the baroness.

“Uhm... I was just in such a hurry... Anyway, are you all right?” the baron said as he looked at Lloyd.

“Oh, yes. I’m fine.”

Lloyd spoke, a wry smile inevitably forming on his face. The baroness was gazing at Lloyd even while reprimanding her husband, who clumsily and naturally avoided the criticism by tossing a question at Lloyd. Lloyd was glad to see both of them. On the one hand, however, a pang of pain shot through his heart when he saw that they weren’t in their best state.

They must’ve rushed all the way here traveling through day and night. The baron and the baroness kept clean and neat appearances at all times. But it was different right now. Their clothes were marked with splotches and dots, and there was even dirt on their elbows and knees. Lloyd could clearly see how they dropped everything to come here. They must have rushed into this ward as soon as they arrived at Cremo without bothering to even change their clothes.

“Did you, by any chance, get the news from Count Cremo?” asked Lloyd, guessing what seemed likely.

The baron nodded and replied, “Yes, you’re right. His Excellency has sent us a letter.”

“What did he write in there?”

“That you are in a critical condition,” said the baron grimly.

“Woah,” exclaimed Lloyd.

“And he told us in brief what you have done in the past few months. That’s why-”

“We departed at once the day we recieved the news,” the baroness cut in, finishing his sentence.

The baron couple’s words were exactly true. About ten days ago, the baron and the baroness were spending time like any other day, finishing up the ondol construction as per Lloyd’s favor and inspecting the water supply system that provided water to the viscounty. And, they also prayed for Lloyd’s safe return from the travel. The said letter had arrived that afternoon, bringing the news that struck them into shock. Lloyd was in critical condition. The words that followed before and after lost all meaning as they processed the terrible news. The parts about the Gigatitan laying an attack on Cremo and the heroic exploit of their son against such a monster and about how his valor and sacrificing spirit would inspire the others... Blah blah... None of those flowery words mattered to them. Not at all. Only two pieces of information echoed through their head. Lloyd was in critical condition, and the letter was stamped with a magical insignia of Count Cremo. In all seriousness, something terrible had happened to Lloyd.

Their hearts sank. There was no time to waste. So they saddled up right at once. Carriage? Relying on that thing had the potential of tying them down on the road if its wheels went bad on the snowy and icy roads. As such, they hopped on the horses themselves, taking only one knight for protection—Sir Bayern.

They galloped throughout the afternoon, and at night, they relied on the torch and moonlight as they continued to speed up. The travel was hectic and even the horses carrying them were almost knocked out by the fatigue. But the baron and the baroness didn’t feel any exhaustion. They instead galloped off, leaving very little time for sleep. Eating took place on as they were riding on their horses. And nine days later, they finally made it to Cremo.

But they didn’t have the mind or time to work on their appearances to look presentable. They roughly brushed through their matted hair and sprinted to the count’s manor. And at last, when they arrived, they heard the news that Lloyd had woken up while they were traveling to this city.

“You have no idea how relieved we were,” said the baron.

“Your mother may be acting all right now, but her legs nearly gave away, and she almost collapsed to the ground.”

“My dear, you don’t have to say that.”

The baroness looked down.

“What’s wrong? It is true.”

“You’re only pressuring the boy by saying so,” she explained. The baron gaped for a second at the realization.

“You should watch your words in front of a sick patient.”

“Ehem. Hmm...”

The baron let out dry coughs without saying anything more.

“By the way,” asked the baroness, “do you have the doll with you?”

“Excuse me?” answered Lloyd, looking at the baroness.

A doll? What could she possibly be talking about? Lloyd, who had been listening to the story of how the couple arrived here, cocked his head to the question. It was only after he heard the follow-up explanation from the baroness that he remembered the doll she had mentioned.

“I am talking about the talisman I gave you before you left home.”

“Oh.”

Then it dawned on him what it was. It was the uncomfortably large pink doll that was supposed to block nightmares if he hugged it to sleep at night. Lloyd found himself gulping drily.

“That doll should be, err, at the inn,” replied Lloyd at last.

“At the inn?” repeated the baroness.

“Yes,” said Lloyd, feeling that he needed to do better with his response. So he added, “I was staying at the inn prior to this whole ruckus.”

“So is that why you didn’t bring it here?”

“Yes.”

“Wait, have you not used it even before?” inquired the baroness, her voice shaking.

“Um, well, of course...”

Of course, I didn’t. I was rather scared that I’d get nightmares of the pink teddy bear if I slept with it. But Lloyd didn’t say his thoughts out loud. Nothing good would come out of it if he did.

The baroness, now wearing a regretful expression on her face, said, “My, I suppose you did not like the doll.”

“Uhm, to be honest, no, I didn’t like it too much.”

“I shall,” the baroness declared, “then make you a bigger one.”

“What...?” Lloyd gasped.

Excuse me? What’s she saying? Lloyd suddenly had a bad feeling about the situation, and that premonition turned into reality, to his misfortune.

The baroness put on a gentle smile as though she had everything in control and spoke.

“I gave it to you, so you could use it as a lucky charm, but you didn’t. I posit that it was too small for you. That is why I am telling you that I shall make a much larger and fluffier one so you can hug it with ease.”

“...”

“Would you not like that, either? Then shall I attach a ribbon-”

“No, it’s fine. Absolutely fine,” Lloyd hurriedly cut in.

A wry smile forced its way onto Lloyd’s face. To be frank, the attention and affection made him uncomfortable. But at the same time, he found himself touched by how they put aside their usual dignity and formalities and showered him with love. They prompted Lloyd to recall his childhood in South Korea.

I felt exactly this way then. When he was young, Lloyd's father used to be slammed with work. Meeting him happened on rare occasions because he was always working. And on seldom cases where he was at home, he spent most of the time sleeping. Lloyd wanted to play with him each time he was at home. But Lloyd held up, taking heed to his mother's words that Father needs to take a good rest.

But one day, when Lloyd was probably about seven years old, he was riding the kick scooter in front of his house when he fell down. The fall hurt his forehead pretty badly, and with a bit of an exaggeration, it left an egg-like bump on his forehead. This got Lloyd to go back home crying, and the sound instantly woke his father up. Father was sleeping in his room because it was his day off.

Lloyd's father rushed him to the hospital, and on the way home, they stopped at a nice restaurant. The taste of the tonkatsu stuck in his memory even now, and so were the conversation they had and the concerned expression and voice of his father. They were all clear. That day, Lloyd felt in every fiber of his being how much his father cherished and loved him. He wasn't a man who valued work over his son.

"Whew."

Heaving a heavy sigh, Lloyd tried to shake off his emotions before they developed into tears. And he looked at the baroness and said, "Thank you. So how big do you plan to make that doll for me?"

"Presumably, this big?" said the baroness as she beamed and opened her arms wide.

Lloyd's smile brightened as well when he saw her do so.

"Yes, that seems to be a perfect size," he said.

"I know, right?"

"Yes, so what do you say to make another one since you will be working on one anyway?"

“One more?” asked the baroness.

“Yes.”

“Why, do you plan on hugging the two in sleep?”

“No, it’s not that,” Lloyd said and shook his head. He then pointed at Javier, who was standing beside his bed.

“I wish Sir Asrahan to have one as well. He goes through so much to protect me all the time.”

Flinch! Javier, who was watching the union of the family with a calm expression, flinched slightly in the shoulder. And when the baroness praised Lloyd for having such a kind heart, his Adam’s apple fluctuated visibly. Lloyd smiled, his smile growing vicious like the sirens that drag people to misery. Joy is for one, while tragedy is for many, thought Lloyd to himself. A shameful act became less shameful when it wasn’t done alone.

A few more days passed. Lloyd’s health recovered as days went by. The contusions that marked all over his body healed quickly, and the strained and torn muscles returned back to normal. His recovery was a combined effort of the hearty care of the baron couple, nurse, triple circle, and manaheart. There was a massive difference in his healing speed between now and then. The physician watched in amazement as he checked Lloyd’s body.

“You have completely healed. You could even go out hunting on a horse right now,” declared the physician.

“Is that so?” asked Lloyd.

“What about my heart?”

“It beats normally.”

His heart seemed to have stopped when he was in a coma, but now, it was beating perfectly fine. Lloyd had told Javier a part of the secret behind such a miracle, and no one else. To others, he simply played ignorant, saying that he was in the dark just as much as everyone else was. And thanks to his feigned ignorance, the matter behind his heart remained a mystery to everyone. Not only that, Lloyd even confessed that he had no idea how he'd killed the Gigatitan. Heck, he explained, he didn't even know if he actually was the one behind the killing. Sure, he had fought hard until he passed out. Once he woke up, this happened. Even with a such story, some people gazed at Lloyd with doubts, but what else could they do when he played innocent? When he plastered on a thick-skinned a few more times, no one questioned him about the Gigatitan anymore.

Of course, they'll still think that I caught the monster. But they'd believe that I am loathing to reveal the secret. Yes, that's exactly what I want. In the first place, all of this happened because of the mana circles. But not a single person, minus Javier, knew about the existence of mana circles. So it was unnecessary for him to tell them about it. Thinking that, Lloyd stepped out of sickbed and walked out of the manor. He then headed to the city district and stood on the podium. He took a full view of the plaza that spanned ahead of him.

"Huraaaaay!!!"

The plaza was jam-packed with people. The crowd could not be counted. The merchants, pier workers, sailors, fishers, scholars, carpenters, and children... Every citizen born and living in Cremo gathered up, cheering at the podium.

There was more. Trumpets played a clear and majestic song at both sides of the podium, and tiny colored papers were sprinkled from the building roofs that followed along the plaza outline.

Woah. I feel so cool right now. Suho Kim who had nose-bled every day in his tiny dorm room in South Korea. He never expected that a day would come when he'd be treated with such splendor. A part of him felt uncomfortable and jittery, but a greater sense of satisfaction took over him.

The accomplishment was achieved out of pure coincidence, but still, it was an accomplishment nonetheless. He told himself that he should act confident when he was being adored. He must not be shy. He must be chill. Resolving such in his head, he looked to the side to see Count Cremo nod his head as he stood beside the podium. The magic marble that amplified the speaker's voice was ready. Picking up the marble placed on the podium, Lloyd cleared his throat.

"Ehem. Hmm."

His voice rang aloud and clear across the plaza as it traveled with magic. The cheering died down a bit as a result, and now they were waiting for Lloyd to speak. As the silence gradually fell, Lloyd fished a note from his pocket, which was the speech he'd written in advance as per the count's request to speak in front of everyone.

Well, the topic of my speech is obvious. I'm going to talk about how the real heroes are the ones that rescued the drowning people from the waters at that disastrous night. And not only them but also the guards and citizens who sweated over to save those who were pressed under the rubbles in the plaza, as well as the medical officers who risked their lives to put out the fire. Lastly, I'll end with how everyone in this city is the true hero for working together as one to overcome the challenge set forth by the disaster or something like that.

The content of the speech couldn't be any more cliche and platitude. So Lloyd was left in two minds. His heart that had originally decided to give such a commonplace speech swayed. It was the people. As he laid his eyes on the crowds as thick as clouds, desire started to creep up inside him. A decision was newly made, and Lloyd clenched his molars tight. He put his lips to the magic marble with the heart of shouting.

"You may know not what they are, but there is such a thing called 'ondol' in this world."

Lloyd's calm voice spread to every corner of the plaza. People cocked their heads to the side. They had no idea what this ondol Lloyd was talking about. Lloyd continued talking.

“It warms your entire house like a hot potato. A furnace isn’t comparable. No more tears streaking down your face or cough gripping you because of the smoke. Moreover, you don’t have to assign shifts through the night worrying about embers growing into a fire by staying close to the furnace and sacrificing sleep.”

Everyone was left baffled. However, it was strangely appealing. The plaza grew quieter. People gave all their ears as they breathed softly. And Lloyd’s salesman pitch invaded their eardrums.

“Yes, I am the one who installs the ondol. But this occasion is not the right time to talk about it, so I shall stop here. If you have more questions, please visit the Frontera barony that sits east of Cremo. I promise to answer your questions heartily and do the construction for you. With that, I’ll go down. Thank you.”

He was tacit just enough to evoke a sense of curiosity, and this strategy was meant to ensure that he’d be flooded with ondol orders later. Once he was done with the speech, no, the ondol advertisement, he gave a bow and quickly got down the podium. Everyone looked dazed, and the count let out an empty laugh. Lloyd decided to act thick-skinned, caring little what their reactions were. He walked over to Count Cremo and casually greeted him.

“Thank you, Your Excellency, for preparing such an occasion before I leave the city,” he said.

The count, on the other hand, said nothing but smiled in a daze. He had heard recently from his source about the ondol. But it never occurred to the count that Lloyd would be brash enough to promote his construction on the podium.

My, I want to have him beside me all the more. The count thought Lloyd something. He was bold. He struck the perfect balance, sometimes appropriate and sometimes bolder. The young man advanced and retreated just aptly to fight for and make his profit.

Not to mention that he’s always on the ball. It was still beyond Count Cremo how Lloyd had killed the Gigatitan. But one thing became crystal clear, and it was that Lloyd's constructing skills exceeded anyone the count has seen so far.

It's telling from how the artificial ground in the water is still standing strong despite the Gigatitan's attack. The count's gaze traveled to the shore near the port, and he stared at the artificial ground left there. The mermaid statue had been shattered to pieces when the monster attacked, but the ground was nearly fine save for a slight dent in its side. Made of steel bars and cement, the ground could accommodate a new statue right away.

Certainly, a talent like his must not be wasted away in a remote province. The count's gaze toward Lloyd glimmered in secret, and it remained like that even when Lloyd left the city after his speech.

"Godspeed. May our paths cross again," said the count, bidding farewell. Then after escorting Lloyd and the others, he then headed back to his manor right away. That night, his report detailing the abilities and accomplishments of Lloyd Frontera got attached to the carrier pigeon, which flew her way to the palace in the royal capital.

Chapter 80: Rise to Fame (2)

Fifteen days passed since Lloyd, and the others left the city. The journey back home was peaceful. Not a single snowflake fell from the sky, even though the wind was chilly as the new year started. Thanks to it, everyone traveled happily. Lloyd, the baron, the baroness, Sir Bayern, and the soldiers' footsteps were light. No accidents happened on the peaceful, tranquil journey. And they arrived at the Frontera barony after 15 days of travel. At the same time, Lloyd's vacation came to an end.

Now that I'm home, it's time for me to work! The joy and coziness of being back home were practically nonexistent to Lloyd. He had a mountain of work to finish on his plate.

I should finish supplying the ondol. And there's also the checkup on the water pipes to make sure that they won't freeze in the winter. The villagers should be running out of wood soon after heating their floors since early winter, so I have to get ready to sell bituminous coals.

That was how he would make money and pay his family's debt. It was only after paying his debt that he could live the rest of his life in comfort. A life of indulgence and peace would be promised for his remaining days then. To actualize such a grand dream into reality, Lloyd called the barony's administrator as soon as he was done unpacking.

"You called for me, Master Lloyd?" asked the administrator.

"Yes, I did. I have a favor to ask you."

"What could that be?"

"Can you get in contact with Shiloh and Meatloaf?" asked Lloyd.

Shiloh and Meatloaf. The Scrawny and Fatso. They were the loan sharks who borrowed a huge sum of money from the baron and extorted an unreasonable amount of interest from them.

The administrator nodded and said, “Yes, I can.”

“Then send them a message right away,” said Lloyd, “that I want to meet them now.”

“Is there any other message other than that?”

“That’s all. That would be enough,” explained Lloyd.

“Yes, Young Master.” And the administrator left the room.

A messenger was sent to Shiloh and Meatloaf just as instructed, and in the afternoon, they visited the baron’s manor. But something about their attitude was different from the past.

“Hahaha, how are you doing?”

“Ehem! Ehem! I pray everything is going all right with you!”

Shiloh and Meatloaf watched out for their manners, which had never happened before. And on top of the changed attitude, they were even holding a basket of flowers and a glass of wine as a git. This would have been entirely unimaginable in the past. Their usual foul-mannered and arrogant looks couldn’t be found on their faces, and the reason behind it was simple.

They don’t want to die. Lloyd chuckled as he had the thought. The two had personally experienced what it was like to be threatened by Arosh, the orc warrior. And they were now all aware of the blood alliance between the Frontera barony and the orc Sand and Steel tribe. To orcs, blood allies meant dear friends whose enemies were also the orcs’ enemies. The rule of thumb for orcs was to slay their enemies. The two knew this very well, so they were treading carefully lest they become the enemy of the barony. Wearing a smile on his face, Lloyd sat them down and jumped into business right away.

“Good news, you say?” One of them replied.

Lloyd looked straight at them and said, “I have made a bit of money recently.”

Shiloh and Meatloaf cocked their heads to the side. It occurred to Lloyd just then that the event back in Cremo hadn’t spread to this remote province just yet. He smiled meaningfully at them.

“So it appears that I can repay what I owed to two of you.”

“Pay us?”

“Yes,” confirmed Lloyd.

“Then how much…”

“About half of the entire principal debt.”

“Eh?!” Their eyes widened in surprise. The news shocked them. It was unbelievable. The debt the barony owed to them was not insignificant. It was considerably large.

It shouldn’t be a manageable amount to begin with. How…? Shiloh and Meatloaf had the same thought in their heads. And they also recalled the time when Baron Frontera came up to them to borrow some money.

At that time, the baron was full of himself like now. When the baron visited them, he explained that he planned on buying some land. But he was just borrowing some because he was short of a portion of the land price. Shiloh asked if he was really doing it because the interest rate was high. The baron nodded as if it were fine. He further explained that the land he was going to purchase would soar through the roof. And paying back the loan would be a breeze, given his massive profit. But in the end, the baron went under.

Turns out, the guy who connected the baron to the land was an impostor. These loan sharks got some men to look around, and they found out that the impostor had eloped after embezzling all the investment funds of the baron. Making things worse, the land which the baron invested in was nothing but a false listing, which only existed on paper. The baron was duped in every degree. But Shiloh and Meatloaf weren't the types of loan sharks who would be compassionate to his mishap.

He judged for himself and borrowed the money, and he's got to be responsible for his actions. Who cares about compassion when they're talking about money? A contract must be complied with, and that's what was terrifying about money. They were extreme sticklers for such a principle, so everything in the contract was strictly adhered to.

The short-term repayment came at a cost, which was a massive interest rate. The loan sharks added daily interest to the principal without a single day amiss. The principal blew up in sum with interest. And with the increased principal, the interest was adjusted accordingly. Interest increased interest, and the principal snowballed. And so, as the baron dragged things and struggled to pay off the interest, the overall loan amount multiplied to an unimaginable sum, which stood incomparably higher than the money he'd borrowed. As such, Shiloh and Meatloaf thought to themselves that he'd never be able to pay the money during his lifetime. A man like that wouldn't be capable of doing so. So all they could leech off from him was to squeeze him to death until they'd get their hands on the manor and some worthy stuff in his inheritance.

That's how we do things. And his manor and other stuff would render way much more profit than the principal we first lent him. So they waited, much like a spider watching a struggling fly caught in her web or like a viper looking down at a mouse whose body was dying as the poison spread in its body each second. But no death came. The baron, who they thought would perish under surmounting pressure, brought out a card against all expectations. It was his eldest son, a once brute, who initiated several projects all of a sudden. And that was when the winds of change began to blow in the barony. And now, that hooligan Lloyd Frontera just declared to them that he can pay half of the entire principal.

"Are you... telling the truth?" Shiloh asked, too incredulous to trust what he had just heard. Lloyd simply nodded his head as if there was nothing strange about this.

"Yes," confirmed Lloyd.

What Lloyd said was most certainly true. He had amassed more than half the amount of the overall debt. Heck, he had actually earned to the point that he still had some left, even after clearing half of the debt.

It's all thanks to Count Cremo. Lloyd smiled, his eyes curling in satisfaction. He thought of Cremo, the city of commerce, with gratitude, for it has left him with heaps of profits. He had sold every bit of the treasure acquired from the orcs, and that granted him a considerable amount of sum. On top of that was the project commissioned by the count, in which Lloyd built an artificial ground in the water. The payment for the construction was considerably larger than initially promised. It was because of the negotiation Lloyd successfully struck with the count the night before he left the city.

"Do you plan on going back to the barony tomorrow?" asked the count.

"Yes, Your Excellency."

"I am sorry to hear that. I wasn't able to even properly reward you for stopping the Gigatitan."

"If that is the case, could you return the favor now?" asked Lloyd.

"Is there a reward that you have in mind?"

"Yes. Money."

"..."

"I ask for twofold of the construction fee for building the platform in the water."

"Hmm... Let us settle at 1.5."

"Did you not just say that you wished to return the favor for my merits?"

"1.6."

"Ha... I worked so hard to kill that Gigatitan..."

“Whew. 1.7. I can’t give you more than that.”

“Thank you, Your Excellency.”

So the massive profit was the result of a constructive and peaceful negotiation.

“All in cash,” Lloyd remarked.

“I am sure you will need confirmation. Let us go then.”

Lloyd then rose, leading the two transfixed loan sharks downstairs. And there, he opened the vault with Baron Frontera and the administrator who were waiting for him. It opened up to reveal shining gold coins and bars, whose sight prompted the loan sharks to smile ear to ear. And just like that, half of the debt the barony was burdened with was taken care of, not to mention the interest was slashed in half as well.

And this means that half of the water bill I’ll receive from the viscounty will purely be my profit from now on. Lloyd lifted his gaze with satisfaction after punching the numbers in his head. The vault was now empty, but he brimmed with confidence that he’d be able to restock it again. And to do that, he needed to busy himself without a moment of laziness. His days began to fill up with work again.

“Here! Hold it!” shouted Lloyd.

“Yes!”Lloyd had his tool belt wrapped around his waist, and he now grabbed the tool at the construction site for the first time in a while. He was at the construction site of the ondol house he had continually supplied to the barony. This was the last site, so he personally led the effort. From the first ondol contract to the ones that followed, he fulfilled the terms of the contract and had finished all the constructions.

Ding Dong.

[The installation of ondol flooring to the homes in Frontera fiefdom is complete.][You have successfully accomplished the work of introducing a new method of heating the floors in a province. The residents will adapt to this new and convenient method and be greatly satisfied.]

[The ondol heating system has now settled as the residential tradition distinct to the Frontera province.]

[A new page has been written in the Laurasian continent's history books as the "Frontera Floor Heating System."]

[For this monumental achievement in construction, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[Current RP: 1,946]

Wow. A pleasing message adorned the air in front of Lloyd's eyes. This reward was something he had never thought of receiving. On top of the RP, he received some construction fees. The profit was something he never expected, but it nonetheless pleased him. But Lloyd didn't stop there. The profit didn't make him smile for even a split second. He didn't relax and goof around. Instead, he decided to work harder, dealing with things that were left unfinished.

I vacated the fiefdom way too long because of the Gigatitan incident. He had a lot on his plate. He headed to the coal mine, coming and going for several days and making sure that everything was safe there. Next, he checked the construction status of the leasing houses in the Maritz land, as the migrants would live there come spring.

So I must build them well. The migrants who signed the contract to live here were mostly tenant farmers who, though modest, led a stable lifestyle. And they took on this big adventure of working for their personal lands instead of working for others that promised security. They decided to come here, taking such a risk.

I should be thankful to them. They took on a lot of risk to move here. That was what risk was for poor people. Moving out of a rental house or starting out in another job after leaving. Or canceling the insurance because one's short of cash, even though that would be a great loss. Each of these small decisions meant a tittering adventure on a steep cliff.

One failure, and there was no chance of picking yourself up back on your feet because you had no assets. Someone with a stable life would never understand the feeling. However, Lloyd personally felt what it was like, back in his days in the dorm rooms. He went through this struggle on a daily basis. He could only execute his plans after much consideration when the choice may have looked trivial to others. This feeling of being alone without support and how very opportunity cost translated to your livelihood. Since Lloyd had experienced this personally, he was well aware of the mentality of the migrants in the reclaimed land.

First, I need to make sure that they will be relieved. That's how I can make them concentrate on their work. Lloyd wanted to ensure that they'd feel comfortable, at least during the time they stayed at home. That was the key to encouraging the migrants to exert more effort and build the land into a more fertile one. Lloyd's thinking was that a comfortable home where they could rest was the beginning of settling into the reclaimed land. So, he spent extra care in inspecting the construction of the leasing houses.

More work followed after that was done. He meticulously worked to ensure that the water pipes were not frozen and checked the status of the stored coals. Such a hectic and busy lifestyle continued for almost 20 days, and that was only when he was able to take care of most of the work. But even after he was almost finished with his work, no time for rest was given to him.

"M-master Lloyd!"

Lloyd was walking out of the storage after checking on the coals when the administrator ran toward him in a hurry. And he shouted at Lloyd, his voice shaky.

"Uh, now, you, you have a v-visitor!"

"A visitor?" Lloyd asked casually.

“Yes, Young Master!”

“Then, what’s making you so flustered?”

Lloyd cocked his head to the side, thinking how strange this all was. The administrator was a seasoned worker, and yet he was now stuttering over a visitor. He frowned. Could it be that a high-ranking visitor has arrived?

“What is all the fuss right now? Who on earth is it? And if it’s an important guest, shouldn’t you be informing the baron first, not me?” asked Lloyd grouchily.

Actually, Lloyd was about to take a nice, short because he had almost finished everything. So, he frankly felt annoyed to be bothered by this fussy man who should have gone to the baron. The administrator stuttered again at his snobby question.

“I-it’s, it’s... It’s...”

“It’s what?”

“A royal messenger is here,” the administrator said at last.

“A royal messenger? What?”

“The royal messenger of Her Majesty has come from the kingdom.”

“Her Majesty’s messenger is here?” repeated Lloyd.

“Yes,” said the administrator as he nodded hard.

And in a dazed expression on his face, he added, “So, uhm, the royal messenger of Her Majesty wants to see you, Master Lloyd.”

“What?!”

The royal messenger is here to see me? And finally, Lloyd’s eyes widened just like the administrator’s.

Chapter 81: Rise to Fame (3)

“Since a long time ago, I, along with the great sovereigns that came before me, have worked hard to achieve peace and comfort for the nobles and citizens. In addition, I have personally considered it my duty to build the land that promises a land of relief to the people.”

Swoosh! The royal scroll flapped open with a pleasing sound, and the messenger’s solemn voice pierced into his ears. So Lloyd thought to himself...

Crap. This is not good. Lloyd was now modestly kneeling before the royal messenger, and it was a relief that he had his head hung down. The royal messenger couldn’t see the look of dismay that was written on Lloyd’s face.

Message from the Queen. I feel like this comes with its pros and cons. Lloyd stole a glance to the side, and he found the baron on his one knee in a courteous fashion. The baron’s eyelids and brows trembled. The overwhelming sense of honor. The surging joy and happiness. The baron looked like the first-prize lottery winner sitting in the bank.

But Lloyd could understand the baron. After all, this place was a province. It was merely a barony stuck in the far-flung east corner. This tacky province would never ever see the visit of the monarch unless a great war breaks out or a historical disaster takes place for her to visit. But against all the odds, the royal messenger was here, reading out loud the message personally written by the queen herself.

It’s going to be an honor for generations to come from the baron’s perspective. What else would bring greater joy and honor than this? Lloyd’s expression grew a tad more complicated.

Well, it’s an honor for sure. Honor if we use it right. Lloyd could somewhat guess why the royal messenger was here.

It’s probably because of what happened back in Cremo. Lloyd got the work from the count and successfully created the marine artificial ground. Later, he took care of the Gigatitan that ambushed the city. The heroic story must have probably traveled to the queen's ears as well. And that was why she wanted to commend his works and reward him.

Sure, I'm happy, but... Hmm. It's a bit uncomfortable. This is the reason why I didn't want to fight against the Gigatitan. Lloyd furrowed his brows, thinking how, indeed, true his words were. It'd have been best for him to come back after successfully finishing the construction subject. Get the construction fee and ask Count Cremo to connect him to the powerful people in large cities so he can get some more projects in his hands. And build a modest reputation that bags him some lucrative amount of profit. This was what Lloyd had in his mind, and that was as far as he planned to go.

That was my line. Right there. I shouldn't have gone further. If I work my head off for a few years according to the plan, my debt will be gone. It was so according to his calculation. Half of his debt was already paid, and the interest amount lowered to a good degree. Moreover, he had the monthly water bill from Lacona viscounty, which covered the interest and some savings. As such, Lloyd didn't need anything more. Doing more would be detrimental.

I just need to clear the debt. That's all. Just stay within the lines where I don't take projects of exceeding scales. Otherwise, I might fall into a mishap where I'll have to work even after paying the debt.

All of this, working and hustling, was only meant to pay the debt. After that, he didn't want to work anymore. No more living hard. He had already done a sickening amount of work back in South Korea. It was tiring. And so, he had not an iota of the plan to spend the rest of his life here in such a fashion. The pearls and golds hardly looked desirable. He merely wanted to laze around his entire life as a noble in this province.

Three fattening meals. Reading books and goofing around. Riding horses if things get boring. Meet a woman who clicks with me and get married. No more trying hard. Just live a comfortable life with my children and family. That's exactly the life I wish for right now.

But this very moment, an unexpected variable was trying to butt in his plan. The first one was the fight against the Gigatitan, which wasn't what he wanted at all. And after some laborious efforts to stay alive, he found himself accomplishing something big, eventually making his name known to the queen.

Whew... What should I do? He was happy, but at the same time, flustered. Just then, he recalled the days back when he was in the military.

I was like this when I was in a uniform. I didn't know then but living a modest middle-class lifestyle is the best way to live. It was true. It must be when he was a private. On the first day of his deployment after finishing the basic military training, the administrative officer of the company shot Lloyd a question as soon as he came.

"Would you look at that? Degree in civil engineering? Can you shovel?"

When Lloyd heard that, he was sitting ramrod straight on a chair in the administrative office. And in a loud, disciplined voice that reflected his new recruit spirit, Lloyd yelled that he could do it.

That was the beginning of my misfortune. Lloyd heaved a sigh. His own thoughtless answer became the reason behind his downfall in the military. From that day onward, he was turned into a personal summon partner of the administrative officer. Thrown into all sorts of construction projects, Lloyd repaired the water pipes, guard posts, and outskirt fences and built the football field in the company. The repair work never came to an end. Once he was done with the field, he moved on to work with the laundry drying machine, and then the battalion's food waste disposal. One repair would be finished only to start another.

And later, I was called in for lawn mowing and welding! Thanks to that, he mastered welding, which he had never fathomed of. Stuck in Yeoju, the rear unit in Gyeonggi province, Lloyd spent more time working and building stuff than learning training tactics, even when he was part of the mechanical force. He got on the handcart more than the armored car and got his hands on the shovel more than the rifle. Half of his years were spent as a laborer. And they even tried to make him stay in the military when his discharge day came near. Indeed, Lloyd received the offer to become the staff sergeant in the military. But he had enough of the military. So he rejected them, which he regretted a little when his life became tougher for him as a civilian.

Anyway, I mustn't put myself out there too much. The rumor of my good skills shouldn't have spread too far. Otherwise, I'm going to get pestered by the higher-ups. Unfortunately, however, that very thing was happening right now based on the words the royal messengers tirelessly read out loud.

"Therefore, the news of Cremo gripped me with concerns... Blah blah... I was overjoyed to hear about the accomplishment of the valor and sacrificing spirit of the young noble and his personal knight... Blah blah... I shall personally honor the achievements of these two men."

Haa. Please do not summon me to the kingdom, or maybe you can call me when things relax around here? Lloyd had to work on the reclaimed Maritz land, and the coal business was about to begin. He was an exceedingly busy man. He internally pleaded to the monarch with all of his heart, but the solemn voice showed no mercy.

"Here ye! To commend the achievement, Lloyd Frontera and Javier Asrahan are hereby invited to the kingdom. The two people are ordered to travel immediately to the royal capital. January Year 617. Declared by Queen Alicia Termina Magentano in Magenta the royal capital."

Fwip! Tap! The scroll made a pleasant noise as it rolled up. There was such a smoothness in the messenger's maneuver that made Lloyd wonder if the messenger had practiced it all day. At the same time, the shoulders of the baron, who was on his knees, shivered. He started to wail in overwhelming sensation, tears streaking down his downcast face.

"Uhm... Waa...! Wa, waaa!!"

"Baron Arcos Frontera, lift up your gaze," instructed the royal messenger.

"Sniff...! Sniff...!"

"You must be proud your son. Truly, you've got an amazing son."

“It’s, it’s, it’s an honor!! Sniff!!”

Ding Dong.

Woah. Lloyd sighed at length. At this point, he was out of options. It reached the point of return. Oh, well. Now that it has come to this point, I have to do it right.

Things have changed for Lloyd, and he ought to think of ways to draw the most profit out of them. Expediting his timetable for clearing his debt didn’t seem entirely bad. No, it might be better depending on how he used the opportunity. Once he finished adding up the numbers in his head, Lloyd lifted his head, his face beaming.

“I, Lloyd Frontera, accept Her Majesty’s order.”

And just like that, Lloyd decided to travel to the royal capital, which was the same as passing the bar with flying colors just by studying the night before.

A festival was held in the Frontera barony. The time was right as it was winter, the time of the year when fields required only a few workers. Residents warming themselves up on the heated floor gathered up, and the ambiance felt like the village saw a bar passer after acing the test.

Hanging just a few pamphlets on a utility pole would really help set the mood. Lloyd had the sudden thought as he watched the festival. There was so much vivacity now, and for a good reason. This fiefdom had been absent of dreams and hopes. Lloyd was the young master who gave himself to daily drinking and troubled everyone. But he completely changed one day. Something seemed to have knocked some sense into him because he started to live an industrious life and began several successful projects. He made fortunes, pushing away the dark atmosphere in the barony that fell because of the scammers. And now, the young master received an order from Her Majesty. He was ordered to come to the royal capital to retrieve a large award. That alone made these innocent provincial residents straighten their backs with pride. In fact, it would considerably benefit all the people.

“It’s going to encourage their spirits. Not only that, they will be treated better when they meet others from another fiefdom. They wouldn’t be looked down upon so easily and enjoy some small profits when trading goods.”

“Hmm, I guess you mean they won’t be looked down on for being a ‘country bumpkin’ from now on.”

“Something similar, yes.” Lloyd nodded as he heard his answer. Javier made sense.

After all, this fiefdom is likely everything to the people here. The Frontera barony was their hometown and their livelihood, and this event improved the reputation of the fiefdom. Their fiefdom had received a royal order and award from Her Majesty, which would become a achievement other people in the province couldn’t easily downplay.

Makes sense that people will be filled with pride. I mean, it’s a human psychology for humans to feel proud when a soccer or baseball team they cheer for win in a game. That was commonplace in the modern world. A particular team clinched victory in a champion’s league, with the most popular athlete in the team scoring the winning goal and carrying the game. That surefire guaranteed online forums to go wild in a frenzy. Lloyd had seen it happen many, many times.

Everyone goes berserk even when they get nothing in return. It was human psychology to go wild for a soccer athlete who lives on the other side of the world and has zero connections to them by school, friendship, or family, absolutely no connections at all. Given that, what did they get out of this happy event in this fiefdom? And the royal order? It'd directly and indirectly profit the people. It was even more so because the man who received the order from Her Majesty was set to become their lord in the future. That was why they were holding the festival in exhilaration. That was why everyone's eyes grew beady and glimmering every time they came across Lloyd, as if he was a member of VTS, the idol group.

Well, thanks to that, I earned additional RP. He had received 100 from the baroness, 30 from Sir Bayern, and 70 from the residents. Of course, the RP was faithfully saved. He thought of upgrading his manaheart skill, but he held back, thinking that he might find himself in a more dire situation again.

Just because I level up my manaheart skill and get stronger, it doesn't mean that it's good. Skills had to be upgraded according to the situations he was in. Lloyd could only respond to various situations only if he did that. It was the case in the ant cave and during the fight against the Gigatitan. As such, Lloyd decided to store his RP like a bear getting ready for hibernation. The only thing that he pampered himself with was some seeds to transform his summon creatures.

Preparation to travel to the royal palace took place step by step. But Lloyd prepared more than the trip. He had a bigger picture in mind. Since the monarch kindly got me a stage for me to perform, I think it's only right for me to make sure that I make the most out of it.

With such a decision in mind, Lloyd came up with a plan, skipping sleep for several nights. And at last, the morning of the departure rolled in. And his master plan was ready to take off to completely clear the barony's debt once and for all.

Chapter 82: The Wrong Answer’s Better Than the Right Answer (1)

“I regret it.”

“Hmm? What do you mean?”

The sun was clear in the afternoon even though it was winter. Almost 15 days into the journey since the departure, everyone had stopped to enjoy a meal. Javier, who was picking at his food with his spoon, blurted out something. Lloyd tilted his head to the side.

“Regret it?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, I regret it.”

“Regret what? Do you regret being born?” Lloyd said playfully.

Javier replied with silence.

“If not, do you have a concern on your mind or something?” Lloyd asked again.

“No, nothing is bothering me. But...”

“But?”

“It dawned on me that I had spent too much time lazing around the past year.”

“Laze around?” asked Lloyd, one of his eyebrows lifting up.

“I have overlooked my sword training too much,” said Javier as he clenched the spoon in his hand. Fixing his gaze at the soup growing cold in the bowl, he added, “To be completely honest, I would like to express my apology to you, Master Lloyd. That is, about what happened back in Cremo.”

“In Cremo?”

“Yes, the night when we fought against the Gigatitan.”

Javier lifted his head and stared at Lloyd.

“I took off with a bold declaration that I would go and battle the Gigatitan,” Javier explained. “But I was far from enough. I wasn’t strong enough. As a result, you had to take the matter into your own hands, Master Lloyd. That put you in great danger, and you almost died in the process,” said Javier grimly.

“Aha. So you’re reflecting your behavior, yes?”

“Yes.”

Javier spoke and nodded. He was sincere about it.

“Had I been stronger or could suppress the Gigatitan on my own, everything would have been different. You wouldn’t have been thrown into danger. That is why...” Javier paused for a second, his eyes glimmering with determination.

“I have come up with a new year resolution.”

“New year resolution?”

“Yes,” said Javier.

“Wow. How grand. So what is this new year resolution you have come up with?”

“Sword master.”

Pfft! Lloyd almost spit out the soup he was eating. Javier maintained his serious gaze as he spoke. It wasn’t that Lloyd thought Javier’s goal was ridiculous. It was never the case. It was the opposite.

His goal this year is to become a sword master? That would be impossible for anyone else, even if they hustled for the rest of their lives. But it sounds like it's actually going to happen since it's coming from him. Lloyd indeed felt that way. Javier could actually do it. That happened in the novel.

That's what's scary about Javier. An innumerable number of knights had spent their lives in training throughout history, wishing to become a sword master. They risked their lives, fought against each other, and sweated over to internalize the fights on the battlefields. Their lives were literally spent sharpening their swords. And how many of these sword-obsessed people were there throughout history?

I'd give hundreds of thousands probably, but maybe more. On the other hand, how many had rose to become the sword master? Less than 200. Yes, indeed it was. According to the official record written in the Laurasia history book, there were exactly 179. Historians said that the number would increase to less than 300 if they included ambiguous records and unverified stories. So throughout history, there were less than 300 sword masters with only 179 of them who were verified.

That's about the same number as the amount of kings in Korea during the Goguryeo, Shilla, Baekje, Goryeo, and Joseon periods. The number of sword masters in Laurasia history was similar to the number of kings in the history of South Korea, excluding the years in Gojoseon, Samhan, Gaya, or Buyeo, whose records were relatively lacking.

That's how strenuous it is to become the sword master. And here was Javier, who set such an extremely laborious feat as his "yearly resolution" and vowed to work hard for it. Had anybody else said it, it would have made them as nutty as a fruitcake. But given that it was coming from him, it didn't sound like a joke.

What a monster. Lloyd was lost in such thoughts when Javier's grim voice pierced into his ears.

"I shall endeavor my best to achieve the goal, so that I won't be surpassed by you."

"Eh...? Me?"

“Yes.”

“What about me?” Lloyd asked, curious.

To this, Javier replied with nonchalance in his voice.

“You have already created the triple circle and reached the level of owning a manaheart on top of that.”

“Oh, yes, I did.”

“I thought to myself that Master Lloyd may appear slow, dull, and dispirited on the outside, but in fact, he’s actually a genius in sword fighting.”

“What?! Slow and dull?” Lloyd’s brow twitched.

“If we’re only looking at sword fighting, yes, that was definitely the case,” replied Javier as if he was saying an objective fact.

“After all, you weren’t a quick learner or exceptionally strong or fast. To be a little more exact, you were below average.”

“Don’t you think that’s the case because you’re setting the standard as yourself?”

“Anyway, it looked like so to me.”

“It’s like I’m talking to a wall...” said Lloyd.

“What’s important is that I was wrong for thinking such. Truly, I never even imagined that you would create a manaheart in less than a year after you start training.”

“Huh. Is this where the conversation’s going.”

“Yes, so I’ve been feeling panicked that I will be surpassed by you, Master Lloyd.”

“What?!”

Hey, mister knight of the blood and iron. There's no way that would happen. Lloyd wanted to tell Javier that he wasn't a genius. He was simply developing things like the Asrahan Core Technique into a skill to invest in RP and enjoy speedier growth than other people. Lloyd could never catch up to Javier no matter how hard he trained. Never. Not in his lifetime. That was true even though he came to possess the triple circle and his triple mana blast was stronger than Javier's.

I mean, mine is just strong in its output. But it's nothing compared to Javier, who can make good use of it. It was true. There was no point in comparing in the first place. Basic stamina and strength, overall physique, mana employment skill—which reminded Lloyd of a solo guitar performance by Jimi Hendrix, reflex sense, ability to use strength, balance, employability, combat caliber, experience, fighting spirit, and overall technique... Javier was better in all of the categories. Analogizing it to a car, Javier was a 31st-century Formula-One car that was advanced and futuristic. Whereas he'd be...

A 20th-century Daewoo Tico with a fighter jet engine. Lloyd was equipped with the triple circle and mana blast, but he couldn't control it. It was like a lottery. That was the objective evaluation he had given himself. So you got nothing to worry about dude. But of course, Lloyd didn't say it out loud. There was no reason for him to tell Javier about the RP. Instead, he decided to leave his knight in his misunderstood state of crisis.

It's only a win for me if he trains hard and becomes a sword master early. Javier was burning with a zeal to get better, and Lloyd stole a smile as he looked at him. It began to snow in the afternoon, and the journey toward the royal capital resumed.

The journey ended quickly with no incidents or accidents. The only event worth mentioning was how one of the royal delegation members had been healed from terrible insomnia. It was the result of them overhearing Lloyd's lullaby service. Anyway, ten more days passed, and at last, the whole delegation arrived at Magenta, the royal capital.

“You will have an audience with Her Majesty right away. You are aware of the proper manners you must keep during your audience with the queen, yes?”

“Of course.”

Lloyd and Javier followed the royal messenger. The royal capital was a city of red and white. Nearly all the walls of the building were painted in warm beige color, while the roofs were made out of reddish brown tiles. The path that led from the outskirts of the royal capital to the palace was wide and immaculate.

But the shape of the royal castle is a bit strange. Lloyd threw his gaze to the distant royal castle as he walked through the path with the royal messenger. The palace had odd architecture. He had a vague image of the palace since he had read the description in The Knight of Blood and Iron. But the actual building held much more uniqueness than the novel had described.

It looks like a half-buried egg or a bunker in Supercraft. It was round, smooth, and flat. At the same time, there was something heavy about its appearance. Overall, it was as if a round and flat bunker was expanded hundreds of time. There were a multitude of different architectural characteristics from previous decades, including identifiable shapes distinct to Middle Age castles. Such piqued interest must have been noticeable to the others. The royal messenger, who was walking ahead, spoke.

“Are you thinking that our palace is shaped in a special way?”

“Yes. Yes, I am,” said Lloyd.

“Understandable,” the messenger said as he let out soft laughter.

“Everyone thinks the same when they see the palace for the first time. Antic and special. Nothing like a typical palace. Tell me, did you think such as well?”

“Not to such an extent,” denied Lloyd.

“I had heard rumors about it.”

“Then have you heard why the palace was built in such a shape?” asked the messenger again.

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded his head, recalling the portion of the novel that briefly mentioned the palace.

“I heard that it’s because the palace was built hundreds of years ago. Was it around the time when this city was called ‘Taliano’? I heard palace got plucked by the same dragon twice during that time when it was under the unfortunate rule of an idiotic king.”

“You are right. The history books speak of the absolute shock of the incident. And so, the royal castles built during the times took such a shape.”

“Was it to not get ‘plucked’ by dragons,” questioned Lloyd.

“It seemed so. Flat and round. No area to be grabbed. I heard that was the trending style in those days.”

“And that royal castle is the last egg-shaped castle that still stands to this day, am I right?” asked Lloyd.

“Haha. I see that you studied your history well. I like you more the longer I’m with you.”

“You exaggerate,” Lloyd answered modestly.

Lost in the conversation with the messenger, Lloyd found himself near the royal palace in no time. The delegation went through a set of complicated procedures before entering the place. Next, they headed right to the audience room, and it was only when Lloyd put on the new clothes that he realized he was in the royal palace.

Whew... Lloyd would be meeting the monarch soon. If Count Cremo was a big shot, the person he was about to meet was the most powerful individual who had the whole kingdom under her thumb. In other words, she was Lloyd's VVVIP with the most money.

Time to shine. Lloyd repeated in his head the temperaments and characteristics of the queen, which he had read in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Scenarios Lloyd had played over and over again on the way here flashed through his mind one more time. Now, he inspected for the last time the grand plan he yearned to actualize. Some moments later, the monarch, at last, entered the audience room.

"Presenting Her Majesty the Queen!"

Lloyd instantly got on his knee and lowered his head. He heard the sound of the door opening. The sound of confident footsteps. And the sound of someone sitting on the throne. At last, a clear and energetic voice rang aloud in Lloyd's ears.

"Lloyd Frontera and Javier Asrahan, lift up your gazes."

Lloyd lifted up his head and saw a pair of black leather boots beyond the red carpet. He then saw the brown leather pants of rough texture. A used long sword was wrapped around a firm and slim waist. His gaze traveled up to the modest outfit, strong upper torso and shoulders, and immaculate neckline.

The last that came into his view was the face of a woman who seemed to be in her late 30s. She had red hair, which rippled like a blaze of fire. Her emerald eyes brimmed with confidence and dignity, and they shone brightly against its blazing color. The moment his eyes locked with hers, Lloyd almost let out a gasp of admiration.

She's incredible. The monarch of this kingdom, and one of the two sword masters. The ruler of indomitable spirit, Alicia Termina Magentano. She exuded significantly more dignity and confidence than what he imagined from the description in the novel. It was even more so in the case of her voice.

"Are you Lloyd Frontera?" The queen asked as she looked down at Javier.

Lloyd flinched. And he said, “All hail Her Majesty the Queen. I, Lloyd Frontera, have come to salute Your Majesty, the rightful owner of all the lands.”

“You are...?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Lloyd Frontera?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm. How strange. From the looks of it, he looks more like a noble,” the queen said as she looked at Javier.

“...”

“Moreover, he seems to qualify to try a duel with me based on the aura I am getting from him.”

This time, Javier flinched as he paid his respect to the queen beside Lloyd. It had been only a few seconds since they met, but she saw through Javier and his level. Truly, Javier thought to himself, she was sharp-sighted, befitting the reputation of the sword master. Queen Magentano lifted her red eyebrows and spoke.

“Regardless, I have heard from the loyal and heartfelt testimony of Count Cremo about your heroic feat. Therefore, I commend the valor and the spirit of sacrifice you have demonstrated in Cremo city. However...”

The queen’s emerald eyes grew serious.

“I never hastily judge a person based on a word I hear from another. I trust only my eyes and nothing else. Therefore, I am filled with greed to confirm your abilities. Starting with you, Lloyd Frontera.”

“By ability, Your Majesty, please enlighten your dull subject what it is you wish to confirm,” answered Lloyd.

“It is simple. I have heard that your civil engineering skills are beyond exemplary. Therefore, you should come up with a wise answer to my question.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. I am at your service.”

The queen chuckled softly and asked a question.

“Lloyd Frontera, what do you think is the most urgent construction project that is needed here in Magenta?”

The queen’s smile was now meaningful. She had actually taken interest in Lloyd ever since she read the report from Count Cremo about his abilities.

Prove yourself. Then, I shall personally put you to good use. Queen Magentano stared at Lloyd with an answer in her mind. Her eyes flashed with a yearning to have a young talent around her. But, right at this moment, she was absolutely clueless as to what was happening. Lloyd was under her feet, respectfully looking down as he bowed his head. But he was smiling satisfyingly.

The time has come. It was just as he expected. Lloyd had analyzed over and over again his travel here. He went over whatever he could remember about the novel and inspected the rumors and records regarding the royal palace he had gathered. And so, the queen’s most wanted construction in the royal palace was already at the back of his mind. And now, the queen was asking the very question he had come prepared for. It felt like he was taking a final exam that only had questions he studied the night before.

So now, it’s time for me to grill her. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rolled slightly upward, and he wet his lips. He placed more force on his tongue.

“To dare answer your question, Your Majesty...”

Lloyd slyly began to speak. The queen was the biggest client of his in the entire kingdom, and Lloyd made his bid for victory to get construction requests by fulfilling all her desires.

Chapter 83: When Wrong Is Better Than Right (2)

“It is my humble opinion that we urgently need to build a new bridge on the Magena River that flows over the whole capital.”

The audience room was spacious but not too luxurious, reflecting the queen’s generous and broad-minded character. Lloyd’s voice rang aloud in the space, and Queen Alicia Termina Magentano’s brows twitched.

“A bridge?” she asked.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Do expound more,” she said.

“Yes, Your Majesty. I heard that the bridge built on the Magena River crumbles quite regularly.”

“Quite regularly...?”

This time, her brows furrowed.

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd’s voice remained calm nonetheless.

“Are you not exaggerating?”

“From a civil engineering perspective, it’s considered frequent when something crumbles once every couple decades.”

“Is it...?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd, who brazenly plastered an emotionless expression on his face.

Nonetheless, what he said was true. When something crumbled once every couple decades, it was considered “very frequent” from a civil engineering point of view. The bridge that was built over the Magena River fit the bill.

This issue is brought up several times in the novel. Even more, three years from now, this bridge will crumble again after a couple of decades.

The passage about the royal capital burst into his thoughts. The Magena River never saw a shortage of water throughout the four seasons, and the abundant water source brought prosperity to the city for eons. However, that very blessing simultaneously was a curse.

Each spring, the river gets flooded because of the rainy spring season in the east. Not only that, as the massive heaps of snow in mountain peaks melt during that time, the water level gets higher with it.

The spring flood chronically plagued the capital, especially the bridge that laid over the river. Ten years if short and fifty or sixty years if long. The bridge got destroyed by the deluge and the royal chamber spent a massive amount of money on construction to build a new bridge.

A similar case exists on earth, I think.

Heidelberg of Germany. The Karl Theodor Bridge in the Neckar River.

The first version of the bridge was built during the mid-eleventh century by Karl Theodor. But it got destroyed by a flood in 1228. I think a similar thing happened afterward.

It indeed did. The second bridge was destroyed in 1308, and the third and fourth bridges collapsed in 1340 and 1400, respectively. The fifth one was crushed in 1470, and the pattern continued to repeat itself even afterward.

The sixth bridge became a pile of rubble in 1565 because of the floating ice that drifted along a flood. The same thing happened to the next one because of the army of Louis XIV during the Nine Years' War. The eighth bridge was even fortified to become sturdier and more rigid. But it stood no chance when a flood and block of ice hit it in 1784.

As such, some people claimed that the Karl Theodor Bridge of today had ancestors that stretched up to nine generations. A similar event was happening in the novel, particularly in the royal capital of Magenta, just like what Heidelberg went through during the Middle Ages.

“I had heard that the bridge standing atop the Magena River saw the twelfth construction. Therefore, Your Majesty, it is my modest opinion that building up the destroyed bridge, again and again, is truly inefficient,” asserted Lloyd.

“Are you saying that building up what’s broken is inefficient?” asked the queen in disbelief.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Do you suggest that we put up a new bridge?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“If that is the case,” replied Queen Magentano, “are you confident that the bridge of yours will stand strong even in the brunt of the spring flood and floating ice?”

“Truly yes, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd.

Lloyd’s voice sounded firm, knowing that times like these called for confidence. In turn, the queen’s gaze sharpened.

“What if it falls?”

“Then...” Lloyd said as he bowed his head lower.

I would run away to a foreign country at once.

Deciding to take on the risk, Lloyd announced, “You may take my neck.”

“Are you serious?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. In return, however...”

“In return?”

“I ask that Your Majesty protect the status of my family until the new bridge I humbly build falls down,” demanded Lloyd.

“Protect your status. That is, until the new bridge collapses?”

“Exactly as you said, Your Majesty.”

By now, Lloyd had practically put his head to the ground. The queen’s eyebrows sharpened as she looked at the back of Lloyd’s round head.

Would you look at this boy.

This boy was the eldest son of the barony that sat in a remote province in the east and yet, he dared to negotiate with the queen. He demanded that his family’s noble status would be sustained for eternity. The sustainment of status could only mean one thing. No matter what happened, the fiefdom would never be confiscated. A lifelong pension that would grant them a minimum degree of dignity. These two were the actual requests hidden behind the outspoken demand.

Come to think of it, he talks as if building a new bridge is already a done decision!

A snort escaped the queen as she thought how deplorable and cheeky he was. This young man’s scheming was too plain and transparent. At the same time, she found his act to be cute and wondered how he could be so brazen in her presence. It was as if he was a puppy whimpering for some snacks to a lion. On top of that, what was the loss to the royal palace to build an unbreakable bridge? This made the queen’s voice slightly softer.

“So, does that mean you have a special plan in mind behind constructing the bridge that will never break?”

“Why, yes, Your Majesty.”

She’s falling for it. She’s almost there, Lloyd thought to herself. He deduced that from the way her voice turned gentle. He was glad that his play worked out.

This is it.

Just then, Lloyd was hit with the characteristic of Queen Magentano, which he read from The Knight of Blood and Iron. The ruler of the indomitable spirit, Alicia Termina Magentano. Much like her absolute power and strength, she was broad-minded and unstoppable. Not only that, she was fair and just and opened her ears to the advice of everyone regardless of their status.

Therefore, she despised pathetic, lowly people. Her inclinations are geared toward the type of people who are unabashed and direct in their speech regardless of class, just like how he spoke now. She liked to have that kind of people around her. Eventually, she would lose an arm after getting poisoned by her most trusted person. She would live but lose an arm. The trauma of betrayal would turn her into a completely different person. An atrocious tyrant who never trusted anyone. From a ruler of indomitable spirit, she would descend into a cold-blooded tyrant.

But thankfully, such an unfortunate event hasn't taken place yet.

That would happen three years later, based on the timeline of the novel. At this period in time, Queen Magentano was still bright and just, much like a red lion. So Lloyd thought his bold suggestion would work, calculating that he would have enough of a chance since the bridge-collapse incident was already enough of a headache for the royal palace. Now, his calculation was proven to be right. There was more conviction in his response.

"If we build a suspension bridge in the Magena River, no flood will ever be able to crumble it," Lloyd said.

"A suspension bridge?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

The queen cocked her head to the side. Lloyd made a declaration toward her, this time with more confidence.

“A suspension bridge refers to the bridge construction method suitable for bridges with a vast span. Generally, two high towers are erected tall on both sides, which are supported by a long cable... Blah Blah... The cables are fixed to the anchor blocks located on both sides of the bridge... Blah... The upside of this one is that there’s a pier in the river... Blah blah... Therefore, I humbly request...”

“Stop. Enough,” interrupted the queen.

“Are you done talking?”

“There is more to explain, but I shall stop if it is Your Majesty’s desire...” murmured Lloyd.

“That is enough. I already understand what you mean.”

The queen let out a sigh of disgust unconsciously, wiping off the sweat in her forehead with a handkerchief. She felt as though the explanation she had heard from Lloyd went into her left ear and slipped out of her right ear in one motion. Lloyd’s question turned sly.

“So, what does Her Majesty intend to do...?” Lloyd’s voice was gentle and uncertain.

“What I intend, you say,” said the queen and chuckled. “I have made myself clear that I shall be testing your capacity. You have given an answer to my question with enough confidence. Why else should I hesitate? Proceed.”

“Does Her Majesty mean that I can proceed with constructing the new bridge?” Lloyd asked.

“Indeed. Build it, and prove yourself. If you succeed, I shall reward you heavily, including the merits of yours back in Cremo. However...”

The chuckle on her mouth vanished, and her gaze grew stern.

“The cost of failing the construction shall be as great as your confidence.”

“I shall keep that in mind, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd bowed in respect. It was game on, and he was beyond the point of return. The time has come for him to show what he got.

“I have never seen anyone so insolent and pertinent in my presence.”

Now, the audience room was empty without Lloyd and Javier. Queen Magentano smiled in a wry manner. Just then, a middle-aged man’s voice was heard as if to second her sentiment.

“He appears clever and calculating, Your Majesty,” said the commander of the royal knights, who was standing ramrod straight behind her all along.

“Sir Kyle, did you notice it as well?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Ha, yes. He is more shrewd than I had thought.”

The wry smile hanging in her mouth deepened. Just then, she was hit with the report she received from Count Cremo. The report made an evaluation of Lloyd Frontera in such way:

“A cunning talent who will surprise everyone by utilizing everything in his power if a clear profit is at stake.”

“He indeed knew what the report said he was, but I never expected him to come up with such a wrong answer,” confessed the queen.

“By the wrong answer...”

“I mean about my question and the answer Lloyd Frontera gave,” the queen expounded.

“Is Your Majesty speaking about the urgent construction of the new bridge over the Magena River?”

“Yes.”

“If you say that is the wrong answer-”

“I already had an answer in mind,” she said, her words as sharp as a knife. In fact, there was an answer at the back of her mind when she tossed the question to Lloyd. It had nothing to do with the bridge construction nor about the deluge or the Magena River.

“I was thinking of the palace repair,” she added.

“Ah...!” Sir Kyle exclaimed as he processed her words.

“Truly, you could not be any more correct. The ten-year regular palatial repair construction is just around the corner...”

“Yes, you are right. It has been constructed way too thick and sturdy to prepare against the dragon. Therefore, it is heavy and requires frequent maintenance. That was the answer I had in my mind. Anyone well-versed in architecture would utter the answer as me.”

However, it wasn’t the case. Lloyd gave an answer that was poles apart from hers. It was absolutely a wrong answer, but it couldn’t simply be considered one.

To be honest, the construction of the bridge over the Magena River was always necessary. But there weren’t really any spot-on measures in plan.

It was true. Her ancestors had mulled over the same issue, which was the flood that regularly occurred in spring when the snow melts after winter. The only method against such a violent natural disaster was a sturdier bridge. So, they constructed a new bridge that was sturdier than the one before each time the bridge collapsed. The same thing took place after some decades. The reason behind it was simple, and it was because of the engineering dilemma.

The builders told me once that the piers that support the bridge must be constructed with more strength and thickness for a sturdier bridge. But the thicker and sturdier the piers become, the greater the water pressure they receive.

Although she was almost ignorant when it came to construction, she was able to grasp the part the builders reported to her because the behind principle was simple. Piers are the pillars that support the bridge legs that stand in the water. So, they are exposed to the constant pressure of the flowing river water. What would happen if the piers thickened and widened? The spaces that receive the pressure of the flowing water would widen.

To overcome that, the builders attempted wedge-shaped piers. They even installed a wooden facility that would protect the piers from drifting ice blocks. However, they were nothing but band-aid measures because they fell short of protecting the flood. Each time the deluge struck the bridge, it helplessly collapsed, and people eventually resigned and gave up.

All they could do was rebuild it as robustly as possible. Once it broke, there was nothing else to do but redo the construction. They regarded it as a tax they pay to the power of nature on a regular basis. That was the policy Queen Magentano upheld for the Magena River. Therefore, Queen Magentano never held an iota of expectation Lloyd would come up with an innovative measure. She never even imagined he could.

But Lloyd Frontera provided the solution in his answer to my question.

The queen had an answer she wanted and Lloyd gave a wrong answer. It was wrong, but it was better than her original one.

I shall stay put and watch first.

Queen Magentano decided to watch the construction of the suspension bridge Lloyd had talked about and observed his ability. If he’s proven to be capable, then she will make great use of him. Filled with the expectation from the queen, Lloyd began to prepare the construction of the bridge.

Chapter 84: Julian Frontera (1)

It was an exceptionally bright afternoon. Lloyd created a shadow with his hand to protect his face from the blazing winter sun. He narrowed his eyes under his makeshift shadow and surveyed the Magena River.

Measure. Crackle...! A mysterious aura filled Lloyd’s eyes, and the sight in front of him changed just then. Countless pieces of data floated on the scene straight ahead of him, and it was like he was looking at the world through augmented reality technology. Thanks to this skill, Lloyd was easily able to figure out the topographic information of the land that spread along the Magena River.

The sloped river bank is covered with flat stones. There’s a road for people and carriages to travel on the bank, and right across the road is occupied by buildings... Hmm, this seems like a challenge.

The Magena Rive flew through the center of the royal capital, much like the Han River in South Korea. But one thing was different, and it was that the river was closely flanked by the city district. The distance between the roads and houses and the river bank wasn’t much, and quite a lot of areas were only about three feet apart.

In that sense, this river’s more like the Seine River of Paris, France, or the Danube River of Budapest in Hungary. It wasn’t that he had been to Paris or Budapest. But he did encounter them when he read materials about city development. Anyway, the crux of the matter was that this place he had just surveyed was far from being unpopulated. It was poles apart from the river banks that remained uninhabited and untrodden. Just then, a horse-drawn carriage passed by, the horse neighing and coughing and heaving a sigh. And to top it off, she relieved a heavy lump of feces on the road and clip-clopped away.

But that wasn’t the end of it. Several groups of merchants walked past Lloyd, which reminded him of Hongdae street on Friday night. Even more, several clusters of people suddenly stopped dead in their tracks and started to murmur among themselves, throwing a gaze at Lloyd's side.

"Oh, my! Would you look at him?"

"How can a man be as handsome as a sculpture?"

"The sun is shining brighter because of him..."

"Hmm, how handsome. His face shines in handsomeness, much like when I was young."

"My lord, you still shine even right now."

"Hahaha, is that so?"

"Yes. Your balding forehead does shine bright against the sun."

"Hmph! Tell me, do you wish for today to be your last day at work?"

The people continued to gush all around them. Dozens, hundreds of sets of eyes, both men and women, glimmered in adoration, and they were fixated on one thing. Javier.

Woah, this is nuts. Lloyd heaved a heavy sigh, and he threw a blaming gaze at Javier beside him.

"Hey," Lloyd called.

"You called for me, Master Lloyd?"

"Yes, I did."

"What can I do for you?"

Javier spoke nonchalantly with a straight face. Lloyd bitterly retorted at Javier, saying, "What can you do for me? Well, can you keep a distance when you follow me?"

“Excuse me?” Javier arched one of his brows.

“Excuse me, my ass. Will you look over there?”

“…”

“What do you see?” asked Lloyd.

“I see people,” Javier said casually.

“Right? And what are they doing?”

“They are murmuring as they look at us.”

“I am sure you can hear every word among the murmurs, right?” asked Lloyd.

“Of course.”

“So, do you not feel anything?”

“I do,” Javier replied nonchalantly.

“I think I should get a basket before we go back to the quarters in the palace.”

“A basket?”

“Yes.”

“Why?” Lloyd asked, the corners of his lips gradually rising in contentment. He was surprised to hear that Javier would come up with such a thoughtful idea. A sense of pride rushed through him. Even now, the groups gushing over Javier’s appearance were quickly growing. Lloyd was distracted by Javier’s groupies, who seemed to be seconds away from forming a fan club. They were getting in the way of surveying.

“Do you plan on wearing it and covering your face?” Lloyd added.

“Since you plan to wear one, it’d be good if you cover yourself with a large basket.”

Lloyd beamed as he threw a joke. However, Javier didn’t laugh for some reason. Instead, he simply quirked his head and spoke as if he couldn’t understand what Lloyd was referring to.

“Wear it over my head? Why should I cover my face?” retorted Javier.

“Eh...?”

“I would like to inform you in advance that the basket is not for such purpose,” said Javier.

“Then what is it for...?”

“It is,” answered Javier, “to take the things I’ll receive back to the room with ease.”

“The things you will receive? Wait a minute...”

“Yes, I am talking about my love letters.”

“...”

“When I receive a handful of them, I do not mind at all. But it becomes a problem when they start to stack up. You see, the size of the letters and envelopes all vary. On top of that, there are some women who write something down at the spot and give the letters to me.”

“So,” huffed Lloyd, “you’re getting the basket to carry love letters?”

“Yes.”

“...”

Javier nodded much too confidently, as if there was nothing strange or extraordinary about this whole situation. Lloyd found himself biting his underlip.

Ha, how I despise handsome guys. They were the most cunning people in the entire world. Lloyd wished in his mind that they would get hemorrhoids and better if they suffered from chronic constipation. Holding such a small wish in the corner of his heart, Lloyd spoke, almost growling.

“Fine. Do what suits you with the basket. Just make sure that you keep your distance from me.”

“Why should I do that?” demanded Javier.

“Because I can’t focus.”

Lloyd was speaking the truth.

“Sure, they have the liberty to chatter in groups, but they’re blocking most of the view. Seriously, what’s up with those people gathering around like they don’t have a job?! Don’t they have work to do?”

He huffed.

“I need to take time and go around the riverside and the bank to do the surveying and view at the land. But, look, it’s like they came to a celebrity meet-and-greet or the zoo to see a monkey. Haah, what in the world is this.”

“Are you saying that they’re disrupting your surveying?” asked Javier.

“Of course.”

“Will you be less distracted if I walk keeping some distance away from you?”

“Probably.”

“Then I cannot do what you order me to do.”

“Why not...?”

“It is somewhat amusing to watch you get in a bad mood out of jealousy.”

“What?!”

“It was a joke.”

“It didn’t sound like one. Not at all,” Lloyd said and narrowed his eyes.

Javier, who was still wearing a straight face, replied, “It is a joke. I am your personal knight, and this place bustles with people. I think it is imperative for me to be close to you to prepare for any unexpected situations.”

“And amuse yourself by getting the taste of my foul mood, yes?” said Lloyd.

“Is that how you feel?”

“Yeah. Sure, you protect my body, but you beat the heck out of my mind. How fun, right?”

“You’re right on the dot, Master Lloyd.”

“...”

“Heh.”

“...”

I should just shut up and survey. Berating his fate of having a ridiculously handsome man by his side, Lloyd focused on surveying. In actuality, the onlookers did distract him from doing his job. But since he couldn’t sweep them away, Lloyd decided to move around and pivot here and there to observe and gather data. As he did so, he naturally came to one realization.

There was a reason why the bridge kept collapsing. Several areas around the riverside held traces of regular flooding. He wouldn’t have noticed them with his naked eyes, but the survey allowed a vivid look at them because of the trace ingredients left in the stones and soils.

Though it’s very few, the soil of this city district and the one in another land remain a little just up to the level the river rose. Its alien component is something I could find in the slope colluvium in upstream.

It seemed that the soil composed of different ingredients that sat in the river upstream flowed down here by the flood and left small remaining sediments with the rising flood. But the water level was higher than Lloyd expected.

When the water level reached its peak, the piers, flat surfaces, roads, and carriages became submerged under the flood. An ordinary stone bridge wouldn't be able to withstand that kind of force.

The beam was the part of the bridge where people crossed, and such a high water level was detrimental to the bridge. Since the structure was long and wide by design, the massive amount of flowing river water put pressure onto the bridge's crossway. Not only that, it was also affected by the buoyancy of the full swelling water. The force of balance that kept the bridge intact was completely thrown off as a result.

And even if that was the case, there was a reason why they couldn't construct a tall bridge.

In order for the stone bridge to be constructed high, the piers that supported the deck had to be equally sturdy and large. But that would disrupt the flow of the river water because of their sheer size, which exposed them to a significant amount of water pressure. The sturdier the builders attempted to construct the bridge, the stronger the water pressure became. Thus, the efforts to build a bigger bridge ironically led to equally high risks. That was the dilemma.

I knew I was smart to argue for the construction of the suspension bridge. Lloyd quietly nodded his head, thinking about the suspension bridge he had asserted to the queen. Most of the issues plaguing this stone bridge would be fixed, and it would evade the misfortune that fell on the bridges that came before. It was because suspension bridges didn't need to be built in the middle of the river.

The river is about 260 yards wide. I think I can erect the bridge towers on both ends of the bank without having them submerged in water. That was the plan. First, he would erect the bridge towers and lay a cable through them. The cables would be used to support and float the bridge in the air, and that would almost eliminate the possibility of the structure getting struck by the flood. That was what Lloyd had estimated in mind. But, of course, the job wasn't a walk in the park. In fact, in all honesty, it was an extraordinary challenge.

Since Lloyd knew how critical the task was, he isolated himself in his room in the palace since that evening after he came back from surveying. Through the nights, Lloyd engrossed himself in building the suspension bridge. He made countless models and ran simulations to test them out. This process was repeated several times. The most important matter in this design was the production of cables, which were a sort of rope made by intertwining thick metal wires.

"Hey, Bangul."

"Bangul?"

Lloyd was contemplating over how to produce cables when an idea hit him. So he asked Bangul, who was goofing around beside him.

"About your steel dung."

"Bangul!"

"Can you make it come out more thinner than usual?"

"Bba-bangul?!"

"Uhm, if you ask how thin... This thin?"

Lloyd closed his thumb and index fingers near his eye, and it was about 0.2 inches thick.

"Just this thick," announced Lloyd.

"Baaangul?"

"Can you do it?"

“Banguuul?”

Bangul tilted her head in a snobby manner, which made Lloyd wonder if that was a yes or no. Her response was ambiguous. At the same time, she seemed to be wanting something.

So Lloyd carefully asked, “Are you saying you can if I do something for you?”

“Bangul!”

Bangul excitedly nodded up and down. And she gushed forth as if she was happy that Lloyd understood her.

“Bba-bangul! Bangul! Bangul Bangul Bangul! Bba-bangul! Bba-bang Bba-bangul!”

“What...? You need a 1:1 proportion of oil-based clay and stone power clay? And you need sand rich with magnetite, decomposed granite soil, and pebbles?”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

“And you’d prefer everything to be made in the shape of a pizza?”

“Bba-bangul!”

“The clay should be spread like a dough? And the others on top?”

“Bangul!”

“Are you saying that while I’m at it, I should get basalt, obsidian, azure stone, talcum, and tin as toppings?”

“Bba-bangul!”

“My dear client, anything else you need? Red clay cheese crust, perhaps?”

“Bangul!”

“I’m glad that’s all you want...”

Bangul was explaining that only the right types and proportions of dirt allowed her to produce thin and elastic metal bars like wires. To his relief, the materials Bangul enumerated weren’t impossible to get his hands on.

“Okay. I’ll tell the people in the palace that I need those materials,” said Lloyd.

“Bangul!”

Lloyd headed to visit the relevant official in the royal palace and requested the said materials, adding that they were essential to building the suspension bridge the queen had ordered him to construct. Maybe it was the mention of the queen’s name. The official told him that it would just take a few days for everything to be ready.

I know it’s a bit much, but those thin wires are a must. That was the only way to produce cables. In particular, the 0.2-inch wire he had requested Bangul to create was essential to this construction project. It would be used to make a Parallel Wire Strand (PWS).

Whew... I think I’m all set for now. Lloyd had been giving up sleep and struggling over the design for a few days after isolating himself in his room. So it was his first time to come outside since starting the project. As the pent-up tensions loosened in his body, Lloyd’s head felt a bit dizzy and empty.

I need to rest my brain for a bit. I should rest today. Lloyd massaged the back of his neck which grew tense and strained. Actually, he still had a mountain of tasks for the project to finish. However, he knew that he’d be the one who would get finished first if he continued this arduous, back-breaking work.

And luckily, I have some other business I can take care of during this stroll. Suddenly, a bitter smile escaped him. It just dawned on him. A reminder he had completely forgotten about as he was engrossed in the work given to him by the queen.

“Once you arrive at the capital, do give this to your brother. And make sure to tell him that we love him.”

A memory of the day he left for the capital popped into his head. He also remembered the baron couple’s reminder. They had handed him a huge bundle, which contained all sorts of items.

Homemade bacon slices from the fiefdom, a winter coat, a blanket, and so many other small items... Goodness. It’s not like I’m a bundle merchant.

His smile deepened the more he thought about it. Lloyd could see so clearly the image of the baron and baroness busily getting ready to fill this bag. And so...

I should move around and get some air today. Lloyd returned to his quarters and left again, carrying the large bundle he had accepted out of courtesy from the baron couple. He then cut across the capital city district and headed to the Royal Academy, the Magenta College, in the capital to fulfill his errand.

Julian Frontera was mentioned as the brother of Lloyd in The Knight of Blood and Iron. He was this unfortunate talent whose time came too early despite his studious years in the academy. And now, the moment to meet this mysterious younger brother was closing in.

Chapter 85: Julian Frontera (2)

“The person you are looking for is Julian Frontera, is that right?”

“Yes, that’s right.”

“What is your name?”

“Lloyd Frontera.”

“And what is your relationship with Julian Frontera?”

Relationship? Lloyd paused and thought for a second.

“Family,” he finally said.

Since he’s related by blood, Julian was his family. But it was awkward for him to utter the word “younger brother.” It felt strange. After all, Lloyd had never met Julian before, and he never had a younger brother, let alone a brother back in South Korea. The housemaster didn’t make any issues with his response, which relieved Lloyd.

“Very good. Now, please show me the token to verify your identity.”

“Here.”

This part was a breeze. He simply held out the family necklace, and the magical verification device in the necklace became activated.

Flash! A hologram image floated on the necklace. It was the face of Lloyd. He brought the image near his face, and it turned blue. It was a match.

“You are verified. Please wait here for a second,” said the housemaster.

“Thank you.”

Lloyd sat down and waited in the lobby, which was an antique space teeming with dark brown trees and the smell of old books. As he sat all alone there, a sense of nervousness began to creep inside him.

Julian, was it? Even the novel didn't mention much about him. Julian Frontera, the younger brother of Lloyd. He never made any direct appearance in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Instead, he was briefly mentioned around the time the Frontera barony went up into flames.

When the barony fell, he had no way to pay the tuition. Eventually, he got chased out of the academy and died on the same day it happened. A thief stabbed him with a knife in the back alley while he was looking for a place to sleep.

He fought the thief to protect his mother's pendant. And he was stabbed just like that. The unpopulated area squashed any hopes of survival. The boy, fallen to the ground of the alley corner, struggled until dawn, desperately calling in his feeble voice for help. But no one came. His final breath was in the puddle of his own blood thirty minutes before the sun rose. His death was a futile, unfortunate one. The book even mentioned that his death was more unfortunate because he was a good student at the academy.

His studious nature was all that the book mentioned about him. That was all Lloyd knew about Julian Frontera. He had absolutely zero idea about his personality, likes and dislike, and relationship with Lloyd. Nothing. So he was now getting the anxious.

Goodness. He's not going to see me through, is he? Lloyd dismissed the thought right away. After all, Julian was seeing Lloyd after almost three years. Even if Julian found his tone and mannerism to be a little off, Lloyd simply needed to convince him that it was the years of separation that changed him.

There's the perfect expression at a time like this. Turning over a new leaf. Turning over a new leaf. An older brother who came to his senses. That was the role he was going to play today. Lloyd was thinking over his plan prior to meeting Julian when he heard someone.

"What are you doing here? Why did you come here?"

A grouchy, no, a cold, harsh voice pierced into his ears. Lloyd turned his gaze toward the source of the voice, and there he found a young child who had an air of maturity around him. With orange curly hair and freckles on his face, the boy seemed to be, at most, 15 or 16 years old. His mature impression was even more noticeable in contrast with his physique. He was small, barely going over 5’2. His slim body accentuated his small physique, and the features on his face were cute and small, much like a doll.

That’s Julian? Lloyd simply stared at a baby-faced boy who he thought was Julian, and this made the boy grimace.

“Again, why did you come here?” He was still grouchy and thorny. Lloyd became convinced after seeing the boy’s attitude.

Yeah, it’s Julian. Lloyd had heard that Julian was the same age as Javier. 21 years old. So Lloyd was a little confused when he saw Julian’s much more youthful appearance. But the explicit grouchiness told Lloyd that the boy in front of him was indeed Julian. A corner of Lloyd’s lips rose, and he chuckled.

“Why else?”

Lloyd rose from his seat and took a big step to get closer to him. That made Julian flinch, but his green eyes nonetheless held much obstinacy, which seemed more like a venomous resolution to remain strong and undefeated.

Let’s not get too involved with this kid for now. Lloyd and Julian. Lloyd was in the dark about their brotherhood. He didn’t want to rush into Julian’s life too much just yet. After all, he planned on returning to the fiefdom after building the suspension bridge anyway. The boy wasn’t going to meet a tragic end like in the story, so there really was no reason for him to get too involved.

So I’m just going to tell him what the baroness hammered into my head and leave. Lloyd lifted the bundle and held it out to Julian, who was still glaring daggers at him.

“Here.”

Fwump. A considerably large bag got tossed into his small embrace.

“What, argh.”

It looked like it was heavier than he expected as his two legs staggered as he caught the bag.

“Any place to eat around here?” asked Lloyd.

“Eat? Do you mean a meal?” asked Julian incredulously.

“Yeah.”

“Why?”

“I was instructed to have a meal with you when we met,” said Lloyd coolly.

“Who said that?” retorted Julian.

“Who else?”

What Lloyd just suggested was one of the things the baroness told Lloyd countless times when he departed for the royal capital. Julian seemed to have understood that somewhat even without a proper explanation.

“Oh, goodness sake.” Julian’s nose crinkled.

“This way.”

Julian spoke, turning with the bag in his embrace. He led along the hallway, where there was a cafeteria for the visitors. Located on the first floor, it was a place frequented by families and friends who came to see the students.

“What are you having anyway?”

Julian asked after getting a seat first. Then he started observing Lloyd.

Tsk. Julian instantly retracted his decision to observe Lloyd because his mood soured the moment he laid his eyes on him. There wasn’t any particular reason behind it. That was how he always felt about his brother.

“I’m telling you in advance, but you can’t drink here,” said Julian.

It was Julian’s way of taking precaution. At the same time, he felt like he was on pins and needles when he remembered the type of person Lloyd was.

He can be thrown to the corners of Hell, and he’ll still go looking for booze. It was Lloyd who had said that his body became all itchy and red if he lived a day without alcohol. And each day, he threw his drunken tantrum at all people. Breaking stuff in the house was commonplace. Sometimes, he hit people, and Julian wasn’t an exception. Arguably, Lloyd whacked Julian the most. When Julian was young, Lloyd beat him for not doing his errands. When Julian grew older, Lloyd beat him for hovering around while he was drinking. His violence grew worse to the point that Lloyd whacked, punched, and kicked Julian for always living an upright life. It pestered Lloyd. That was how much of a piece of trash Lloyd was. He was one of the most disgusting scumbags Julian ever met. And so, Julian couldn’t believe the current situation.

What could that man possibly accomplish? Just then, an event from a few days ago popped into his head. A man from the royal palace came looking for him and shared the news about Cremo, the city of commerce. The city was the center of Cremona, the region where part of his hometown was located. The man had said that the Gigatitan wreaked havoc by arriving on the inland. The sailboats that floated in celebration of the statue construction sank, and the actual statue and the posts were destroyed. Even more, the city district was set on fire.

But no one died, according to the man. Moreover, I was told someone exerted superhuman courage and selflessness to fight against the Gigatitan. Julian was honestly very impressed, and his heart was filled with awe to the point that it began to thump when he heard the story. The reason behind the man from the palace telling him the story was lost in his thoughts. He was curious. He wanted to know the man behind such a fantastic achievement. He wondered what kind of life the man led and what kind of wisdom he held. Julian direly wanted to know more about him, and if he could, Julian wanted to meet the man and learn from him. Become a bit like him after personally meeting the amazing hero with his own eyes. In short, Julian was mesmerized by this hero. So he did a double take when he heard the name of the hero, which forced Julian to scratch his head in confusion several times.

No way! The hero who saved Cremo, the city of commerce. His name was Lloyd Frontera. Julian couldn't believe it and for obvious reasons. But eventually, he was left with no choice but to buy it because the story was told by the man from the palace. So it had to be true. On top of that, the man reminded Julian that he should not speak of this to anyone for the time being as the official announcement would be made when Her Majesty sent a letter to Lloyd Frontera. His brain felt numb. The longer Julian listened, the more dazed he became. It felt as though he got hit by a hammer in the back of his head.

Lloyd Frontera?! Not in a million years. There must have been a misunderstanding, or something must have gone terribly wrong. Everyone could have gotten confused. If not, they might be enchanted or possessed by something evil.

Those thoughts were what first came to Julian. There was definitely something missing here. Something distorted or misunderstood. It didn't make sense otherwise. His scumbag drunkard of a brother was the last person who could obtain such an accomplishment. He was nothing but a scum who drank every day and got in trouble. That was all he was.

That's what I'd thought... Julian lifted his head and glanced across the table. Lloyd was slowly going through the menu. For some reason, he wasn't browsing the alcohol section. He was simply looking at the food selections with a serious expression. And just then, Lloyd looked up, locking gaze with Julian.

"What are you looking at?" asked Lloyd.

"Eh...?"

“If you want to look at it first, go ahead. I’m buying. This restaurant is for visitors, so it’s not free, is it?” asked Lloyd.

“Y-Yes. Yes,” muttered Julian.

“Then take your pick.”

Tap. The way Lloyd passed the menu. The slight scoff. It all felt too distant and strange. Julian thought that Lloyd was acting odd.

“...”

Julian covered his face with the menu after receiving it from Lloyd. He couldn’t focus on anything that was on the menu. And he started blabbing out words without meaning to.

“Uhm, you see, how’s Sir Asrahan?”

“Javier?”

“Yeah.”

“What about him?” asked Lloyd.

“I heard you came here with him,” answered Julian.

“Have you been keeping up with my news?”

“Yeah...”

Shoot! Why am I having this kind of conversation with that person?!

Julian grasped the menu. Lloyd Frontera is not ordering booze? But he always cursed and lashed out at me every time we had a conversation that was longer than ten words!

Since the situation was terribly strange, awkward, alienating, far-flung, severing, and shocking, Julian even let his mind come up with an eerie possibility that the man in front of him might not be his real brother. In short, he was a bit befuddled. But Lloyd was completely ignorant to what was going on inside Julian. He simply spoke, his tone dripping with much more humanness.

“Well, one thing led to another, and then we’re here. Don’t mind us too much,” assured Lloyd.

“Okay...”

“Oh, did you want to see Javier?”

“Eh...? Yeah, a little.”

“Are you upset that I didn’t bring him?” asked Lloyd.

“Not to that extent.”

“Then, good. He actually wanted to tag along, but I stopped him.”

“You stopped him?”

“Yeah. It gets really rowdy when he’s around. He attracts people’s attention,” said Lloyd.

“Y-Yes, you’re right. He’s handsome and cool.”

“Anyway, that’s why I stopped him. He was being stubborn about it, so I told him that I wouldn’t sing a lullaby to him anymore. That shut him up right away.”

“A lullaby?”

“Don’t worry about it. Anyway-”

Lloyd, who was talking very well, suddenly stopped talking and turned serious. This made Julian flinch. Finally, Lloyd opened his mouth and asked, “have you decided what to eat?”

“Huh?” Julian’s voice was raised a pitch.

“What are you getting so surprised for? I’m asking if you have decided. The menu.”

“Oh, yes. This one,” Julian said.

“Get something more expensive.”

“If you’ve chosen what to eat, put down the menu.”

“...”

Julian wanted to keep his face covered like this. Lloyd’s behavior was making him feel unbearably awkward and uncomfortable. He bit his bottom lip, hanging his head down.

Ha. This is nuts. It had been a long while since Julian met Lloyd. It was an unexpected meeting as well. When the housemaster informed him that his older brother was here, Julian wondered if he had heard it right. And on the way down here, he even made a stern resolution to not get distracted and swayed by Lloyd like in the past. That was why he had acted in such a grouchy manner. He treated Lloyd with as much sharpness as he could muster. Otherwise, that man would either hit him or throw an ugly fit, Julian expected.

I planned to call the housemaster if that happened. The housemaster would have the authority to kick Lloyd out. He wanted to keep the meeting with Lloyd as short and brief as possible. But his plan failed within ten minutes because of Lloyd’s eerily normal behaviors.

Should I just ask upfront why he’s acting like this? To be honest, Julian held many questions for Lloyd. For starters, why was he acting so normal? And what kind of scheme did he employ to trick Cremo people into believing that he accomplished something there? Julian finally lifted his gaze to ask those questions. He then threw a determined gaze at Lloyd, but just at that moment, Julian witnessed something he never expected to see.

Chapter 86: How To Eradicate Violence (1)

Huh? Julian opened his eyes wide, lifting his gaze after working up some courage to ask Lloyd what had happened back in Cremo. But when he did, every bit of his courage and determination vanished into thin air. Was it because he saw Lloyd's face and changed his mind? No. It was because he spotted a man coming his way from behind Lloyd.

Diego? Diego was his classmate, and they were both the same age. But Diego was much bigger, so he was stronger with a deeper voice. No matter, they got along just fine since they started attending the academy around the same time. But that lasted only a month after enrollment. After that...

"Julian Frontera. Did I not make myself loud and clear that you should not eat where you can be seen in the dorm?"

Diego was already near Julian, and his voice was a low growl. The threatening voice pierced into Julian's eardrum. Julian hung his gaze down. It happened against his will. Diego's robust and veiny hand on the table came into view.

Why did he have to come now? Julian berated the situation he found himself in. He was now meeting Lloyd for the first time in a while and was struggling hard not to lose the power struggle against him, the ever-scumbag. But that was all pointless because he was confronted by Diego, who couldn't seem to ever leave him alone. He had the worst luck.

"Oh, I-I..." Julian stuttered.

"What?"

"..."

Julian bit and chewed his lips. Diego, who was now looking down at Julian, was overcome with hatred. What a scrawny jerk he is. Diego didn't like Julian, but it wasn't always the case. When he first got to this academy, the Magenta College, Diego was all alone, and he knew nobody because he came from a far-flung province. There was, however, only one person that first came up to him. Julian.

"Hey, I came here last night too."

One day difference. Similar enrollment. And it turned out that their hometowns were very close. Diego and Julian found a friend in one another, and the two became close. They hung out together all throughout the month, and during that time, Diego was surprised to find that Julian was a bright and intelligent kid. Grammar, logic, law, natural philosophy, geometry, and even astrology... Julian was able to comprehend the studies others found difficult. Not only that, he was dutiful. Throughout the time he'd been with Julian as a roommate, he never saw the latter sleeping in. Waking up an hour earlier than everyone else , he washed up, had breakfast, and got ready for class. Diego was impressed but only for a month.

Intelligence and work ethic. I realized in the first month that you didn't need any of that in this place. Diego scoffed in his head. A snort escaped him when he thought of what he had realized during the first month of school. This royal academy was established to educate noble children, but studying barely mattered to the students here. Something else held greater significance than getting good grades, which was family status. The whole academy was all about forming connections with other families. Engage in school politics with such connections. Build relationships with other families at such young ages and create their own cartel and sanctuary. Maintain it for the rest of their lives, even after they become the bearers of the family name. Continue capitalizing on the formed relationship and maintain power. The secret society of nobles where they supported each other's interests. Their own cartels. At its core, the academy's existence was to lay the foundation for this system.

It's funny, but it's undeniably true. The world was ruled by power. And power was maintained through connections. Work could be given to those who studied hard. When this truth hit Diego, he changed.

"Starting today, don't act like you know me."

The first action Diego took was distancing himself from Julian. He warned Julian to stay away from him with a straight face. At first, Julian reacted with confusion because he couldn't understand what Diego was saying. So, as a way to make his point, Diego punched Julian. One bruise on Julian's eye. That shut him up. The reason behind distancing himself from Julian was simple.

He's the son of a tiny rural barony. The lowest among the nobles. No power. No fame. So Diego had zero reasons to be close to Julian. Heck, he was rather afraid that he might hit rock bottom, just like Julian and his family. He believed that was the worst thing that could happen to him.

My family isn't a very powerful one, either. In fact, Diego's family was a viscount. His family's financial situation allowed him to live in clover because of the viscounty's specialty product, but it was nothing compared to the real nobles in the royal capital. And so, Diego chose to be a bully and started to suck up to the students who were high up in the hierarchy. He groveled to the sons of noble families, becoming their right hand whenever they needed him. In the process, he didn't forget to pester and harass the sons of lower nobles like Julian. It was a way of drawing the line between him and these lowly nobles, a way of publicizing his superiority over the others. In short, Diego became a devoted dog of the sons of noble families in the royal capital.

That was what was happening right now. A hunter dog was proving his existence by hunting. Diego moved forward, coming within inches of Julian's face as though he was studying his prey.

"I am asking you right now. What did you think when you decided to come to eat here?" Diego growled.

"..."

"Answer."

"Uhm... Uhm..."

"Uhm, what?"

“I had to today... It’s...” muttered Julian.

“Had to? Why?”

“...”

“Are you suddenly excused from the rule whenever someone comes to visit? Is that it?”

“...”

“What did we learn in law? The law is not malleable, and you’re violating it right now,” reminded Diego.

“...”

“What’s the rule here?”

“That’s...”

“Losers from lowly baronies should not eat in public. Why? It’s annoying to see. Did you forget that?”

“...”

Julian’s mouth clamped shut. He clenched his molars. He wanted to fight back, rebut that bullcrap. But he couldn’t do so because he’d only find himself in an uglier situation. Nobody protected him here. He could yell and bawl that it was unfair. But no one listened to him. Why? Simple. The families of the bullies held much greater power. The memories of harassment and powerlessness flooded his mind, suppressing his desire to fight back. Instead of doing that, Julian shot a gaze at Lloyd. However, it wasn’t a gaze asking for help.

Don’t interfere. Julian spoke via his gaze. He asked Lloyd not to intervene in this situation. One thoughtless intervention held the potential to damage his family and wound everyone up in an unnecessary dispute. So he asked his brother to pretend he didn’t see any of it. Lloyd, who was watching over the whole thing, answered with his gaze as well.

Yeah, of course. Why would I intervene? Lloyd shrugged and visibly raised his brows. At first, the whole didn't make any sense to him. But a few glimpses of their exchange granted Lloyd to understand the whole thing. This was also something he had commonly seen in South Korea.

Well, how unoriginal. School bullying. Bullying. School violence. Being born and raised in South Korea, the very scene in front of him was a daily occurrence. Of course, there wasn't necessarily a time he got bullied by the others. But he did witness a lot of such cases. Elementary school. Middle school. High school. All classrooms were operated under a jungle-like system of power. The so-called bullies ruled the turf, while the fawning students never left the former's sides. School life turned extremely difficult for anyone who became the target of those bullies. No, it was much worse. All sorts of inhumane harassment and torture followed them all year. School violence. It was ubiquitous, but everyone turned a deaf ear and blind eye to it. Not a single South Korean student could be freed from it. And this world didn't seem much different.

Well, this is also a place run by humans. Lloyd stared at Julian sitting across from the table. He was short and small and had a bad family name. Of course, when compared to the entire population of the kingdom, the baron status was something to be proud of. However, Julian was in the royal academy. That was the problem.

Only the nobles who get recommended can study here. Julian, too, received the recommendation, and he enrolled here with much support from his family, only to be stigmatized as the lowest ranking student in the hierarchy of the academy.

But Lloyd didn't uncross his arms. He simply stayed put, watching. Was it because of Julian's favor? No. Let's just watch for now. He didn't want to butt in thoughtlessly. After all, he was just a passersby who might never return here after today. But what would happen if he meddled and blew this whole thing up? What if he took care of this threatening student and went back and never returned? Julian would be left all alone, and...

It's going to make it worse for this kid. The sense of victory and relief would be short-lived. The harassment and bullying would get even worse.

He had seen it happen too many times in Korea.

So first, I have to find out what's going on. Lloyd's gaze grew sharp as he started his observation. He focused on how much Julian could protect himself in this situation, how bad the harassment was, and the method to cut it off. Without saying a word, he simply detached himself and played the observer's role, wondering in his head what kind of preparations he needed to make. Meanwhile, Diego's behaviors against Julian started to cross the line. Diego lifted his large palm and tapped Julian's small head a few times.

"That's why both you and your family lineage are trash. Got that? Honestly, what have you got in your family to boast of, eh? Fresh air? Clean water? Dirty and poor farmers? What else?"

Tap. Tap.

"But what about my family? We have a specialty product widely acknowledged for its quality in the kingdom. You know it, too, right? Laconata. My father presented the fabric to Her Majesty last year."

Slap! Slap!

"So, please. I beg you to just consider yourself invisible because you're nothing but a scum just like your family. And stop eating in public. Understand me?"

Tap! Thwack! The palm that smacked Julian on the top of his head grew more violent and forceful each time. At first, it was a simple tapping. But now, it developed into a smack.

"Know your place, okay? What are you looking at?"

"..."

Julian accepted the harassment without a fight. The only protection his petite body could manage was clumsily wrapping his head with his hands. Just then, his sleeves rolled up, slightly revealing his arms with bruises everywhere. From old yellow ones that spread out from time to dark reddish and bluish ones, Julian's arms were a mess. It wasn't the result of a day or two bullying. When his arms came into view, Lloyd made his resolution, and he thought over something he had picked up a while ago.

Laconata. I knew it. I knew he looked familiar. The way Lloyd stared at Diego turned deadly. He quickly went over the situation in his head. The plan was settled. Behavior and consequence. Action and reaction. A complicated ball of string was untangling. Predictions and processes. The ultimate result.

"Tell me, what does that old geezer of your father do?"

Lloyd spoke in a soft but low voice, his chin propped against his hand. That made Diego stop smacking Julian. For the first time, Diego's gaze turned to Lloyd.

"What?"

Diego's brow twitched as he looked at Lloyd. He glared at Lloyd for speaking of his father. What is this now? Diego did notice a while Lloyd sitting across from Julian. But he chose to ignore him because he considered Lloyd another scum visitor who came to see Julian. Scums of the same kind grouped together. And so, he ignored Lloyd's existence. But now, this scumbag was speaking impertinently before his presence.

"I am asking. What does your old geezer do?" said Lloyd again.

"Ha! He is Viscount Lacona, the wise and merciful. What are you?"

"What am I? Don't you know who I am?" asked Lloyd.

"What?"

Lloyd was now standing up, facing Diego and his large physique. He smiled icily.

"My goodness. It was like this in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Even though the Lacona viscounty was their neighbor by geography, the lack of engagement made it impossible for the children to know each other's faces.

You don’t recognize me? What was written in the novel was true then,” said Lloyd.

“What are you… Ack!”

Thwack! Just when Diego was about to respond, Lloyd kicked Diego like lightning in the gut.

“Ack!”

The kick contained the strength of one mana circle. Diego’s body folded in half and went flying in the air, smashing two tables in the process and rolling away even after landing.

A corner of Lloyd’s lips rolled upward in hostility. Diego was an unlucky boy. He had picked the wrong place and person to bully. In the very academy funded by Her Majesty, Diego had acted with impudence against the honored guest of Her Majesty. No housemaster or dean could do anything about it. Besides...

“What should I do with you? I guess you haven’t heard from that geezer, the wise and merciful, about the water bill, eh?” Lloyd spoke, his voice dripping with compassion and pity.

Chapter 87: How To Eradicate Violence (2)

“W-water bill...? Eek?”

Cough! Cough! Diego couldn’t think anymore because of the sudden blow that knocked him out. It hit right into his gut, and it was too powerful. His stomach tumbled, twisted, and churned from the sudden blow. He couldn’t breathe well, and his whole body ached as a result of being flown away. His back smashed the two tables into pieces, so it went without saying that his back was far from okay. However, despite the blow, Diego stood up, telling himself that he couldn’t act weak in front of whoever was that bastard that kicked him away. And besides, he knew who he was. A mana user with a manaheart.

“A-Argh!”

Diego got back to his feet, his face red. He shot a deathly glare at Lloyd for giving him the first blow, only to learn that a fist was flying right toward him at lightning speed.

It’s too fas… Pow! Something blinked in front of him, and his nose ached like he was hit by a hammer. The blow shoved his head to the side before he could react. The time around him started to slow down, and something interesting came to his view.

Is that... my front tooth? A flat, white tooth twirled in the air as it flew away, along with drops of blood and saliva. But Diego wasn’t spared another time to appreciate the spectacle. That was because another merciless punch flew to clock him in the gut. Pow!

“Argh!”

Once again, Diego’s body curved inside like the letter “c.” His knees bent by reflex. Just then, his ears heard a cold voice.

“You don’t even know why you’re getting beaten, eh?”

“I, ouch! Ack!”

Thwack! His cheek suddenly felt hot, feeling the thick blow of a slap. The ear on the side dulled, and the world swirled around him. He couldn’t distinguish which was up or down. Even so, the cold voice continued to be heard.

“Do you still not know why I’m beating you? Huh?”

“Arggh!”

Wham! This time, it was his right shin. Diego wondered if the man kicked —no, stabbed—him with pointy shoes. Or was it another object? He couldn’t tell. The bone in his shin hurt too bad. He bent over by reflex, lowering his arms to the ground. However, the voice was heard once again.

“Viscount Lacona, the wise and merciful? I have to laugh.”

Thwack!

“...!”

Diego was looking at the restaurant ceiling. He wondered how on earth he was looking up. Did his head get lifted up? And why, Diego thought to himself, does his jaw hurt this bad?

“How are you so similar to your father? Hm? Tell me, is bullying vulnerable people something that runs in your family?”

Crack! This time, the blow hit his left collarbone. It slammed into his bone without a tad of mercy.

“Ack...!”

He had never experienced this type of pain before. His mouth hung wide open against his will, and his curled tongue scratched his palate in desperation.

Why? Why?! Diego couldn’t make sense of this situation. He was a mana user who received swordsmanship lessons from the fiefdom’s senior knight starting from when he was 11 years old. The tenacious mana training allowed him to create a manaheart just within four years. The stupefied look of the senior knight stuck in his memory. Sir Curno asked him at that time if he was a genius. And so, Diego was confident that he had the upper hand because of his manaheart when it came to fist fights and scuffles. That was why he had no one to be afraid of at his age. But now...

How, how dare he?! Arghhhh!! Diego went livid. It hurt too badly, and so he attempted to counterattack, flailing his clenched fist. But the man didn’t even try to avoid it.

Thwack! Lloyd’s head turned at the blow, and a smile of hope appeared on Diego’s face. Do I stand a chance? Do I?

But it only took three seconds for his hope to shatter into pieces. Lloyd, whose head was shoved aside, slowly recovered and looked at Diego. He then wiped his torn lip with the back of his hand and flashed a vicious smile.

“Now, it’s mutual combat.”

Thwack! Whatever mercy was left in Lloyd’s blows vanished. It was time for a ruthless beating session. Lloyd punched, punched, and punched again. He was knocked down with his elbow on and on. And there came the kicks. He kicked only to throw another kick. When Diego fell to the ground, Lloyd rose him up and beat him even more. When he resisted, Lloyd kicked, punched, and struck him. Diego pleaded. Lloyd ignored him and trampled him some more.

“S-stop! I’m sorry! Stop!”

“Stop, my ass,” huffed Lloyd.

Thwack! Pow! Bam!

Diego lay coiled on the ground. Lloyd stomped on his back, head, and anywhere his foot touched. Lloyd looked at Diego, calculating every kick and punch against him in his head.

This is the only way to make sure that this boy won't hurt Julian again. Diego was set to bully Julian again if Lloyd went easy on him. So he had to do it right. No half-assed forgiveness. He needed to go all out in beating him. Lloyd was sure about that because he had his share of experience back when he was a student in South Korea.

This is the most effective solution for guys like him. Just then, a past memory interrupted his thoughts. It must have been when he was a first-year student in high school. There was once a bully in his class, and one time, the bully set Lloyd as his target. And so, he had used this very method to completely resolve the problem. He had said no to the bully ordering him to get some bread from the cafeteria. The bully then slapped him with a pair of slippers. Three slaps for each cheek, totaling six. Two blows in his gut. Once he got them, Lloyd said yes but instead headed toward the back of the classroom, where he found some elongated fluorescent light bulbs to be disposed of later. Lloyd grabbed one of them like a bat and walked over to the bully, who was happily chatting with other bullies. Lloyd raised his hand, and he struck the lightbulb right on the back of the boy's head.

Clang! Clash! Blood flowed everywhere. All hell broke loose in the classroom. But Lloyd didn't stop there. He had to do it right. Repeating those words in his head, Lloyd lifted one of the chairs and smacked the bully with it. He then trampled him.

That day, the bully was sent to the hospital while Lloyd got suspended. Parents were called in, and they apologized to the bully's parents for putting their son in the hospital and generously compensated them for the medical bills.

Surprisingly, nothing more happened after that incident. There were just a few rumors saying that Lloyd was a nutcase. That was all. He enjoyed a quiet, peaceful life until he graduated high school. Not a single student ordered him to get some bread. Though the measure Lloyd had employed involved severe violence, it granted him immunity from school bullying or abuse.

It's the same now. You mess with Julian, and you die in my hands. You speak ill of my family, and you die in my hands.

The punches and kicks Lloyd threw at Diego contained such messages. Each time Diego's body received another bruise, Lloyd ensured that such lessons would be implanted in his wounds. Julian's heart sank in shock as he watched everything.

Lloyd, that idiot, has lost it! Julian's jaw dropped. The sudden desire to hide his face rushed through him as he witnessed the violence happening in front of him. Was it because he was shocked? No. It was because his future was growing bleak with every second.

I knew that Lloyd Frontera was a nutcase before... But what in the world is he doing right now?! Julian had sent several gazes at Lloyd to stay away from this. He had hinted to please turn a blind eye to this. And Lloyd nodded, though faintly. So, Julian was relieved. He had thought Lloyd of a ruthless human being who couldn't be restrained. Human trash that upset his parents. But seeing Lloyd nod, Julian presumed that this man had learned to control himself in a situation like this. Julian couldn't be any more wrong, as it turned out. Control, my ass! Julian thought to himself. Lloyd was beating the daylights out of Diego like a man who lost it. No, he was beating Diego closer to death!

"Hey!" Julian yelled, unable to hold back any longer. "Stop it!"

Lloyd had to stop. Indeed, he really had to stop now. He had went too far already. Julian wondered how Viscount Lacona would react when he heard that his son had become a ball of bloodied mess. And what punishment would Lloyd get from the academy for beating Diego? And what kind of harassment would he get more from others in the future? The more he allowed his thoughts to wander, the greater his body trembled like he was in an ice cave. Finally, unable to hold back any longer, Julian grabbed Lloyd's arm.

“I said, stop it!” Julian shouted violently. But the response that came afterwards surprised him.

“Sorry. Just a little more.”

“Eh...?”

Shiver. When Lloyd turned around for a second to reply, his eyes locked with Julian’s. This instantly brought bone-chilling chills to Julian’s body. Was it because Lloyd had a set of murderous gaze about him? No. Absolutely not. Instead, he was more...

Lloyd’s calm. He hasn’t lost a single strand of reason. It was too unexpected. Julian couldn’t wrap his head around this. The man in front of him was poles apart from the Lloyd Frontera, his hooligan brother, he knew. And it was the same case with the answer that followed.

“If I half-ass the fight right now, then it’ll only make it harder for you. Is that what you want?”

“That’s...”

“So, just trust me.”

Thwack! The beating session resumed. Julian was left overwhelmed by the sheer force of Lloyd and his cool-headed violence. And at last, Diego passed out.

Bam! One last punch, and Diego’s head drooped. Bubbles foamed around his half-opened mouth. Countless gazes were looking at them, and just then, the housemaster bawled as he rushed toward their way.

“What?! What is going on?!”

The housemaster, a slim, middle-aged man, yelled sharply. That was when Lloyd straightened his back. He lifted his one hand and ran back his disheveled bang. Sweating and panting hard, Lloyd turned around and faced the housemaster.

“I was just defending my honor.”

“What is that?”

Flinch. The unexpected answer made the housemaster recoil. And when he finally saw the unconscious body of Diego sprawled on the ground, he bit his lips.

“Have you forgotten what place this is? You are in Magenta College, the academy run with the support of the great Queen. And yet, you stirred trouble, exercised violence, and hurt a student in this college,” accused the housemaster.

“So?”

“If you do not have any justifiable reason behind your violence, I shall have you in the hands of the guards and be severely punished.”

Murmur, murmur. By now, there were several groups of people behind the housemaster. Restaurant workers. Young students. College Administrators. Some were clicking their tongues, while some were condemning what just took place. Some were shocked, alternately looking at Diego and Lloyd. This was perhaps the reason why a bitter smile formed on Lloyd’s mouth.

They wouldn’t act like this if Julian was the one who got hurt. They probably wouldn’t have. They’d have turned a blind eye, thinking that it was not their business but the students’. No, they may have paid more attention to the voices of the bullies.

The bullies are from wealthy and powerful families, after all. That sort of unfair situation was highly likely. And so, Lloyds straightened his chest and scoffed, thinking about the plan he’d formed before wielding his punch at Diego.

“Justifiable reason, you say?” asked Lloyd.

“Do you have it?”

The housemaster’s gaze grew serious. Lloyd smirked.

“Yes, I do.”

“What is it?”

“Libel,” said Lloyd coolly.

“Excuse me?”

“This friend over here insulted me.”

“That’s it? That’s why you…”

“What do you mean by ‘that is it’? An insult to me is the same as insulting the queen.”

“What in the world are you saying now...?”

The housemaster’s eyes grew confused. He was left speechless, he couldn’t understand the nonsense Lloyd was spewing. And rightfully so.

Why on earth is he involving the queen in this? Especially when he’s nothing but a son of a rural provincial baron? His gaze toward Lloyd grew colder, and he couldn’t believe what he was hearing. Libel? Insult? The more he thought about it, the more laughable he thought Lloyd was. In fact, the housemaster was completely in the dark about what kind of exploit Lloyd had achieved back in Cremo. The news about it hadn’t spread in detail to the royal capital just yet. And so, the headmaster looked down on Lloyd due to his family status.

They said the visitor was Julian Frontera’s family, I believe? He was. The Frontera family. The baron over there didn’t slip a bribe or anything to him behind everyone’s back. He wondered if it was due to a lack of manners or common sense. How lowly the Frontera family was compared to Viscount Lacona, who secretly asked to give special attention to his son as he slipped a thick envelope of bills into the headmaster’s pocket. Thinking such, the housemaster resolved to himself that he would raise this issue and have the visitor pay for what he had done. That would be the only way for him to free himself from the reprimand of Viscount Lacona, who had bribed him.

“Clarify what your words and intentions were for speaking of the queen,” the housemaster said sternly with an equally stern gaze.

The people gathered behind him were shooting a similar gazes at Lloyd. Despite the fact that he was being showered with the look of rebuke, Lloyd remained calm and composed.

“Well, of course. The reason is simple,” Lloyd said and casually brought his hand into his pocket. And then, he brought out a round gold pendant and held it out for people to see.

“Eeek!”

At that instant, the housemaster sucked in his breath. The eyes of the people behind him widened. Lloyd’s sneer grew wider as he saw how astonished they were over just a pendant.

“The queen has specially invited me and given me this token as her rightful honored guest. Since everyone here is studying or working at the college, I am sure that you will all recognize the meaning behind this item.”

“…”

Everyone’s gaze was fixed on the gold pendant in Lloyd’s hand. The eyes of the double-headed eagle imprinted at the center shone sharper and glinted against the sun. At the same time, they thought of one thing: That’s the seal of the honored guest of the queen. Replicating it was impossible in the first place, so there was nothing doubtful about its veracity.

Not a single response spilled out of people’s mouths. They were all clamped shut. The housemaster, who was now pale, chewed his lips. The cafeteria immediately grew silent just like that. When Lloyd spoke, his voice echoed through the air, and it thrashed like a whip against all the quiet listeners.

Chapter 88: How To Eradicate Violence (3)

“I am sure you see the reason behind my actions and words now. That’s right. I am an honored guest who is currently staying at the palatial quarters after being summoned by Her Majesty. Therefore, any actions that insult me is the same as committing the grave sin of insulting Her Majesty.”

“...”

Lloyd’s clear voice echoed through the cafeteria. No one responded. No one could dare do it. As the silence continued to fill the room, he continued to speak.

“Moreover, I have heard of the beautiful story of how this academy is under the grace and support of the queen. And that makes all the students under the support of Her Majesty. And yet, it has never occurred to me that a student under Her Majesty’s auspices would dare insult her honored guest and regard her royal authority as nothing but trivial.”

A corner of Lloyd’s lips rolled upward. He shot a glance, daring the headmaster to give an answer.

The latter replied with a question, his shoulders drooping. “However, uhm, is it not your one-sided argument?”

“One-sided argument?”

“Is there any objective evidence that my student, Diego Lacona, has insulted you?”

“Evidence, you say? Hahaha,” Lloyd chuckled and shrugged his shoulders. And he added, “Certainly, there is. Don’t you know about the proof better than me?”

“Excuse me? What do you-”

Thud. Lloyd held out his hand and placed it on Julian's small shoulder. This made Julian flinch, but Lloyd didn't mind. He nonchalantly had it remain there as he stared at the housemaster.

"I am telling you this just in case you might not know it, but this boy is my younger brother."

Julian flinched once again, and this time, the housemaster's eyes trembled for a second. Lloyd continued to speak.

"You insult him right in front of me, you insult me. You harass him, you insult me. As such, that is same as ruining the reputation of Her Majesty. If that is not showing any disregard for Her Majesty's authority, then what is?"

"How does that…"

"Are you trying to negate what I am saying?"

"..."

The housemaster clamped his mouth shut. Lloyd's acrid remarks continued.

"And I'm sure you are not telling me that you and the students behind you don't know what kind of relationship Diego and my brother has, right?"

"..."

Silence once again. No one could haphazardly throw a response at Lloyd, and it was obvious why. There was nothing secretive about Deigo harassing Julian on a daily basis. But it wasn't the affair relating only to Diego. All the other nobles of the high class did so as well. They all joined as one to ignore, discriminate, and insult Julian. A lot of students gathered behind the housemaster were Julian's harassers, who joked and made a bet among themselves on which method was the most innovative and novel way of making Julian's life miserable. Their rationale behind such abuse was that Julian was from a provincial baron family, and yet, he got praised multiple times by professors for his academic achievements. That is, everyone bullied him because Julian acted without any knowledge of who he was. And so, Julian became the target for discrimination and scorn in the academy.

This is the reason why I'm doing this, you brat. Lloyd tightened the muscles in his arm, pressing down to stop Julian from removing his arm. Lloyd felt the glare Julian was shooting and understood the message he was sending. What's the deal with this ruckus? What's the point of this? Are you going to leave and have me deal with what comes after? Julian's resistant glare burned Lloyd's cheeks. But he ignored them all, for he was convinced that patience and endurance weren't the answer to responding to unfair discrimination and school violence.

Enduring it won't solve anything. It was true. He wasn't just saying his opinion. What he was doing was based on an actual and real-life event, the fluorescent light incident. He had learned his lesson there.

I got all scared after causing trouble the first time. But as time passed by, it wasn't the case. Things started to take off in an unexpected way. Right after Lloyd beat the daylights out of the bully with the fluorescent light and chair, the school was turned upside down in shock. Parents were summoned, the school violence committee opened up, and things began to develop unfavorably for Lloyd at first. It was understandable. After all, the only wrong the bully did was order Lloyd to get some bread and hit him a few times. But on the other hand, he struck back by sending the bully to the hospital. Thus, he got suspended, and he thought that was the end of things. However, it wasn't.

It turned out the bully had caused more than a little trouble before then. About three days after the incident, Lloyd received a call from a father of his classmate. And he explained that it seemed his son had been bullied by that jerk for a long time and seeing Lloyd fight back gave his son the courage to speak up about it for the first time. That was the beginning. Similar calls continued to pour in. The bully's dirty acts were made plain. Bags, clothes, hats, and shoes. Game consoles, cash, bicycle, cellphone, and laptop. They discovered one hundred dollars to two hundred dollars, and even up to thousands of dollars of money. As the evidence of his harassment was collected, the scale of his extortion proved to be larger than everyone expected. Karma finally hit him well. The parents gathered to file a lawsuit against him, and he was thrown into juvenile court. Victims teamed up to internalize the message, “Karma’s a bi, you jerk.”

And so, I need to go all out when responding to these things. If I’m going to do it, I need to do it right. Lloyd couldn’t just sit and trust the school to do the job. He needed to make sure that the law, police, and press sided with him. And to do that, he needed to make a large issue out of this incident. The larger the incident became, the better chances he had of winning. That was the plan he had in mind before taking action. He had beat the living soul out of Diego. It was time to crush school.

“So, housemaster, pray tell me. Are you still thinking that what I did is wrong?”

“...”

Lloyd cocked his head to the side. The housemaster began to get a headache. This is troubling. A crease was formed on the housemaster’s forehead. Of course, he, too, knew that Julian was a punching bag to the other students. He’d turned a blind eye and declared that it wasn’t his business. But he wasn’t particularly sorry about that. What was happening right now was tradition.

He’s nothing but a son of a provincial baron. Julian got scorned and mocked by the sons of upper class families in the capital because he was from the province. He was bound to intermittent disdain and physical abuse. The headmaster saw nothing wrong with it. After all, this was something that had taken place for decades in the academy. A natural occurrence. He didn’t even think about correcting this, and since it was a loss for him to cut ties with the sons of the powerful families, he didn’t want to meddle in this affair. His desire to stay out grew all the more when he thought about the flashy and powerful families that backed these students. Therefore, he turned a blind eye. Everything was fine until this moment. It wasn’t fine anymore. When the brother of the harassed student was an honored guest of the queen, the whole situation took on a whole different meaning.

“Take issue with it? I would never,” the housemaster uttered, his mouth forming a smile. He changed his attitude after quickly weighing things in his head.

“As you know, I am a person who is in charge of managing the dormitory. And so, it is my responsibility to verify the claims when an unfortunate event like this happens in the building.”

“So what are you trying to say?”

“Should you find yourself in a dispute in the future, please call for me instead of taking action by yourself,” the housemaster replied.

“Aha. You mean you’re going to provide me with a great service of reconciliation called mediation, yes?”

“I am glad that you know what I mean.”

The housemaster was experienced in his role and knew how to act at this dormitory that was filled with noble children. Seeing his face, Lloyd thought to himself...

What a snake. The housemaster skillfully yet subtly abandoned Diego and decided to befriend a new power. It seemed to Lloyd that the housemaster wanted to form a new connection from this incident. A snort escaped Lloyd, and the housemaster gave a proper bow before leaving. The students chattering among themselves scattered away, but Lloyd imprinted every single one of their faces in his memory until all were gone.

I’m going to get you all good. You wait and see. Lloyd internally made the resolve. He’d already intervened, and it was water under the bridge. If he stopped now, he’d be throwing his and his family’s reputation down the drain. And if this incident worked to form a bad public image of him to others, it’d hurt his business for a long time.

So I have to finish what I started. Suppressing the dark desire to have their heads on a platter, Lloyd said that he was done for now. Then, he turned and looked at Julian.

“I lost my appetite. Let’s go.”

“What?!”

Julian kept glaring at Lloyd and tried to free himself from Lloyd’s arm that wrapped around his shoulder. One of his eyebrows quirked up.

“Go? Where to?” huffed Julian.

“Just follow me.”

Lloyd then moved, keeping his arm on Julian’s shoulder. He then got out of the cafeteria, almost dragging Julian. They heard the murmuring noises from both sides, but Lloyd ignored every single one of them. He even ignored Julian fighting to free himself. Just like that, they strode across the corridor and headed to the opposite way of the lobby, where there was the office Lloyd had previously located a while ago. He figured it’d be like the administrative office in the school. Thinking such, he pushed the door open.

“I’m here for business.”

The water was already spilled. The people in the office widened their eyes as they gazed at Lloyd. They were too taken aback to ask what business he had here.

Lloyd said to one of the dazed clerks, “I’d like to file an leave of absence. The duration will be one year.”

His name is Julian Frontera. The shocking declaration caused Julian to go wide-eyed.

“What are you doing?! Are you out of your mind?”

They were in front of the main gate of the academy in the cold winter. Julian’s shrill got raised by a pitch. How else would he react? He was struck dumb to the point of passing out.

“Who do you think you’re for causing all that mess back in there, huh? And who do you think you’re for filing a leave of absence against my will?!”

Huh? Julian recalled the event that happened a moment ago. Lloyd had barged into the office and filed for an LOA without so much as asking a question to him. There wasn’t any time to stop Lloyd. And so, he was forced to stop studying for a year in the academy.

This isn’t happening! Julian was livid. He couldn’t understand what Lloyd was doing. It was so thoughtless and irresponsible.

And he doesn't think at all! Julian jumped out of his skin when Lloyd suddenly began whacking Diego. A part of him did feel good because Diego constantly pestered him. The sight of him getting beaten up granted Julian an immense sense of pleasure, and when Lloyd brought out the pendant, Julian’s heart tingled in excitement.

But so what about it? What’s the point of this good feeling when it’s just temporary? Nothing. Meaningless. This good feeling was transient, and once Lloyd left the capital, Julian would have to bear the massive weight of the mess Lloyd had created alone. They would retaliate for sure, and the harassment would worsen by a few more degrees. Even if Lloyd had brought out the VIP seal, the reality he was in wouldn’t have changed by much.

They can always bully me in secret. From the point of the sons of noble families, they held bounty ways of secretly making a living hell out of someone. The mere thought of it brought chills to his spine, and Julian wasn’t confident he could endure it. Just when he thought things couldn’t get worse, Lloyd unilaterally filed for a leave of absence!

“Speak now. Are you telling me to run? Huh? You’re the one who messed up. Did you get me out of the academy because you know you can’t be responsible for what you did?! Is that it?!” bawled Julian.

He didn’t want that. Even when things became hellish, Julian wanted to stick around in the academy. He wanted to continue studying regardless of the tribulations and frustrations. That was the only way he could help his family.

If I don't study, my family will be done for. That mindless brute will ruin everything for my family. Julian would have to spend his lifetime correcting what Lloyd had ruined. To do that, he needed to be educated and form connections, which he had already planned to do. But what? A leave of absence? Julian saw red at the decision. He felt it was a tyrannical act of trampling his determination. And so, maybe that was the reason why a wry smile formed on Lloyd's face.

"Ha! You think I'm doing this without any plans in mind?" asked Lloyd.

"What...?"

Duh! Julian wanted to shout that aloud. But Lloyd's declaration intercepted and pierced into Julian's ears first.

"First, I think we need to clarify your misunderstandings and go through some harsh training."

"What are you... Misunderstanding? And what? Training?"

"Yeah."

"What am I getting wrong?" asked Julian.

"Well, the first one is that I'm acting like a maverick. And second, you'll be able to handle Diego or any pricks by yourself once you get trained."

"..."

Julian felt the words stop in his throat, sensing that the way Lloyd stared at him was too serious. No playfulness or arrogance. That was a bit of a surprise for Julian since it was his first time seeing so. Maybe he was persuaded by Lloyd's gaze. Or maybe Julian was piqued by the possibility that he could deal with Diego by himself.

“Training...? What training? Where? Like sword fighting?” asked Julian, stuttering without his knowledge.

Lloyd scoffed and smiled. He then shared the secret that would toughen up Julian’s weak body and mind.

“What else is there? At the construction site. Shoveling.”

And just like that, Julian Frontera, the slim and frail child with beady eyes, became one of the laborers in the suspension bridge construction, which wasn’t part of his destiny.

Chapter 89: Between Construction and Trust (1)

“So, the rumors are true?”

“Yes.”

“Are you sure it’s the truth and it’s not a misunderstanding or mistake?

“Yes, that’s right,” replied Javier.

“So, what you’re saying is, the story of how you stopped the Gigatitan from invading Cremo and how my brother finished it off is true without a tad bit of exaggeration?”

“Yes, of course.”

Julian gulped and stared at the man sitting across from the table. Javier’s handsomeness made the luxurious royal quarters look like an inn.

“Whew... I can believe this given that it’s coming from you,” confessed Julian.

“Then, did you not believe it before?” asked Javier.

“How could I?”

Julian couldn’t help but scoff at the ridiculousness of the whole thing. He shook his head before continuing to speak.

“Actually, I first heard of the news from a man from the palace. He advised that I should keep it only to myself since the details of the news weren’t made plain or something.”

“Is that so?”

“Yeah. He even told me that Her Majesty plans to summon Lloyd and you to reward you both and share the news with everyone. There was nothing else I was told.”

“What do you mean by nothing else?”

“You know, the details of how he caught the Gigatitan. They were untold.”

The edge of Julian’s round nose crinkled. Just then, his mind was interrupted by the visit of the palatial official.

“Truly, what an excellent brother you have. I am envious.”

Even now, Julian couldn’t forget the words the official spoke before leaving. Was it because he was honored and proud to have such a brother? Absolutely not.

“It was unbelievably dumbfounding,” Julian said.

“Think about it. They said he’s an excellent brother. Can you believe it?”

“Hmm...” Javier paused for a second.

“Did you suspect that the man was a con man pretending to be an official?”

“Of course, I did.”

“I am not surprised to hear that,” seconded Javier.

“Isn’t it obvious? A man suddenly appears out of nowhere and showers Lloyd with praise for his accomplishments and talent. I was skeptical at first. However, it turned out that he really was from the palace.”

“It must have been confusing.”

“Yeah.”

Julian nodded, and he continued to speak.

“So, I believed that there was some kind of misunderstanding. I mean, it’s Lloyd Frontera we are talking about. The very drunkard who never went a day without causing trouble.”

It was true. That was the Lloyd Julian remembered in his mind. Three years ago, Julian prepared to leave the Frontera fiefdom to enroll in the academy and wanted to greet his brother before leaving. After all, he was still brother, albeit how much Julian hated him. The moment he opened the door, the pungent and acrid smell of alcohol assaulted his nose, and then came a shout, yelling at him to get out since he's sleeping. Then, a bottle of alcohol was tossed in the air and hit the wall right beside Julian's face. The smell of liquor, the rough yelling, and the shattered bottle marked his last interaction with Lloyd three years before Julian left for school.

"So there."

Julian stroked the corner of his left eye by habit with his right hand. There was a small scar on his skin, a burrow that looked like a mole. He had gotten it from the shards of the glass bottle Lloyd threw three years ago.

"Honestly, I thought that an unknown hero was behind the achievement and some passersby saw Lloyd when in fact, he was just hovering around the area. I thought everyone had been mistaken."

"Did you think that Master Lloyd had taken credit from the real hero and pretended that it was his own doing?" clarified Javier.

"Yeah. Exactly," said Julian as he vigorously nodded.

"That was the only way I could accept the situation no matter how I thought about it. But who knew, the whole thing was true..."

Julian never thought that it could be true. A heavy sigh escaped him, and Javier smiled softly as he looked at his young master.

"I see. I understand what you are going through, Master Julian. I, too, went through the same thing."

"You too, Sir Asrahan?"

"Yes."

Javier nodded.

“It just happened out of the blue. There were no impending signs or clues. It was just like any other day. The morning after a night of drunken ruckus in the bar.”

“Did something happen that day?” asked Julian curiously.

“Yes, Master Lloyd became different.”

“Different? What do you mean?” Julian spoke, raising one of his brows.

“As I said, he became different. As if someone else’s soul entered his body.”

The furnace filled the room with warmth, and it was tightly enclosed so that not a whiff of cold wind blew into the cozy space. Javier’s steadfast voice was the only thing filling the room.

“He became hardworking, considerate of others, and sober.”

“What...? No way...”

“It is true. Not only did he stop drinking, but he also began to work on all sorts of construction projects I never imagined was even possible.”

“Just like the artificial ground Lloyd had built after being commissioned by Count Cremo?” asked Julian.

“Yes,” Javier answered and continued to explain.

“He achieved more things outside of that as well. It’s the ultimate result of his dutifulness, brightness, pettiness, and shrewdness.”

“Petty and shrewd?”

“The qualities he never had but now owns.”

Javier furrowed his brows before speaking again.

“They are traits he didn’t possess as a troubling drunkard. When he changed, however, he grew petty, never letting himself be in the position of loss, no matter how small. Let’s just say that, even if he was in the middle of a meal, he would drop everything to get his money back if he realized the construction payment, he received was off by a mere cent.”

“Woah...” gasped Julian.

“On top of that, he is shrewd. He takes advantage of any weakness you have, no matter how trivial. He has you in his grasp and shakes you up. There is just no way to fight back. Not only that, but he also doesn’t even try to hide his joy at seeing you suffer. He has a nasty temperament.”

“It sounds like he’s gotten worse,” Julian pointed out.

“Indeed. Oh, there’s one more thing.”

“What is it?”

“It seems that he has gotten more confident about his appearance.”

“What? Lloyd?” Julian shrilled.

“Yes.”

“Impossible.”

“It is the truth. Sometimes, he burns with competitiveness when he looks at me.”

“Tsk, tsk. He lost touch with reality.”

Now, pity filled Julian’s eyes.

“I thought the same.”

“Mhm. He should know his place.”

“That is right. At least before he changed, the young master held a clear grasp of where he stood in terms of appearance. I wonder how he turned out this way. Sometimes, he explicitly shows his envy and anger when I tell him the number of love letters I'd received."

"How unfortunate. That's pitiful of him," Julian said with a sigh.

"I couldn't agree with you more."

Julian Frontera, the second son of the baron and Javier Asrahan, the faithful knight of the barony, caught up with one another after three years, seeing eye to eye on strange topics. However, they were ignorant of the fact that Lloyd was just beside the room, working on his design. Lloyd clenched his teeth.

"I can hear you loud and clear, you bastards..."

Lloyd sighed at length as the whispers from the gossiping traitors in the other room pierced into his ears. He wondered how he ended up with such a brother and personal knight. Contrary to his sigh, the corners of his mouth were curved into a smile. It was because of the message that floated in front of his eyes.

[Your likeability with Julian Frontera has increased by two points.]

[Current RP with Julian Frontera: -fifty-nine]

[You have earned twenty-eight RP by slightly improving your relationship with the main character.]

[Current RP: 2,164]

[Your intimacy level with Julian Frontera has upgraded from <Extreme Hatred> to <Hatred>.]

[You have earned five RP as a bonus for the improvement.]

[Current RP: 2,169]

Yes. Good.

The notification message for the increase in RP was always welcomed. It never got old no matter the time, day, or how often it came. This message felt more meaningful to him than usual.

This means that I now have a new source of RP.

Indeed, Julian was the new source of his RP, and it had been quite a while since he found one.

I don't earn RP just for getting close with someone. I know for sure based on what I observed up to this point.

At first, he thought that he could earn RP from others just by being friends with them. But that wasn't the case. The best example was Count Cremo.

No matter how close I got with him or what favors I did for him, the message of likeability didn't pop up.

It wasn't like Count Cremo held antagonistic feelings toward Lloyd. It was the opposite. He expressed insurmountable fondness for Lloyd to the point that he asked him to be his son-in-law. However, not a single message popped in front of his eyes regarding the count. There was no notification for an increase of RP or likeability level. That was why he concluded to himself...

Everyone who gives me RP must have something in common. There must be certain requirements that need to be met for the likeability system to get activated.

Lloyd had formed a rough theory in his head, and now, he found the answer.

They must be a person within my reach. That's the right answer.

He could almost ascertain that it was true as he read through the messages about Julian and as he recalled the events with the orcs.

So far, the people who gave me RP mostly belonged to the barony. The baron couple, Javier, Sir Bayern, the residents, and the orc tribe members, formed the blood alliance with us.

Therefore, the RP system was only activated when the person was a member of his barony or an official ally. Lloyd became almost sure about it. Now, as he looked at Julian, he started to see his younger brother differently.

My dear brother. Congratulations on hopping onto Lloyd's emotional rollercoaster.

A large grin formed on his face, revealing all his teeth, when he thought of taking advantage of Julian and sucking the RP out of him. At the same time, he thought of what was ahead of him.

Since I brought him here, I should be responsible for him.

Lloyd had filed for an LOA and brought Julian here to the palatial quarters. However, he knew that it didn't truly resolve the bullying Julian went through in school.

The boy needs to get stronger in both mind and body.

Nobody harassed the strong, and when strength was joined by endurance, that was the icing on the cake. The fundamental solution Lloyd came up with was that. It could appear dirty and unfair, but the uncomfortable truth could not be denied even if one wished to go against it.

Sure, there are rules and systems in place to prevent such a mishap, but those could only lessen the unreasonable and unfair sides of things. They never act as a protector.

The housemaster of Julian's boarding school came to Lloyd's mind, as well as the workers. Everyone chose to be silent and overlook the situation. They turned a blind eye to Julian, and this served as the best example of how powerless and ineffective the rules and systems could be at times.

So even if it means getting harsh on him, I need to train him.

Surely, Julian wasn't Lloyd's brother by blood, and he never had a brother in his life back in Korea as well. What was more, it had been only half a day since he met Julian. However, the RP system and its messages illustrated something very clearly to Lloyd.

That boy has become a member of my inner circle. I'm responsible for anyone who belongs to it. This principle must be upheld so that those who are in it will feel it in their bones.

That was how he would be able to expand his influence and keep them by his side. That's how I'll get more RP.

Reminding himself of that fact, he started to plan out his future and shifted his focus back to the suspension bridge design and simulation mode. The other side of the wall continued to bring the soft and happy voices of Julian, Javier, Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang into his room. Among them, Julian's voice contained the biggest joy. The relief and comfort must have been overwhelming for him to be surrounded by his friends rather than harassment and discrimination. Each time he spoke, Lloyd sensed something warm in his voice. That was when it occurred to Lloyd that he had made the right choice to get Julian out of the boarding school. I should be nicer to him, Lloyd thought to himself. Just like that, the night filled with zealous designing and cozy conversations passed.

The following morning rolled around. Lloyd became busy. He bolted out of his quarters the moment he woke up, and he was heading to the forge in the palace, holding dozens of blueprints in his arms. It was the blueprints he had printed out using his optional skill late in the night.

"I wish to meet the supervisor here."

When Lloyd expressed that he was the builder for the construction Her Majesty had commissioned, the supervisor came out to meet him.

"What brings you here?"

The man was about four feet in height, and his body was shaped like a barrel. His shoulders were extremely wide, and the beard that hung down his face reminded Lloyd of Santa Claus. With wrinkled eyes that made him look as obstinate as a mule, the old man looked up at Lloyd.

So, this is what dwarves look like.

It was the first time Lloyd met a dwarf. He had only read about them in novels before then. However, he quickly pushed aside his fascination with the exotic being. Instead, he put on a salesman's smile and began to talk.

“Hello. My name is Lloyd Frontera. I am here to ask you to manufacture some things that are needed for a construction project ordered by Her Majesty.”

“You want me to manufacture something for you?”

“Yes, that’s right.”

“What kind of fancy items do you plan on building? We are highly selective in taking the jobs. What’s more, you want items for the construction, not weapons nor armor. Why don’t you tap other forges for that?”

“If any other forges could do what I want, I wouldn’t be here in the first place,” explained Lloyd.

“Hmm... So, are you saying this is your only option?”

“Yes.”

“What an honest sycophant you are,” replied the dwarf.

“I would like to believe that I’m an honest man.”

Lloyd grinned. Just then, he recalled The Knight of Blood and Iron. The dwarf in front of him was the supervisor of the forge in the royal palace. He was rumored to be an unrivaled blacksmith and could produce anything with his hands if they were metal. As such, the dwarf’s help was indispensable to Lloyd for this task.

No other dwarf will do.

The item Lloyd wanted him to build would bear the massive weight of the suspension bridge. So, only the best and superior sturdiness and quality could be trusted. He needed that master craftsman to do the job. The problem was that the dwarf didn't hold his hammer unless a job piqued his interest. If not, he would relegate the jobs to the masters below him.

He's notorious for taking only what interests him, even if the order comes from Her Majesty.

So, it was imperative for Lloyd to earn his attention. He must make the master dwarf to want to build it. Reminding him that in his head a few times, Lloyd looked around and found a clean working table. He walked over to the dwarf's direction and spread out the blueprint.

"Here, first take a look at this."

Lloyd confidently spread out his blueprint, and the dwarf's gaze traveled across the width of it.

Is that...?

Wels Corgidus, the supervisor of the royal forge and the master craftsman. He quirked his brows. Lloyd's meaningful words pierced into his ears like a jab.

"Have you ever heard of a sky bridge?"

Chapter 90: Between Construction and Trust (2)

Wels Corgidus, the master craftsman, and the man in charge of the royal forge, visibly quirked his eyebrows.

“This is... Hmm... Are they the frames to support the weight?”

His tenacious eyes, which were distinct features to dwarfs, scanned the blueprint that contained a frame he had never seen before. Looks like a frame. There were straight bars connected to each other, intricately forming triangular shapes. Overall, dozens of short bars laid slanted and formed triangles in the area between two straight elongated bars. Corgidus, like the master of craft he was, immediately identified the purpose of the structure in the blueprint, as well as the flow of force on the structure and the balance of weight the structure would withstand.

“Is this going to be used in the bridge?” asked Corgidus.

“Yes, you are right. It’s called a truss.”

Lloyd smiled, impressed. Corgidus was just as the novel had described him. Corgidus tossed another question to Lloyd.

“Surely, this design would allow the wide structure to carry the most weight possible. But who designed this? Tell me, do you also have a dwarf master craftsman working for you?”

“No,” replied Lloyd.

“If not, who did it?”

“I did.”

“What?” The dwarf’s brow twitched.

“I designed this one. I did.”

A mysterious light flashed across Corgidus’s eyes as he looked up at Lloyd. He blurted out something not very nice.

“My, you are one heck of a nutcase.”

“Haha. Is that so?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, indeed. You came to threaten me, right?”

“Did you already notice...?”

“Of course.”

Corgidus heavily exhaled through his nose.

“A mediocre blacksmith could never create something like this. No, in this forge as well, there wouldn’t be anyone else but me who can produce this. After all, it involves producing the entire metal structure with an equal distribution of weight and entrusting the job to other master craftsmen...”

That would lead to a disastrous accident. Corgidus was sure of it. It would be even so for a truss structure that appeared to be fine on the outside. One clumsy mistake during production would create an imbalanced distribution of weight on the inside. What would happen if one built a bridge on top of it?

“It will collapse. That’s the thing with metals. It looks fine until it suddenly snaps. That’s what is so scary.”

What would happen if the truss snapped, and the bridge collapsed? It would spell a disastrous accident where at least dozens would perish.

“Yet, you came to me and showed me the blueprint of such a structure? What, you thought I wouldn’t be able to see through you?”

“Actually, I wanted you to see me through like now,” Lloyd replied nonchalantly after chuckling. Corgidus clicked his tongue.

“Are you testing my conscience?”

“Well, you can always say no if you don’t want to.”

“So, you want me to watch the accident in the future and feel guilty?”

“The choice is yours,” said Lloyd, “so I will not force it upon you.”

“Are you not confident that you can pique my interest and get me to accept the order?”

“Indeed. I’m not confident at all. How can I when I am nothing? So that’s why I did it.”

“Did what?” asked Corgidus.

“I’d thought that I stand a greater chance by appealing to your conscience this way.”

“And why are you coming clean about it?”

“Because you’ll know even if I hide it.”

“Hahaha.”

Corgidus guffawed, and his thick beard danced along with his head. He considered Lloyd brazen. However, he didn’t hate him for it because such an attitude came rare among his visitors.

Usually, they try to abuse their position or provoke and test my skills.

But Lloyd, the boy that showed up in front of him, was slightly different. He was crystal clear about what he wanted. He didn’t parade around his position or attempt obvious provocations to challenge him. He only emphasized the truth that Corgidus was needed to make his construction project safe and successful. At last, after mulling over the matter, Corgidus made a decision.

“Let’s see your other blueprints.”

“That means...”

“Give me the blueprints first,” demanded Corgidus.

“Yes.”

Lloyd busied himself, spreading the blueprints in order. Each time it spread out; a pleasant shock was sent to the dwarf’s eyes to his relief. The large socket to fix the bridge cables to the bridge towers. The link-type joint connecting device to respond to the elasticity depending on the temperature change of the bridge. The flap to reduce the vibration level in the bridge depending on the wind level. Countless modules and components spanned in front of his eyes. A sense of responsibility suddenly surged in him, his eyes brimming with determination. And at last, he nodded.

“Okay,” Corgidus finally said, “Let’s do it. We’re doing it.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“Do I look like I’m lying?” Corgidus’s meticulous eyes stared at Lloyd’s face.

“I became more certain when I scanned the other blueprints you showed me. There’s only one being who can create this structure in the whole kingdom. Goodness, and if you have someone else build this, only for it to collapse later, my conscience will be bothered. This job isn’t a matter of interest. It’s about what is right.”

“Thank you,” replied Lloyd.

“You can save your gratitude. You owe me a lot of explanation as I’ll be making them for the first time. Don’t even think about going back home today.”

“I wasn’t planning to in the first place.”

Lloyd spoke, grinned, and opened his bag, which contained stacks of lunch boxes he had prepared. Moreover, it was for two people.

“Hahaha.”

Could it be that he saw this coming when he got here?

Corgidus once again felt that this boy over here wasn't a normal brat. Now, the gaze Corgidus sent to Lloyd was no longer that of interest. It was satisfaction.

Three days passed, and Lloyd was not allowed to leave the royal forge during that period. Corgidus turned out to be a meticulous and detailed craftsman, befitting his status as a master. He asked questions, even Lloyd missed, about the details and directions of the production. Lloyd even broke out into sweat a few times trying to explain certain things to Corgidus.

He's a master for a reason.

In fact, Lloyd received help from the design skill when he came up with the blueprint. So, a few of the details were missed and overlooked in the process. But now that he was hearing questions from the master of the craft, who was on par with his university professors, Lloyd realized that he was not paying attention to the details.

From now on, I should start designing with a fine-tooth comb.

Three days later, Lloyd was permitted to leave the forge. That didn't mean the end of his job. Instead, it was time for him to really get serious.

"All right, let's do some cooking, shall we?"

Lloyd cracked his knuckles as he looked straight ahead. He was now in a small training hall the palace loaned him to use, and a huge pile of sand sat there. The sand was the main ingredient for today's cooking.

Everything was delivered just as I asked. I expected nothing less from the palace.

Oil-mixed clay, stone powder clay, magnetite, pebbles, grinded basalt, obsidian, azure stone, talcum, and tin were there. Each ingredient was placed in separate piles.

I’ll go first with the oil-mixed clay.

Lloyd’s shoveling began. He first scooped the oil-mixed clay and pressed it flat with his shovel, making it into the shape of a pizza dough that was about thirty feet in diameter. He then sprinkled all sorts of sand on top, which he finished with stones like basalt, obsidian, and others. Once he was done, Lloyd served it to Bangul, who was waiting with a growling stomach.

“Bangul,” Lloyd called.

“Bangul!”

“I made it just the way you wanted.”

“Bba-bangul!”

“Want to try eating this?”

“Bangul!”

Bangul turned gigantic and took a large bite of the sand pizza, chewing several times before gulping it down. At last, she wagged her tail hard.

The bell attached to her tail rattled violently, and she lifted her fat tail high up and shouted, “Bangul!”

Lloyd moved instantly at the noise and threw the granite tray he had prepared before her buttock. Metal bars that were thinner than usual started to come out of her buttocks. Red and hot metal bars stacked itself onto the granite tray, and Lloyd twirled the tray just in time to make sure that the bars would coil around the tray.

“Fan them!” Lloyd shouted.

As soon as he yelled, a gush of wind blew from both sides, which was the work of Javier and Julian standing by Lloyd. They wielded the fans very passionately.

The violent wind cooled the bars in no time. After all, the diameter of the bars was only about 0.2 inches thick. They were more like metal wires rather than bars.

Good. They turned out just fine on the outside.

Lloyd's eyes held a joyful smile. Bangul had been honest about excreting thin metal wires if she ate according to the recipe. True to her words, the granite tray carried an abundant load of wires.

Let's check if they function just as well as they look.

The wire would be used to support the suspension bridge, so it was imperative for Lloyd to test out how durable it was.

The load cell machine sounds like a perfect thing to have to test its applied force.

To his regret, there was no way he could get his hands on such a modern machine. Thus, he tested the tension of the wires by himself.

"Javier," Lloyd called.

"Yes."

"Hold this."

Lloyd held out the cooled wire and told him to grip one end. Then, he grabbed the other end.

"Now, I'm going to pull this hard, and you have to hold on without swaying."

"Yes, Young Master."

"You can't pull it either. Even a little."

"I just need to hold and endure?"

“Yes. This is to test how much force the wire can withstand.”

The exact math became complicated once Javier’s pulling force was added in the equation. So, Javier had to remain at a fixed position. Lloyd’s pulling force was the only input needed in this test.

“Here we go.”

Lloyd gripped the wire and employed one mana circle. He even used an optional skill to accurately measure the force.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option four: Circle Shift has been activated.]

Since I need to test by stage, I’ll start with the low gear. He set the gear to level one. The circle reacted instantly.

[The Alpha circle is set to gear one. Fixed at RPM 1,000.]

The RPM of the first circle was set to 1,000, and he transferred the amplified power of mana into his right arm. He then yanked the wire.

The wire stretched tightly, but it didn’t snap. It held very well. Time for gear two.

[The Alpha circle is set to gear two. Fixed at RPM 2,000.]

Lloyd tugged the taut wire with more force. It didn’t snap this time, either. He revved up his gear to three and four... until five. That’s when it snapped off.

Good. Somewhere between gear four and five based on the single circle. One more time.

The test continued. He first used the optional skill Circle Shift and set the stable RPM. Later, he turned off the skill and employed a more detailed RPM. Thanks to that, Lloyd was able to identify the tension of the wires Bangul produced.

The wire roughly snaps in between 4,600 and 4,700 RPM. Computing this to force... Hmm... It looks okay.

This was more than okay as it didn’t fall short of the wires used in modern times in South Korea. Now, it was time to produce the cables. Lloyd dug his hand into the inner pocket and brought out a summon creature taking a sweet nap in there.

“Hey, Ppodong.”

“Ppodong...”

“I’m sorry to wake you up, but can you do me a favor, please?”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“From now on, Bangul will be making some wires for you.”

“Ppodong?”

“Once they cool, can you cluster them together and roll them up? Roll about 120 strands into one, like a bunch of dried noodles you would see in markets.”

Lloyd picked up a twig and drew something on the ground to help Ppodong understand better.

“What do you think? Do you think you can do it?”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong nodded confidently. He liked doing favors for Lloyd. A smile of satisfaction hung on Lloyd’s smile.

“Yes, thank you. First, eat this one.”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong grew thirty feet after eating the red sunflower seed. From then on, Ppodong rubbed his hands zealously, and Bangul got ready to excrete metal wires and shook her buttock.

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

“Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

Now that it was ready to produce cables, Lloyd turned around and stared at the third worker he had appointed at the back of his mind.

“Hey,” Lloyd called.

“Eh? What?”

Julian flinched when he was called. He was in a daze. It was his first time seeing the giant summon creatures, and Lloyd was freely controlling them. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rolled upward.

“I’ll be working on the basic construction of the bridge towers with Javier.”

“Oh, sure,” Julian said.

“So, we need to vacate this place.”

“Yeah, so?”

“I want you to hold down the fort for me.”

“Me? How?” Julian asked curiously.

“How else?”

Lloyd lifted his shovel and held it out to Julian.

“Here.”

Before he had any time to resist, Julian found himself carrying a large shovel in his small arms.

“Imagine you’re with your friends, grilling some delicious and juicy meat, but you ran out of cooked meat, and the ones on the grill aren’t ready yet. So, you are now forced to wait until the new meat is done. You stopped eating in the middle of a tasty meal. How do you think you’d feel?”

“Uh, I guess I’ll get anxious and annoyed.”

“Right? I knew you’d understand. Therefore...”

Lloyd’s smile turned suggestive.

“You should start shoveling, and make sure to be faster than the speed of Bangul eating her sand. The recipe needs to be followed as closely as possible. Okay?”

“The sand you dig up with your shovel will be transformed into wires through Bangul, which will in turn become the cables that support the entire suspension bridge. So, do you see where I’m getting at? Put all your effort into it”

Julian’s adam’s apple fluctuated as he swallowed drily. The young master had done nothing but study until now. He didn’t understand the importance of shoveling until Lloyd enlightened him with the sheer purpose behind such a seemingly simple act.

“Hold on, wait,” Julian hurriedly stopped Lloyd as the latter was leaving.

“Wait, then, isn’t this super important?” asked Julian in disbelief.

“Then you’re entrusting it to me? Why?”

Julian was curious. Something was off. This person in front of him was Lloyd Frontera, the object of his unchanging hatred and doubt. It was the same case for Lloyd as well. He never believed in Julian. Each time Lloyd requested to go drinking and got rejected, he hurled curse words at Julian in anger and dismissed him as nothing but a buzzkill. As such, it was a wonder why Lloyd gazed at him with such seriousness while speaking in a gentle voice as if he always did.

“I’m entrusting it to you because it’s important.”

Though Julian wasn’t aware of it, his eyes trembled visibly.

Chapter 91: Sky-Walking Bridge (1)

“I’m entrusting it to you because it’s important.”

“Huh?”

Julian’s eyes trembled visibly. He couldn’t believe it. Entrusting it to him because it’s important? Julian wondered if he was serious. And besides... Seriously, is this Lloyd Frontera?

Not once in his life did, he expect to hear such a thing from his brother. If someone had prophesied about this in his dream, he’d have laughed out loud at the prophecy. However, that very impossible event was happening now right in front of his eyes, so clear and vivid that it was undeniable.

Entrust it to me because it’s important? He gawked at the shovel in his hands, and though he was a bit numb, it didn’t feel unpleasant. Just then, he was hit with an important fact. That was...

“Uhm, how do you use this shovel?” asked Julian.

“How, my ass. Have you never used a shovel before?”

“Uhm, no, never.”

Julian nodded because he had never used this tool before. He was unsure whether he could take up such an important job. Lloyd will probably be disappointed. He’s going to scold and downplay me for not having done this before. Julian was ready to receive such. And just as he had expected...

“Tsk. Whatever, give it to me,” Lloyd said as he held out his hand.

Of course.

Julian, a little bit disappointed, gave the shovel back to Lloyd. Instead of ignoring or criticizing Julian, Lloyd instead rolled up his sleeves and stretched his shoulders.

“I’m going to show it to you once. Watch me.”

“Eh...? Okay...”

“Watch how I do it.”

Lloyd didn’t wait for a response. He was already posing in front of the piles of sand. His lower torso and waist were slightly drooped, and the back of his left hand faced the sky.

“Take a look at my left hand. This is how you grab it. Don’t stab the ground, dig into it, and scoop up the sand. See this?”

“Oh, yeah,” Julian said.

The shovel drew a soft trajectory in the air after scooping. It then returned to the sand pile at lightning speed. Lloyd dug in the sand, scooped it, moved it, sprinkled it on the ground, and stacked it up.

“Got that?”

In no time, Lloyd was holding the shovel like it was a cane. Lloyd smiled, and in Julian’s eyes, he looked like a seasoned master of labor. Julian found himself nodding at the sight in front of him.

“Eh? Okay.”

“Good,” said Lloyd, “Do what you just saw.”

“Okay.”

“But make sure that you straighten your back only when you’ve filled up the one-legged cart to the brim. Am I clear?”

“Why is that?” asked Julian.

“That’s how I do things.”

“Anyway, do a good job. The speed of Bangul making wires depends on how fast you shovel. I’m off now,” Lloyd said as he passed the shovel.

Julian took it, and he could feel the warmth in the hilt and handle. The moment Julian touched it, he suddenly wanted to know. Why didn’t Lloyd ignore or mock him when he said that he wasn’t good at shoveling? Why did Lloyd teach him so nicely instead? And...

“Uhm, Lloyd.”

“What?”

“I have something to ask you.”

Julian lifted his head, and he got ready to say the question he had all along.

“Where did you learn all this, Lloyd?”

Julian wanted to know. It was strange. He wanted to ask what Lloyd went through all this time. It’s as if he has become a different person. Lloyd Frontera was standing in front of him, but he seemed poles apart from the man he knew. He was sober and gentle. The two changes were enough to give him goosebumps.

“I’m curious. You didn’t know how to use the shovel before.”

“That’s right.”

“The same goes for the summon magic. I heard you called for the summon creatures.”

“Yes, I did.”

“And Sir Asrahan told me that you have a manaheart.”

“You’re right.”

“What in the world happened to you back when I was in the academy?”

Something happened. Otherwise, this would be impossible. But the response Lloyd gave only plunged him into deeper confusion.

“Something happened... I’ll tell you next time.”

“When?”

“When I’m ready.”

Lloyd smiled bitterly, and his eyes seemed to hold a backstory, which made him look inexplicably alienating and mesmerizing. So, Julian couldn’t probe any longer. He eventually thought to himself that the time would come when Lloyd would tell him everything. At last, Julian nodded, much to Lloyd’s relief.

Whew. It worked.

His operation to dodge Julian's probing questions was a success. After duping his brother with his masked seriousness, Lloyd hurried and left the area, saying that he needed to look at the field quickly. Now, left alone, Julian picked up the shovel.

“Whew.”

The shovel felt heavy in his hands. Nonetheless, he decided to try his best. He just earned Lloyd’s trust, which came rare. To be honest, it weirded Julian out a bit but not in a bad way. He was rather happy. He even resolved not to disappoint his brother. Recalling how Lloyd had gripped the shovel, Julian grabbed it and moved. He stabbed the sand pile with a shovel, but the result was terribly different from Lloyd’s.

The shovel made a weird noise as it hit the sand. It failed to dig deep into the earth. Instead, it slipped to the side and left his hands.

The shovel bounced in the air and was sent away so that it shamed Julian. Bangul, who was watching the scene, tapped the ground with her fat tail. Ppoddong joined, writhing his fat body in amusement, and forgetting to interlace the strands of wire.

“Bangul! Bba-ba-babangul!”

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-do-dong!”

Are they laughing at me...?

Heat rushed through Julian’s face as he sprinted to pick up the shovel again. He was a red tomato. This was just the start of the many challenges ahead of the short young master.

The construction took off with full force. The survey and design were already over. The trusses and cables were being produced without any hurdles. So, Lloyd proceeded to work on building the bridge towers of the suspension bridge. The first step was constructing the base.

Lloyd’s triple circle rotated violently. two: three: three. With the Alpha circle at the center, the other two rotated in a ratio of two: three: three. They clashed and bumped into each other, backed by the ideal rotation ratio. At that instant, Lloyd dug the shovel into the ground, transferring the power of the triple mana blast into the land.

Lloyd bore holes into the ground that were about sixty feet in diameter and 114 feet deep with terrible force, not missing a fraction of an inch. He dug one hole per day for a total of nine holes on each side of the riverside. Those holes would support the bridge towers of the suspension bridge. Next, Lloyd poured a large amount of cement into the holes. The cement, which was mixed with the volcanic ash of Bangul, filled them up just like how Lloyd did when he built the artificial ground in the water in Cremo. They solidified, turning into huge cement poles that stretched down to the underground.

The spring rain came right after the basic construction was finished. It was torrential spring rain. Heavy rain kept coming for over ten days, quickly increasing the water level of the Magena River. Eventually, that created cracks in the stone bridge that sat about one hundred yards off the suspension bridge. It was the first time it had happened since sixty-one years ago when it was first built. Lloyd smiled internally.

Even heaven is helping with this project.

The stone bridge showed signs of collapse, and that prompted the palace to change its stance on the project. The officials started to shower him with support in building the suspension bridge instead of spending the resources on repairing the damaged stone bridge. They heavily invested in the construction, starting from employing more laborers for the project. Expert craftsmen and skillful men joined the force, and the support of the palatial magicians just topped everything off.

Thank you! Thank you so much!

Once the magicians joined the construction efforts, everything started to quickly progress at an unbelievable speed. Lloyd's design, which was supported by his surveying and data, was as detailed and comprehensive as a microscope. When that was compounded together with the palace's unreserved monetary support and labor, the construction took off at lightning speed.

This is nuts. This is absolutely nuts!

Lloyd clucked his tongue in disbelief as he commanded the construction. The tower was mainly composed of stones, and Lloyd simply needed to let them know the size to cut out. Once the shape and function of the blocks were made plain to the expert stonemasons, they jumped into action. Magicians joined as well. As such, the job ended in no time. The same went for stacking the blocks to make the tower. Normally, Lloyd required a crane or Ppodong to lift the massive blocks, and it was a challenge to stack up more than ten blocks a day. But when magicians came into the picture, everything changed. They were not your average magicians. They were royal magicians.

Magicians imbibed magic into the large blocks and reduced them to one-fifth of their giant size. That alone completely changed the construction speed.

“Pull! Count during the process!”

“One! Two! One!”

Large blocks hoisted up each time dozens of people turned the lever of the crane. The downsized blocks took a lesser toll on Javier and Ppodong, who received the blocks. Magicians used magic to lift them up, while those above received the blocks without any concern of spraining their backs. Every task proceeded like an impeccable cogwheel, and it was obvious that Lloyd’s meticulous design work was behind it. Just like that, time continued to pass.

The wind grew warmer. Magnolia flowers blossomed and wilted. The cherry blossom leaves wafted in the air against the wind. The aroma of roses permeated the air every morning. Julian’s arms thickened from all the shoveling. On the day the cicadas started singing, 295-foot bridge towers stood tall on both sides of the Magena River. Citizens in the royal capital exclaimed in joy because they had been nervous about the existing stone bridge, which could collapse anytime. But now, the construction for a new bridge was nearing its completion. The unique shape of the suspension bridge garnered much attention from people.

“What do you think he plans to do by setting up the tower so high?”

“Did you not hear?”

“Excuse me? Hear what?”

“He’s said to plan hanging cables at the peak of the towers.”

“Cables, you say?”

“Yes, indeed. Just like a hanging clothesline.”

“What kind of...”

Some citizens tilted their heads as they chatted, while others were expectant.

“Did you hear? He’s planning to hang a clothesline there.”

“Clothesline? Wait, in between the towers on both sides of the river?”

“Yes, I heard from the lady beside the house. The hanging clotheslines will become bridges.”

“Come on, how’s that possible?”

“I’m telling you. The cable work is happening later in the afternoon.”

“Really?”

“Yes, I’m telling you. I reserved a spot to watch it for myself.”

“Can I tag along?”

“Of course.”

People gathered near the river in groups of threes and fives. They set up mats where they could get a good look at the towers. Lunch boxes were open. When they laid their eyes on the cables being delivered under the bridge towers, they were overwhelmed with shock.

“What... is that?”

“Good gracious. They’re very thick.”

“Clothesline? That’s a clothesline?”

“Oh, who said it’s one?”

“They’re thicker than tree stomps.”

“Plus, that’s not hay or anything. It’s made from metal.”

It was true. The cable was pure metal. Ppodong interlaced the 0.2-inch-thick wires Ppodong had excreted. Those 120 strands of wires tightly clustered together to form a cable. Then the outside was wrapped with chains. So, it was too heavy and thick to be called a simple “clothesline.” When people saw the cable, everyone became nervous, thinking of one thing.

How is he going to transfer that to the peak of the bridge towers? Is he going to bring a large giant to toss and receive the cables? Is he going to use ships? There are no sailing boats around here in the river, and it might even sink if it’s small.

Curiosity filled everyone’s minds, and they all became worried about how the large and thick metallic ropes would be hung on the bridge towers like a clothesline. No matter how they thought about it, it looked impossible. The mere act of trying looked like an accident waiting to happen. Thousands of anxious and expectant gazes focused on the peak of the bridge towers, where Lloyd and Bangul were.

“Bangul, you know what to do, right?”

“Bangul!”

“You bite it and go boom!”

“Bba-bangul!”

Bangul, who had already gotten large, nodded her round head up and down. At last, Lloyd noticed the cable being lifted from the foot of the tower. It was being lifted by the crane after growing light with the help of the magicians’ magic. Its end was attached to a tightly knit chain, which Lloyd tugged and put on one side. Afterward, he held up the sand-filled bucket.

“Hey, Bangul. Time to eat something good.”

“Bangul!”

Bangul opened her mouth wide, and Lloyd emptied the whole bucket by pouring the sand into her mouth. He quickly stepped back.

“So, Bangul. Just as we practiced,” reminded Lloyd.

“Chomp, chomp! Bangul!”

Bangul gulped the sand, and she turned her round head to bite the chain that was set aside on one side. Then, she coiled her body. A chemical reaction took place inside her body. The food she consumed in one go digested in her body at a fast speed.

“Bungul! Bbu-bungul!”

*J*Bangul wagged her fat tail, and the clear ringing sound of the bell drummed in everyone’s ears. Next, a fierce volcanic explosion took place in Bangul’s buttocks.

The volcanic ash and gas emitted out of her body with such ferocity. The repulsive force sent Bangul to fly away into the air, and she bit on the chain with her mouth. And as she traveled airborne, the cable attached to the chain followed suit.

“Buuuung-ul!”

That day, the people’s jaws dropped as they saw a giant snake with a cable in its mouth travel across the Magena River, just like an arrow fixed to a rope.

Chapter 92: Sky-Walking Bridge (2)

“Buuuung-ul!”

Once the volcanic skill activated, the magma built inside Bangul’s stomach crushed into a million pieces and gushed out in a ferocious manner. The sixteen-foot fat body was propelled forward by the force.

Bangul leaped in the air, flying toward the western tower bridge of the suspension bridge. She flew across the Magena River in a flash, and a thick chain dangled from her mouth. The cable was attached to the chain.

The fat arrow with a rope... No, Bangul, biting the chain, glided away into the sky. As she was sent forward, the long cable that followed her drew a straight, clean line in the air over the Magena River that stretched 260 yards in width. On the other side, a natural cushion was waiting to receive Bangul.

“Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong!”

The 32-foot Ppodong stood on his feet, bringing out his chubby belly with his outstretched arms. He sucked in a breath, and seconds later, Bangul flew and collided into him.

Bangul’s round head dug deep into Ppodong’s belly like an arrow. But even though the inertia made the blow extremely powerful, Ppodong was okay because several layers of his belly protected him from harm. The thick fur worked as the first line of defense, absorbing the force of the collision. Next, his thick leather lessened the impact, and at last, his flabby belly distributed the rest of the landing force. Ppodong reached out and wrapped his arms around Bangul, preventing her from being bounced off the impact. He rolled down on the ground, resolving to never let her go. The two summon creatures locked their gaze.

“Ppodong?”

“Bangul!”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“Bba-bangul!”

The two confirmed each of them were okay. Both flashed a happy grin, and Javier quickly moved his feet behind them.

“Now!” Lloyd shouted from the other end.

Javier stretched his hand and grabbed the chain, which Bangul carried from the other side. He held on to make sure that the chain and cable wouldn’t fall. It required him to use his manaheart and three mana circles.

“Arggh!”

Ppodong and Bangul sprinted in his direction, assisting Javier by grabbing the cable together. They endured and tugged. They tugged and grabbed. At last, the cable affixed to the end of the tether came into his reach. Then, he turned right away, carrying the cable over his shoulder. He started to walk forward toward his destination, where there was a socket that connected the cable to the bridge peak.

“Put it in!”

At last, the end of the cable was shoved into the socket right when Lloyd shouted out. The cable and socket fit perfectly as if the two were measured with a ruler. Right when Javier saw its entrance, he turned the socket, locked it, and fastened it safely. However, Javier wasn’t satisfied with the job. He quickly turned to the west side of the tower, where Lloyd was standing. That was when he knew he could rest assured.

“Success...!” Lloyd was waving his two arms toward him, and he could even hear the labored pants between the shouting. It looked like the other end was able to connect as well.

“Whew.”

Javier finally let out a sigh of relief after knowing that the most dangerous part of the job was now done, and Lloyd was safe. The latter alone was good enough.

Even after that, a string of complicated tasks awaited them. The second act of construction resumed under the scorching sun that grew hotter as the day progressed. The main cables were connected from the rear areas of the towers, and they were installed at each anchorage of the tower. After that, Lloyd installed the fan trusses made from chains. To analogize, the main cables hung in the bridge towers looked like a clothesline, while the fan trusses took the shape of harp strings. There were dozens of them vertically stretched downward.

Ppodong played a stupendous role in this part of the job. To cut the long story short, Ppodong turned out to be a guru in riding ropes. He hopped and dangled on the cables even when his body stood more than thirty-two feet tall. The cable twanged and fluctuated as he moved, but he managed to run like he was on flat ground. Furthermore, hanging down there was a breeze for him as well. Sometimes, he went down the slide with his chubby belly.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Every day, Ppodong repeated the process of crisscrossing over the cables, hanging countless fan trusses and fixing them. Once the installation of the fan trusses was done, one last major job remained, placing the bridge plates on the top and connecting everything. To this end, Lloyd first floated the plate on the river.

“I am very relieved,” said Lloyd.

“Relieved? About what?”

Wels Corgidus looked up at Lloyd. There was a smile of satisfaction on Lloyd’s face.

“It’s about the bridge plate I had ordered. The truss frames have been constructed to be much sturdier than I had expected.”

“Are you kidding me right now? Have you forgotten who constructed it?”

“Who else but the master in craft, Sir Corgidus.”

“Such excessive flattery. Anyway, you impertinent brat, what do you plan to do from now on?” Corgidus said as he exhaled.

“What do you mean what I’m going to do?”

“That.”

Corgidus pointed at the area near the river with his chin. There was a huge raft on the water, which was occupied by a portion of the bridge plate. Corgidus asked once more.

“Didn’t you say you planned on connecting the object on top of the fan truss?”

“Yes, I did.”

“It’s a good idea,” Corgidus continued, “to have it afloat on the water. But how are you going to transfer it up there?”

“Oh, about that.”

Lloyd chuckled when he received the question.

“I have my ways. The technique is called ‘Jack-up Down,’ and I’m trying to play around with it and apply it to my current situation.”

“Jack-up down?”

“Yes.”

“What is it?” inquired Corgidus.

“Uhm, to put it simply... You know what? Why don’t you just watch how it’s done?” suggested Lloyd.

“What?”

Instead of explaining, Lloyd simply grinned. He tried to come up with an explanation that would be understandable to people here, but he couldn’t. The same method had been used in building the Gwangan Bridge in Busan, South Korea. He could tell the dwarf that, but it wouldn’t mean anything. So, he simply shrugged. Such a vague answer worked to plunge Corgidus into deeper confusion.

Jack-up down or whatever. How is he going to lift that thing up?

Corgidus couldn’t wrap his head around it as he was fully aware of the size of the truss frame bridge plate he had produced.

I’d mobilized all the masters working for me, and it almost took us four months to create six plates. That’s how heavy they are. One block of the plate weighs well over one hundred tons.

So, it was a puzzle how Lloyd would lift the plates up to the fan truss. And the crease around his eyes was deepening in curiosity when...

“Hamang...!”

There was a loud, unexpected shout in the middle of the river. Right after that...!

“Eh? Something’s sucking the water!”

Suddenly, the river tumbled just like one of the crowds shouted. It swirled into a storm, and it suddenly sucked into a single point as though a hole was burrowed under the river bottom. At last, people and Corgidus could see what was happening. A hippopotamus was rapidly growing as it drank the water right under the raft!

“Hamang! Hamamang!”

Hamang shouted like thunder as he gulped down the river water. One sip. Two sips. His body swelled like a balloon each time he drank. There seemed to be no limit to his expansion. He continued to grow thirty feet, sixty feet, and even 150 feet tall.

The raft moved on top of Hamang's back.

"Hamamang! Hamang!"

Hamang's body enlarged in size without stopping, and as a result, the raft on his back continued to elevate. 165 feet... 195 feet... 230 feet... Just at that point, Lloyd sent a signal.

"Hamang, stop!"

"Hamang...?"

"Could you pause drinking water for a second?"

"Hamamang? Hamang?"

"I'll let you drink more later!"

"Hamang!"

Just like that, Hamang's body stopped growing at 230 feet, and his height perfectly aligned the bridge plate on his back to the edge of the fan truss, which was 157 feet tall.

"All right! Let's go!" Lloyd shouted.

Lloyd led the waiting workers and headed to the bridge plate. Everyone connected a dozen strands of fan truss into the sockets. They connected one block after another, and it was repeated several times.

"Hamang!"

Hamang, who had gotten small while the workers connected the fan truss and plate, became large again and pushed the next block accordingly. Lloyd, Javier, and workers stood by at the top of the towers, and they assembled the plates and fan trusses. And they then connected the plates with one another with the link-type joint connect device Lloyd had ordered previously. Instead of the welders, the magicians came and used fire magic to weld the plates. This process went on for several days. At last, the last block was connected.

The moment the last plate was inserted into the socket, a new message popped in front of Lloyd.

[You have finished constructing the suspension bridge in the royal capital Magenta.]

[You have successfully constructed the first large suspension bridge in the history of the Laurasian continent.]

[This new type of bridge will be deeply loved by people in the capital. Moreover, it will be named after the builder and his handsome knight, the “Llojavi Bridge.”]

[The “Llojavi Bridge” will settle as a new landmark in the royal capital Magenta.]

[Your name will be vividly marked in the civil engineering history of the kingdom and the continent for constructing the “Llojavi Bridge.”]

[For that significant achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[Current RP: 3,019]

It’s done.

The welcoming message notified him of his achievement. He could never get enough of it, and it never failed to fill him with joy. Lloyd flashed a big smile as he looked at it. The tediously long suspension bridge construction ended up a success. It felt real. Lloyd thought to himself that this RP reward was just the beginning. Something better would come, and he’d soon be rewarded to the point that his stomach would burst in joy amid the overflowing number of rewards.

“I, Alicia Termina Magentano, declare henceforth.”

Queen Magentano’s voice echoed throughout the space with such dignity. She didn’t need to use magic to amplify her voice. She was a sword master, so imbuing mana into her voice to boom across the land was a breeze for her. Her voice reverberated majestically, and each time her mouth uttered, twenty magic-controlled golems moved in unison. Ten golems approached from the east and west side of the “Llojavi Bridge.” Then they marched toward the center of the bridge.

Each time their massive feet moved forward; the plate of the bridge trembled. But it didn’t collapse. Instead, it held up more flexibly, and at last, twenty golems gathered to the center of the bridge. Even till then, the bridge stood tall, majestic, and robust.

Twenty golems stopped at once, lining up behind the queen, who stood on the podium at the bridge center. The corners of the queen’s lips rose to form a satisfied smile.

“I hereby grant Lloyd Frontera, who has built this beautiful and sturdy bridge, the title of master craftsman.”

The sky was filled with hundreds of immaculate pigeons, and citizens gathered along the riverside to cheer for Lloyd. The previous bridge had posed a serious concern for them. They crossed holding their breath, fearing that the bridge might collapse due to the flood come spring. Their fear exacerbated when the bridge cracked in the spring. But they had to cross nonetheless to get to the other side of the river. They were like cats on hot bricks when they did, fearing that it might collapse without a warning. But to make ends meet, they were forced to cross it. That, however, was no longer necessary. For there was the beautiful and newly constructed suspension bridge, the Llojavi Bridge. It looked safe even in their untrained eyes.

Aside from the amazing shape that resembled a clothesline, it was amazing in that it didn’t have any piers submerged under water. This meant that no violent floods could impact the bridge. Its sturdiness was being put to the test right now. Even when twenty golems marched and gathered at the center, the bridge didn’t even budge.

“Lloyd! Lloyd!”

People’s cheers were mixed with Lloyd’s name. The shouting of his name grew louder until it became a unified outcry springing out of the crowd. It manifested the best form of respect and gratitude they could ever express in commemoration of the person who built a safe bridge for them. Lloyd’s shoulder shivered as he processed their fervent calling.

Woah...

Lloyd wondered if this was what it felt like to be a global K-pop star. He couldn’t believe this unrealistic and heart-thumping situation where the entire city called out his name. It was then followed by several praises from Her Highness. All sorts of rewards were announced one after another like a string of sausages. A hefty sum of compensation was paid, which was enough to cover the debt of the barony. On top of that, Lloyd was given a lifelong pension as an incentive.

It’s over. It’s finally over.

There was no greater reward in the world than money. Lloyd remained clutching his fists throughout the completion ceremony even as they were getting sweaty. Lloyd felt content and eclectic. It had been a year and a half since he came to this world under a new identity. And his earnest yearning to clear his debt was finally realized in real life.

Once I go back to the barony... I can just laze around for the rest of my life.

The debt problem was completely solved. He’d be on lifelong pension from the kingdom. No dramatic rebellion or anything since he was just a provincial noble. He’d be living the life of laziness for the rest of his life. Happiness overwhelmed Lloyd. So, he just needed to solve one issue, and it had something to do with the resolution he had secretly formed several months ago when he brought Julian out of the academy. If he solved that, he could happily go back to the barony. Thinking such, he sought the exact time and tried to read the queen's mood. The queen was coming down the podium after the construction completion ceremony when he saw the chance. He quickly got on his knee and spoke in a somewhat resentful voice.

"Your Majesty, I give thanks and praise for your boundless generosity. However, if I may be so bold, I, Lloyd Frontera, alert you about a highly important matter."

"What is it?"

Queen Magentano was walking down the podium until Lloyd spoke. She paused and turned to his way.

"You have something to alert me? What is it?"

I've got her attention. It worked.

Lloyd smiled as he hung his head down. He had just received the title of master, as well as the queen's favor and trust. Now was the right time.

"The Magenta Royal Academy that is under your guidance continues to be the center of rotten corruption, inequality, and sordidness. Therefore, I humbly ask if that is within your knowledge."

"What is that... Corruption, which I am not aware of, is taking place at the academy?"

"It is unfortunately true, Your Majesty." Lloyd's voice dripped with resentment. But his lips twitched into a smile, but no one saw it. At last, the reaction he'd wanted came back.

"Do expound on the matter."

So, it began. The time to tell on the jerks who harassed the weak hiding behind their family status and the academy workers who turned a blind eye to the whole situation. The time had come for Lloyd to put their heads on a platter. Thus, this began Lloyd's detailed tattling that was filled with nothing but the truth.

Chapter 93: Tattling and Trickery (1)

A long, long time ago, there lived a private who was slow in movement. He got kicked in the shin all the time by his seniors. So one day, the private made a wish.

Dear stars above, please help me bond well with my seniors. And boom! The stars descended into the unit!

And the wrath of the two-star general carried the nasty-tempered senior to military prison. Oh, what a happy ending. A happy ending.

A corner of Lloyd's lips lifted upward. His days in the military came to his mind. He had a comrade who came into the military around the same time as Lloyd. The comrade was kind, but the military wasn't exactly the place where he thrived the most. He moved slowly, and was a bit socially slow as well. Making things worse, he was unlucky. Some of his seniors were foul-tempered, so they summoned him just to kick him in the shin. There were even worse things that happened to him. Fast forward a few months, almost breaking into tears, he confessed to Lloyd that he planned on running away from the base. Lloyd advised that he shouldn't be the one to leave. Instead, he ought to report the wrongdoings of his seniors. Two weeks later, the entire unit was turned upside down. The division commander visited to inspect the unit, and all of them were swept into military prison. It was the power of taking the courage to report. That was how he became happy. Happy ending.

Whew... The exact same thing happened today. Lloyd threw off his superfluous dress coat and tossed his necktie on the chair after loosening it. His tired body flung itself toward the sofa, and the pleasant fluffiness brought an onrush of sleepiness and the memories of events that had taken place during the day.

It's a relief. That everything went according to plan. There was a ceremony marking the completion of the suspension bridge, and the queen bestowed the title of master craftsman to Lloyd as well as the promised rewards and prestigious benefits. And in return, he told the queen about what was happening down at the academy. He couldn’t forget the expression on Queen Magentano’s face was deathly.

“Corruption...? Inequality? And, on top of that, sordidness?”

The queen’s icy voice filled the air. Having a just and fair character, Queen Magentano especially despised the act of using wrongful force to harass the weak. It was something mentioned several times in The Knight of Blood and Iron. That is, it was true until she lost an arm after an assassination attack. And so, Lloyd figured that tattling on the queen would work. Plus, she gave him full trust at this point in time. So now that he had the chance, he needed to make hay while the sun shone. Missing it would be a foolish thing to do. Convicted of such, Lloyd nodded at the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

This was the most important part. He needed to choose his words carefully. They had to be strategically ordered.

“Please forgive me for saying this, but the reality of the academy I have witnessed is extremely far from the mission of its existence.”

“Far from it?” said the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Do expound more,” she added.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

His scheme worked. Now, he spoke in a more forceful tone.

“The students, who are supposed to give everything to their studies, are only interested in forming cliques. Instead of competing with their knowledge and wisdom, they parade their family ranks and status. The sons of the marquess and count join as one to persecute the son of the viscount, and he is forced to trample the child of the baron. Furthermore, everyone is silent about it. When every minute should be spent on academics, they indulge in the sweetness of power, and instead of forming great ambitions for a better world, students despair over the wall that is their family rank."

Lloyd was unreserved about letting out the harsh thoughts that he had held in until now.

"What is more, the attitude of the academy is no better than the students it should be guiding. The housemaster, who should be pointing out the wrong, accepts money behind everyone's back. Professors, who ought to be alarmed and fearful over the corruption of the world, are scared that they might make a bad impression on the nobles. And the dean, who has the duty to put an end to this wretched reality, is busy silencing the pitiful outcries for help from the students from less influential families."

What Lloyd said was true. Ever since Lloyd got Julian out of the academy, he used whatever time he had left in building the bridge to meet up with the cleaners and cafeteria workers in the academy. He even once visited a weak noble alumni. Countless testimonies and reports were revealed through them. Dirty corruption by the housemaster and dean and their practice of receiving bribery in exchange for turning a blind eye to all those were made plain. The sons of the powerful nobles acted more boldly, as though the world was theirs. A culture of corruption spread throughout the academy like rotten roots. Lloyd collected such witnesses, accounts, and pieces of evidence as much as possible. He fished the evidence out of his pocket, which was a rolled-up piece of paper.

"I have investigated when and where the workers in the academy took bribes for personal gains. In each item, I have attached the incident and witness right beside it."

"Spread it open," demanded the queen.

Lloyd opened it up according to the order and carefully handed it to her. Afterward, everything went smoothly. The pieces of evidence and witnesses were so perfectly organized in the paper that the queen's gaze changed the moment she checked. She looked like the division commander of Lloyd's comrade when he reported harassment in the military.

“This means that from now on, the queen’s going to summon everyone involved and beat the daylights out of them.”

Lloyd spoke as he was jostled out of his reverie. He turned to look at the door, and Julian was standing there. He had become darker than when Lloyd first saw him a few months ago, and his petite physique had grown a bit firmer. But his unique round and youthful impression was still the same. The boy mumbled as he looked to Lloyd’s side.

“Tell me if you got something to say,” Lloyd said as he tapped the side of the sofa with his hands.

Julian awkwardly approached, and instead of sitting in his designated seat, he remained standing, crinkling his nose.

“Uhm, so what’s going to happen from now on?” Julian muttered.

“What do you mean?”

“Them.”

“Do you mean the folks in the academy?” asked Lloyd.

“Yeah.”

“Are you worried?”

Surely, he would be curious, Lloyd thought to himself. After all, they harassed and bullied Julian for a long time. And there was a large group that remained silent about the whole thing. But now, they were seconds away before the iron mace of the queen hit them. Lloyd laughed.

“I don’t know.”

“Huh?” asked Julian, raising his brow.

“Who cares what happens to them. They can die, and I won’t care.”

“They might even die...?”

“Well, I don’t think the queen is going to punish them that severely. But...”

“It’s going to sting considerably. Some might end up in jail for bribery, and a thrashing might await one young master. Some may even be confined to the manor and won’t be able to set foot outside for several years,” drawled Lloyd.

“...”

“And anybody who has an iota of involvement in your harassment will seriously have their future as a noble jeopardized. Why? Because they’ve been singled out by the most powerful person in the kingdom.”

“Wait, did you plan the whole thing from the beginning?”

“Somewhat.”

That was true. The moment he sought the opportunity to teach Diego a lesson and brought Julian out of the academy, he devised the plan to annoy, provoke, and destroy them.

“It’s really nothing complicated. I had just gotten the construction deal from the queen. Since the construction held much meaning to the royal circle, I thought that the success of the construction would let me earn some brownie points from her. And earning her trust like that would help me tattle on them,” explained Lloyd.

“...”

Lloyd shrugged as if it was nothing. Julia found himself gulping. There was something awesome about Lloyd. He was never like this. The man was a spontaneous drunkard who only caused trouble, but not anymore. Ever since Julian was forced into a LOA and dragged out of the academy, he received the feeling that Lloyd Frontera wasn’t an alcoholic hooligan anymore. He didn’t drink. He became industrious. Most importantly, he was even gentle with him!

He never got angry at me for several months. A gentle and kind Lloyd Frontera. That was something unimaginable. Julian wondered at times if Lloyd was the same person he always knew.

Him being gentle... It was awkward at first, but it wasn’t so bad after a while. It was the same case with shoveling. This was the first time in his life he did an activity like that. So, it went without saying that the work exhausted him. For the first few days, muscle pain throbbed all over his body. Blisters appeared on his palm, and his skin became scraped. But such soreness and muscle pain hardly meant anything. It wasn’t anything compared to his agonizing days in the academy when he faced harassment on a daily basis.

Actually, I felt good. Julian sweated and shoveled all day. Something in him changed each time he used the tool. He moved the piles of sand, and Bangul chomped it up to produce wires. Ppodong interlaced the wires to turn them into cables, which were used to support the suspension bridge in the capital. Julian found satisfaction in the work. The entire process of construction was facilitated by his shoveling. So, in a way, his shoveling was what allowed the suspension bridge to be realized. An overwhelming sensation swept over him as he thought so. He felt confident. And just as his stamina increased after months of hard shoveling, Julian began to have more belief in himself.

It could be that Lloyd entrusted me with the job to make me feel this way. Julian’s gaze moved to Lloyd. He was scoffing in his loosened clothes. Lloyd was an older brother Julian had always hated and was ashamed of. But for the first time ever, Julian saw him differently. It could be, perhaps, that was what made Julian say something he never ever thought he’d tell Lloyd.

“Thank you.”

“What?”

“I said thank you,” Julian said louder this time.

“You must have eaten something weird.”

Lloyd spoke as he poked and scratched his ear. And then it occurred to Julian that he had made a mistake. Grimace formed on his face.

“Yeah. I think I did. I feel like vomiting,” said Julian.

“That’s the same thing for me. I feel like I’m going to puke from my ears.”

“Yeah? Well, I’ve got goosebumps right now.”

“Just goosebumps? Even the taste buds on my tongue stood up,” Lloyd said as he stuck his tongue out. Julian scoffed at him.

“By the way, Lloyd.”

“What is it?”

“When are you going back home?”

“Not sure. Maybe tomorrow?”

“Tomorrow? That soon?”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd nodded his head. There was no need to stay around here any longer.

“The construction is finished, and I received everything I need from the queen. So, it’s time to go back to the fiefdom. A mountain of work await me since I’ve started a lot of projects there, too.”

It was true. The coal mine, Maritz land, and waterway. He had several things to check over.

“Plus, I’ve earned enough to pay the debt. If I goof and stick around here, I might be arriving after the interest date. I’d have to pay the interest again.

So, I have to pay every penny of my debt before the interest date comes up."

"Oh, that is so true. But you see..." Julian scratched his cheek. "I didn't know about it, actually."

"Didn't know what?" asked Lloyd.

"The debt you mentioned."

"Oh. The debt?"

"Yeah, I really didn't know since all I did was study here. My parents sent me letters every month, but they never ever once mentioned it. So, I was entirely in the dark that they had it so rough back there."

Julian hung his head down as shame started to creep up inside him. He had thought that he had it the toughest among his family. He was the one living a hard life away from home, and he had it worse because he withstood the harassment even when studying alone was difficult to keep up with. So, he considered himself proud for enduring the situation and not telling his parents. But when he learned about their financial situation, he gained a new perspective. Javier had explained everything to him about how his father got conned, how much debt his family owed, and how Lloyd acted differently amid such a situation.

"At first, I was a bit skeptical," confessed Julian.

"How can I when he told me that you changed. Sir Asrahan told me that you are really awesome. Sometimes, you can be petty but you're trying very hard. He said that the family would have collapsed into ruins if it weren't for you."

Javier's words fell like bombshells. Julian clenched and unclenched his fists several times and sighed at length as he imagined the pain and suffering his family had to go through. When that fact was made clear to Julian, he severely rebuked himself.

It turned out that I had it the easiest. But Julian didn’t know that. He simply grumbled that Lloyd would be the same as before. He acted like a child.

“So I’m sorry.”

“You’re sorry?”

“Yeah.”

Julian nodded, even though he couldn’t meet Lloyd in the eyes. He was too embarrassed. Still, Julian had mustered up the courage to say it. The only chance to say so was today since Lloyd would be returning to the fiefdom the next day. He had to say what he wanted to say now. And so, he carefully uttered the very words he had wanted to say for a few months but was too shy to say out loud.

“I’m not going to hate you anymore.”

Just then...

Chapter 94: Tattling and Trickery (2)

“Oh, you little boy...”

Lloyd grinned without realizing it. He couldn’t help but feel happy and content as he stared at Julian standing in front of him. But at the same time, a deep sense of embarrassment swelled in him when he thought back to what Julian had just said.

“So you’re not going to hate me anymore?” asked Lloyd.

“Um, no...”

“That means that you used to hate me a lot.”

“Yes, I did,” admitted Julian.

“How are you going to treat me from now on?” Lloyd demanded.

“I... I... Um...”

“With a lot of affection?”

“Um, no. Not like that.”

“Then, how? By being friendly?” demanded Lloyd once again.

“...”

“With a lot of warmth and love and softness?”

“…Ugh, seriously?” Julian spoke as he grimaced.

A teasing smile spread across Lloyd’s face. “Now you know what you just did, eh?”

“Whew, yeah.”

“Really toe-curling, isn’t it?” asked Lloyd again.

“Yeah.”

“I even got goosebumps up to the tip of my toes.”

“...”

“Don’t you ever say something that cheesy again,” said Lloyd.

“...”

“Whew, I thought I was going to get a seizure, really,” Lloyd emphasized as he tapped and stroked his belly.

Even though his tone was teasing, Lloyd didn’t feel offended. In all honesty, Lloyd was instead endlessly elated and delighted. It had little to do with earning a lot of RP. No. Although he was satisfied with the reward of RP in front of him, the contentment in his heart satisfied him much more. At that moment, he suddenly recalled his childhood.

I wish I’d had a younger brother back then.

Anybody with a brother would freak out and immediately advise Lloyd to get rid of the thought, but Lloyd was serious about it because he had grown up as an only child. Throwing a tantrum at his parents became his strategy to make them get him one. He demanded that he wanted to play with someone younger, like the neighborhood kids. One day, he even drew doodles on the wall with some crayons. They were of the popular robot, Gundam. Any boy would have recognized it at the time. About five inches shorter than his height, the robot posed in a V-shaped with his outstretched arms. Lloyd even colored the drawing. That night, his parents came home to a surprising doodle of a robot on the wall, and Lloyd confidently told them that the robot was his younger brother from now on. His parents merely smiled in bitterness and embarrassment without scolding him. He didn’t know at the time, but it was revealed many years later that he was an IVF baby.

Whew... Stop thinking about it.

Sometimes, no, on rare occasions, memories of his past intruded his thoughts, plunging him into unexpected and unnecessary nostalgia. He let out a soft sigh and pressed the pieces of ambushing memories back into his mind. Then, he stared at Julian and spoke.

“Anyway, I’m going back to the barony tomorrow. Oh, that is after I attend an event later tonight,” said Lloyd.

“What do you have later?” asked Julian.

“Oh, Her Highness told me earlier that she wants me to attend a party this evening. She said it’s going to be awesome.”

“A party?”

“Yeah, a banquet hosted by the royal family, celebrating the construction of the bridge. I can already see what’s going to happen there. The orchestra playing music. The nobles wander around to form connections. Then, a rude young noble eventually gets challenged to a duel. It’s the same old same old,” drawled Lloyd in boredom.

“Brother, you have become very imaginative.”

“I’ll take you to mean that I’ve become smart,” said Lloyd. “Anyway, you should come along.”

“Eh? Me too?” Julian’s eyes grew wide.

“Of course,” Lloyd said as he chuckled. “You are the younger brother of the master hand. That alone gives you the right to come. And besides...”

Lloyd’s voice turned meaningful. “You will meet a lot of powerful nobles at this banquet.”

“Um, so that means...”

“There will be families whom I tattled on.”

“Doesn’t that make it a little awkward?” Julian said with hesitation in his voice.

“No, you must attend with your chin held high. You’ve done nothing wrong. You’re the victim. Yet, you’re trying to hide? Nonsense.”

It was true. Julian had to be confident, especially in situations like these. He had to be thick-skinned and callous as if he had a titanium plate on his face.

“So, let’s take this chance to give you some ego. Okay? It’ll make your life easier moving forward.”

“All right. Okay.”

Julian nodded in understanding. Lloyd felt content again, seeing how smart the boy is. He then resolved it in his heart as well.

Tonight’s not going to be a simple celebration. It’ll be something more.

The queen wasn’t clumsy. She would want to keep Lloyd by her side. Whether it be a magnificent position or a jaw-dropping prize, she would offer him such sweet rewards in exchange for making him stay in the capital. That was why she called him up here and tested his abilities in the first place.

I, too, am not going to go so easy on her.

Lloyd’s dream remained the same. He wanted to become a rich man. He didn’t want to suffer anymore. He didn’t want to work too hard, either. He simply wanted to pay his debts and become a couch potato in the barony. So, the time had come for Lloyd to play one more trick so he could happily go back home to his barony.

The soft and slow melody traveled throughout the marble floor, and the glimmers of the chandeliers flowed down like starlight. The banquet hall was unbelievably luxurious and majestic. Amidst everything, Lloyd was dressed in a tuxedo. As he noticed Her Highness approaching, he paid his respect and started talking, almost in a scripted manner.

“All hail Her Majesty. Please forgive me for saying this, but no,” said Lloyd.

“No...? What do you mean?” Queen Magentano quirked her brow sharply to one end. Once again, just like any other time, she noticed how brazen and unpredictable he was.

“I have not asked anything yet,” said the queen. “But what is it that you dislike so much that you reject it before I ask?”

“Were you not going to say that you will be bestowing me with land and a title befitting my skills?” asked Lloyd.

“I was?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Why?”

“So that I shall accept a position in this palace.”

“Hmm... Tell me, can you read minds?”

“No.”

“Then?”

“I can read the room,” explained Lloyd briefly.

“Ha.”

Clink.

The queen laughed shortly and put down the crystal glass in her hand. She then grabbed a new one from the serving tray and sipped it as she glanced down at Lloyd through the slightly slanted glass.

“I have no choice but to admit it. Yes, your presupposition is right. I planned on rewarding you with a fitting land, title, and massive amounts of gold. Moreover, I meant to give you a position in the palace that suits you."

"Did you host the banquet to announce to everyone about this?" asked Lloyd.

"Indeed."

She drank from the second glass. The first glass was a dry, sparkling one with high acidity. The next one was a flavorful red wine. It was the typical order of drinking the queen enjoyed. Keeping the routine, she said, "Therefore, I am curious. Why do you reject it when I am ready to bestow you with the title, land, money, and position?"

"It's nothing extraordinary, Your Majesty. But..."

"But?"

"I like living in the quietude of the province."

"Is that all... there is?" asked the queen.

"Yes, Your Majesty."

Lloyd hung his head down a little lower. The queen was drinking her third glass now. And as he studied her reaction, he thought to himself...

Good. Everything's going according to plan.

Just then, he recalled what had happened earlier in the day. Right until he set foot in this banquet tonight, Lloyd mulled over how he should reject the queen's inevitable offer to work for the palace. Even when he got dressed, touched up his hair, and hopped into the carriage, Lloyd thought and thought again about it. He finally concluded that the standard tactics were the best method.

I might be cornered into accepting it by giving clumsy excuses.

In actuality, Lloyd could come up with a whole trove of excuses. First off, he could say that he or his family was sick. Or that he was crushed under work and that he wasn’t ready. Everything around him could be used as an excuse. Just like how everyone made up an excuse to skip class, leave school early, or take a day off work, Lloyd could lie. But he remembered someone saying that the only person who succeeded in life by giving out excuses was an artist who sang the song “Excuse.” Lloyd believed in that, and that this principle applied just the same to him.

The moment I make up an excuse, I’ll be setting myself up to be caught in a trap.

If health was an issue, he could get better anytime. It went the same for family situations or business. The moment the source of his excuse evaporated in thin air, he would have no escape. What was more, the person Lloyd was dealing with was the queen. And so, coming up with dimwit excuses to reject a position in the royal palace may backfire and Lloyd could have no choice but to accept it later on.

I’ll end up the same as Minister Hwang Hee.

At the end of the Goryeo period in ancient South Korea, there lived Hwang Hee, who took the same test as the Taejong of Joseon, Yi Bangwon. In the future, Hwang was appointed by King Sejong, the son of Yi, and toiled away his entire life for the country without any second of rest. He pleaded in vain that he needed to take some rest. He used his health and family as excuses, but it was as if he was talking to a wall. His whole life was spent putting his nose to the grindstone for the government, and just like that, the man died doing nothing but work his entire life.

Ugh... I have the chills.

Lloyd shuddered at the thought, his shoulders trembling. No thanks to lifelong slavery. He concluded that it would be better for him to opt for the standard tactics than to come up with perfunctory excuses. That promised a higher chance of his victory in this situation. When he put this into action, he was able to secure the result he desired.

“I see. You hate it so much that you dare to be this forthcoming with me, the queen.”

“Please forgive my rudeness, Your Majesty.”

“Not at all. Nothing good will come out of pinning you down here when you have no desire to remain in this place. How can you fulfill your duties when your heart's not in it?”

The queen paused after saying that, smiling.

“I am not a tyrant. You are a loyal subject who has done great deeds for this capital and for Cremo. I shall respect your decision. Therefore, go back to your home and spend the rest of your life in peace.”

“Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Highness.”

“Really?”

“...”

“You must be relieved on the inside. I know what you are going through. That is why I give you my word. If you change your mind, do come to the capital,” assured the queen”

Lloyd paused at her words. Then he said, “Do you mean... that Your Majesty’s offer has no expiration?”

“Indeed,” confirmed the queen.

Clack.

Taking a sip from a fourth glass, the queen said, “I swear by my name. Your land, title, and position will always be waiting for you in the capital.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“I hope you do. Now, I will take my leave.”

Lloyd heard the queen turn around and walk away. The clacking of her heels started to grow distant. That was when he slightly lifted his head.

“Woah.”

The air that was stifled in his lungs rushed out, and he found himself clenching his fist.

It worked!

Lloyd exclaimed inwardly because his choice of tactic worked.

I mean, even the queen can’t force someone to work for her when he doesn’t want to.

Just then, Lloyd recalled The Records of the Three Kingdoms, and the famous three visits of Liu Bei to make Zhuge Liang join him. And so, Lloyd thought the same thing would happen here since this world was no different from the one he lived in. Thankfully, his prediction was spot on”

And since I was promised she’d save some land and a title for me, my future is secure. My later years are promised to be good. Perfect.

The thought of this brought a satisfying smile all over his face. Everything was set. His debt was cleared. The only thing that awaited him was a luxurious life of laziness. Lloyd felt as though he had gotten a newly constructed house without a loan in the most expensive city district in the country, bought a high-end car in one payment, enough resources to pay for the kids’ school, university, and wedding, and to top it all off, his retirement plan was all covered.

Whew. How I wish I could hop back into the carriage and go to the barony at this moment. But since I can’t do that, I should just sit back and eat the exquisite food.”

Thinking such in his head, Lloyd moved around the buffet like a person who had starved for the past three days. He approached the servants holding up the food trays, and just then, something made him stop dead in his tracks.

“The banquet will continue until the moon sets.”

Huh?

Those seemingly innocuous words traveled into Lloyd's ears, and they sounded plain and harmless to others. But not to Lloyd. The moment he heard them, he felt numb, as though a bucketful of ice water splashed down on his body. He gulped.

Why am I hearing this now?

Just then, Lloyd recalled The Knight of Blood and Iron. After two and a half years, the royal capital goes through something tragic. An assassination attempt on the queen. There was a code shared by the group that took one of her arms after poisoning Queen Magentano. It was so simple that it didn't attract any suspicion.

The banquet will continue until the moon sets...

Since it was meant to happen much later, Lloyd could not be hearing that now. This should've come two and a half years later. But now that he heard the code, he turned to its speaker. His gaze locked on Sir Kyle, the commander of the royal guard, who was happily chatting with the Great Lord Chamberlain. Chills ran down his spine. At that moment, Lloyd was sure in his heart that he had discovered the culprit behind the veiled assassination of the queen, which wasn't even revealed in the novel.

Chapter 95: Tainted Crown (1)

“Whew. I must have drank too much.”

Clack. Clack. The clicking noise of heels filled the hallway. Queen Magentano smiled meaningfully.

But I didn’t drink more than I usually do.

She felt nauseated, and her heart beat a little faster than usual.

I must have worked too much lately.

She looked back at her schedule as she walked across the hallway. Each day was another challenge yet to be finished.

The flood damage from the spring rain was greater than I expected, and the wasteland in the east is concerning as well.

Enemies surrounded the kingdom, and there were a lot of powerful figures that yearned for her downfall. Among their enemies, the sultan kingdom “Asfahan” over the eastern range of the wilderness was her nemesis. She had battled against them twice already.

Something is not right.

She had planted spies in Asfahan. Their reports came to her mind. They said that the kingdom had been increasing its weaponry in recent days. They were concentrating their forces against the western region that faced her kingdom. This couldn’t be simple military training.

Invasion maybe? No. A vast wasteland stands between us. If they were vying to attack us, they would have gathered the forces up north where both territories meet. So, what could it be?

The question left her wondering for several months. But no answer came to her mind, especially now when she was inebriated.

Tsk. I need to put it out of my mind for a while.

Her smile deepened. Thinking about it now solved nothing. It would only add unnecessary stress. So, she decided to focus on the present, sober up, and get back to the hall. She entered her exclusive resting room and leaned against the comfortable sofa. After drinking a cold glass of water, she caught her breath to regain some focus in her mind. It didn't work though. Her stomach still churned with nausea, and her palpitations didn't get any calmer. She breathed fainter and faster than usual.

Something's off.

She furrowed her brow. There was no one else that knew her body better than herself. She was a sword fighter that rose to the level of a sword master. Sobering up from slight intoxication was a breeze for her. Supposedly. She just had to control the mana in her system. But that wasn't working very well at the moment. Now, her vision grew dizzy and faint.

Something's gone wrong.

Thump! Thump! Her heart started to beat faster. She started to break out in a cold sweat. She got down from the sofa as an ominous feeling rushed through her. Removing her shoes, she let her body collapse to the floor. And she sat down, straightened her back, and started to breathe properly. Her heart was awakened. The powerful manaheart moved at her calling.

I should inspect every corner of my body first.

She pushed the fully loaded mana through the manaheart into every vein inside her. And the mana, which was like a node spread throughout her whole body, started to storm in her. At that moment, she reflexively clutched her chest.

Sink!

"…!"

The shock almost bent her back. The pain almost burst her heart.

“Argh!”

Everything before Queen Magentano was starting to drain in color and turn white. She fought to stay awake, not to lose consciousness. In a frantic manner, she put her hands on the floor and got to her feet, clenching her molars.

Poison? It couldn’t be.

She hoped not. But the pain that started from her heart spread all throughout her body in an instant. It was flowing along the mana within her vein, attacking every corner of her organs. There was only one explanation behind this.

Poison? How?

The queen gritted her teeth. The servants inspected her food and drink and tasted every one of them. They waited for four days to see whether they showed any symptoms or signs of illness. Only after that four-day process did the food make it to her table.

It was the same today.

The food and drink she had eaten at the banquet passed the same procedure as any other day. And no servants had died or passed out.

So what happened?

She wondered how this happened, but there was no way of knowing. She could only speculate. There was a mole behind the process of checking the food.

I should... call someone...

She needed help. The poison was spreading even now. The more she attempted to suppress it using the mana, the faster and wider the poison would spread. Queen Magentano yelled, squeezing every strength in her.

“Is someone... out there?!”

But no one answered. That was something else that was sketchy.

Dammit.

She did ask the servants to leave before she entered this room. But not without the instruction to wait outside the door. It was strange that no one answered.

“Argh... Argh!”

Staggering sideways, she hobbled toward the door as her hands propped against the wall. Her consciousness grew fainter every step of the way. She had to bite her lip hard to remain conscious. It was merely a few steps, but her mind blinked on and off like a light switch.

It’s too far.

The distance she would have easily traveled with a leap felt far now. The rest area was too wide. Though she moved with much strength, the distance ahead of her was greater than how much she traveled. She let out a chuckle at the ridiculousness of this situation. How did she get into such a mess? She wondered. She was about to plunge into despair when...

Clack. Like a miracle, the door opened. It was the man she was the closest with.

“Sir Kyle?”

The man she trusted the most. The royal commander that protected her at all times, her teacher in sword fighting, and her fellow sword master. Her face brightened when she saw him. Trying to not lose dignity, she spoke.

“Sir Kyle... Just in time... I am glad that you are here amid this difficult time. Here, my hand.”

She held out her hand toward the commander, smiling in the hopes that he would help her. Sir Kyle smiled at her the same.

“Yes, I am glad that I am with you, Your Highness, at this difficult time,” he stated.

But he didn’t take her outstretched hand. Instead, his hand moved to the hilt of his sword.

“Once a monarch of the kingdom. May you rest in peace.”

Fatal hostility flashed through his eyes.

“It looks like the queen is in danger.”

Lloyd’s whisper came as a surprise. Javier cocked his head to the side.

“I do not know what you mean.”

At first, he thought Lloyd was making a nasty joke. But when he looked into Lloyd’s eyes, he knew he was serious.

“I’m telling you. Be quiet and lower your voice.”

“...”

“I’ll tell you the details later. Just follow me.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Javier nodded, knowing that if his words were true, there was no time to goof around and stall. The details and explanation could come later. It was time to move, but not too closely. A few steps away from him. Lloyd instructed him through his eyes. Javier, who was quick to take hints, stepped away. And he asked Lloyd through his gaze.

Where are we going?

Over there.

Lloyd's eyes pointed to an area near the ball. That was where the resting room for the queen was located.

It's obvious. The queen is nowhere to be seen, and that's the only place where she could be.

The monarch was still human, so there would be times when she got drunk and tired during banquets. That was why there was a rest area for her, so she could sober up or get some air without losing her dignified air in front of people.

That's also the place where they attempt to assassinate her in the novel.

The story popped up in his mind just then. The incident happened two and a half years from now. It was the day it snowed for the first time that year. Queen Magentano almost died from poison when she stopped by the resting area during the ball. But she impressively used her mana ability, befitting the status of a sword master, and barely made it out alive. The assassination attempt fundamentally changed the destiny of the kingdom.

But it happens today? Why?

He couldn't wrap his head around why it was happening two and a half years earlier. He came up with various speculations, but nothing really stood out except for one.

Something changed.

The plot must have been altered for some reason. If that was the case, he might be the reason behind it, thought Lloyd to himself.

Let's check it out first.

Not too hastily. Just naturally as they blended in with the people at the banquet. Sometimes drinking from a cup with elegance. Passing by the servants with a smile. Doing such things, they removed themselves from the hall and entered the long hallway. Lloyd and Javier walked side by side, and their walking became faster. Lloyd quickly formed a plan in his head, but he was a bit nervous about it.

Why did it have to be Sir Kyle, really, out of all the people?

Lloyd recalled what he had heard a while ago about how the banquet would last until the moon set. That harmless line was actually pretty famous amongst the readers of the novel. This was because the line was the code shared among the assassins that altered the history of the kingdom. So, Lloyd knew the line as well. The problem came from the fact that the person who said it was Sir Kyle.

If the assassin is really Sir Kyle, can we stop him?

Sir Vergado Kyle. The commander of the royal guards and an even greater sword master than the queen. It was shocking that he could be the assassin. But more than that, Lloyd was anxious about whether they would stand a chance against him. As such, Lloyd was of two minds about saving the queen.

I mean, we could be the ones that are done for.

He was hesitant, so he thought about it for a few minutes. Save the queen or turn a blind eye to her? Lloyd meticulously weighed the pros and cons between the two options. And at last, he arrived at a decision.

It's a bit risky, but it's more beneficial to save the queen.

Actually, there was no reason for Lloyd to mull over this. Queen Magentano had unreserved trust in him at the moment, to the point of granting excessive favors. And should she fall into the tragedy in the novel, losing an arm and becoming a tyrant...

It'd be a big loss for me.

The queen cherished and trusted Lloyd very much, willing to bestow land and a title at any time. Her fondness and favor for Lloyd were unrivaled, so Lloyd had the most powerful person in the whole kingdom as his supporter.

What would happen if she got poisoned, lost an arm, and became a massacring tyrant?

Goodness, I don't even want to think about it.

He could be degraded into her punching bag, not to mention the fact that he would be losing his greatest supporter. He might wound up in a tragedy where he could get framed for wrongful sins. His family status, title, and property would go down the flames. Worse, he could end up beheaded.

So, I've got no other option but to save her.

Even if it meant his opponent was Sir Kyle, Lloyd needed to trust Javier and get there fast.

Sprint! Lloyd and Javier were now running, but something was strange. They saw no one during their run through the long hallway. No servants or maids they usually saw. Turning the corners three times and moving up the stairs, they traveled a long way, but no one was in sight.

"Something is definitely sketchy."

Javier's voice turned low and icy.

Suppressing his nervousness, Lloyd asked, "Are you sure you're going to be okay?"

"Excuse me?" Javier arched one of his brows as he ran.

"Your sword. You don't have it."

"I will be fine."

Clang! Javier wielded his right hand at the same time he answered, and he snapped the candlestick hanging on the hallway wall. The snapped candlestick turned a few times in the air as it reflected the light. Javier grabbed the lower part.

Thwack!

“This will be enough.”

They were unarmed for the banquet, but now, that problem was solved. Next, when they took the last corner to the entrance, they met a horrifying scene. There was a pool of blood on the floor of the door to the rest area. Six servants lay in the bloody puddle, all of them not breathing. It only meant one thing.

Slam! They both kicked and rushed into the room, the door smashing in half. Two people were in there. Sir Kyle pressing his sword down, and the queen, struggling to block it. Javier reacted first as he saw the scene.

Slash! The candlestick in Javier’s hand slashed the air, creating a string of ferocious wind invisible to the eyes. Sir Kyle moved his sword.

Clang! Clang! Clang! The candlestick and sword collided several times, and the burning fire danced in the air. Javier’s veins in his right popped, and Sir Kyle frowned. The two beastly eyes met one another. Lloyd passed by the fight right away and made way for the queen.

“Lloyd Frontera...?”

“I am sorry, but I need you to keep your mouth shut now.”

“What...? Argh...”

Lloyd’s large hand cupped her mouth. And he gently forced her to lie on the ground without sparing a second of resistance. His actions would have normally been unacceptable, but right now, the queen was poisoned all throughout her body. Since Lloyd knew that he did away with all his menial mannerisms and etiquette. He merely focused on healing her.

“I’ll get the poison out first. Relax your body. Loosen up.”

Ziiing! Lloyd placed his palm on her stomach, and he rotated the three circles at their highest speed, absorbing the mana inside her body.

“…!”

Queen Magentano’s eyes flew open in horror.

Chapter 96: Tainted Crown (2)

Zing! Javier's three circles rotated at varying speeds. At times, they amplified the spin of one another, and some other times, they slowed only to burst with speed again. As the circles criss-crossed together, Javier freely discharged mana and harnessed it into the candlestick that stabbed and slashed through everything in front of it.

Clang! The candlestick hit the sword, igniting fiery sparks in the air, and one of the sticks was slashed in half. The sword shot upward only to then aim for Javier's neck. Javier responded by tilting his head to the side by an inch.

Slash. The sword brushed an inch away from Javier's nose, and Sir Kyle's attack failed to warrant a single hair strand of damage. Javier's icy eyes traveled over to the enemy, and Sir Kyle's eyes widened in surprise.

What in the world was that?

Sir Kyle, the commander of the royal guards, gazed at Javier with evident astonishment in his eyes.

He avoided that?

Sir Kyle believed he had aimed his sword correctly. The timing, the sword trajectory, and the silver-haired stripling's staggering balance assured him so. Not a single enemy ever managed to avoid his sword under such conditions. But today was an exception. This youth avoided his perfect blow with nothing but a simple tilt of his head!

Has he been reading my sword's trajectory?

A shiver ran down his spine, but he instantly shook it off with a scoff. Who was he anyway? One of the two sword masters in the kingdom! There was no chance that he would get beaten by this young novice.

"You are nothing but a baby!"

Bam! Sir Kyle stomped the ground hard, and a cloud of shockwaves shifted the balance of his weight. He tugged his sword at lightning speed and wielded it with the force of his weight and mana.

Fwoosh! The sword laterally swayed to burst through the air, and Javier wasn't allowed another second to avoid the incoming blow after escaping the previous one.

"Argh...!"

This time, Javier grimaced from the shockwaves produced by the ripple of air. Their force hit him all over his body, so there was only one way he could respond.

Slash! Slash! Clang!

Javier brandished the candlestick at a speed faster than the wind, and as his motion created more ripples of air, it created a shockwave as well.

Kaboom! Javier's shockwave collided against Sir Kyle's, and they shoved and wrestled until they disappeared in thin air. Fright rushed through Sir Kyle's eyes.

"Where did this boy come from… Eh?"

Crackle! Sir Kyle wasn't spared a second to finish his sentence as he noticed that Javier was charging at him. Javier hurtled toward the sword master, penetrating the vanishing shockwave. He hooked, pointed, stabbed, and jabbed upward, cornering Sir Kyle at a breathtaking speed.

Corner him. Don't give him any time to breathe.

Javier objectively judged the situation and calculated his moves. The flow of victory formed so clearly inside him. His eyes sank coldly.

It is beyond me why the commander of the royal guard attempted to assassinate Her Highness. No matter, it is irrelevant to this duel. There's only one thing I should remember, and it's that I must corner and question him.

Javier laser-focused on the person standing in front of him. He tried to get a read of the man's fighting tactics and style.

Sir Kyle is a sword master. As soon as I spare him a second, he's going to create an aura sword. I'd be back against a wall if that were to happen. So come hell or high water, I must prevent him from creating an aura sword and drag this fight out as long as possible.

Javier stole his glance at the queen and Lloyd.

Poison.

He could vaguely paint a picture of what was happening. The queen had been poisoned, and Lloyd was trying to get it out of her system using the Asrahan Core Technique. That left Javier with only one job, and it was to buy time for Lloyd to resuscitate the queen"

"The sword! Over here!" shouted Javier"

Clang! At that instant, the candlestick broke into pieces, leaving Javier empty-handed. Sir Kyle didn't waste the opportunity. He rushed toward Javier.

Swish! Clack! Slash!

The incoming sword aimed at Javier's heart, arms, and legs. Javier stepped back and twisted his body, changing his step. Then, he stretched out his hand backward.

"Take this!"

Javier heard Lloyd shouting, and he noticed a sword flying in his direction. It was the queen's sword that Lloyd hurled toward him. Javier gripped the sword.

Clang! The two swords clashed. Javier's blue eyes. Sir Kyle's furrowed eyes. The two glared at each other ferociously between the two swords. Balance of powers. Search and identification. Confrontation. Silent but fierce. Their breaths were even. Each of them read the slight movement of their eyes, which were mixed with a thirst for blood and lies. Sir Kyle spoke to Javier, his words much like his schemes.

“So, the rumors of what you did back at Cremo against the Gigatitan weren’t exaggerated,” said Sir Kyle.

“...”

“But it is strange. You don’t look to be at the level of a sword master. How are you dodging my sword?” he continued.

“...”

“Ha. Are you not going to answer me? Or are you just so busy that you can’t talk?”

“...”

Clang! Javier shoved Sir Kyle’s sword with force, bouncing it away and giving him a split second of time that he used to look back at Lloyd. He spoke to the young master with his gaze...

I’ll make you some time.

All right, but be careful.

The two gazed locked for a split second, only to tear away right after. Javier started to corner Sir Kyle.

Ziiing! Lloyd made two circles collide, and the blast created a massive force, which jetted out an explosion.

Thwack! The fierce mana blast shot toward Sir Kyle. His eyes widened.

“…!”

Slam! Sir Kyle clumsily brandished his sword and narrowly avoided the blow. He was sent almost seven yards away and smashed against the wall outside the rest area of the queen.

Thwack!

“Argh!”

The force from the blow made his shoulder, arm, and sword sting.

This is such a brutish attack...

Kaboom!

The second mana blast fired at him. Sir Kyle dared not block it this time again. He simply ducked down in a hurry and avoided the blow.

Crash! The blast hit the ground he was just standing on, but now it bore a hole that was about 20 inches deep.

“...”

Sir Kyle had never heard of or experienced this type of attack, and never in his wildest imagination did he think that a sword could enable it.

He’s a dangerous one.

Sir Kyle sharpened his senses in alarm. He no longer thought of him as a novice. Making things worse, the fighting location had grown more unfavorable for him.

Kaboom! Boom!

“Argh!”

The mana blast came in strings. Sir Kyle closely avoided each one.

It’s too narrow here!

They were in a long, narrow corridor, and the mana blast that stretched dozens of steps came flying at him, leaving him no chance to fight back. There was too much distance to do so. Standing on the ground already took a heavy toll on him, let alone allow him to counterattack. He wished he could conjure an aura sword. It would've made slicing through these blows a piece of cake. But the silver-haired boy didn't give him the time he needed to focus and create the aura. Sir Kyle started to grow anxious.

I was on the fence about slaying the queen with my aura because it'd leave a trace. Never thought that it'd come back to bite me"

Grit! Sir Kyle recalled his mission to make sure that the queen was dead. So, he had to return to the rest area. But first, he had to deal with the silver-haired novice who appeared out of nowhere and confronted him with abilities that rivaled his own. No, he was instead winning against him using a powerful technique Sir Kyle had never seen before.

Is he trying to make me keep far away from the queen?

Sir Kyle furrowed his brows. Javier charged forward as he kept shooting his mana blast down the long, narrow corridor. Sir Kyle drew back against his will. Javier pushed ahead while Sir Kyle got pushed back. Javier fired the mana blast while Sir Kyle barely avoided it. Javier grew tired, while Sir Kyle became tenacious. After much shoving and pushing, Sir Kyle, who continued to jump back, was finally pushed out of the corridor.

Boom! Sir Kyle leaped back to avoid the mana blast once again, landing on the red carpet of the vast banquet hall. Glasses clanked, tables thudded, and people screamed. The chandelier dropped from the ceiling. Another scream. And Javier stood firmly on the ground at the entrance of the corridor, like a gatekeeper.

Swish. The queen's sword in Javier's hand glinted. Its shining glimmer held a clear message: No one could set foot in the corridor. No one.

"Ha! You insolent fool."

A ferocious smile spread across Sir Kyle's face, his skin wet and dripping with sweat. Now he understood. It became clear to him why Javier had cornered him this far.

He's trying to buy time.

There was no exit in the corridor. The young sword fighter just needed to protect one end of the hall. And should he get pushed deeper...

Did he decide that he'd be able to buy some time if he pushed me out of the corridor without dying?

The corners of his lips rolled upward as he finally shed light on Javier's plan. A counterplan came to his mind just then.

Well, I have my own plan too.

Sir Kyle quickly scanned every corner of the banquet hall that was now deathly quiet without the music and conversation. Groups of sharp-eyed men had their hands on their waists. They were all familiar faces. They were the royal knights he commanded over. They were waiting for his order.

They are oblivious to my betrayal and what happened back in the rest area. So, they'll listen to my words since I'm still their commander"

The smile on his face deepened.

"Hear my knights!" said Sir Kyle, his voice dripping with dignity. He then held up his sword high and pointed at Javier standing at the entrance.

"That man over there dared to plot treason in the capital. He has tried to assassinate Her Majesty with his accomplice, and now he has taken Her Highness hostage, attempting to take over the corridor. My dear knights! Raise your swords for the protection of Her Majesty!"

Right after his order was made...

Clang! Dozens of swords were pulled out of their hilts. They moved in unison and surrounded the corridor entrance by forming a crescent shape"

Crackle...!

Each knight was at least a mid to high-level sword expert. Their swords all contained sword auras and made menacing sounds. The knights glared at Javier without an iota of mercy. They had blinding trust in their commander, Sir Kyle.

I knew it. It's because of this sword.

Javier smiled bitterly as he had seen this coming. He was actually prepared for this from the time he began to corner Sir Kyle at the end of the corridor. The sword in his hands belonged to the queen, and it didn't look good in front of others.

Though it's just pure chance that I have her sword...

But no one would trust him. They would rather place more trust in Sir Kyle's words since they were unaware of his betrayal.

But I don't care. The commander has already tried to kill the queen. It's likely that some of them may be on it with him. From now on, no one shall set foot here.

Javier positioned himself like a mountain. Iciness rolled off his body. His gaze was like that of a ferocious predator.

"I, Javier Asrahan, inquire by the entitlement granted to the knights. Come forth, those who are ready to abandon the vow made to Her Highness."

"What...?"

The knights flinched at Javier's words. Their faces turned dark. They couldn't believe what was coming out of the man who attempted to assassinate the queen and took over the corridor that led to the rest area.

"Do not listen to the traitor's nonsensical words. Strike him!"

Just then, Sir Kyle commanded aloud. This jostled the knights out of their confusion and got them to hurtle toward Javier.

"Ah!!!!"

The knights brandished their swords to protect the queen, aiming at the silver-haired assassin. But Javier remained wordless. He didn't even utter an excuse when unreasonable and irrational attacks showered him. Instead of confronting them with words, Javier decided to respond with this sword to clear the doubt, misunderstanding, and anger against him.

Crackle! Clang! Clang! Clang!

There were three knights charging at him together. Javier defended, kicked, and shoved the swords that flew at him in unison. He received head-on their wishes for death against him. Amid them, Javier coldly lifted his gaze and fixed it on one person. Sir Kyle. And Javier spoke with his eyes: Don't send these underdogs and fight for yourself. I have no intention of being subdued by these men. Javier's gaze made Sir Kyle's heart burn with emotion.

Fine. If that's what you want

Sir Kyle grinned. For the first time since the fight began, he had been granted the time to breathe and relax. A few breaths were all it took for him to restore his force, and his mana circulated in a manner distinct to sword masters. The sword in his hand glimmered until it finally started to burn.

Whoosh! An eerie radiance enveloped the silver blade. It was the ultimate weapon only a sword master could employ. Though it took a long time for it to get activated, nothing could stop it from slaying anything once it appeared. The aura sword emitted a ferocious glint like a predator's fang.

If you have decided this ground to be your grave, then I shall grant your wish.

Sir Kyle trudged in Javier's direction, his eyes loaded with icy animosity. He then lifted the blade charged with evil and jumped high, narrowing the distance between the two. Leap!

"…!"

The speed was incomparable to the previous one. A second was all it took for Sir Kyle to be two steps away from Javier. Sir Kyle flashed a grin as he spotted Javier’s flaw.

“Got you.”

Swooosh! The force of the strong aura sword swept over Javier like a tsunami. Javier held out his sword at the same time and shot the mana blast. It clashed with the aura sword. Then, the tsunami split the blast.

“…!”

Swish! The aura sword that split the blast in half shredded Javier’s heart.

Chapter 97: A Resplendent Resolution (1)

Crack! Zip! Something rough roared in his system. As he heard the sound, Lloyd thought to himself...

I had no idea how fatal poison could be until now.

It was nothing to joke about. Lloyd put his palm on the queen's stomach, and he absorbed the poison through it. The poison attacked his veins and tissue nonstop. Each time it happened, his muscle tissue and veins screamed aloud.

Crack! Crack! The poison tried to tear him apart, while his body resisted it. Caught between these two powers, Lloyd sweated in abundance. So, he endured all the more, harnessing more strength in the Asrahan Core Technique. The three circles fiercely rotated, sucking in the poison that invaded the queen's body.

"How did you... learn this?"

The queen gazed up at Lloyd. She had never experienced this mana absorption technique before. Her gaze was mixed with terror, wonder, curiosity, and adoration. The corners of Lloyd's lips rolled up bitterly.

"Um... Whew... If you talk now..."

"Should I stay quiet?"

"It makes it difficult for me to focus on your emergency treatment."

"But," reasoned the queen, "you absorb the poison very well, despite what you say."

"Well, if you accuse me of pretending, I have nothing to say," said Lloyd playfully as he maintained the Asrahan Core Technique. "Since you're asking, why doesn't Her Highness cheer me on so I can do a better job."

“Cheer? By the way, sucking out the poison will only put you in danger. Do you have any other plans in mind?” asked the queen.

“Of course I do. I should discharge it.”

“I see.”

The expression on the queen’s face softened a little, but Lloyd didn’t know whether it was because of the diminishing effect of the poison or because of his words that he had a plan in mind. Regardless, her gaze was still sharp.

“I have two more questions,” said the queen.

“Please do ask.”

“One. How did you figure out this was happening to rush in here?”

“I have excellent gut feelings.”

“Gut feelings?” asked the queen.

“Yes.”

“Be more specific.”

“Um, are you doubting me right now, Your Majesty?” asked Lloyd.

“Well, of course--”

“If I were on Kyle’s side, I wouldn’t be removing the poison out of your system, risking my life,” said Lloyd casually.

“...”

“I mean it, Your Highness. I came here because I overheard Sir Kyle talking with the Lord Great Chamberlain, and something stood out to me in their conversation.”

“What could have possibly stood out? What did he say to the Lord Great Chamberlain?” asked the queen.

“Something about,” explained Lloyd, “the banquet lasting until the moon sets.”

“It sounds innocuous to my ears. How was that strange?”

“Cheesy?”

“To be honest, Your Majesty, I never expected it to be treason. But...”

“But what? Do continue,” hurried the queen.

“I just thought that something fishy was going on between Sir Kyle and the Great Lord Chamberlain.”

“...”

“So, I figured that they would be a good source of entertainment and decided to trail behind them until I was met with this ruckus... Anyway, that’s how I came to be here.”

“It must not have been a pleasant sight.”

“No,” replied Lloyd.

For a moment, silence fell over them. Lloyd felt relieved in his heart.

Thankfully, the queen won’t be suspicious of me anymore.

The assassination attempt on the queen. Lloyd only predicted the incident because he had read the novel. The people in this world were clueless. The queen and the assassins didn’t know either. Only Lloyd knew about it because he had come across them in the novel.

So, I’m in the perfect spot to be suspected.

Lloyd had precipitously run up here to save the queen, but that gesture alone could seem suspicious. It signaled that Lloyd had noticed the circumstances of the assassin before anyone else did and that he had arrived at the scene earlier than everyone, minus the assassin. Those behaviors also warranted suspicion from others. Therefore, Lloyd needed to exonerate himself from these suspicions. He decided to be clever about it.

I'll mix the truth with a lie. Always works like a charm.

The truthful part was the code Sir Kyle had used before taking action. The lie was that Sir Kyle had a secret life. By mixing these two stories, Lloyd deprecated himself by admitting that he had arrived at this place after snooping around to enjoy some gossip. And now, he was risking his life and sucking poison out of the queen's body. These elements worked in synergy and cleared any doubt about him. The queen's gaze toward Lloyd softened.

"I see. But I have one more question," she said.

"Yes, Your Majesty. What is it?"

"Why is it that you are speaking more casually now?"

"Your Majesty...?"

"From the moment you set me down for emergency treatment, you started to be more casual, though very subtle, in addressing me. Was this intentional?" demanded the queen.

"Certainly not, Your Majesty."

"You just changed your tone faster than the wind blows."

"This is a misunderstanding, Your Highness."

"It appears not."

"I feel wronged, Your Majesty."

“How brazen of you,” she said as she softly chuckled. But she instantly put on a straight face again.

“By the way, Sir Asrahan, is it?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Do you think he will be fine? He is fighting against Sir Kyle.”

“...”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut. He couldn’t answer her rashly. And, in fact, Javier was the reason why Lloyd was using all the strength he had to absorb the poison. He was trying to quickly finish administering the emergency treatment and go help Javier.

Javier hasn’t reached the level of a sword master.

And yet, Javier was forced to confront the sword master. Lloyd wondered how the fight ended. He could neither ascertain nor predict anything.

Of course, he won’t be defeated so easily. But that doesn’t mean I can relax right now.

Surely, Javier was a man of ingenious talent. He had already become a high-level sword expert and owned triple circles.

But even if he combines those two strengths, there will always be a gap he won’t be able to overcome against the sword master.

That was how terrifying sword masters were. The only ones that could stop a sword master were other masters. Their existence was likened to a strategic weapon, much like a nuclear weapon in the modern world. The number of sword masters in the land translated into military power for their respective countries.

And now, Javier is forced to fight against such a monstrous entity all by himself.

Of course, Javier became a sword master in the novel. He actually reached the level of grandmaster, advancing beyond the sword master level for the first time in history. But that was only in the novel. A totally different situation from where he was now. And if Javier got unlucky...

Javier could die.

Lloyd didn’t want to lose him here in vain. Javier had been a strong timber that supported him and was a sort of insurance for his future.

Ziiing!

Lloyd increased the rotating power of the circles by a notch. He was forced to his maximum limit. The poison absorbed by the queen started to stack up around the circles. However, he didn’t care.

Once I’m done absorbing the poison, I’ll eject it right away and run.

Then he’d go help Javier and fight alongside him. Beads of sweat dropped from Lloyd’s face, dripping on the queen’s face. But she could not rebuke him. The expression on Lloyd’s face as he focused on the Asrahan Core Technique appeared too grave.

The more I see him, the more amazed I get.

The construction of the suspension bridge was a first for her. Lloyd proved that his big talk wasn’t for show. He had the skills to prove he could do it. And now, the queen realized that he had been hiding his true abilities.

A technique to absorb external mana, other people’s mana, and special characteristics into himself. How clever. I had never imagined such a thing could happen.

But one such unimaginable event was taking place in real-time right in front of her. Poison was flowing out of her body. This was undeniable proof. That fact frightened and impressed the sword master.

I wonder what the limit is for this man.

She wanted to see if she could find out. She was intrigued. Curious. And just like that, the emergency treatment took place in the tranquil rest area as the queen stared up at Lloyd with curiosity in her eyes.

Slash! The blast split in half, and the aura sword rushed forward to slash Javier in the chest. However, no blood splattered.

Hmm?

Sir Kyle's eyebrows trembled heavily. For a split second there, he had thought he slayed Javier. But when he brandished his sword, he realized that something felt light in his hands. The cut was minimal. As soon as Sir Kyle felt it, Javier attacked again like lightning.

Slash!

"…!"

There was no aura in Javier's sword, but it was as fast as light. Sir Kyle held up his sword.

Clang! Javier's sword bounced off the aura sword. The shockwave allowed Sir Kyle a glimpse of what had happened.

I only cut his clothes.

He stared at the front of Javier's clothes. They were vertically torn, and the gap exposed Javier's chest.

Such amazing speed.

A pure sense of admiration gripped Sir Kyle. When he had slashed Javier's mana blast in half and used the momentum to slay his chest, Sir Kyle was convinced that he would get the better of Javier. But he was wrong.

He's strong and fast, even though he isn't a sword master. Technique-wise, he might be equal to me, or even better.

The silver-haired fledgling appeared to be just over 20 years old. But he was monstrously talented. Sir Kyle could already picture what would happen if he rose to the level of a sword master.

He's going to easily surpass me.

He had to admit it. At the same time, a violent impulse took over him.

But that won't ever happen. Why? Because he'll die right here.

A sense of pleasure rushed through Sir Kyle at the thought of nipping the sprouts of a talented rival and trampling him. This violent impulse made the corners of his lips rise upward. The muscles in his hands tightened as he gripped his sword.

I'll make sure that you die today. Resist all you want!

He brimmed with confidence, as he held an aura sword. He had nothing to fear anymore.

Whoosh! Clack! Sir Kyle raised his sword at a strange angle. The aura burning fiery in the sword rushed toward Javier.

Clang!

The aura and Javier's sword clashed, instantly breaking a piece of the latter's blade. It got torn and shattered by the aura. Javier's face darkened while Sir Kyle scoffed.

"Do you think you can defend against an aura sword at your level?"

Crash! The aura sword struck down once more. Javier's sword began to shatter into pieces with the blow, which deepened Sir Kyle's mocking laughter.

"You blocked me again? I must say, you have my praise for keeping your sword in one piece even after you blocked mine."

Slash! The aura sword was brought down one more time. Another side of Javier's blade crashed, and this time, Sir Kyle's smile mixed with deathly desire.

"Woah. Three blocks? I suppose it's because it's the queen's sword. What do you say about using your skills from before?"

"..."

Javier couldn't answer because he didn't have the energy or time to do so. The moment he first blocked the aura sword, his whole stomach churned, the impact turning his system upside down. It felt as though he was using his fingers to block a giant's hammer. He wasn't spared a second to use the Asrahan Core Technique and absorb the mana. Each time he blocked, each massive blow accumulated inside his system, paralyzing his legs. They refused to move, frozen by the building force.

Use the mana blast, maybe?

The thought crossed his mind. But he knew that the mana blast wasn't enough. And besides, it had already split in half a while ago by the aura sword. And if he used it once more, it'd surely mean a slice to his chest, not his clothing.

I wish I was a sword master.

He would have easily neutralized the aura sword if he was a sword master with his mana blast. No, he wouldn't need to use the skill in the first place since he would have an aura sword like his opponent.

Master... Lloyd.

Crash! Another blow struck down again, making him feel like he had become a stake stuck in the earth.

Cough! Blood came out as Javier coughed. The rotation of his circles slowed. For the fifth time, a merciless impact struck down like lightning.

Crack!

“…!”

At last, the queen’s sword broke in half, the aura sword charging down at Javier as a result.

It can’t end like this!

One second. Javier told himself that he should stall by at least a second. That was how he could increase Lloyd’s chances of treating the queen and surviving. Since the queen was a sword master, she would be able to put up a fight against Sir Kyle.

Argh!

Javier decided to put his pride aside to stall his death by even a second. He fell to the ground and slid to the side. Slash!

The aura sword scratched the ground, sparks bursting in all directions. Javier managed to avoid death by a split second. He resolved to buy some more time, so he wielded his half-cut sword in the hopes to increase the chances of Lloyd making it out alive. Just then, a merciless kick knocked him in the stomach. Slam!

“…!”

The kick smashed against his chest and sent him nine steps backward into the corridor. His body crashed into the table in the corner and flopped to the ground.

Crack! Flop!

Splinters of wood littered the ground. Javier raised his body in the rubble.

I’m not done yet.

He didn’t give up. He held out his hand and grabbed the leg of the broken table. Sir Kyle, who had hurtled toward him when he rose, was near him now.

Striking down the burning aura sword, Sir Kyle hollered, “It’s over now!”

Fwoosh! The aura sword came down like a bolt of lightning. Javier raised the table leg. Sir Kyle flashed a smile. There was only one thing that could stop his aura sword: another aura sword. This law was absolute.

How dare he block my aura sword with a table leg! Ha! Struggle all you want!

Just then... Thwack!

The aura sword was blocked by the piece of wood.

“Huh?”

What’s happening?

Sir Kyle’s eyes snapped open. Just then, something unprecedented started to take place with the table leg.

Crackle...! Cold rays of light appeared in streaks, enveloping the table leg with fierce radiance. It was the brilliant determination only those who reached the master level of swordsmanship could muster. The aura.

Chapter 98: A Resplendent Resolution (2)

Thwack! Memories always hurt. The plume of smoke burning overhead. The corpses on the ground. Mother lay still. Father lost focus in his eyes. Javier grabbed, shoved, and shook their shoulders. But there was no response. Not even a smile.

Thwack! The impact shook his shoulders. The impact stirred memories in him. The shout outside the barn. Something seemed to be in there! He rose the moment he heard the shout, crawling and rolling into a stack of hay in the barn. There inside the compact and musty pile of hay, Javier made a resolution. He owed his life to his parents, so he would make it worth it. He would live so that one day, he could choose the place he would take his last breath for himself.

Thwack! The impact hit his shoulders again. Javier opened his eyes amid the shock, being jostled out of the memory of when he was five years old, hiding in the pile of hay. He was now 21 years old. He lifted his head, and his eyes saw the flustered face of his enemy.

“What...”

The ferocious radiance illuminated his enemy’s face. The brilliant resolution enveloped the table leg. Javier noticed the aura in the table leg in his hand. But it wasn’t just the block of wood. His hand, wrist, arms, shoulders, and heart glimmered with the aura.

Thump...! Thump! His unprecedented resolution wrapped his heart, tapping into and opening a firm manaheart. Like the groan of a giant carrying the sky, the manaheart split and spread away. Destruction for regeneration. Death for resurrection. Breakage and recomposition. Perishing and being born. It split and spread, only to gather, connect, and breathe. The beginning and the end circulated. The beginning called the ending. In between the attractions and at the end of the balanced destruction and regeneration of chaos. The heart of the beginning pumped like his resolution from his memory.

Thud! The newly generated mana heart beat for the first time. A different force tapped his blood vessels awake. They pumped as it spread to all corners of his body, raving and seeping into himself. Every cell reacted. The mana circulated without an end, which was only possible for sword masters. Javier moved amid it.

Thwack!

"...!"

He wielded the table leg, and the aura wrapped around it reacted on its own as though it was a living beast going after its prey. Each ray of aura sharpened the blade and discharged an insurmountable, raging force, following the trajectory of the table leg. It then bounced off the sword Sir Kyle was slamming down.

Clash! As the sword bounced off, Sir Kyle's eyes flew open in terror.

What's happening?!

He couldn't wrap his head around what was happening right now. Why was there an aura in the table leg in that boy's hand? How was it possible to produce aura through an object like a table leg? Amid the curiosity, shock, and disbelief, he closely managed to grasp his sword back. He pulled it to his side, feeling a sense of crisis, and defended the left top by instinct.

Wham! Javier's table leg came down at him, and its aura gushed out as if it was a fang of a predator.

"Argh...!"

He almost failed to block it. And even though it was just one sword strike, his waist staggered, and he almost keeled over.

No way!

He jumped back in alarm. He couldn't believe it. The aura loaded in a mere splinter of wood made him retreat.

This is a lie. A scam!

Grit! Sir Kyle felt as though his world was crumbling to pieces. A sense of shame surged in him as his pride was shredded to pieces. Sir Kyle gritted his teeth and gripped his sword tighter. Who was he? A genius swordsman. A human weapon. A strategic arsenal.

I need to regain my footing first.

Sir Kyle took a breath, and that alone controlled his emotions enough. His heart was no longer feeling flustered. He shoved the shock and terror to the side and focused on the enemy in front of him after pulling himself together. And with a cold, icy gaze, he studied his opponent.

Slash!

The table leg was coming at him, and the aura formed in streaks following the trajectory.

Admit it. He's become a sword master as well.

That was an aura, for sure. He had to admit it so that he could come up with a stronger aura to fight back and crush it. That would be his best shot at defeating this silver-haired, monstrously talented novice. His eyes burned with determination.

Exhale! Grit!

It was time for a head-on fight. Sir Kyle hurtled with such resolution and harnessed every bit of his mana into his sword. And there, he brandished the sword with all the aura he could muster.

There is no way I will lose in an aura-on-aura fight!

He had years more of experience as a sword master. He had to be better by several folds when it came to the power of the aura and his skills. He believed in himself and came up with a surefire method.

Suppress him in an aura sword fight, slice the table leg, and use the momentum to take his head next!

Slash! Sir Kyle's aura sword. Javier's aura table leg. The fangs of the two beasts collided.

Clash! The sword broke into dozens of pieces, and some of them stabbed Sir Kyle's body.

"...!"

Sir Kyle didn't have the time to scream or feel pain.

How?

The moment his brain formed a question in terror, he saw Javier's table leg flash with light. Then, it came down on his right shoulder like a streak of lightning.

Slash! Blood splattered. Sir Kyle's amputated right arm flew in the air with his sword still in its grip. It fell to the ground, the blood drawing a pool of red, staining the white marble.

"Argh...!"

Sir Kyle grimaced in pain, but before he could wrap the injury, Javier mercilessly kicked him in the gut. Bam!

"...!"

His nose got smashed, and he staggered and collapsed to the ground. But before he hit the ground, Javier grabbed the back of his neck and steadied his limp body.

"Anybody takes a step forward, and I shall slice his neck."

Javier's icy voice rang aloud in the room. That was when it occurred to Sir Kyle what kind of sorrowful state he found himself in.

Could this be true...? Could it be that I've been taken hostage?

Sir Kyle's trembling eyes stared straight ahead. The banquet hall came into view. The noble women clamped their mouths with their hands, holding their screams. The nobles, drained of color, protected their noble wives. The royal guards flinched with swords in their hands, all flustered. Then, he looked down at himself. A hostage without a right arm, whose neck was being gripped by the mewling silver-haired boy.

Whoosh... He suddenly felt the table leg on his shoulder. Its aura licked his right earlobe to his terror. That was when he had a realization. He had lost. He had become a hostage. Any struggle and he would get beheaded.

I... lost to this boy...? Argh...

Sir Kyle's face fell at last, along with the pride he held so dearly. But Javier didn't care in the least about his despair. Javier simply stared at the royal guards as he took steps toward the entrance of the corridor. At that moment, he smiled wryly.

Out of all the people in here, this one had to be my hostage.

It was ironic that the person Javier held hostage to protect the queen was her would-be assassin. But he didn't care. His most important mission right now was to ensure that no one would step foot in the rest area. There may be a traitor among the guards. Javier couldn't trust anyone, so he made sure that no one passed him.

Master Lloyd... May what you are doing end in success...

He wished that Lloyd would save the queen. He hoped and waited faithfully, and just as Lloyd got involved in this case through his trust in Javier, the same thing would be done for him. Javier would guard this place due to his trust in Lloyd. Javier's gaze suppressed everyone with its hostility. The new sword master. The royal guards could do nothing but lower their swords in the face of his overwhelming might.

Ziiing...!

[All the circles are set to gear six. Fixed at RPM 6,000.]

Hmph!

The rest area was quiet. Beads of sweat dripped from Lloyd's face. The circle rotated at high speed around his heart, creating a strong absorption power and wrapping the poison around his organ.

It's almost done.

The volume and potency of the poison he absorbed from the queen was no laughing matter.

One mistake, and it'll spread all over my body.

If that happened, he would die for sure. He could ascertain as the poison felt potent even though he was feeling it indirectly.

The moment it spreads, it's going to block all my nerves and melt their surrounding tissue.

It'd inflict comprehensive damage to his tissue, and large blood clots would block his blood flow, putting a halt to the oxygen supply in his body. Once that happened, all his organs would stop functioning, and he would fall into shock.

I must never lower the circle rotation power.

Lloyd stayed vigilant, never letting his guard down. He was like a poison-filled bucket going around at full speed. As long as it kept spinning, the centrifugal force would be maintained and keep the poison in check. But once it weakened, the rotation would slow down and make the poison burst out of the bucket as there would be no centrifugal force. It would cover him, and he would surely die as a result.

So, these three circles act like a bucket. Okay, I'm done.

Ziiing! The circles continued spinning, and now, no poison could be absorbed. It was finished.

"Okay. It's done, my dear client, no, Your Highness..."

Lloyd slowly rose lest the circles' rotations lose their speed. Like a sleepy sloth, he measured his steps and walked away from the queen.

The absorption is done. It's time to safely discharge it.

He spotted the wine bottle he had already eyed a while ago. Grabbing the wine bottle, he pulled the cork out and emptied the bottle. Then, he stuck his right index finger into the opening.

If I boil down the poison, I'd have about five drops.

He estimated the actual amount of the poison going rampant in the trap of his circles. He concentrated his mind, measuring his breath.

Zing! Keeping the rotation power intact, he shifted the direction. From collection to purification. From absorption to discharge. He took the steps opposite to what he had been taking. And he failed.

Thwack!

"Ack...!"

Lloyd reflexively clutched his heart, which was wracked with excruciating pain that seemed to squeeze it until it burst. Everything turned black at the massive pain, and he almost stopped the Circle Shift.

What the heck? What is this?

He was confused. He had done everything he normally did. Absorb the external energy and discharge it. He had simply followed his usual procedure.

Why can’t I discharge it?

The poison could not be released. It instead stuck to the circle like a sticky oil residue. It was glued to the rotating circle. This was something he was experiencing for the first time. He was scared.

What should I do?

Time wasn’t on Lloyd’s side. The poison continued to stick more and more to the circle with great tenacity even while he racked his brain for a solution. The circle slowed its rotation.

Ding Dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 4: Something is interrupting the movement of the Circle Shift.]

[Due to the powerful external interruption, the maximum rotation number of the Circle Shift will be limited to five.]

[All the circles are set to gear five by force. Fixed at RPM 5,000.]

Crack... Crack!

Making things worse, the circle gear was forcefully decreased to five. This meant that the RPM was now at a 5/6 level compared to the previous one. And the poison trapped in the rotation power became more reactive and violent. It was like a beast that wanted to break through its cage and run free.

Dammit.

His heart sank. This was not a joke. The gear would continue to decrease if he didn’t respond quickly. The poison would be freed to roam around inside him.

Like I’d let that happen!

It was time for a full-out brainstorming session. Possibilities and hope. Trials and results. Lloyd reviewed all the scenarios in the twinkle of his eye. Inspection. Calculation. His anxiety must have been written all over his face because the queen, all pale and white, rose and staggered to his side.

“Is something going wrong?”

“...”

Lloyd didn’t have the time to respond to her. Her face turned serious.

“Can you not get the poison you absorbed out of your system?”

“...”

He barely nodded. The queen’s gaze turned stern.

“Can you transfer the poison into one arm?”

“...”

He could. But he didn’t want to. The Knight of Blood and Iron came to his mind. In the novel, the queen treated herself by concentrating the poison in her arm and cutting it off. That was how she lost her left arm.

No thank you.

He rejected her with his gaze, hinting that she should back off.

Cutting off my arm is just too drastic of a solution.

Any method that damaged him was overruled. No questions. He’d rather put himself in a do-or-die situation, which he was about to do now.

Whew...

He breathed in, and he faced the opposite side of the queen. Just then, an ominous message floated in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 4: Something is interrupting the movement of the Circle Shift.]

[Due to the powerful external interruption, the maximum rotation number of the Circle Shift will be limited to four.]

[All the circles are set to gear four by force. Fixed at RPM 4,000.]

Thud! The rotation of the circle received greater resistance. Now, the circles rotated like cogwheels caught in a swamp. The force of the poison started to creep outside the rotation's power as it weakened. A beast in a crumbling cage. Feeling the terror of its movement, Lloyd held out his hand and grabbed the dining knife on the table.

Grip! One shot. Clean and cut. Lloyd adjusted the gear shift.

2:3:3.

Ziiing! The alpha circle was set to 2,000 RPM while the others were set to 3,000 RPM. As Lloyd lowered the rotation power, the poison finally broke the cage and rushed outside, making its way toward his heart. Just then, the three circles reverberated in the rotation ratio of 2:3:3. They pulled each other and grabbed the nape of the poison. Then, they collided.

Boom! Lloyd's outstretched knife shot a ferocious storm of mana from its silvery end. This was his best bet for getting the poison out of his system. The triple mana blast.

Chapter 99: The Night of Compliments (1)

Boom! The three fragments of the circles collided, causing a massive explosion around Lloyd's heart.

[Manaheart Skill Option 1: Shock Neutralizer has been activated.]

[Your manaheart can neutralize the impact of the mana blast on its own without the protection of the circles. Therefore, your manaheart does not get any damage from the mana blast.]

Clack! Click!

The manaheart became solid, and it absorbed the impact of the mana blast. There wasn't any damage left. Instead, the entire force shot toward the outside. Fwoosh!

The blast supercharged along the blood vessel, lymph nodes, and muscle tissues. It traveled along the path Lloyd led. Some rushed out of the heart to the pectoral muscle and pectoralis minor muscle. The others split and combined to travel through the trapezius muscle, roofing cuff, deltoid, and coracobrachialis. And after it passed the vein in the wrist, it penetrated the ligaments and joints until it exploded from the tip of the knife in his hand.

Crash! The large pillar of fire of the triple mana blast shot diagonally. The violent fire created by the collision of pure mana burned everything that stood its way. It cut, melted, incinerated, and obliterated the closet, the wall, and the ceiling. The poison that ran rampant to be freed from the clutches of the circle disappeared as well.

I did it!

Lloyd's eyes glimmered as he shot out the mana blast with his knife. He had a feeling he would succeed as he intentionally lowered the spinning power of the circles while activating the Circle Shift. His senses picked up the poison trying to slip out of the spin when they slowed down. That was when Lloyd made all three circles collide, right before the venom finally escaped and entered his system. The collision engulfed the poison, and the explosion was so strong that the venom didn’t stand a chance against it. Like a cat falling into a rapid current of water, it flailed and struggled with its paws to get on land. But it didn’t work. The force of the triple mana blast was overwhelmingly strong. And at last, it got expelled out of him through the knife into the air, carried by the explosive blast and exposed to the immense force in the air.

Crackle! A considerable part of the force discharged in the blast was consumed by heat energy. The extreme heat burned and scorched the toxic substance, and the protein in the poison became altered. The link of the molecules snapped and broke. They changed in shape and color. Unable to hold up against heat, it finally became carbonized.

Fwoosh... The toxic substance was lost in the fiery heat. But the force of the triple mana blast remained indomitable and powerful nonetheless. It flew ahead with much violence, penetrating the 6-foot-wide roof and many other things that were in front of it. Once it pierced everything, and nothing stood in its way, it shot into the night sky.

Fwoosh! The fire pillar of the mana shot up about 75 yards in the air, allowing anyone in the capital to see its magnificence. As the people laid their eyes on it with panic, the pillar soon subsided.

Cough! Cough! Cough!”

The triple mana blast left a heavy toll on the body. Even though the heart was protected from damage, that wasn’t the end of it.

Ugh. I feel like my whole body was crushed down to the bones.

Every bit of his body was sore and throbbed as though it was beaten down with a hammer. Though the blast lasted only for a moment, it nonetheless was unbearably strong for a human body. And now, the manaheart had been emptied. Lloyd felt both terribly fatigued and like he caught the flu. His legs gave way, and he collapsed to the floor.

This is seriously no joke.

It wasn’t this bad when he had used the triple mana blast to lay down the basic foundation of the suspension bridge. But this time was different as he had exhausted all his energy to save his life. That made a larger difference than he had expected. Even so, he didn’t pass out from the pain, although, in all honesty, he wanted to. There was a reason why he didn’t allow himself to faint, and that was because of the message that floated in front of him.

Ding Dong.

[You have survived despite the fact that your body was invaded by a large amount of Lunatica, a fatal poison.]

[In the process, you have succeeded in expelling the poison in an impressive manner.]

[For your special experience, two of your skills have been equipped with a unique upgrade.]

Unique upgrade? Wait a minute... Optional Skills?

Lloyd dropped to the ground in sheer exhaustion. But what looked like an alert for an award dinged in front of him. He didn’t want to miss it by passing out. He would wake up again in curiosity even if he did. His eyes started quickly moving.

[New skill options have been made available in the manaheart skill.]

[Skill Option 2: Complete Poison Resistance - You have survived despite the powerful compound toxic “Lunatica.” For your experience, a permanent poison immunity has been added to your manaheart. This option will enable you to become highly resistant to all types of poison existing on the land.]”

[New skill options have been made available in the Asrahan Core Technique skill.]

[Skill Option 2: Supercharge - The skill accelerates the recovery of mana when extreme depletion occurs. Once you use the option, one of the circles rotates at a high speed for five minutes and absorbs a large amount of mana from your surroundings. Limit: You can only use this once per day.]

Ha? Hahaha.

A grin spread across Lloyd's face as he read the message. These upgrades were entirely uncalled for.

All I did was desperately try to make it out alive.

That was all he did. He tried everything he could possibly think of, but nothing expelled the poison from him. Nothing changed regardless of how he spun the circle. He even thought about using the Latent Power Surge of the Asrahan Core Technique.

But if I failed, that would've been it for me. The Asrahan Core Technique can't be used when I'm exhausted. After all, the circle stops spinning when that happens."

Should the circles have stopped spinning, the poison would have spilled out into his system and killed him right there. Thus, he reached the decision that the mana blast was the solution. He gave everything he had thinking so. And now, he bore the unexpected fruits that were the optional skills.

Complete immunity to poison. Well, there goes my worry of being poisoned to death in my life. I love it. And Supercharge? Hmm... I suppose I got this because I didn't pass out even after I emptied out all my mana with the triple mana blast."

Lloyd thoroughly read over the optional skill of Supercharge.

Random absorption of mana in my surroundings?

Absorbing mana was the main goal and foundation of the Asrahan Core Technique. And this optional skill looked like it enabled the basic function to its extreme.

Let's try it out then.

He was already depleted of mana anyway. Standing up was labor for him. He would pass out if he loosened up. So, there was no time better than now to test out the Supercharge skill.

Let’s give it a try.

He opened the skill window and activated the optional skill.

Ding Dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 5: Supercharge has been activated.]

[You are absorbing a large amount of mana from random surroundings.]

From then on...

Ziiing... The three circles started after having been left quiet by the collision of the triple mana blast. It was like turning on a fan that had been stashed in a garage all winter long. At first, they made a clunking noise until they started to rotate. The rotation grew smoother, faster, and fiercer. It surpassed the normal limit. From the soft wind, it grew stronger, summoning a storm.

Ziiing! As the circle roared and rotated in three parts, it formed into a vortex with an impressive absorption power. As though it was a black hole, the vortex started to suck the mana around it.

Clank! Clink! There was no one except for the queen and Lloyd, but the table tumbled. Lloyd absorbed a small amount of mana laden in the mahogany wood. It started to crumble. The same thing happened to the others. The rose on the table wilted in a trice, and the springtail crawling behind the makeup table immediately dried up. Even the marble started to lose its gloss. There were no exceptions made for any people as well.

“What... are you doing right now?”

Queen Magentano’s voice quaked in fear. She dropped to the ground just like Lloyd did after being poisoned. Needless to say, her body was in a terrible state as she witnessed the triple mana blast that shot out Lloyd. She had never seen such a thing before, nor did she ever imagine it would be possible. It came to her as a complete shock that such massive power could be released with just pure mana, not magic.

I have never fathomed once in my life that this could be possible.

But it did happen right in front of her, and by Lloyd, who wasn't even a sword master. If there was one thing that could harness such powerful force purely with mana, it was an aura. The explosion Lloyd showed to her bragged an overwhelming force that would neutralize an aura. Her understanding of the world shattered at that instant. But before she could recover, another wave of shock came to frighten her once more.

"My mana is... Argh!"

Her mana was being taken by no other than Lloyd, who was on the ground five steps away from her! Queen Magentano hurriedly activated her manaheart.

"Arggh!"

Sink! Crash! She forcibly moved her exhausted manaheart. Otherwise, she feared that she would be sucked to dry and die from excessive mana loss.

Thud! Thud! Her heart pounded visibly, and the mana in her system circulated in harmony, which was something only sword masters could do. This method was also the secret behind gaining endless endurance in battles.

Regardless... I'm losing just a little more mana than I can handle. Argh...

But thankfully, it wasn't strong enough to kill her. Although, it was more than able to nauseate her. And since she had to maintain the circulation of the mana in her body, she couldn't speak at all. The mana absorption forced her to put all her energy into replenishing her body again, and ironically, her strained efforts became an excellent help for Lloyd.

Ziiing! Lloyd absorbed an alarming of mana with each second that passed. He was a mana blackhole. Falling into a state of stupor, he devoured the mana around him, especially from the queen.

Whew...

Lloyd breathed in and out, searching for the purest and most refined mana by instinct. He yearned, usurped, and absorbed it to make it his. The source was the queen, who was the sword master. Hers contained the refined power that was brought about after a strenuous mana circulation. It was different from the mana permeating in nature in terms of its density and purity. The difference was truly immense. The mana in nature was just an ordinary atom, while the refined mana of Queen Magentano was a hard-compressed neutron star. If applied, the compression would reduce the Empire State Building in the United States to a tiny millet. That was the power of the mana Lloyd was absorbing from the queen. Her mana's density and purity commanded awe, and it was entirely different from what came from nature. Such high-quality mana filled Lloyd's empty manaheart. No, it did more than fill it. It burst in full, forcibly expanding its storage. Lloyd's manaheart underwent an evolution.

Ding Dong. Ding Dong.

Countless messages appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes, which were still in the state of stupor. The manaheart's skill experience continued to rise over its limit. As its experience continued to stack up, his level increased without any show of rest. The level-up messages popped up one after another. As Lloyd absorbed more mana, Queen Magentano's face grew pale.

Gah... I didn't think this would be possible...

She never did. It felt like her world had turned upside down. But she had no time to ask questions or energy to walk over to Lloyd. She would have to surrender more mana to him if she did. So, she desperately struggled to stay away from Lloyd. That, unfortunately, didn't happen as much as she wished. Moving even an inch proved to be a toil. All she could do was become a portable charger for Lloyd's manaheart.

This can’t be real!

Queen Magentano gave all her efforts to retain as much as mana in her. Every fiber of her being strove to resist the pilfering. But it was in vain. As Lloyd leveled up his manaheart, the amount of mana he absorbed increased. It was a natural occurrence. There was more room for mana in his manaheart as it tore and expanded. Lloyd unreservedly stole mana from her, continuing the unfair tug of war. If the queen was a high-level sword expert, she would have been depleted of mana already and become a mummy. But thankfully, she was a sword master, which meant that she could resist by circulating the mana in her instead of ending up as a bloodless corpse. Lloyd enjoyed the infinite flow of mana as well, thanks to that. Supposedly, the Supercharge was meant to absorb some energy present in nature to gain some strength just enough to get him back on his feet. But when it was used against a sword master, it went beyond, and she became a source of nutrients for an explosive power-up. Lloyd’s manaheart continued to be filled, and it tore and expanded on repeat. He continued leveling up without stopping, from two to three, from four to five. In no time, he reached level ten. And when he reached level 11, which took him just five minutes when others would have taken several years, an eye-catching message dinged in front of him.

Chapter 100: The Night of Compliments (2)

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Your Manaheart skill level has risen to the rank of <Low-Level Sword Expert>.]

A message floated in front of his eyes, but Lloyd remained in a state of stupor. His eyes were open, but nothing was processed. He remained in a sitting position with his focus resting solely on his inward thoughts.

Ziiing! The manaheart was packed with three rotating circles, and the mana boasting amazing density and purity flowed into him through them. This experience shocked Lloyd.

Whew!

A piece. A breath. Even when that small amount of mana entered his system, his manaheart tumbled in tumult, making him feel like he was a teacup inside a storm or a bucket catching the ocean. He couldn’t take the inflow of mana that came in violent waves. He could only take a tiny portion of the whole, and that alone ripped apart his manaheart. Clash!

Ack!

A searing pain shot through his body as his mana ripped to pieces. But at the same time, he felt refreshed as everything was destroyed and disbanded, only to be put together and regenerated. In no time, his manaheart was restored, stronger and better than it was previously. He could take a bit more mana. But the influx of mana from the queen remained overwhelming and ripped apart his manaheart again. Just like that, his regenerated mana heart was ripped apart and shattered over and over again. It was restored only to be torn, and then, regenerated once more. The cycle of endless destruction and revival. Lloyd sweated like a horse. Black droplets of sweats seeped out of his pores. It was the result of the dark and clouded energy that accumulated in his body throughout his life. And when the powerful mana of the sword master made its way into his system, it pushed and discharged the clouded energy out of him.

Argh...

His whole body shook, but he endured in his stupor. Five minutes, which felt like unbearable torture, passed. And at last, the three circles, which were going berserk like a black hole, quieted down.

Ziiing... Their rotation slowed, and the devouring absorption stopped. The result was tremendously wretched for those around Lloyd. Everything around him within a 200 feet distance was far from okay. The table dried up and crumbled to dust. The chair beside it met the same fate. The rose as well as the bugs in it had disappeared without a trace. Any metal objects were covered in rust, and the bricks for the walls and ceilings turned soft. Within the distance, the only one that had remained safe was Queen Magentano.

“Huff...!! Huff!”

Is it finally over? He is not going to start again, is he? He must not. I am not confident that I can endure another round.

Queen Magentano, who was pale as a sheet, lifted her head after a struggle. The mana absorption was heinous. She felt proud that she had survived the storm.

Even a mid-level sword expert, no, a high-level sword expert wouldn’t have survived.

You would lose all your mana and be drained of life eventually, dying all dried up and bloodless like a mummy. The thought of it made her break out in a cold sweat.

Goodness... What kind of technique is this...

Her trembling eyes traveled to Lloyd. He was calmly sitting at the center of the heinous mana vortex. She saw his eyes slowly open. Black like always.

But she noticed that his gaze shone and sparkled after being cleansed of the dark energy it held before.

Oh.

It was only then that Lloyd was able to see the message in front of him.

What is this...?

Ding Dong.

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Skill Name: Manaheart.]

During this time, all pain will be numbed, and you will never faint. Your strength, stamina, and reflexes will be increased by 200%. (Limit: You can only use this once per day.)]

[Current RP: 4,029]

What the heck is this?

Dazed, Lloyd's eyes widened. He was happy and flustered at the same time. It was only natural since all he did was activate the Supercharge optional skill of the Asrahan Core Technique. Why? This new optional skill seemed appropriate to use in this situation and testing it out seemed like a good choice. So, he tried it out, closed his eyes, and fell into a stupor. He felt like his eyes were closed only for a few seconds. And when he opened them, he had become a low-level sword expert!

It’s been five minutes already? But even so, how is it possible that I became a low-level sword expert even after that? He couldn’t believe it. But he couldn’t deny the change in him when his surroundings were reduced to ashes. The table and chair were crumbled to pieces. The metal adornments had grown rusty. The bricks had softened. The carpet was faded as if it was 100 years old. Lloyd’s gaze traveled to the queen, who was despairingly looking at him about five feet away from him.

“You... You... What are you?”

Queen Magentano was stuttering, unlike her. Her face looked worse than a while ago. She wasn’t this pale when the poison was killing her. Right now, her skin was so white that she looked like a terminally ill person who had never received sunlight for a whole year.

Did I do that to her?

It looked like it. The description of the Supercharge skill in the message seemed to agree as well.

Yeah. It said that the skill absorbs all the surrounding mana in large amounts without discrimination.

But he had no idea that it would be this annihilating. The suction of the mana occurred with an unimaginable force. This made Lloyd embarrassed for a second, but he soon brushed it away because that was not what mattered right now. The queen was now healed from the poison, and he was alive. It was time to go help Javier.

Javier is up against a sword master.

Lloyd was worried even if Javier had a God-given talent. His opponent was Sir Kyle, the sword master. Lloyd couldn’t imagine how Javier would last against a knight of such caliber. If he was unlucky, he could have already lost.

I hope that didn’t happen. Please.

Lloyd bolted up in anxiousness. Thankfully, his leg didn’t give way. He was rather energized from rising to the level of a low-level sword expert. Lloyd quickly supported the queen.

“Your Majesty, is your body all right?”

“Do I look all right in your eyes?”

“...”

“I shall ask again. What are you? What did you just do?”

The queen’s gaze was filled with suspicion. It traveled to the hole in the ceiling that showed the night sky. And then it moved downward.

“I have never heard of those techniques you displayed earlier... the discharge of explosive mana and the rapid absorption of my mana...”

“Indeed, Your Majesty.”

“Can you explain what they were?”

“Why, yes, Your Majesty. However, may I plead that we have this conversation later?”

“Is it because of Sir Asrahan, the knight of yours?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Is it because you are worried about him?”

“I wish to move at once and help him,” Lloyd said with confidence.

“I am of the same heart. Let us move. Can you carry me on your back?” the queen asked.

“It is my honor.”

Lloyd then turned backward, and the queen got on his back right away.

“I shall run now,” Lloyd said, and without waiting for her response, he sprinted.

Swoosh! His steps were faster than before, and using the energy in him, he rushed out of the rest area. He sprinted along the long corridor, direly wishing for Javier’s safety. He planned to join the fight right away the moment he arrived at the banquet hall. He would stand side by side with Javier and fight against Sir Kyle.

I will be able to help out since I have become a low-level sword expert.

Plus, he owned a triple circle. If things went wrong, he could always bazooka the knight with his triple mana blast. And though the chances of him getting heavily injured were slim, it could happen given that he had little knowledge about his skill.

So just hold up a little more!

Jump! Sprint! Lloyd passed the passage lit by a dancing chandelier. He turned the corner and jumped off the stairs. Meanwhile, the queen focused on recuperating on Lloyd’s back.

Good. Just a little more.

The queen was still circulating her mana. A skill unique to sword masters. Thanks to being carried by Lloyd, her face recovered color, and she looked much better. Her exhausted muscles were vitalized once again.

About one-third of my power has been recovered.

Surely, it wasn’t satisfactory. But it was enough to put up a fight. And since she was with Javier, Lloyd, and the other knights present in the hall, she believed that Sir Kyle would be easily defeated.

Sir Kyle.

Her eyes burned with sad rage. He was the longest-standing commander of the knights. He was her sword teacher, her most trusted subject. But today, he was the traitor that laid a sword on her neck.

Why? Why did he do it?

She couldn’t wrap her head around his reason for betrayal and who was behind this. Her venomous efforts to pinpoint it failed. Every suspicion and fact was like shards of glass scattered in thick clouds. The more she thought about it, the more determined she became.

Sir Kyle. I shall never let you off the hook. Your death shall never come so easily. Every scheme of yours, and the people behind you shall be revealed.

Only after then would the queen behead him.

That will be my farewell to the subject I once cherished.

Grit! Deathly rage. Icy coldness. The queen’s shoulders trembled as such emotions surged in her. At the same time, she prepared herself for the bloody battle soon to take place in a moment. Just then, Lloyd, who was running the corridor, took a final turn.

Leap!

“Huh?”

Lloyd flinched in surprise as he ran, stopping dead in his tracks. He looked ahead.

“Javier?”

His gaze lay at the exit of the corridor, where a man was standing with his back facing Lloyd. The chandelier brightly lit up the banquet hall, and several long swords glinted against the light. The brilliant lights blinded

Lloyd, so he could only see the outline of the figure. However, he could still recognize who it was nonetheless.

“Javier. Are you all right?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

Javier turned to his side. There was a smile on his face. Lloyd meant to scold him for smiling in such a grave situation. He was about to until he was forced to clamp his mouth shut. Right before the words of rebuke came out, Lloyd’s eyes saw the outline of a man whose body lay limp in Javier’s hands. The outline was familiar to Lloyd’s eyes as well.

Could it be...?

Lloyd thought it was impossible. He blinked several times. He looked again. It was definitely him.

“Wait, did you arrest Sir Kyle?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“And you cut his right arm?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“What about you?”

“Excuse me?” asked Javier.

“I mean, are you hurt?”

“No. Thankfully.”

“Okay, good. That’s all that matters,” Lloyd assured.

That was truly all that mattered to Lloyd. Once he confirmed that Javier was A-OK, Lloyd finally let out a chuckle of relief. He trudged toward Javier, standing side by side as the exhaustion started to creep up inside him. Meanwhile, the queen got down from Lloyd's back and joined the two of them.

"Listen."

Her voice dripped with seriousness and dignity. Like a roaring lion, her voice brought silence across the banquet hall. The swords that pointed to Javier hung down, and dozens of guards gulped in nervousness.

"Tonight, Sir Kyle dared to assassinate me, and these two brave men have risked their lives to save my life," announced Queen Magentano.

Even amid the poisoning and lack of energy, she remained indomitable nonetheless. Everyone in the hall took their knees before her prideful and relentless declaration. Not a single soul dared to lift up their heads or steal a glance at her. And as her announcement shed light on the events, everyone was greatly shocked. The trustworthy Sir Kyle, the commander of the knights, turned out to be the traitor. And when they slowly lifted their heads, they saw Lloyd who was supporting the queen even now. Then, everything became clear. Lloyd Frontera. This man protected the queen tonight, they thought to themselves. Just then, a message popped in front of Lloyd.

Ding Dong.

Chapter 101: Unexpected Spoiler (1)

[All of your past achievements and accomplishments have satisfied a hidden condition. A new system has been made available as a result.]

[<Compliment System> has been activated.]

Eh?

Lloyd's eyes went wide when he read the messages that popped out of nowhere.

Compliment system?

Lloyd had never heard of it before. Things like "likeability" or "RP" appeared so many times that he grew familiar with them. But "compliment" was unheard of. But Lloyd didn't panic because the answer to his questions was in the message itself.

A hidden condition... Hmm...

The countless achievements and accomplishments he had undertaken after he arrived in this world replayed in his head.

Career-wise, it is quite impressive for me.

The word "impressive" fell short of capturing his feats. Just off the top of his mind... He revived the flat-broke barony, formed an alliance with the orc tribe in the wilderness, killed a monster that was the size of a skyscraper, and almost became the son-in-law of a count. And tonight, he put a stop to an assassination attempt on the queen. In short, he had saved the country.

And such accomplishments accumulated until I satisfied a hidden condition.

Lloyd could guess what was happening, and he suddenly grew hopeful and expectant.

A compliment system. I wonder what it is.

The likeability and RP he had accumulated were like wings that let him soar through life, enabling him to achieve impossible things and saving him from a host of crises. So Lloyd naturally wondered how this new system would empower him, how it would bring the impossible possible. Feeling the beating of his heart, Lloyd looked down at the message, and there was a selection window.

Ding Dong.

[You have selected the “Compliment System Guide.”]

[Praise breeds willingness. The accomplishments you have achieved are turned into a title. People will praise you using the title. Each given title comes with its own bonus skill. Additionally, at midnight of every full moon, a certain amount of compliment points (CP) will be awarded.]

Bonus skill... A compliment point.

Lloyd was still lost after reading up to that point. He opened the title list.

Ding Dong.

[You have selected the list of titles you hold.]

The titles cascaded below him.

[Exemplifying Punisher]

[Builder of Dead Estates]

[Honored Warrior of the Barbaric Tribe]

[Guardian of Cremo]

[Magentano Carry]

So this is just like the titles in video games...

Lloyd recalled the many games he had enjoyed back in South Korea. The games used to give out titles whenever he successfully achieved certain missions and quests.

The titles there gave me certain powers or buffs as bonuses. This reminds me exactly of those games. Let’s first check it out.

Lloyd selected one title and put it on a test.

Ding Dong.

[You have selected <Guardian of Cremo>.]

[Guardian of Cremo]

[Title Level: Regional talk]

Carpeted the night sky, the monster’s gaze. Stood a man’s powerful will. The city’s blaze died at his yell. The monster’s heart dropped as his feet fell. Night of disaster may not quell. But the morning ray shall fall. Come. Oh, the monster of the deep sea. Come. Oh, to the dawn of protection.

[Compliment Effect: When you fight an opponent ten times or heavier than you, “Iron Stance” is invoked. The damage you deal against the opponent will double. The damage you receive from the opponent will be halved.]

[Title Region: Entire Cremona region, including the City of Cremo.]

[Active Period of Title: 120 years]

[A title’s powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, the time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 6]

[Current CP: 0]

“...”

Lloyd was still in the dark about where this CP was used. But something was made clear when he read the guide.

So, I now have a buff that will last 120 years as long as I am in the Cremona region.

Come to think of it, the condition for the title was enormous, and the same went for the effect. Lloyd found himself gulping.

Okay, let me look at another one.

This time, Lloyd picked the “Exemplifying Punisher,” which was his first title.

Ding Dong.

[Exemplifying Punisher]

[Title Level: Fiefdom rumor]

The hooligan is out for trouble again! He endured everyone’s mockery. In doubt and suspicion, he fought while drenched in sweat. Against the sword of the traitor, he stood with bravery. No retreat. He remained canny. At last, he punished the big snitch. The root of injustice he plucked, willful and witty. Lloyd Frontera, the hooligan, the eldest son of the barony.

[Compliment Effect: You hold great influence on those below you. Those who work for you pay more attention to your words. Cases of disobedience and insubordination will be reduced significantly.]

[Title Region: Frontera barony.]

[Active Period of Title: 7 Years.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 1]

[Current CP: 0]

This is pretty good as well.

Judging from the description, the title seemed to have come from the time when he took care of Sir Neumann, who turned his back on the barony. As such, the accomplishment was more modest than the one back in Cremo. The period and region of influence were far more limited, too.

It’s better than nothing.

This system wasn’t like the ones in the game where he could wear only one. Using several of them at once offered great help. The more the better, especially when the time period and region expanded.

The same goes for the CP that automatically gets awarded when I wear the titles.

The usage of CP was still a mystery to Lloyd. Not a single word described where it could be used in the messages.

But it will come in handy if I save them.

Lloyd wasn’t guessing. He was sure of it. Thinking such, Lloyd glanced around, and he quickly closed the system window after reading the room. It wasn’t the best atmosphere to leisurely read the messages.

I want to look over more, but let’s read them later.

An air of disorder hung in the banquet hall. But it was dead silent. The nobles and the knights were on their knees, bowing down before the queen standing beside Lloyd. And her dignified voice reached into their ears.

“Therefore... I proclaim. Tonight, every individual who has set foot in the banquet today shall be suspended from leaving until the investigation is over. Since this is an urgent measure for the safety of the monarch, I request close cooperation...”

Temporary lockdown. Everyone in the hall would be investigated until the mastermind of the assassination attempt on the queen was found. Such declaration was spoken forth by the queen.

Looks like the most appropriate measure.

The situation involved a murder attempt on the queen, and the assassin was no other than Sir Kyle. Not a single soul could be trusted. Everyone had to be put into question. The nobles were even included in this group. Though the measure may have seemed overly strict and comprehensive, it was most necessary. And her proclamation was immediately put into effect.

Clack! Clang!

New forces arrived at the hall. The number was small, a total of less than 30. But each boasted a strong and grave aura more powerful and serious than the royal guards. Lloyd noticed the insignia on their armor and presumed who they were.

The three roses. The Order of Thornbush, the unit directly working beneath the monarch.

Just then, Lloyd recalled the beginning of The Knight of Blood and Iron. The Order was a secretive force directly working under the monarch. The royal guards were like the guard dogs that were in charge of protecting the queen on a daily basis. The Order of Thornbush was the queen's hunting dog mobilized only when traitors needed to be chased down.

Whew. They look so serious.

All of them were high-level sword experts. Apathetic killing machines. That was how the novel described them. But when Lloyd saw them in real life, he realized the novel barely did justice to what they actually looked like. The men's armor clacked and clanged as they approached in his direction. At last, the queen turned to Lloyd's side.

"Lloyd Frontera," she said.

"I am at your service, Your Majesty."

"You and Sir Asrahan have saved my life tonight. So, I shall ask one more favor from you."

"Do you wish for us to help out the Order of the Thornbush?" asked Lloyd.

“Precisely. This is why I like you. You’re very good at reading the room.”

The queen smiled in contentment. Lloyd replied with a wry smile on his face.

It’s going to be a long night.

Lloyd was exempted from being a suspect because he had saved the queen. Instead, he was to join the knights to find out those involved in the treason.

“I am at your service, Your Highness.”

I can look at the compliment system later, Lloyd thought to himself, and he bowed down. It was the beginning of a busy night.

The morning rolled around. And Lloyd was able to walk out of the hall only after the sun rose.

“Woah.”

The bright morning sun nauseated him a bit, and he wondered if it was because he had stayed awake all night or gone through the ruckus of saving the queen.

My head hurts.

He was tired, and rightfully so. He had spent the entire night investigating even when he was already worn out.

I don’t think I’ll ever snitch as much as I did today.

The afternoon before, he had told on the royal academy. And just on the same night, he testified everything he heard and reported that to the queen and the investigator as the person behind the monarch needed to be discovered.

Whatever. I told them everything about the Lord Great Chamberlain and all that, so it’s up to the palace now.

The investigation was beyond his jurisdiction. He did his part to save the queen and prevent her from becoming a tyrant. That alone was a goal achieved.

I never want to experience this ever again.

His stomach churned as he thought about the fuss he had to go through the night. And then, he suddenly became curious.

“Hey.”

“Did you call me?” Javier asked.

Javier shot back with a question right away. A laugh escaped Lloyd.

“Look at you. All I said was ‘Hey.’ How did you know that I was calling you?”

“Just a hunch. Please do ask.”

“Ask what?”

“Do you not have something to ask me?”

“Are you by any chance... a mind reader?”

“I just had a feeling that you might have one,” said Javier coolly.

“Aha. You are a psychologist.”

“...”

“What I meant to ask you was about whether you became that,” asked Lloyd.

“Do you mean a sword master?”

“Yeah.”

“Yes, I did.”

Pfft! The sound of something spraying out came from the opposite of Javier. When Lloyd turned around, he found Julian looking at him, and then Javier with a flustered expression on his face.

“Eh...? Sir Asrahan? Sword master?”

“Yeah.”

“But how can you say that so easily?” Julian asked in wonder.

“Then, should I say it with more difficulty?” asked Lloyd.

“No, it’s not that, but…”

“Then, what do you mean?” asked Lloyd.

“You know, you and Sir Asrahan. We’re talking about him being the sword master. But you two talk so nonchalantly like you are talking about breakfast.”

“Hmm,” drawled Lloyd, “should I have asked as though we’re talking about lunch then?”

“Oh, come on. Don’t joke with me,” Julian said as he waved his hand.

“I mean, there’s no need to make a fuss, don’t you think?” asked Lloyd again as he chuckled and shrugged.

Surely, he was happy that Javier had become the sword master. But it was something that he knew would happen. It was just that he became one earlier than what was written in the novel.

“No need to make a fuss, really. To Javier, he simply met his goal for this year. Isn’t that right?”

“Yes, that’s right.” Javier nodded. “That’s why I’m relieved. I was actually getting anxious because summer was nearing its end.”

“Why, because you feared you might not meet your goal this year?”

“Yes, but today, I achieved it. I’m happy.”

“By the way, did the queen say anything about your achievement?” asked Lloyd.

“She did.”

“Bet she told you to serve her, no?” asked Lloyd again.

“Yes.”

“And what did you say?”

“I rejected her.”

Julian was drinking from his cup when he sprayed it again. Javier, unperturbed, continued to speak.

“She wanted to see me separately right after the investigation. Her voice was serious.”

“What did she say?”

“She told me that the position of the commander of the royal guards is open,” Javier explained.

“Did she promise to offer you the position? The queen?”

“Yes,” Javier nodded as he spoke. Then he added, “So I told her I don’t want it.”

“And?” Lloyd stared at Javier intently.

“She asked why.”

“What was your answer?”

“I told her that my only master is Baron Frontera, and no one else.”

Javier’s voice grew more serious as if he felt assured by his own words.

“Thankfully. Her Highness understood my heart. She smiled and said that she envied the baron. I am very relieved,” said Javier.

“Yes, truly, it’s a relief,” Lloyd couldn’t help but smile, and he thought Javier’s reaction was very much like his.

The same thing happened in the novel, I think.

In the novel, Javier turned down the offer from the queen and the emperor to work for them. And the reason he gave them was pretty much the same as what he just gave.

I think it was about how there was only one lord for him, and that was the late Baron Frontera.

With such talent, Javier could’ve lived a life of fame and luxury, but he rejected all those good things for the sake of loyalty.

Seriously, he’s an impressive guy

Lloyd internally clucked his tongue and looked at Javier. He was smiling like a student who had finished his homework in time for a vacation. But his smile vanished soon.

“I wonder, however, who was behind it.”

“The assassination attempt of the queen?” said Lloyd.

“Yes.”

Javier’s voice was cold.

“Whomever the person was, Sir Kyle was cajoled into the scheme. The sword master of the kingdom and the commander of the royal guards.”

“Yes, it’s a shocking event,” agreed Lloyd. A sigh escaped him because he couldn’t put a finger on who did it. That was the case even when he finished the novel.

The novel didn’t specify who was behind such a plot.

Incomplete hook. The assassination attempt of the queen was just that. There seemed to be some sort of organization hidden in veils, but it was never brought to light even in the end. The only thing that was mentioned in the novel was about Javier secretly bracing himself for the threat that wasn’t over.

That’s the thing with authors these days. It’s just a setup for the second novel.

It was an ending, but not technically quite so. It was just an unfinished hook to be expanded in the sequel when it received more attention from the readers. The secret organization behind the assassination attempt was exactly just that.

Tsk. Why didn’t they publish the second novel?

Unfortunately, there was only one book for the novel. It looked like the second would come out soon, but it never got published. So Lloyd didn’t know a thing about the unfinished hook. That was the conundrum at the moment.

It just doesn’t feel right.

Originally, the assassination attempt should have been executed two and a half years later. So, Lloyd meant to hint at it much later. But now, it happened much earlier than expected, causing him to wonder.

But the important thing is that we were able to stop it.

Rustle. Rustle. Before he realized it, there were already leaves falling from the trees. The sign of fall hit Lloyd’s feet each time he walked. And the stroll cleared his mind a bit.

Let’s not think too much about it.

Whatever the case was, Lloyd did prevent the assassination attempt from succeeding. So what was to come after wasn’t part of his job description. After all, his goal was to live doing nothing for the rest of his life in the fiefdom.

So it’s all good as long as there aren’t any large uproars, natural disasters, monster attacks, measles, or anything like that.

The thought brought an onrush of peace to his mind. He returned to his quarters, caught up on sleep, and lazed around. He had a late dinner and stared at the night sky. And at last, the much-awaited full moon floated in the sky, bright and shiny. Lloyd waited some more as he lay on the grass in front of his lodging. As the waiting continued, he looked over the descriptions of the titles he wasn’t able to read a while ago.

The Builder of the Dead Estate makes everyone in the fiefdom cooperate with the construction projects I hold in the fiefdom... The one about the barbaric tribe lets me use the roar unique to the orc tribes... And the Magentano Carry, hmm... it gets me the absolute trust of Queen Magentano and frees me from treason at all costs...

Each title was unique and efficient in its own way. He liked them. Meanwhile, midnight came near, and the full moon stood right in the center. Just then, the message Lloyd had waited for appeared in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong.

[The full moon is lighting up the night sky.]

[You will receive CP for the five titles you have.]

I knew it.

It was just as he expected. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rolled upward. Fixing up his posture, Lloyd read down the messages.

[The people in the Frontera barony are showering you, the Exemplifying Punisher and Builder of the Dead Estates, with compliments. You have acquired 3 CP.]

[The orcs of the Sand and Steel Tribe are showering you with compliments for being the Honored Warrior of the Barbaric Tribe. You have acquired 2 RP.]

22?

To be honest, he didn’t know where this CP would be used. So that may have explained the uncertainty of whether the number “22” meant plenty or not. Just then...

Ding Dong.

Another message appeared right away as soon as the previous ones disappeared.

What...? Ending... Spoiler?

An unbelievable message appeared in front of him. Lloyd’s eyes widened as he read it.

Chapter 102: Unexpected Spoiler (2)

What? Ending Spoiler?

Lloyd's eyes widened at the unthinkable message. He had to read the skill window twice, word by word because it was utterly unbelievable.

It's real.

The system didn't lie. Lloyd had already benefited from the likeability and RP system multiple times. He organized his thoughts with aplomb. The ending spoiler. The name itself already somewhat told Lloyd what it was about.

Okay. I'm in the novel right now. But my actions have altered many parts of the story. And this system shows me how the story has changed down the road. Just the skill I needed."

Come to think of it, it indeed was the case. The Frontera barony should have already crumbled and gone under if things happened, according to the novel. The baron couple, Lloyd, and Julian were supposed to die tragically. But none of them did, and the family remained strong. Their debt was cleared, and his estate was thriving…

It's the same for Javier.

According to the novel, he should still be wandering around and not yet become a high-level sword expert or completed the Asrahan Core Technique yet. But now...

He's a sword master. And not enough with that, he's obtained the triple circle in the Asrahan Core Technique and freely uses mana blasts whenever he wants.

His growth was sped up by a few years. At this rate, it was a question of how much stronger he would be. Who knew? He could become more powerful than in the original story when he became a grandmaster with hexa circles.

Anyway, my stay of a year and a half has changed a lot of things. It’s my doing. It’s a good thing, but I can’t say it’s without any negatives.”

There obviously was a serious downside, and it was that the future was becoming more unpredictable.

It’s because of me whose actions constantly affect this world, ultimately changing the turn of events in this world. That’s why the story keeps differing from the novel.”

Just like so, the events would follow a course different from the original story. And it would divert more and more down the road.

Case in point. This event.

The assassination attempt of the queen. This incident should have taken place two and a half years later based on the novel, but it happened this early on. And the cause behind the treason was yet to be revealed. Lloyd racked his brain, but nothing particularly stood out. That was the problem.

This simply means that the relative upper hand I had in this world is slowly slipping out of my grasp.

Since Lloyd read the novel, he had access to the information the other didn’t. He enjoyed the exclusive, superior access to information. To the people in this world, he was almost a prophet. But once the events in this world veered off from the novel more and more...

It’ll be impossible to make predictions or anything.

His biggest weapon, which was the information, would be lost. And thinking about it troubled him.

Just when things were going for the worse, this skill came up at a perfect time, letting me look at the future.

Lloyd read the message on the skill window once again.

Ding Dong.

[You can take a peek at the portion of the ending scene that will unfold in this story by spending some of the CP. It may be a happy or sad ending.]

I knew it.

It was just as he had expected.

Okay, let’s give it a try.

The ending that was soon to come. His heart raced expectantly at the thought of looking at it.

Please. Please. I hope I’m growing old, enjoying the best of life.

A life lacking nothing. A marriage that was a match made in heaven. One son and one daughter. Two dogs and a cat. Thinking about what to eat for dinner and the summer vacation. Those would be the biggest concern in his life. Lloyd wished that such an ending would appear, where he would grow old with much ease and peace.

And if there are any, it’ll give me just a hint of the stumbling block that prevents me from living such a life.

Lloyd thought that he might find the element that prevented him from living the best of his life. If he did, it would be instantly removed, he said to himself. Lloyd rolled his eyes and selected the “Activate” button below the skill window.

Messages related to the skill usage appeared, and right after that...

Crackle...! Time around him stopped. The wind, flying insects, and falling leaves hung in the air.

What is this...

Just when he thought so, Lloyd saw a space about five steps ahead of him tumble. It tumbled and flashed a light until it cracked, opening a round and white passageway.

A portal?

It looked like one. He struggled to look into the bright white inside. But it waved and fluctuated as though it was motioning at him to come. It reminded him of a pond filled with freshly squeezed milk.

Would it be all right to go there?

Lloyd was doubtful for a second, but he reminded himself that the system was always right. He decided to trust it, took a step, and held out his hand.

Slosh. His fingertip produced a concentric circle on the surface, and it grew larger until it pulled his hand. Softly and gently, Lloyd walked inside, and finally, a blinding light radiated in front of him.

Fwoosh! Lloyd wondered if he blinked and opened his eyes or if a new landscape appeared in front of him. If so, what was the pool of blood on the ground he was seeing?

What is this...

Lloyd tried to open his eyes wide, but his body remained still against his will. He willed to do so, but his body forced him to furrow his brows. Moreover, against his will, Lloyd started to talk to himself.

“At that time... I should have come back as soon as possible.”

As soon as possible? I should have come back?

The voice dripped with regret. Lloyd wondered what he was saying and what situation he found himself in. His mouth moved once again.

“If so, this wouldn’t have happened.”

Another round of regret-filled voices. And his head slowly lifted, at last, allowing Lloyd a better look at his surroundings. The entire village was in ruins. The houses and woods were nibbled, and corpses lay everywhere. Crows flew around, drooling. The scene expanded to be etched in his mind so deeply that it would appear in his nightmares.

What is this... What the?

Lloyd asked himself why he was seeing this landscape in the ending spoiler. He was thinking so when the familiar ground came into his view. The path that cut across the ashen village straightened. It was a road of about 190 feet in width. The middle part was higher than the corners, and each side was closely covered with flat rocks that were about 2 feet. The corners of the road were installed with a waterway that was 1.6 feet wide and 0.6 feet in depth. And the waterways were externally wrapped with 10-feet wide pedestrian walks on both sides. Lloyd closely studied it because it looked familiar. Soon, he learned what it was. Via Appia, the ancient Roman road. Ppodong had painstakingly dug the ground, and the civil engineers had smoothened them out. People cocked their heads in wonder, and at times, threw a gaze of wonder. Regardless, they dug, smoothened, and constructed until the job was done and brought a host of praises from people. Lloyd wondered why those people who praised him then were lying on the ground. The bar owner seemed to have died on the ground while trying to run away. The civil engineers had been engulfed. And so many more. This place was...

This is the Frontera barony? This?

Shiver. Chills ran down his spine. He couldn’t believe it. Just then...”

Whiiing.... An eerie noise blared in the distant sky. Lloyd looked up, and a dark cloud was blanketing the sky, coming fast in his direction. No, it wasn’t a cloud as water particles didn’t have eyes and wings.

“Master Lloyd, we should go. Now.”

Someone spoke in front of him. Javier’s back. Even he was soon enveloped in darkness. The sky was gone with the gray cloud, and so was the sun. The darkness engulfed his surroundings. Tens of thousands of sets of arthropod eyes came near. Their wings sounded like a storm.

“…!”

Javier shouted something for the last time, but it was buried under the noise.

Fwoosh! A ray of light smeared the sky in front of Lloyd. And he clamped his eyes shut by reflex.

“…”

Chirp. Chirp. Amid the night wind that brushed against his skin, bugs chirped and cheered peacefully. Lloyd opened his eyes as he heard those noises. The view of the palace's backyard appeared. There were no ruined estates or lying corpses. Lloyd grabbed both of his knees.

“Whew...”

Beads of sweat streaked down his forehead, and there were goosebumps all over his skin. And he clenched his teeth as the muscles tightened in his face.

“What did I just see?”

The system did say that it was a spoiler for the ending, which granted him a sneak peek at the ending should the current course of events continue.

This is my ending if I continue moving forward this way?

The barony paid off the debt at last. Only a life of peace and cushiness awaited him. All he needed was to go back to the barony.

I can’t believe that tumbledown village is my barony.

Lloyd couldn’t believe it. What kind of joke was this? The question blurted out of him on its own. But Lloyd shook his head.

No, it can’t be a lie.

Lloyd was on the crest of a wave because of the likeability and RP system. But if he chose to turn a blind eye and avoid taking action because he saw something negative...

What I just saw can really happen.

So, Lloyd needed to take some kind of action, no matter how small that was. Even if the system lied to him, coming up with a plan didn’t harm him. Right now, he needed to prevent the ending he just saw. The first step he had to take? Analysis.

Okay. Let’s look back at what I just saw.

Lloyd breathed in and out first, trying to collect his pounding heart. His eyes slowly recovered calmness.

First, the location. It was the Frontera barony, for sure. The Via Appia in the rubbles is the proof."

But what about the time period?

Near future.

The voice in the ending scene wasn't much different from the voice right now, and it only meant that he hadn't grown old. The same went for Javier. He was young and youthful, just like now.

The clothes. Javier and I still had the same travel clothes we wore to the palace when we came here.

So, perhaps, whatever happens, it was to take place around the time they go back to the barony. Lloyd was convinced that it was so.

And now, the reason behind the disaster.

Lloyd recalled the sight of his ending spoiler. The dark clouds that carpeted the sky. Tens and thousands of arthropod eyes. The stormy wings. Lloyd saw clearly what they were. Hundreds and thousands of giant locusts that were two feet long.

Dammit. First was the financial crisis, and it's a violent crisis next?

Lloyd had busted his gut making money for the last year and a half, finally paying the debt in the barony. And now, he was forced to deal with a violent crisis even without being able to enjoy peace for a moment. Lloyd bitterly thought it was unfair. It was as though he had tightened his belt to overcome a great recession, and now, a war broke out right after.

No way I'm going to lose my dream life so easily!

The barony was the land of milk and honey that promised him a cushy life. It was his lifelong insurance, savings, and pension. Lloyd couldn't let it slip out of his grasp so easily as he could see what was going to happen if he did. The queen would express condolence and call for him because he had nowhere to go, and eventually, he would become her loyal subject. No, her loyal summon partner. Toil for the rest of his life, much like his time in the military when he became an enslaved summon partner for the administrative officer. No. Never! Lloyd bolted up.

Come to think of it, what I said earlier bothers me the most.

He told himself there that he needed to get back to the barony sooner at that time. “At that time” may have meant now. Lloyd’s walk quickened. He gave no care that it was late at night. He rushed into the palace, and though he was stopped by the Order of Thornbush, he didn’t care. After all, he had saved the queen. He was immediately let in after he identified himself.

Perhaps it was his voice laden with anxiousness. Lloyd was immediately led to her office.

“Come in.”

The queen shot an answer even before he could explain the matter to her. The door opened, and he saw the queen sitting on the edge of the desk piled with papers. She looked like she was going over the investigative reports on the assassination. Filled with fatigue and tiredness, she gazed at Lloyd.

“Lloyd Frontera. What brings you here at this late hour?”

Her gaze seemed to ask whether he learned anything important about the assassination attempt. Lloyd removed every trace of a smile off his face and replaced it with a grave and serious one. Right now, he needed to go back to the fiefdom. But he mustn’t force it upon her with urgency and go back so precipitously. It would only bring trouble.

So I need assistance. The best kind of support I can receive in this situation.

And the right amount of fishing was necessary to acquire the necessary assistance. Thinking such, Lloyd spoke in a nervous voice.

“Your Majesty, I, Lloyd Frontera, dare report to Her Highness that the Cremona region and its eastern borders, including the Frontera barony, will wind up in a catastrophe of fire that wreaks havoc in the land.”

“What did you say?”

Lloyd cocked his head to the side. Her brows were slightly wrinkled. The bait was thrown, and it was a success. Convinced of such, Lloyd opened his mouth.

Chapter 103: Magentano Carry (1)

“What do you mean the eastern border will be set ablaze? Get to the point. What is it that you are saying?”

The queen stared at Lloyd, furrowing her brows. Yes, surely, it would sound bogus. But it wasn’t the time to care what she thought about. Lloyd proceeded to throw bait at the queen.

“It is true, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“True?” The queen asked back.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Then, I shall ask you one thing. The eastern region is currently peaceful from what I know. No urgent message has been received, and no war has broken out. And yet, you are here reporting to me the danger of the eastern region. What should I make of this?”

“Consider it my humble counsel to the disaster that will come down soon.”

“What? Counsel? The disaster that will come down soon?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

The queen took the bait, and the fishing hook pierced her palate. Now, it was time for Lloyd to pull it up.

“I, Lloyd Frontera, humbly report to Her Majesty that the entire east side of the Cremona region will turn into ashes within a month. The houses will be burned, innocent people will die, and the agricultural lands will be reduced to ruins.

There was silence for a second. “Such a thing will happen to the entire region of Cremona within a month?” asked the queen finally.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd hung his head down. Surely, what he just said may not be true. It may be incorrect. The Frontera barony may be the only place that gets scorched to the ground, while the other regions in the Cremona remained fine. But right now, he needed to be as dramatic as possible and make a big deal out of it to draw her attention. So, he could receive a tad of support from her. His attempt seemed to have worked.

“Hmm, impossible...”

The queen’s attitude was graver than before. She no longer tilted her head or furrowed her brows. Instead, she looked more serious than ever.

“Could it be that you suffered from a terrible nightmare? Oh, do know that I am not trying to insult you,” the queen added.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Good,” said the queen. “Then, why are you speaking such nonsense?”

“I do not think it is nonsense, Your Majesty.”

“Why not? The east of the Cremona region is peaceful today.”

“It will not be in a month,” defended Lloyd.

“Hmm... One month later. Are you by any chance worried about the sultan country over the eastern range and the wasteland?”

Sultan country? Lloyd perked his ears. The queen’s words continued.

“Yes, it is true that the sultan country had significant military activity in its western border, that is, the border facing ours. I was concerned about it as well. However, there were not any signs that indicated any danger or threat toward us,” she explained.

“Could it be that they are preparing for an ambush?”

“No, they are not.”

She was straightforward about it. She continued to speak.

“According to my spies, their military activity took place only on the borders. Meaning it was just a routine exercise. Even if it wasn’t, the transfer and preservation of massive supplies for invasion would have been picked up by the spies first. But they did not spot anything. Moreover...”

She stared at Lloyd.

“Two geographical barriers stand in between the borders of the sultan kingdom and ours. I am sure you are well aware of it, yes? The vast wasteland is rife with giant monsters, and the eastern range is too rough and rugged for the military units to pass. So, it hardly makes any sense for the sultan kingdom to attack us through the eastern terrain. If it comes from the north that directly touches the border, your words would make more sense.”

Her voice was filled with conviction. She thought to herself.

Lloyd Frontera. You are off base this time.

Lloyd hung his head down without any retort or rebuttal. But even though he was wrong about it in her mind, he looked at her in a contented manner.

He must have made a mistake out of his youthful passion.

Lloyd had shown quite a lot of wit and hidden talent. At this point in time, he was the most sought-after talent by the queen. But he was young and zealous. This time, his fledgling passion must have gotten the better of him after picking up an uncertain piece of information and forming an incorrect opinion.

Should I encourage him a little?

His blunder was the result of loyalty, youthful zeal, and passion. At a time like this, she ought to care and wrap her arms around him instead of snapping his zeal like a twig. She ought to redirect his zeal to a proper channel. That was the true accepting quality and leadership she wanted to manifest as a ruler.

“Lloyd Frontera, raise your head.”

Lloyd slowly raised his head, but his gaze was slightly strange. It was shaking. Lloyd was actually deep in thought, working his head off, trying to rack his brain. But was it because he was trying to come up with various excuses? Or to draw her attention once more? No. It was because several pieces of information she just revealed enlightened him about the cause behind the catastrophe that was too soon to arrive in the land.

Crap. That was it.

The large military scale happening in the eastern range, and the monster-littered wasteland. Once Lloyd learned those two facts, a portion of the novel came to his mind.

Monster domino. The initial capabilities’ doctrine of preservation.

That was the new military doctrine the sultan kingdom planned to showcase. When? Two and a half years later. Where? Through the north as it invades the Magentano border. But the period was shortened now, and the location changed. Not the north. It was the east.

For what reason? Why?

Lloyd wanted to know the intention behind the sultan kingdom and the reason why the time and location changed. He mulled it over, but nothing came up. He just felt the urge to inform the queen about this.

“Your Majesty, I have something else to report to you.”

“Hmm. I see that you have not yet given up on your claim.”

The queen looked at a loss, and her gaze seemed to suggest the conversation was over. But Lloyd had more to say. In fact, he was just starting.

Thinking such, he said, “The military exercise the sultan kingdom is holding right now, which Your Majesty just mentioned, shall bring blood to the Cremona region.”

“What...?”

“It is true, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“Hmm. But how can you ascertain it? How is it possible for such a thing to happen? I cannot understand,” replied the queen.

“Rightfully so, Your Highness. It’s as the military doctrine and strategy is rather new and still developing.”

“Explain.”

The queen’s facial expression turned stoic. Lloyd licked his lips in nervousness.

“A butterfly effect?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. It refers to the phenomenon where a flap of a butterfly develops into a storm across the sea after a chain of events.”

“How innovative. And such a thing will happen between the sultan kingdom and ours?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. But this time, it will not be a storm. It will be a massive ambush of the monsters.”

“Monsters?” the queen quirked one of her brows.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Explain.”

“As you know it, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd, “countless colonies of monsters inhabit the eastern wasteland.”

“True.”

“The sultan kingdom will make use of it. It will provoke and hunt the colony of monsters near the border. It will pressure them to transfer their habitat westward.”

“Then?” The queen asked, curious.

“Even a strong and large monster can never stand against the power of the military forces, and eventually, they will transfer the habitat. That is the beginning of the monster domino.”

“Domino?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. The monsters will be moving toward the west, threatening the monsters inhabiting there already.”

“Do you mean,” the queen asked, “that just like how a domino block falls to make the next one fall, forcing out the monsters will disturb the habitats until they attack the west, where we are?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. The sultan kingdom will continue the military exercise, continually pressuring the monsters to move until it affects the Cremona region.”

It would be just like what happened at the end of the Roman empire. The Germanic race was forced to escape westward by the Hun race. And just as the national escapade wreaked havoc on Rome, this world was about to undergo a similar event.

“Hmm.”

Queen Magentano thought about it until she asked, “What do they gain by doing so?”

“Preserve their initial forces.”

Lloyd was unreserved in his answer.

“While our border is reduced to ruins because of the monster domino effect, they maintain their existing forces without combat. And they can slightly test the water as well," said Lloyd.

"They can test the waters?"

"Yes, Your Majesty. Once we fail to stop the monsters from flooding into our borders, they will invade us at once."

"But if we block the monsters for good?"

"We simply need to send the troops back," said Lloyd.

"Hmm... I see. And we would not be able to raise issues about it since they are not technically attacking us directly."

"That is exactly the case, Your Majesty. Even if we point it out to them, they shall only express their customary regrets and turn the dagger of criticism at us for intervening with their military exercise."

"They will criticize us for intervening with their internal affairs?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"..."

Queen Magentano remained silent for a while as she chewed over Lloyd's words, it made sense. If the sultan kingdom was planning a scheme, the eastern region could be greatly harmed. Thus, she started to wonder

"By the way, where did you receive this information?"

Her gaze grew stern.

"What you just said is logically plausible. Therefore, I am curious. How did you attain the intelligence that even my spies failed to notice?"

She was curious and doubtful at the same time, even if his words were true. What Lloyd nonchalantly reported to herself were the things even the palatial spies failed to retrieve. So, she could not help but take his words with a grain of salt. The look on Lloyd's face, however, indicated tranquility. And when he spoke, his gaze was added with an additional layer of nonchalance.

“My friends in the eastern wasteland told me,” Lloyd answered.

“By your friends in the wasteland, do you mean...”

“Yes, what you presume is right, Your Majesty.”

“The orcs. The Sand and Steel Tribe.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Of course, it was a big fat lie. He had never heard anything about this from the orc tribe. But if he straightforwardly told the queen that he knew because he read about it in a novel, the latter would consider him nuts. Therefore, Lloyd decided to come up with a believable lie.

“Your Majesty, I am sure you know. The Frontera barony and the Sand and Steel Tribe formed a blood alliance, and ever since then, constant communication has been taking place. And one of the topics was regarding the areas beyond the wasteland.”

“Hmm... The orcs came across the sultan’s strategy and informed his blood ally, you?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Where is your proof that it will be executed within a month?”

“It is my hunch, Your Highness.”

“Hunch?” she asked.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd lifted his head and looked straight into his eyes. There was conviction in them.

“Someone tried to assassinate you, and the palace fell into temporary chaos. The lords in the regions cast doubt in your authority, Your Highness.”

“Therefore... the sultan kingdom will not give up this chance?”

“That is exactly the case, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd hung his head down again.

“They are the oldest enemy of ours. Which means that they, too, must have planted spies in this palace,” Lloyd stated. “It is certainly the case that they know about the unfortunate event this time.”

“Hmm. And so, you’re asking me to trust you?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

The queen paused for a second until she continued. “But there is no evidence to support that it will happen. You are only assuming. How can I mobilize the military to respond to a mere assumption?”

“You should trust me, Your Highness,” Lloyd spoke with a slight force in his voice.

“If I do, what will you do for me?”

“I shall tell everyone that you have seen through the whole threat and took measures against it.”

“All the credit will be mine,” she said.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“But what if the incident you expected does not occur?”

“Do punish me harshly.”

“Ha!”

The queen scoffed at the ridiculousness of his answer. But her eyes didn't hold any laughter. A close calculation and review of everything he had said and the consequences of his suggestions went through her head. Meanwhile, he waited for her to speak. The baits were tossed, and they were too sweet to reject.

The queen loses nothing even if she follows my counsel.

The assassination attempt dampened the spirits across the kingdom, and this could potentially change the atmosphere for the better. Chaos and disruption would instantly be removed, and domestic and international attention would be diverted to the east. To the queen, this was a joker card.

And for me as well.

He needed to save the fiefdom. A violent crisis was right around the corner after a financial crisis. He must protect his sweet home at all costs, and to do that, Lloyd needed the queen's support. It was more effective to rush to the border with hundreds and thousands of soldiers than to dash to the barony with just him and Javier. This was the reason why Lloyd didn't rush back to the barony. Instead, he came here and boldly set up a negotiation table against the queen.

Come on. Say yes. My queen. Come on. Please!

Lloyd waited for the queen's decision, direly wishing as he bit his lips. Just then…

Ding Dong.

Chapter 104: Magentano Carry (2)

[Your dire wish has activated a title.]

[<Magentano Carry> is starting to have a powerful influence on Queen Magentano.]

What is this...

Lloyd paused for a second in front of the message that appeared before him. He wondered if this was what it felt like to spot a hopeful torch from an unexpected search party.

Ding Dong.

[Magentano Carry]

[Title Level: The unofficial history of the kingdom]

Faster than anyone else, you have arrived. The poison hungry for my heart, you have plucked. Without reservation, you have left your mark on my heart. You have gasped for air in place of my breath. Your eyes trembled in place of mine. You have even tried to sacrifice your life to save mine. At last, your back carried my body, and you protected me with an indomitable spirit. My dear brave Frontera. How can I ignore you? How can I forget you? My soul is indebted to you for as long as your breath lasts and heart beats.

[Compliment Effect: As the lifesaver of Queen Magentano, you have her absolute trust. Your opinion and advice will be positively received. Moreover, for as long as her reign continues, you will never be suspected of treason or rebellion.]

[Title Region: Magentano Kingdom]

[Active Period of Title: Queen Magentano’s reign]

“...”

The message brightly floated in his eyes, and Lloyd lifted his head a little and examined Queen Magentano’s face. She looked contemplative. Her face began to brighten just then, and her grimace was now going away. Her furrowed brows softened, and the corners of her clenched lips started to move upward, at last forming a smile. Her gaze toward him turned positive, and Lloyd wondered if her smile was wry.

“Lloyd Frontera. You are truly bold and carefree.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“Overwhelmed with gratitude...?” asked the queen. “Do you even know what I am about to say?”

“I believe that you shall grant my request,” stated Lloyd.

“Ha! You are full of yourself, aren’t you?”

“Please think of it as my effort to be considerate toward you, Your Highness.”

“How eloquent you are,” replied the queen.

“Once again, I am overwhelmed with gratitude.”

“But what if your presumption is wrong? What if I don’t grant your request?”

“Then, please harshly punish me if that time comes.”

“Tsk. You always have a response to everything, don’t you?”

Queen Magentano scoffed and, at last, gave the answer Lloyd waited for.

“All right Your wish will be granted.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“No more sweet talk.”

“...”

“I have,” the queen went on, “carefully thought about your suggestion. It is truly clever. I can feel how much you have mulled over how to wheedle me into your plan.”

Her smile turned into a sneer.

“I could tell from the simple fact that I have nothing to lose when I follow your suggestion. On the off chance that the disaster of your claim does happen in the east, my reputation and authority will soar for taking pre-emptive action. Even if your prediction is wrong, I--”

“Your Majesty loses nothing,” Lloyd finished her sentence.

“Correct. I can simply argue that it was a routine military training exercise. And that kind of news could shift the attention of the political circle in the capital from the assassination attempt.”

“Therefore,” asked Lloyd, “how much support does Your Majesty have in mind?”

“I am thinking about 500 directly under my command.”

“By that, do you mean the white cavalry, Your Highness?”

“Indeed. Do you need more?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty.”

He didn’t need more, indeed. The white cavalry, which was directly under the queen’s command, may not be the strongest force in the force, but it was an elite force nonetheless. The cavalry at his side would be more helpful than having thousands of random men. Later on, Lloyd negotiated some more with the queen, particularly about the command of the forces and the length of her support. The talk was kept brief as they couldn’t afford to waste even a single second. Once Lloyd received the promise of assistance from the queen, he hastily returned to the barony. The first thing he did to that end was wake Javier and Julian up.

“Is it true...?” Javier asked.

“Very much so. You think I’d be making such a fuss right now if it wasn’t?” Lloyd said.

Lloyd had summarized the information he had taught the queen, and the two of them instantly grimaced despite the grogginess.

“I see. We must depart now, then, I suppose,” said Javier as he flung himself out of bed. He then began to pack his bag for the trip. Julian did the same, too.

“Hey, what are you doing?”

“Huh?” Julian asked as he paused packing.

“I said, what are you doing?” asked Lloyd again.

Julian was following Javier’s lead and packing his things, albeit clumsily. Lloyd grabbed him and asked a question, to which Julian answered matter-of-factly.

“I’m packing. Why?”

“Why are you packing?” Lloyd asked as he stared at Julian’s eyes.

“What do you mean? I’m going as well.”

“To the barony?”

“Mhm.”

Julian nodded, his voice assured and firm.

“It’s my home and my fiefdom. You said it was going to get dangerous. I’m going as well. I’ll protect the fiefdom with you guys.”

“Tsk. Don’t even try.”

Grab! Lloyd wrenched the bag out of the boy’s embrace. Julian was startled, and before he could fight back, Lloyd spoke first.

“What if you tag along, and all of us die?” “What’s going to happen afterward?”

“What...?”

“Think about it. Imagine what could happen if we went back to the barony together. What if something goes wrong, and everyone in the fiefdom perishes? Who’s going to continue the family name then?”

“...”

Julian seemed to have understood at last. Lloyd spoke to him.

“That’s why you have to stay. There has to be at least one person left in the family to carry on the family name. Don’t you think so?”

“Um, but...”

“Listen to me, Julian.”

Lloyd lowered his back a little, coming down to Julian’s eye level. He then stared at him intently.

“Our job is to do all the dirty work. And as for you... You stay put. Cheer us from behind. That’s all we need. And if I fall, that’s the time when you should come and take action. Right now, save your energy for when that time comes. Got that?”

“Brother...” Julian muttered.

“What?”

“It doesn’t suit you to be so serious.”

“Dammit.”

Lloyd ran through his curly hair behind with his hand in embarrassment. Meanwhile, Javier spoke.

“Master Lloyd, we’re ready.”

Javier truly was a sword master. He had packed the bags for two at an extreme speed that transcended human capacity. Lloyd straightened his back, looked down at Julian, and grinned.

“I’m off now.”

He carried the bag and turned, feeling relieved about how the conversation went.

Whew. Operation: One Less Baggage was a success.

Lloyd actually feared that Julian would be stubborn about tagging along. That was why he came up with a plan on how to leave him behind in the capital. And thankfully, it worked.

There’s a high chance I might not be able to take care of him once I return to the barony.

It was possible that Lloyd wouldn’t have any free time and have to put his life on the line. And so, taking Julian, who couldn’t even fend for himself, was the same as putting the boy in harm’s way. The others could be put in danger as a result as well. So right now, it was for the better that he stayed in the capital. Feeling relieved, Lloyd stepped out of the lodging, where he found the two promised magical coursers.

“Whoa.”

Lloyd whistled, impressed by what he saw. The two horses were carefully enchanted by a palatial mage. A glowing silver energy swirled around their legs with a half-transparent glimmer.

“Let’s go then.”

Lloyd hopped on the horse before stealing a glance at Julian, who followed behind Lloyd in a hurry.

“See you next time.”

Thwack! Lloyd kicked the horse’s side, and the horse began to gallop.

“...!”

It was an unbelievable speed. Julian grew distant in a second, and everything in front of Lloyd came in hazy and blurry shapes.

Is this some kind of supercar that can go from zero to sixty in three seconds?

Lloyd clenched his teeth as he grabbed the rein. With his body put closely on the horse’s back, a sense of relief flooded Lloyd for having learned how to ride a horse from Javier a little while ago. What was more, this swift horse was smart. She easily avoided and jumped over everything that stood in her way, and she was considerate of Lloyd on her back. So, the terrifyingly fast speed of the trip didn’t shake him much. Lloyd glanced to his side.

“Hey, you okay?”

“Yes, of course.”

Javier’s horse was as good as his. But he seemed to be adjusting to the speed much more smoothly than Lloyd.

“Let’s go then.”

“Yes.”

Gallop! Gallop!

Lloyd and Javier. Their two horses galloped across the main road of the capital at dawn as they left a trace of silvery glitter. Julian waved his hand quietly as he stared at the two growing far. And then his motion stopped, and his hand slowly closed into a fist.

“...”

Julian’s face was stoic, and he unconsciously bit his lower lip.

I guess I’m not much of a help to my brother.

Lloyd had cooed him with good words. He knew where Lloyd was coming from when the latter said that he should stay here to continue the family name. But on the other hand, Julian was quick to catch the meaning Lloyd left behind.

I’m a burden.

Julian wasn’t a fool. There were certain words that didn’t need to be said out loud to be understood. He knew why Lloyd stopped him from going back to the barony with them earlier.

He’s worried about me, that’s true. But it was equally true that he thought of me as a burden.

Julian clenched his fists, but he didn’t do it out of anger.

I feel so ashamed and guilty.

Julian wondered what he had achieved all this while. Javier, who was the same age as him, was already a sword master. Even though he acknowledged that Javier was a rare genius, Julian knew that he had plenty of time to hone his skills, which could’ve been helpful to Lloyd. But he didn't.

I want to be of help to Lloyd.

To do that, he needed to be good at something. He had to find something he could do. Julian lifted his head with that thought in mind. He gazed toward the road Lloyd and Javier galloped away on and made a determination.

Just wait for a while, Lloyd. I'm going to try as well, so that I can become helpful. Wait just a little more for me.

When that day comes, he would rush back to the barony like Lloyd and Javier did. He would stand tall by their side as they overcame many obstacles in their way. Julian resolutely gritted his teeth under the late summer sky.

Rumble! The horses leaped and galloped, creating a storm of leaves as they sprinted. The magical power of the palace mages was stupendous. The horses barely got tired, and giving about 70% of their maximum speed allowed them to gallop all day long without a break. But that speed was already faster than the full speed of ordinary horses. So, Lloyd and Javier focused on traveling, taking as little time as they could for meals and breaks. The Asrahan Core Technique was now at the triple circle for both, so they were able to pull off such a hectic journey. They galloped on and on toward the east where the sun was rising, toward the barony that was in impending peril. They rushed, ran, and charged for five straight days until they arrived at the border of the barony.

"..."

Lloyd surveyed the familiar land as he heavily breathed. The barony was just as he remembered. The green fields adorned the Maritz land, and the paved road started from there. Three and four villages were adjoined by it, as well as the baron's manor. The paved road led up to the central plaza, coal mine, and farther east. Lloyd's gaze traveled farther than that to the mountain range of the east, and he finally gazed at the peak and the sky. It was morning. Supposedly, the sun should be brightly shining over the mountain range, but it didn't. Was it a dark cloud? No. There was something more black, darker. Something unusual. A giant dark lump was covering the sun, and it was letting out a strange noise more strident than thunder.

Bzzzzzzt! Voooooooo!

Thousands, hundreds of thousands of wings fluttered in the air, and the blaring noise amplified as they approached closer. In no time, the entire swarm of locusts, whose number was too many to count, covered the sky of the eastern mountain range.

“Master Lloyd... What you mentioned... Is that it?”

Could it be because of the unbelievably horrendous scene? Javier’s voice trembled faintly. Of course, Lloyd was the same.

“Are you shaking?”

“A little bit,” Javier confessed. “Do you have any plans?”

“Of course, I do.”

Lloyd did come here with a plan. That was all he had in mind throughout the whole journey. The 500 white cavalry knights should have been marching to get here at high speed. Lloyd and Javier just needed to buy some time until they arrived. The time had come for the two to save the fiefdom as planned.

I can have a luxurious retirement only after I protect this place!

If he failed, he would be reduced to a servant of the queen and spend every minute of his life working for her until he died. Lloyd didn’t like that possibility.

Clank! Lloyd brought out the steel shovel and turned around to face Javier. Their eyes met.

“You will follow me, yes?”

“You know my answer.”

“Then, I will explain more as we run. Let’s go! Hiya!”

Lloyd kicked the horse, and she sped down the hill, entering the Maritz land with much fierceness. And toward the people panic-stricken from the locust plague, Lloyd shouted out the item he had in mind.

“A caldron lid! Give me the biggest one you can find!”

Chapter 105: Captain Frontera (1)

Bzzt! Flutter! Fwoosh! The two sets of wings wrapped with a film fluttered violently. Its 2-foot body flew in the air, riding and gliding along the wind until it hit another locust flying right beside it.

Bzzt! Once the hit knocked the balance off its body, it took a nosedive to the ground, falling and hitting a random branch during its drop.

Thwack! The tree branch swerved as it harshly landed, and this locust, the 86,215th in the entire swarm, shook its body. And as soon as it recovered from the fall, it opened its upper jaw wide and took a bite of the shaking branch in front of it.

Grit! The tree branch was as thick and sturdy as the thigh of an adult, but it was nothing against the locust's powerful jaw. Its husk and body was chopped off with a single bite. However, the locust refused to let go.

Grit! Crunch! Chomp!

It bit and chomped everything in its way. Anything that could be crushed with its jaws was devoured. Just like that, it continued to fill its stomach without a break. The 86,215th locust engulfed the bottom of the branch in no time, and using the trunk of the tree as a spring, it leaped high in the air.

Leap! Bzzzzzzt! It let the wind guide its way. The scenery of the vast eastern range passed beneath its stomach. Looking at the green landscape, the 86,215th locust was reminded of the farther eastern land it had left behind.

Bzzzzzzt! The eastern range was frequently described as a wasteland by people. It was where the 86,215th locust originally lived and hatched out of an egg in the spring. After shedding several times, it passed the larva phase. It was only about one foot long at this time. But one day, the environment started to change around it.

"March!"

The blaring noise of a pipe echoed across the wasteland, and it was instantly followed by a thick cloud of sand. An army of humans appeared amidst the sand. They were holding a torch and wielding it ruthlessly. The locust's antenna got scorched, and it leaped in surprise. The entire swarm started to make way for the west, where the humans were pushing them to. The locust flew westward to survive. The travel went on for a few days, but these humans were equally tenacious. They remained hot on its heels, staying near and wielding their torch. Some of the soldiers chattered, and the locust heard what one of them was saying.

"Centurion, is this going to impact the orc tribes living on the opposite side of the wasteland?"

"Of course. You still don't know it, do you?"

"What do you mean?"

"The new strategy General Mamluk devised."

"What about it?"

"These worthless locusts will wreak havoc in the entire wasteland."

"With what? A swarm of locusts?"

"It's not that simple."

"Then..."

"A swarm of locusts is just the beginning. All the monsters inhabiting the wasteland will be disturbed because of the swarm of these bugs."

"Could it be…?"

"Yes, you are right," acknowledged the centurion as he nodded. "The locusts are voracious. But what do you think there is to eat in the wasteland?"

"Barrel Milk Cactus? Could it really be that?"

“It’s exactly that. The Barrel Milk Cactus is rich in nutrition. In fact, the entire ecosystem in the wasteland depends on them. So, imagine what would happen if the locusts living in the west fly to the areas littered with cacti?”

“They would wipe out all the cactus. The herbivore monsters that eat the cacti and the omnivore monsters alike will experience a food shortage. Am I correct?

“Yes, you’re right. And naturally, all the monsters will flee to the west one by one because that’s where the mountain range is.”

“And at the foot of the mountain lives... the Sand and Steel orc tribe, our target?”

“Now you get it,” the centurion spoke and nodded.

“According to recent sources, the orc tribe has overcome their food shortage problem. They built... a seokbinggo? It’s a pickle for us. The only thing that kept them in check was the food shortage, but with that gone, they’ll soon start to expand in number...”

“It’d pose a great threat to us.”

“You’re right, so we must trample them before they get bigger.”

“Excuse me,” the soldier asked, “but what if the locusts or the monsters travel farther into the west and beyond the range? What should we do?”

“Hmm? Do you mean toward the Magentano Kingdom?” replied the centurion.

“Yes.”

“I don’t know.”

“Excuse me?”

“That’s something the higher-ups should think about, not me. It’s not our problem.”

“Hmm... You’re right...” the soldier quickly agreed.

“We just follow the orders, and that’s it. Like this.”

Blaze! The centurion laughed out loud as he tossed the torch. The 86,215th locust jumped high in surprise. Of course, the locust didn’t comprehend the conversation taking place between the centurion and his assistant in the sultan’s kingdom. And no one in the area had a clue that their current plan resembled the Joseon Dynasty’s cleansing operation against the foreigners in the north. The locust jumped high to avoid the torch, and in all ignorance, it simply flew toward the west.

And at last, it finally found refuge. The whole land teemed with sharp and thorny plants. The Barrel Milk cacti were juicy and sweet. Even though the plant wasn’t its go-to staple, the taste wasn’t so bad. There, the 86,215th locust ate and filled up its stomach to its heart’s content. But its hunger was unquenchable. It wanted to exclusively have the juice of the cacti all to itself, except that it couldn’t. There were too many others gathered up in the area.

Flutter! The fluttering din of the other locusts boomed throughout the land, and as the locusts gathered up in an unimaginable density, the 86,215th locust underwent a change in its body. Its swarm became alarmingly compact, and they were all squished together. This environment prompted the 86,215th locust to experience the same hormonal changes the locusts on earth go through.

Bzzt! Its wings visibly lengthened in just a few days, and its rear legs shortened. The transformation was an inevitable result of the extreme compact space it was in. Its risk of being eaten alive by enemies was lessened now but competition for food increased. As such, its legs needed for escaping predators shortened while its wings necessary for long periods of travel lengthened. At the same time, its body grew double in size. It was the survival of the fittest.

Bzzt! Bzzzzzzt! In no time, its body turned yellow and two-foot in size. The 86,215th locust flew across the sky with its transformed body. It glided over the eastern mountain range along with the others. The antennae fluttered, and it stole a glance at the abundant land of prosperity. Beneath the western mountain range spanned the fiefdom resided by humans. Unlike the thick and bushy woods in the eastern range, there seemed to be no signs of menacing monsters. There was no need for a second thought. Today, that was their place.

Bzzzzzzt! The 86,215th locust let its body fall with the downward air current, and it rode the wind to make a drastic descent. The human residence came close in no time, and it speedily passed the frantic shouts of the orc miners and cut across the paved road. And it charged into the biggest building it could see.

Crash! The window got smashed, and a table was broken as it crashed into the building. Then, it greedily opened its jaw and chomped anything that could be eaten.

Crunch! The edge of the wooden table was torn in one chomp, forcing a panic-stricken shriek out of a maid.

“Arghhhhh!!”

Emily, one of the maids of Marbella Frontera, was a peace-loving girl. Her daily concerns were composed of where to take the baroness for the day or what the lunch menu would be tomorrow. At times, she found satisfaction in the way her knitting was done. She was an ordinary girl like so many others. And so, Emily almost swooned in shock when she laid her eyes on the sudden appearance of a giant locust on the morning dining table.

“Ackkk! Arghhhh!!!!!”

Emily wondered if the locust was a joke of the devil. Or could it be an evil spirit that threw the organism into this world? That was how giant, grotesque, and awful the locust was. But her fear was short-lived.

Crash! Out of nowhere, a wooden chair was wielded down without a tad of hesitation and with much force. The motion held zero mercy, and just like that, the chair hit the edge of the locust's stomach.

Crunch! The chitin skin of the giant locust cracked, and half of its stomach was busted by the chair.

Kiaaaaaah!! The 86,215th locust flailed violently as it made a sharp noise. Its leaking guts smeared on the table as it rubbed the skin of its body hard against the wood. At that moment, the creature heard the sharpest outcry it ever heard from a human.

"Emily! Help me out here! Now!"

It was the baroness. She held up the chair she had brandished and gave a hard, powerful blow. Wham!

This time, it was its chest. A portion of its wings and chest was crushed. The locust opened its upper jaw toward the baroness to end her, but Emily was quick enough to turn the table upside down. Tumble!

Humans possessed a massive amount of strength when faced with a crisis. The strength this 16-year-old girl boasted was too strong for her age. Regardless, thanks to her sudden outburst of power, the baroness was safe. And the locust lost balance and toppled to the ground, and it moved for a second until it died.

Crunch! The chair punished the bug once again, smashing its head. The liquid splattered in all directions, staining the white dress of the baroness. But she remained unmoved and unperturbed, for it was a trivial thing.

"Emily, are you all right?"

"Yes... I am fine, my lady."

"Come, take my hand and follow me."

Their peaceful breakfast time was already ruined. The baroness saw a swarm of locusts blanketing the blue sky from a distance through the broken window. Her hands shook in fear. Grabbing her hands firmly, the baroness ran along the corridor until she met the baron coming in her direction. The baron's face turned ghastly when he saw the locust's bodily fluids smeared all over her dress.

"Marbella! Are you hurt? Is everything okay?" he demanded.

"Yes, I am fine. What about you?"

"I am fine, too," said the baron.

"But you..."

Her gaze moved to his shirt, which was stained with the bug's blood. Not only that, he was holding a sword in his hand. She assumed that he had gone through a similar experience as her.

"Let's move first. Over here."

The baron led the way, sprinting along the corridor. The sound of shattering windows inside the closed doors rang aloud while they ran. And each time, everyone flinched as they all knew what it meant.

What in the world is happening...?

The baron's face went pale as a sheet. A sudden swarm of locusts in the morning? He had never even dreamed of such a thing before. This type of disaster sweeping over the land escaped every bit of his wildest imagination.

I need to quickly gather up the guards.

The baron thought so as he went down the stairs at the end of the corridor. He then came up with various ways to respond to the swarm of bugs.

I need to put up a defense line together with Sir Bayern. Thankfully, the locusts are not as strong as the wild ants. Since my soldiers are well-trained, each can take care of about five or six in a breeze. If we form a file and fight properly without breaking it...

Clack! The baron opened the mansion door, only to be frozen in shock.

What is this...

His face was frozen, and the only thing that moved was his eyes. From left to right, they scanned and processed the situation in front of him by sending the information to his brain. He analyzed the sight and finally came to realize and make sense of the situation.

I know locusts move in swarms... But how can there be this many?

What lay straight ahead was... locusts. They were everywhere in the garden. The flowers the baroness cherished and the trees he personally tended with care were now being eaten up by these bugs. He ballparked the number in the garden, and it easily went over hundreds! And slowly, they turned toward his side in unison.

Bam! The baron slammed the door shut, breaking out in a cold sweat. The shivers felt like an electric shock in his body. His breathing grew raspy.

W-what do I do?

The plan to gather up the soldiers and Sir Bayern evaporated in thin air the moment he laid his eyes on the locusts that took over the garden. When their gazes met him, every plan and operation he had formed prior crumbled to pieces.

This... This is hopeless...

Everything went blank in his head. Nothing popped into his head. The only response he could manage was bolting the door shut. That was all he could think of.

“Dear? How’s the outside situation?”

Marbella asked, and the baron wondered if he should be thankful that she wasn’t allowed a peek at what was happening outside. Should he put on a nonchalant face and suggest hiding in his place? The baron found himself of two minds.

Thwack! Thwack!

The bolted doors jerked like someone was banging it with a large hammer or a voracious beast was chewing the door.

“Arghhhhh!!”

Emily, who was looking around beside them, shrieked aloud, drawing the baron couple to finally see the doors being penetrated by ten upper jaws of the locusts. And when they clamped shut, their teeth bored holes larger than human fists.

“Woah...”

The baron was terrified when he realized what was happening.

The locusts are chomping down the door.

No, to be technically correct, it was the whole house that was being gnawed by the locusts!

“Eek! You bastards!”

The baron wielded his sword at the locusts trying to make their way into the house by eating up the doors. Their bodily fluids splashed in all directions, but two more jumped at the exact spot one locust died. Two died, only for three to jump and eat the doors. The holes started to widen, but the baron’s frantic sword saw no stop. The baroness joined in by grabbing a flower vase. Emily held up a candlestick, crying. At last, the doors finally broke down completely.

Crush! The doors were already breaking as more than 20 locusts latched onto them. As the doors grew smaller in size, the weight of the bugs was too much to bear. And soon enough, the doors crumbled down.

Crash! Snap! As the doors snapped in half, the swarm of locusts entered freely, their eyes glimmering in hunger at the humans.

“Piss off, you pests! Ackk!!”

The baron brandished his sword, but it was pointless. There were just too many bugs. One man’s sword stood no chance against the waves of bugs.

“Move back! Now!”

They retreated, rushing back to the way they came. They went up the stairs, but they could not run beyond the entrance of the second floor.

Crash! Tumble! The doors that lined up the corridor crumbled, broke, and snapped. Locusts flooded out of the broken doors into the corridor. And just like that, the baron couple and Emily were trapped on the stairs by the swarm of menacing pests.

“No... No...”

The baron bit his lip. The baroness held up the vase, and Emily clutched the candlestick in tears. He direly wanted to protect them, but nothing sharp came to his mind. Doom. That was the only thought that overwhelmed him.

“Honey...”

He held out his free hand and tightly held her soft hand. The locusts came closer from both sides. They were drawing near. The baron wondered if he should be thankful that his last moments were with his loving wife. The baron couple shut their eyes amid the despairing romance. The locusts spread their upper jaws toward them. Their rear legs crouched to pounce at the human meal. Just then...

Bong...! Bong...! All of a sudden, the entire place was gripped with a clear, reverberating noise. It sounded like a bell. Or a large cauldron lid. The noise reverberated throughout the land with much intensity. The swarm of locusts stopped dead in their tracks at the noise. At last, the baron couple heard a strangely familiar voice.

“You pests! What do you say? The sound of the cauldron lid is getting you all so excited, right? Isn’t it demanding your attention?!”

Bong! A clear, ringing noise started to come closer. At the same time, a welcoming voice rang even louder in their ears.

“Over here! If you’re enticed, come get me! I am Captain Frontera, you bastards!”

Bong! The majestic sound of the vibration echoed throughout the land, and the baron couple murmured the owner of the voice by reflex.

“Lloyd...?”

Chapter 106: Captain Frontera (2)

Bong! A low, clear reverberation spread across the land, sending a wave of vibration in the air. When it touched the locusts' bodies, it stimulated their auditory organs connected to their chest and rear legs and ultimately tapped their nerve center. When that happened, their nerve center reacted, prompting them to go after the reverberation.

Bzzzzzzt! The 132,645th locust that was about to pounce at the baron paused and loosened the strength in the rear legs. It fixed its posture for attacking and whipped around toward the source of the noise, which was coming from outside.

Jump! The 132,645th locust leaped through the broken window to make its way outside. The others followed suit. Like some invisible, giant power was manipulating them, every locust wheeled around as soon as the first one jumped out the window. They all stampeded to go out before the others, smashing every bit of the remaining windows and denting the windowsills. Each stomped on the other to rush out ahead. And just then, the reverberation stimulated their ears once again. Bong!

What's happening...?

Baron Frontera widened his eyes as the swarm of locusts thundered out of the manor in a flash. He couldn't believe what was happening.

"Arcos, did you hear that?"

The baron turned to his wife at the question.

"I did. There was a voice along with the bonging sound of a bell..."

"Lloyd," Marbella Frontera stated.

The baron and the baroness nodded as they looked at each other. They were sure about it. It was definitely Lloyd, whose voice the two could recognize even in the deepest parts of Hades. The two hurried right after, rushing down the stairs and going past the destroyed entrance. And they sprinted across the empty garden to finally arrive at the main gate that granted them a wider view of the fiefdom. They saw thousands and tens of thousands flying in one direction, pursuing two coursers and their riders ahead of them.

“Lloyd...? Sir Asrahan...?”

The baron and the baroness murmured in fright. Just then, a locust flew past right in front of them to join the rest of its crew. It flew beyond the manor approach and fell on the roof of the only bar in the village. The bar owner shrieked in surprise, but the locust didn’t care and simply leaped high again, finally joining the tens of thousands of its species. This event happened in several parts of the fiefdom.

Bong! The echoing sound came again. A locust eating up some hay in a stable paused and spat it out and rushed toward the sound.

Bong! The low, clear noise came for the second time. The locust about to attack the calf stopped. It then flew outside, giving up the juicy-looking cow meat.

Bong! The reverberation came one more time. The young shepherd crying in fear, the hunter girl protecting her friend, the civil engineer holding his family’s hands and praying, and the young mother protecting her newborn baby all saw the locusts freezing right before pouncing at them. They saw the pests giving up and opening their wings wide to follow the sound. And later, at last, they saw an unimaginable spectacle unfolding in their fiefdom.

Bong! Javier brandished his sword with the cover on, and it hit the cauldron lid, creating a loud banging noise. The dark lid, which was almost 4 feet in diameter, echoed heavily, and Lloyd yelled aloud behind the lid.

“Good! Let’s try it one time!”

Lloyd was on the fast-galloping courser, holding the lid like a shield. Javier was right beside him and gave a full swing of his sword once more when he heard his young master.

Swish! Booong!

Javier hit while Lloyd defended. The sword knocked, and the lid protected. Each time Javier knocked the lid with his sword, he produced a low and clear reverberation around him and attracted a larger swarm of locusts. But they weren't being encircled by the throng of bugs, thanks to the magic spell that made the horses very fast.

"All right! Hahaha! Herding is what makes hunting trash mobs so fun!"

"What's a trash mob?!" Javier shouted.

"Don't worry about it! One more time!"

"Yes, Young Master!"

Sprint! Booong!

They produced a reverberating noise in front of the swarm, and the size of the locust swarm continued to blow up as it chased after them. A soft smile spread across Lloyd's face.

Great. Everything is going according to plan.

The plague of locusts swarmed around him, and his operation was working very well. Lloyd called to mind the story in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

The description was about the orc tribe in the eastern wasteland.

In the novel, orcs lived off hunting monsters, but the hunting didn't always end up with a bang. There were multiple instances when they went hungry. And orcs had a plethora of methods they used for survival when the stored food emptied out. One of them was producing a low, clear echo using a gong in the middle of the wasteland.

I think it was this kind of echo that attracted the swarm of locusts inhabiting the wasteland. The novel described that the wavelength produced by the bonging sound is similar to the sound they make to call their partners during mating season.

Lloyd decided to trust his memory and give it a try. That way, he thought, it could bring the locusts into one place.

I should gather them all in one place and kill them in a single strike. If not, I'd have to whack all of those bugs dead one by one. Not a single blade of grass would remain in the barony before I get the chance to do that anyway.

Any other method would lead everything in the fiefdom to be eaten up. The grass, the house, and the people. Everything. It would be a wretched end for Lloyd as well. So, he wanted to avoid this sad fate as much as possible. Before such a fate became his, he had to efficiently kill all the locust swarms, and he could do so only by gathering them up in one place.

That's what herding the trash mob is all about. Like this!

Slash! Javier swung down his sword sheath, and Lloyd protected the blow with the lid.

Bong!

Ouch...

Javier must have struck down with too much power. Lloyd's hand and arm went numb as the powerful vibration and shock traveled through his whole body. It felt as though he was on a New Year's bell that people rang to announce the first day of the year. Or it felt as though he was tightly hugging a concert mega woofer speaker like a pillow. His stomach churned a little bit.

"Hey?" Lloyd called.

Lloyd peeked through the edge of the lid, and he stared at Javier with a straight face.

"I'm starting to notice that your emotions are leaking into your strikes."

"Excuse me? I'm not sure what you mean."

Javier, who was lying flat in line with the horse's head, glanced at Lloyd's side and quirked his head in confusion.

"I am simply and dutifully doing what you tasked me to do."

"Ah, is that so?"

"Yes, like this."

Fwish! Booong!

Ouch!!

His stomach churned once more, and Lloyd narrowed his eyes to slits.

"I think your swing has gotten stronger."

"Well, that's because the harder I hit, the louder the echo will be and the more locusts will swarm."

"Is that so? How about we switch? You hold the lid," suggested Lloyd.

"Why?"

"I think I can strike harder with the triple mana blast."

"I refuse."

"Why?"

"I like the way it is now."

Fwish! Booong!

Another blow. It was stronger this time. Lloyd's face crumpled as much as the blow, but it was equally effective. The locusts began to pursue them with more tenacity.

Okay, the operation is working successfully.

In all honesty, Lloyd had been uncertain about the plan, but it was turning out smoothly. He felt like he had become Peter Piper.

“Okay. Now! One more time!”

Lloyd happily held the lid and defended Javier’s blow. Who hits who didn’t matter right now. Lloyd was ready to get hit hundreds and thousands of times.

As long as the fiefdom is safe, this is nothing!

And if this assured him a happy life of retirement, he was ready to take all of it. Resolving such, Lloyd quickly surveyed his surroundings.

Great. The rounding-up is taking place very nicely. Now, I need to minimize as much damage as I can.

Rounding up the locusts was essential to the plan’s success, and it was going very well. Now, it was time to expand the range. He had to round up as many locusts as possible. That was how he would be able to take care of the locusts in one stroke.

“All right! Let’s run one lap like this! Around the outside perimeter of the fiefdom!”

“Yes, Young Master.”

The two guided the horses to the outskirts of the fiefdom, galloping along the main road. They removed themselves from the central village and passed the villages, paddies, fields, and fruit gardens. And the bonging noise from the lid continued to echo aloud. Everywhere the two went, they attracted a new set of locusts. From 50,000 locusts, the number reached 200,000 now. But it kept growing and growing. Lloyd, however, wasn’t satisfied with it.

“To the south!”

Right after Lloyd succeeded in rounding up the trash mobs after a lap around the fiefdom outskirts, he proceeded to point to the south where the Maritz land stood. No, he was actually pointing the land beyond the Maritz land.

“We’re moving up to the viscounty. Make sure to follow me!”

“Yes, Young Master.”

A soft glimmer appeared in Javier’s eyes. Lacona Viscounty? It was a bit of a surprise.

Is he trying to help out there as well?

The viscounty was on bad terms with the barony. No, it wasn’t just bad. The two were practically enemies. But come to think of it, Javier thought the residents there were innocent people.

Master Lloyd must have first thought about the safety of the residents and put behind his inconsequential resentment against Viscount Lacona.

Javier nodded. It was obviously the case. If the barony was under attack by the locusts, the same fate would await the Lacona viscounty as it sits right beside the barony. People there would be suffering from the plague that appeared out of the blue. Javier never thought that far. He looked back at Lloyd, his gaze mixed with admiration.

Just then, a new message appeared in front of Lloyd.

Ding Dong.

[Javier Asrahan is touched by your righteous action.]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by three points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: +8]

[You have earned 54 RP by improving your relationship with the main character.]

[Current RP: 4083]

Huh. Righteous action?

Lloyd couldn’t help but smile in a wry way. Javier must have misread his gesture.

I’m not going there for righteous reasons.

Sure, he was going there to help. But not because he felt pitiful or sorry for the people there. It wasn’t due to an overwhelming sense of righteous indignation either. There was only one reason behind his move to the viscounty: to protect his cash cow.

The water bill! I can only receive it if the viscounty is safe!

If the viscounty went under, his efforts to install the waterway would go down the drain. He had decades' worth of water bills to collect from the viscount, and that would be gone if the cash cow died. Such an unfortunate event had to be prevented at all costs. And from the perspective of clearing the locust swarm, his decision was obvious.

If I leave the locusts in the viscounty, my barony will receive collateral damage anyway.

They could target the barony after annihilating the viscounty. So, to exterminate them to the hilt, he had to clear both those in the barony and viscounty.

“So let’s go now! Faster now! Hah!”

Lloyd prompted the horse and tightened the muscle in his hand that grabbed the lid. The magic in the horse became more powerful.

Clip clop! Clip clop!

They approached the outskirts of the viscounty. They were right. The same hell had broken loose in the viscounty. The entire land was swathed with giant locusts. People’s panicked screams and the locusts’ wings produced a symphony of chaos throughout the area.

“Let’s go! Hah!”

Lloyd kicked the side of the horse. He and Javier charged without hesitation. They jumped over the main road, passed the village, and cut across the entire viscounty. Javier and Lloyd continued to produce the bonging noise. The guards fighting till they bled, the farmers and wives on the run, the crying boys and girls, and the babies smiling at the locust trying to eat her... Everyone heard the reverberating sound at the critical moment. They were saved by the echo Lloyd and Javier created.

Bzzzz...! Hundreds of thousands of locusts covering the viscounty flew high in the air, and they left behind their prey and began chasing Lloyd and Javier. Rounding up these pests in this area was a success as well.

“All right! Now we return to the barony!”

They rushed forward with a track of 500,000 locusts behind them. This procession was all devised and premeditated.

The Maritz Wetland. The river embankment. We just need to get there.

Lloyd thought about the stand-by point where he placed Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang. The place Lloyd had designated. The Extermination Zone. That was where he would exterminate every locust, booking them a ticket to discuss their afterlife with Hades.

Chapter 107: Captain Frontera (3)

Crackle!

“…!”

Suddenly, there came a violent rustling noise ahead. Lloyd ducked down.

Scratch! A leg of the locust brushed his nape. It burned. He wondered if his skin was torn by the claw. But Lloyd didn’t have the mind to give thought to such an inconsequential matter. There were hundreds and thousands of swarms of locusts coming into his view straight ahead.

“Dammit.”

Lloyd thought he was doing a good job at rounding up these bugs. He had carefully designed the route to make sure that most of them would follow from behind, not the front.

I knew the range was just too wide. They’re practically all over the barony and viscounty.

And so, some of the locusts still managed to fly at them from the front, even with the well-planned route. The problem here was that “some” meant hundreds and thousands.

“Master Lloyd, please brace yourself.”

A plague of locusts swarmed from the sky toward them, their flapping wings sounding like thunder. Javier’s solid voice was heard amid such. A corner of Lloyd’s lips lifted upward.

“Oh... Come on. I’m not ready yet.”

He was far from ready. After all, he was no hero. He was no courageous warrior in a storybook. As such, hundreds and thousands of giant locusts hurtling toward him with such hostility was not something he enjoyed.

I feel like I’m going to lose it!

Bugs were repulsive. He always hated bugs, but his hatred worsened when he lived in a small dorm room. The thing was that his dorm wasn’t those trendy, modern studio-type rooms. It was dilapidated, old, and rotten. Cockroaches and centipedes appeared so often that they sickened him. After a while, the sight of anything with more than six legs disturbed him. And now...

I have to run into hundreds and thousands of locusts that are the size of a dog. This is nuts. It really is!

For a split second, Lloyd considered calling it quits and leaving the fiefdom. Just turn back and head to the capital and beg the queen to give any work to him. But he soon realized that he didn’t have any time for reveries. It was already too late to run away. The locusts were nearing ahead, and Lloyd was galloping right into them!

“Oh, damn it! The problem is me!”

Whatever happened, happened. Lloyd brought the caldron lid in front of him.

Thwack! Clack! Twang! A series of hits banged against the lid, but they weren’t any ordinary blows.

Argh!

Blows, incomparably more forceful than Javier’s hits, came in dozens. There was no surprise here. Lloyd was on the enchanted courser, and she was easily traveling over 60 miles per hour. Moreover, a hefty locust weighing several pounds was flying from the opposite direction and rushing toward him with immense speed.

Compute the impact of the caldron received by each blow... My ass! Save me!

Thud! Twang! His arms slowly went numb, and shoulders trembled. He felt like his back was about to snap and legs were about to fold. If it weren't for the triple circles that fueled him, he would have already toppled to the bottom.

And if I fall, thousands of locusts will fight to take a bite of me!

Shiver.

With that thought in mind, Lloyd barely held on with a struggle. Javier, too, was of great help.

"Turn your head this way! Run parallel to me, so you can follow the route even without your vision! And hold your lid slantwise! You cannot take the full impact! You must let it flow off!"

The fluttering of their wings sounded like hundreds of electric fans whizzing all at once. When Lloyd heard Javier, he obeyed immediately, tilting the lid diagonally. This slightly lessened the blow sent to the lid, and Lloyd was able to somewhat breathe.

How's Javier holding up?

Lloyd was now curious how Javier was enduring when he didn't have the lid. His voice seemed all right. And when Lloyd turned around, he saw...

Ziiing! Slash! Fwoosh!

Running right beside Lloyd, Javier and his horse were enveloped with a brilliant ray of aura.

How can a human wield a sword like that?

Swoosh! Slash! The sword igniting with aura danced, slashing, and slicing through the space. Everything in its way was slashed. Everything that rushed at it was cut to pieces.

It looks like he's swinging ten electric fly swatters at once.

Lloyd was impressed. Javier brandished his sword at a transcending speed, creating a storm of aura as he hit directly against the locust swarm. He was chopping away every single one of them, and whenever he saw a chance, he even used the mana blast at Lloyd's side.

Wham! Boom!

Each time he blasted the mana, he shot three or four shots together. His moves weren't random. The angle and route of his blasts were carefully calculated, and the distance was closely adjusted, intersected, and overlapped. The blasts had a narrow and long path to follow. Javier shot, making sure that the range was widened with maximum effectiveness.

Thwack! It was a regular blast, but it was as powerful as Lloyd's triple mana blasts. It appeared that Javier's was more efficient when it came to strength consumption.

I don't know, should I call this a 2+1 mana blast? As I thought, what a monster.

Even so, the locusts kept rushing at them from the front. Lloyd ducked a little lower, and he encouraged his courser.

"Hold up just a little more! You can do it!"

Neigh!

Lloyd was grateful for his horse, who was faithfully galloping even when she was going out of breath. Had it not been for the magic spell on the animal, he wouldn't have been able to even attempt this kind of plan.

"Let's go!"

She moved as if she became one with Lloyd.

Clip clop! The horse wasn't galloping ahead like a fool. Sometimes, she accelerated and turned just in time. A slight twist to the left to push to the right. She avoided, fought, and leaped above the incoming bugs. She even took into consideration the wind, noise, and other threats. Lloyd reacted as well, reading every movement around him, and he began to get the hang of it.

“Like this!”

Thud! Lloyd brandished the lid hard, knocking the incoming locust charging from above. It bounced to collide with another and plunged to the ground. The horse trampled and instantly killed it with her hooves. Just like that, Lloyd penetrated the throng of bugs ahead of him. Of course, the swarm of locusts continued to pursue him from behind. He estimated the number to be hundreds of thousands. Javier’s aura or mana blast or even his triple mana blast wouldn’t do. Chills ran down his spine when he thought so.

“Keep running! Hah!”

Lloyd galloped in full vigor. They were now out of the viscounty territory, and they made for the north. Familiar paths and terrains came into his view. The land that was once a wetland. The land that was now reclaimed by the collective efforts of everyone. The Maritz Wetlands.

“Over the hill and to the waterway embankment!”

That was where the Extermination Zone Lloyd made was. They had to hold on just until they arrived there. Just then...

Neigh...

“Huh?”

The courser, who was galloping just fine until now, started to slow down. Surprised, Lloyd examined the animal.

“Hey?”

Neigh! Neigh! Huff!

There was foam around the horse’s mouth. She, however, seemed to be trying hard not to give up.

She’s tired.

Even the best horse had her limit. Magic didn’t come without limits.

Well, it makes sense. She’s been galloping since dawn. And she never took a single break while getting to the fiefdom.

And right after she arrived at the barony, she had to run full-speed to round the pests up. She lapped around the outskirts of the barony once before running to and around the viscounty. And during those times, she never slowed down. She ran like someone running a marathon at the speed an athlete runs for a 100-yard dash.

Did I overwork her so much that not even magic can help her anymore? What should I do?

Lloyd glanced beside him to check if Javier’s horse was all right. The same thing was happening there. Her speed had visibly slowed down. And her legs weren’t stretching far anymore. She would definitely collapse if he pushed her more.

We should get off before that happens.

Right now, they were being chased by hundreds and thousands of locusts. The horses would collapse and fall if Lloyd stubbornly pushed them to move ahead by a few yards. The unprepared fall might even lead to serious injuries on Lloyd and Javier’s parts.

It’d be a total loss for everyone. That’s not good.

Javier must have read Lloyd’s thoughts. Or it could be that he noticed the fatigue in the horse. Javier sent a similar meaningful gaze to Lloyd. Their eyes met, and their exchange was done.

We get off here.

Yes.

Twup! There was no reason to hesitate. Lloyd placed his hand on the horse saddle, jumped with his two feet, and flung his body high.

“Make sure you are safe out there! Don’t let your guard down because you’re somewhat safe. Make sure you go far!” Lloyd shouted.

Slap!

“Neigh!”

Lloyd slapped the buttock of the horse to thank her for her service. Suddenly feeling light all of a sudden, she charged forward after giving a neigh. She disappeared in a flash. By the time Lloyd landed, she was already 21 yards away from him.

“...”

Goodness... That horsey looks so alive and well the moment I get off. Lloyd instantly removed his doubt because he had to run now. Plus, he was getting near the Extermination Zone in the Maritz Wetland.

“By the way, what are you doing?” Lloyd asked as he turned to the side.

Javier held up his sword, and his eyes glimmered with resolution.

“Master Lloyd, go first. I will protect the route here.”

Swish! An aura appeared as soon as he finished his resolution. It started to spiral around his sword. This was the brilliance only sword masters who reached the mastery of sword fighting could muster. The brilliant sword of the knight protected his lord, reputation, and vow. Javier turned his back against Lloyd, showing his back brimming with determination. With bravery, he confronted the menacing procession of locusts. Lloyd’s heart started to race. And he wielded his hand just as his heart pounded. Then, he slapped the back of Javier’s head.

“Have you lost your mind? Are you planning to fight those things right now?” Lloyd gaped.

“Master Lloyd? Why did you just…”

“Protect the route, my foot! Are you saying I should run away and leave you here to die? Come, carry me now!”

“Carry you, Master Lloyd?”

“Now! We don’t have time!”

The distance between them and the locusts was now 100 feet. Lloyd loudly yelled, pushing Javier, and without waiting for an answer, he jumped and got on Javier’s back.

“Run!”

“...”

Javier grimaced for a moment. But he instantly understood the meaning of his young master.

I see. He made a practical decision.

Jump! Javier turned around and started to run, charging straight ahead with Lloyd on his back. Now, Lloyd started to bang the lid with his fist.

Bong! The reverberation stimulated the locusts once more, pushing them to pursue him harder. Now, the distance between the two grew closer. 80 feet.

“Master Lloyd, did you hint at me to get off after you calculated the whole thing?” Javier asked as he maintained the speed.

“What do you mean ‘calculated’?” asked Lloyd.

“Getting on my back,” Javier said.

“Of course.”

Lloyd scoffed behind Javier’s back.

“I don’t run fast. I may be faster than ordinary people, but I am not confident I can outrun the locusts. But you are different. You are fast.”

“But with you on my back, I cannot ascertain that I will succeed. You could have easily run away if I stopped them in the front,” Javier reasoned.

“I’m doing this because I don’t want that.”

“...”

“Come on. Do you have some fantasy to become a hero in your head? Why do you keep trying to die so often? You did this back in Cremo as well.”

“...”

“Let’s just stretch the idea, and you leave behind so awesomely and die. And I live because of your sacrifice. You think that would make me feel good? Huh?”

“Master Lloyd...”

“I don’t want that. So run faster. Come on! Giddy up!”

Slap!

“Please don’t treat me like a horse.”

“I’m just paying you back,” Lloyd said.

“Paying me back? What do you mean.?”

“The ant cave. After the explosion. Our escape. Does it ring a bell?”

“...”

“I got you on my back and walked out. Remember what you were like?”

“I can’t remember.”

“Aha. Really? That’s too bad. I remember it all,” Lloyd said.

“...”

“Anyway, let’s leave this place together alive. It won’t be right if one stays and dies while the other runs away and lives. It’s also just unfair.”

“...”

Lloyd Frontera. Javier wondered how much truth was in his words. Sometimes, no, most of the time, the young master puzzled him. But he knew one thing for sure. He wanted to get out of this place alive together.

“I like the sound of that.”

Leap! He leaped higher. The distance between them and the locust was 65 feet. But Javier didn’t look back. He knew he should spend his energy and time to sprint harder instead. Every fiber of being focused on staying alert and not losing balance. He activated an endless circulation of manaheart. And he transferred the amplification of the triple circle to this circulation.

Fwoosh! Javier forced his tired leg to use every last strength it had. He imbibed his tenacious resolution in his raspy breath. Javier ran against the wind and crossed the hills. The locusts were now just 32 feet away. The flapping of their wings sounded terrifying in Javier’s ears. And straight ahead, just about 100 feet away, was the Extermination Zone.

“Fiver more steps!”

A shout was heard from his back, prompting him to take five more steps. His fifth step was taken with the son of the lord on his back. He took his fourth to actualize Lloyd’s words and make it out alive together. His third step was to push himself until the end. His second to maintain his focus. Last...

“Jump to the side!”

Leap! Javier reacted instantly, and he jumped and flung his body to the side, falling flat on the waterway. Now what, Javier wondered. Just then, he felt Lloyd grabbing the back of his head.

“Get down!”

Lloyd’s hand pressed down Javier’s head, and he obeyed and ducked down. There was a distance of 15 feet between them and the locusts. And then, Javier saw...

“Bangul!”

Jingle! Jingle! He saw the fat, rattling tail of Bangul as she emerged from the woods with a jingling noise. He saw the storm of explosion coming out of her.

Boooom The volcanic blast, whose power Javier had never seen before, burned and engulfed the incoming locust swarm.

Chapter 108: Saved by the Bell (1)

Slump! A locust reaching up to two feet tall fell to the ground, all burned and sooted like a lump of charcoal. The bug obviously didn't move. It was already dead, so there was no resistance. It remained immobile and frozen even when a farmer, who was yawning in fatigue, leisurely raked its body.

Yawn.

Crunch! Crash!

One raking motion caught three or four locusts at once. Every single one was burnt like coal, and they swept into a mountainous pile.

"Whew. This is a lot."

Sir Bayern, the senior knight of the barony, encouraging the clean-up, shuddered. They were creepily large in number, which he had felt the previous night when the pests swarmed into the place.

Still, it's a relief that almost no one got hurt.

Sir Bayern recalled the previous morning. It was a normal morning. He had woken up like any other day, washed his face, and hurried to his morning training. It was right after he stepped outside his house that he heard the scary, booming noise from the eastern sky.

I had never seen anything like it before.

A plague of locusts had swarmed and blackened the sky, covering the sun and clouds. The whole surrounding was dim as if it was nighttime. The mere thought of it brought chills to his spine.

It felt like the end of the world.

He was flustered. No, he was scared. A part of him wished to leave everything behind, head back to the house, hide in the deepest corner of the attic, and stay there. But he was the senior knight of the Frontera barony. Though he was way behind Javier in terms of sword fighting, the responsibility to command the civil engineer corp and guards fell on his shoulders. The sense of responsibility felt more real in a disaster like yesterday's. He rushed to the barony manor instead of locking himself up in the house. He meant to assemble the engineers and guards and fight back. But it turned out to be difficult.

I was surrounded by the locust swarm before I could even run 200 yards.

Dozens of locusts came at him, and still, he brandished his sword amid the chaos. It was the worst battle he had experienced. He started to grow tired. The sword felt heavy in his hands, and his legs slowed. The end seemed near for him. What a meaningless death, he had thought to himself. Incapable of protecting anybody. Failed responsibilities. Death in the throng of bugs. Just then, an unexpected reverberation started to drum in his ears.

It was Master Lloyd.

Sir Bayern lifted his head and gazed toward the embankment. A man supervising the clean-up efforts stood there. It was the eldest son of his lord, Lloyd Frontera.

I'd have died if it weren't for him.

He was certain about that. If the echo didn't interfere with the bugs just then, he would have perished for sure. If Master Lloyd didn't knock the lid and lure the locusts away, his body would have been ripped apart alive.

It wasn't just me.

Countless people throughout the fiefdom went through the same thing. The wetland migrants piling the locust carcasses, the civil engineers fatigued from the clean-up, and their families would have kicked the bucket if it weren't for Master Lloyd. Sir Bayern was sure about that. At that moment...

"I think we can call it a day."

A voice was abruptly heard beside him. Sir Bayern flinched at the noise, so he turned to the side.

“Why? Do you wish to work more?”

“...”

Lloyd, who was on the embankment, was walking over to him before he knew it. The young master must have come while he was in a daze. Thinking such, he cleared his throat.

“Master Lloyd, if you wish to, I shall extend the clean-up.”

“You want to do more? But the sun is setting,” Lloyd insisted.

“I am at your disposal,” Sir Bayern stated.

“Yeah? Okay. Let’s work through the night until the sun rises tomorrow morning. And while we’re at it, let’s take it up a notch and finish it quickly.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Sir Bayern nodded, and he immediately turned to call the soldiers in higher ranks. But he couldn’t do so because Lloyd cut in first before he could call them.

“Woah there. Are you for real? Are you serious about the overnight job?” Javier asked in disbelief.

“Yes,” Sir Bayern replied.

“Wait, because I said so?”

“Yes.”

“No, no. You can’t let them work overnight so easily.”

“Then does that mean you are canceling the overnight job?”

“Of course.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

“...”

Woah. Lloyd chuckled because he couldn’t believe how faithful and headstrong the knight was.

Yes, Sir Bayern was this type of man.

In the novel, there were only two knights that didn’t betray the barony even though it was on the brink of collapse. The first was Javier, and the other knight was Sir Bayern, who didn’t appear very much in the story because he was only a secondary character.

Faithfulness and loyalty. These two words were all that described him.

Those two sides of him were more than enough. His loyalty ensured that he stood by his lord, the baron. And his faithfulness pushed him to strive till he achieved the mission entrusted to him. To capitalize on such fortes, Lloyd tasked him with the job of supervising and overseeing the ondol project early on. And he had been faithfully completing the construction projects without anything amiss.

But if I could point out one shortcoming, it’d be that he’s too serious.

Balanced resistance and snobbery. Those were the qualities Javier possessed that amused Lloyd whenever he teased the latter. But Sir Bayern didn’t have them. Feeling the wistfulness in his heart, Lloyd cleared his throat and spoke.

“You did a good job today. It’s not like we can clean that up in a day or two. There are just too many. Since the sun is setting soon, let’s call it a day.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Sir Bayern signaled the high-ranking soldiers, and the rest of the men cheered and organized the tools. Everyone was exhausted after spending the entire day cleaning up the burned locusts. But they didn’t leave for their homes right away. Before they hurried back to the barracks, they came to Lloyd’s side and stood in one line. And they shouted...

“We thank you, Master Lloyd!”

“Haha...? What are you all doing?”

This situation, where a bunch of grown men were coming together to thank him, flustered Lloyd a bit. But when he looked at their eyes, he was able to feel the sincerity in them.

“Are you thanking me because I saved you yesterday?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes!” They shouted in unison again.

“Woah. Forget it. I just fought hard for my retirement!”

“...”

“So, if you want to give thanks to me, then go ahead. But next time, you might want to give me a bag full of gold coins instead of shouting your gratitude. Got it?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes!”

He felt a bit embarrassed in front of their sincerity. That was why he had blurted out a nasty response, and even so, the soldiers shouted yes and went away.

Did I go overboard last night?

As Lloyd walked alone from the Maritz Wetlands to his manor, he couldn’t help but chuckle. The more he recalled what he had done in this part of the land, the louder his chuckle became. Just then, one moment of great urgency came to his mind. The final moment when he was luring the locusts to the Extermination Zone.

Bzzzzt!

The violent din of wings fluttering right behind terrified Lloyd, causing him to break out in a cold sweat. He shouted to jump to the side, and Javier immediately reacted. Carried on his back, Lloyd was flung to the side into the waterway. Lloyd then stretched his hand immediately and pressed Javier’s head down, and covered them with the lid.

Bzzzzt!

The eerie sound of the flapping wings hovered over them. There were too many for them to count. So many that their noises mixed and jumbled altogether. Like TV crackling in gray screen, they roared, except that the volume was that of 100 concert speakers blaring aloud. Lloyd’s heart pounded in a frenzy. Now’s the time, Bangul! Lloyd shouted internally. Just then, Bangul responded.

“Bangul!”

Boooom! A thundering noise boomed across the sky. The explosion fired at the locusts.

Kaboom! The volcanic explosion skill was activated, and it was followed by a terrible shockwave. A heatwave reaching over 1,500 °F was discharged, and bits of magna stormed straight ahead at 250 miles per hour. It rampaged and swept everything that existed within the range. The radiation scorched everything that was within a couple hundreds of feet. Only two people could remain safe in that distance.

“Duck down! Lower!” Lloyd shouted.

They further lowered their body to the waterway of the field. And the lid on them protected most of the heat charging down from the sky. And the rest was absorbed and discharged through the Asrahan Core Technique. They were able to survive one volcanic storm like this. Then, Lloyd rose up.

“Now! Hit it!”

Thud! The two sprang to their feet. Lloyd held up the lid while Javier lifted his sword.

Booong! The sword hit the lid, spreading the low, clear echo across the site. And the walls and hot air surrounding them amplified the echo to spread faster, stimulating the locusts who froze at the sudden explosion. It allured them and drew them near.

Bzzzt! The locusts started to move again like hungry predators.

“Good! Let’s try it one more time!”

Booong! Another bong reverberated in the air, and hundreds and thousands of pairs of wings flew near them in greed. At that moment, Lloyd and Javier lowered their bodies deep into the waterway. Then, another explosion boomed near them.

“Bangul!”

Boooom! Trillions of tiny glass shards as hot as 1,500 °F swept the entire sky at the speed of 250 miles per hour. The awful radiation and fierce shockwave blasted everything within dozens of yards. The second explosion brought more than 10,000 locusts to be scorched to death. Bangul prepared for the third shot.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

She widened her big mouth, and Ppodong fiercely dug up the soil to throw them into Bangul’s mouth right away. Once it was eaten and digested, a reload was complete for the third explosion.

“Ready!”

Booong! The reverberation, frenzied locusts, and loud signal.

“Now!“

Boooom! Fire, eat soil, hit the lid, attract, and fire. The rampage cycle was ruthless, devised for complete extermination. On top of that, Hamang joined in and threw a trap.

“Hamang, now!”

“Hamang!”

Gulp! Gulp! Splash! Hamang, who was standing by, jumped into the river across the embankment and started gulping the water, taking in as much as he could. He then lifted his head and sprayed the water high in the sky as far as he could manage. More than 25,000 gallons of water flooded the sky like a torrential pour, attacking the locusts that were about to run away from the continuous explosions. Once the water soaked their wings and dropped them to the ground, Lloyd jumped up, and Javier drew his sword. A second later, the ground shook from the west.

“Here! Do not forget our spears and knives!”

Clip clop! Gallop! 500 cavalry knights armored in white appeared in their view. The white cavalry the queen had promised finally arrived. They charged like a tsunami, stretching out the lance in shiny white. They swept the locusts lying on the ground, penetrated them with their lances, and pierced far into the rear file of the locust swarm. And later, Lloyd and Javier’s shovel and sword glinted.

Kaboom!

Lloyd’s triple mana blast. Javier’s series of delicate mana blasts. The destructive mana storm swept the locust swarm. The fear quickly spread among the bugs like a disease. They expanded their wings wide and flew high to escape. And once again, Bangul fired another shot of the volcanic explosion to welcome those that flew in the air.

“Bangul!”

Boooom! Volcanic ash adorned the fiefdom sky like a mushroom cloud.

It was such a spectacular day.

His past day had been filled with tense and suspenseful moments. If a pest control company employee was there to witness the events, they would have sent a tearful standing ovation for their extermination method.

It's a relief that it worked.

Everyone was able to live because Lloyd's operation and bold execution worked perfectly like magic. The fiefdom was saved from the crisis as well. With that, Lloyd jostled himself out of his own reverie as he walked. Around the time the sunset disappeared on the horizon, he arrived at the barony. The manor was in a hot mess because it had been chewed and bitten all over the place. It looked like a pair of ripped jeans that had been badly torn by a grouchy fashion designer.

"It is a relief that the building didn't collapse. If the young master arrived any time later, this manor would have crumbled to ruins."

A clear voice spoke when Lloyd was staring at the house at length. Lloyd found that a maid was standing at the main gate. He ballparked her age. 15 or 16. The freckles on her face made her stand out. Lloyd remembered that she mainly served the baroness.

"Emily?" Lloyd said as he remembered her name.

"Yes, Young Master. The baroness sent me to escort you to the dining room once you arrive."

"Sure, yes."

Lloyd wasn't sure why she was so happy. He wondered if she was pleased to escort him. Emily's face was filled with a smile, so Lloyd found her a bit uncomfortable to be around.

I can never get used to this kind of treatment.

He had never been welcomed like this back in South Korea, particularly after his parents passed away. But this world was different. Everyone called him “Young master” wherever he went. They sent gazes of reverence and gratitude, saying that Lloyd saved them and the fiefdom. Everyone was the same as this smiling and cheerful girl who turned around to steal a glance at Lloyd at times as she walked ahead of him.

“Actually, young master,” Emily said.

“Huh?” Lloyd replied.

“I started to knit something today,” confessed Emily.

“Knit? What knitting?”

“You know, cross-stitching.”

“Oh, okay.”

“I plan to stitch something awesome.”

“Ah, is that so?” Lloyd spoke in an indifferent manner.

“Yes. Something really awesome. The most awesome thing I’ve ever seen.”

“Um, I wonder how awesome it is.”

“The sight of you risking your life for everyone,” she finally said, blushing.

“Woah...”

Lloyd almost burst into an endless cough. But Emily seemed clueless to it as she merely continued to speak in a feeble and soft manner.

“To be honest, I was very scared,” she confessed.

“Yeah, you were?”

“Yes. I thought I was going to die. Right here, at the top of the stairs.”

“Here?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes. I was surrounded by the locusts.”

“You must have wanted to faint,” Lloyd added.

“That was when you showed up,” Emily said, almost choking in admiration.

“Hey... I’m hungry. Let’s move faster.”

Lloyd felt like he was about to die of embarrassment. He quickened his steps to walk ahead of Emily and enter the dining room first.

But before he could do so, Emily interrupted, “So, young master....”

Her voice was a grip that clutched at his sleeves. And she bowed right away before he had the chance to say anything.

“Thank you.”

“...”

“You saved me. Thank you. You saved my younger brother, grandma, and everyone else. You’re our lifesaver, young master.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes. I hope you enjoy your dinner.”

“Yes, thank you.”

Lloyd was at a loss in front of such heartfelt, sincere gratitude. Emily ran away, all blushing and red after she was done speaking. Lloyd put on a wry smile as he looked at her back. Just then...

Chapter 109: Saved by the Bell (2)

[You have shown heroic courage and determination by risking your life for the Frontera barony and Lacona viscounty.]

[For that, the people of the two fiefdoms are touched and praise you very much.]

[You have earned a new title.]

“...”

Hmm... Finally, Lloyd thought to himself. When the message appeared in front of him, he perused the message without a show of surprise.

I suppose I saw this coming.

He had gotten quite used to receiving messages in moments like these, so he expected this to happen from the second he started to exterminate the locusts.

This was the perfect time for a new title.

He had risked his life and saved the fiefdom. Therefore, it would be only upsetting if a new title didn’t come out. In fact, it was the reason why he had paraded around hollering that he was Captain Frontera and saving everyone.

Otherwise, no one is going to know who came to save them. Why bother accomplishing anything if no one is going to acknowledge me?

The importance of PR could not be emphasized enough in an age like this. Thinking such, Lloyd studied the message that continued to pop up.

Ding Dong.

[A new title <Bell Saver> has been created.]

[Bell Saver]

[Title Level: Regional talk]

Murky clouds covered the eastern sky. Carrying an apocalypse, they flew. Livestock perished, houses crushed. Humans weeped, swords snapped. When death neared everyone. When two fiefdoms despaired as one. A bell tolled aloud in unison. Bong. The livestock was saved. Bong. The people woke up. Bong. Hope was alive. That's why we shall chant out for our savior.

[Compliment Effect: The Frontera barony and Lacona viscounty, who have undergone the attack of the plague of locusts, will consider you as their lifesaver throughout your lifetime. Moreover, every form of insect monster instinctively will fear you and get discouraged when they see you.]

[Title Region: Frontera barony and Lacona viscounty.]

[Active Period of Title: 110 Years.]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region where the compliment was given. Moreover, the time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 3]

[Current CP: 2]

Woah.

Bell Saver. Its effect was as grand as the name sounded.

Does this mean that I became the most respected hero in the region?

That wasn't all.

To summarize its effects, I can automatically discourage insect monsters.

Come to think of it, this optional skill was awesome. The description didn’t even mention any limits on things like the size of the monster.

This means that there are no conditions attached to it whether it’s the size or whatever else. Anything that’s shaped similarly to an insect will be affected by it. So, this means that something like the Gigatitan that I had fought back in Cremo would be scared and shy away from me if we met eyes.

If he was in the modern world, pest companies would have paid big bucks to hire him. Nonetheless, its effect was going to come in handy in many ways in this world as well.

I’ve had a lot of unlucky experiences with insect monsters.

He really did. The wild ants, the Gigatitan, and the locust swarm... Each and every single monster was yet another great crisis to overcome. But if he had held the title back when he was fighting them, victory would have come easily. He wouldn’t have had to risk his life so many times.

And I think it’d be very useful for catching mosquitoes in the middle of the night.

That might be the sweetest take away from the title. Lloyd closed the message window as he grinned contently. He looked across his table, where the baron and baroness were enjoying dinner. The two appeared to be happy, basking in the peaceful dinner. Understandably so. The fiefdom had faced an unprecedented disaster, and it was overcome by their heroic son. How could they not be happy? How could they not be satisfied? Lloyd could easily understand the baron and the baroness. But it didn’t mean that preparation for other possible future attacks wasn’t necessary. And so...

“Um, I am sorry to say this to you right now, but it won’t end with this,” announced Lloyd.

Lloyd spoke with an empty salad plate in front of him. The happy conversation between the baron and baroness ceased right away. They gazed at Lloyd, which was followed by the concerned voice of the baroness.

“My. Do you wish to eat more salad?” she asked innocently.

“...”

“You should have told me. This isn’t the end? Well, I suppose I should’ve known that wouldn’t be enough for them. Still, you must be tired from traveling all the way from the capital.”

The baroness spoke and then took Lloyd’s plate to serve him a full heap of salad. Lloyd looked at it. There was way more meat than vegetables on his plate.

“Tell me if you need more,” she added. “Today must have been tough for you, too.”

“Um, I didn’t mean that way, but-”

“Care for some sausages?”

“...”

His heart was touched against his will. Memories were problematic for this very reason. Lloyd wondered why mothers were like this. He shoved away the thought of his mother that flashed across his mind, and he forced a cough to remove the awkward expression from his face.

“Ehem. Hmm! It’s not that, but I actually do have something to tell you both,” Lloyd finally managed to say.

“What is it?” the baron asked, and the baroness put down the salad spoon. The two seemed to have noticed that Lloyd wasn’t talking about food. Lloyd gazed at them.

“Please forgive me for what I am about to say while you are feeling happy and relieved,” Lloyd said, “and it makes me feel like a wet blanket to say this. However, there will be time to celebrate later on. The same goes for you both and me."

"Is..." the baron murmured, "something going to happen again?"

"Yes."

"Will it happen again in the future?"

"Yes."

"Can you tell us in more detail?" the baron asked once again.

"Of course."

The baron's gaze was now serious. Feeling the intensity, Lloyd opened his mouth to speak.

"Yesterday's disaster was terrifying, to say the least. Thankfully, we managed to overcome it well. But now is just the beginning. To tell you the reason and our current situation in detail..."

Lloyd began to walk through the whole thing one by one, just like the time he had reported the matter to Queen Magentano. The things he had learned from the novel and the facts he managed to deduce were laid on the table in a logical manner.

"Therefore, a string of invasions, just like the one we'd witnessed, will occur down the road."

"A string of them?" asked the baron.

"Yes, it's..." Lloyd paused for a second before he spoke again. "I am expecting three to seven at most."

"..."

The baroness blanched at Lloyd's words. The happy-go-lucky and peaceful atmosphere that hung on the dining table was instantly killed to be replaced by a horrendous and suspenseful one.

“Ha... What should we... How about we leave the fiefdom at once?” the baron suggested.

“That won’t do.”

Lloyd shook his head firmly before continuing. “You must remember, that once we lose the fiefdom, it’s over for us.”

“It’s over for us?” repeated the baron.

“Yes.”

It was true. Abandoning this fiefdom wasn’t an option. This fiefdom held his dreams, hopes, and a comfortable and prosperous retirement life for Lloyd. And if they gave this place up because of the monster hoards and let it become ruined, it would become a wasteland. All of the villagers would either die or flee. And what would happen afterward?

We’ll lose the fiefdom. Some might say that we could simply run away for safety and establish the fiefdom again on an empty lot. But this isn’t a video game. Doing that would be impossible.

If the fiefdom’s lord and his family fled for their lives in front of a threat... That would nuke the people’s trust in the lord. Even though he poured gold coins into building up the agricultural lands and distributed them to them afterward, they wouldn’t be so willing to settle there. No, even before that happened, the royal palace would surely come to grill the baron.

Since a fiefdom is nothing but a land given by the monarch.

Therefore, it was to be managed and maintained on behalf of the monarch. Abandoning the land was the same as stripping himself of the qualification to rule over the land. The land would forever be out of his rule.

“And so, running away must be the final resort when death is our only alternative. First, for now, we must stick around here and protect this land.”

Lloyd never wished to lose the fiefdom. He didn't wish to wound up homeless and be summoned to the capital. The queen would then comfort him and give him a job there, where he would be committed to a lifetime of backbreaking work. He had been snowed under endless work and labor already enough back in South Korea as he tried to make ends meet. It sickened him. His strong resolution seemed to have been conveyed well to the baron and the baroness. The former nodded with a resolved expression on his face.

"I understand what you mean. You are 100% right," the baron acknowledged.

"Isn't that right?" Lloyd said, feeling relieved.

The baron, who seemed to be afraid, mustered up the courage. Lloyd thought that since he and the baron were on the same page, things would be much easier to plan out. However, it was revealed a second later that the baron must have mustered up too much courage.

"So, you shall run away alone," the baron announced.

"Excuse me...?" asked Lloyd, dazed.

"As you said, countless monsters and beasts will sweep over the fiefdom as the locusts did. That is why."

"I don't get-"

"If you need to survey and design things for defense, just do that and nothing more. As soon as possible," the baron explained.

"Wait," Lloyd asked as he grimaced a little, "are you saying I should run after assigning the project to someone else?"

"Yes."

The baron's tone seemed to tell Lloyd, "Duh."

“What would be the point of putting yourself at risk? You have risked your life already by taking the matter into your own hands this time. I am sorry and ashamed of that alone. Therefore, from now on, you shall stay somewhere safe. Don’t act recklessly from now on. Let this old man deal with it.”

The baron’s voice was stern, which was something rare for him. And so, Lloyd was able to catch how serious the baron was about keeping Lloyd safe, even if it meant putting himself in danger.

“...”

Lloyd was touched once again. He wondered why his father came to mind. His father used to comfort Lloyd that everything was okay and that he must focus on his studies as the old man could pay off the debt. The baron reminded Lloyd of his father, who spoke with conviction like now.

When in fact, he was the one most scared and tired by it all.

Why fathers always tried to carry every single burden all to themselves was beyond Lloyd. He drew his breath at length, smothering emotions that tried to spill out of him. And he spoke to the baron.

“But even so, it will not be enough,” Lloyd said.

“Not enough...?”

“Yes.”

“Are you saying that your father will not be able to protect the fiefdom?”

“No. That is not what I mean. However-”

“However?”

“Things will be much easier if we work together. So, here is my promise,” Lloyd said.

“Promise? What promise?”

“Without looking back, I will run as soon as things get dangerous. To a faraway place that is safe. How does that sound?”

“Are you really serious about keeping that promise…?”

“Of course,” Lloyd assured.

That was obviously the case. Even though this barony was his golden ticket to a happy retirement, it wasn’t more valuable than his life. The moment he sensed he was near death, he would be the first to run. Thinking that in his head, Lloyd spoke to the baron.

“So you do not have to tell me to run away first. Instead, I wish to ask you for something.”

“Ask for something? What is it?”

“Please provide me with as many workers as you can.”

“Is it to shorten the time needed to build a defensive structure?” the baron asked.

“Yes. We need more workers on top of the villagers and civil engineers. Especially those who are strong and brawny. So...”

Lloyd paused as he stared at the baron. With a grin on his face, he uttered a request that was sure to frighten the baron.

“Please summon the commander of the White Cavalry after dinner for me and tell him that the entire member of the cavalry will be transferred to the civil engineer corp first thing tomorrow,” Lloyd said.

“What...?”

Gulp-

It was only seconds ago that the baron promised full cooperation to protect this fiefdom.

I know that we have been given the command control as the lord of the fiefdom, but it's directly under the command of the monarch! What is he going to do with them?

The baron was concerned that the commander of the cavalry might go apoplectic. But Lloyd was nonchalant, and he spoke much more brazenly.

"Of course, you should be worried. And about how you will bring it up to him is another concern. I wish to do it myself, but I am not the lord. So, the job is yours, and it's imperative that you do so," said Lloyd.

"Imperative? Why so?"

"Because it's our chance to attain 500 brawny and well-built laborers."

Lloyd continued to speak.

"The next wave of monsters will rush down here now that the locusts are gone. We will need people for shoveling then," he added.

"Shoveling?" the baron asked in curiosity.

"Yes, but not just this time. I have a bigger, much bigger picture in mind for the future. So they must master how to use the shovel and get used to the tool beforehand. Please make sure that you make them come around. Also, if he gets mad..." Lloyd paused.

"What if he does?"

Baron Frontera shot the question in a hurry, thinking that Lloyd might have a wonderful trick up his sleeve. He waited for the hopeful answer to come. Lloyd grinned.

"Act thick-skinned and brazen," Lloyd finally uttered.

"..."

"You can do it."

“…”

“Good luck.”

“…”

The baron wondered if he could really pull off such a thing. His Adam's apple fluctuated hard as he gulped.

Chapter 110: The Meaning of Shoveling (1)

It was late at night, around the time when almost everyone got ready for bed. Some might already be asleep, enjoying sweet dreams. But it was an exception for one. The commander of White Cavalry, Sir Valeradi Blanc, was the exception. He was trudging ahead as he breathed heavily in annoyance.

What a rude situation this is...

Clank! Clank!

He recalled what happened a while ago, and that prompted his steps to be more violent. For a good reason, however. He had gone to meet Baron Frontera in his office as per the request of the latter. There, he heard the most preposterous offer he had never even imagined to hear.

What? He wants what? He wants to deploy the entire knights into the civil engineer corp?

It wounded his pride. Could it be any more absurd? The mere thought of it flushed his face in anger.

They expect us to hold a shovel instead of a sword and scoop soil? Us?

No way. He knew who he and his men were. They were the White Cavalry.

We are the queen's sword and lance. Our greatest honor is fighting and dying on the battlefield. Yet, they expect us to wield a shovel?

Of course, Sir Blanc resisted. He grabbed the baron's collar, and lashed out at him for daring to give such an impertinent order. Sure, the queen had commanded the cavalry to be here, which gave the power of command to Baron Frontera for the time being. But...

But still, this is nonsense!

Sir Blanc blew a gasket, bawling at the top of his lungs. And what came out of the baron's mouth stupefied him all the more.

What? It wasn't his decision?

So, Sir Blanc probed some more. At last, the baron told him that the answer was waiting at the training hall in the manor.

Fine. I'll go there. I will go because it's all so ridiculous!

Sir Blanc was sure that he would find out what this was all about once he got there.

Clank! Clank!

He tramped outside the mansion toward the training hall behind the manor. But the moon over his head shone brightly, inconsiderate to his burning rage. When he arrived there, he noticed a silhouette of a man standing all alone at the center of the training hall. The man had his hands behind his back. He was looking up at the moon, his posture straight.

"Who are you over there?" Sir Blanc asked. "Did you wait for me here?"

The man turned around. He wasn't carrying any weapons. But he had a nonchalant smile on his face, which strangely signaled more danger than a weapon to Sir Blanc.

"Yes, I've been waiting for you. You are here earlier than I expected."

"Lloyd Frontera?" Sir Blanc asked in disbelief.

"Sir Blanc, the man of great reputation, knows my name. What an honor," Lloyd answered.

"Honored my foot. I am Valeradi Blanc. I briefly saw you yesterday, but finally, we have the chance to introduce ourselves properly."

"I am sorry. I was engrossed in cleaning up the mess after the disaster," Lloyd said.

“You are not the only one who was busy.”

Sir Blanc had spent the previous day slammed with work. He inspected his people, the armor, and the weapons. As he cocked his head to the side, Sir Blanc stared at Lloyd.

“But you see, I just heard something a bit strange,” Sir Blanc said.

“From the baron?”

“So you know,” he said”

“Of course I do,” Lloyd replied. “I was the one who asked the baron to tell you that.”

“Wait, the decision to deploy the White Cavalry into the fiefdom’s civil engineer corp came out of your head?”

“Yes, indeed.”

“...”

The nonchalant manners of Lloyd almost propelled Sir Blanc to jump and grab him by the collar. However, he suppressed such desire with great struggle and spoke.

“Why? The baron told me that I would be enlightened once I came here. So don’t beat around the bush, and tell me straight.”

“To stay alive.”

“What...?”

Sir Blanc paused for a second. He wondered where this Lloyd Frontera was getting at. Lloyd continued to speak.

“I don’t want to die, but I can’t give up the fiefdom,” Lloyd explained, “On top of that, I can’t just run away all the more, leaving the people here behind. So, I thought I should do anything I can. Resort to every means possible, and push through for as long as possible."

"So what, that was your method to prepare for the future monster invasion? Deploying my knights to be engineers of yours?"

"Yes, indeed."

"You are making a mistake," warned Sir Blanc.

"How so?"

"It would be more destructive and effective for 500 of our knights to wield the lances on battlefields than carrying shovels and joining your engineering group," Sir Blanc reasoned.

"Yes, that is right, indeed."

"What is that now...?"

Sir Blanc was curious about what the deal was with this man. Why was he consenting to his words so easily? Lloyd grinned nonetheless, which made Sir Blanc wonder if this man understood his words"

"Lances in battlefields. Yes, yes, you must let them shine bright. I am not stopping you. You have my encouragement and support. But all I am asking from you is to hold up the shovel until the monsters strike," Lloyd reasoned.

"So you want my knights to join the construction in peacetime and fight as lancers on battlefields?"

"Yes."

Lloyd's answer was curt and straight to the point, which made Sir Blanc pause for a minute. This left him speechless, and he struggled to rebut Lloyd's request.

I mean, it makes sense circumstantially.

After all, they could only act as lances on the battlefield. And here was Lloyd requesting them to grab a shovel only until those battles began. As Sir Blanc mulled it over, the suggestion appeared extremely practical.

It's not like our reputation will be damaged by holding a shovel when nothing is happening.

They only had to bring out their best game during war times. Sir Blanc thought further and realized that Lloyd's request wasn't problematic in a procedural sense as well. After all, the moment the queen had ordered them to be dispatched to this fiefdom, the ultimate control over them temporarily shifted to Baron Frontera.

But still... It doesn't feel right.

Sure, it was practical and followed all the proper procedures. However, his pride. That was the problem. His pride was hurt. The brilliant shining lancers of the queen carrying soiled shovels? Sir Blanc couldn't help but feel repulsed by that image alone. Therefore, this issue had nothing to do with profit or logic. It had everything to do with his feelings and emotions.

If even I am feeling this way, I wonder what my men will feel about it.

The 500 men in the White Cavalry. Each and every one of them was ready to throw their life away for the queen. As such, this type of order was sure to bring about some serious resistance from them. Sir Blanc, after some thinking, raised his head as he wanted to confirm something.

"Let me ask you one thing," he said.

"Sure, go ahead," said Lloyd.

"Let's say that we join your engineering team. What exactly will be our job?"

"Things the civil engineer corp does," Lloyd stated nonchalantly.

"You mean..."

“Mainly shoveling. At first, the work will be slow because you are not adept at it. But once you get the hang of it, you will surely get better than my people. I have high hopes for you,” Lloyd added.

“What...”

“I mean it. Truly.”

Lloyd was telling the truth. He wasn’t asking this type of favor to hurt their pride.

I mean, they are the White Cavalry.

They worked directly under the queen, so their combat power and stamina were verified already. Once they got the hang of shoveling, each one would do the job of three or four skilled civil engineers. What was more, they could be instantly transformed to combat capabilities once things went south at the construction scene. Lloyd had a bigger plan in mind, which was a surefire trick to put the endless brake on the monsters. To do that, they had to be excellent shovelers.

“I promise you,” Lloyd said, “your daily wage won’t be insignificant. Five times what the civil engineers receive. I am being very generous right now.”

“This isn’t about the money.”

“It is important. Many people in the whole world break their backs all day to earn money.”

“...”

“And just so you know, shoveling in a construction site isn’t as much of a waste of time as you imagine. It can be a great source of training,” Lloyd added”

“Training? Do you mean like stamina training?”

“Yes, indeed.”

“Ha.”

Sir Blanc sneered, and he wondered if this man named Lloyd was in his right mind.

I thought he was the hero of Cremo and a great talent Her Majesty acknowledged.

On top of those, Lloyd was the very person that stopped the assassination attempt of Sir Kyle. When Sir Blanc heard about the news, fright and admiration overwhelmed his soul to the point that he yearned to meet Lloyd. Sir Blanc wanted to feel the grave aura of the man behind such a tremendous accomplishment. As such, he was thoroughly disappointed tonight.

“Lloyd Frontera, it appears you know nothing about us, the White Cavalry. Do you consider us weaklings who need to train in construction sites?” Sir Blanc’s voice contained disdain”

“Hmm, don’t you think so?”

“Bullcrap. You are ignoring us.”

“That surely is not.”

“Are you saying you are not looking down on us?” Sir Blanc retorted.

“No, I am not.”

“Are you saying that construction sites can train our stamina?”

“Of course it can,” Lloyd emphasized”

“How in the world...”

Sir Blanc furrowed his brows. The work only involved a shovel. Or a hammer. How hard can it get to transfer soils and bricks? On the contrary, what kind of training did the White Cavalry go through?

We have trained every day, risking our lives. Blood and sweat amid the piercing spears and our skills were built upon the wounds and injuries. We battled in wars and drank bottles of victory, cheering for today for being alive and for tomorrow for being braver. And here comes this man to tell me what? A construction site can train us? Bullcrap.

Sir Blanc made his resolve. With a stinging gaze, he looked at Lloyd.

“How can it train us? What difference will it make if we train in that construction site of yours?” Sir Blanc retorted”

“Different in many ways.”

“Can you prove it in specifics?”

“Sure, I can.”

“Can you prove it right now?” Sir Blanc demanded.

“If you want, let me show you right now.”

“Please do so.”

“Great. But why don’t you make a bet with me?” Lloyd said.

“A bet?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd smiled meaningfully.

“From now on, I will show you the result of training on the construction site. If you judge that what you see is more powerful than your sword fighting, please make your men join the civil engineering corp without a complaint. How does that sound?”

“Ha, fine.”

Sir Blanc didn’t even think twice before saying it. He’s going to show the result of training done with a shovel? And he’s comparing it to my sword fighting? Sir Blanc almost snorted at the absurdity of it.

Does he not know that I am about to become a sword master?

Sir Blanc could do everything except conjure an aura. So whatever this man Lloyd Frontera was about to do, it would fall short of his own sword skills. It would be the case even if he had fought and killed the Gigatitan to become a hero. A shovel was nothing but a tool. It would not be enough. Sir Blanc was filled with conviction as he spoke.

“I will take you on that bet.”

“That sounds great.” Lloyd nodded his head without hesitation, and he picked up the shovel from the ground.

A shovel? What’s he going to do with a thing like that? It’s not even a weapon”

Sir Blanc felt how laughable this whole thing was. Lloyd could go and do whatever he desires, be it shoveling or anything. Once he saw enough, he would sneer at Lloyd as much as he could. And he would gripe about the impertinence and disrespect Lloyd has resorted to up until this point. Thinking so, Sir Blanc took two steps back lest his shirt gets soiled. But right after he did, he heard something he never expected to hear.

“Two steps won’t be enough. Step further back.”

“How far should I move...?”

“As far as you can.”

“...”

Sir Blanc took two more steps back. Lloyd shook his head. Feeling uncomfortable, Sir Blanc took five more steps back. Lloyd positioned himself just then.

“You see, the thing about shoveling is...”

Clench! His two hands tightly gripped the shovel handle. As the veins in his hands popped out, Lloyd spoke.

“It’s not as easy and effortless as you think it is.”

Zing! Lloyd started to activate three circles, tightening his grip all the more.

“Just to shovel, you should wake up early in the morning. You need to put on clothes even when the sun isn’t up, and you must leave your house with safe shoes on. And you must pray hard that you’ll be picked by the employment agency. If you don’t get picked, you can’t shovel even if you want to,” Lloyd narrated.

“...”

Sir Blanc wished to ask what Lloyd was talking about. But Lloyd continued to speak.

“The same goes for days when it pours hard. It’s more so during the stormy season, like in the summer. And in the winter as well, when you can’t just use a shovel. But even on days with nice weather, sometimes you get no job because you bought the hatred of the supervisor. Or when you’re out of luck, the job itself cancels right in the middle of the whole thing. And so, when things like that happen, you can’t shovel even if you want to.”

“What are you saying...”

“Only after overcoming such tribulations and ordeals can you finally hold up your shovel for the day. And that’s only when you have earned the right to be paid. Sure...” Lloyd paused for a second. He looked straight into Sir Blanc’s eyes. “Others may consider it invaluable and trivial. But to those who shovel, it may be their last lifeline. The very job you like to make fun of can cover medicine and school tuition. It can be someone’s final source of hope.”

“...”

“So, for some, this shoveling is a symbol of hope and life. It’s what sustains their dreams, feeds their children, and keeps them moving forward without quitting. So...”

Zing! The triple circle was rotating in a frenzy. Each time Lloyd spoke, the circles reverberated with each other. A faint smile appeared on his lips. Just then, the circles collided. He pointed his shovel to the sky.

Kaboom!

“...!”

The triple mana blast ejected out like a volcanic explosion, forming a straight line that traveled as high as 70 yards in the air. It burned a section of the night sky until it died down with the wind, which became hot due to the high temperature of the mana blast. It blew to dishevel Sir Blanc’s hair. Lloyd’s gaze traveled to the side, and he spoke, his voice serious and low.

“This is what real shoveling is all about.”

“...”

Sir Blanc remained silent. Not a single word managed to escape his mouth. In its stead, he gulped dryly. The following day, every single member of the White Cavalry modestly held up a shovel in their hands. And five days later, the second wave of monsters Lloyd had predicted showed up at the outskirts of the barony.

Chapter 111: The Meaning of Shoveling (2)

Rumble...

The ground started to shake from the east, beyond the eastern range that soared high, from the abundant valleys in between the peaks to the rugged hills and nameless rocks under the ridge, and along the hunting site at the foot of the mountain, mine, logging area, road, and fields. There came an unfamiliar and heavy shaking of the ground. At last, it traveled past the horse hooves, going up through the back and armor and waist and chest.

“They are here.”

“Hmm.”

Sir Blanc nodded at the aide’s words. His green eyes traveled to the range east to the Frontera barony. The unfamiliar and thudding shaking was coming from there.

“Truly, are they Mastodons?”

Just then, Sir Blanc recalled the visit last night. Lloyd Frontera came to him.

“The Mastodons will sweep over our fiefdom probably tomorrow or the day after that.”

And so, Sir Blanc asked how on earth he knew about it. To that, Lloyd simply smiled and said that it was obvious.

Obvious? How did he predict that?

He couldn’t comprehend it. As far as he knew, Lloyd didn’t dispatch a patrol team to the eastern range. For the past few days, Lloyd was solely focused on supervising the construction. And yet, he acted as though he had a third eye watching everything. So, it was difficult for Sir Blanc to trust his prediction right away. It was still the case this early morning. After breakfast time, Sir Blanc scoffed at the predicament as he washed his face. See? Nothing is happening, he had told himself that.

But now, he knew his doubts had been unnecessary. When it was noon, as if Lloyd and the monsters had struck a deal, there came from the distant mountain range in the east a low yet heavy shaking of the ground. It was the type of shaking that came when a hoard of heavy animals marched in unison, fearlessly shattering every tree and rock that stood in their way. There could only be one thing that could produce such vibration, and it was the flock of Mastodon, the giant herbivore that lived in the wilderness.

Judging by the intensity of the ground shaking, it looks like they will show up soon.

A 13-foot monster that looked like a mix of rhinoceros and elephant. Hundreds of them would hurtle into this place soon.

That's the way the Mastodons move.

Clench! Sir Blanc gripped the lance hard. Internally, he predicted how the coming battle would unfold.

The herd will come from the east to the west, charging into the barony right away. So the most efficient response on our part with the given capability is a head-on fight.

The White Cavalry would take the front and hurtle right toward the herd of charging Mastodons. They would pierce their frontal leg joint after dodging their tusks and horns.

It's important to block the one in the very front in order to disrupt and confuse the entire rest of the herd. That would naturally bring a stop to their stampede.

From then on, the knights would circle around the herd of immobilized Mastodons and gallop round and round, killing them with the lances. Like peeling an onion, those monsters would be killed one by one until the entire herd was slaughtered.

It’s fully possible. We can pull it off if the soldiers in the Frontera barony offer us proper support and stay within the file.

Sir Blanc predicted in his head how the battle would end.

The herd of Mastodon will be massacred to the hilt. As for us, the White Cavalry... We will lose around 20 to 30 knights.

About 30 casualties among the 500. It was a considerable amount of damage. But Sir Blanc clamped his mouth shut.

It doesn’t matter. If that is the result of our best efforts, so be it. I’ll be content. For that is our honor.

This battlefield was chosen under the orders of the monarch. They were now protecting the land from the invasion of monsters. And so, death was not to be feared in such battles.

“Everyone, get ready to take charge. We shall remain here on standby until we receive a signal. That’s when we move forward at once.”

“Yes, sir!”

500 knights of the White Cavalry, who were in the middle of the fiefdom, loudly responded in harmony. They held up the white lance at the same time. Just then, a messenger appeared in the distance, rushing toward Sir Blanc. He was sent by the baron to share the message that caught Sir Blanc by surprise.

“Whew!” the messenger panted when he arrived. “I have the order from the baron... Every single man of the White Cavalry is to leave this place at once and stand by near the southern border of the Maritz land with a lance and shovel.”

“What?” Sir Blanc’s beard quirked in disdain. “What do you mean that we should wait at the southern border? What about the charge?”

“The baron orders that direct confrontation must be avoided at all costs.”

“Then how’s he going to-”

“Do you,” the messenger said, “see the white rock on the ridge in the east?”

“Yes.”

“Master Lloyd is over there.”

“Lloyd Frontera? What is he doing over there?”

“He will be commanding the operation from there. He directed you to take over the designated location in the south and wait until you see the blue flag go up on the rock over there. That is when you must make a ‘slow’ procession toward the north,” the messenger explained.

“Slow? But we are up against Mastodons. Are you sure he didn’t mean to gallop at full speed or relentlessly charge forward?” Sir Blanc said in disbelief.

“Yes, I am sure. He instructed you to proceed slowly as you produce a thick sandstorm and drum the lance with your shovel for distraction.”

“But why...”

Sir Blanc’s face turned stoic and cold. The whole thing was absurd. How could the baron call for a slow procession when we are facing the Mastodons? And what? Make dust and noise instead of roaring as we charge ahead?

“Are you utmost certain that you received the proper order?” Sir Blanc asked incredulously.

“Yes, sir,” the messenger assured, “I am certain. Oh, Master Lloyd sent another message which he emphasized that I must relay it to you.”

“Must relay it to me? What could it be?”

“‘The time has come for the six-day shoveling to pay off.’ was his message.”

“...”

Sir Blanc’s mouth shut itself as he recalled the shoveling they had done the past six days.

“I see... I shall follow the order.”

“Thank you, sir. Well then.”

The messenger bowed and went away. Sir Blanc led his men right away, and throughout the southward travel, he cocked his head to the side in confusion.

Will the operation be effective?

A piece of memory interrupted his mind just then. It was probably one night about a week ago. Lloyd’s shovel fired an outburst of mana that shot straight for dozens of yards. Sir Blanc had never seen anything like it. It seemed more powerful than the aura of a sword master Sir Blanc had seen a couple of times. And with that, he lost the bet. Afterward, he grabbed the shovel per the request of Lloyd, making sure that his men did the same thing. Just like that, they moved according to his instructions.

And we shoveled... for six days straight.

That was all they really did. They laid the ground as ordered. They dug as they were instructed. They transferred soil, stacked it up, and flattened it. At first, no one could guess what they were constructing. But four days passed to reveal the outline of the result of their toil.

It was a massive sculpture installed on a surface.

A 492 x 328-foot flat surface, which was sloped by 15 degrees to the west, was built at first. After that, the shoveling continued. They transferred the volcanic ash to the soil ground. It was covered and flattened. Next, they either scraped or thickened the ground, depending on Lloyd’s instruction. Sometimes, they poured water to solidify the soil. This process continued to slowly build up a gigantic image of a monster. The mammoth herbivore “Megalania” inhabits the wilderness.

So I went up to Lloyd and complained.

That this won’t work. This wasn’t a proper defense. When Sir Blanc explicitly questioned him, Lloyd responded...

“Doing so will be more effective for defense than stacking up a wall with the same amount of soil. I’m sure about it this time.”

But Sir Blanc wasn’t convinced. That carved-out image on the surface would block a herd of Mastodons?

And not enough with that, he now prevents us from charging straight into the herd. What in the world is he thinking?

Sir Blanc was tormented throughout his journey to the south. For the cavalry, the timing to rush toward the enemy was never random. In fact, finding the perfect timing was actually more important when they were fighting against monsters. Lloyd was about to waste such a golden opportunity for reasons Sir Blanc could not grasp.

He’s not doing this because of some superstition, is he?

Sir Blanc nibbled his lips, and his gaze, which contained an abundance of concern, moved toward the white rock where Lloyd was.

This plan. I wonder if it will be effective.

“Effective? Of course, it is.”

Lloyd chuckled, convinced that everything would take place exactly the way he predicted. Much like his prediction that Mastodon would be the second wave of the monsters to charge into the barony.

“Were you confident about all this?” It was Javier who asked.

“Yeah.” Lloyd nodded his head.

“But how could you be so convinced?” asked Javier.

“Simple. I am smart.”

Javier ignored Lloyd.

“Just kidding. I looked through some documents,” Lloyd stated.

“Documents?”

“Yeah, this one.”

Lloyd tapped an old booklet and dusted off its cover. Javier noticed that the leathery cover was entitled “Illustrations of Monsters in the Eastern Wilderness.”

“I found this in the study. It organized the list of the monsters and their nature. So I read and took notes of the content,” Lloyd said.

“And the result is today’s operation?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.”

Lloyd nodded eagerly, but the truth was that he was lying. He did refer to a book. But that illustrated book wasn’t the only book he had referred to.

Truth be told, there is another very useful book. The Knight of Blood and Iron. Haha.

The illustrated book he had told Javier about actually fell short of being a solid reference for him to devise a plan. But there was a reason why he had lied to Javier.

Because I need clear proof and reason for being smart.

It was only natural. Groundless ingenuity. Mysterious smarty-pants. Lloyd couldn’t afford to be viewed in such ways. What would happen if he acted as if he knew everything about this place when there was nothing for him to study? What would happen if he got everything right about the future as though he was Sherlock Holmes? At first, he might get praised. But it would be different later on.

People would become suspicious of me eventually. They aren't fools.

As such, Lloyd regarded that his ingenuity should be backed by something that people in this world could easily accept.

It's convenient to live free from suspicion.

A suspicion-free fiefdom. A life full of trust. Lloyd believed in that motto. So, he spoke.

"I must have told you before that this is happening because of the monster domino phenomenon. Just imagine what monsters would come after the locusts. It's obvious. Those that live in a herd, mobilize fast, are at the bottom of the food chain, and are strong enough to climb over the eastern range."

"Mastodons," Javier said.

"Yes, that's it."

That was as far as Lloyd referred to in the illustrated book. The following preparation and planning were based on The Knight of Blood and Iron.

After all, he wasn't a genius. He was not Sherlock Holmes, either. He just had a bit more access to information. That was the only upper hand Lloyd had compared to the people here.

Anyway, the short mention of the hunting custom by the orcs in the novel helped me a lot.

Lloyd recalled in the novel. Orc tribes used an enormous plate of Megalania when they hunted down the Mastodons. And being brainless and cautious beasts, the Mastodons judged that the plate was the real Megalania and ran away to the other side just in case. They took precautions first before judging. Orcs smartly made good use of their nature by installing the traps in the direction those monsters rush ahead to for safety.

“So watch how the trap is set from now on. Watch closely.”

Lloyd pointed to the side with his chin. Just then, the ground shaking amplified by a notch. It became nearer. Hundreds of trees in the area shook and fell. At last, the herd of Mastodons appeared.

“Gwoahhh!”

Crash! Rumble!

A 13-foot body with a horn of a rhinoceros, tusk of an elephant, and a head of a bison. The Mastodon. Hundreds of the monsters came rampaging down the foot of the eastern range. They crossed the hunting and logging site, trampling on the fields. In particular, the one in the far front, the leader of the herd, thought to itself as it breathed out heavily. It felt nice to stampede on a flat surface after climbing the range. And unlike the wilderness, there were nice patches of greenery here and there. And for the time being, they didn’t have to worry about the incoming mating season as they could happily run around the grass to their heart’s content. The leader Mastodon glared at the barony, its eyes bloodshot. And at last, it saw.

“Gwoak...?”

Right in the middle of the human fiefdom. It saw the image of its archenemy there. The horrendous predator Megalania, whose staple was very themselves. Its mouth was elongated like a crocodile. Fangs stuck out in between its lips. Skin so thick that their horns couldn’t penetrate into it. And its claws were made special for tearing the belly skin of its prey. The double whammy was that the Megalania standing over there was at least three times bigger than what the Mastodons had in mind. Moreover, it sat crouching to its side, which was a hunting position distinct to Megalania!

“Gwoa! Gwoak!”

The leader Mastodon was taken aback and couldn’t figure out what the Megalania was doing in human territory. It couldn’t believe it. But at the same time, it couldn’t deny what it was seeing. That was how lifelike the Megalania sculpture covered up in the soil and volcanic ash was. It looked as if the Megalania would pounce and snap its back in one chomp. The leader Mastodon was terrified even though it thought that the Megalania could be fake. But when it considered the slim possibility that the predator was indeed real, fear swept over its whole existence. It didn’t want to die. Eventually, the leader made the decision to opt for safety, which was in line with its nature.

“Gwoack! Oak!”

Slide! Halt!

The Mastodon stopped in its tracks to the west. The same went for the rest of the herd that followed behind. And just like that, dismay and chaos descended on the herd as they were lost in direction. It was just then…

“Now! Raise the blue flag!” shouted Lloyd.

Javier lifted the huge flag. The blue flag swayed over the white rock. Sir Blanc, who was waiting at the entrance of the southern part of the Maritz land, saw it clearly.

The operation worked? I never thought the Mastodons would stop at the image etched on the ground...

Sir Blanc was clueless, indeed. This was true even when he had been shoveling for the construction.

Is it because of the slope toward the east?

The ground was sloped up by 15 degrees. The Mastodons charged down from the range, which meant that they were gazing downward. So, those two angles must have compounded to make the image more real and lifelike in the eyes of the bison-like beasts. Sir Blanc postulated such. But he immediately snapped out of his reverie as he had a job to do right now. Thinking of the order he had received, he shouted...

“We shall march forward! Hold up your shovels and lances!”

Clip clop! Clip clop!

The 500 lancers moved, clip-clopping and trotting as they moved forward under the order. They marched, each of their steps creating as much sand dust as per the prior command. And they didn’t forget to clang the lance and shovel aloud with both of their hands.

Clang! Clash! Clang!

They slowly progressed toward the north, creating a loud cacophony. This brought about an unexpected reaction from the herd of Mastodons.

“Gwoack!”

The leader cried out at length, and it started to dart off to the north.

Is the threat working?

The monsters were now on the run. Unbeknownst to Sir Blanc, the Mastodons would have shown an opposite reaction from the current one if Sir Blanc had opted to stick with his initial plan of hurtling toward them. The knights’ excessive threat would have awakened the defensive instinct of the monsters and prompted them to fight back. But now, it was different. The knights pressured the Mastodons just with the sand, dust, and noise. It worked very well. The Megalania in the distance stirred fear among the Mastodons. And the nearing sandstorm and din. The two things work together to push those monsters to run away.

Hold on. There is a connected passageway dug deep in the north and south... Where the monsters are heading now... No way.

Sir Blanc was enlightened at last. What lay in the destination of these charging Mastodons was the very place he and his knights shoveled their heads off for the last six days. Certainly, they didn’t shovel out the ground with a certain purpose in mind. They simply followed Lloyd’s instructions. They dug and filled as told. Just like that, they shoveled out the soil to make the foundation of the Megalania image. But the result? There came about a long and deep hole that was likened to a canal.

But that hole... its southern and northern end almost touched the river that flowed by the Maritz land... Wait a minute. Did he really...?!

Just then, a hunch flashed through his mind, and things started to piece together. One by one, each piece was assembled and jumbled to reveal the final picture. The trap. Sir Blanc shuddered as the epiphany struck his mind. He turned toward the white rock on the eastern mountain range. A white flag was waving as though it was confirming his prediction. Then he immediately noticed a fantastical creature, which was likened to the summon creature, that rolled from the south toward the herd of the Mastodons.

“Hamang!”

And there began the water attack.

Chapter 112: Conqueror of the Fountain (1)

Water jetted out, filling up the water bottle.

Trickle.

“Here, drink this, sir.”

Sir Blanc was snapped out of his trance to find his aide holding out a portable water bottle.

“It’s water, sir,” his aide said, “I thought your throat might be coarse from inhaling all the dust.”

“Oh, thank you,” Sir Blanc said as he took the bottle. As the bottle tilted sideways in his hands, the water inside flowed through his throat. Just then, a certain image came to his mind. The Mastodon herd. The straight route. The column of water. A giant hippopotamus rolling and jetting out water. The hundreds of beasts swam away in sheer terror at the image and force of the creature.

“...”

The cold water absorbed into his empty stomach. The water attack had been impressive and effective as it swept away the entire herd of countless Mastodons. The flood shoved them to the end of the route toward the northern river.

How can I make sense of what I saw today...?

Sir Blanc asked himself whether what he saw was real. Or was it a terrible dream? Or was a giant scheme at play here? He couldn’t tell which one it was. But there was something certain, and it was that Lloyd Frontera’s plan had worked, saving the barony from a rampage of hundreds of Mastodons without seeing almost any damage.

“Oh, there was some damage.”

Sir Blanc heard a voice coming from beside him, but it didn’t belong to his aide. He turned and found Lloyd Frontera smiling in a wry way distinct from the latter. Sir Blanc wondered when he had come here.

Feeling slightly dazed, Sir Blanc asked, “There was damage?”

“Yes. There was.”

Lloyd shrugged his shoulders, replying in a deprecating manner.

“The fields in the mountain foot have been ruined. That was where we planted the onions, green onions, potatoes, and corn. What a waste, really. The corn in that particular field was very tasty.”

“...”

“Oh, and a portion of the paved road was lost as the flood swept the Mastodons. It really was some tough work building that up. But what else can we do? We have to repair it again.”

Sir Blanc was left speechless. Lloyd Frontera should be receiving a medal for minimizing the damage from the attack of several hundreds of Mastodons. But instead, the man was making a big fuss about relatively trivial losses. Who was this guy?

“Wait a second. The flood attack and the waterway for that, no, the underground route the Mastodons ran into by themselves and swam off for their lives... Was that all in your head when we were constructing the image of the Megalania?” Sir Blanc asked reflexively”

“Of course,” Lloyd answered plainly without any trivial modesty or humility.

“It was tough digging for six days straight, right? It was all part of the plan. I am sure you complained and wondered why I made you dig and move soil when you could always shovel the area right beside the relief image. Well, that was all part of the plan, too. You were annoyed for having to dig following a straight, designated course when you could just dig up one area, right? Of course, that was also part of the plan," said Lloyd.

"Then the course of the waterway was-"

"Yes, everything was designed after a survey to make use of the Prona River that flows down clockwise as it hugs the barony from the south to the north."

"..."

"Starting from the point the course of the river breaks westward to the north. To converge it with the downstream that flows after traveling clockwise. Well, thanks to this job, we built up one more waterway we can utilize down the road. All we need is just some repairs and maintenance, and it can be used as a mini canal."

Killing two birds with one stone. Getting a free parking spot after only purchasing a bag of candy. Obtaining a canal after protecting the Mastodon invasion. All of these were made possible because of the foolish yet careful nature of the Mastodon.

"Well, anyway, the Mastodons should live well now that they are swept to the north. They aren't going to die so easily by the flood anyway. And since the north is an uninhabited region, it's not likely for them to come back here."

"How do you know that they will not come back...?"

"Because they already laid their eyes on the Megalania, their natural enemy."

"Oh," Sir Blanc gaped.

"Those beasts will remember everything very well. And so, they won't be coming here where their natural enemy lives. It'd make more sense for them to avoid this place."

"Did you calculate that all in your head?"

“Yes, of course. Isn’t it obvious?”

“...”

Sir Blanc was left speechless because it wasn’t obvious to him. He had thought that the best solution was fighting and repelling them off. He had thought that he should simply protect the kingdom’s territory by throwing his life away like it was a worthless trinket.

But we won without a fight, with almost any loss”

No, they even gained something. The fiefdom attained a canal they could use in the future. Sir Blanc wondered how many trials and errors Lloyd Frontera underwent to draw this result. How hard he must have racked his brain to turn his plan into reality. Since he was just a brawn knight, Sir Blanc couldn’t imagine it at all. His Adam’s apple jerked by reflex, and he suddenly thought to himself...

Maybe this is what real combat is all about.

It turned out that rushing toward the enemy wasn’t the magic formula to victory. Parading around in courage wasn’t the answer. Victory ought to be clinched without fighting. Practical benefits must be attained thoroughly. Sir Blanc pondered whether those two were the actual victories he ought to pursue as a commanding knight.

That way, I won’t have to lose my men.

Sir Blanc recalled the countless battles he had fought. He had gone through 12 wars as a member of the White Cavalry. Then, five more after he became the commander of the lancers, including this one. So throughout the 17 occasions of small and large battles, this was the first time he had not lost any men. This time, he didn’t have to clean up the corpses of his men, which had developed into a habit after every battle. This unfamiliar and fresh experience made his heart beat faster, leaving him with an important lesson.

Yes, I used to mask death with valor and honor. I had considered it an honor to fight courageously and die. But here, there was greater valor and honor. To fight and live. To safely return to our families, loved ones, and friends after a battle, so that we can fight a bigger one.

To continue to stay alive and grow stronger and overcome bigger battles. And along the way, protect the country as well as families and their happiness along the way.

That was the way to uphold my honor all the more.

How foolish he had been! And how many men he could have saved had he realized this sooner. Regret, shock, and realization rushed over him. At the same time, he lifted his head and gazed at Lloyd differently.

“Thank you,” Sir Blanc said.

“Excuse me?” Lloyd returned a confused gaze.

“Please take good care of us moving forward,” Sir Blanc uttered, his voice dripping with respect.

Sir Blanc would watch and learn by Lloyd’s side. He would be further enlightened and educated. Just like that, he would consider this respectable man as his teacher.

“Oh, sure. Well, me too.”

Suppressing the awkwardness rising in him, Lloyd held out his hand, and the two shook hands. Sincerity was exchanged. Sir Blanc fought to not break into tears. Lloyd tightened his fingers that were trying to curl in the cringiness of this situation. And just like that, the day they stopped the second monster attack passed.

A few days passed. The repair job in the barony happened fast. They repaired the destroyed fields and redid the paved road washed away by the flood. But it didn’t come without a prize. When the herd of Mastodons jumped into the water to be swept away out of fear, they left five Mastodon babies, which Sir Bayern had discovered.

“So... are you saying you wish to raise them?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

Sir Bayern reported with a deep resolution, and five Mastodon babies let out a loud cry as though they were responding to his voice.

Chu!

“Do you see it, Master Lloyd? Thankfully, every one of them is healthy and strong.”

“Yes, I can see that,” Lloyd replied, “but don’t you think it’s going to be dangerous?”

“They won’t be.”

“How would you know that?”

“Because they are adorable.”

“...”

Sir Bayern pointed at the Mastodon babies, but for some reason, Lloyd noticed that Sir Bayern’s face blushed a little contrary to his usual dignified state.

“There is a story I was told once. I heard that full-grown Mastodons raised in the wild are extremely violent around humans, but they are poles apart when you raise them from when they are babies.”

“Are you saying that they can be tamed?” Lloyd asked.

“That’s what I heard.”

“So, are you planning on raising them?”

“Yes.”

“Hmm, don’t you think it will be extremely difficult?”

“It won’t be.”

“How would you know that?”

“Because they are adorable,” said Sir Bayern as he cleared his throat. A large feeding bottle was already in his hand. But it wasn’t exactly a feeding bottle. It looked more like he attached a nipple on a small barrel.

“Chu!!”

“Chu!!”

The Mastodon babies, who were the size of a calf, fought to eat first from the feeding bottle. Sir Bayern snorted in satisfaction each time, feeding them the bottle one by one.

Well, well. Sir Bayern, I didn’t know you loved raising pets that much because of the dignified air around you.

Lloyd was slightly nauseated to see a grown man coo at the baby animals and be overwhelmed by happiness, but he decided that it wasn’t a bad thing.

“Hmm. So, you want my permission?” Lloyd asked”

“Yes, please.”

“Hmm, what should I do?”

Sir Bayern waited nervously for the decision. Lloyd thought about it as he looked at Sir Bayern. Mastodon was a herbivore monster reaching up to 13 feet in height. And it showed extraordinary power matching its size. So if Sir Bayern successfully tamed them, they would be set to become a great asset to the fiefdom. They could be a great source of labor for many different chores and projects.

We can make them work in a field, carry heavy loads, or draw a giant carriage. Put them together, and we may have a pollution-free engine locomotive. But they would be excreting massive amounts of feces, much more than cows. That’d be the downside.

Lloyd concluded that there were infinite ways to use them.

“Sure. Raise them well, Sir Bayern.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“If not, would I lie about it?”

“No. Thank you. Okay, Pudding, Puddang, Pungdeong, Pungding, and Pudong. Line up, and greet him. He is Master Lloyd, your master from now on,” Sir Bayern introduced.

“Chu!!”

“Chu!!”

Woah, he named them already...? He really was bent on raising them all up. My goodness, he would have been really upset if I didn’t give my permission.

Lloyd smiled wryly and left him. Even after that, he took care of several things. He picked out the civil engineers who crossed the eastern range with him. And he sent them back over to the eastern range to make run surveillance of the area and check the safety of orc tribes.

I didn’t have the time to do it until now, even though I wanted to.

The previous situations had demanded every second of focus from Lloyd. A moment of distraction was a luxury for him. But now, since he could breathe and relax somewhat, he decided to attempt something he had wanted to try all along but never had the time for.

“Did you hear what I said? You just have to stand still there,” announced Lloyd”

“Right here?”

“Yeah.”

“Does that mean that you will be absorbing a large amount of mana like you explained?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, I will.”

Lloyd wanted to see if he could level up like the time he supercharged his mana heart by absorbing the mana of Queen Magentano in Magentano the capital. So now, Lloyd and Javier were in the training hall in the middle of the night.

“But, Master Lloyd…”

“Yeah, what?”

“But I just became a sword master.”

“Yeah, so?”

“I can now sleep without your lullaby.”

“Aha. So you are no longer suffering from the sword master syndrome. Is that what you want to say?”

“Yes, I can adjust my overly sensitive senses now.”

“So since you have nothing to lose, you don’t want to be used and taken advantage of by me anymore?”

“Yes,” Javier said proudly.

“Do you really think so?”

“Excuse me?”

“Well, go try to sleep on your own tonight,” Lloyd suggested.

Lloyd smiled, brimming with confidence. That same night, when Javier went to bed, he tossed and turned throughout the night, unable to fall asleep. That was when he realized how scary habits were. His body was so accustomed to Lloyd's lullaby that he could not fall back asleep without it.

"So stay still for me, will you?" proposed Lloyd.

"Yes..."

It was the night after that. Javier was now flopped to the ground of the training hall, smothering the rage burning inside him. At last, Lloyd fired a triple mana blast in the air. He made himself worn out on purpose and activated the Supercharge optional skill. But the attempt failed, and Lloyd could not absorb large amounts of mana as he did from Queen Magentano. The reason was simple. Javier possessed the Asrahan Core Technique just as he did.

Ding Dong.

[Your opponent's mana circle is reverberating with yours, interrupting the flow of the mana absorption.]

The message appeared in front of his eyes and canceled his mana absorption from Javier. Because of that, Lloyd sucked the mana only from the sand and air of the training hall, just enough to restore the amount of energy he had used up.

"Tsk... You useless punk."

Lloyd was disappointed, so for a split second, he mulled over the plan of raising Sir Blanc to the level of a sword master and turning him into his personal mana battery. But sadly, he just didn't have the time for that. The locusts and Mastodons were just the beginning of the monster domino phenomenon that was about to crash down on them.

"But we won't last if we stop every single one of them. It's a war of attrition, and a meaningless one."

The following night, Lloyd gathered everyone at the baron's office. The baron and baroness, Javier, Sir Bayern, and Sir Blanc sat at the table. Standing in front of them, Lloyd revealed the grand plan he had been developing for a long while. It was a smart measure to put a stop to this monster domino once and for all and acquire permanent peace.

"All we need to do is go to Lake Kapua and wake King Storma, the ruler of the area, and make him work for us. I already have a detailed plan for that. What do you think? Isn't it simple?"

Everyone in the room gulped dryly, and as the future grew bleak in their minds, they wondered to themselves if there was anything difficult for Lloyd.

Chapter 113: The Conqueror of the Fountain (2)

“Lake Kapua? The one that sits in the middle of the eastern range? Are you saying you plan on waking King Storma who rules over the area?”

The baron broke the silence in the room. His urgent question pierced everyone’s ears, and it was only then that they were jostled out of their trance. The baroness found herself clutching her handkerchief. Javier’s blue eyes flashed coldly while Sir Bayern gulped dryly. Sir Blanc’s heart jumped in expectation. Baron Frontera tossed the question again.

“Isn’t Lake Kapua the place where you constructed the intake station for the waterway because of Viscount Lacona?”

“Yes, it is,” Lloyd said.

“And isn’t sleeping King Storma a formidable monster?”

“Yes, that is right as well,” answered Lloyd again.

“Do you have a special purpose in mind as to why you want to wake up such an evil monster?”

“Yes, it is the one I told you about a while ago.”

“What do you mean you told us already?”

“I plan on making him work for us.”

“King Storma? Do you mean to wake him up and put him to work?”

“Yes,” Lloyd answered, his voice sounding assured.

“...”

How is that possible? What kind of job does he plan to give to a monster?

The baron and the others felt dazed by Lloyd's words as they were completely in the dark about his plan. Meanwhile, Lloyd continued to speak.

"Well, I am planning on putting him to work, but it is nothing grand. Twice a day. Morning and night. I will make him roar."

"Roar?"

"Yes, it can be understood as an act of marking his territory."

"The roar of King Storma. Will it change anything?"

"Yes, there will be a large change."

"Could you be more specific?" asked the baron.

"The barony will not be damaged by the monster domino phenomenon."

"How so?"

"The monsters rushing to the west from the wilderness will never dare traverse the eastern range," Lloyd reasoned.

"Wait, because of King Storma's roar?"

"Yes," Lloyd said as he nodded. He then fished an old booklet out of his embrace.

"This is an old record I found in the study."

Crunch. Crunch Lloyd carefully flipped open the booklet, its old paper giving off a moldy smell.

"Please take a look at this. About 350 years ago, that is, before our family was bestowed this fiefdom, a lord that used to rule over the province left a record."

Lloyd pointed to one page.

“The record shows that King Storma arrived at the mountain range at that time. No one knows where he came from. But the record shows that he was very active at that time. He chopped countless trees and brought them to the middle of the mountain range.”

“To the middle of the mountain range? Why?”

Lloyd grinned at the baron’s question.

“To make a natural dam. And so, a huge volume of water stagnated in the middle of the mountain range on and on, and I am sure you can guess what comes next, right? The origin of Lake Kapua.”

“Oh...”

Everyone’s eyes broadened when they found out that Lake Kapua wasn’t a natural occurrence. It was formed by King Storma. They started to give more ears to Lloyd.

“Well, it’s not a surprise that you never heard of it. I, too, learned about it for the first time from this record. Anyway, soils piled, and trees grew on the dam, eventually transforming the scenery into the natural mountain lake it is right now. And King Storma went into hibernation in satisfaction in the center of the lake he had created.”

“So, are you telling us that Lake Kapua was created to make a home for the monster? By King Storma himself?”

“Yes, but what we must pay attention to is what follows.”

Flip. Flip.

Lloyd flipped the pages some more.

“According to the records, life in this part of the region turned rougher following King Storma’s hibernation.”

“How so?”

“Simple. Monsters came here, crossing over to the range from the east. They caused trouble, ate people, and so on. You know, the same events we experience once or twice a year at the foot of the mountain.”

“Oh...”

A glimmer appeared in the baron’s eyes. Listening to his son, the baron naturally understood. The Frontera Barony, at times, fell victim to intermittent monster attacks. Most of them were the attacks of the monsters coming down from the eastern range. It had always been a problem here, even before the monster domino phenomenon. But what would happen if a giant monster started to become active in Lake Kapua, which sat along the range down to their fiefdom? The answer was crystal clear.

“So, are you thinking that King Storma will deter the monsters?” asked the baron.

“Yes, that’s exactly what I think,” replied Lloyd.

“That’s why you want to wake King Storma up?”

“Indeed. Once he roars twice a day to mark his territory, the monsters coming from the east will naturally turn back in fear. He would be likened to a biological wall to put it one way,” Lloyd explained.

“A biological wall...” the baron said as he nodded his head.

Everyone shared the same sentiment about this idea. Lloyd’s suggestion was more than what they imagined. But it was convincing, and it was worth giving it a try.

“But don’t you think this is too dangerous?” asked the baron.

“By dangerous, you mean...”

“I am talking about the chance of King Storma storming into our fiefdom and attacking us,” the baron said in a faintly concerning voice. “Should that formidable creature charge at our fiefdom, the damage will be catastrophic. D you have any measures in plan to avoid such a mishap?”

“Of course I do,” Lloyd said with confidence.

“What is it?”

“Staying still,” Lloyd replied.

“Staying still?”

“That’s right,” affirmed Lloyd.

“How?”

“Just doing nothing. Staying still.”

The baron remained silent.

Lloyd smiled faintly.

“I mean it. This record tells me that King Storma never ever left his habitat. He manifested a highly territorial quality. I believe the same thing will happen again,” Lloyd reasoned.

“However, should something were to happen-”

“Yes, I know what you mean and are worried about. But we have Sir Asrahan with us.” Lloyd looked at Javier.

“What?” The baron looked at Lloyd, confused.

“As you know already, he is a sword master.”

Everyone’s gaze traveled to focus on Javier, who must have become embarrassed. He forced out some coughs. Lloyd smiled in a mischievous way.

“If King Storma storms into the fiefdom to wreak havoc on us, the answer is simple. We have Sir Asrahan, a sword master. Moreover, we are joined by the brave White Cavalry. Regardless of how powerful the monster is, we should be able to hunt him down with ease,” Lloyd assured.

It was true. Lloyd studied King Storma by reading several works of literature and scholarly journals of many scholars. He reached the conclusion that the barony's current capabilities would be enough to hunt down the monster.

"We expect that King Storma will be as powerful as the Gigatitan we went up against back in Cremo," Lloyd continued. "So, if our goal is just hunting it down and nothing else, Sir Asrahan should be able to fight it alone. He could even kill it. It would be much easier than hundreds of thousands of locusts or hundreds of Mastodons. There would only be one opponent to go against."

"But our goal is not hunting but to make him work for us?" asked the baron.

"That's right. It appears that this is the best measure we have in our hands right now," reasoned Lloyd.

"Hmm... It does appear so." The baron nodded. Lloyd's explanation allowed him to visualize the plan in his head. In summary, King Storma wasn't that difficult to take care of on the off chance he went berserk and threatened the fiefdom. And if they achieved the goal, King Storma was set to effectively deter a large number of peskier monsters from dealing with than King Storma himself. Controlling him wasn't that hard, and yet, he efficiently blocked bigger threats. That was what King Storma was to the barony.

"In short, he would be a gigantic guard dog. A guard dog on a leash in our front yard that scares and deters other monsters," said the baroness, who had been quietly listening to the conversation.

Come to think of it, King Storma was certainly set to be a guard dog. It was a good summary. Thanks to her analogy, everyone was able to get a clearer picture of Lloyd's plan. But that didn't mean that everyone didn't have any questions.

"Hmm, I somehow see it now. But I wonder..." The baron muttered as he cocked his head to the side. "How do you plan on waking him up and controlling him at your disposal?"

“We won’t be controlling him,” answered Lloyd.

“Then?”

“We’ll put him to exercise.”

Lloyd brought his hand to the old booklet, turning the pages until it landed on the last one.

“Take a look here.”

Everyone’s eyes followed Lloyd’s fingers, which were pointing at the sentence that defined King Storma.

[Very similar to a beaver.]

“A beaver...?”

Everyone tilted their heads to the side with the exemption of Sir Blanc, who thus spoke.

“A beaver is a large animal that looks like a rat and lives in the river to make dams, right?”

“Very good. You are right, Sir Blanc. It appears that the others are not familiar with the animal,” said Lloyd as he smiled.

“It’s just like what Sir Blanc said. Beavers tend to make dams in the rivers or lakes by gathering up tree branches. They show a great obsession with dams. Sometimes, they create one from generation to generation. Therefore, when a dam is broken, they leave everything behind and try to make another one.”

“Are you saying,” said the baron, “that King Storma will be the same?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded his head as he recalled the time he watched a program about beavers back in South Korea.

In a TV program, I don't know, was it episode 202? It showed beavers raised in zoos.

Their daily life consisted of creating dams. They worked hard to build one. But once they succeeded, the zookeeper shattered and destroyed it to pieces without any mercy.

I thought the zookeeper was evil and abusing the animal. But that wasn't the case.

The zookeeper's interview came to Lloyd's mind. She said destroying the dams was a way to keep the wild nature of beavers. It kept them moving. If the dam was left all built and strong, the beavers accepted the reality and settled there. They got lazy and fat and sick. That was the rationale behind the constant demolition of their dams. Giving them work to do—that was the way to keep them industrious, mobile, and healthy.

Several scholars analyzed and concluded that King Storma was much like the beavers in that sense. So, this method will probably work as well.

Lloyd briefly walked them through about the nature of the beaver, excluding the part about the TV program. And around the time everyone started to nod in understanding, Lloyd spoke with confidence.

"As such, we just have to use that method as well."

"That method?"

"Yes, we will slightly destroy the edge of Lake Kapua while King Storma is asleep."

"And you think King Storma will wake up to repair the dam after feeling the damage?"

"That's exactly what I mean."

"What happens if the dam is all repaired?"

"We can sneak again and destroy it."

For a split second, everyone couldn’t find the words to respond. It was because they suddenly felt compassion toward King Storma, who was in hibernation. But Lloyd was indifferent to everyone’s gaze.

Right now, we just don’t have the time to mind that.

As of now, the fiefdom was on the verge of being swept away by the monster domino. So, if he could bring peace and wellness to the fiefdom by harassing a giant monster for about a year, Lloyd was ready to do it even a hundred times.

“Plus, you don’t have to feel compassion for King Storma. We have our own share of risks by waking him up.”

“Hmm, yes, since he surely is a giant monster.”

“Yes, and on top of that, we might cause a great flood if we destroy the dam after inaccurately calculating the demolition scope.”

“A great flood, eh?” asked the baron.

“Yes.”

Lloyd’s gaze turned serious.

“That is the thing with dams, just a tiny fraction is all it needs for the entire thing to be demolished. And more than the miscalculation, King Storma going berserk in the lake can cause trouble. That would cause a tsunami, overflowing the water out of the dam. Then there would be another flood,” stated Lloyd.

Everyone became speechless. They never ever thought about such a type of disaster.

Well, not so surprising that they’re speechless. I mean, they have never encountered a huge dam before.

But the two types of disasters he had used as an example held the possibility of happening anytime at the fiefdom.

First case was the demolition of the Stava dam in Italy in 1985. A little damage on the outer wall collapsed the entire dam, and about 66,000 gallons of water swept the village at the speed of 55 mph.

The second case, the lake tsunami, was worse.

In 1963, the Vajont dam collapsed. That was even more awful. The two sides of the dam contained a limestone and clay layer. And when the water level increased because of the dam, it touched this layer until the foundation weakened and created a landslide. 238 million square meters worth of soil slid into the dam all at once, whose impact power was twice the impact of the Hiroshima nuclear bomb.

The aftermath was horrifying. The large amount of soil fell out of the dam lake to create a mega-tsunami that soared as high as 820 feet. The shocking and terrorizing wave went over the dam, sweeping the entire village nearby. It was a mega catastrophe, with around 2,500 to 5,000 people losing their lives.

“But, well, attention must be paid to ensure that those disasters will not be happening here. You can leave that to me. Surveying and designing are perfect for a job like this.”

Lloyd planned to make meticulous calculations to avoid any damage to the dam when they awakened King Storma and put him to work by purposefully destroying a part of the dam. And he would also lead and design King Storma’s movement.

“And so, since King Storma is a dangerous monster, only Sir Asrahan, the White Cavalry, and I will be working on this job.”

“Us?” asked Sir Blanc.

Lloyd grinned and spoke.

“Yes, since the job is too risky for ordinary engineers to partake in. Even when King Storma notices us and acts up, your men will able to respond to him and get ready for combat.”

That would be something impossible for ordinary soldiers. There was a chance of massive casualty should King Storma go berserk. Thus, Lloyd needed strong men who could fight right away when things went south during the shoveling.

“So, this is the reason why I hurried to bring your men to the civil engineer corp and make the Megalania structure,” Lloyd went on. “Why, you ask? To make you all used to shoveling.”

Lloyd’s nonchalant voice rang aloud in the office. Everyone clamped their mouths shut. And soon, it hit them that Lloyd had been holding various projects with this very plan in mind. As such, everyone could only get on board with his plan, thereby kickstarting Lloyd’s evil and sly scheme of intentionally waking the sleeping ancient lake monster and taking advantage of him.

Chapter 114: The Conqueror of the Fountain (3)

Splash.

Autumn must have arrived already. Lloyd withdrew his hand after he touched the lake water. It was colder than he thought. It was the same for the morning air”

It’s perfect weather to catch a cold.

After washing his face, Lloyd looked around the lake. Lake Kapua. It was a typical lake located in the mountains. But its size was obscenely vast. Because of the twisted and elongated terrain, his eyes couldn’t hold the whole area in one gaze.

I think it’s about the size of Lake Soyang.

Lake Soyang bordered Chuncheon, Yanggu, and Inje in Gangwon Province in South Korea. It was about 1,608 hectares in area, and its curve extended to about 1,200 yards. It was an expansive lake whose storage reached up to 2.9 billion tons.

I think this place would be just that.

Lake Soyang of South Korea and Lake Kapua in this mountain range. The two shared several similarities. First of all, they weren’t naturally formed. Lake Soyang was human-made, while Lake Kapua was constructed by King Storma. Due to the artificial construction, most of the lake water was stopped at a particular point.

If the stop gate for Lake Soyang was the Soyang dam, this place would be right there.

Lloyd gazed westward. His eyes were already glimmering from the faint wave of mana.

Ding Dong.

[Surveying skill has been activated.]

[Scanning will begin.]

Flash!

Lloyd studied the western side of the lake with a sharp eye. He closely looked at the geography and features of the area using his surveying skill.

This lake is basically a dam. If I had to compare, it kind of feels like a rockfill dam."

A rockfill dam was different from a regular concrete gravity dam. While the latter was constructed by pouring concrete, a rockfill dam was composed of a mix of rock, pebbles, sand, and other ingredients. The dam King Storma had built was exactly like that.

King Storma used large amounts of rocks and pebbles, and on top of that, he weaved together entire trees"

Lloyd activated the "Subterranean Scanning," which was an optional skill within the surveying skill. He then got a clear read on the components of the 16-foot deep underground. The inside of the dam was also made visible, albeit faintly. Though it wasn't a complete scan, he was able to tell that the dam was so well built that it looked like an impenetrable fortress.

King Storma ripped out humongous trees by their roots.

The trees were then piled up, numbering thousands and tens of thousands, and in between the frames, King Storma used a massive amount of pebbles, rocks, and sand to fill up any empty crevices left behind. And as years passed by, sand naturally accumulated on the surface. As grass and trees started to grow on top, their roots entangled with each other and firmly set themselves in place. This became a key feature of the terrain.

I don't even think dynamite is going to cut it.

Lloyd continued to be surprised as he laid his eyes on the lake. But he wasn't worried because, right now, destroying the whole dam wasn't his goal. Doing so could actually cause several million gallons worth of water to flood this whole place. Right now, the goal was to destroy only a portion of the dam.

Just small enough to still keep the entire dam structure intact.

It would be imperative to carefully calculate his plan.

Splash! Splash! Lloyd washed his face with the lake water after collecting the data around the dam with the surveying skill. And when the coldness of the water settled his thoughts, Lloyd activated the survey design skill to test out the collected data.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Option 3: Simulation mode has been activated.]

[The topographical data in the current design space will be available for simulation.]

Bzzt! A virtual design space appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes, applying the data he acquired just now.

Flash!

All sorts of quantitative and qualitative data points of the area's physical characteristics were displayed in front of him. The height of the topography and the chemical composition. All of those elements were reflected in the design space. Lines were drawn. The sides were overlapped. Just like that, the western area of Lake Kapua appeared in the virtual space—no different from the actual one.

Let's begin.

Lloyd set about moving his hands, sometimes like a performer twanging a guitar string in arpeggio or tapping the piano key in staccato. Or like sliding the violin in glissando. Lloyd's two hands freely moved around the virtual space, pulling a point, expanding a line, and flipping a side. Low hills were dug. Rocks were separated. Holes were dug. Lloyd destroyed, repaired, penetrated, and dug, repeating all sorts of tries and experiments. He ran all kinds of tests on almost all points of the dam that occupied the west of the lake. While that was happening, Lloyd was so engrossed in the job that he failed to notice the hard gaze coming from his side.

"..."

Javier quietly stared at Lloyd. He's doing it again, said Javier to himself. Lloyd was in a trance, yes, but it didn't look like he was meditating or was deep in thought. Instead, his eyes were glimmering brightly. He was busy scanning and staring into the distance. And his hands—they kept moving without a second of rest while his arms were busily outstretched in front of him.

Could it be that Master Lloyd can see something others can't see?

No matter how much Javier thought about it, that was the only explanation he could come up with. And that made Javier more perplexed.

Master Lloyd can see things even I cannot see?

Javier's neat eyebrows furrowed slightly. Of course, he had seen his young master do this several times before. But he had simply brushed it off, thinking that Master Lloyd sees and feels something he failed to see. After all, he wasn't a sword master. But right now, he learned that it wasn't the case.

When I became a sword master, my senses were perfected. And yet, I still can't feel or see anything, just like before.

Javier's senses transcended human capacity. He could pick up even the tiniest sound around him if he wanted. So much as a speck of dust and its energy could be sensed. And yet, he failed to pick up or see whatever it was that Lloyd saw at the moment. It was so even when he was right beside Lloyd.

What could it be?

Something visible to Lloyd but wasn’t to Javier. He racked his brain, but nothing came to his mind. It didn’t look like magic because he didn’t feel the mana.

A special power yet to be uncovered? Or is it just a habit he has when he focuses on something?

Pinch.

To test it out, Javier slightly pinched both sides of Lloyd’s cheeks. He then stood in front of Lloyd and waved his arms. But nothing. Lloyd didn’t react. With a focused expression and gaze, Lloyd kept on touching and waving in the air.

The more I learn about him, the harder it gets to make sense of him.

Lloyd Frontera. His young master. Javier wondered what this man was. He had thought he knew Lloyd well before. A hooligan young master who came to his senses.

But now, I can’t make sense of him anymore.

Despite the internal confusion Javier was going through, Lloyd remained focused on the design work. As Javier was staring at Lloyd, questions kept invading his thoughts. However, he willfully pushed them to the back of his mind, his blue eyes glimmering. Leaves, which were insensitive to his thoughts, kept falling to tap on his shoulders.

Three days passed, and the design was complete. At last, the demolition plan was finished.

“I am sure you know it already. Today, we will be demolishing a part of the dam that supports Lake Kapua.” Lloyd was standing in front of the 500 White Calvary, giving a speech”

“As such, everyone must be well aware of the goal of our job. Today, we are not destroying the whole dam. We will instead dig and break down just the designated area. Now, each of you has worked together with my civil engineers, and today's job is the very reason that you familiarized yourselves with the shovel."

Lloyd continued talking.

"Some of you might ask, 'If the job involves shoveling only, why aren't the civil engineers of the fiefdom joining us?' That is an incorrect way of thinking. Their safety can never be guaranteed in this job. They will not be able to fend for themselves against King Storma that will be awakened by our demolition. They are not like you, the brave lances of the White Cavalry."

Lloyd traveled the length of the formation and pointed at each of them one by one.

"I have no inkling of doubt that you are all very different from the engineers. Even if King Storma wakes up and fights back during our job today, you can get right into combat with the shovel in hand as you are strong and brave warriors. Am I correct?"

"Yes, you are!"

Lloyd's obvious sweet talk was intentional, and it was meant to boost the ego of the lancers of the White Cavalry. They gradually started to feel happier hearing Lloyd's words.

"Yes, indeed. This job is made possible because you are with me. Clumsy knights and boastful warriors don't stand a chance against you. Who in the world would dare come down to this dangerous place to dig and wake such an epic evil monster and think to wield the shovel in the face of impending threats? Who else but the White Cavalry?! Am I right, or what?!"

"Wooo!!!"

"What are you?!" yelled Lloyd.

"The best of the best, the White Cavalry!"

“What’s the White Cavalry?!” yelled Lloyd once again.

“Valor! Honor! Bravery!”

“And we’ll do what today?!”

“Shoveling! With valor, honor, and bravery!”

At last, pride swelled among the lancers of the White Cavalry. It practically soared through the sky. Lloyd lifted his shovel high with a meaningful smile on his face and pointed at the demolition spot.

“Let’s go! Group one! Off you go!”

“Off we go!”

The shout kickstarted the demolition. The White Cavalry was overwhelmed with a soaring pride that all fears were driven out of them. Based on their overflowing stamina and valor, they shoveled continuously. And after the pep talk was over, Lloyd proceeded to grab the shovel by himself and move along with the group to actualize the demolition plan he had simulated countless times. Not a single thing deviated from the plan. The number of laborers was exact, and only the designated land mass was dug out. They stacked up with precision. The demolition was very detailed, so they went through the job with a fine-tooth comb to ensure that the lake water would not flood and that the structure would remain intact. Finally, Lloyd called Javier.

“Okay, just as I had explained to you,” said Lloyd, “Do you see the red marks drawn on four sides of the dam?”

“Should I break that area?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, using your mana blast. Make sure that it’s quick and clean at a perfect angle. Oh, and the spot will collapse right after it breaks, so run back here as soon as you hit it.”

“Does that mean I will be swept away by the rubbles if I escape late?” asked Javier.

“Yeah. Of course.”

“Will you then come to save me, Master Lloyd?”

“Why would I?”

“...”

“But I’ll make sure that you get compensated for the accident,” assured Lloyd.

“What are you saying...”

“And mourn your death anniversary. Not a year missed.”

“I... am still alive, Master Lloyd,” Javier griped.

“Well, just saying. Anyway, really, what are you waiting for? Go now. On the double.”

“Whew... I’ll go.”

Javier walked over to the demolition spot as he shook his head. The White Cavalry had courageously shoveled all throughout the morning. But now, the site was empty of people. Javier breathed heavily before drawing his sword.

“Hmm..”

Flash!

A ray of light flashed in his sword, and it penetrated the red mark. The ground trembled lightly. And by that time, Javier’s sword was already back to its sheath.

Kaboom!

A total of six mana blasts burst in a consecutive series. They uniformly penetrated and ruined the upper part of the dam after precisely following their intended path. And they finally exploded.

Crash! Rumble!

Explosion and demolition. Intentional and measured destruction. Just like that, a portion of King Storma's dam crumbled for the first time in 300 years of its construction.

Rumble!

Hundreds of tons of piles of dirt and rocks slid down into the water, and its massive vibration shook the entire dam. But the dam remained solid, undestroyed. The same went for the lake trapped inside the dam.

It's working. I succeeded"

Lloyd clenched his hands as he threw his gaze to the center of the lake. A small island was sitting there, but it actually wasn't an island. Just like how beavers created their lodge by stacking up branches at the center of a lake, King Storma had built a massive nest at the center of his lake.

What about him?

Lloyd held a glint of nervousness in his eyes as he gazed at the nest. Today's project wasn't about the demolition. The objective was to demolish a part of the dam and wake the giant monster up and put him to work. That was the ultimate goal of mobilizing the White Cavalry in shoveling.

So stop sleeping and wake up, you sleepyhead. 300 years of hibernation is enough. It's time for you to get to work. Repair the broken dam. Mark your territory day and night. Stop the eastern monsters that will flood here like a domino.

Wishing such, Lloyd clenched his hands. He gulped and stared at King Storma's nest. Just then...

Wham!

The elevated nest that floated on the lake like an island... The huge trees that grew on its peak tumbled a little. A second later, it did once more.

Crash!

This time, the shake was a bit louder. Trees swayed back and forth in great motion.

Crash! Wham!

It now tumbled so hard that a willow tree fell. The same went for the upper part of the nest that supported the tree.

Thwack! Crash!

The entire nest rocked violently as though something giant woke up from its slumber and staggered half-asleep. And all of a sudden, something roared in horrifying terror as if it was letting out a griping grumble.

“Bibeong!”

Its vigor was so ferocious that it could upturn the whole world. But for some reason, the voice sounded similar to the cry of a fantastical creature in Lloyd’s ears. King Storma’s roar thundered through the lake.

Chapter 115: Taming a Fantastical Creature (1)

“Bibeong!”

A thunderous cry rang aloud, shaking up the whole lake with force enough to turn the world upside down. Lloyd, who was hiding in the bush with the White Cavalry, was confused when he heard its cry.

Eh?

What is that? Why is it crying like that? It sounds so familiar. It sounds like a fantastical creature.

Just when Lloyd thought so, another ferocious outcry roared beneath the nest once again.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

Fwoosh!

This time, his cry came louder. The clamorous noise created several ripples in the lake. The lancers of the White Cavalry reflexively tightened the shovel in their hands in nervousness. But Lloyd was different. He wasn’t nervous at all. He was rather curious and confused because of King Storma’s roar, which he could understand its meaning.

“Wait a minute. He just shouted, ‘Who broke my dam?!’ right? Did I hear it correctly?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

When Lloyd asked Ppodong as he looked down at his embrace, Ppodong nodded his head hard.

“Ppo-do-dong. Ppodong. Ppo-do-dong!”

“Right?” confirmed Lloyd once more.

“Ppodong!”

“Yeah, it sounded like that to me too.”

Lloyd was absolutely certain about what King Storma said.

It was as if an automatic translator was lodged in my head when he spoke. His words were so clear and vivid. This feels so familiar.

It was only natural as he experienced it all the time. It was always like that when he talked to Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang.

So this is something I only experience when I’m chatting with fantastical creatures.

The mechanism behind the translation was a mystery to Lloyd as well because it just happened from the moment he had summoned Ppodong. For some inexplicable reasons, Ppodong’s language made clear sense to him as though a real-time translation tool was at work in his head or as though he was born with a top fantastical creature certification. He just could understand them.

But why is that happening right now?

King Storma was supposed to be an evil creature. So it was a wonder for Lloyd why the latter’s outcry sounded like that of a fantastical creature. Lloyd was jostled out of his curious state when he heard another ferocious roar.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeo-beo-beo-beo-beong!”

Thwack!

A blare of noise thundered along with the roar. One side of the nest jerked upward, causing an explosive water spray. A gigantic shape slowly emerged to reveal a round and chubby silhouette that stood tall and high.

Splaaash!

The creature’s 65-foot tail, whose flat and wide shape resembled an oar of a ship, hit the water. The monster then stood up on his short and thick hind legs, propping him firm and stable. Lloyd noticed the monster’s bloated belly, his short front legs, and huge and round head. His water-soaked fur was dark brown and wide open mouth revealed a set of square front teeth. He stood upright, his towering height reaching 328 feet. And once again, he roared aloud.

“Bibeong!”

Fwoosh!

The tumultuous roar echoed through the lake and range dozens of times. At last, a realization hit Lloyd.

That’s not a beaver-like creature! It’s literally a beaver!

Lloyd was indeed right. King Storma, who finally emerged from his nest, didn’t just act akin to a beaver. It was his looks as well. King Storma plainly looked like a giant 328-foot beaver. What he did after he let out another cry was much like the animal as well.

Splash! King Storma leaned forward and smoothly dove into the water. And he started to swim toward the spot destroyed by Javier’s mana blast”

Okay, it’s going as planned”

Beavers manifested an infinite obsession over the dams they created out of their hands, and Lloyd planned out this operation based on that very nature. The plan was now going exactly the way Lloyd had devised, for the giant beaver made for the dam to repair it.

Good job. Just go straight. Fix the broken dam.

Lloyd internally cheered for King Storma, hoping that he would swim toward the destroyed spot. But things evolved against Lloyd’s wish as King Storma stopped dead in his tracks in the water. And he started to glance around, sniffing hard and letting out a curious cry all of a sudden.

“Bibeo-beong? Bibeong?”

Of course, his words were comprehensible to Lloyd as well. And they meant...

Something smells off...? What?

Sniff! Sniff! Sniff! King Storma’s nose sucked in the air continuously, and he could catch a faint yet strange odor hanging in the air, an odor that didn’t go well with the soil, trees, and lake. Something metallic. The smell of metal wafted out in the air, stimulating his senses.

Bibeong? Bibeo-beong?

King Storma thought to himself as he continued to sniff.

I’m sure. This thick smell of metal has to belong to humans. Only such a weak and greedy race goes around, leaving traces of this heavy, metallic smell. This only means...

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeo-beong!”

King Storma’s gaze moved toward the dam, the place he felt the vibration that woke him up a while ago. He looked at the portion of the dam.

“Bibeong!”

At last, things cleared for King Storma. He realized that the dam didn’t break due to old age or by coincidence. It was the doing of humans that smelled like metal. They must have broken them for whatever reason they had. How dare they touch his precious dam!

“Bibeo-beo-beong!”

King Storma’s large black eyes held a glint of rage. He combed the area around the lake with a burning gaze. And because of that, Lloyd gulped in nervousness.

He’s looking for us right now.

King Storma’s enraged outcry naturally translated in his head, just like when he chatted with his fantastical creatures.

He’s saying that he can smell metal. That humans are around here. That it’s the humans that woke him up and ruined his dam... Dang, he can deduce very well.

King Storma was no joke. Lloyd realized that the latter didn’t simply have the intelligence of a beast or an evil creature. He turned out to be as intelligent as Ppodong, Bangul, or Hamang, who all could reason and infer as much as the humans.

I think I need to rethink my plan.

Lloyd’s expression hardened, and he immediately collected his thoughts.

Okay, so originally, I planned to keep damaging the dam to wake King Storma up and repair the dam over and over again. I meant to repeat the same process once King Storma goes back in hibernation after finishing with the repair until the monster domino phenomenon was over. I planned to repeat the process for about a year.

Lloyd intended to semi-doom King Storma to endless work, just like the beavers Lloyd saw on TV and like Sisyphus bound to roll up the rock forever. But now, from the looks of it, Lloyd realized that he could get hurt unless he tweaked the plan.

He’s much smarter than I expected.

Lloyd had thought King Storma would be an evil creature like the Gigatitan. A beast. It never occurred to Lloyd that he would manifest the same characteristics as a fantastical creature.

So, I don’t think we can go on with our current operation as planned.

It may work this very first time, but judging by King Storma’s reasoning capacity, Lloyd would be caught two or three tries later. That was why…

I need a counterattack.

Lloyd started to rack his brain, analyzing his original plan and King Storma's nature and intelligence. He disassembled the facts as though they were pieces of a puzzle. Placing every piece on the mind floor, Lloyd allowed himself to go back to square one. He started to fit a new type of puzzle. And at last, he found the answer.

"Javier?"

Lloyd's gaze moved after finishing up the calculation, and looking straight into Javier's eyes, he said, "I need you to play the villain today."

"I'm not sure what you mean..." Javier asked with a dissatisfied look on his face.

Lloyd rolled up a corner of his lips.

"It's just as I said. I need you to be the villain. That is, to King Storma."

"To King Storma? Does that mean..." Javier's eyes glimmered for a second as he paused. "That I should kill him?"

"No. No, no! Never!" Lloyd hurriedly objected as he shook his hand hard. "You can't kill him. Come on, man. Think about it. Think what would happen if you killed him. Who's going to scare and stop the monster herds rushing into the barony because of the domino phenomenon?"

"Then..." Javier murmured, discouraged.

"King Storma's looking for someone to put the blame on."

"Excuse me? Someone to put the blame on?" asked Javier"

"Yeah, to add to that a bit, he's now searching for the trace of the culprit who ruined the dam."

"Is that the reason why he stopped approaching the dam and started to look around?"

"Yeah, can you see him sniffing now?" asked Lloyd"

“Yes.”

“He must be searching for the source of the metallic smell.”

“He must have concluded that it was a human’s doing,” concluded Javier.

“Yes, that’s it.” Lloyd grinned and continued, “So my dear brave, chic, and cynical Sir Asrahan. Will you please work on behalf of humanity today?”

“Why should I do it?”

“Because you’re handsome.”

Javier shut his mouth while Lloyd grinned viciously.

“Look around you,” said Lloyd, “Is there anyone who’s more handsome than you?”

“No one.”

“Wow. It didn’t even take a second for you to answer that.”

“It’s a clear fact,” Javier drawled”

“Right. So that makes you the representative of us.”

“What kind of logic is that...”

“To to be more specific, I want you to go where King Storma can notice you easily, and draw his attention, acting as if you’re the one who ruined his dam today.”

“You must have something in mind,” said Javier.

“Indeed. I do have something in mind. And technically speaking, you’re the one who ruined the dam anyway. Am I wrong?”

“But that was a collective effort…”

“Well, yeah, but you hit it the last,” reasoned Lloyd.

“...”

Oh, what a filthy and nasty young master you are. Javier looked daggers at Lloyd for a moment, but he soon nodded after accepting his predicament.

“Okay. I will do it. But on one condition, Master Lloyd,” said Javier.

“Do you have a favor to ask?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Nah, I refuse.”

“...”

“What? Why? What? You think I’d immediately take up your offer if you put on serious air right now?”

“Whew, no.”

“Right? Good call. Come on. Off you go. Don’t forget to fight in the shallow water, so the lake doesn’t overflow,” instructed Lloyd finally.

“Yes. Well then.”

Javier sighed, thinking about what he meant to ask for as a favor: Don’t take risks regardless of whatever it is that you plan to do. Javier lowered his body with resignation and started to walk under a bush, sneaking off for a long time until the distance between him and the others reached about 300 yards. He then got up and stood on a noticeable rock in the lake.

Swish!

A sword came out of the sheath as Javier activated the Asrahan Core Technique. He then ferociously collided with the two circles.

Boom!

A powerful mana blast ejected out of his sword, creating a loud explosive sound in the air as it cut across the wind. King Storma, which had been glancing around till then, snapped his head to immediately discover a man standing on the rock. Javier.

“Bibeong!”

King Storma clearly remembered this explosive sound. It was the booming noise he faintly heard during his sweet slumber that was interrupted. It was the noise that smashed his precious dam. The two noises were the same. King Storma was certain about it, so it was concluded that the silver-haired man standing across the lake with a sword in his hand was the culprit who ruined his beloved dam!

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

He let out a savage roar before diving into the cold water. He swam his giant body through the lake.

Swoosh!

Because King Storma had a giant body, his movement appeared slow when it wasn’t actually. The oar-like flat and wide tail whisked a huge amount of water as it moved, powerfully propelling the 328-foot body forward. It had taken only a few strokes for King Storma to arrive at the water Javier was standing.

“Bibeong!”

Splash!

He emerged from the water and instantly struck Javier down with his short and thick front leg.

Crash! His mammoth body split the rock in half. No, it was shattered to pieces. King Storma studied the smashed rock as he breathed heavily in anger. But he failed to find the body of the despicable man. Just then...

“I’m right here.”

All of a sudden, King Storma heard an icy voice about 20 yards away. A powerful shockwave charged right at him at the same time.

Kaboom! The mana blast brushed King Storma right over his head. King Storma was taken aback by the blow.

“Bibeong! (Shoot! You surprised me!)”

Surprise evolved into rage”

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

From then on, King Storma became more ferocious and wild. He let his wild nature guide him to kill this despicable human for destroying his dam. But each time he attacked, Javier easily dodged him as though he was a fruit fly. And he fired mana blasts at times, intentionally missing them. Thanks to his strategy, King Storma soon grew obsessed with Javier. Each time Javier avoided and escaped, King Storma used all his senses to focus on Javier.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong!”

King Storma grew more aggressive as time progressed. And so, he was completely unaware of a human devising another plan. Lloyd.

Okay. Good.

Lloyd was furtively approaching behind King Storma. And in his hand carried a sure-fire weapon that would subdue the giant beaver. It was the food that downsized fantastical creatures: the blue sunflower seed.

Chapter 116: Taming a Fantastical Creature (2)

Okay. It's working.

Furtively and swiftly.

Lloyd moved, sliding forward at each step. He was holding the blue sunflower seed in his hand. The target was King Storma, who was going rampant in front of him.

It's worth trying to feed King Storma the blue sunflower seed.

Lloyd was certain that King Storma was a fantastical creature, and it was evidenced by his understanding of the latter's language. But Lloyd postulated that King Storma had a different nature from his own summon partners. Ppodong and Bangul were small in size on a regular day until they ate a red sunflower seed to grow gigantic for a certain period of time. Whereas King Storma was different. He was gigantic on a regular day, and the blue sunflower seed was needed to keep him small for some time.

It's plausible enough.

Or not. If his speculation turned out wrong, then he could always come up with another alternative.

I've got a lot of options in my hands. Retreat, or suppress, or kill if I'm all out of options. And it doesn't look like this one has an owner or anything.

Lloyd was actually surprised to find out that a fantastical creature he didn't summon existed in this world. But that hardly mattered. After all, what really mattered was that this monster was a fantastical creature and hinted at the chance of being tamed. That was all that mattered.

A little more.

King Storma was going wild to catch Javier. Lloyd narrowed the distance, slowly wading through the waist-deep water to get closer. Just then,

“Bibeong?”

King Storma snapped his large and round head to his side!

“...!”

Lloyd immediately ducked down, plunging deep into the water head below. The water above his head above rippled. Lloyd could see from underwater that King Storma staring at him as the latter glanced around. Just when Lloyd wondered if he was caught...

Kaboom! A mana blast came from the other side, brushing King Storma’s head. That made him focus back on Javier.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

King Storma went wild again as he created a blaring and crashing noise. Lloyd drew a sigh of relief as he watched the back of King Storma in the water.

Woah. That beaver is more sensitive than I thought.

It was seriously dangerous a while ago. If Lloyd had been slow to react and failed to hide underwater, King Storma might have found him and attacked.

I should approach him underwater.

From then on, Lloyd started to approach King Storma by slowly crawling under the lake. He occasionally came out of the water to breathe. As he did, he direly wished for Javier’s success.

Javier! Please! Make him focus only on you!

Of course, Lloyd didn’t have telepathic powers. As such, his dire wish wasn’t shared to Javier, not an inch of it. On the other hand, Javier was thinking the following.

Master Lloyd is risking his life this time again.

Javier wished that wouldn’t be the case. But his wish wasn’t granted.

He’s always like that.

In retrospect, Master Lloyd was always like that. It was the same case when he dueled with Sir Neumann to restore order in the fiefdom, when he entered the cave of wild ants, and when he rescued the civil engineers from the hands of the dark mage Lupellan.

His words betray his actions all the time.

By now, Lloyd’s pattern was obvious to Javier. He said he despised taking risks and acted brazenly that he would never do it. But his action was...

When the most dangerous moment came, he never hesitated to be in the front.

It was just like now. He never tossed any responsibilities to someone else and took on all the risks himself. Lloyd Frontera, his young master, was the paragon of a person who proved himself through his actions.

So I suppose my role for today is this.

Javier resolved to make sure that his young master would not solely bear all the risks to himself. Whatever threat came along the way, Javier determined that he would take them. Another mana blast was emitted, and this time, it was more forceful. He continued to provoke King Storma, but he realized that he had to do more. King Storma could whip around at any moment and discover Lloyd coming in his direction. So Javier came up with a plan to up his game and draw King Storma’s attention more drastically.

“Bibeong!”

Crash!

His front leg crashed down on Javier, and he evaded swiftly, distancing away from the beaver.

“Hmm...”

He inhaled heavily. But it wasn’t to use the aura or emit a more powerful mana blast. No, not at all. After drawing in a large amount of air, he hollered at the top of his lungs.

“Bibeong!”

His mana-loaded shout rang aloud in the air, shaking up the entire lake area. It was as loud as King Storma’s roar. Could it be because of his shout? King Storma froze, and he appeared flustered. It was because what Javier had shouted a second ago meant “Mother” in King Storma's language.

“Bibeong? (But I am not your mother. And besides, I’m a male who’s been single for the past couple hundred years!)” said King Storma after stopping.

Javier then pointed at him, and he shouted once again, with greater mana this time.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!” Javier shouted.

Of course, Javier didn’t know how to speak King Storma's language. And thus, he didn’t know what he was saying. He simply yelled. But to King Storma, this human friend made sense. “It’s going to rain tonight! Why?! I don’t have sauce on my tonkatsu!” King Storma was dismayed.

“Bibeo-beong? (Are you okay? Are you sick or anything?)”

King Storma was dismayed. This bad person who ruined his dam started to talk gibberish all of a sudden. Soon, dismay began to develop into nervousness. It was obviously the case. Imagine having your door kicked and shoved one day by a rude neighbor. Then when you open your door in anger and complain to him, he starts to talk senselessly. You realized that he was not in the right mind. The frustration would soon evolve into nervousness and fear. That was exactly what King Storma was feeling.

“Bibeong? Bibeo-beong? (Can you not fight me with the right state of mind, just like a while ago?)” King Storma sincerely asked.

To this, Javier replied, “Bibeong! Bibeo-beong! Bi-beo-beong! Bibeong! (It’s sad to hula dance with a metal chain around you! It’s good to bleed your nose! Since I am cute!)”

“Bi... beo-beong?” asked King Storma.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong! Bibebeong! (So the king said! I tear up sometimes! I love you, braised beef!)”

“Bibeong, Bibeo-beong?”

King Storma was dismayed to the hilt. And he started to think.

Bibeong. Bibeo-beong.

This human has definitely lost it, King Storma thought to himself as he wondered if he should continue this fight. He waffled whether he should appease this man to knock some senses back into him. The more King Storma pondered hard, his whole vision and nerves focused on Javier and him only.

Good. This is working.

A mischievous smile formed on Javier’s face, and he stole a glance as he continued to holler gibberish. He saw Lloyd, who was already climbing King Storma’s tail slowly and sneakily.

Good. Very good. Just keep this up!

Lloyd cheered Javier through his gaze as he climbed King Storma’s tail with more vigor. Feeling like he had morphed into a tick, he climbed far and high until he finally arrived at King Storma’s head.

“Bibeong?”

It was only then that King Storma noticed something strange. So he snapped his head up, but it was too late.

Now!

Jump! Lloyd leaped high from the crown of his head, flinging his body in the air as he gazed downward. Lloyd saw King Storma turning his way, and their eyes met.

“Bibeong...?”

King Storma’s mouth gaped wide, and Lloyd tossed the seed right at it.

Swish! The blue sunflower seed left his hand, and as it was hurled straight, it drew a fastball trajectory. Since King Storma was dazed and frozen for a second, the seed went right into his mouth.

Gulp!

“Bibeo-beong?”

King Storma gulped the seed by reflex. And...

Boom!

He became small at about four inches tall.

Splash!

“Bibeong...?”

He instantly grew small in size. He was soon submerged in the water, which flustered King Storma. He felt chaotic.

Bibeo-beong? Bibeo-beong?

All he did was gulp something small that was tossed into his mouth, and now the whole world grew gigantic around him! Everything around his view of the lake water appeared colossal. It was a first for King Storma to see a swaying water plant bigger than him. The same went for a fish that swam by him and for a frog that hopped away in surprise. Everything looked about his size. And...

“Got you!”

“...!”

Swoosh! A grip plunged into the water to grab him in a flash. And it lifted him up.

“Bi, Bibeong!”

King Storma fiercely resisted, just like the time he chopped ten trees in one stroke and smashed a rock with his buttock. He fought and jerked and turned with power. But nothing changed. It was useless, and he couldn’t wrench himself off the grip. And the world that appeared around him... looked so vast and grand!

“Hey, have you given up now?”

“...!”

King Storma followed the arm that stretched from the grip, and it felt grand and marvelous, like the mountain range. Over it, he saw the face of a human that covered the sky. He saw the man’s dark hair dripping with water and his eyes resembling a full moon. King Storma felt stifled and hopeless. It was shocking to see an organism larger than him. And then, it hit him. It wasn’t that humans grew gigantic. He had grown... small.

“Bi, Bibeong! Bibeo-beong?! (What did you do to me?!)” yelled King Storma in a hurry.

Then King Storma noticed the man shrug.

“What did I do to you? I made you small.”

“...!”

Another shock. Was it because he confirmed that he got small? No.

Bibeong? Bibeo-beong? (Wait a minute, did I just understand what this human said? How is that even possible?)

King Storma was at a loss. This had never happened before. He searched in his memory if there was a time he understood humans. It has never happened ever since he fell into this world.

Bibeong. Bibeo-beong. Bibeong.

No one called him. No one gave birth to him. He just came to exist one day as though he was dropped from the sky. And so he lived, survived, grew, and existed. Of course, he had never met up with his kind ever before. He never thought a kind like him existed in this world, so he never imagined that he could converse with another creature. That was until he met this human who was right in front of him.

“Hey, you. You can understand me, right? Right?”

“...”

Gulp. King Storma looked at Lloyd in disbelief. Lloyd’s face lit up.

“Aha. Yes, you can. You can understand me.”

“Bi, Bibeong. Bibeo-beong.”

“Yes, I can understand you as well. So, how about we settle down and talk?” suggested Lloyd.

“Bibeong?”

“Whew. I’m beat. Let me just take a seat for now.”

“...”

“Where should I start? How about I tell you to relax a bit? I have no plans of hurting you.”

“Bibeo-beong?”

“I mean it. I won’t hurt you. I promise.”

“Bibeong...”

“You don’t trust humans?”

“Bibeo-beong. Bibeong!”

“What? You’re going to trample me if I don’t let you go now?” interpreted Lloyd.

“Bibeong!”

“Um, but that would be problematic. I’ve grown much larger than you, but I do not have you under my foot. So, how about we put an end to this fight?”

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong!”

“You hate obeying me because I’m nothing but a human? But why?”

“Bibeo-beong!”

“So what if you’re the ruler of the lake?!”

“Bibeong!”

“Hmm.”

Lloyd was troubled.

This one’s tougher than I’d thought.

King Storma was resisting very hard to escape out of Lloyd’s grip. He turned out to be more stubborn and tenacious than Lloyd pegged him to be. And it appeared that he was hostile to humans. Minus the capacity to converse, King Storma was as good as an untamed wild animal.

He’s completely different from Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang.

Lloyd wondered if the difference was because King Storma wasn’t summoned by himself. Should he opt for a rougher method to tame this creature? Lloyd pondered on it but immediately shook his head.

He might close himself up to me if I do that, and that's going to be more problematic.

Lloyd had risked himself and succeeded in feeding the blue sunflower seed to King Storma. The seed would last only 24 hours, so sooner or later, he would grow gigantic again to become a 328-foot beaver. Lloyd needed to either make him come around or tame him before the hour was up.

The best result is to persuade him and have him protect this place of his own volition. What should I do?

Lloyd racked his brain, thinking very hard. Just then, an idea came to him.

Wait a minute. Will he loosen up if I introduce him to other fantastical creatures?

Lloyd slightly opened his inner pocket at the brilliant possibility.

"Hey, Ppodong. Bangul. Hamang?"

"Pupung! Ppodong!"

"Ba, Bangul!"

"Hamamang!"

They answered from his inner pocket, which was filled with water like a tub. The corners of Lloyd's mouth slowly crept up.

"We have a new friend. Would you like to meet him?"

"Ppo! Bang! Ha!"

Their response and reaction were immediate. Ppodong got out of the pocket with Hamang on his back, climbing up to Lloyd's shoulder. They looked at King Storma, who was still in Lloyd's grip.

“Ppodong?”

“Hamang?”

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong! Arggggggh!!”

King Storma revealed his sharp front teeth as he looked at them both. But what came next...

“Bangul?”

Bangul slithered up to Lloyd’s shoulder later than the others after fixing her soaked ribbon and getting the water out of her bell. She then revealed herself, her face glowing in the water. And her round and dark eyes glimmered as she gazed at this “new friend” Lloyd mentioned.

“Bba-bangul?”

Her calling drew King Storma’s attention.

“Bibeo-beong?”

King Storma growled just as he did a while ago, and his gaze moved toward Lloyd’s shoulder. But there, he saw Bangul, who was perched on the human shoulder, and his eyes locked with her glimmering eyes. Just then, the scowl on King Storma’s face disappeared, and he felt dazed.

“Bi... Beong?”

That day, King Storma fell in love for the first time.

Chapter 117: How to Reverse the Domino (1)

“What? I’m your owner now?” asked Lloyd.

“Bibeong!”

“Don’t you think it’s a bit too drastic a change of attitude?”

“Bibeo-beong. Bibeong.”

“Come on, this couldn’t have been your plan in the first place. And are you sure you want me to call you Bibeong? Really?”

“Bibeong!”

“Hmm.”

King Storma, no, Bibeong nodded his chubby head. Lloyd stroked his jaw as he stared at Bibeong with doubt-filled eyes.

“You. Something’s off about you,” Lloyd said.

“Bibeong?”

“You changed so drastically. Just a while ago, you growled as though you were trying to start a fight with all of us here.”

“Bibeo-beong?”

“Come on. I was almost worried that you’d bite my hands.”

“Bibeong?”

“Don’t play innocent. That was just a minute ago.”

“Bi, Bibeong.”

“Don’t recall, eh?”

“Bibeong.”

“Ha, you were just testing my sincerity?”

“Bi-Bibeobeong.”

“Hmm...”

King Storma, no, Bibeong was sitting on Lloyd’s palm. Lloyd narrowed his eyes as he looked at him.

Something’s going on with him.

Lloyd recalled the event a while ago. Bibeong was violent, to say the least. Even though Lloyd succeeded in making him small with the blue sunflower seed, the creature couldn’t be negotiated with or persuaded. Continuing the conversation alone proved to be difficult because he was extremely hostile to humans.

He was an absolute wild animal.

The fact that the two spoke the same language was no use because Bibeong didn’t open his heart to Lloyd. Nothing could persuade him, so Lloyd was troubled. That was why he racked his brain to come up with the idea of introducing Bibeong to Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang. Lloyd did so in the hopes that this encounter may soften Bibeong’s attitude even a little. But to Lloyd’s surprise, the moment he showed Bibeong his friends, Bibeong changed his attitude by 180 degrees. His transformation took place at lightning speed.

Something’s definitely going on with him here.

The beaver had been wild, throwing such a terrible tantrum. There was definitely something that calmed him down.

I might be able to manipulate him easily if I find out what that is.

Lloyd’s eyes narrowed to slits, and he studied Bibeong standing on his palm. His eyes scrutinized Bibeong’s motion, expression, and gaze. He scanned and analyzed every single thing without anything amiss. Then, Lloyd faintly saw something.

The angle of his standing posture. 45 degrees from Bangul's perspective. He's standing at an angle that would make his belly look the slimmest. And look! He keeps glancing over at Bangul.

Lloyd was getting close.

Wait a minute. Is he...?

A corner of Lloyd's lips curved upward.

"Hey, you," called Lloyd.

"Bibeong?"

"You have a crush, don't you?"

"Bi, Bibeong?"

"And I think I know who that is."

"Bibeo-beong. Bibeong?"

Bibeong's expression shook visibly. The smile on Lloyd's face deepened.

"Oh, oh! Her head is round while her body is chubby. Her tail is rattling-"

"Bibeo-beong! Bibeong! Bibeo-beo-beong!"

"Never ever? You know nothing of it? Are you sure?"

"Bibeong!"

Bibeong hurriedly nodded his head. Once again, the corners of Lloyd's mouth went further up.

Got you. Looks like you are smitten with Bangul. But what about Bangul?

Lloyd quickly observed Bangul. She was simply looking at Bibeong as she tilted his head to the side. There was only curiosity in her eyes. Nothing more than that.

Oh, the sorrow of unrequited love.

Lloyd welcomed Bibeong to the single's club. With a beaming grin on his face, he spoke.

"Well, okay. If you say so."

"Bibeong!"

"Yes, good. Anyway, so I'm your owner now, eh?"

"Bibeo-beong."

"You made the right call. But I have a question for you."

"Bibeong?"

"Who summoned you?"

Lloyd was sincerely curious about who had summoned Bibeong and why he was living here all alone by himself without an owner.

This could mean that I might not be the only one who can summon fantastical creatures.

This was an important matter because this could mean that someone might enjoy the benefits of the RP system. Lloyd was intrigued by who it was that got Bibeong into this world. And so, Lloyd was probably relieved when he heard Bibeong's response.

"Bibeo,beong! Bibeong! Bibeong! Bibeong."

"What? No one summoned you here?"

"Bibeong!"

Bibeong nodded and continued to speak.

“Bibeong. Bibeong. Bibeo-beong.”

“Hmm, so to sum it up, you just came to be in this world, and no one was around you. And you’ve never met a fantastical creature like you?”

“Bibeong!”

“For over 500 years...?” asked Lloyd.

“Bibeong!”

“Hmm.”

It appeared Bibeong was a rare case where a fantastical creature was born into this world by natural occurrence. Lloyd made that conclusion and was putting the thought behind him when Bibeong asked him a question in a concerned voice.

“Bibebeong? Bibeong?”

“What’s that? Are you asking if he’s all right?”

“Bibeong!”

Bibeong was pointing at one side with a nervous expression on his face. The person he was pointing at was...

“His name is Javier Asrahan. What about him?”

“Bibeong, Bibeo-beobeong. Bibeong!”

“Haha! He started to talk senselessly out of the blue?”

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

“His gibberish was on another level, eh? But you don’t have to worry about whether he has lost it.”

“Bibeong!”

“Really, he’s fine. He just loses it sometimes.”

“Bibeo-beong?”

“Actually, everyone called him a genius when he was young. But he fell from a persimmon tree when he was seven, and then...” Lloyd paused with a sad expression on his face.

“Master Lloyd, I can hear everything.”

“...”

“I did not know,” continued Javier, “that you were well-versed in spreading false rumors and propaganda.”

“Ehem. Did you see that? He’s normal usually, but he just, you know, only sometimes. Please understand him with a big heart,” persuaded Lloyd.

“Bibeong!”

Bibeong nodded as he beamed while Javier grimaced slightly. Lloyd chuckled at them.

Anyway, mission accomplished.

The mission was to wake King Stoma, the ruler of Lake Kapua, and force him to mark his territory and stop the monster domino phenomenon. It was accomplished. But Lloyd managed to achieve more than waking him up. He succeeded in being Bibeong’s master, and Bibeong was now at his disposal.

Looks like I over-accomplished my mission.

Of course, establishing the pet-master relationship wasn’t the end of it. Moreover, the downside and upside for Bibeong were that he was way too big.

He’s completely opposite to other creatures like Ppodong.

Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang were usually small. Just the perfect size to put them in his inner pocket. Lloyd only needed to increase their size with the red sunflower seed whenever he wanted. But Bibeong was different. He was 328 feet tall on a normal day. Lloyd could downsize Bibeong if he needed to put Bibeong in his pocket. But there was a 24-hour limit.

It means that I have a limit to taking him around and using him.

So, the question was whether Lloyd should use Bibeong as he had intended in the first place, which involved leaving Bibeong free in Lake Kapua to act as a deterrent to the monster invasion. And if the rare need to use him arose, Lloyd would take him. He was contemplating the matter when he was interrupted.

“Master Lloyd.”

It was Javier who called. When Lloyd turned, he found Javier pointing beyond the lake.

“It looks like our recon team is coming this way,” said Javier.

“What? Which one?” asked Lloyd.

“The team we’d dispatched beyond the eastern range the other time.”

“Oh, them.”

Lloyd peered at the area Javier was pointing at across the lake. A group of men dressed in civil engineer uniforms appeared in view. Though they were far, Lloyd could notice them somewhat. It was the patrol team Lloyd had dispatched to the orc tribe right after they blocked the herd of Mastodons.

“Let’s go.”

It looked like they were returning after running a recon. Lloyd led everyone to the other side through the dam in the lake. The team met and were delighted to see Lloyd and the rest.

“Master Lloyd. I didn’t know I would bump into you here.”

“Indeed. Is everyone safe?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, not a single one of us was hurt, thankfully.”

The leader of the recon team was the soldier who had once hurt his back during the seokbinggo construction in the orc village.

“That’s a relief. What about the orc village?” asked Lloyd. “How are they?”

“Um, the thing is...” He paused, his expression looking somewhat grim. “They are fighting very hard.”

“Fighting? Could it be against the rushing monsters?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Woah.” Lloyd let out a sigh.

He knew very well that the orc tribe was made up of ferocious warriors. Even so, it surprised him that they were facing the fight head-on without taking refuge.

The damage must be immense.

The monster domino phenomenon was no joke. Blocking one wave of monsters didn’t mean it was the end. More and more kinds of monsters came rushing like an unending wave. One or two defenses didn’t cut it. Like how a sharp rock got smoothened by continuous waves, even the most powerful capabilities died down eventually. They would get tired until they finally collapsed. That was what was truly scary about this event.

That is the reason why I tried to create a biological wall using Bibeong.

And yet, here were the orcs taking the full brunt of the monsters without retreating. Lloyd was astonished by their bravery and boldness. At the same time, he thought that he should save them.

They are my steadfast ally.

His decision, however, wasn’t a moral one. It was extremely practical. These orc friends were useful, so he didn’t want to lose the orc tribe so easily.

What should I do?

He stopped and started to think about an effective way to support the orcs while minimizing any damage and maximizing the benefits on his part. The status quo was immediately put under review, and so were his current capabilities and resources. Timing and opportunity. Benefits and losses. Processes and results. He pieced together all these elements as though he was building them up. He placed and elevated them to draw out a full picture at last.

“Bibeong,” called Lloyd.

“Bibeong?”

“Do you think you can carry all of us if you grow big again?”

“Bibeo-beong?”

“We’re thinking of heading east to the wilderness at the foot of the mountain range. Do you think you can do that?”

“Bibeong? Bibeo-beong?”

Bibeong’s face grew agitated. He had spent almost his entire life around this lake area, so the suggestion to leave this lake and make for the wilderness was off-putting even though it was coming from Lloyd, his new master. But something he heard afterwards changed his stance right away.

“If you grant my request, someone is going to be very, very happy.”

Lloyd’s sweet voice pierced into Bibeong’s ears. To add to his voice, Lloyd wriggled his eyes toward Bangul.

“Bibeong...?”

Bibeong gulped dryly as he wondered if that was true. He asked himself whether Bangul would truly be happy if he carried everyone to the foot of the mountain range in the east. Lloyd spoke again, and this time, his voice grew subtler.

“Now, think about it. Just imagine in your head how happy she will be,” Lloyd cooed. “She is faithfully serving me at my side right now. What do you think will happen if she sees you obedient to my words? Don’t you think she will feel the camaraderie and assurance of serving the same owner?”

“Bi, Bibeong?”

“What I am saying is that her gaze toward you may change,” Lloyd cajoled.

“...”

“How’s that?”

The question was like a poisonous apple that looked so glossy and scrumptious on the outside. At last, Bibeong gave in and nodded hard at Lloyd.

“Bi, Bibeong! Bibeo-beong!”

“I knew you could do it! Wow, you are awesome. I’m sure she thinks so, too.”

“Bibeong!”

Bibeong held up his tiny front leg. And he stole a glance at Bangul as he took the red sunflower seed Lloyd was giving him. And he moved about 100 yards away from the rest of them and ate it up.

Crunch. Gulp.

The change was immediate.

Boom! The world around him grew small again as he went back to his original size.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong!”

Bibeong roared ferociously after he became 328-feet in size. He lowered his body to the ground, motioning at Lloyd to hop on. Getting onboard was a smooth experience. Lloyd, Javier, 20 men of the patrol team, and 500 lancers of the White Cavalry hopped on Bibeong’s back, which still had a lot of space as it was that vast and wide.

“Okay, let’s go! To the east!”

“Bibeong! (Hold tight!)”

Bibeong bellowed as he leaped, and just like that, he left Lake Kapua, his home. He made for the east, and it took only one step for him to cross the valley. And several steps later, he was already at the peak. Some panting and huffing later, the range was already crossed behind him. After just six hours of travel, Bibeong crossed the eastern range.

“Great. Keeping moving east!” Lloyd urged.

“Bibeong!”

Lloyd was on top of Bibeong’s head, acting as a human navigation machine. And at last, a familiar terrain came into his view. It was the path he had taken to look for the cave of the dark magician. And soon, more familiar sights appeared. The limestone quarry site where Javier first used the mana blast. The yellow and deserted wilderness beyond it. And the massive sandstorm forming over there.

That’s where the Sand and Steel Tribe is.

Lloyd’s eyes narrowed as he observed the sand dust. It was certainly happening at the place he remembered to be where the orc tribe was at. He focused on hearing, and he picked up several shouts and roars coming in the distance.

“Bibeong, I want you to listen to me carefully now!” Lloyd instantly hurried.

“Bibeong!”

“Let us get off over there first. And once we’re all down, I want you to rush toward the sandstorm.”

“Bibeo-beong?”

“Yes, charge right at it. And you’ll see orcs and monsters in the storm,” Lloyd said.

“Bibeong? Bibeo-beong?”

“No, the orcs aren’t your enemies.BLeave them alone. But thrash against the monsters,” Lloyd quickly instructed.

“Bibeong?”

“Yes, as ferocious and marvelous as you can. To the point that these monsters will spread rumors to the others as they run back to the east in terror. Do you think you can do it? If you could do it very well...” Lloyd paused. And he lowered his voice to make sure that it sounded suggestive. “I am sure she will love it.”

“Bibeong!”

“She” was the magic word for Bibeong, for he nodded right away. After everyone got down, Bibeong hurtled toward the Sand and Steel tribe village, hoping that Bangul would notice how cool he was and fall in love with him. For the first time ever in his life, Bibeong burned with zealous passion.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong! (Move orcs!)”

He rushed into the sand storm as he roared and brushed past the orc warriors, who froze at his appearance. Then, Bibeong spotted his enemy amid the thick sandstorm.

“Grrr?”

The 168-foot evil creature widened its eyes at the appearance of Bibeong. Its mouth was elongated like an alligator, and its teeth stuck out irregularly. And its skin was so thick like armor that even the horns could not penetrate it. The claws were specialized to tear the stomach of its game. It was the Megalania, the evil creature known for being the most violent creature in the wilderness. But what was Megalania to Bibeong? He didn’t give a hoot. Right now, everything that stood in his way was to be sacrificed at the altar of love.

“Bibeo-beong!”

Boooom! With a power-charged roar, Bibeong threw a 3,000-ton first-love jab at Megalania’s face.

Chapter 118: How to Reverse the Domino (2)

“Bibeo-beong!”

Boooom! Bibeong’s savage roar boomed across the land. But his blow was louder than his roar, as it sounded like a peal of thunder. The result of his blow was destructive.

“Gargh....?”

Megalania’s head was hurled to the side, more than ten of its teeth flinging away in the air. It was only natural. Bibeong boasted a towering height of 328 feet. Even without the tail, he was 262 feet. He had a chubby physique compared to his height, which made him weigh over 3,000 tons. The punch contained every fiber of his massive weight. But there was something else more to his mighty punch than his weight. It was Bangul, his first love. She was watching him from behind. And so, Bibeong had harnessed every bit of energy he could scrape up in that punch.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

Wham! Thwack! Crash!

Left foot, right foot, left foot. The Megalania was sentenced to three 3,000-ton punches, each blow sending the monster up in the air like an ankle sock swirling in a tornado.

“Gaaarrrr!!”

A scream escaped out of its mouth. The counterattack was unthinkable because its body was a mere 164 feet. And its body was 1/4 the size of Bibeong, weighing only 700 tons.

“Bibeong!”

Bam! Bibeong wielded his front arm once again.

“Gargh!!”

Five punches were thrown in a row, but they were enough to make Megalania severely groggy. And Bibeong threw one more final blow.

“Bibeo-beong!”

Crack!

He bit the back of Megalania with his large teeth. Then he hurled it high and shook and let it go.

Whoosh! The 164-foot height and 700-ton Megalania was catapulted high in the air, flying about 400 yards. And it fell.

Boom! Crash! After being sent away for a couple of yards in the air, it hit the ground, leaving a large hole. That alone compromised Megalania’s combat power”

“Grrrr.... Garggh....”

The megalania, which was beaten to a pulp, closely rose from the ground. It was lucky that it wasn’t dead. Its whole body was shaky and trembling. Six more Megalanias were around the injured one. But none of them dared to extract their fangs as the one thrown to the ground was their leader.

“Garrrr!! Garggh!”

The horribly injured Megalania turned around and began to run toward the east, its tail lowered to the ground. As the leader left, the others followed suit.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

Bibeong let out a roar of triumph, and he stole a glance to the west where Lloyd and the others were. To be exact, there was Bangul, who was perched on Lloyd’s shoulder.

Bibeong, Bibeo-beobeong...

Bibeong direly wished that she saw the awesome feat he had achieved. He feigned some coughs, which brought Lloyd to smile wryly.

My, that beaver is too obvious.

Lloyd noticed how clumsy Bibeong was and thought that there was a reason why he was single. But that side of him appealed to Lloyd, who felt a sense of camaraderie from Bibeong.

“Bangul?” called Lloyd.

“Bangul!”

“I have a favor to ask you. Could you jiggle your bell once for Bibeong?” asked Lloyd.

“Bba-bangul?”

“You know, just to boost his spirit.”

“Bangul!”

Bangul nodded her round head up and down. Bangul, too, didn’t dislike Bibeong. But her feelings were that of friendship and nothing else.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul! (Good job, my new friend!)”

Bangul slightly lifted her tail up and jiggled. The vivid noise rang aloud, instantly bringing a pinkish smile to Bibeong, who was breathing heavily from the hard punches.

Hmm. This is just perfect”

Now that the appropriate reward had been given, it was time for Lloyd to do his job.

“Everybody, please wait up here for a while.”

Lloyd asked his delegation to stand by and made for the east alone, crossing the calming sand storm. He saw hundreds of orc warriors standing as they chatted. He then raised his voice toward the biggest orc warrior among them.

“Long time no see, chief!”

“Eh? Oink?”

The biggest warrior was Akush, the chief of the Sand and Steel tribe. He perked up his ears. Actually, he was in a state of considerable dismay as astonishing events had taken place in series.

What is this situation, oink?

Monsters had been invading the village in series lately, and yet, Akush had been fighting indomitably against them. The same went for today. There was a violent and savage herd of Megalania, and he was fighting against six of them. He let out a roar in the frontline and threw a javelin to make sure that his warriors would not lose courage and retreat. But all of a sudden, something hurtled toward his way with impressive force and stomped by. And in one powerful blow, the intruder threw a hard punch against the Megalania and bit it up to send it flying away beyond the village territory.

What in the world is that, oink?!

Beating the daylights out of the Megalania was hard enough. And yet, the intruder hurled it away in the distance. This intruder was a giant monster that resembled a beaver. And now... he was hearing a familiar voice from behind.

This voice seems to be Lloyd, an honorable warrior of my tribe but a weak human, oink.

To Akush, Lloyd was kind but weak. That was how Akush remembered Lloyd. He turned around, thinking about that recollection, and found Lloyd walking over to him”

“Hoho, oink?”

A friend. A smile naturally formed on Akush’s face. Chief Akush smiled as he revealed his large fangs. Worm-like veins popped on his huge pecs.

“What brings you here, my friend? It’s dangerous here today. It is dangerous, especially to a weak friend like you, so you better go back home, oink,” advised Akush.

“Dangerous? Is it because of the monsters?” asked Lloyd”

“Yes, oink!”

A smile vanished from Akush’s face. He held up his ax and pointed toward the east, where Bibeong was standing.

“Countless monsters are invading these days. Today, Megalanias have come. But right now, a worse one has appeared. It is very dangerous, oink.”

“Oh,” Lloyd replied, “are you talking about that one?”

“Yes, oink.”

“Then, you have nothing to worry about. I am his owner,” said Lloyd”

“What, oink...?”

“I mean it. His name is Bibeong.”

“...”

Lloyd masters over the monster that defeated Megalanias with one punch? What is he? Akush was slightly overwhelmed by his presence.

Feeling such, Akush asked, “So? What brings you here, my friend? Have you come here to fight with us, oink?”

“Well, something like that.”

Catching up can happen later. Right now, it was time for business.

“I am sure it was a tough ride for the last few days. The locusts, Mastodons, and the Megalania. It was one heck of a ride, wasn’t it?”

“Hmph! It was fine. Perfect days for working out, oink!”

“Yes, yes,” agreed Lloyd, “I am sure they were perfect. But do you happen to know the reason why these incidents occurred?”

“No, oink!”

“And so I am here,” said Lloyd, “to give you the cause and solution.”

Lloyd grinned. From now on, it was time to stop the monster domino phenomenon and lay a massive counterattack to the sultan kingdom responsible for this mess.

The counterattack operation took place in a breeze. Lloyd walked Akush through in great detail the unforgivable actions of the sultan's kingdom. For obvious reasons, Akush blew a fuse. But not just him. Every member of the orc warrior was enraged, and so they readily participated in the operation.

“The operation is simple. From now on, for the next few days, we are going to lay an indiscriminate attack on every monster milling around this area. Of course, Bibeong will be at the center of the offense.”

The orc warriors were assigned to threaten the monsters aghast by Bibeong’s attack. They were responsible for rounding up the monsters to the east.

“However,” Lloyd explained, “you must keep something in mind. Monsters can get injured. But don’t kill them. Let them stay alive as they run away.”

“Why, oink?”

“So that they will spread rumors among the surviving ones. Then--”

“Then what? Oink,” hurried Akush.

“The monsters charging from the east to this place will reverse their path. Just like when they came here. They will make way for the east, and thus, turn the direction of the domino.”

“Woah, oink!!”

“Do you get what I am saying?” asked Lloyd.

“No, it’s complicated, oink!”

“Well, anyway, what we do will cause serious trouble to the sultan kingdom’s western border.”

“I like that. Let us get right to it, oink!”

And thus began the operation. It started immediately. And no one felt a pang of guilt in doing so. The western border of the sultan kingdom that was to be affected by the monsters was thankfully unpopulated.

Its western border is bare. No fiefdoms or villages. Just the forces that defend the border.

So there would be zero innocent casualties by Lloyd’s counterattack. Plus, since the forces on the border are protected by the fortress, no one would really get hurt.

But they’ll be super busy taking care of the herds of monsters. The senior leadership will also learn something from it.

It was that the sultan kingdom wasn’t the only one that could stir the monster domino. The kingdom could do it as well. So, the act of enabling the monster domino phenomenon could be counterattacked and retaliated against. Lloyd wanted to plant that message to the leaders in the sultan kingdom.

That way, they’ll never dare to try to do this tomfoolery again.

The principle was similar to nuclear deterrence. If a country owned a nuclear weapon, it was harder for another country to use it. The message was the same here: You're not the only one with the weapon. Sending the message was the objective of this operation on top of the revenge"

"So now, let's get started."

There was no reason to waffle. The mission was initiated right away, and Bibeong, the orc warriors, Javier, and the White Cavalry performed extraordinary feats. They scavenged every corner of the wilderness in a frenzy, rushing to anywhere they could find a strand of monster hair. They beat, strangled, bent, threw, roared, and threatened. Every monster that got the taste of their reckoning fled to the east in fright. The operation lasted for six days. By that time, not a single monster was to be found in the area because they spread the rumor among themselves and rushed to the other end. In other words, their mission succeeded.

"Whew, since we're on the topic anyway..." Lloyd started.

This conversation took place after the reverse domino operation had succeeded. Lloyd and Akush were at the center of the orc village, which was almost in ruins by the incessant invasions of monsters.

"I am quite wary of saying this, but how about moving the tribe's village to somewhere else?" suggested Lloyd.

"Move the orc village? Oink?"

"Yes," replied Lloyd.

Tossing the sandburs branch into the crackling bonfire in front of him, Lloyd spoke.

"Certainly," he said, "I understand this land is precious to you as you have lived here for generations. But think about it. As this incident has revealed to us, the village has little defense because it sits in an open area."

"But we are strong, oink," rebutted Akush.

“I am aware. But I am bringing this subject up because you will be stronger once you move your village,” reasoned Lloyd.

“What? We will be stronger, oink?”

“Yes.”

“How so, oink?”

“Um, I’ve actually wanted to tell you this for a long time. I know I built a seokbinggo for you earlier, but this wilderness suffers from a severe food shortage. So, it is very unfortunate. This is not a great place to build muscle from a nutritional standpoint,” said Lloyd.

“What...? Muscle, oink?”

At the word “muscle,” Akush’s eyes flew wide open. The same thing happened to the other orc warriors that sat in groups near the fire. Lloyd noticed that his plan was working. Smothering the grin, he spoke up.

“You must rest and eat well. Those two are just as important as working out. This, however, is something you know very well, correct?” Lloyd said as he looked at Akush.

“Yes, yes, oink.”

“And so, my heart aches to be honest. It aches because of your tragic reality, where you and your men fail to enlarge your muscles by the shackles of your tradition.”

“Enlarge muscles, oink?”

“Yes,” replied Lloyd.

“H-how do I do that, oink?”

“It’s actually not that difficult. Um, I normally don’t tell this to others. But are you interested in hearing it?”

“Tell us now! Oink!”

“Okay, good. Look over there.”

Lloyd held out his hand, which pointed to the eastern range that spanned like a folding screen.

“Deer with luscious and rich hair run about the grass, and fat wild boars enjoy the flowery gardens. Overhead, mountain pigeons and pheasants flutter their wings. Just imagine it. The breast of the mountain pigeons that fly mightily. Imagine the juiciness of the breasts of those pheasants which pulse so fiercely.”

“Y-yummy, oink.”

“Yes, that is right. But that’s not all. The creek is so rich that it’s half filled with water, and the other half is fish. Since it’s the best of the best water, lobsters inhabit there. Imagine steaming a lobster compact with protein. Where do you think it’ll go when you eat it?”

“To my m-muscles, oink?!”

“Truly, you are the chief. You know it very well,” complimented Lloyd”

“Then, do you suggest that we move to the eastern range, oink?”

“Of course. What’s more, technically speaking, you are not breaking tradition by doing so,” Lloyd reasoned”

“How so, oink?”

The word “tradition” made Akush flinch in guilt. Lloyd then spoke up to relieve him of such a burden.

“Just think about it,” cajoled Lloyd, “your ancestors were muscular orcs, weren’t they?”

“Of course, yes, oink!”

“What do you think they would want their children to be?” suggested Lloyd.

“Muscular! So much so that it’s going to burst, oink!”

“That’s exactly what I mean. I knew you would understand. You are so wise even when I don’t say anything aloud.”

“Are you saying that my ancestors would want us to eat well and enjoy bulky muscles, oink?”

Just then, a glint of hesitation appeared in Akush’s eyes. He, too, was aware that the eastern range held an abundance of games. That was why he occasionally sent his warriors to the range. But still, the efficiency of settling down in the lush woods could not be compared to that of dispatching some men there. Right now, it took them several days just to get there.

“B-but, I cannot leave the land of my ancestors... Oink...”

“Your ancestors will be pleased as well,” cooed Lloyd.

“If we have bulky muscles, oink”?

“Of course.”

Lloyd’s whisper sounded sweet and provoking to Akush’s ears, which were muscular as well. Lloyd’s tempting words pierced deep into the hearts of orc warriors around him. And at last, a decision was reached.

“Good! From today on, our land is the eastern range. Do lead us, oink!”

And just like that, the Sand and Steel tribe moved to the eastern range. This move was exactly what Lloyd wanted.

Bibeong conquers Lake Kapua. And now, the orc tribe will settle in the eastern range. Two great walls will defend my fiefdom from now on.

And should something happen to the fiefdom, Lloyd could now ask for help from the orc tribe.

So I can now say goodbye to this sickening physical threat. It's over.

Lloyd was certain it was over. When the financial crisis was overcome, next came the physical threat that imperiled his fiefdom. That dangerous element was, at last, overcome. Lloyd felt light and weightless as he went back to the barony.

One last thing remains right now.

Lloyd thought to himself. It was something he desperately wanted to take care of. Debt clearance. And now, the time had come for him to pay the entire debt with the money he'd earned from the royal capital.

Chapter 119: Joyful Day (1)

Lloyd opened his eyes. He blinked several times. The scene around him was unfamiliar. He wasn't in the barony manor where the shabby village came into view through the bedroom window or where the magnificent mountain range appeared when Lloyd turned east. He was not in the bedroom in the barony he had gotten used to for the past year and a half.

The royal tomb?

The blue sky and green grass. Hills that were up to dozens of feet tall stood intermittently. The place looked like the royal tomb in Gyeongju that he once went to and stayed in his memory afterward.

"Ha..."

Lloyd couldn't make sense of this situation. He wondered why his eye level was low. It was as though he was back to when he was a 12-year-old boy.

Am I dreaming...?

With that though, Lloyd stared at his two hands. They were small, soft, and smooth. He didn't have a single callus from shoveling nor a scar on the back of his hand from his time in the military. It wasn't there. He blankly wiggled his hands. They certainly belonged to a young boy.

Wait, I think I'm...

It was strange. He was certain that he had come back to the barony late the previous night and collapsed on the bed in sheer exhaustion. He fell asleep, telling himself that he would clear every penny of the debt the next morning.

So what's this...

Just when he was trying to process the dismaying situation, he heard someone speak to him.

“Suho,” the voice called, “did you wait for long?”

The voice coming from behind him was familiar. It was a slightly rough and cold voice. The owner of the voice had a dialect and accent he couldn’t fix even after his wife’s nagging. But there was an intermittent warmth that came out amid his usual roughness.

“Father...?”

Lloyd wheeled around in surprise as he called and saw a shadow that stood tall, covering the sun. His father then bent forward to meet his eyes and grinned.

“My, look at my boy. Did something happen? You’re calling me ‘father’ not ‘dad’.”

“Um, I...” Lloyd trailed off.

“My boy is all grown up now. Here you go. Eat this.”

“...”

Lloyd looked at the object his father held out. It was a bottle of medicine that helped digestion and a pack of bubble gum.

Is it really that day?

A memory struck him just then. Lloyd’s father was a busy man, so he didn’t spend much time with him. They never took a trip together or did anything like that. His only memory of them was this one when he turned 12 years old. They took a father-son trip to Gyeongju. Similar to today, the weather had been great. The clear blue sky, green royal tomb, and white clouds. Lloyd had walked quite a lot, holding Father’s hand. But he got carsick because he forgot to plaster an anti-nausea patch.

“What is it? Is something wrong?” His father asked. “Do you want me to open it for you?”

“...”

“Here you go. Just drink up and burp. That would do it. Come on.”

“...”

Lloyd took the bottle. Something hot surged from his heart, and he chugged the medicine, swallowing the hot lump as well.

“Here, take this one as well.”

“...”

Before Lloyd knew it, his father had opened a pack of gum already, and he held out one to him. It was bubble gum. His favorite kind.

“...”

Lloyd was confused as to why he was having this dream. In sheer disbelief, he stared at his father, who looked back at him in concern.

“Are you all right? Can’t burp, eh?”

“N-no, it’s not that. The thing is...”

Lloyd was at a loss for words. The words he wanted to say kept coming up deep within, but he couldn’t make them come out of his mouth because of the heavy feeling in his heart.

“I’m fine,” Lloyd finally managed.

Father grinned and said, “Are you sure?”

“Yes.”

Since Lloyd didn’t know what else to say, he held out his hand and grabbed Father’s large hand. And the two walked, just like the day he turned 12.

“...”

Things started to make sense a little. This was definitely a dream, though it was too real. But it was a dream nonetheless, and Lloyd wondered when he would wake up. He wondered how much time he had to see his Father's face. Lloyd was walking with that thought in his head when his Father spoke.

"But, Suho," Father called.

Lloyd felt that his stomach was fine now. Is Father still worried? Lloyd thought to himself. He looked up and found his father's eyes trembling with tears welling up in the corners. And in a voice mixed with a sigh, his father spoke.

"Son, you did good. You worked so hard."

"What...?"

This line wasn't in Lloyd's memory. This conversation didn't take place when he was 12 years old. Feeling a bit dazed, Lloyd saw his father's nose grow red.

"I'm sorry. It's been really hard, right? It's not your fault. You just happened to have a poor and incompetent father."

"..."

"But that's why I'm proud of you all the more."

"That's..." Lloyd couldn't finish words.

"I'm proud of you, my son."

Tap. Tap.

"..."

Lloyd closed and opened his eyes. A familiar room showed up. It was the bedroom he had gotten used to for the last year and a half.

“Whew...”

It was morning. And it was a dream. Lloyd rose up from his bed and called the maids just like he always did. After washing his face with the water a maid got for him, he put on his clothes and had breakfast. He woke Javier up and started his day by calling the administrator.

“Are Shiloh and Meatloaf back?” asked Lloyd.

“Oh, yes, Master Lloyd. They are said to have returned two days ago,” the administrator said.

“Goodness, those two fellows know when danger is near.”

The moment the barony was under a monster invasion, the two loan sharks fled away. A snort had escaped when Lloyd heard they were back.

“Great. Please call them here,” Lloyd requested.

“Yes. Is there anything that you wish to tell them?”

“No, that won’t be necessary. Just call them, please,” Lloyd said. But a second later, he added with a grin, “Oh, you know what? Please tell them the time has come to happily end this relationship of ours.”

“Yes, I will tell them that.”

“All right. Thank you.”

The administrator left, and the wait began. Lloyd spent half of the day thinking as he waited for Shiloh and Meatloaf to arrive. To be honest, Lloyd was disturbed in a lot of ways.

Is it because I’m paying off my debt today? Or is it because of the dream I had earlier this morning?

Lloyd couldn’t decide which one it was. The sense of dismay inside of him continued to linger even when the two loan sharks arrived.

“Ahaha. Long time no see, young master.”

“My, you are looking very good today.”

Shiloh and Meatloaf playfully joked at Lloyd as they handed him a bottle of wine. Lloyd once couldn’t stand the sight of the two, who looked as if they would follow him to the depths of hell to demand repayment. But not anymore. Now, he wondered if he grew fond of them over time. Smothering the wry smile forming on his face, he spoke.

“Thank you for coming all the way here. I hope you both have been well.”

“Haha, we almost died.”

“The locust swarm. Whew.”

“I am very relieved that you are safe and can receive all the remaining debt from me today.”

Shiloh and Meatloaf, who were joking with smiles on their faces, suddenly grew serious, and their smiles vanished. They cocked their heads to the side in utter disbelief.

“What do you mean that we can receive all the remaining debt from you?” asked Shiloh”

“Could you mean-”

“Yes, that is right,” Lloyd interrupted. “The time has come to happily end our old relationship. I am sure you have heard this already from my messenger.”

“...”

The two loan sharks were silent.

“I guess you should check the money first. Please follow me. Over here,” Lloyd said as he grinned and rose from his seat.

At the thought of clearing the debt, Lloyd's knees trembled a little.

Paying off the debt was simple. It was so simple that it felt meaningless and vain. Lloyd simply handed the check he had received from the queen. Meatloaf and Shiloh verified the amount and the queen's signature written on the check, and they went over the contract. They then wrote a document confirming the debt clearance, signed it, and stamped it. That was it. One business handshake, thanking each other. And they went away. That was it.

"..."

The mountain of debt was paid off, but Lloyd wondered if this was what he was supposed to feel. Nothing. He felt nothing. Instead of joy, there was emptiness, a sense of detachment from reality, and a tad bit of resignation. Lloyd couldn't point out whether this was normal.

"I thought it would be a little different," Lloyd said to himself aloud.

Lloyd did imagine what it would be like to pay off the debt before. Actually, he had imagined it hundreds of times, and it started before he came to the barony. Back when he used to live in a cramped dorm room, he vaguely envisioned how his life would have turned out if his family had paid off their entire debt. The same fantasy crossed his mind before his parents passed away. The thought of him winning the lottery and clearing their debt in one payment, and traveling with his parents had put a big smile on his face.

I have never ever felt empty in any of my fantasies.

But right now, when the moment he once thought would be filled with infinite joy arrived, he just scoffed at how meaningless it all was. But because people around him were joyful, Lloyd at least could accept that his debt was cleared.

"Ha! Hahaha! My… My...!"

It was the first time Lloyd saw the baron be this joyful. The baron couldn’t finish his words. He simply kept swallowing the words, trembling as he spoke. And as his emotions were too strong to come out into words, he finally gave up and jumped to hug Lloyd, patting him for a long time. And the baroness gazed at Lloyd, tears welling up in her eyes as though she was praising him for a job well done.

“...”

Lloyd was reminded of the gaze his father gave him in his dream. Aside from the baron and baroness, many others came to visit him, sending a host of praises for clearing their debt.

“Master Lloyd, you are truly amazing. No one would have pulled that off so easily.”

“I was absurd for forming wrong ideas about you. I respect you so much, Master Lloyd.”

Lloyd could feel the sincerity of the administrator and Sir Bayern in their messages. Aside from them, the servants and maids he bumped into on the corridor and the farmers he came across on the road praised him highly in various manners.

The news surely spreads fast.

The debt was paid off in the afternoon, and it was only three or four hours since the loan sharks went away. But every corner of the fiefdom was already noisy from the news. Congratulations. I’m proud of you. Loyd had never been praised so much in his life. Thanks to it, he earned a new title.

Ding Dong.

The effect was appallingly great. Plus, it was to last for a lifetime. Lloyd would have hurray-ed on any other day. But not today. He couldn't wrap his head around why he was perturbed. After throwing a quick glance at the message window, he closed it and called for the person walking beside him.

"Hey."

"Yes, Master Lloyd."

"What was your father like?" asked Lloyd.

“...”

Lloyd felt Javier staring at him. A smile escaped him.

“Just. I just was curious. I’m sorry if it’s private, and I crossed the line.”

“Are you okay...?” Javier asked, his voice dripping with doubt.

“Yes.”

“But how do you explain your quick apology?”

“No reason. Everyone has weird days,” Lloyd said nonchalantly.

Yes. There were days when everyone acted strangely. The same went for Lloyd. Today was the rare day when he felt like he was back to being Suho Kim, not Lloyd Frontera. The day when he felt like he had breathed in after taking off a mask on his face.

“He was a rough man...”

Javier’s voice pierced into Lloyd’s ears. Sounding low and heavy, Javier continued to talk, but it went on like a soliloquy.

“Actually, I was too young when I last saw him. I have a vague and hazy image of him like I am seeing him through several layers of glass placed on one another. But there is one thing I can recall, and it’s that he was very much of a rough man,” Javier said.

“Why do you remember so?”

“Because he used to tap my back right before I went to bed at night, and that’s all I can recall.”

A smile spread on Javier against the rays of sunset.

“He was a busy man. It was hard to see him. I waited all day long until I dozed off. I had to pretend I was asleep until midnight because I didn’t want to get scolded by my mother.”

“Your father came back at midnight?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd wondered where Javier was gazing at. The deepening dusk? A past memory?

“He worked his head off late in the day, and he came back only at midnight. Then, he would tap my back several times with his soil-soaked hand as I pretended to sleep. That is all I can remember. The callous touch of his large palm. The roughness in his clumsy tapping... Such things,” Javier said.

“Yes, I see.”

Maybe we’re very similar, Lloyd said to himself. Not a word was exchanged with Javier after that. Instead, they walked side by side at the same stride. Sometimes, their pace turned slow or uniform at times. They continued to walk for a long while until they came back to the manor. And like any other day, Lloyd had dinner, helped Javier fall asleep, and returned to his bedroom.

“Whew.”

His routine was similar to any other day, but something was different. This day was passing by. But Lloyd was still unsure about his emotions.

It’s really funny. Really.

A scoff tried to escape him, but Lloyd suppressed it. He stared at the pitch-black ceiling, and memories began to appear one by one in his head. They opened up like an old journal. His childhood days. His parents. His dire family situation. Their unbearable mountain of debt. And his parents’ hunched backs, which were crushed by the weight of the debt.

It’s really funny. Really.

Another laughter escaped him. But for some reason. His nose continued to burn. He wished he would dream the same, just like last night. If he did, he wanted to tell his father this.

Dad, I think I made it in this place...

And for the first time after arriving in this world, he cried.

Chapter 120: Joyful Day (2)

Cocka-doodle-doo!

Lloyd's eyes flew open at the sound that announced the coming of the morning.

"Woah."

Lloyd rubbed his eyes immediately and erased every trace of his dream the other night. He washed up his face like usual, had breakfast, and woke Javier up. Javier woke up to stare at Lloyd at length.

"Did you cry last night by any chance?" blurted Javier.

"What?"

"Your eyes are swollen and somewhat bloodshot."

"Oh, that?" said Lloyd as he put on a smile in a hurry. "I had trouble sleeping last night. Seriously, my heart was just pounding like an earthquake last night."

"Your heart? Why?" asked Javier.

"Yeah, my heart. My heart raced when I thought about all the comforts I'll be enjoying from now on," said Lloyd.

It was true. A day of melancholy was enough. He had more days ahead of him for enjoyment. Days without any financial debt. A financially clean life was about to begin.

"Think about it. I paid off the debt. And the fiefdom is running very well. And the viscounty is paying us for the water every month," enumerated Lloyd.

That was true as well. As he enumerated, he confirmed once again that the future for the barony was bright and clear. It was practically surrounded by stable sources of income.

“Even though there is a bit of damage from the locust swarm in the Maritz Land, it’s no problem. Do you remember that the locust carcasses got turned into soot by Bangul? We ground them to fine dust and sprinkled them on the ground, and jackpot.”

“Do you mean that you used it as fertilizer?”

“Yeah, I heard that pepper, corn, and all the other crops are growing well these days,” Lloyd said.

“Hmm, that is good news,” Javier replied.

“And it looks like the orc tribe has settled down already.”

“Right, I had heard the news as well. I heard that they are very content as their new home near Lake Kapua is littered with game animals.”

The 328-foot fantastical creature was splashing around in Lake Kapua, dutifully letting out a ferocious roar twice every day, day and night each. Lloyd’s request was being faithfully granted. The credit was due to Bangul, Bibeong’s first love.

“Anyway, so I’m absolutely free from worry. I’ll be living in luxury for the rest of my life. So I was thinking of throwing a festival.”

“A festival?” asked Javier.

“Well, to celebrate paying off the debt and defending the monster invasion. Don’t we celebrate Thanksgiving around this time anyway? So the timing is good as well.”

“I think it’s a good idea,” seconded Javier.

“Good idea? You’re complimenting me...? Why?”

“No reason. Everyone has off days,” Javier said.

“Really?”

“Really.”

Javier faintly grinned at Lloyd’s side. He had grown softer in the past days. Lloyd figured that it was because his likeability surpassed zero and became positive.

“Anyway, I’m planning on suggesting the idea to the baron.”

Lloyd headed to the baron’s office and suggested holding a festival. The baron, as always, gave him a yes.

“The idea is indeed splendid in my ears. On top of that, why don’t we take a family trip after the festival is over?” the baron suggested.

“Excuse me? A trip?” asked Lloyd, not sure whether he heard it right.

“Yes, a trip,” the baron said and let out a chuckle. “We used to enjoy a family trip once every year or two, but that stopped when that happened. Do you not remember?”

“Oh...”

Lloyd figured that the baron was referring to the crippling debt. His thought was confirmed when he heard the baron next.

“So this is our chance. We never dared to travel when we were in debt, and we overcame a huge disaster recently.”

The baron’s face beamed in joy as he spoke. He continued to speak at length, but most of them were about the trip, and how certain places are perfect in weather like this. He paraded his plans for the family trip as though it was already confirmed and decided.

“Yes. I agree with it as well,” said Lloyd.

“Is that so?” asked the baron.

“Yes, but all planning--”

“Don’t you worry about it, and leave it to me. If there is anyone who can plan a trip, it’s me.”

“Hahaha, is that so?”

“Yes, yes, of course, I am.”

The baron tapped his chest in bravado, and the sight brought a smile to Lloyd’s face.

A family trip?

Lloyd wondered when was the last time he had gone on a family trip. He couldn’t remember it properly.

College? Orientation? Wait, that wasn’t a family trip.

When he searched his memory, the only time he had gone on a happy family trip was when he was a child. He tried to think of the time when he had traveled after he grew up. But nothing came to his mind.

And for the last few years, I have never had the time to travel.

It was true. Ever since he was brought into this world, he worked his head off day in and day out. Always on the move, Lloyd was slammed with work to pay off his debt.

I traveled to Cremo and to the royal capital, but that can’t be considered a trip.

They were there for official business, so it couldn’t be considered a trip. The same went for when he was in the other world.

It was worse there. I just rotted away in my rental room.

Taking a trip was a luxury for Lloyd. All he could afford was to take a suburb bus to a random destination, but that alone burdened him. One time, Lloyd yearned to see the east sea and just gaze at the sea. Just a simple day trip. Life was too stifling for him, and his heart was going to burst soon. But he decided to give up on it. Why? Simple. he had no money for the round fare. To be precise, spending money on the bus ride meant he would have no money for his rent.

I was miserable.

He felt wretched on the way home due to only a few dollars. But now, it was different. The barony was loaded now, and as long as no one lived in extravagance and splurged the money all away, the wealth promised a lifetime of stable merriment and abundance.

“Then, I shall look forward to it.”

Lloyd’s steps felt light as he walked out of the office. The feeling went on even when he was enjoying the festival.

This is what it feels like to live.

Delicious food. A life free from labor. Kind and smiling people. Lloyd wondered if this was what it was like to live in heaven. Such a festival lasted for three days.

So comfortable.

Having grown bored with the festive mood, Lloyd spent his whole day goofing around in his bedroom. He read several books he had picked out from the library and spent a lazy and relaxed day.

I want to play a video game.

Lloyd recalled the free games he had enjoyed back in South Korea. There was nothing better than video games to kill boredom and time.

Should I learn to hunt?

This time, the hunting would be real, not virtual. He feared that he would get fat unless he did so. When he was having such thoughts on a sofa, there came a knock on his door.

Knock knock.

“Master Lloyd. Are you inside?”

Javier’s voice was heard along with the face, and Lloyd replied aloud, still lying down on the sofa.

“Yes, I’m in here. Come in--”

“You need to see this.”

“You’re already inside...”

Lloyd removed the book covering his face, and then he saw the grim expression on Javier’s face. It wasn’t the kind he always had on his face every day. Something was off, and Lloyd noticed it right away as he had spent considerable time with Javier.

“What is it...?”

A mischievous joke? No. Whatever it was, something happened. And indeed, Javier’s following response was suggestive.

“I do not know how to put it into words.”

“Then?”

“I think you need to see this for yourself.”

“...”

Lloyd followed Javier as the latter stepped out of the manor and went down to the center of the fiefdom. It was still festive there as the festival was on the third day. But now...

Something's unsettled here.

The melodious lute and singing were not there anymore, and it was replaced by a group of people murmuring. And their gaze was all darted to one side.

Who are those people?

Everyone's gaze was fixated on a group of 70 to 80 people. But they were all dressed in a similar fashion, but not because they were soldiers in uniform or robbers from a troupe. They were instead all ragged. The clothes were dirty and threadbare. Their knees were patchy, and the sleeves were torn. And their flesh revealed in between their tattered clothes were skins and bones. And their feet, they were more wretched. Only a handful of people wore what looked like a pair of shoes. Most of them seemed to have walked a great distance with nothing but a piece of cloth tied around their feet, which were caked with pus, soil, and dust. Their shirts and coats would have been decent if they were new, but they were not.

What the...

In short, they were haggard-looking with their sunken eyes and cheeks. And their hair was caked together in sweat and dust. And their worn-out faces. Lloyd passed his residents and walked over to the ragged people.

"Excuse me, do you, by any chance, live in this fiefdom?"

Lloyd didn't recognize anybody. But he asked just to be safe. The answer he received wasn't surprising.

"N-no, young master. Are you the owner of this fiefdom?"

"I am not the owner," Lloyd replied.

"Then, you are-"

"The owner's son."

"Oh."

The guy, who appeared to be the representative and just over 30 years old, spoke as he gazed at Lloyd with yearning.

“I am truly sorry to ask you this, but... young master, please help us.”

“Hmm.”

“These children are dying of hunger,” the man went on. “I do not ask for much. No, even animal feed will do. Please you don't have to feed the adults, just the children. Please, I ask for your favor, young master,” the man whimpered as he bowed. Then the entire group bowed in the same fashion. Lloyd let out a sigh.

“Woah.”

Lloyd wondered who these men and women were and where they came from. For a split second, he considered them to be beggars. But the number was too many to be so, not to mention the varying age groups.

“We have enough to feed you all, so pull yourself together first. Okay? But first, I think you and I need to talk,” Lloyd suggested.

“Talk...?” The man muttered in hesitation.

“I don’t bite. I’ll get you some things to bite into instead.”

“Ah... I understand.”

The man rose and strode toward Lloyd, who requested his people to bring out some water, soup, and a light snack, and clothe them up. Afterward, he took the leader to one side and spoke.

“I’ll be straightforward with you. Who are you people?” demanded Lloyd.

A group of ragged-looking individuals appeared out of nowhere to break the festive mood in the fiefdom. There was something awkward and off about that. Lloyd even considered the possibility of some being foreign espionage. But what the man said caught Lloyd by surprise.

“We are from Sortino barony. And my name is Nicholas, and I come from a village named Sorti in the fiefdom. My father used to be the chief, but because of the recent disaster-”

“Hold on. People from Sortino barony? You all are?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes. That is right.”

“What are you doing here then? And in this state? And what do you mean by disaster?” asked Lloyd, feeling confused at the odd situation.

The Sortino barony sits quite south of ours.

Lloyd couldn’t wrap his head around how these people ended up here in his fiefdom in such a sordid state. But the answer was in the man’s response.

“Monsters attacked our village,” said Nicholas.

“What...?”

“It was a great number of monsters. What was the name...? Herakleto? It looked similar to a beetle that went over 60 feet in size... They swarmed on us like bees, nibbling all the trees and grass in sight.”

“What are you saying...”

“We lost our land as a result. But we never gave up. Encouraged by our lord, we tried to put up shacks and work on our fields again. But the heavens abandoned us,” Nicholas said grimly.

“It couldn’t be,” replied Lloyd.

“Yes, young master. That is right. Five days after we were swept by Herakleto, another monster herd invaded my village.”

“...”

Lloyd was speechless. He knew what had happened there.

“Monster domino...” Lloyd muttered.

“Excuse me?”

“No, never mind. So what happened to your lord?”

“He went missing while he fought against the monster herds that came after. We presume that...”

“He was eaten up,” Lloyd finished on Nicholas’s behalf.

“Yes...” Nicholas answered with a grim expression on his face.

“The lord and his family went missing. There was nothing we could do in that situation. Everyone fled for their lives, and more than half of them perished. And finally, we managed to come here...”

“It must have been a hard journey coming here.”

“Yes...” The man said, and he finally broke into tears.

At last, Lloyd was enlightened about what had happened.

Yes. The Sartino Barony. It sits far south of us. But what stands in its east? The eastern mountain range. Just like ours.

The strip of mountain range extended a long way. The north and south were a couple thousand of miles apart. And so, the Frontera barony wasn’t the only one that sat in the vicinity of the eastern range. Dozens of fiefdoms were there, and...

Most of the fiefdoms close to the eastern range would have fallen within the influence of the monster domino.

Lloyd was aware of such a fact, but he didn’t have the time and confidence to help out others. He had figured that the other lords, who do a pretty good job at managing their fiefdoms, would handle the situation well. But now, he learned that it wasn’t the case.

They don’t have fantastical creatures, me, a sword master, an engineering corp, or lancers dispatched by the queen.

Without these capabilities, would there be any fiefdom that could well fend itself from the invasion? The answer was no.

“Eat first. And make yourselves warm,” Lloyd said.

“Oh, thank you so much, young master. I shall never forget your favor-”

“Don’t bring up the favor to me now. It makes me uncomfortable. Stay here a few days, and move to another fiefdom once you get better.”

Lloyd left the table without waiting for a response, but did he do so because he feared Nicholas would bug him? Or because he had completely forgotten his harsh days when he was penniless and poor? No. That was all wrong.

This may mean that more refugees may come here with no end in sight.

Lloyd strode toward the baron’s office after he removed himself from the disrupted festival. His steps were quick now. The same thing was happening in his head. Lloyd awakened every single neuron that rested for the past few days, meticulously going over the days ahead of his barony.

At least 20 fiefdoms would have been ruined to dust. Where would those refugees rush to? To the west? No. Another mountain range is there, so they can’t cross it. To the south? It’s a foreign country. And they won’t go to the east since monsters flooded from there.

As such, the only direction left for them was the north, and the only functional fiefdom in the northern route would be here, the Frontera barony. Moreover, the days were turning cold as winter was approaching.

Traveling to Cremo would be too much without food and proper clothes. So that means...

In the northern route the refugees would take, there was only one fiefdom that survived. And it was close enough for them to dare travel by foot.

Us. Who else? Just us. There's nowhere else.

Lloyd gritted his teeth as he concluded that a huge number of refugees would rush here. But turning a blind eye to them and kicking them out would bring about serious punishments from the queen.

My goodness, I guess I'm not destined to take a vacation. Dammit.

Lloyd bitterly wondered when he would ever have the luxury of comfort to rest and live the life of Riley. Feeling the bitter taste of his destiny, Lloyd hurried toward the baron's office. And throughout his walk there, in his head, there formed an urgent city planning that could accommodate an inundating number of refugees.

Chapter 121: Milking Money (1)

“It appears we will be busy for a while, my lord,” said Lloyd.

“Eh?”

Screech!

The abrupt voice seemingly broke the silence. The baron tightened his fingers, and his chisel skidded forward. The wooden doll in his other hand received a long scratch as a result.

“Oops, oh my...”

But his wistful look quickly disappeared. The baron removed his gaze from the sculpture and turned to Lloyd.

“What do you mean that we will be busy?” asked the baron.

“Forget that, are you okay?”

“Oh, I’m okay. I meant to peel off the area anyway, so it is all fine. And my hand didn’t get injured,” said the baron.

“That’s a relief.”

Lloyd was actually feeling the opposite of what he said. The baron had discontinued his hobby of chiseling wooden dolls when he was pressed under crippling debt. But now that the debt was paid off and the crisis in his family was nonexistent, his habit returned to ensure a peaceful merriment in his daily life. However, such a joyful hobby was set to be put on hold for a moment again.

“Refugees have come to our fiefdom,” Lloyd explained.

“What?” The baron was about to pick up the chisel to smoothen the area but stopped. “What refugees?”

“Just as I said. There are about 80 refugees here,” explained Lloyd.

“Have you checked where they are from?”

“Yes, they’re from the Sortino barony.”

“What? Hold on. Sortino barony is...” The baron looked at Lloyd meaningfully.

“Yes, it’s near the eastern range. Just like us.”

“...”

The baron’s eyes gradually grew bigger as the meaning of Lloyd’s words slowly sunk into him.

“Unfortunately, they failed to respond to the monster domino,” Lloyd said. “The entire fiefdom became desolated.”

“What about the Sortino family?”

“They have gone missing,” Lloyd said, his voice low.

“What a tragedy...”

“I had people serve up warm water and food to the refugees first. So, I have something to tell you, my lord,” said Lloyd, hurrying up before the baron’s face grew darker. “It appears that more refugees will be coming soon.”

“Yes, I see. That is the reason why you said we will be busy soon,” replied the baron.

“Yes.”

“But what about the other fiefdoms? Any news?”

“No. But...”

“But?”

“I presume that most of them met the same fate as the Sortino barony.”

“...”

The baron shut his mouth. It was hard, but it was plausible enough because he, too, experienced firsthand the shock and terror of the monster domino when hundreds of thousands of locusts stormed into his fiefdom.

Yes, there would only be a few... that could defend themselves against such a terrorizing event...

The baron still suffered from nightmares of that day. He broke out in a cold sweat on those nights, and he would wake up from sleep completely soaked. And so, he didn’t take the matter in front of him lightly.

Clack.

The baron put down the wooden doll and chisel.

“So... are you saying that those refugees will come to our fiefdom?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“How many?”

“Almost all of them.”

“What?” The baron threw a glance at Lloyd.

“The ballpark number is somewhere between thousands. It may easily go over tens of thousands.”

The baron’s eyes widened in surprise. The number was somewhere between thousands and tens of thousands. The baron, who had braced himself to hear the figure, was shocked to hear the actual number. His surprise made sense, for the Frontera barony boasted less than 5,000 people in population. And right now, his son was notifying him that a group of refugees was expected to arrive, and the number was a couple of times more than the current population in the barony.

“But... even so, do you really think it will happen?” said the baron.

“I presume it will.”

“...”

The baron’s Adam’s apple bobbed when he gulped. Lloyd was always right. It seemed so looking back. There was never a time he was at a loss when he did whatever his son suggested. Putting faith in Lloyd rendered a host of benefits. The same thing would be with the refugee situation. Plus, there was enough evidence to trust his son’s words.

“You’re right,” the baron agreed, “Come to think of it, you do have a point.”

The baron began to collect his thoughts as he spoke.

“Most of the fiefdoms near the eastern range have probably been greatly damaged. The same is true for the fiefdoms sitting in the west.”

“Yes, that is likely.”

“Right,” said the baron, “there must not be many places for the refugees to turn to.”

“Yes, my lord. Another range sits further into the west, and the south is a foreign country,” said Lloyd.

“And since they won’t be able to move to the east because that’s where the monsters came from, their only option is the north...”

“And in their route, the only working fiefdom would be us and the Lacona viscounty. There is also Cremo, the central city of this province. But it’s too far.”

“Right,” said the baron, “and making things worse, winter is nearing. From the perspective of the refugees, traveling to Cremo would be extremely difficult.”

“Yes. They will flock to a place where they can safely spend the winter.”

“And that would be our fiefdom.”

“Yes.”

A soft smile escaped him. Truly, the baron was a sensible person. He slightly lacked the grit to overcome challenges, but he gave ears to the advice of people around him. In a situation like this, such quality was imperative.

“And so, I think we need to prepare for two things before more people flood in here.”

“Two things?”

“The most urgent ones would be providing food and shelter when accommodating the refugees.”

“Food and shelter. Hmm.” The baron’s expression became dark.

“I suppose we must halt the festival first since we should save as much food as we can. But that still won’t be enough to feed thousands of refugees.”

It was true. The food stocked up in the storage wasn’t enough to feed the refugees. Sure, the Maritz land finally saw harvest, but there was still room for improvement as this was the first time the land was being refurbished and worked. The harvest was only enough to cover the people in the fiefdom. So right now, a flood of refugees whose number was set to reach multiple times their current population was far from promising.

“Should we resort to importing from Cremo?” the baron suggested the first thing that came to his mind.

“Well, that is a great idea as well. But I wish to leave it as the next best alternative.”

“Do you have any ideas in mind then?” asked the baron.

“Yes.”

“What is it?”

“Locusts. The bugs Bangul caught with her volcanic ash.”

The baron’s facial expression froze.

“What...? Do you mean to say we should feed the refugees the locust carcasses?”

What if they throw it up in disgust? Or what if they blow their gaskets and stir up a riot? Those were the two questions that popped into the baron’s head. But such a reaction was only natural because eating a locust was unimaginable and foreign to the people in the Laurasian continent. However, it wasn’t to Lloyd, who was from South Korea.

I mean, locusts may look repulsive, but grill them up well, and they become a great bar snack.

Plus, most South Koreans enjoyed pupas as snacks. So Lloyd and the baron had differing perspectives on consuming insects.

“It is all right. They won’t die eating it. The locusts should be surprisingly tasty. Not to mention the fact that they’re very nutritious.”

“But still, they’re insects...”

“Plus, they’re not small bugs. So that would be even better for us,” reasoned Lloyd.

“What do you mean by that?” asked the baron.

“The refugees won’t be eating up the entire thing.”

A corner of Lloyd’s lips curved upward.

“The locusts are over 2 feet in size. Snap the head and legs, and tear the skin naked. It’d be about a foot and a half. That is why...”

“So?” the baron asked in expectation.

“There is no one who can consume an entire locust in one sitting. Isn’t it comparable to the size of a steak?”

“Oh...”

The baron’s eyes glimmered. He was starting to get the idea.

“You plan on chopping only the meaty parts to feed them, yes?”

“Yes, that is what I mean.”

The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled further up. Human psychology worked like that. Cooking something up and seeing the ingredients in their raw form repulsed humans. They either loved or hated it, nothing in between. And so many ingredients were chopped and sliced into most dishes to hide their original shapes. Moreover, these refugees weren’t mukbang streamers or food fighters. No one among them would be eating a raw 1.5-foot-long locust as it would be processed and cut up into small pieces before being served.

“But of course, that wouldn’t entirely get rid of the repulsion toward the locust meat. So we have to come up with a recipe,” said Lloyd.

“A recipe? Why?” asked the baron in curiosity.

“Since a recipe is just a thing to make the refugees enjoy them,” Lloyd said as he shrugged. “Now, let’s get moving, my lord. We need to take care of the urgent matters first.”

“Yes, that sounds like a good idea.” The baron nodded at the same. If the refugees were right about their testimony and if Lloyd was right in his prediction, there was not a second to lose.

The barony carefully moved in preparation for the incoming refugees. First was the processing of locust meats attained in mass. They were already grilled to a crisp by the volcanic explosion, and the cold climate preserved them to be of the best quality. Javier oversaw the process.

“Okay, I want you guys to follow me. From here to here. Like this.”

Javier demonstrated with a dagger, and the crispy locust was skinned in a flash, exposing a white meat likened to a shrimp.

“...”

But it was never easy. The guard soldiers struggled to peel off the skin. Once only the juicy meat was left, the fiefdom’s women, who were supervised by Baroness Marbella, took over.

“Actually, I had a taste a while ago,” the baroness said in a dignified manner.

Her words caused the other women to widen their eyes in surprise, unable to internalize that the baroness had tasted those creepy and disgusting locusts before anyone else.

“Yes, I did. I chewed and ate it. It was not so bad,” she added.

“...”

“Based on my experience, I think we need a bit of a strong spice. This meat was a bit gamey. That is why...” The baroness grinned elegantly and placed an old book on the countertop.

“I am sure you are familiar with this cookbook. Yes, this is the legendary cookbook ‘I Became the Dragon King’s Chef’ any refined and high-status lady owns or wants to own.”

“Oh, my!”

There was an envious clamor among the women. It was only natural, given that the cookbook had been regarded as one of the best of the best cookbooks on the continent for several hundred years. It was a legendary and rare cookbook authored by a foreign girl who became the wife of a dragon in human form eons ago.

“Yes, it is the cookbook you all are familiar with,” Marbella explained, “I am sure you can recall how my son had taken care of the dark sorcerer the last time. He brought it from the evil man’s den. It is my plan to refer to this book to develop a recipe for cooking locusts. What do you say to that?”

“…!” The women nodded their heads in enthusiasm.

Amid the busy preparation in the fiefdom, Lloyd’s days were hectic as well. But his business was different in nature. He was busy walking, which went on for a whole day. Every day, without fail, he aimlessly walked and walked as though he was possessed by a spirit that loved strolling. At times, he stopped and nodded. Other times, he looked around, sighed, and contemplated. Just like that, Lloyd walked, observed, and walked every corner of the fiefdom for several days. It was as if he had become Anaximander, the first mapmaker in the world. But none of the residents thought his behavior was strange.

“He must have a reason. After all, he is Master Lloyd.”

“Of course. He is Master Lloyd.”

“Indeed. He is Master Lloyd.”

The troublemaker, the gangster, worse-than-a-plague hooligan young master was gone in their perception. In its stead, his actions were defined and understood in one sentence: He is Master Lloyd. That was enough. Even if Lloyd did handstands all day or tumbled forward and backward and jumped around, everyone was almost ready to understand him, saying, “He is Master Lloyd.”

Regardless, about 15 days passed by. Lloyd’s prediction turned real. Each day, more refugees fled into the barony on and on. There was no end. Some were in groups of ten while others came in hundreds. Men and women came from all corners of the east. The refugees began to be packed full in the fiefdom. Once this truly happened, the baron paled.

“What do we do?”

On the morning of the 16th day the refugees arrived, the baron called Lloyd, and he spoke in a voice mixed with anxiety.

“Whew... I somehow braced myself for this to happen after you told me, but as I see the endless queue of people, my heart is afraid.”

It was the indisputable truth. He did see this coming, for he was warned of the massive influx of refugees. So he decided to stay prepared and determined. But when he actually confronted the situation with his own eyes, this whole thing felt real. The actual situation turned out to be much worse than what he vaguely imagined. He felt frustration bubbling over inside him.

“Yes, we made various preparations on our end, like the locust meat, but I am afraid,” the baron confessed. “I am worried about whether we can take care of them. Or I wonder if we should take in a certain number of them and send the rest away. Will we be able to offer them a place to stay safe against the cold wind? I couldn’t get a wink of sleep last night.”

“Hmm, is that so?”

“Yes. How am I supposed to accept this situation...? On that note, I heard that you have been walking across all around the fiefdom. Tell me, did you find the solution to solve this shelter problem which you kept to yourself the last time?”

The baron recalled the report he had heard a few days ago about how Lloyd spent the whole day roaming around the fiefdom. So the baron figured that Lloyd was doing what he called surveying, that he was devising a housing plan he vaguely mentioned the last time. The baron’s presumption was right.

“Yes, I do have a plan, my lord.”

“I knew you would have one,” the baron said. “That is great. Tell me, what is this plan?”

“Other than obviously providing a temporary tent, ultimately...”

“Ultimately?” The baron asked again, still hopeful.

Lloyd grinned happily and said, “Have you ever heard of an apartment complex?”

Chapter 122: Milking Money (2)

An apartment complex. It was the most common type of residence in South Korea. It was ubiquitous in cities near the capital, metropolitan cities, and even in provincial towns. The housing structure was so rampant that not having them in a city was the same as not having kimchi during dinner. That was how a stately apartment complex was in South Korea. Lloyd, too, lived in one of them when he was there.

From the moment I was in elementary school. Until my house was auctioned off.

His family lived in the typical 112 square meter unit with one living room and three rooms. The veranda lined up the plants his father used to grow, and the walls boasted the ostentatious wallpapers of his mother’s taste. They were tacky by today’s standards, but still, Lloyd wished to go back to that cozy house if he could. He sometimes even dreamed of living there. Even the faint scent of the cleaner that wafted out every time his mother cleaned the bathroom stimulated his nose in his dream. To Lloyd, the house was to be missed and a source of nostalgia.

But of course, I’m not thinking of putting that kind of apartment here.

The conditions weren't right to build one here, and there really wasn’t any reason to do so. The apartment complex he was suggesting to construct on this land was meant to efficiently accommodate refugees.

“And so, I was trying to find a solution and thought over the issue. How I can efficiently and safely accommodate as many people in a limited space.”

“Hmm, so your conclusion was this so-called apartment complex?”

“Yes.”

The baron cocked his head to the side as he failed to understand Lloyd. He appeared to be slightly confused by the unfamiliar term he had never heard before. Lloyd nodded his head earnestly toward the baron.

“To be honest, the concept didn’t come from me. Do you recall the time I had stopped by at the academy to meet Julian during my time at the capital?”

“Mhm, yes, you did.”

“While I waited for Julian, I came across the concept from a book shelved in one of the many bookshelves in the academy.”

Of course, it was a lie. There was no book, and he had never seen such. But the baron had no way of verifying it. Besides, Lloyd knew that he could resort to a white lie in a moment like this. And he could always brush it away saying that the book wasn’t there anymore.

“The book introduced architecture styles of the ancient kingdoms,” lied Lloyd.

“So, are you saying that this ‘apartment complex’ is architecture conceptualized in ancient times?” asked the baron.

“Yes, that is what I mean.”

Lloyd grinned. This time, he wasn’t lying. It was the truth except for that it was an ancient architectural style of the earth, not this Lorasian continent.

“Though the name isn’t famous, there once was an empire named ‘Rome.’ And the empire held several multi-story residential buildings called the Insula, which housed many families.”

“Insula?”

“Yes, my lord. The building was constructed from wood, brick, and classical cement. The limit is usually six stories to avoid any collapsing, but some were even constructed up to more than ten.”

“Haha, ten stories?”

“That’s just not it. There was also a country named Islam other than Rome. A city named Cairo was lined up with seven-story apartments, and hundreds of people lived in one building, according to the record," Lloyd expounded.

"Hundreds in one building, eh?"

"Yes," Lloyd replied. "Some even reached 14 stories, and the roof even held a garden."

"Haha. It must have looked like a royal palace," the baron stated.

"Needless to say. In particular, a place called 'Shibam' in Yemen is recorded to have boasted an apartment unit that was 11 stories high while entirely made of dirt."

"Hmm," the baron said as he stroked his chin, "That means that you will vertically construct a building high to accommodate refugees in a limited land space, yes?"

"Yes, that's what I mean."

Lloyd smiled with conviction as he taught the baron a completely new concept of construction. In a moment like this, putting on a confident air was imperative.

Duh. In a situation like this, I must appeal to people even if it means lying to them. That's how I can advance in society.

Just then, his mind flew back to the time in South Korea. It really was the case even in a simple setting such as a construction field where dust and cement powders flew all around. He had to pose and show up to earn rewards, even if it demanded him to be political. In construction sites, those who received praise and got recruited for being competent were mostly those who actively publicized their skills to others. In other words, a combination of dexterity and sales skills promised greater physical and monetary rewards than those without the latter.

It's the same right now.

He must own a silver tongue and make his audience look forward to the outcome. As such, Lloyd licked his lips and resolved to turn himself into a salesman.

“First and foremost, there are many advantages to constructing an apartment complex. One of them is the easier administrative management of the refugees,” Lloyd began.

“Do explain for me, will you?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied. “Imagine that a building accommodates 1,000 residents. Then we will be able to create a management system where a leader will be selected in a unit of 1,000 residents to count the numbers, check their health, and provide relief goods.”

“Hmm, that sounds like a good idea. What is the second benefit?”

“Since a lot of people will reside in a house that stands up vertically, the actual land mass required to accommodate an individual will be reduced. Don’t you think this is quite appealing given the fiefdom’s rather modest territory? This one is related to the third benefit,” Lloyd went on.

“Yes, do go on,” the baron urged.

“Yes. Once the refugees settle down here, business districts will develop around the apartment complex in the future.”

“What do you mean by business districts? Like bars, shops, and restaurants?”

“That is right. An area will be created thanks to the increase in population density caused by the apartment complex. A high population in a small area means that the purchasing power in the region will be high.”

That was exactly the case in South Korea. Very much so. Businesses thrived around apartment complexes. As the population focused on a small area, the purchasing power increased as a result, and movie theaters, franchise restaurants and cafes, after school classes, hospitals, supermarkets, salons, and convenience stores appeared everywhere. The population tempted the businessmen and women to do business there.

“There is one more thing. It’s easy to construct.”

“How so?” asked the baron.

“Because it will be standardized.”

Lloyd shrugged after he spoke.

“Once hundreds of families come in for a while, the hundreds of houses will be shaped in the same fashion, like they are printed. Standardized houses are easier to construct and manage. Moreover, it’s advantageous for insulation as well as during the winter.”

“Insulation?”

“Indeed. Since houses will be surrounded by other houses on all sides. There will be less room for the heat to slip out, keeping the heat during the winter. It’s going to be less cold.”

“I wonder...” The baron nodded in a daze. The advantages Lloyd just enumerated sounded plausible, but the final one Lloyd suggested next appealed to him the most. That was the deal clincher.

“And the last advantage. Our fiefdom will enjoy stronger defense during emergencies.”

“Defense?”

Easy management. Economical land usage. Active businesses. Easier construction and maintenance. And not enough with that, the fiefdom’s defense now? Lloyd grinned as he looked at the widened eyes of the baron. He held up a pen and drew something on a piece of paper. It looked like a donut with an empty middle.

“There is one more ancient architecture style I forgot to tell you a while ago. It’s this one. It’s called ‘Tolou’ in the Fujian province. This is what it looks like. This enclosed building holds a plaza in the center, but my version will look like a four-sided donut, not a round one like this Tolou.”

“It does, doesn’t it? All the windows are open only toward the inside plaza. This allows the exterior walls to act as a fortress, and the only entrance to the plaza is this one. So if we lock this up, one building will turn into an impregnable fortress.”

“What is the use of the plaza in the center?” asked the baron.

“For communal use.” Lloyd’s voice sounded confident. “I plan on putting only a bedroom and living room in each house. And cooking, eating, washing dishes, doing laundry, showering, and relieving will all take place in the facilities installed in the plaza. The well, canteen, and public sauna, and bathrooms, and whatnot.”

The baron didn’t say a word.

“That is the only way we can house the most number of people there. Like a beehive.”

The baron didn’t say a word.

“Moreover, the advantages I have outlined are just what our fiefdom needs at the moment.”

The baron didn’t say anything again. He simply glanced at his son, feeling slightly dazed. Lloyd put on a brazen smile on his face.

“Certainly,” Lloyd said, “constructing this building will take some time. I will have to find an appropriate piece of land as well as survey and design and acquire materials for the construction. Realistically speaking, it will be completed next winter. That’s the goal. This means that we must build temporary shelters for the refugees before the complex is finished.”

“Yes, I see,” the baron said as he gazed at Lloyd.

“Um, but why are you looking at me like that?”

“Whew, how should I say it? I just think that I am blessed to have you as my son.”

“...”

“Haha, did I make you uncomfortable?”

“Um, it’s not that, but, well, yes, you are making me uncomfortable,” Lloyd said.“And you saying it right at my face makes my stomach churn.”

Lloyd scratched the back of his head. He did throw a pitch to start another project to the baron, but such praise made his face flush red. But the baron continued to send gazes of confidence to Lloyd despite the latter’s evident expression of discomfort. Lloyd was perturbed. Just then, he wondered if there still remained in his heart Suho Kim, the discouraged boy sitting cramped in a small room rental. Lloyd eventually broke into embarrassed laughter.

A few days passed, and Lloyd gave full-bore efforts to construct temporary shelters for the refugees.

The structure ought to be kept simple as much as possible. So we can finish it in no time.

A square hole was dug 65 feet in width and length and 1.6 feet in depth. Lloyd then constructed a formwork that was the size of a hole, after which he fashioned a zigzag route in it. Each side of the four-sided route was about eight inches in the path. The other end was connected to a chimney. It was a cement ondol to be used for heating.

I didn’t have Bangul or her volcanic explosion skill when I made the ondol room the first time I came here.

During those times, he couldn’t make cement, but now, it was different. Making the ondol floor was much more convenient and safer than before.

It’s all thanks to the surveying skill as well.

Thanks to the design skill and simulation option, Lloyd could test out the flow and discharge of heat, enabling him to construct an ondol structure that can transfer heat in a more sophisticated manner. As such, he was able to easily make one as though he was making some cupcakes.

“Pour!”

“Two, three! Here we go!”

“One, two, oink!”

The civil engineers and orc miners worked together to mix the cement out of Bangul’s volcanic ash and pour it onto the formwork. When it was cured and dried up, a flat ondol surface with an area of 400 square meters was made as a result.

“All right, time to lay the wooden panels!”

“Yes!”

The cement surface was then finished with thin wooden planks, and wooden poles were erected all around. One side was 9.8 feet in height, and the other end was 6.5 feet. They were covered by a thick cloth. Just like that, with the roof sloped to one side, a massive ondol tent was completed.

“All right. You made one already, and I’m sure you now know how it’s done, yes?” asked Lloyd. “From now on, repeat the process. The design and size of the formworks should be equal. Every single one of them. You think you can do it?”

“Of course, we can,” Sir Bayern nodded confidently. Before Lloyd knew it, Sir Bayern had already become so seasoned in commanding the engineering corp that he became an excellent construction supervisor. The job of building the rest of the tents in the winter fell on Sir Bayern. Thanks to it, Lloyd focused on getting ready with constructing the apartment complex.

But the real issue is money.

A scowl never left Lloyd’s face throughout the preparation period. Money really was the actual problem here.

We spent almost all our money to pay off the debt.

Every penny was scraped to clear their debt, so their remaining money reserve was low. Of course, there was the monthly water bill from the Lacona viscounty on top of the steel dungs Bangul excreted that Lloyd was hoping to sell. But none of them could be translated to cash at the moment.

To my relief, the total cost of materials isn’t much. Bangul offers free steel and cement needed for construction. The cost of labor is cheap since I’m hiring the civil engineering corp belonging to the fiefdom. But that doesn’t mean we have plenty of money. I can see how much we lack just by looking at the payment for the stonemasons and blacksmiths we’ll hire later.

Right now, the refugees were flooding into the barony, and that was why the temporary shelters were being constructed. The cost of purchasing tent cloths was considerable, and so Lloyd was already on his uppers to cover the food, medicine, and other basic necessities for the incoming people. Amid this situation, the lack of capital was barely surprising because it took place simultaneously with the unprecedented apartment complex construction.

I need to source some money for this place.

There was a way, in fact. It was to ask help from Count Cremo, and he held the title <The Eldest Son of the Frontera Family> he had newly earned by clearing the debt.

I can attain financial credibility within the Cremona region, and I can get an investment in the most favorable conditions and with the lowest interest rate available. Moreover, no one will press me to pay them back in any form...

That was the effect of the title, so Lloyd could receive a generous investment. But he was hesitant.

I just paid off the debt, and now I have to incur another one?

But this time, no one was going to press him. But since he couldn’t shake off the leery feeling, Lloyd put off the decision and deliberated for a few days. The solution, however, came to him unexpectedly.

“My goodness, Lloyd. Look what just came from the royal capital.”

One afternoon when Lloyd was thinking hard, Baron Frontera called Lloyd to his office. As soon as Lloyd entered, the baron held out a letter.

“What is this?” asked Lloyd as he looked at the letter.

Lloyd noticed the royal magic insignia stamped in the letter envelope.

“A carrier pigeon flew here a while ago, and I opened it to find out this. I think we can expect to receive a royal messenger in a few days, bearing the command of the queen.”

“...”

Lloyd took the letter and wondered what it would be about. He opened it.

[Since time immemorial, I, along with the great sovereigns that came before me, have worked hard to achieve peace and comfort for the nobles and citizens. However, the news of great misfortune falling in the stretch of the eastern range has recently been reported to me. My heart is filled with sorrow.]

The letter contained a message about the monster domino that took place in the eastern range. Lloyd continued to read the letter.

[A host of monsters invaded the fiefdoms bordering the east range... Blah blah blah... Many residents lost their lands... Whatnot... The refugees are the people I must cherish.... Blah blah blah... Each fiefdom lord is thus requested to actively accommodate and protect the refugees in the lands I have entrusted you with.]

Hmm...

Lloyd started to deliberate.

[Order. Every fiefdom in the eastern area of the Cremona region is ordered by the powers vested to the queen to prioritize the accommodation and protection of the refugees. November of Year 617. Declared by Queen Alicia Termina Magentano in Magenta the royal capital.]

“Whew. The future looks bleak for us,” the baron sighed beside Lloyd, seeing that his son finished reading the letter.

When Lloyd turned, he realized that the baron’s face darkened. It was grim and gloomy. His emotions were reflected in grumbling.

“Although it is moral to accommodate the refugees, I never expected the queen to issue such an order. What should we do then? What more should we do now when we don’t have enough money or food?”

The baron was being frank. Of course, he had been accepting the incoming refugees for the sake of humanitarianism, but that acceptance could only work when he had enough capacity and resources. Right now, the number of people was overwhelming their tiny barony. Things would have looked brighter if the refugees were equally distributed to the Lacona viscounty that sat on the south. But no. Every single refugee flooded here. Lloyd’s reputation was behind such an influx. The hero of Cremo. The protector of the queen. Two-time defender against the monster invasions. People believed that moving to the Frontera fiefdom would ensure safety, and that thought turned into a beacon of hope and a guide to their escapade.

“And with the queen’s order, we have no choice but to accept every one of them. We cannot even ask for consideration and reject them. Ha... What should we do?”

The baron considered the future to be bleak. He could already see his barony tanking by the financial and refugee crises. Just then...

“Well, this is for the better,” Lloyd calmly said.

“What...?”

Here was the baron’s son, uttering gibberish. But there was more. Lloyd even grinned.

“My dear Lloyd,” the baron asked anxiously, “How could you smile in this dire situation?”

“Oh, of course we should smile.”

“Why?”

“After all, I am joyful.”

“...”

This was it. The surmounting pressure has finally got the better of my smart son, and he has finally lost it, the baron thought to himself.

“Joyful...?” the baron asked, growing more worried. “Why in the world would you feel that?”

“Because I can write a response. That is why I’m happy.”

“A reply?”

“Yes.”

“But to whom?”

“Why, to the queen, of course,” Lloyd said nonchalantly.

“To the queen? You are going to send a response letter to her?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied with a big fat smile on his face. “This is really for the better. A good thing. Really, a lot has been on my mind because of the financial crisis.”

“And?”

“I am thinking of using my fatal and secret weapon to solve the financial crisis while responding to the queen.”

“What could be that secret weapon of yours that will save our financial state?”

“You see, my lord, the queen herself has just gifted us with permission to use the weapon in her letter.”

“…”

The baron could feel his heart thump, and it dawned on him that his son was on another level compared to him.

I was at a loss when I received the order, but my son saw a glimpse of hope at changing the situation for the better.

He couldn’t be any prouder of his son.

“A hidden weapon?” said the baron as he smothered joy rising in him. “It appears that you have a sure-fire method, given your confidence. What could that be?”

There was anticipation in the baron’s eyes as he asked the question to Lloyd. To this, Lloyd responded with a large and steel-like brazenness on his face.

“Groveling, throwing a tantrum, and whining.”

Chapter 123: Milking Money (3)

“Ready to fire.”

Creak. Clank! Clank!

In the royal courtyard of Magenta. An officer’s voice rang aloud in the grand drill hall. 50 archers holding a crossbow turned the windlass at the voice. They put the fatal bolt on the string, and the sharp bolt head glinted against the light. Just then, the officer commanded in a serious tone.

“Fire!”

Thwack! Thwack!

More than 50 lethal bolts were fired in unison, each carrying a tension of 1,250 pounds. They flew toward the same target: Queen Alicia Termina Magentano.

“...”

Queen Magentano’s eyes held a glint of ferociousness. The 50 archers that surrounded her were on a more elevated footing than hers, so the arrows were fired at a slanted angle. But it took only a split second to identify the trajectory of each bolt, hear the sound, and feel it. Her response was immediate.

Clank! Slash!

The moment her sword came out of its sheath, strands of her silver aura appeared.

Slash! Crack!

12 sword strikes in one blink. She slashed, struck, slayed upward, defended, spread, twisted, slayed, hit, stabbed, and divided. The aura of twelve strands roared, surrounding her with a storm, which turned into a soft breeze in no time.

Drop...

50 bolts, which were cut in exactly half, fell to her feet by dozens. But they weren't just sliced in half. Nothing was random. It was cut at the same length and angle. Not a single bolt was exempted. But Queen Magentano looked bored and disinterested because what she did was nothing but some stretching of her muscles.

"Again. This time fire indiscriminately," she ordered dryly.

The officer, who gulped as he saw her, turned toward the archers.

"Reload! Ready to fire!"

Creak. Clank!

The archers busied themselves with reloading and getting ready. Beside them was a pile of hundreds of bolts. This bolt was lethal enough to fatally pierce into heavy armor. Even though she was faced with such an intimidating situation, Queen Magentano breathed with aplomb. It was only obvious as this was her normal training routine, even though it doesn't look like so to others.

This isn't enough.

Queen Magentano told herself that she needed to grow stronger. She needed to get better at sword fighting. It wasn't an option to relax and take things easy just because she rose to the level of a sword master. Otherwise, she could put herself to shame in the future.

I never wish to experience it again.

She recalled that day. The day the suspension bridge was finished. A banquet was held. She drank poison. Sir Kyle attacked her. The mere thought of the event overwhelmed her with shame and rage.

I’d received too much help.

A nameless knight, Javier, overpowered Sir Kyle, who was a sword master. And what about Lloyd, whom she had pegged as a simple young master? He showcased a technique she had never heard of. He absorbed mana around him in an indiscriminate manner and even bore a large hole through the banquet hall roof by emitting some powerful energy. And with what? Just a simple dinner knife.

Whereas I couldn’t do anything.

She was embarrassed by herself. She had gotten too relaxed, boasting that she was already a sword master. But now, ever since she recovered from the poisoning, she had been engrossed in training every day.

There are also several other matters giving me a headache.

She failed to receive any confession from Sir Kyle. Swordmasters had the power to build powerful psychological walls unique to them. Several drugs were put out in his system, and the confession magic was also employed to shatter them to pieces, and the process was likened to digging a thick steel wall with a spoon. But she didn’t give up. Dozens of magicians stuck to the job for almost a month. At last, they succeeded in disarming the psychological wall from Sir Kyle. But what has revealed in his heart frightened the queen.

Sir Kyle was... empty. Completely empty. He knew nothing.

To be technically correct, a part of his memory about the power behind the assassination attempt on the queen and their motivation behind it was completely erased by a powerful brainwashing spell. He didn’t remember anything. The only thing that remained was the strong will that had lived in his head for a long time: I will kill Queen Magentano according to his wish.

Something definitely is going on here.

Who could have cast a powerful brainwashing spell on Sir Kyle when he was a sword master? What for? She didn’t have an answer despite the countless investigations that were conducted. As though her head wasn’t aching with that alone, the east was going through turmoil.

Lloyd Frontera. His prediction was spot on.

The monster domino the sultan kingdom created in the east was much more substantial than she expected. The damage was considerably huge as 17 fiefdoms in the eastern range were annihilated.

Thwack! Fwish!

Another 50 bolts were fired while she was in a trance. And yet, despite the indiscriminate storm of arrows, her train of thought didn’t stop.

When I heard of his prediction, I thought it was just a potential disaster that could unfold. And I thought that its magnitude would be small enough for each fiefdom to adequately respond to. Who would have thought that it would be this destructive... This is clearly my fault.

She realized that she had thought too lightly of the incident.

Slash! Slash!

She wished that she could overcome this incident easily, like these bolts that sliced so smoothly in her hands.

“Your Majesty, Frontera barony has sent a response to your order.”

A clear voice echoed aloud in the corner of the training hall. The queen turned around to find an official hanging his head. She dropped her sword and wiped the sweat off her forehead.

“A response?” she said.

“Yes, Your Majesty. It has been sent through a carrier pigeon.”

“Bring it to me.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

She received the letter the palatial official held out and spread it out.

[I, your faithful subject Lloyd Frontera, express my sincere loyalty to Her Highness.]

She noticed that Lloyd's handwriting was ugly, as though he had scribbled it. The corners of her eyes drooped in annoyance.

Loyalty? I do not think so.

She knew that Lloyd would never be a loyal person. Raising her guard hard, she went on to read.

[Today, I have gravely received your order and vowed to obey it to the best of my abilities. However, I do not have the money to do so.]

"..."

She couldn't believe her eyes. She kept reading nonetheless.

[The state of the refugees flooding the fiefdom is wretched and sordid. The children are skins and bones, and the elderly have grown weak. They can only rise with the support of their children. In obedience to your dignified will, I yearn to feed them fully and clothe them warm. However, I do not have the money to do so.]

"Tsk."

She was starting to see where he was heading. She continued to read.

[It is my sincere wish to overcome this disaster wisely. However, I am poor. It is my desire to be loyal to your will. However, I do not have the money for it. I do not have any food, clothes, or other basic necessities either. If there is anything I have, it is the ebullient and yearning loyalty toward Your Highness, and with it, I can only cry out Your Majesty's name day and night toward the blinding and dark days ahead of me.]

"..."

Don’t do that please.

Queen Magentano sincerely wished to stop him, and she wanted to fold the letter and look at it no more. But Lloyd’s tenacious whining written in his letter was so appealing and forceful that she couldn’t pull her gaze away from it.

[Therefore, to overcome this wretched disaster as one, I have hung a painting of Your Majesty on my wall. Last night alone, I stood along with the starving refugees and gazed at your painting at length. Do you know what happened then? The boiling loyalty for Your Majesty wonderfully worked to erase the pang of hunger in the refugees!]

“...”

[The stinging pain of losing their home had the same effect. Just this morning, the refugees and I formed an organization called ‘XOXO Queen Magentano.’ Indeed, it is the organization, a fan club that strives to forget the pain of losing your home out of loyalty and affection toward Your Majesty.]

“...”

Hold on. What? Is he out of his mind?

[When a pang of hunger strikes, we gaze at Your Majesty’s painting. When pain rushes over us, we sing a song that celebrates Your Majesty. When the cold hits us, we count day and night how many days are left until your birthday. Once we do that, we smile in happiness in the clear hopes that our hunger, pain, and chills shall be forgotten.]

“...”

That sounds so sickening that it makes my hair stand.

[Certainly, it is not sickening. Every moment is fun. Every attempt feels anew. As I report to you, it dawned on me that being penniless has gifted the refugees and the fiefdom with happiness and enriched us with meaningful experiences. We are happy because we are poor and hungry. We are joyful because we are poor and sick. We are thrilled because we are poor and cold.]

“...”

Stop it, you weirdo.

[What is the good of having money anyway? What else matters more than our loyalty to Your Majesty? That alone shall be enough to overcome this starvation, agony, and cold. So that when the spring comes to bloom beautiful flowers on the land, your beautiful name shall be written on our skulls. Oh, oh! Your Majesty! Ah! Your Majesty!]

“...”

She was out of things to say, so her resigned eyes simply moved to the far bottom of the letter.

[P.S.—Your Majesty is aware that there are only a handful of fiefdoms that remain intact in the Cremona region aside from us, and it is in my knowledge as well. Therefore, please remember me, who carried you on my back! Should Your Majesty still remember a part of the warmth in that devoted back of this menial servant, please give us some money... along with the royal master blacksmith Corgidus...]

“Ha, haha...”

Laughter escaped Queen Magentano after she finished reading the letter. She wasn’t even dumbfounded anymore.

I made another mistake.

Queen Magentano realized that she shouldn’t have sent the royal order to the Frontera barony at all. But she did, eventually giving Lloyd a reason to confidently whine about his predicament to her.

Tsk. I would have paid little attention to his whining if I did not issue the royal order.

It never occurred to her that Lloyd would whine and wail about his situation the moment he received the letter. And never with this kind of force and tenacity.

I should scale up my assistance to him more than what I had in mind.

Otherwise, Lloyd may whine again. No, it was just obvious that he would do so, and it would be even worse next time. Queen Magentano didn't wish to defile her eyes again as she read the letter once more. And so, she considered going all out in assisting him since she had meant to support him in the first place.

How about assigning the Frontera barony to act as the hub of rebuilding the Cremona region?

She recalled the news about the barony, about how it managed to defend monster invasions twice, and how it mastered a giant monster in the eastern range. Not enough with that, the orc tribe in the wilderness was persuaded to move to the range.

The Frontera barony must be the safest area from the monster domino situation now. If Lloyd's skills and my bountiful assistance are combined, then the reconstruction project is worth pushing ahead.

The reconstruction project could be expanded to make the Frontera barony become the second city in the Cremona region. If that happened...

Lloyd Frontera can be my shield in the east.

The barony was seeing a steep hike in population with the massive number of refugees flooding there. Stably housing the population and helping everyone settle there would allow the barony to quickly grow in size, taking the first step to becoming a big city.

That wouldn't be a loss for the palace and me as well.

If she showed him a clear benefit and let him enjoy it steadily. Lloyd was ready to give her his unchanging loyalty. The throne would grow stronger as well if a person like him rose to power. The sultan's kingdom, her enemy in the east, would be deterred by his growing influence. So, all in all, it was a solid investment. Once that decision was made in her head, Queen Magentano looked up.

“This is my order. The palatial minister is thus ordered to return to the palace and hold a review committee on the motion of granting special escalation of status in the Frontera barony to the status of the county,” she ordered in a dignified voice”

“This isn’t an order but just a favor.”

Back here in the Frontera barony, the sun shone brightly in the early winter, and Lloyd started speaking on top of a plain lot.

“Have you ever run a hamster wheel before?”

“Ppodong?”

Ppodong cocked his round head to the side as he stood on Lloyd’s palm. Lloyd smiled in satisfaction.

“I guess you haven’t, right?”

“Ppodong!”

“I knew it. Do you want me to make one for you?”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“About 65 feet in diameter. You’ll be able to run to your heart’s content. How does that sound?”

“Ppodong!”

A joyous smile spread on Ppodong’s chubby cheeks from surprise. He found himself dancing his buttocks in happiness, and the same reaction was visible on Lloyd's face, who smiled in contentment. But did Lloyd smile because he was happy to give a gift to Ppodong? Of course not.

Kekeke. The construction equipment has been acquired.

When Ppodong ran on the wheel in excitement, he would actually be turning the equipment connected to it.

That's how I'll make sure that the cement doesn't dry up!

The Frontera barony was welcoming the early winter, and the sun blessed the land. There, a special equipment called "Ready Mixed Concrete" was being invented to enable the construction of the first-ever apartment complex in the Lorasia continent. And that was the 65-foot diameter wheel Ppodong would turn with his utmost strength.

Chapter 124: The Apartment Complex (1)

“My lord, it looks like we are almost there.”

The guard knight’s voice coming from outside woke the great palatial dwarf master, Wells Corgidus. He opened his wrinkled eyes, and his gaze darted outside the window to an unfamiliar scene. The Frontera barony, the destination of his journey.

This place is undeniably rural”

There were no decent buildings or anything similar. It was just a patch of fields amid a vast plain lot. However, Corgidus loved it.

At last, I can breathe in some fresh air.

It had been already 40 years since he started working in the palace as the craft master. How many times did he go out of the capital during those times?

Only a handful of times. And the last time I stepped out of the royal capital was 15 years ago”

Due to the years he spent residing in the capital, he was used to its high-rise buildings that stood compact with one another and bustling crowds that existed anywhere he went. And that was probably why he felt refreshed by this tranquil and unruffled landscape.

Well, though I didn’t come here for vacation.

Corgidus’s thoughts flew back to the event that happened a few days ago. It was late at night. The queen had called him to the palace, which was atypical of her. He had served three monarchs in his lifetime, so the relatively young queen treated him in a respectful manner. Thus, she never once called him into the palace past midnight. This was why Corgidus thought to himself that something special must have happened on his way to the palace.

And I was right.

The moment he paid his respects, the queen immediately asked something that caught him by surprise.

“What is the biggest object you have constructed so far?”

“It is the suspension bridge,” answered Corgidus, “we constructed last summer, Your Majesty.”

“Are you interested in constructing something far bigger than that?” asked Queen Magentano.

“Please do tell me what can be bigger than a suspension bridge.”

“A city for instance,” the queen stated.

“...”

Her suggestion to construct a city sounded like gibberish in his ears. Then, the queen went on to explain further”

Lloyd Frontera. That arrogant yet talented prick. She asked if I’m interested in working with him to build a new city.

Corgidus didn’t have to think about his answer. He immediately nodded, and for a simple reason. This offer served as a great opportunity to try something he had never done before and experiment with a new construction project. As such, he started to pack. 20 master blacksmiths working in the royal forge were selected. And at last, after a hectic 15-day journey with them, Corgidus arrived at this barony.

“Whew... My... My back aches so much,” Corgidus grumbled”

One of the young dwarf masters, who was seated across from Corgidus, grinned and spoke.

“Indeed. I never expected that we would be on such a rough journey without a single break.”

“Right? Sitting in a rattling carriage all day long is a hard job in itself,” Corgidus said.

His entire body felt sore and joints rattled in pain. He wondered if this was what delivery parcels went through during the several days it took to get delivered. But even when Corgidus arrived and hopped out of the carriage, rest was not granted to him.

“You are here. I have waited for you day and night.”

A voice welcomed Corgidus even before he could get out and get a breath of fresh air after being stuck in the carriage for so long. He wiggled his thick and bushy brow and turned to the voice, and when he checked who it was, he flew into a rage.

“Wait for me?” huffed Corgidus. “I don’t trust a single word you say, you prick.”

“Oh, is that so?”

“Of course.”

The voice belonged to Lloyd, who grinned as though he was here to escort Corgidus, but the latter scoffed and huffed through his nose at the young master.

“How can you come out alone if you have been waiting day and night, eh?” pointed Corgidus. “Be honest with me, you prick. You simply happened to spot us on your way somewhere else, am I wrong?”

“Woah,” said Lloyd, “since when did you learn to read minds?”

“Read minds, my butt. It is too obvious.”

“Haha. Had I known you’d react like this, I would have hung a welcome banner at the entrance of the fiefdom along with some flowers,” joked Loyd.

“Why, do you want me to die from embarrassment? Leave it,” Corgidus groped.

“And that is why I didn’t prepare anything. This is the beautiful thoughtfulness of humanity at work. Thoughtfulness.”

“Yeah, right. I’m so thankful that I’m tearing up.”

“You’re not alone. My eyes are also getting wet at finally meeting you,” Lloyd quipped.

“Really?”

“Yes. It’s not a lie. I’ve been waiting for you. So...”

Lloyd stopped and held out a wad of paper. Doubt flashed through Corgidus’s eyes.

“What is this?”

“You will find out once you see it.”

“...”

The 20-or-so pages of papers were rolled up, and Corgidus took and opened them up. His ears picked up the wily voice of Lloyd.

“While I was waiting for you day and night, I drew up some designs. Let’s be honest. We don’t have a use for banners or bouquets. I think these papers are better suited for you,” Lloyd said.

“Better suited for me? This?” Corgidus asked.

“Yes.”

“What makes you think so?”

“Your nose. It flared when you opened the paper.”

“...”

“Come on. I know you actually like them deep inside,” Lloyd insisted.

“...”

“Aren’t you honestly glad that I’m welcoming you with these blueprints?”

Lloyd’s voice grew more suggestive, and at last, Corgidus scoffed.

“Yeah, I like it, you prick. This is what I came to see. Happy now?”

“Yes. Look as much as you want.”

“Haha. But kid, what if I leave after I finish looking at these designs to my heart’s content? Where is your confidence coming from?” Corgidus asked.

“Um, isn’t this the first time you’re seeing anything like that blueprint?”

“What?”

“You’ll have trouble sleeping at night if you just leave after taking a peek,” Lloyd said with confidence.

“Me? Why?”

Corgidus spoke as his brows pulled upward. Lloyd brightly smiled.

“You will want to make it.”

“What is that...?”

“You will want to make it so much that those blueprints will appear in your dreams. Your desires will softly whisper into your heart... ‘Oh, oh, I want to make it! I want to tap the metal, ignite the fire, and fine tune it! I want to see the designs completed and operate in real life!’ Things like those.”

“What sort of nonsense are you spewing-”

“And every night, you will be tossing and turning in bed with regret, thinking about how you should have constructed the design on the blueprint and wishing to turn back time. Oh, how pitiful your blanket is. It’s going to be all bruised up but never have any time to heal,” Lloyd said.

“What? Why would I toss my blanket-”

“So,” Lloyd interrupted, “are you in or not?”

“...”

“It’s going to be super fun if you take the job. It’ll give you a strong purpose in life and plenty of impressive things to brag about later on. Are you sure you are not in?”

“Tsk. Fun, meaningful, and impressive, my foot. It’s either I do it, or not. There’s no need for your mumbo jumbo.”

“Does that mean you are in?” Lloyd said, his voice dripping with joy.

“Come on, you prick, I need to hear what this building is for before I go and make it,” muttered Corgidus.

Flip. Flip.

Flipping the blueprints quickly, Corgidus said, “Now, do explain them to me. What is this cylinder with one open side, and what’s that large container that leads from there? What on earth is this for?”

“Oh, that’s a mixer.”

“A mixer?”

“Yes, it’s to mix the cement,” Lloyd said as he nodded.

Everyone has seen a truck stirring and moving ready-mix concrete (remicon) in construction sites while going down a road. Specifically, the so-called mix truck with a round, slowly turning barrel attached on its end.

The vehicle was a key component in many constructions as it was used to build anything from small homes to large commercial structures.

“But this object appears familiar in my eyes. Why is that?” Corgidus asked.

“What do you mean that it’s familiar?”

“Isn’t this just an upsized treadwheel?”

“Yes, it is.”

“It is?” asked Corgidus.

“Yes. It will move using the power Ppodong generates as he runs.”

“...”

Corgidus was at a loss for words. Lloyd continued to explain.

“The concept is simple. Ppodong will run the treadwheel, and the power from it will be transferred following the axis, which will turn the body of the mixer.”

“Okay, but what are these spiral-shaped structures inside here?” asked Corgidus.

“Those are meant to continue stirring the cement and maintain its form.”

The mixer turned to prevent cement from hardening and getting mixed with rain and other unwanted particles in the batter. Moreover, it kept the quality of the cement consistent.

“There’s something called the ‘Brazil Nut Effect.’ And its goal is to prevent that,” Lloyd expounded.

“Brazil... Nut? What?” Corgidus asked, cocking his head to the side. It was his first time hearing the concept.

Lloyd grinned and went on, “It’s a real thing. To explain briefly, it refers to the phenomenon where small particles sink to the bottom when big and small particles are randomly mixed together.”

“Hmm. Small particles sink to the bottom, you said?”

“Yes.”

“Well, you have a point there. I have seen it happen quite a lot when I dealt with soot and sand.”

“You did, right?”

The Brazil Nut Effect. It was a phenomenon proven by science. Anyone could check this by throwing thick beans and small rice into a bottle and shaking it up. Otherwise, they could use small Lego blocks and a box. Unlike how most people expected the large particles to sink to the bottom, it was the opposite. They sat on the top.

Well, but there’s a counter effect depending on the conditions.

Anyway, this Brazil Nut Effect was to be watched out for when mixing and depositing cement. The cement had to be kept under watch even after it was mixed. Otherwise, large particles in cement would float up, sinking the smaller ones to the bottom. And when this type of cement was used to construct a building, it brought about a disaster.

Cement cannot harden when its quality is not consistent. Sometime later, the building will crack, break, tumble, and crumble to dust.

Such an event was to be prevented come hell or high water. It was especially so for this construction.

This apartment complex is different from the structure I’d built underwater in Cremo. And it’s also different from the bridge tower I’d constructed back in the capital. Pouring fresh cement as soon as it’s made is an absolute no in this project.

Lloyd recalled the construction projects where he used cement. The artificial ground in Cremo and the basic structure of the bridge tower in the capital were different from this project. The previous structures were gigantic but simple. All Lloyd needed to do was pour cement by loads into the empty frame. That was why he was able to pour and pour the cement as soon as it was made. But now...

The conditions are different.

The apartment complex he would be working from now on had a more complex structure. The floors, walls, ceilings, and stairs inside had to be taken into account separately. The intricate and elaborate structures were weaved one another, so their formworks had to be equally small and elaborate. Lloyd could no longer mindlessly pour cement into a formwork as he did in previous jobs.

If I do that, the cement won't properly cover all the corners. There will be unfilled cracks and bubbles in cement. That would be troubling.

In actual construction sites, the task of depositing concrete fell on the shoulders of the most skilled workers. It was an elaborate and detailed job that required dexterity and skill.

That's why the job takes a long time. But what happens when cement is deposited without a mixer? The whole thing will harden and be divided into components even before one can start depositing. That's why we need the mixer.

The mixer was meant to mix the concrete well and keep it consistent. As such, the equipment was indispensable to the apartment complex construction.

"Oh, and this one is the pump for pouring cement," Lloyd said.

"A pump?"

"Yes."

Lloyd pointed at the other blueprint.

“Connected to the mixer, it will pull up the cement. Since we’ll be building a high-rise building, the pump will suck the cement all the way to the top.”

“Hmm. Did you get the idea from the screw-type pump used in waterwheels?” asked Corgidus.

“Yes. That’s precisely correct. I’m thinking of manufacturing a human-powered pump.”

“Perfect. That doesn’t seem too complicated,” Corgidus complimented.

“So can you make them for us?”

“Ha. Are you doubting my ability?” huffed Corgidus.

“Of course, not. How would I dare to,” Lloyd smiled greasily”

This caused Corgidus to frown.

“Tsk.”

Every conversation he had with this prick was the same. He talked to him, and before he knew it, he was already on board with his plan.

“My goodness. Come to think of it now, you expected me to be here and drew a blueprint in advance. It seems like I’m always the one who’s losing out. You’re so cunning as if a big serpent lives in your still-developing brain.”

“I appreciate the compliment.”

“Cunning and brazen.”

“So, Master Corgidus,” Lloyd said, “how long do you think the manufacturing will take?”

“Tsk. I shall let you know after I make one. Show me our studio first.”

“Of course.” Lloyd then led the way quickly.

Ten more days passed, and indeed, the skills of a royal master were on another level. And besides, the Great Master Corgidus was the one leading the project, and Bangul’s best steel dungs, which Lloyd had regularly made sure to collect, were being used. These three elements compounded to bring about the best possible result. On top of that, the treadwheel was 65 feet in diameter, and the size of the axis and mixer body connected to it was considerable as well. The sheer size of the large structure was something impossible for the blacksmiths here in this fiefdom. But to Corgidus and his team, the job only took ten days. And it operated extremely well.

“Ppodong!”

Vrrr... Ppodong got on the treadwheel after eating the red sunflower seed. The 65-foot treadwheel started to heave.

“Ppodong?”

A large smile appeared on Ppodong’s face. He was running on a treadwheel for the first time in his life. It was more fun than he had expected. Thanks to his enjoyment, Ppodong’s speed gradually increased, and the rotation of the treadwheel grew more violent.

Rattle! Rattle! Rattle!

The 65-foot treadwheel rotated with Ppodong’s power alone. This ferocious rotation power coursed through the axis and to the mixer.

Fwish!

The mixer rotated heavily, and the cement in it danced and fluctuated. At the same time, Lloyd’s hope increased along with it.

Jackpot. It’s working perfectly.

Thanks to the dwarf masters the queen had dispatched, the key construction equipment was finished. Now, it was time to kickstart and construct the apartment complex.

Chapter 125: The Apartment Complex (2)

The apartment complex. It was the most popular form of residency chosen by South Koreans along with the walk-up. But here in the Lorasian continent, it was a new type of structure that was being built for the first time in history, and its construction had officially begun.

“The construction, like always, begins with the foundation.”

Lloyd gazed at the vast plain lot that stretched in front of him. This land was located in the northern part of the barony and stood opposite of the Prona River that hugged the entire fiefdom clockwise. Lloyd had this part of the land in plan when he decided to build the apartment complex.

This place sits distant from the center of the fiefdom, and the land isn’t rich enough to be used as a field.

The land wasn’t used for anything in the first place, so it was the perfect spot for construction which meant that Lloyd didn’t have to compensate for any damage or loss to the land.

“So, let’s dig the land first. Javier?”

“Yes. Did you call me?”

“Of course, I did. Who else is here besides you and me?” huffed Lloyd.

“...”

“Hmm?” Lloyd studied Javier’s face. “What’s wrong? You look like you saw a ghost,” said Lloyd.

“May I be frank?”

“Yeah, go ahead.”

“I don’t want to do it,” Javier said.

“What?”

“I don’t want to do it, I said.”

Javier turned to his side, and his eyes flashed with grouchiness, so spiky and sharp like a porcupine’s quills.

“I know what you will entrust me with. The mana blast presumably. And you’re going to mark the ground with your red-dyed brush, telling me to vertically blast a hole wherever you see appropriate,” Javier said defiantly.

“Yeah, so?”

“And you will pour cement into the dozens of holes I’ll bore.”

“Yeah, so?”

“And you will use the cement chunks as poles that will become the foundation of the building,” Javier drawled.

“Yes, that’s correct. Hey, you’re kind of smart.”

“Thank you... No, that’s not what I’m getting at. I’m saying that I don’t want to do it,” Javier objected.

“Are you saying you don’t want to dig holes into the ground?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“Because I think you only regard me as a convenient tool, and nothing more,” Javier bemoaned, and his voice turned cold. “To remind you, Master Lloyd, of something you seem to be forgetting right now, I am a knight who vowed his allegiance to the lord.”

“Yes, yes. So?”

“And yet, you put me to work as though it is only natural that I do these things. As if my duty is to be mobilized into all sorts of constructions, not protect the fiefdom, which is my actual calling.”

“Yes, yes. But you’re going to do it anyway, aren’t you?”

“...”

“Of course, I get that you hate doing it, but you will do it, right? After all, this is for the development of the fiefdom,” Lloyd said.

“Even still, I wanted to voice my thoughts out.”

“Aha. My little Javier, you wanted to throw a tantrum in front of your big brother, didn’t you?”

“...”

“But do you think I give two hoots about it?” joked Lloyd as he sneered.

“...”

“Now, let’s get to work. Work, I say.”

Lloyd chuckled as he held up a jar, which contained red dye he would be using to mark the ground. Lloyd stabbed the land with the brush, and he went on to explain to Javier.

“Here. And here. And here. 39 feet deep. And as for the diameter, set it to 20 inches. As you can see, the distance is 9.8 feet.”

“Is that my task?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, can you finish it before lunchtime?”

“To do so, I will have to overwork my body.”

“And that is why it’s a job,” said Lloyd.

“Excuse me?” Javier grumbled at the prospect of the hard work given to him. Lloyd gazed at him pitifully.

“You asked just now whether this was your task,” Lloyd said.

“Yes, I did.”

“Don’t you know what it stands for?”

“I do not know.”

“Fine, then I’ll tell you. It’s been a while since I told someone about this. Can you spell the letter one by one, please?” asked Lloyd.

“What are you-”

“Come on.”

“J...”

“Just.”

“O...”

“Overwork till death.”

“B...”

“But never complain. Look at your face. You didn’t know? It’s just the way of this world.”

“...”

Javier scowled in annoyance while Lloyd smiled in satisfaction.

“Good luck to you. I’m off to prepare the cement.”

Whoosh. Javier was given no time to fight back. Lloyd simply left after finishing what he had to say.

“...”

Wow. Young master, I wish to send you on a one-way trip to the underworld.

“Tsk.” Jaiver then resigned to get to work and plucked his sword. And there, the great construction of the apartment complex took place.

Time sped by like lightning. The construction progressed smoothly during this period. The monumental apartment complex, building 101, boasted a basic foundation that was 492 feet in width and length and 22,500 square meters in area. But of course, the building wasn’t set to take up the whole land. It was shaped like a square. Thanks to it, the basic foundation took place surrounding the plaza.

Kaboom! Crash!

The diameter was 1.6 feet, and the depth was 39 feet. Each hole stood about 3 yards apart. Once each hole was bored, Lloyd poured freshly produced cement. More than 3,000 cement pillars were erected in the ground about 10,000 square meters in mass. The next part of the project was the groundwork. On top of the 3,000 pillars, a formwork as high as about 2 feet was erected.

“But, of course, there’s more to it than just pouring cement. The important part starts from here on out.”

Around the time the formwork was completed, Lloyd gathered 120 orc miners.

“So everyone,” Lloyd said, “today, we’ll be playing the steel bar folding game to our amusement.”

“Oink?! Folding steel bars, oink?”

“Yes, that’s right. Here, do you see this?”

“Yes, I do, oink.”

Lloyd held up the steel bar made by Bangul. The orc miner representative Arosh cocked his head to the side.

Folding that is a game? Oink?

Arosh wondered what the point of it was. Where's the fun in that? He asked himself. Meanwhile, Lloyd went on to demonstrate.

"Like this. This way, ugh. Like this! Whew, you play by folding it up like this."

Creak! Crack! Creak!

Lloyd rotated his mana circle to the full and transferred the amplified mana power into his grip. The steel bar, which was as thick as his fingers, bent by 90 degrees. Another was bent again in his fingers. Then, they were tied together. By doing so, Lloyd demonstrated the basic steel bar-tying method in front of everyone.

"What now? Did you get a good look?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes, I did! But I have a question, oink!"

"Arosh? Yes, tell me. What is it that you want to know?"

"What's the benefit of folding up the bars, oink?"

"Aha."

A sly smile formed on Lloyd's face that was marked with satisfaction, and he gave a clear answer.

"It's great for muscle development."

"M-muscles, oink?"

"Yeah. It's super good for your grip power, wrist, and forearm. The best. It's really the best," Lloyd assured.

“F-forearm, oink!”

“Yes, yes. The forearms and arms. This game will make your arms bulge with rugged muscles, even more so than now. And make worm-like veins appear from your wrist to elbow just from pinching your finger… It’s amazing. How do you like that?”

“V-veins, oink!!”

“Thrilling, isn’t it? The harder you play, the veinier you will become.”

“Is it true? Even more than doing a wrist curl? Is it more effective than wrist curls, oink?”

“Oh, please, wrist curl is just a warm-up exercise compared to this.”

“G-great! We will learn! Now! Folding game, oink!!”

“Oiiink!!!”

120 orc miners breathed heavily through their noses in sheer excitement. Just like that, Lloyd procured primitive steel workers who didn’t need any tools. Their training was simple. The orcs didn’t need much training since they were strong. Just giving a couple of tips was enough for them to be familiarized with the process. This whole thing was possible because of a natural tool that moved lighter than most professional tools: their fingers.

The steel bars were assembled at supersonic speed to cover the foundation and the first floor. At the same time, the formwork gradually expanded in size without an inch amiss in accordance with Lloyd’s design. And the cement depositing took place.

“Ppodong! Turn it!”

“Ppodong!”

Fwoosh! The 65-foot treadwheel rotated in a frenzy, and the colossal mixer connected to the wheel turned accordingly. The various materials loaded there mixed in a flash, but it wasn’t done in a random manner. Even the proportion of the mix followed Lloyd’s meticulous calculations.

Several factors were taken into account. These included the specified compressive strength, the target strength, the slump and AE air amount, as well as the proportion of the water and bonding materials, and of the fine aggregate and compression strength. These elements were mixed in perfect ratio, and the batter was mixed using Ppodong’s strength. Afterward, it was pulled up through the screw-type manual pump manufactured by the master dwarf.

“One, two. Press!”

“Argh!!!”

Clack! Clack! Clack!

It took 20 White Cavalry lancers to grab the pump knob. All drenched in sweat, they pressed, pulled, and pressed the knob again, allowing the pump to turn with force and suck the cement from the mixer. The cement then flowed out through the elongated leather hose. Its end was grabbed by Lloyd, who personally oversaw the construction site.

“Continue! Keep the momentum!” Lloyd yelled.

Splash! Splash!

A line of cement came out of the nose as they pumped, perfectly filling up the complex and intricate formwork. Meanwhile, Lloyd activated the optional survey skill Subterranean Scanning and observed the formwork in real-time.

Okay. It’s filling up nicely.

Lloyd saw that the cement was nicely filling up into all the empty crevices. Air bubbles were prone to appear in the corners of the formwork and steel bar links when the depositing job took place in a hurry. But thankfully, the cement was filling up without missing a single spot.

The cement mix is a success.

It wasn't too thick or watery. It couldn't be any better than this. The pump functioned, much to Lloyd's satisfaction. To his relief, the first depositing job ended in a brilliant success.

"Great. Now, it needs to be cured for three days," Lloyd said.

"By curing, you mean to let it dry and harden, right?"

"Wow! My Javier, how far you have come!"

"Like I had any other choice... It was because of you, Master Lloyd... Anyway..."

Javier, whose cheeks were smudged with dirt, opened his eyes wide.

"Can we rest for three days while this one is cured?" asked Javier.

"No."

"..."

"Rest? For what? We have other work to do."

"But you said that we have three days until it cures-"

"But we can construct the foundation of Building 102 while that cures, don't you think?" Lloyd said matter-of-factly.

"..."

"Come on," Lloyd said, "You weren't planning to goof around, were you? Are you serious?"

"That is-"

"Can't you hear the devastated cries of the refugees living in those makeshift tents?"

“...”

“Haa... You let me down. I wanted to construct this apartment as soon as possible even if it meant working overnight. That way, we can relieve the refugees’ pain sooner.”

“...”

“Haa... This is unfortunate. I wanted to provide them with a home soon even if it meant skipping dinner. That way, we can see happy smiles appear on their faces.”

“...”

Ugh, this young master is just...

Javier gave in at last.

“Ha... I see. So blast the ground just like I did before?” Javier asked in resignation.

“Yeah, shall we head there right now?”

“Yes...”

Javier, now resigned once more, had to draw his sword one more time. The great apartment construction continued once again.

A similar construction continued from that point on.

“Steel bars! We fold, oink!”

“Steel bars! We bent, oink!”

“Lunch box! We eat, oink!”

“It sure looks tasty, oink!”

The orcs bent the metal bars and tied them together with vivacity. The carpenter, on the other hand, built up the formworks. The entire process was similar to the one for the first floor, and it was like they were pressing Ctrl+c/Ctrl+v.

That's the good thing about constructing apartments!

Every story held the same structure as the others. So, it wasn't an overstatement to say that the process was just simply copying and pasting the same thing again and again. Things became much easier and faster after the first floor. The process could just be repeated from there.

And naturally, the workers learn the ropes and get better by many folds.

Thanks to the repeated course of action, their efficiency multiplied with each passing day. When they deposited the cement for the second floor of Building 101 and cured it, they proceeded to work on Building 102. When the cement for the first floor of Building 102 was being cured, they worked to build the formwork and steel bars of the third floor of Building 101. The whole process was smooth and perfect, reminding Lloyd of the rotation of the perfectly fit cogwheels. The fiefdom was struck with good luck in the process. The supplies the queen had sent arrived at last.

"According to Her Majesty, the supply will arrive once every month for the time being."

It was the words of the officer that brought them here. Thankfully, the food situation for the refugees was now better. Meanwhile, the floors of Building 101 and 102 gradually increased. Now, Lloyd summoned another assistant he had in mind.

"Okay, now, Bibeong! Lift it up!"

"Bibeong!"

A special mercenary was hired: Bibeong, the conqueror of Lake Kapua. Biebong's massive body and power allowed various materials to be transferred from the ground to the highest floor. In other words, he acted as a tower crane, which was commonly used in modern construction sites. Bibeong helped the construction to add more momentum. Cement was poured on the fifth floor. Steel bars and formwork were finished for the sixth floor. Pour, plan, pour, tap, and refine. One month later, Building 101 became an eight-story building.

“But don’t think it’s over yet!” Lloyd shouted. “Tell me! What’s the most important part of construction?!”

“The finish and detail!”

The engineering corp answered in unison when Lloyd shouted a question. And just like that, as the snow started to fall in the Frontera fiefdom, the outlines of the monumental and lucrative apartment complex that would drastically advance the fiefdom started to take shape.

Chapter 126: How to Acquire Insulation (1)

Thwack! Tap!

The first snow of the year was falling, and the cold wind blew. But the snowfall and gust weren't enough to dampen and freeze the passion of the workers in the construction field.

"Woah! It's snowing!"

"Eh? It's really snowing!"

"Wahaha! Looks like this is our lucky day!"

As the soft hail started to fall to announce the first snowfall, a cheer erupted among the engineers. The reason was simple.

"Compensation for inclement weather!"

These engineers belonged to the fiefdom, so they were the soldiers hired by the lord. Therefore, even if they participated in the construction, the only additional payment they could receive from the lord was some occasional bonuses and nothing more. However, there were some exceptions. It was when the construction took place after dusk late at night or during inclement weather. On top of that, when the job involved some form of risk, they received a thick wad of bonuses. Such a type of compensation system was put up by Lloyd, who meticulously supervised the construction site.

Master Lloyd is somewhat, no, shamelessly a cheapskate. He despises losing even a single coin. But what really amazes me is how thoroughly he takes care of his workers.

Everyone was weirded out by this. On a normal day, Lloyd was the worst miser. A loss of coin or peanuts was enough to prompt him to kick his blanket at night in frustration. Being such a terrible pinchpenny, everyone wanted to know whether it was a trait ingrained in the young master's genes. Upon hearing this quality of his, an outsider may think that Lloyd was the worst boss to work for. That, too, was the concern for the engineers at first. But it turned out, he was different. It was the opposite.

He took great care of us.

When it came to special bonuses, Lloyd was meticulous about giving the proper amount. There was never a delay of payment as well. He met the payment deadline on the dot. Lloyd even gave the workers holidays. One rest day every week. And he emphasized that the construction site should be kept organized and tidy as messy construction sites were prone to safety accidents. And so, the engineers came to have firm trust that Master Lloyd never considered them as replaceable goods and that he sincerely cherished them. The same was today.

“Hey, you! Make sure you mark the time the snow fell!” shouted Lloyd”

“Why?” said the youngest engineer in the corp.

“Are you serious? Because the rule is to work for an hour and take 20 minutes of rest by the fire during snowy days,” said Lloyd”

“Oh, do you mean the rule Master Lloyd has set here on the construction site?”

Thwack! Thud!

The engineers got to work with more zeal, waiting for the promised inclement-weather bonus and rest.

“By the way, I have a question I want to ask,” said the same young boy.

“Hmm? What is it?” answered one of the commanders beside him.

“It’s about this central heating room we are constructing.”

“Uh-huh.”

“Why are we constructing today?”

“What? What are you saying?”

“I had heard that the refugees can only live in the apartment complex next fall. That means that there is still a lot of time left... So why hurry the job when it’s snowing?” asked the boy.

“My, my. Are you saying that Master Lloyd may be wasting his money by unnecessarily putting us to work during severe weather conditions?” answered his senior.

“Yes. Master Lloyd may be taking good care of us but he never is wasteful. So I can’t understand even a little why he is pushing ahead with the job today.”

“Tsk. How could you be so narrow-minded?”

“Excuse me...?”

The commander clucked his tongue.

“What are we constructing today?”

“I heard we are building a heating facility,” answered the young soldier as he gulped.

“And what season are we in now?”

“Winter.”

“Then,” said the commander, “should we not hurry to finish constructing the facility before winter has passed?”

“But, they will be coming in next fall-”

“Exactly. That’s why we need to finish up the heating facility and test it out,” enlightened the commander.

“Oh...” he gasped.

“So before they come live here next autumn, we should make sure that the heating facility is running smoothly to heat up indoors in the next winter. We need to check those things. Okay?”

“Th-that’s why...”

“Indeed. That’s why. Don’t forget that Master Lloyd is a meticulous man. So, let’s get to work now.”

“Yes!”

The inclement weather bonus was set to be paid, and the engineers were able to work hard in anticipation of the pay. Thanks to that, the heating facility was built in a smooth manner without any interruptions. First, the central heating room for Building 101 was built in a corner of the plaza. Then, a steam kiln specially made by the dwarf master was installed, and bamboo pipes were added to transfer the steam from the kiln. Next, the exterior of the pipes was wrapped with an insulator made of wheat straw, chaff, and lime. Afterward, those numerous pipes were intricately connected to each household like a spiderweb before they were connected to a steam grill that was likened to a modern radiator.

Of course, that won’t be as effective as ondols in heating up the floor.

Even if that was the case, however, the structure of the apartment complex promised less heat loss than residential houses. That is, the building required less heating. What was more, each unit was much smaller than the average house.

It’s small because there is no kitchen or dining room.

The bathroom and toilets and whatnot were designed to be installed in a communal facility. So each household only held a small living room and bedroom. It was Lloyd’s desperate measure to accommodate as many refugees as possible and minimize the burden of heating.

But still... I must make sure that the heating works properly.

This central steam-type heating for each building was something Lloyd was trying out for the first time. When he ran a simulation using his optional skill, there weren't any serious malfunctions. Even so, Lloyd didn't put his guard down as the construction took place. He checked the facility every day without fail, personally overseeing the insulation construction indoors. The walls and floors were thoroughly plastered with insulation mixed with wheat straw, chaff, and lime. Once they dried up enough, they were finished with thin wooden planks. And at last, the construction of the heating system for Building 101 was completed toward the end of the year. Lloyd immediately went on to test the function right away.

Please! Heat up!

Fwish!

The steam kiln for Building 101 was warmed by the heat of the coals. Boiled water and hot steam flowed through the pipes.

Great. It's working well so far.

To Lloyd's relief, the steam wasn't leaking from the pipes. He walked following the pipes and entered the first floor. He touched the radiator of each household.

"It's hot!"

Lloyd almost burned his hand. A smile escaped from him.

Good. Now to the second floor.

After looking around the entire units on the first floor, Lloyd checked the second floor. It was equally hot. But as he went up, things became different.

Hmm...? It's a bit...

The look on Lloyd's face slightly hardened as he inspected the fourth floor.

Though it’s very minimal, it’s getting colder as I go up.

The first floor was scorching hot. The second floor was hot. The third floor was warm. But now on the fourth floor...

It’s slightly lukewarm. I’m sure of it.

Nervousness gripped Lloyd at that moment. And when he came up to the fifth floor, it was more lukewarm than the fourth floor. The sixth and seventh floors were chilly. And when he got to the eighth floor, it was cold.

Woah. Is this for real? This is bad.

As a pang of disappointment continued to grip him, Lloyd analyzed the reason. It was actually simple.

The actual insulation of the pipes is doing more poorly than my simulation. That’s why the heat is lost when the steam flows through the pipes.

The proof was the hot lower floors, which were closer to the heating room. And it got colder the farther he climbed.

“It’s because of the long pipes. Even though I separated the pipes for each household to prevent heat loss, the distance from the upper floors to the heating room is just too far. The insulation isn’t enough. That’s the main reason.”

Tap. Tap. Lloyd concluded as he tapped the pipes of the eighth floor that had gone cold.

“Is there a way we can shorten the pipes?” asked Javier as he furrowed his brow.

“Of course, we can.” Lloyd chuckled. “The solution is actually simple. Just put a heating room for every floor.”

“But why can’t we do that?”

“The reason is just as simple. It’s dangerous.”

“Dangerous? Why?”

“Fire.”

There was finality in Lloyd’s voice.

“Hundreds of refugees,” went on Lloyd, “will be living here in Building 101. And if a fire breaks out in one of the heating rooms that I install on every floor, a catastrophe too terrible to put into words will occur.”

“There will be a great number of casualties...”

“Yes, exactly,” agreed Lloyd. “I built this building to house as many people as possible. The priority wasn’t comfort. And the design followed that direction. The interior is entirely made of wood. So if a fire breaks out, at least half of them will be scorched to death, unable to flee.”

Lloyd wasn’t joking. He was dead serious about it. One fire, and it was sure to spell a massive disaster. At least hundreds of casualties would be seen. Lloyd could ascertain so because he had designed the building himself.

There aren’t any modern-type escape facilities or fire extinguishing facilities here.

This world didn’t have fire extinguishers. No ventilators to send the smoke outside. No helicopter to rescue people who fled to the roof.

“If there’s one, Hamang is our best asset as he can spit a large amount of water at once. But what if Hamang isn’t there? What if he’s vacant? Then there is no other solution. If we’re unlucky, a catastrophe no one can deal with may break out. Besides, even if he’s here, he won’t be able to kill the fire in one gush. And that was the reason why I designed the heating room and cooking area to be placed outside,” explained Lloyd.

“Was it the reason why you wanted to replace the interior lights with light bugs as well?”

“Yeah, obviously. They are common in the eastern range and safe.”

“For safety reasons, I see. Hmm, to wrap up, we should keep the heating facility in the courtyard but improve the insulation of the pipes.”

“That’s exactly right. Javier, man, you’ve gotten smarter these days.”

“Smarter? I doubt it.”

“You do?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“After all, I was already smart in the first place.”

Lloyd didn’t say anything. He simply stared at Javier with a dumbfounded look on his face.

“Ehem,” coughed Javier, “I was being serious.”

“Normally, people say that they were joking.”

“What is the need for it? I am telling the truth.”

“Look at you. You’re just shamelessly saying it’s the truth now.”

“I am a knight, after all,” said Javier.

“What does that have anything to do with that?”

“I learned that knights are always to speak the truth. For example, Javier Asrahan is smart. Javier Asrahan is handsome. Javier Asrahan possesses a noble character. And so on.”

Lloyd was speechless.

“There are other truths besides those. For example, Lloyd Frontera is single. And so, he is jealous of Javier Asrahan’s competence, handsomeness, and character out of his stingy, narrow-minded, and small-hearted qualities. And these are some of the uncomfortable truths.”

“Hey,” Lloyd called.

“Yes?”

“Having fun?”

“I am for the first time in a while.”

“Tsk.”

“Anyway,” Javier said as he changed the subject. “How can we improve the insulation of the pipes?”

“I don’t know. That’s a pickle for me as well.”

Lloyd scratched the back of his neck for this was really a concern.

“Actually, the batter made out of the wheat straw, chaff, and lime was the best insulator I had in mind.”

It was true. The wheat straw, chaff, and lime were the easiest materials to acquire around here in large volumes. This meant that they were low in price as well. The cost was a very important factor to take into account.

Duh. I need to insulate the whole building in the future as well. So if the materials are hard to come by and expensive, it just doesn’t cut it.

But other than the soaring material cost, what equally mattered was their availability. A low supply could affect the construction schedule. And that was why Lloyd decided to go for the wheat straw, chaff, and lime as the main materials. They were cheap and common. He ran countless experiments to come up with the best combination that ensured great performance.

And yet, the insulation isn’t enough.

Lloyd started to deliberate what more he must do with the insulation to keep the heat in the pipes.

The pipes were designed to be as little exposed as possible. There is nothing more to do with the design. This means that I must look further into the material.

He needed materials that provided better insulation than the initial formula but was cheap and easily available. Lloyd put on his thinking cap to figure out if there is any material that satisfies these conditions. His deliberation lasted for three straight days. For a second, it crossed his mind to use CP for the Ending Spoiler to find the answer to the solution. But he shook his head.

No. I should save it for when I'm more desperate or when I really can't find a solution.

CP was way harder to save than RP which was based on likeability. As such, it was wasteful to spend the point just because he met a small hurdle. Two more days were spent pondering the problem. Lloyd rummaged through his memories and records during those days.

At a time like this, this method may help.

Lloyd brought out a bundle of papers from his bedroom drawer. These were the notes that he consistently recorded from the moment he came to this world. They were related to the novel, The Knight of Blood and Iron.

For people's memories aren't perfect.

Lloyd knew that he wasn't perfect as well. He wasn't a genius. That was why he recorded the notes with fervor. The plot, major characters, accidents, setting, and other small facts of the novel were jotted down in detail every time he remembered them.

I think I read about a setting that can help my situation right now... What was it...? Eh? Hold on.

After a long time of rifling through his records, Lloyd's gaze stopped at one note.

Found it. This is it.

The records he finally found had the following writings: "Elves' woods," "Javier's love," and "Warm dragon breath."

Chapter 127: How to Acquire Insulation (2)

There were people everywhere. And every one of them was ragged.

“...”

The sun was setting earlier than usual now, and Javier threw his gaze down below the hill. The plain lot that used to be empty and bare was now jam-packed with people. Countless tenets stood close to one another, and people moved through the tents. They were the refugees that recently arrived at the Frontera fiefdom.

“Sir Asrahan, the food rations are ready.”

“...”

Javier turned and found a high-rank guard officer. He faintly nodded his head.

“Let us begin before the sun sets.”

“Yes, sir.”

Javier went down the hill with the soldier, dozens of large pots hanging here and there. The scent of food wafted out from there, and refugees queued up in a long line. Their eyes reflected their hunger and desperation.

“Start the distribution.”

“Yes, sir.”

The food trays were filled in order, and the long line started to shorten. One after another, every refuge was asked a question by Javier.

“Are you sick or feeling discomfort of any sort?” asked Javier.

Most of them said they were fine. At times, some said they were sick, and Javier ran a thorough check on their state, recording their name, symptom, and makeshift tent number.

“I see. A physician will be here later tonight to check up on you. Until then, make sure to eat and rest,” advised Javier.

“My... Thank you... You are an honored knight, and yet you take care of this old lady...”

“Not at all. I am just doing what is right.”

Javier counted the number of patients and oversaw the distribution, spending many sleepless hours at night.

“But, sir, are you not going to eat?” asked one of the soldiers.

“Later.”

There was the tidying-up left after the distribution. The soldiers said that they could take it from here, but Javier remained and worked with them. It was because Javier considered it his job as he was the supervisor. But when he was distributing dinner, something took place.

“...”

Among the refuge tents that lined up in strings, Javier spotted a kid wandering around. He appeared to be seven or eight. But something was off about his gait and movement. With a food tray in his hand, the boy peeked into the tents and glanced around without rest. He walked quickly around the area as if he was lost.

Did he forget the way to his tent?

It appeared so since there were dozens of large tents around. Minus the number marked on the tent door, every single one of them looked the same. Even an adult would be confused by it.

“Kid.”

Javier walked over to the kid and called him. The flustered boy looked up. Javier strove to put on a warm smile on his face.

“Are you lost?”

“...”

The boy nodded, his eyes all wet. Javier carefully stroked the boy’s head.

“I think I can help you with that. Why don’t you let me help find your tent?” suggested Javier.

“...”

The boy nodded again.

“But why didn’t you eat the food? It’s going to get cold. Are you not hungry?”

“I am... hungry,” the boy finally said.

But what he said next caught Javier by surprise.

“But I won’t eat it,” said the boy.

“Why not?”

“My mother is hungrier.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes.”

“...”

Javier wondered why this kid came out to take the food when he had a mother. There must be a reason, he thought to himself. He held out his hand.

“I will hold the tray for you.”

“...”

“I won’t spill it. I promise.”

“Okay...”

Javier took the tray and wrapped the boy with his other hand. And then he called some of the soldiers cleaning the place and the representatives among the refugees. After some searching and asking, Javier finally managed to find the boy’s tent and discovered why he came out to collect the food ration all alone.

“Allen?”

When Javier stepped in, he heard a woman’s voice. Her voice rang clear and aloud among the many refugees in the tent. The same thing was the case for this boy, whose name seemed to be Allen.

“Mom!”

The boy sprinted into his mother’s embrace. But something about her gaze was off.

Her eyes aren’t focused. She can’t see.

She was visually impaired. But it appeared that she was not used to the discomfort she was experiencing. All of her body gestures and movements looked awkward. And Javier noticed why instantly.

She wasn’t born like this. She recently lost her vision.

Javier’s face turned wistful. He postulated that the monsters took her vision but managed to get here after exerting every bit of strength in saving her child. And now, the boy was the one taking care of his mother by receiving the food for her. Taking care of his mother was more important than filling up his stomach. Javier felt his throat getting hot, and he got on one knee and carefully put the food tray down. The food was cold.

“Here.”

Javier’s voice and presence made the mother flinch, so he said, “Do not be afraid. I am Javier Asrahan, currently supervising the guards. I came here with the boy as he was lost.”

“I-is that really true?”

“Yes. And I brought your dinner with the boy,” assured Javier.

“How can I repay you for your kindness...”

“Please do not mention it. I will help you. Here, slowly.”

Javier lifted the spoon. But was it out of compassion? Perhaps so. Or maybe it was the blouse that was smudged with porridge. Or maybe, it was because he was suddenly reminded of his childhood.

“Now, open your mouth please,” cooed Javier.

“How can I dare...”

“It is fine. There is plenty of food. Even for the child.”

“Oh...”

His assurance that there was enough food for the child brought relief to her face. Javier slowly began to feed her. The first spoon full of food. The second spoon full of nostalgia. Once he was done, Javier spoke to the child.

“Kid. Do you see the mark at the entrance?” asked Javier.

“Yes, I see it.”

“This is A-3.”

“A-3...”

“Remember that, and you can come into that tent starting tomorrow. Do you think you can do it?”

“Yes! I can.”

“Good boy.”

As Javier stroked the child’s head, he wished that Master Lloyd would come up with something to solve the insulation issue since this was as far as he could help the people out. If Master Lloyd succeeded, this mother and child and so many others could live more comfortably. And perhaps because of that sentimentality, that night, Javier committed the mistake of nodding his head when Lloyd, who finally found the solution, asked for his help.

“So, you are telling me that you will go into the Everglow Woods where the elves live and acquire the sap of the Elensia Tree?”

“Yeah,” answered Lloyd.

“But that is just outrageous...”

Javier shook his head. He threw a determined gaze at Lloyd, who came to the former’s room to sing a lullaby.

“I can’t help you with that,” defied Javier.

“Wow. Why?”

“What do you mean why? Simply because it is impossible.”

“But you just nodded that you will help me out a second ago,” objected Lloyd.

“You did not mention then that you are planning to go to the Everglow Woods.”

“Aha. You said you’d help out when you thought it was easy, but now that it’s not, you’re taking back what you said and backing out?”

“That is not what I mean-”

“Cut the crap. You know I’m right,” said Lloyd.

“...”

“Since when did you like to break your promise?”

“...”

“Why? Am I wrong?”

“...”

Javier pressed his lips together, saying not a word. He knew that Master Lloyd was right.

“But, Master Lloyd…”

“Yeah, go defend yourself.”

“What you’re trying is impossible.”

“What? Extracting Elensia sap from wood?”

“Yes.”

“Do you really think that way?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“Elves cannot be negotiated with in the first place. You will only waste your time and efforts since it is the same as reaching for the stars. I think it would be more constructive to focus on taking care of the refugees and looking for other solutions.”

It was the truth. For at least 500 years, not a single human engaged with the elves. It was a fact that was commonly believed throughout the Lorasian Continent.

“They are stubborn and refuse to engage with humans. There was only one place that said it was possible. Fairy tales. That is, children’s fairy tales.”

“...”

“In the case that someone believes its possibility, I would think that the man has a mental age of about six years old,” said Javier.

“Six-years-old? Where’s your proof?”

“Me. I believed that I could befriend an elf until I was six years old.”

“Hmm... So what you are doing is skillfully reaming me out for being immature?” asked Lloyd.

“No.”

“Then what?”

“I am not pulling back any punches.”

“Dang. You aren’t even trying to sugarcoat it.”

“Because it is the truth.”

“But look at you. And where did you learn that expression from just now?”

“You. Since you used it several times, I came to get a grasp of its meaning.”

“Tsk... But too bad though. It looks like you’ve got it wrong this time.”

“Wrong? What do you mean?”

“What do you mean, my ass. I’m saying there is a way to acquire Elensia sap from the woods of the elves.”

“...”

“What. What. What. Why are you narrowing your eyes and glaring at me like that?”

“It’s nothing. I was just thinking if I should pay a visit to the lord tomorrow morning,” Javier said sternly.

“Why not?”

“To discuss with him whether we should put you in therapy or send you to the capital for recuperation.”

“...”

Lloyd clicked his tongue because it seemed that Javier was hell-bent on distrusting him. But Lloyd knew why Javier was acting that way.

The comment about putting me in therapy was harsh, but that’s understandable.

It really was understandable because the elves in the Everglow Woods had zero contact or engagement with humans. So it went without saying that they never ever conversed with the latter. And if anybody dared to step foot in the woods, the intruder was instantly put to death. Therefore, the suggestion to strike a deal with the elves in Lorasia was as foolish as tap dancing naked in the middle of the savannah in Africa.

After all, no one succeeded in talking with the elves for the past hundreds of years. No mighty lord, king, emperor, or swordsman.

Everyone had failed. The power of the sword master was useless. Sword masters were slowly moving creatures in the face of the elves who seemed to be able to transport through the air.

But the first one to shatter that absolute notion was Javier.

The pioneer of the Everglow Woods. Javier Asrahan. Although he said that sitting at the negotiating table with the elves was reaching for the stars, in the novel, he later shared friendship with the elves in the Everglow Woods. After more adventures, he and one of the elves start to develop feelings for each other.

Thinking about that part is making me hate him.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. As Lloyd recalled the story of the book, he glanced daggers at Javier.

Come to think of it, that really is the case. The man in the novel had a fling in every place he went. Goodness, what is he? An actual heart-stopper?

But the really funny thing was that Javier always blocked the women coming on to him with a wall as high as Arctic sea ice. And when Lloyd thought that far, his hatred increased.

“That’s why you’re no good, man,” Lloyd said suddenly.

“I am no good...? What do you mean?”

“You’re an enemy to the army of single men... I mean, come on. Use your imagination.”

“My imagination?”

“Yeah,” answered Lloyd.

Lloyd pushed back his trivial thoughts and focused on the Everglow Woods, which was the main topic of the conversation.

“The elves in the woods are not a problem. The Elensia sap can be attained. I mean it.”

If things went according to his plan, and if he could really get his hands on the Elensia sap, the pipes could be perfectly insulated. Lloyd was confident about this because the Elensia Tree’s sap, according to the novel, boasted an incredible ability to store heat.

Of course. Javier made his armor and helmet using the sap. And he fought against the dragon in it.

Even though the fire dragon breathed hellish fire out of its mouth, it failed to melt the armor made out of the Elensia sap as 99% of the heat was blocked from entering his body.

Javier was hit with the dragon's breath three times in a row. But what he said to himself afterward really is comical. What did he say? Oh, how warm?

Javier even felt sleepy because the dragon breath reminded him of a warm blanket near the fire in winter. Just like that, Javier was completely safe from the fire dragon, and after three straight days of battle, he succeeded in slicing its horn. This story of a great expedition took a page in the novel.

"So we just have to go and get the tree sap from the woods. If we can get our hands on that and smear it around the insulation pipes, the heat can be transferred to every floor of the complex without losing any. I'm sure of it."

And the remaining tree sap can be stashed to be used for a greater profit later on. Lloyd stared at Javier confidently with that scheme in mind. The same gaze was returned from Javier toward Lloyd.

"..."

"..."

After a lengthy exchange of gazes, Javier spoke first.

"Are you serious about that?"

"Yeah," answered Lloyd.

"This isn't a childish antic, whatsoever?"

"Of course not," assured Lloyd.

“Okay. Then if we are really making for the Everglow Woods, how do you plan on persuading the elves and striking a deal with them to hand over the Elensia sap?” demanded Javier.

“I will talk if you promise me your cooperation.”

“Why do you need my promise for that?”

“Well, I have a secret I don’t want to share with anybody. So? Are you in or not?”

“...”

“Well, if you’re not up for it, then leave it. I’ll go there all by myself. But do know that acquiring the sap will be delayed just as much. People won’t be able to enter the apartment complex next year. Oh, how sad. If only cynical Sir Javier gave his helping hand. Then, the refugees’ lives would be much easier this coming year.”

“...”

“Once the apartment complex is finished, they will be able to cozily spend the first snow day of next year. Kids will be making snowmen and merrily have snow fights and ride sleighs. But that won’t be happening in real life. Just in their poor heads. Why? Because heartless Sir Asrahan is denying cooperation.”

“...”

“So one of the boys will take the full gust of biting wind and murmur to himself, ‘Oh, oh, Patrasche...’ and hang his head. Not just him. There will be a poor girl who begs the others to buy matches in tears until despair sweeps over her. She would close her eyes in the harsh winter with nothing but only a single ember of a match. What’s the reason for that tragedy? Simple. Because heartless Sir Asrahan is denying cooperation.”

“...”

“Oh, oh, but despite a host of tragedies, heartless and and cold-hearted Sir Asrahan is-”

“I’m going,” interrupted Javier. “I will go with you,” said Javier as he gritted his teeth.

To this, Lloyd’s eyes glimmered and grew alive.

“You will?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“With me?”

“Yes...”

“To the Evertglow Woods?”

“Haa. Yes, I will.”

Javier opened and closed his fist, thinking about punching him in the face. The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled up in satisfaction.

“You should have said yes earlier,” said Lloyd.

“Then tell me.”

“What? How to extract sap from wood?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

Javier was curious. He wondered what breathtaking and innovative method Master Lloyd came up with that he would brim with so much confidence in getting the Elensia Tree sap from the insolent and stubborn elves. Javier waited in anticipation. At the same time, he resolved to himself that he would try his best for the struggling people like the kid and his blind mother he had seen a while ago. As long as it didn’t involve defiling his honor as a knight by stealing or anything similar, he was ready to listen. The moment Javier made his resolution, the corners of Lloyd’s lips curved strangely.

“Simple,” Lloyd said at last, recalling the story of the novel. “We’re going to steal it.”

Chapter 128: The Negotiation Table Is Now Open (1)

The Everglow Woods. Everything there glowed and was preserved warmly. It was a mysterious wood where spring lasted all year long. But it hadn't always been special. Originally, the woods was like any other forest in the eastern range until elves settled there 300 years ago. They were the descendants of elves that once served dragons. They were sickened by the human world and decided to lay low, casting a special spell on the woods and creating a paradise of their own.

"And it's not cold throughout the entire year nor is there sweltering heat. It's a place where perfect spring exists forever."

Now, Lloyd and Javier were at the foot of the woods. A scoff escaped Lloyd as he gazed at the marvelous sight.

Wow. It's so real that I'm here.

The place was so vivid that it was poles apart from what was described in the novel. There was a vast difference between his imagination and the actual place.

It's not just any spring. It's the best kind of spring. The biting winter wind just outside this place is gone, and flowers I can't name blossom here and there. With the butterflies and bees, everything that's unique to spring is here-

"Ah-choo!"

Javier sneezed after inhaling pollen.

"Hey, shh," Lloyd whispered as he flinched.

"I am sorry. I, I..."

"Cover your nose and mouth at once."

Javier barely managed to cover his mouth and nose before another sneeze came out. Though it was muffled, it nonetheless invited a glare from Lloyd.

“You... You do know where we are right now, don’t you?”

“Yes, I do,” answered Javier sheepishly.

“Then, why are you sneezing so much? Do you want to see the female elves or something?”

“Um, I had no choice. It just came out all of a sudden.”

“Wait, you’re not allergic to pollen, are you?”

“Of course, no- Eh... Argh...”

“Eh?”

“Eh... Whew... I-I am fine.”

“...”

No, you don’t look fine…

“Like I would believe that,” Lloyd said as he grew doubtful. “You’re allergic to pollen. This is bad. Do you see this place? Pollen is flying around everywhere.”

The environment was that bad. This whole place was worse than the fine dust situation in South Korea. It was as though someone was slapping chalkboard erasers right in front of the two or the pollen was heavily snowing down from the sky. The thick pollen could be accredited to the perpetual state of spring here. And if Javier turned out to suffer from a pollen allergy, that changed things for the worse.

“But you are a sword master. Can’t you control the sneezing?” said Lloyd.

“I cannot.”

“Why not?”

“Because it’s a natural occurrence.”

“Hold on. Does that mean it’s impossible to infinitely hold your pee even if you are a sword master?”

“Yes,” said Javier”

“Hmm... Sword masters really aren’t that much, eh?”

“...”

“Anyway, this won’t do. Here. Cover yourself with this first,” suggested Lloyd.

“...”

Javier took the handkerchief Lloyd held out, and he wrapped it around his face to cover his nose and mouth. Breathing soon became easier.

“Follow me.”

Javier then moved into the outskirts of the woods with Lloyd, and the plan he had revealed eight days ago came to his mind.

We are going to steal it.

When Lloyd suggested stealing the Elensia sap and solving the insulation issue at hand, Javier flew into a rage, objecting that it was an outrageous idea. Stealing the Elensia Tree sap in the Everglow Woods while avoiding the elves? Javier considered that it was more realistic to train a chicken how to sword fight and hunt tigers.

That’s the case even if it’s me.

Of course, Javier was a sword master. But he wasn’t confident about dealing with the elves. Anywhere else, he would have fooled the elves. But he was in the Everglow Woods.

The elves are said to notice even a small change in the air of these woods. And yet, we are going to fool them? I'm afraid Master Lloyd is overestimating my powers.

Javier was worried, but the plan was pushed ahead nonetheless. The following day, Lloyd went to the baron and revealed his plans in detail, causing a bit of a scuffle between the baron and Lloyd. But the result was always the same. The baron gave up and said yes to Lloyd's never changing stubbornness and thorough plan.

And we departed right away.

The following morning, they left the barony, and they arrived here after a seven-day journey. The plan, which Javier could've never imagined, was revealed to him.

"Good. We can start from here," Lloyd said.

"Do you mean extracting the Elensia Tree sap?"

"Uh-huh."

Lloyd stopped moving.

"Then, what am I supposed to do?" asked Javier, certain that his young master must have devised a plan. He was certain that Lloyd did have a plan. After all, it was Master Lloyd.

These woods belong to the elves.

Javier could never let his guard down. It was the case even if he was a sword master. At least within the boundaries of these woods, the elves were as equally sensitive and perceptive as him.

And Master Lloyd wishes to fool these elves' senses and extract the sap? I wonder what he has up on his sleeves.

Javier waited for Lloyd's response, his face hardened. But when he heard Lloyd, it darkened all the more.

“Run.” Lloyd’s short answer was heard.

“Excuse me?”

“Run. Straight ahead.”

“I’m not sure what you mean.”

“Don’t you know how to run?” asked Lloyd again.

“Of course, I do.”

“That’s a relief,” said Lloyd.

“So what, you want me to run? Just run?”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd chuckled.

“As far as you can go from here. And as fast and noisily as you can. Into the woods. But make sure you don’t get lost.”

“You...” Javier paused and stared at Lloyd. “You want me to become a scapegoat.”

“Yeah.”

“Aren’t you worried that it might be dangerous for me?”

“No.”

“...”

“I’m more worried for myself,” objected Lloyd.

“What are you saying...”

“Think about it. You are a sword master.”

“I am.”

“And you got triple circles with you.”

“That’s right.”

“So no matter how much these elves in this Everglow Woods try to come at you, they won’t be much of a threat to you.”

“Are you sure about that?”

“Yeah, and I’m sure about one more thing. I am in more danger than you are.”

“You, Master Lloyd?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.”

This was something Lloyd was absolutely certain about.

“You,” Lloyd said as he glanced around, “have no problem protecting your body, but what do I have?”

“So, the plan is for me to create a ruckus and draw attention, and you are going to extract the Elensia Tree sap in the meantime?”

“Now, you’re talking.”

“But it’s going to be too dangerous,” warned Javier.

“Can I trust you on that...?”

“Are you worried about me?”

“That can’t be,” said Javier.

“Then?”

“I am scared that I’ll get scolded by the lord for losing you.”

“Aha. So you are scared of losing your job in this day in age of economic instability, eh?” asked Lloyd.

“That is accurate.”

“My, my, you’re making me cry with your concern. I’ll make sure you won’t lose your job, so focus on taking care of yourself.”

“Understood... I will trust you then.”

“If you know, then scram. But make sure you meet me within 30 minutes.”

Javier gave a short bow. Even though the young master was throwing nasty comments at him, Javier knew very well that the one who was in greater danger tonight was Master Lloyd, not him.

I pray he will be safe.

Javier wondered if Lloyd could succeed in extracting the sap without getting caught. A part of him thought that it would be more reasonable to find another way than to venture into this risky plan. But he knew very well that it was too late to turn back.

And Master Lloyd is still confident about this whole plan.

By now, Javier knew that Lloyd had something up on his sleeve when he was this confident.

So I just have to trust and get on board with his plan.

Swish! Javier drew his sword and leaped high, like a predator letting out a ferocious roar. Then, he raised the sword toward the sky and collided with his mana circle.

Kaboom! The powerful mana blast jetted toward the sky.

I am right here! Come and catch me if you can!

Javier zoomed through the woods with more speed, aiming to stay as far from Lloyd as possible. Just then, dozens of light green shadows appeared and dashed through the trees, almost flying”

Dang, they’re really fast.

Lloyd was hiding in a bush, quietly observing where Javier had gone to. Javier was already nowhere in sight. Instead, Lloyd saw the mana blast blasting through the sky from where Javier was headed, as well as the intermittent flashes of something light green.

It must be the elves. They’re already tailing Javier.

Lloyd was impressed by how perceptive these elves were. It appeared that it was almost impossible to fool these elves in the woods.

But that’s only when they’re on the ground.

After observing the surroundings some more, Lloyd rose up. A shovel was already in his hand.

When I’m underground, it’s a bit of a different story. Though I can’t fool them completely, I’ll be able to buy some time.

Rustle. Rustle. Lloyd carefully dug the ground, creating as little noise as possible. Thankfully, the earth was smooth and soft without many stones. So the digging turned out to be a cinch, and as he continued to dig, the hole became deeper. 15 feet. 30 feet. 60 feet... Eventually, Lloyd was able to completely hide himself in the small cave.

Okay, time for my first disguise.

He got out of the cave and covered the entrance with some leaves and twigs. It was disguised to look like an animal’s cave. Once it was done, he stepped out again.

Now, time for the real digging. Energizer.

Ding Dong.

[The skill option of the Asrahan Core Technique, Energizer, has been activated.]

[The triple circle's efficiency has been brought to the max.]

[You are guaranteed to not get tired for the next 20 minutes.]

Ziiing!

Woah, it's been a while since I felt this way!

Every fiber of his body was charged with strength. The three circles rotated at maximum speed, and an inexhaustible vigor, which was as energetic and charged as energy drink commercials, swelled over Lloyd.

Let's goooo!

Fwish! Fwish!

The noise was kept to a minimum this time as well. But the shoveling was not. It was ferocious and relentless. Lloyd dug the cave vertically, moving downward. 15 feet. 30 feet. 60 feet. But of course, Lloyd was never exhausted. Moreover, he already saw the path he had to go in advance.

The roots should appear anytime now.

This part of the land Lloyd started to dig was actually the area about 20 yards away from the Elensia Tree. But he couldn't thoughtlessly access the tree. If he reveals himself and tries to extract the tree sap and slice the trunk husk, what would happen?

I'd get beaten up.

Lloyd was certain about it because he had read it happen in the novel. Some of the explorers dared to extract the sap in such a manner, and they were captured by the elves. Lloyd shook his head as he recalled that part of the story.

Their attempt was off-base in two ways. First, they were exposing themselves on the ground. Second, this was the bigger reason. They only cut the husks, which only rendered a few drops a day.

In order to attain a large volume of sap, he needed to target the root, not the husk. That was the lesson Lloyd had learned from the failure of the explorers. It was so because the Elensia Tree stored the sap in its roots.

So, I simply need to cut a few thick roots to bring home and squeeze the sap out.

Inspecting the plan in his head once again, Lloyd accelerated his shoveling, and right before the Energizer ended, he discovered the root.

Okay. I see it.

Flash! Lloyd was actually activating another skill at the moment, and so the 16 feet space ahead of him was scanned in his eyes. Thanks to his skill, he was able to see it.

It's a root. I'm sure of it.

Lloyd tightened his grip, and at last, the shovel head reached the area near the root.

Thud!

A corner of Lloyd's lips curved upward.

Bingo. Found it.

From then on, Lloyd's shoveling became more detailed. As though he was spooning a pudding with a teaspoon or rifling through his ears for earwax, Lloyd scraped and removed the dirt off the tree root. Lloyd started to sweat very much. At last, the actual root of the Elensia Tree was seen in his naked eyes.

"Yikes."

This is massive.

Lloyd picked up the torch placed beside him in amazement. The Elensia Tree root was thick and transparent like glass. A milky liquid was filled in its smooth husk.

That's the sap.

Now that he checked, it was time to extract the root. Lloyd cut three strands of the root cleanly and wrapped them in oil paper in several layers before putting them in his bag. But he wasn't satisfied with it, and he made sure that he didn't climb out of the cave so fast. He instead held up the torch and brought it near the root. And in a soft and relaxed voice, he spoke.

"You sisters sneaking behind me. Stop right there. Take one more step, or aim your arrow at me, and I'll burn this tree to the ground"

Lloyd's thick voice rang aloud in the cave. The elf ladies, who were entering the cave, stopped.

"Are you... trying to take hostage of us when you're the one cornered in an impasse?"

Moira, who was aiming the bow behind Lloyd's back as she stood in the front, asked, her facial expression looking flustered. Lloyd smiled as though he had all the time in the world.

"Yes, I am."

They can't shoot me anyway, Lloyd thought to himself. So his plan would be a sure-fire success. Filled with conviction, Lloyd brought the torch near the end of the root.

"Or you can always shoot me if you want."

Chapter 129: The Negotiation Table Is Now Open (2)

“…!”

Crackle! A spark of fire erupted from the end of the Elensia Tree root. Moira’s eyes widened in surprise while Lloyd curved the corners of his lips.

“How much should I burn? Do you prefer medium? Well-done?” growled Lloyd.

“S-stop...!” shouted Moira.

“First, I think you should put down that bow in your hands,” stated Lloyd.

“...”

Moira’s Adam’s apple bobbed. The tree couldn’t be harmed at all costs. She would rather burn herself instead. This was wrong. At last, she let go of the bowstring, and it hung down in her hand.

“Now, I did what you asked. Don’t hurt the tree,” said Moira.

“Of course.”

Lloyd pulled the torch slightly, and the end of the root stopped warping.

Okay, I succeeded in taking a hostage.

Lloyd looked around the narrow cave which he had just dug. It was so narrow that it would be hard for even one person to pass through. And Lloyd was trapped in such a cave with five elf ladies glaring at him at the entrance.

I’m helplessly trapped in here.

Lloyd smiled wryly at his predicament. But actually, he had expected this to happen early on, for there was no way he could hide from the acute senses of the elves in these woods.

That was why I created my plan with this situation in mind from the very beginning.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. Lloyd referred to the features of the elves from the novel. He studied and delved into the details, deliberating over several different solutions. The operation was finally established with several steps. First, use Javier as bait. Second, get to the root by digging a cave. Third, threaten the elves by taking hostage of the Elensia Tree and setting fire to its root.

And fourth, exchange hostages.

Lloyd moved one hand into his inner pocket and fished out something he took great care not to break. It was a wildflower he had picked before he started digging this cave.

"…!"

When he held up the flower, the faces of the elves trembled once again. Lloyd closely brought the torch to the flower.

"Everybody back off. Unless you wish to see this flower burn."

"H-how evil!"

"Come on now," growled Lloyd.

Their eyes shook like an earthquake. It was trembling so heavily that one would have wondered why they were acting that way. It was just a flower, nothing precious or extraordinary. It was just a common, nameless flower found in a field.

But the thing is, this kind of threat works on elves.

Corners of Lloyd’s lip rose. Yes. The Knight of Blood and Iron. The novel spoke of this secret characteristic of the elves. They were maniacal plant lovers.

Their love isn’t ordinary. It’s obsessive.

The elves held an extreme love for plants, and it was worse than the obsession some movie characters showed over certain objects or people. Even a simple act of stepping on an acorn by mistake caused them overwhelming sadness. They sobbed all day if they tore a leaf as they hopped over tree branches. And now, here was Lloyd, threatening to set a wildflower on fire. Their reaction was obvious.

“...”

They stepped back as they gritted their teeth. To this, Lloyd opened his eyes wider and said, “Farther. Keep going.”

“...”

The elves slowly stepped back, and Lloyd moved forward just as much. Moira looked daggers at Lloyd as she gritted her teeth.

“Your threat won’t be able to get you out of this forest,” she said, trying to knock some sense into this human.

“That’s not something for you to worry about,” huffed Lloyd.

“...”

“Keep moving back. Farther. Go on. Faster.”

“What if I say no...?” Moira asked.

“This flower burns.”

“But you will perish in our hands if the flower burns,” threatened Moira.

“Then,” Lloyd said,” today will be my last day.”

“...”

“Oh, well. That’s life.”

Lloyd stared straight into Moira’s eyes. He knew that in this kind of confrontation, the first to cower lost. He had to plant in their heads that there was nothing for him to lose. The psychological warfare must have worked, thankfully. For Moira bit her lips and took one more step back.

“Good choice.”

Lloyd realized that he had become the villain in this situation. While a sense of shame washed over him, the elf ladies moved to the far end of the cave. Lloyd motioned them with his chin and spoke.

“Go out. Outside.”

“...”

He drove the ladies out of the cave. But Lloyd remained inside.

Obviously. I don’t want my head to be pierced with an arrow.

The area outside the cave was an open space, so Lloyd could be sniped at from any direction. Knowing this very well, Lloyd persisted at the entrance of the cave and waited.

Javier should be here soon.

He had told Javier to return here within 30 minutes, no matter what. Once he got here, the ladies would fight back. And when chaos broke out, Lloyd would try to sneak out of the woods. Lloyd was confident that he would succeed.

My goal isn’t to fight the elves and take over this forest. The goal is just to run away. And since Javier is a sword master, I say it’s possible enough.

The nighttime getaway. This was the last stage of the operation he had devised for tonight.

Anyway, the elves were just as I expected.

As Lloyd waited for Javier, he never tore his gaze away from the elves. He was afraid that they would immediately shoot an arrow the moment they caught him lowering his guard. And so, he was able to observe even the smallest details of their appearance.

White complexion. Sharp ears. And these are all ladies who came to capture the intruder. It was true what had been written about them. Elf men do house chores while women shoot arrows.

The men were in charge of cleaning their houses. Women were in charge of inspecting the woods for any suspicious activities. This custom was mentioned in the novel. But there wasn't any particular or grand reason behind this.

Since men are larger and heavier than women, they're more harmful to the grass when they move around the forest.

And so, Lloyd read that the elf ladies learn a special step technique to protect the grass. Only when they perfect the technique can they be acknowledged as adults and go outside the village. This tradition was comical from a human perspective. But it was reasonable enough when you considered their obsessive love for plants.

But anyway, that's that. Why are they so gaunt?

The dragging engagement with the elves taught Lloyd one thing more about them. It was that they were seriously all skins and bones.

I'm not mistaken.

It was dark at night, and the only sources of light were the moonlight and flickering torch. And yet, they were still overwhelmingly visible.

They're not slim. They're gaunt.

Lloyd's gaze moved toward their faces. Every single one of them had protruding cheekbones. And their eyes were sunken and hollow. Not to mention, their faces had an odd shade to them, and their grips that held the bows trembled faintly. It was weird.

Hold on. Something's off.

Lloyd's gut feeling tingled, and from then on, he avidly moved his gaze. He studied the full length of the elves and the woods around him. Things he had missed in his nervousness started to come into view.

These woods... I don't see any animals.

The forest. This was a forest that hadn't been touched by any humans, and it was spring all year long. Despite that, there were barely any animals. The squirrels that should be jumping from one branch to another were nowhere in sight, as well as the birds. There weren't any chirping noises that should have come naturally. In its stead, this forest was filled with dead silence.

How is this possible?

Lloyd was curious. He then gazed at the elf ladies once again. The plant-loving elves. Their emaciated faces from prolonged hunger. This forest is without any animals.

Wait a second. Is this...

He processed this in his head fast, making an intelligent guess based on the visible facts and speculations. The puzzle was pieced together, and a possibility popped into his head. Lloyd developed a theory at last, with which he came up with a new plan. And he uttered the plan out loud.

"Do you... by any chance like meat?" asked Lloyd.

"…!"

The elves' eyes trembled. Lloyd was right. A mischievous smile formed on his face.

I'm right. They are starved of meat.

These elves loved plants. They cherished and regarded them on an obsessive level. They never ever damaged any of them, and so, they never ate one. Not a single fruit, seed, leaf, stem, or root. Nothing.

They're meat lovers. Hardcover meat eaters.

Meat. Their diet consisted of nothing but meat, and nothing else. Their gaunt and frail appearance then suggested only one thing.

They haven't been able to eat meat for quite a long time.

Lloyd wondered why. The answer was found easily.

Monster domino. The phenomenon affected even this place.

The Everglow Woods sat in the eastern range, so it could not be completely free from the monster domino phenomenon. What was the result?

It's obvious. Some monsters would have caused a ruckus here, but of course, the elves would have repelled them. The problem would be what came next. The ecosystem would have been disrupted by the sudden appearance of the monsters.

Lloyd could instantly infer from the dead silence and absence of animals in this place. A large number of small animals have likely migrated out, and as a result, their predators left this place in search of another place to inhabit.

That's why the number of animals dropped. And from the elves' perspective, this means a drastic decrease in hunts.

Hunting would probably be unsatisfactory for a certain period of time now. Even though they sprinted around and shot arrows, they would have acquired only a small volume of meat. Lloyd's postulation was on point. In actuality, these elves were considerably starved, and they could not pinpoint the last date they hunted successfully and enjoyed a nice meat jerky. They couldn't even remember it well. They were hungry and weak.

But not just these ladies here. Everyone in the tribe was starved. All the men, women, and children. The situation was grave and desperate. But there wasn’t any solution since the number of animals was reduced to a great level in these woods and the ones around it. Their hunts grew scarce. Of course, the situation would improve over the years, for nature didn’t like vacancies. In the far future, the animals that left this place would come back to restore the lost vivacity. But the elves didn’t know when that would happen and whether they could hold up starving until that happened.

The food shortage was already giving them a headache, and now, a human had dared to enter the woods! Moira thought to herself.

And this person ventured to damage the Elensia Tree root and threatened to burn a beautiful flower. The elves in the place felt their heads throb.

“You... What are you really up to?” blurted Moira. Her plan was to distract him until he let his guard down for a split second. She would use that moment to bore a hole in his head.

“Nothing,” said Lloyd, acting thick-skinned. “But...”

“But?”

“I want to negotiate.”

“Negotiate with us?”

“Yes,” said Lloyd.

“We don’t strike deals with humans. I am sure you know that very well,” said Moira.

“But you are doing so at this very moment.”

“...”

“And you even took heed of my threat. Isn’t a threat technically a form of negotiation,” said Lloyd.

“Don’t push your logic here. And I don’t intend to make a deal with you.”

“So what, you are going to kill me after the fire is out?”

“Are you afraid of dying?” Moira asked.

“Obviously.” Lloyd grinned at her before nonchalantly blurting out a suggestion too sweet to deny. “I can cook you some grilled pork, you know.”

“What...?”

“Sizzle. Sizzle. Oh, how tasty and savory grilled pork is. When it’s burned crisp, turn it the other way. And after it’s perfectly grilled, just cut it up with scissors. And dip it in some sauce... Whew!”

“...”

The eyes of the elf ladies grew slightly dazed. Lloyd continued to talk.

“Well, tell me if you prefer chicken to pork. Why? Chicken is just a way of life. Wash the chicken in water and spice it up with salt. Put it in milk for a day, and fry it for seven minutes in 330 in the fire. Then, three more minutes at 350. Just imagine. Imagine the juicy meat that would erupt in your mouth after you take a bite of the drumstick. Imagine the aroma that wafts out when you rip its juicy breast.”

“...”

“Oops,” continued Lloyd, “maybe your refined tongues prefer beef. Beef is best cooked as a steak. Remove the blood from the feather blade. And salt it up. Next? Simple. Throw the steak in a searingly hot pan. And turn it every minute. Oh, how the oil sizzles! Turn to medium heat, and grill it up to your preference. Woo, everyone would be drooling as they wait for it to rest!”

“...”

“Now, what do you say?” said Lloyd.

Gulp. Instead of giving an answer, the elves swallowed as their mouths salivated. The negotiation table, which Lloyd wanted, was now open.

Chapter 130: The Negotiation Table Is Now Open (3)

Swooosh! Arrows flew, and the air particles split as they moved forward.

Crash! An arrow flew to pierce into a rock. Javier stepped on the arrow stuck onto it and leaped high.

Leap! He leaped like a bolt of lightning. But he didn't have any time to enjoy the flight as another shower of arrows came from behind to pierce the back of his head.

Thwackk! Crash!

Javier twisted his body midair in a hurry, and five arrows almost brushed his body. Three arrows hit the earth while two more arrows pierced into a rock. Just then, Javier realized two things: first, darkness didn't matter in the slightest to the elves. Second, they shot in a way so that the trees or patches of grass didn't get hurt.

This is outrageous.

This chase was happening breathtakingly fast. Javier was running through the dark and thick woods. And the arrows flew so accurately and fast that chills crept up behind his spine. What was more chilling was the fact that these arrows hit only the empty ground and rocks.

I'm moving at full speed, and yet, they can predict my movement with their senses. The angle and environment of the incoming arrows are all calculated in their heads. Each shot is the result of a meticulous calculation.

The more Javier thought about it, the more amazed he was. But it wasn't the time to marvel at their prowess.

Tap! Javier landed and jumped high again. He moved through the trees and bushes and zoomed forward. Chills ran down the back of his head and his back. Dozens of arrows were flying at him, and the mere noise they created as they left the string stung his skin.

But I can't be caught so easily.

If he got caught, Master Lloyd would be in danger. So he could never let them catch him. He would do his best in his role tonight, which was letting the elves recklessly chase him. Thinking so, Javier sped up. But the elves started to corner him.

Swish! Fwish! The arrows that only flew from behind started to come from the side as well.

"...!"

Slash! Javier wielded his sword, slicing the two arrows with his sword blade. He bounced away the other one right so narrowly before it pierced his forehead.

"..."

Javier realized that he was being cornered. This was bad.

I was told to come back within 30 minutes.

There was something else he needed to do besides avoiding the clutches of the elves. It was to meet Lloyd after successfully distracting their attention away from his young master. The timing was wrong, and Lloyd could be put in danger. Javier wondered if he could make it within 30 minutes.

I might be a bit tight on time.

The elves were chasing him relentlessly, cornering him with every bone-chilling shot. But now, it seemed that he had to turn back and rush into the path where he came from. This only meant that he had to break through the siege head-on.

No time to waffle anymore. It'll be too late if I go any further.

Javier made a decision, which was to turn back at the creek ahead and jump into their siege. He would protect his body by wielding his sword that was charged with aura. If possible, he would threaten them with the mana blast to make sure they would retreat.

Perfect.

He finalized his plan in seconds. He jumped three steps forward, and four arrows were nailed to the ground as they swooshed in the air. Just then, Javier's eyes glinted.

Now!

Leap!

Javier instantly wheeled around and brought his sword to his chest. A brilliant ray of light, the aura, appeared.

Fwoosh!

The moment the aura appeared, Javier wielded his sword 57 times in accordance with the wind current and the way the pollen flew, creating a storm of aura.

Clang! Clang! Clang! Clank! Clank Slash!Fwoosh! Kaboom!

86 arrows flying at him were sliced in an instant, sending the arrowheads to the ground and the body back to the owners in the woods.

"...!"

The elf archers panicked in confusion as the shots they thought to be perfect were sliced by the aura and sent back to them again.

"Argh!"

"Ack!"

A handful of them, who failed to evade the counterattack, were struck. Some were hit in the shoulders. Some were hit in the shin. But no one was injured. It was comparable to a small sting or slap. But the elves didn’t have any time to focus on the burning pain.

That human is trying to break through us!

One elf hinted as she gazed at another. The rest of them picked up Javier’s intentions soon.

Thwack!

The silver-haired human in front of them charged forward, and this time, he was more forceful and relentless, unlike when he was trying to flee earlier. It was easy to see what he was doing. Breakthrough, not escape. Direct hurtling.

“...!”

Of course, the elves would never open the path for him so easily. Once the 86 elves realized what Javier was doing, they all pulled their bowstrings at the same time. Javier was about 50 yards away. Everyone’s eyes glimmered coldly. Javier’s speed. The direction and force of the wind. The humidity and density of pollen in the night sky. The elves instinctively calculated everything, and as they pulled their strings and aimed about 24 yards ahead, the arrowheads shone brightly. Deathly glare appeared in their eyes. 24 yards ahead of them was a tiny opening between the bushes, which was as small as the eye of a needle. There. That area will be the very venue where this silver-haired intruder would be pierced to death.

Stretch!

The veins on their arms popped out of their skins. The bows were pulled all the way to the back, and they bent to the point of breaking. They were about to let it go, but just then...

“...!”

There came a whistle. Soft but loud at the same time. It was only audible in the ears of the elves, and it was used to put a halt to the chase and chaos.

“...”

The archers looked at one another in confusion, but no one understood the sudden hearing of the whistle. Even still, they had to obey the signal as it was the way of life they had internalized over their years in the woods.

Rustle. The elves pulled away the bows and hid in the darkness. Some hid in the shadows cast under the beech tree. Some hid in between the vines, while some chose behind the rocks where the moonlight was unreachable. They left the scene so naturally, like sugar melting in the water. It was as if they were melted in the shadows. As such, Javier was confused.

Thump! Javier simply jumped and passed over the elves’ designated killing area, releasing energy from his sword to protect his whole body. However, it was strange.

What’s happening?

No one shot him. Not a single arrow flew in his direction. Something else was also gone.

The blood thirst that hung around the place was gone.

But Javier didn’t stop charging ahead as he knew that he could be easily taken down should he stop now. That could be something the elves were after, perhaps. So Javier kept sprinting while trying to make sense of the situation.

Something’s off. What is it?

Throughout his travels, Javier didn’t feel the presence of the elves that tried to take him down. It was as if the zealous chase that had taken place some minutes ago was all a lie or a dream.

How strange.

Javier wondered what in the devil these elves were up to. But instead of letting his guard down, he grew more alert and vigilant. At the same time, nervousness started to creep up on him.

Could it be that something happened to Master Lloyd?

Javier direly wished that wasn't the case. But he was nervous as the elves had suddenly halted their chase and decided to let him go as though nothing had ever happened. Javier's anxiety grew with every step he took. The silence around him made him more anxious.

I shouldn't have left him alone there.

Even though Javier became a scapegoat, Lloyd was already exposed to a considerable amount of danger. Javier knew that but foolishly trusted his young master's confidence too much. He had conveniently thought that Lloyd would have a plan in his head. He simply passed over the grave responsibility to Lloyd, which was making sure he stayed safe.

Please... Master Lloyd.

Please be safe and well, Javier thought to himself. He prayed that Master Lloyd would later welcome him in his usual nonchalant and brazen manner. Javier longed and longed for it as he rushed through the woods, growing hastier and speedier with every second. He jumped over rocks and thick trunks and slithered through the branches and twigs. The handkerchief that covered his nose and mouth was removed, and pollen started to assault his senses. But he didn't care. He simply barreled through the woods until he arrived at where he had started. The place where he had left Lloyd.

"Master Lloyd!" yelled Javier.

Slide! Screech!

Javier stopped dead in his tracks, sliding as he landed. He turned and glanced around to hurriedly search for Lloyd. The elves? Javier said to himself, resolving to respond the moment he spotted them. Even if it meant killing some of them and being chased for his life, he would rescue Lloyd first. Javier gripped the sword with a deathly determination, but before he found them, he was discovered first.

“Hey. You’re here?”

Javier turned at lightning speed to the source of the welcoming voice and the smell of grilled meat. And there, he saw Master Lloyd with five elves, all seated around in a circle. They surrounded a grill with sizzling cuts of meat being cooked.

“What... are you doing right now?” asked Javier.

“What about... them?” Javier said as he pointed at the awkwardly seated elves. His finger trembled.

“I’m eating with them,” Lloyd beamed as he answered.

“...”

“You’re right on time. Take your seat.”

Lloyd spoke as he tapped the empty seat beside him. Javier sat down on the rock as though he was entranced and naturally joined the elves as the meat sizzled on the pan.

“What is happening-”

“Introduce yourself to them,” said Lloyd. “These are the archer elves. In particular, she is Moira, the chief of the Myosotis tribe that settled here in the Everglow Woods.”

“...”

“See that?” went on Lloyd. “This guy is taciturn and not very social. He’s Javier Asrahan, my personal knight I told you about a while ago.”

“...”

Moira and the other elf archers greeted him awkwardly at Javier with their eyes. Blankly staring at them, Javier felt that these elves, too, were overwhelmed with embarrassment as they greeted him.

“So, tell me, what’s happening right now?” Javier groused after he managed to collect his thoughts. Javier felt cheated. He was sincerely concerned about his young master, so he rushed to get here. And yet, this was the situation they were in? What on earth happened between Master Lloyd and the elves while he was gone that they would be sitting around the fire grilling pork belly like some good friends? Javier thought to himself.

I can’t wrap my head around this at all.

Confusion rushed through him. But Lloyd was completely unaware of the latter’s feelings for he simply continued to grin at Javier.

“What do you think I’m doing? We’re in the middle of a negotiation,” said Lloyd.

“You’re negotiating?”

“I don’t have time to explain. Just sit and watch. Now, take the tong. Make sure you flip the meat before it burns.”

“...”

Javier took the tong in a daze, and he flipped the meat on the pan in his stupor. Meanwhile, Lloyd and chief Moira continued their discussion.

“Haha, how’s the meat?” asked Lloyd.

“Right? I heard that elves don’t use fire,” said Lloyd.

“For obvious reasons. Fire is created in the sacrifice of the plants.”

“Is that why you dry your game meat raw and process them into a jerky?” inquired Lloyd.

“It’s quite tasty, you know,” defended Moira.

“Tastier than this meat?”

“...”

“I knew it. Grilling pork belly like this is never the wrong thing to do. Tell me, are you bothered by the smell of coal in the meat?”

“Not at all.”

Moira shook her head shyly, and her eyes moved downward toward the fiery coals.

“It’s surprising. I didn’t know you can start a fire without sacrificing trees or depending on magic,” commented Moira.

Coal. Rock that started a fire. She was stupefied when she first laid her eyes on it. It was more than surprising, she felt emotional. She had never imagined that such a thing existed.

A rock that starts a fire? I never knew there was something like this.

Coal could be used to start a fire without throwing wood there. This meant that they could grill their game and cook them nicely. Moira’s eyes started to hold a glint of desire that was thick and deep as a cup of espresso. Lloyd was quick to catch the change of emotion right away.

Well, well, I expected it but never really thought the elves would be drawn to coal.

Lloyd had packed some coal to help start a fire. And the meat and pan were meant to encourage him on the cold journey. So he never imagined that these items would work so wonderfully to facilitate a deal with the elves. Seriously, even Lloyd, who liked to draw out large plans, considered himself lucky.

“Well, anyway, to continue the negotiation... give us what I ask, and I shall supply you with a generous amount of meat and coal every month.”

“Coal? Do you mean this burning coal?” Moira asked.

“Yes.”

Technically speaking, the coal wasn’t a rock. It was a tree that died and was buried trillions of years ago. But Lloyd decided that it was superfluous to tell her that.

“What I demand is simple,” Lloyd said as he brushed away the thought of what coals actually were. “The right to extract the sap of the Elensia Tree roots. Of course, I won’t recklessly go about extraction. I will take the exact amount approved by your tribe under your supervision. And...”

“And?”

“Send us 100 elves who can jump from great heights without fear. They will be working as metal workers in my fiefdom. It will be a sort of outsourcing,” Lloyd said.

Juicy meat. Marvelous coals. Lloyd dropped his demands on the negotiating grilling pan as he revealed the two cards he held in his hands.

Chapter 131: Dancing on the Rebars (1)

“Welcome. I hope the journey was kind to you. You are now in the Frontera barony.”

“...”

Lloyd Frontera’s voice rang aloud in her ears. The chief of the Myosotis tribe, Moira, lifted her head, and a vast and familiar scenery appeared in front of her.

So, that must be the land of humans.

She surveyed the Frontera barony at great length. The first thing she noticed was the Prona River, whose waters flowed from the south and largely turned clockwise in a semicircle. It then rounded west to flow out north. The Frontera barony sat within the semicircle.

The east touches the foot of the mountain range, and the other sides are surrounded by the river.

It was a beautiful sight to behold. But she realized one uncomfortable truth.

Too many plants are sacrificed amid the beautiful scenery.

Small villages sat here and there throughout the fiefdom, and the paddies and fields stood among them. The reclaimed land stretched vastly in the north. Those areas were designed and used to harvest plants and vegetation by mass, all at the necessity of humans. The same went for several houses and buildings.

All the structures use wood.

The log houses, stables, and storehouses all were built using wood as the main material. This uncomfortable truth made Moira’s heart throb in pain.

I bet these poor trees never received a proper funeral.

Humans didn’t consider plants valuable enough to go to such lengths for them. As such, they never paid their respects to dead trees. This sight naturally brought...

“Are you uncomfortable?”

“...”

Lloyd, who must have understood Moira’s feelings, asked as he stood right beside Moira. She nodded softly at his question. The corners of his lips rose.

“We don’t have a choice. For everyone has a different way of life.”

“Different way of life?” asked Moira.

“For instance, the monks.”

Monks?

Moira had never heard of such a word before. The smile on Lloyd’s face deepened slightly.

“They are a sort of priest in a faraway region,” explained Lloyd.

“A priest? Why are you bringing it up now?”

“They keep a diet that is poles apart from yours. They only eat plants.”

“What in the world...”

Moira was terrified. Eats only plants? That was just awful. But when Lloyd explained further, she was prompted to rethink her stance.

“To keep the rule that forbids killing. They only eat plants out of respect for living beings. Sure, there are some who do not abide by the principle. But most of them strive to keep it, according to what I have heard. It is the same with you, who cherish and value plants.”

“...”

“I am saying this to ask for your understanding as we all have different ways of life,” said Lloyd.

“Understanding? Just like the negotiation you had offered a few days ago?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd gently nodded, and his response made Moira take a trip down memory lane. A few days ago, this intruder had entered their forest and dared to take the sap of the Elensia Tree. When he was cornered, he took the sap hostage and had the audacity to grill meat in front of them. Not enough with that, he tried to strike a deal by promising to provide them with meat and coal. Even right now, Moira could not forget the words spoken through this man’s mouth.

“Negotiation is all about narrowing the distance between the interests of two sides,” Lloyd said.

Moira felt odd, and she wondered what he was talking about. Lloyd continued to speak.

“Well, we don’t have to narrow it by force. After all, some negotiations do break down. However, the mere attempt to close the distance between the two sides is a good start. Just like how we are sitting across from each other when everybody has said that the two races can never come to an agreement.”

Lloyd chuckled.

“Anyway,” he went on, “let us summarize what I had offered once again. I promise monthly provision of meat as your tribe needs it. Along with coal, the rocks that sustain a fire, which you can use to grill the meat.”

“In return,” Moira said, “you want us to grant you the right to extract Elensia Tree sap and 100 workers?”

“That is exactly right,” affirmed Lloyd.

“...”

“You can reject my offer if you don’t like it. Or if you want to receive something more, please do tell us now.”

“Are you going to grant it if you hear me out?” asked Moira.

“That depends. Let’s hear it first.”

“...”

Moira wondered if this was what a negotiation, which the human was calling it, was all about. One side makes an offer and the other side counteroffers. And they weigh the benefits. Moira had never ever experienced this before. She has led a peaceful life as she spent all her days hunting in the vast woods. A sense of hesitation rushed through her at the face of the negotiation. And she fell deep in thought.

What would my mother have done if she were alive?

Her mother’s name was Roscia, and she used to engage with humans in the fiefdom called “Gapelle.” Though she couldn’t remember exactly, Moira remembered hearing from her mother that she had come back to the woods and had Moira after her human friends passed away one by one. Just then, her mother’s will that was left before she went back to the spirit of the plants called to Moira’s mind.

She said that human friendships are transient. That they die too early and meaninglessly, unlike us. So, she told me to trust only human friends. Trusting the entire race was only going to put me in trouble.

And now, this human named Lloyd was...

Not a friend. But…

He didn’t look like an enemy either. The so-called negotiation was proof of it. Plus...

“Why are you taking off your armor?” asked Moira.

“Oh, to make a contract.”

“What do you mean by a contract?”

“It’s a preservation of the terms of an agreement. It’s an important document that leaves physical evidence of the results of a negotiation. As a result, it prevents and reduces any misunderstandings and conflicts that may arise in the future,” explained Lloyd.

“So leaving this so-called contract erases the reason for a dispute?” asked Moira.

“Yes, most of them.”

“Most of them...? Why not entirely?”

“Because nothing is perfect in this world. Anyway, okay. Here we go. Turn it this way, and slice it up...”

Stab!

Lloyd took off his leather armor and removed a shoulder protector. After turning it upside down, he stabbed and sliced it with a dagger. Once he cut out a square, he looked at Moira and grinned.

“I’m going to use this as a contract. Normally, we write it on a piece of paper. But I didn’t think you’d like that very much as that’s another form of plant harassment from your standpoint. Right?” asked Lloyd.

“...”

“So, did you have enough time to think about it?” asked Lloyd once again.

“Yes, I did.”

Burning rocks and meat. These deals were good enough, especially for their tribe, as they were suffering from a food shortage. This deal was a sweet rain in a drought. Moreover, she liked Lloyd's attitude of creating a contract on a level playing field. He didn't give any empty words of bravado. And the sight of him cutting out the leather armor for her impressed Moira.

"Okay," said Moira as she nodded. "I will take up your suggestion."

"And in return, the Elensia Tree sap and the workers?"

"Of course."

Just like that, she took the offer. Afterward, they wrote two copies of the contract and took one each. On top of that, they wrote an outsourcing contract for dispatching elf workers. This deal, however, invited harsh criticism from the tribal elders. They reamed her out for thoughtlessly handing over the root of the precious tree and for opening the woods to humans.

This is better than starving the children in our tribe.

This was her realistic concession and decision as a tribal chief. She would fully take the brunt of all the criticisms thrown at her. But she would make sure that her tribe would reap the benefits of the negotiation. Resolving as such, she jostled herself out of her trance. Her gaze traveled to the Frontera barony before it moved to Lloyd at her side.

"It is just as you said it," Moira said.

"Excuse me?"

Lloyd gazed at her in confusion. Moira faintly smiled at him.

"Well, it's all a matter of perspective. I now see it. The stance of humans, and their different lifestyles. So, where will we be working from now on?"

"Oh, do you plan on working right away?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes. That was a term in the negotiation."

Coal and meat. She would give as much as she received. Lloyd smiled in satisfaction after hearing her.

“Allow me to teach you how to work first. Okay, this way, please.”

Lloyd led Moira and 100 elves to the fiefdom. He first introduced them to the baron and the baroness. The people in the barony manor and fiefdom were flustered and amazed by the elves. Some of the young men fell in love at first sight, while a handful of girls sent gazes of adoration at them. And when Lloyd revealed what the elves would be doing from now on, the baron was caught by surprise.

“What? They would be put to work with the rebars?” asked the baron in disbelief.

“Yes.”

“D-do you really think that would be possible?”

“Yes, of course.”

“...”

Lloyd nodded his head, brimming with confidence. The baron was flustered.

“Um, but I... fear that it might be slightly difficult,” confessed the baron.

“Is it because of their fragile appearances?”

“Yes, although it is a bit wrong to judge them based on their appearance... Um, I cannot help but feel that way,” the baron said with hesitation in his voice.

It was true. These elves reminded the baron of mysterious and slender does. They looked like fairies who had never worked hard a day in their lives. But here was Lloyd, announcing that they would be thrown into construction sites and given the job of working on the rebars, which was extremely laborious and hectic.

“I am sure of you now,” said the baron. “Even the fearsome and rough orc warriors clamor in fear all day as they work on the rebars. They cry out loud that the building is too tall. Their cries have worsened in the few days you weren’t here.”

“Yes, I am aware of it. That is why I brought them here,” Lloyd said.

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd grinned.

“They are not afraid of heights. Plus, they are much stronger than you’d think.”

“What do you mean? They’re strong?” asked the baron, incredulous.

“Yes. They live ten times longer than us, and they dart around the woods and shoot arrows throughout their long lives.”

Archery. Most RPG games included this agile skill. But in real life, it was different. Very different. Anybody who had experience using a bow and arrow would know it very well. Archery required muscle, not agility.

“And they remain young for much longer than us. Their muscles grow during the entirety of those long years. Moreover, they practice archery every day, so you don’t have to question their strength,” said Lloyd.

Their youth was far longer than humans. And in the span of those years, the hormones that foster muscular growth were secreted the entire time. On top of that, they were carnivores who only ate protein-filled meat as they went around shooting arrows. So technically speaking, even the special force units would be cute children in comparison to these elves. The baron may have dismissed them as weak, but the truth was that they were far from it.

“So do not worry about it. And you can leave it to me to take care of them,” assured Lloyd.

“Hmm,” said the baron, “you have a point there.”

The baron was convinced. And the following day, Lloyd taught the elves the work process. Since they had no knowledge of construction work, they were educated on different concepts and precautions. In particular, Lloyd paid special attention to safety.

It’s nice that they’re careful by nature.

The elves were discreet creatures. They were slow to learn, but they made sure they internalized the lessons. The safety aspect of the construction was particularly the case. Once they finished their basic education, it was time to learn the rebars, which was their main task.

“So, laying the rebars is called rebar placement. Just like here, you do this and this. The important thing is to exactly lay the rebars according to the design. And when you tie the intersected rebars, you use this tool called a hooker.”

Lloyd taught them several ways to tie the rebars. Besides that, other techniques were shared with them as well. For instance, the way to unite the cement formwork, how to construct structural support to prevent any bending or tilting from pressure, and the procedure and safety guidelines for dismantling the formwork after the cement was dried. Lloyd put the elves through the wringer during this training period, showing no mercy.

“Over there, tie the rebars like that, and it’s going to bust. Wait, are you doing this because you don’t want to eat meat?”

“Excuse me? You should be laying them following the ink on the ground. Otherwise, I might not be able to give any meat today.”

“Hey. Erect the support like that, and it’s going to collapse. An accident will happen. And you know what happens if an accident occurs? I’m going to wrap the pork belly with vegetables!”

Lloyd’s most effective threat was to make a wrap out of lettuce, sesame leaves, and cabbage. During snack time, he would wrap their favorite meats in vegetables along with some sliced peppers and garlic and show them to them. But he didn’t make them eat it. For showing it was enough. Almost all elves at the site were rooted to the spot. Some of the soft-hearted ones even broke into sobs, repenting for their mistakes. And as these hectic training sessions lasted several days, the elves grew up to become solid, trustworthy rebar workers and were dispatched to the construction site. Of course, Lloyd was with them.

“I will be personally supervising and overseeing your work here for the time being. How long? Until you get used to the job. So if you want to stop hearing my nagging, you can just quickly adjust to the field,” voiced Lloyd.

The elves flinched when they heard Lloyd. Were they still under his supervision even when he was at the site? A sense of awfulness swept over them. Lloyd was stringent when it came to nagging. And the experience of looking at lettuce-wrapped meat was just...

No. Just no. I don’t want to experience that ever again!

The elves resolved to themselves that they would exert the best concentration skill and be acknowledged by Lloyd. So that they would be saved from the terror of witnessing another lettuce wrap. Their determination and focus compounded to derive 200% of their athletic jumping ability unique to elves.

Jump! Swoosh! Creak! Clank! Tap!

The construction of Building 102 had been on a temporary halt because of the orc warriors and their fear of heights. But now, the site was filled with the elves who had begun to fly at the top.

Chapter 132: Dancing on the Rebars (2)

Jump!

Moira stepped on the rebar and jumped high in the air. A thought crossed her mind. I'm free. How familiar. This feeling of being hundreds of feet off the ground. As she jumped high from the roof of the building made of rebars and cement, she surprisingly felt familiar akin to leaping on birch trees.

It feels like I'm back in the woods again.

Since she had spent her whole life in the Everglow Woods, she started to miss it even though it hadn't been a month since she left. The landscape, air, and smell. Every moment in this fiefdom was another moment of nostalgia for her home. But right now, as she flung herself in the air from the peak of the construction site, she was shocked to learn that she didn't miss the woods at all. It was all due to the surprisingly familiar feeling that washed over her.

It's similar to the woods. The height. The space, too.

The high-rise building and the pillars felt like tree trunks. And the tied-up rebars that protruded from the building reminded Moira of tree branches.

Jumping in between them feels similar.

Tap! Fwoosh! She jumped to the top of the rebar and surveyed the construction site as though she was hanging from a tree branch. She wondered if the other elves were feeling similar. They, too, had a glimmer in their eyes, which was different when they were on the ground. Everyone hopped and moved around the site as if they were riding the wind. To the others, they looked like they were flying.

Creak. Clank! The elf workers moved and tied the metals in a flash, riding the wind and dancing and sliding. And when they had to move from one floor to another, they did acrobatics.

Fwoosh! Moira threw herself out of the building, the ground just dozens of feet below. But she didn't plummet to the ground. She had already decided before the leap where she would land. The fall safety net.

Tap! Her feet touched the edge of the net, and she was sent high in the air again. The momentum sent her to the lower floor in no time, and she picked up the tool she had forgotten there. The process was the same when she went back up.

Tap! She kicked the safety net and stepped on the wall, the sheer speed letting her defy gravity and run up the building. Stretching her arm, she grabbed the window sill and entered the building through it. It took her only about two seconds to climb this high without taking the stairs. However, even though Moira just showed an exploit that no ordinary humans could ever perform so easily, the other elves were nonchalant about it. After all, what she did looked as natural as walking to them. What was more, the elves perfectly showcased what they had learned from Lloyd despite their intense movements.

My goodness. They're better than I expected them to be.

Lloyd's jaw dropped as he supervised the construction site. He wondered if those elves were born to be rebar workers. They were that wonderful.

I did a great job by bringing them here. With their current competence, Lloyd could assuredly leave the site to them. There was no more need for supervision. But since mistakes are unavoidable even for the best masters, I better take precautions and lay a thick pad of hay on the ground just in case.

The elves could fall under the safety net by mistake. And so, Lloyd thought to himself that he should take another preventive measure. But when he went down, he found the orc warriors cheering in the courtyard as they stared at the ongoing construction.

"Awesome! Oink!"

"Elves are the best, oink!"

“I was so scared to go up there, oink!”

“My girlfriend scolded me every night, oink!”

“My wife scolded me, oink!”

“My son scolded me, oink!”

“Liars! These guys are all single! oink!”

Thanks to the great work of the elves, the orcs were liberated from the rebar work and their fear of heights.

They are unimaginably fast as well. At this speed, we might be able to put up eight stories of Building 102 before it gets colder.

The winter was coming near, and Lloyd was secretly worried about it. Once the freezing winter began, the cement could no longer be deposited after the temperature dropped below 32 degrees.

It will freeze and thaw.

This was a phenomenon that had to be watched out for at any construction site.

Since water is used to make concrete, it will solidify into ice once the temperature goes below freezing. So, even before the concrete itself can dry up, the moisture inside it will condense and become ice.

If the concrete dried in that state, it would create ice particles and molecules from the water. That was fine in the winter since it remained frozen. But once the winter passed and the climate got hotter, the particles would melt, and the finished concrete would be left wet from the defrosted water molecules.

If that happens, the construction will be a failure. The concrete structure will dip below the designed strength. As a result, the concrete can crack, crumble and collapse, erode the rebars, or worse, bring about the pop-out phenomenon, where concrete blocks as big as fists tear out. In other words, a disaster will unfold. The building will be useless. And if it's an apartment complex with about 1,000 residents in it... Ugh, the mere thought of it is just horrible.

Lloyd shuddered at the thought, his shoulders trembling. But now that he saw the speed at which the elves worked, he knew that he was free from such concerns.

The weather has been fine until now. So, we must finish the eighth floor in the next few days before it gets colder.

Lloyd encouraged the workers on the construction site with such determination. He sometimes coaxed and pushed the elf workers. Thanks to their hard work, the eighth floor, which had been slow in progress, was finished in no time, and the concrete was deposited there just within eight days.

Great. I love it.

Lloyd was greatly satisfied. Building 102 was erected on the top floor before the freezing winter came, so Lloyd was able to finish the insulation and heating of Building 101 and 102 during winter.

Building 101 and 102 will become a prototype. And based on their age and experience, I'm going to construct Building 103 to make sure I have another source of cash.

Lloyd pushed ahead to the next part of the process. It was the heating project of Building 101, which he had postponed for a while.

"So mix the bean oil with this precious sap?"

"Yeah."

The key to upgrading the insulation in the heating pipes was the Elensia Tree sap, and Lloyd poured some drops of it into the bean oil. This invited Javier's strange glances as though he was asking what on earth he was doing.

“Do we have a lot of Elensia sap? No, not at all. It’s a waste to use it as it is. And besides, there’s no need to do that,” said Lloyd.

“Is that why you’re diluting it with water?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.”

“But why bean oil out of all the other ingredients?”

“Since it’s cheap and easy to acquire, and it’s waterproof.”

What’s more, was the smell. It was nutty. And so, Lloyd mixed the sap and bean oil. But the ratio was a pickle. 1:1? Of course not. Then, conservatively, 1:10? That wasn’t it either.

“Master Lloyd... You’re not going to say that you ‘mixed’ the liquid when you just put a drop of the sap, are you?” Javier, who was struck dumb as he watched Lloyd, asked.

His response was understandable. Right now, Lloyd was mixing the two at a ratio of 1:99! But Lloyd was nonchalant as he spoke to respond.

“Hey, this is just the way of the world. Go try to buy a drink, and you’ll know it right away. You’ll be thankful if it contains at least one percent of the advertised ingredient.”

Truly, it was the way of the world. Go to any supermarket. Pick up any fruit-flavored drinks or jellies. The wrapper could advertise orange, strawberry, or another fruit in big letters. But if you checked the ingredients, it was common to find the product contained less than one percent of the fruit. Lloyd had been hurt by this realization during his tender youth. The unforgettable lesson of capitalism that hurt him still lived with him to this day. That day, he learned the magic of being a cheapskate.

“So, this is enough. We already tested the performance too,” said Lloyd.

“Is that so?” asked Javier.

“Of course. Take this jar. And the brush.”

“...”

“What are you doing? Come here quickly.”

Lloyd led Javier to the heating room of Building 101, and he pointed at the pipes that extended to the apartment complex.

“Do you see the pipes? Go apply the Elensia insulation cream on these pipes. Now.” ordered Lloyd.

“Technically speaking, they’re bean oil-based cream, aren’t they?” pointed Javier.

“Shush. The one percent is what matters.”

“...”

Lloyd and Javier started to apply the cream on the pipes, fanning them to make sure that they were properly dried. Next, the two wrapped them with a thick blanket of hay and fastened them with a straw rope. And when Lloyd and Javier tested out, the result was extremely satisfactory.

“How is it?” asked Lloyd.

“Right?”

“Yes.”

Prior to this job, the pipes on the eighth floor were cold. But after it was insulated with the Elensia insulation cream, they were warm as though the heating room was right beside them.

This will do. I’m perfectly fine with how it turned out.

The previous insulation was only mixed with wheat straw, chaff, and lime. But now, it was topped with Elensia Tree cream and hay. Lloyd felt the worth of taking special care to wrap the pipes with several different layers. Just then...

“Excuse me, Master Lloyd?” called Javier.

“Hmm?”

Lloyd noticed that the way Javier called him was slightly different.

“You have a favor to ask me, don’t you?”

“...”

“I’m right. I’m completely right,” said Lloyd.

“How did you know?”

“You said ‘Excuse me’ before calling me,” said Lloyd as though it was so obvious.

“...”

“You know, you don’t usually call me like that unless you want something from me.”

Javier didn’t say anything. He simply stared at Lloyd.

“So?” Lloyd asked. “What is this favor of yours?”

“It’s about the refugees.”

“What about them?”

“How about letting those who are disabled or sick move in here first?”

Javier spoke frankly, but there wasn’t any particular reason for doing so. It was just that he remembered the event that happened a few days ago as he touched the warm pipes.

I wonder how that boy taking care of his blind mother is doing right now.

Javier's thoughts flew back to the event, and he recalled the environment the boy and his mother were in. It was lacking. Even though the refugee tents were built with care, they were nonetheless tents. They were uncomfortable even for healthy people. So, it went without saying how much worse it would be for the sick and disabled.

"Since refugees have to live a communal life where everything is exposed... It is my opinion that those who are sick will get better faster when they can peacefully reside in this building," explained Javier.

"Hmm."

Lloyd chewed over Javier's words, and he thought his points were quite reasonable.

"You're right," Lloyd agreed, "it's not helpful to put sick people in a cramped tent."

"Yes, I believe so."

"Then, should we let them move in first to take the bottom three floors? That way it will be easier for them to move up and down," suggested Lloyd.

"I like your idea."

The basic facility for Building 101 was all there. The heating was almost done, and so was the inside of each unit. The communal dining area and bathrooms only required a few more touches, which could be done even while people lived in the building.

Plus, it's going to help to see the residents actually living here.

There could be a discrepancy between reality and the design. Houses were always like that. The noise between units, dew condensation, draught, light, ventilation, etc... The design could miss out on certain elements that make it uncomfortable for the people who live there. As such, these patients can be made to live in the winter first, and Lloyd would observe them. They would be the beta testers for Building 103, whose construction was to begin next spring. Its design could reflect the points of improvement found in Building 101 and would be upgraded to promise greater convenience for residents.

“We should then sort the patients, and those who are sicker will take the first floor,” concluded Lloyd.

The first group of people moved into the building. The patients in the refugee camps were transferred to Building 101, and everyone was touched to be there. Their response was nothing surprising as the monster domino had devastated their houses. They dragged their injured bodies to this fiefdom to live in a refugee tent for several months until a proper home was ready for them. So, it would be strange for them to not break into sobs.

“How grateful I am... I don’t know how to repay this debt...”

The first batch included the kid and his blind mother. She broke into tears as she touched the small unit given to live with her son. Just then...

Ding Dong.

A new message popped in front of Lloyd.

[Monumental construction achievement!]

[You have commanded the construction of the first apartment complex and occupation efforts in the Lorasia Continent.]

[The first batch of residents who moved into the building will be grateful to you for their entire lives, becoming the most faithful residents of this fiefdom.]

[You have left an indelible mark in the history of civil engineering on the Lorasia Continent.]

[You shall be remembered as the pioneer of the apartment complex in history.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[Current RP: 4,783]

It had been quite a while since he acquired RP. Lloyd forcibly pushed away this warm feeling in his heart as he responded cynically to the boy's mother.

"Ha, forget any debt. Raise your son well, and that will be all," said Lloyd.

And this boy would grow up to work for the fiefdom, and Lloyd would use the boy to his benefit. Repeat this process, and it would gradually fatten up Lloyd's cash cows.

Heh. You think I'm building this apartment for free?

Of course not. There was no such thing as a free lunch for Lloyd. There may be so for him. But it was never to be so for others, including these refugees.

But right now, the time isn't ripe yet. Just a little more. Once they settle in my fiefdom and get better, I'm going to put them to work.

They would be made to pay for everything they received from him. Lloyd was envisioning a sweet future in his head when someone panted and rushed to him.

"M-master Lloyd!"

Lloyd turned to find who it was, and it was a servant in the manor.

"Just...! Now!" panted the servant.

"Just what? What's going on? Come breathe now. Speak slowly," urged Lloyd.

"A r-royal messenger is here."

“What? A royal messenger? From the queen?” asked Lloyd.

The servant nodded.

“Yes, and he’s waiting for you, at the manor.”

“...”

When Lloyd heard the arrival of the royal messenger, something tingled inside him. He suddenly had a gut feeling.

Wait a second. Is this...

Lloyd made for the manor with the servant, and when he got there, he spotted the royal messenger chatting with the baron and the baroness. It was the same one that had come here to announce the queen’s order after Lloyd’s accomplishment in Cremo. Although it was the same person, his attitude was different from then.

“It has been a long time.”

The royal messenger was courteous and well-mannered, which was hardly the case back then. He had treated Lloyd with disdain.

“...”

The hunch in Lloyd grew stronger. Feeling the hunch grow into a conviction, Lloyd spoke.

“Please, let us do the procedure first.”

“Yes, let us,” replied the messenger, and he cleared his throat.

He looked around, and one of his men brought a scroll to him. The order of the queen. Lloyd got on one knee and waited for it to be read aloud. And Lloyd predicted that his hunch would be right and that the scroll would contain the very message he expected. At last, the messenger started to read.

“Since time immemorial, I, along with the great sovereigns that came before me, have worked hard to achieve peace and comfort for the nobles and citizens.”

What followed after was the usual stuff. The queen felt the burden of responsibility and that she was working hard day and night. Wretched by the recent disaster, she commended the Frontera barony for its achievements... Yada yada...

The messenger continued to read, complimenting and praising Lloyd with plenty of flowery words. As Lloyd listened to the messenger, his lips moved softly. Soon, his hunch finally developed into conviction. Lloyd continued to murmur softly as the messenger spoke aloud until his words matched the latter.

“Here ye! For the abovementioned achievements, I hereby grant the Frontera barony the status of a county.”

Chapter 133: No Free Lunches (1)

“Here ye! For the abovementioned achievements, I hereby grant the Frontera barony the status of a county.”

Silence ensued right after the messenger ordered forth. No one dared open their mouths. The messenger, his delegation, and Javier... Everyone was silent until a little later when Baron Frontera, who now rose as Count Frontera, started to sob.

The baron immediately covered his mouth in an attempt to smother the choking sound. But it was no use. His wailing couldn’t be contained, and it kept spilling from his muffled lips. As tumultuous emotions rushed through him, his shoulders shivered terribly as a blanket hung outside during a storm.

Goodness... Goodness gracious. How do I make sense of this?!

The count couldn’t believe what he was hearing. But it had to be true. The messenger was standing right in front of him, holding a royal scroll. And the voice reading the order aloud was grave and serious. Everything was actually real and true.

What a blessing to my family...

Count Frontera hung his head lower as he muffled his sobbing. Meanwhile, the messenger continued to declare the order.

“Here ye once more! In accordance with the elevation of status, Frontera county may experience a hierarchic conflict with County Cremo, for it is the central fiefdom in the Cremona region. Therefore, the Frontera county shall be thenceforth directly under the control of the royal palace, separating from the administrative jurisdiction of the Cremona region.”

Oh, this is good.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose up as he heard the announcement.

A direct-controlled city, eh? It's a measure to prevent the hierarchy between the nobles from getting all twisted.

Come to think of it, this measure was an obvious one. The Frontera barony originally fell under the administrative order of Cremona county. But now that the baron had risen to become a count, he now enjoyed the same status as Count Cremo. One region with two count families would only breed conflict as the hierarchy jumbled between Count Cremo and Count Frontera.

So it's better to divide the administrative districts as independent entities. I knew my queen was a genius.

She was not only skilled in sword fighting. Her skill in politics was at another level. And next, the messenger proceeded to enumerate the various benefits that follow the escalation of status.

"Here ye once more! Therefore, the Frontera barony is hereby exempted from taxes to the royal palace for the next 20 years as it has been designated as the hub of reconstructing the eastern region."

Woah!

Lloyd's eyes widened in surprise. There were even more benefits that followed.

"Here ye once more! The royal palace shall assist the Frontera county for the next ten years by allotting supplies and a special budget for it."

Well, well, well!

By now, Lloyd was smiling ear-to-ear. The sweet benefits didn't end with that.

"Here ye once more! The Lacona viscounty, which sits near the Frontera county, shall be designated to fall under the direct control of the new county."

Viscount Lacona... Hahahahaha!!

Lloyd was so overjoyed that his shoulders started to tremble. He almost broke into wild laughter. More benefits followed after that. These included the right to receive investment from the royal Central Bank at the lowest interest rate, participate in the Royal Assembly, marry a member of the royal family, conscript people from lower fiefdoms, and appoint and dismiss lords of lower fiefdoms. These benefits were enumerated consecutively, one after another. Each one was powerful, and it couldn't be compared to the benefits given to a barony.

"With it, I, Queen Magentano, congratulate and bless Count Frontera. January Year 618. Declared by Queen Alicia Termina Magentano in the royal capital Magenta."

Flap! The scroll was closed, and the messenger smiled courteously.

"My sincere congratulations, Count Frontera."

"Oh, my sincere thanks to, I mean... Thank you."

Count Frontera was dazed by this whole situation. He remained in this state as the messenger congratulated him and when the maids and servants sent their wide cheers. Even when the news of the escalation spread all throughout the villages and when he was seated at the dinner table, Count Frontera wondered what had just happened. He simply was bewildered. It was as though his feet and mind were stepping on a cloud. It all felt unreal.

I am... a count?

Count Arcos lifted his spoon, feeling dazed. A scoop of mushroom soup went up, but it fell back on the plate. The baron blankly took another scoop of the soup.

I have never even dared to imagine this scenario.

He considered this an impossibility. Not in his lifetime. I mean, the count thought to himself, I had been suffering from crippling debt just the previous year.

“So we all must be alert from now on.”

“...”

“Excuse me, are you listening to me?”

“Huh?”

Count Frontera heard a voice, and he was jostled out of his trance. He then stared at Lloyd, who was looking at him across from the table. Lloyd chuckled faintly.

“I am sure that you are dazed, and all of this seems unreal. You are not alone,” said Lloyd.

“Yes, um, it is, indeed.”

“Yes, so you must stay alert from now on. That goes the same for me and everyone else.”

“What do you mean, Lloyd?” Count Frontera spoke, and Lloyd’s calm voice brought the same effect on him. He soon regained some calmness. Lloyd continued to speak.

“Because the intent behind raising our fiefdom to the status of a county is very clear.”

“By intent, do you mean Her Majesty’s?” asked the count.

“Yes.” Lloyd grinned. “The monster domino phenomenon destroyed many fiefdoms that sit in the eastern range, and as a result, the refugees flooded here. This means that she plans on designating this place to be in charge of reconstructing the region.”

“Hmm, I see...” said the count.

“We will be busy from now on.”

“I guess we will be.”

Count Frontera nodded his head, and it was indeed true as he listened to his son.

“Her Majesty has raised our status and entrusted us with equally heavy responsibilities. And this means that-”

“We can say goodbye to living a simple life as a noble in a rural province. Our influence has grown bigger.”

The smile on Lloyd’s face slightly turned bitter. Yes, an ascension to the status of a count called for celebration because it came with countless benefits and power. But the duties and responsibilities grew just as much. Their modest lifestyle as a provincial noble family was now gone.

Though we won’t wind up in treason or anything like that.

It would at least be so while Queen Magentano is on the throne because of the title Lloyd had: “The One who Carried the Magentano”.

The title was marked in the unofficial history of the kingdom. And I will be free from any form of suspicion of treason. In one word, this is awesome. The effect is applied throughout the kingdom, and it lasts until the queen steps off her throne.

The effect was a tremendous one. Lloyd even felt that this effect was the best and greatest he had among the other titles.

Since the worst thing to experience as a noble is to get involved in treason.

History proved so. It was also a common theme in historical TV series. Even the most powerful nobles and privileged were beheaded because they schemed treason. Even when the accusations were false and rumored, they were sentenced to a hanging.

It won’t be too different in this world, either.

In short, this effect that freed him from any form of accusation of treason was huge. It was especially so when the baron was receiving considerable attention after being promoted to a count.

“In relation to that, I suggest that we appropriately use our powers as our family status is raised and enjoy more authority,” suggested Lloyd.

“What do you mean by using our powers appropriately? Do you have anything special in mind?”

“Yes.”

“What is it?”

At the count’s question, Lloyd quickly gathered his thoughts. He regarded that it was appropriate for them to get a sweet taste of power now that his family status was raised.

“About Viscount Lacona,” said Lloyd.

“Viscount Lacona?”

“Yes.”

Viscount Lacona had a history of pestering Lloyd and his family, but he was retaliated against by Lloyd. And now, the viscount is paying the water bill. Lloyd decided to give the viscount a bitter taste of power. Thinking such, he smiled in satisfaction.

“Let us summon Viscount Lacona first thing tomorrow morning.”

The following morning rolled around. Viscount Lacona scrambled into the manor, his long mustache dancing as he ran. He had received a visit from a royal messenger the night before, and so he was aware that the baron was promoted as a count and that his viscounty now belonged to the county. The news was a bolt from the blue for Viscount Lacona, who was known for his wealth in the small province.

What...? Baron Frontera, that penniless good-for-nothing, became a count? And he’s my superior now?

Viscount Lacona wanted to dismiss it because it was too unbelievable and dumbfounding. But he had no choice but to swallow the bitter pill as the order came from the queen herself and came into effect as soon as it was declared. Knowing this very well, Viscount Lacona couldn't get a wink of sleep all night.

What's going to happen to me now?

His blanket normally felt fluffy and light in his hands, but now that he was gravely anxious, the blanket felt uncomfortable. It felt heavy, hot, and offensive. The same was true for his pillows and pajamas. Everything felt too uncomfortable.

Haah... Goodness, why did I do that...

Heavy sighs continued to escape from him without any end. He felt particularly guilty about the Frontera barony, and each time he sighed, a panorama of his evil deeds in the past spanned his head. Mortifying Baron Frontera had been part of his daily routine. There was also a time he insulted the baron in a ball. And just recently, he had stirred conflict over the Maritz Land and dared to contaminate the river that flows through the Frontera fiefdom.

What am I supposed to do now?

His future grew bleak with each passing second. He racked his brain, trying to come up with a solution through the night. What am I supposed to do now? He constantly asked. Grovel with a gift? Repent for his past misdeeds with a penitent heart? As the night crawled, he tossed and turned in his bed, his concern growing deeper. And when the morning came, someone from Frontera county arrived to announce that the count wished to see him.

Eeck!

His heart sank. The day had come. He threw on some clothes, darted to the county at lightning speed, and bowed before Arcos Frontera, who was now a count.

“Ehem. It has been a long while, Viscount Lacona,” said Count Frontera.

“M-my honor... to meet you, Your Excellency.”

“Are you uncomfortable?”

“Yes... Eh?”

“You are sweating a lot,” the count pointed out.

“N-no, it’s nothing. My clothes are just a bit too warm... Anyway, congratulations on your promotion, Your Excellency.”

“Hahaha. Thank you. In fact, I summoned you here because I wanted to be congratulated,” said the count.

“I-is that so?”

“Whew, of course not. I am merely pulling your leg.”

“I-I see! Ah, hahaha.”

The viscount was now on one knee, feigning a groveling smile at the count’s corny joke. Doing this made it more real. The loner and underdog among the nobles, Arcos Frontera, was now his superior. And this realization hit him harder when he was called to meet Lloyd in the latter’s office.

“Long time no see, viscount,” Lloyd announced.

“...”

“You have grown thinner, I see. Your color is off, and you now have dark circles under your eyes. Could it be that you have had trouble sleeping these days? My, should I sing a lullaby for you?” joked Lloyd.

“...”

“Oops. My greeting was too long, wasn’t it? Let us get right into business. Please,” said Lloyd, “over here.”

“Th-thank you.”

The viscount sat at the chair Lloyd suggested. He opened and closed his two hands under the table, and his back was ramrod straight, away from the chair. Lloyd noticed this and started to grin.

“Are you nervous, by any chance?” asked Lloyd.

“Not at all.”

“Please sit comfortably. I do not bite,” quipped Lloyd”

“...”

“Yes, just like that. At least your seat should be comfortable.”

Lloyd’s smile brightened. This only made the viscount more nervous. At least my seat should be comfortable? He asked himself. He wondered if that meant that the business that was about to reveal next would only make him uncomfortable. His hunch proved to be true three seconds later.

“Let me get right into business. I think the water bill needs to be increased,” Lloyd said frankly.

“Excuse me...?”

“Goodness. There is no need to be that surprised. The reason is actually simple. Have you noticed that winter will soon be arriving?”

“Y-yes,” said the viscount.

“Then, won’t the water in the water supply freeze as the temperature drops?”

“Yes.”

“That will burst the pipes, won’t it?”

“Yes, yes...”

“What happens if they burst? The clean water, which is used for the dye of the Laconata cloth, will not be supplied, right?”

“Indeed...”

“Therefore,” Lloyd went on, his voice gentle and soft, “I shall have to put extra care to ensure that the pipes will not freeze from the cold. We will continue to manage it. To do that, of course, what do we need? Yes, money. Won’t it obviously use money?”

“...”

“So all these efforts and endeavors are for you, viscount,” said Lloyd as he held up his two hands. “Just imagine it. Who suffers from the damage of a broken water supply? Who’s going to be the one crying? Should I turn a blind eye to it? No. I mean, consider our relationship. Your misfortune is mine, isn’t it?” said Lloyd.

“I-is that so...” murmured the viscount.

“Of course, it is. Thus, my point is that an increase in the water bill following maintenance is inevitable.”

“Then how much do you plan on increasing the-”

“I decided to be modest. I think thrice is good,” announced Lloyd.

“...”

Oh, you deranged thief!

The words almost slipped out of the viscount’s mouth. Lloyd or whatever he’s called was personified evil. He’s a devil, thought the viscount to himself. But he suppressed his raging emotions and exercised divine patience. Clenching his fists hard under the table, Viscount Lacona asked, his voice growing diffident with every word.

“Th...rice?”

“It’s not much, isn’t it?”

“...”

“Right? Aren’t you relieved that the bill was not doubled but tripled, which is finally the reasonable cost of using my invention?”

“...”

“Viscount. I thought we had a good, close understanding of each other,” said Lloyd, smiling in a content manner. He couldn’t be any happier as he spotted the viscount’s face growing redder by the second. But he didn’t feel an iota of guilt as it wasn’t an unreasonable request or exercise of power. Not at all. It also wasn’t a retaliation against the viscount, who had a history of harassing his fiefdom. No.

This is just an extremely realistic measure.

The water bill hike wasn’t a simple emotional attack against the viscount. It was rather an objective decision born out of impartial and unprejudiced analysis. Lloyd made the decision based on the current reality of Frontera county.

We’re now exempted from tax, and the royal palace will keep funding us. But money will be spent to no end. We will continue needing it. I must do my very best to acquire capital.

The Lacona viscounty was now under his fiefdom, and yet, it wasn’t housing the refugees at all. In short, the viscounty was basking in the goodness of the Frontera county, which had protected the former from the monster herds and accommodated the refugees all by itself.

Like I would let that happen under my watch.

United efforts. I help, and you help. This was the principle Lloyd adhered to, so it was only natural for Viscount Lacona to shoulder the cost of housing the refugees. After all, the viscounty was now under the county. And so, what Lloyd did was the most pragmatic measure. Not only that, as far as he was concerned, the viscounty was financially doing good. So, raising the water bill thrice was manageable for them, though it could be burdensome.

“So,” Lloyd added, “I am thinking of ramping up the size of the civil engineering corp for my county. That is, by mostly selecting out of your forces.”

You can’t live in comfort. If I can’t, then you can’t either. I work my head off, and you should do so, too. No, you should work more laboriously than I do. That’s how I will be content. Just like that, Lloyd fired off his requests one after another, strictly adhering to the motto that you can’t be the only one lazing around in the goodness of life.

Chapter 134: No Free Lunches (2)

“C-civil corp, Lord Lloyd?”

“Yes,” Lloyd answered, “You saw who they were, didn’t you?”

“Surely...”

He did. It was around the time Lloyd came here to install the water supply system. It was impressive to see that the corp was composed of seasoned engineers well-versed in civil engineering.

“Um, but why would you conscript my soldiers to expand your corp-”

“Why? Shouldn’t everyone take part in the disaster relief efforts?” asked Lloyd.

“...”

As soon as Viscount Lacona heard Lloyd’s words, he felt a lump in his throat as he realized what the former was saying.

“You mean...”

“Yes, you guessed it right,” agreed Lloyd, “your guess is indeed correct. Why do you think Frontera county has been designated as a special city directly under the control of the palace? Did you not think it is Her Majesty’s plan to designate our county as the central hub to overcome the monster domino situation?”

“...”

“Well, but if you don’t want to lend your hands in the reconstruction efforts, what can I do? But you see, I am starting to look forward to the first quarter report that’s coming up. I shall give a detailed report to Her Majesty about how you stand in strong opposition against the plan to rebuild the region,” drawled Lloyd.

“W-wait a minute, my lord, I didn't mean it that way...” defended Viscount Lacona.

“Well?”

“It’s just that...” the viscount muttered.

“Are you going to send your soldiers or not?”

“...”

Viscount Lacona felt stifled. Technically speaking, what Lloyd was doing wasn’t asking for support. It was a unilateral conscription, but the problem was that Lloyd had a crystal-clear reason for doing this.

The reconstruction effort was ordered by the queen. And the civil engineering corp is at the front of the project. So, if I show my unwillingness by refusing to take part and send my engineers...

Her Highness and the royalty would detest him to the hilt. In the worst-case scenario, he could be regarded as a traitor.

This boy is cunning enough to make me look so in her eyes. Yes, yes. It’s fully possible.

Viscount Lacona shuddered as he looked at Lloyd. Lloyd Frontera. He was an evil guy who had horns growing on his head. It was only obvious that Lloyd would paint him to look like the world’s greatest villain to the queen, and eventually, there would only be tragedy wherein he’d be helplessly thrown into the execution ground. At the prospect, Viscount Lacona was forced to nod.

“Yes, my lord,” acquiesced Viscount Lacona, “Then, how large do you need the troops to be...?”

“I shall leave it to your conscience and sincerity, viscount,” said Lloyd.

“...”

Please just kill me now. Just specify how many men you want from my force.

Viscount Lacona wanted to cry. When Lloyd saw the flustered expression on the viscount's face, he beamed. He knew that "anything" was the most troublesome answer. The same thing happened when someone asked another what they wanted to eat. And Lloyd did just that right now. He intentionally gave a vague answer, leaving the size of the dispatch crew up to the viscount's conscience and sincerity. Lloyd was certain that his answer would heavily burden the viscount. And he spoke something afterward to add another weight to the viscount's already troubled and burdened heart.

"Decide for yourself the scale of support as well," said Lloyd. "Then, submit a report by noon."

"A report...? And by noon, my Lord?"

"Yes," stated Lloyd.

"How many should I put in there-"

"I said, I will leave it up to you. I suppose it will depend on your conscience and sincerity. The number should be appropriate enough to keep this friendship of ours. Put the number that will not make me woeful. Got it?" asked Lloyd.

"..."

"Then, let's move to the next agenda."

Lloyd happily flipped the documents, revealing his plans to the viscount. These were mainly about the scope of assistance the viscount should provide to the county. They included the food and clothes for the refugees, logs and other materials needed for various constructions, and temporary recruitment of skilled workers. Although the plan was entitled "Plan for Support and Temporary Recruitment," in actuality, it was a unilateral order, and its rightful name was "Plan for Exploitation."

However, there was no way for Viscount Lacona to overturn the negotiation table and start a fight. He didn’t have any reason or capacity to resist Lloyd. He could only give a tired nod.

“Yes... My Lord.”

Viscount Lacona berated himself. He shouldn’t have led such an evil life. It was wrong of him to ignore and treat his neighboring lord badly just because he was poor. He felt a pang of bone-crushing regret, but the realization came much too late.

Of course. I have a principle of knocking my enemy dead without any mercy.

People didn’t change, so there was no reason to try. It was especially the case when someone acted with bad intent. Once you showed your weakness, they would stab you in the back again. Lloyd knew this from experience. He had learned this bitter lesson when he lived in his tiny rental room in South Korea.

The guy who used the room next to mine was a total douche.

It was around the time when Lloyd had just moved into the rental room. The room next to his was occupied by a nutcase. The guy was preparing for the civil servant exam, and he blared music every night. It wasn’t just loud. It was blaring, the noise coming out from the luggage-sized woofer speakers. Boom. Boom. Boom. The low cacophony hit the walls and floors and could be heard from Lloyd’s room. No, the vibration was so heavy that Lloyd could feel it from his bed, and a pair of cheap earplugs from a convenience store wasn’t enough to deafen the din. Unable to bear it any longer, Lloyd brought the matter to the manager. But it barely worked. The villain was quiet only for a day. The racket resumed the next day. Left with no patience, Lloyd eventually knocked on his neighbor’s door to confront the matter face-to-face. But to Lloyd’s dismay, he was punched in the face.

That guy was one heck of a weirdo.

The punch came so fast that Lloyd received the full blow. The world around him swirled, and his eye was bruised black. But before it could develop into a full-fledged fight, the manager came just in time to stop them. But Lloyd was dismayed and dumbfounded. He bawled that he would sue the guy for assault.

The color of that mongrel's face changed in a flash, and he started to beg me in tears.

The guy begged for mercy so pitifully that Lloyd believed that the guy realized his fault. The guy pleaded to Lloyd that he would be kicked out of the room if he paid the fine since he'd be out of money for rent. He implored him to let this slide and save his life. He was on his knees, tearing up.

The sight of him softened me.

Suddenly feeling inhumane, Lloyd made the terrible choice of forgiving the guy. But one month later, Lloyd regretted that he did as the woofer speaker came back again!

Crap. Thinking about it pisses me off to this day.

Lloyd felt his face burn as he dwelled on the past. Reflecting on the annoying experience reminded him that Viscount Lacona was the same as his former neighbor. Lloyd could forgive and tolerate the viscount once. But as soon as Lloyd showed any signs of weakness, the latter would stab him in the back. Strong against the weak, and weak against the strong. Lloyd knew who the viscount was. A groveler in the presence of the powerful. A devil in the presence of the weak. That was what Viscount Lacona was.

So, there will be no forgiveness.

Lloyd determined that he would gradually exploit and hang the viscount out to dry every chance he got. He will imprint a clear message in the latter's bones and souls that Lloyd was the superior being. Tilting his head, he stared at Viscount Lacona.

“Are you upset about the measures I have taken today?” asked Lloyd.

“N-no, my Lord,” said the viscount, his eyes trembling.

“Are you sure?”

“Yes...”

“I am very relieved. You are too generous,” answered Lloyd.

“T-thank you. Then, I shall leave now-”

“You’re leaving so soon?”

“Oh, yes, my Lord,” said the viscount.

“Hmm, that makes me a bit sad.”

“...”

“While you’re here, why don’t you put Sir Curno standing behind you in a duel against Javier. It would improve his skills and strengthen their friendship as they train. All these meetings and activities. It’s all to deepen our connections, isn’t it?” said Lloyd, his voice dripping with amusement.

Flinch! Sir Curno, who was silently standing behind the viscount, flinched, his shoulders trembling. This made the corners of Lloyd’s lips rise upward.

“Oh, didn’t you bring him with a diaper on? Then, I guess he can’t fight against Javier.”

“...”

“I am joking. Hahaha! You know it was a joke, right? I mean, it’s between us.”

“Ah, hahaha... Yes, it’s between us.”

One foolish move and he would die. Everything would be taken away. Viscount Lacona felt this in every fiber of his being as he noticed that not a single joy was held in Lloyd's eyes as he smiled.

Gulp.

Lloyd's gaze wasn't just chill, it was icy. Viscount Lacona was forced to put on a smile, but his face looked like he wanted to cry. The situation was at a standstill until he was allowed to leave the manor after a long while of currying favors with Lloyd.

"Whew."

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction after saying goodbye to the viscount.

Very good. I broke his spirit just enough. I also got a lot out of him.

The water bill jumped thrice, and the viscount promised his men to Lloyd's civil engineering corp and clothes and materials for the construction. All the resources were planned to be used to run the refugee camp and develop the fiefdom.

So, I have to start moving now.

It was time to move on to the next part of the plan. Lloyd took a box that sat in the corner of his office, and he made it for the refugee camp with Javier.

"Oh? Master Lloyd?"

A group of soldiers was getting ready to ration lunch, but they stopped when they saw Lloyd approaching. Lloyd waved his hand at them.

"Yes, it's me. Don't mind me. Continue what you're doing."

"..."

But there was no way that they could do that. In any workplace, the workers became busy at the appearance of their boss. They quickened their stirring with a ladle, and the soup and bread were served at a faster speed. The food trays and spoons were laid on the table in a flash. Lloyd smiled wryly at the sight of this.

I kind of feel sorry.

The rationing soldiers hastened their work because Lloyd had shown up. Lloyd fully empathized with them because he, too, had undergone this before.

Especially in the military. The division commander and politicians really stirred things up in my base when they decided to visit us during the holidays.

Supposedly, Lloyd and his comrades should be left to enjoy the holiday and rest as much as they want, basking in the goodness of the national holiday. But when the higher-ups, such as division or corp commanders or politicians, came to visit, every single one of the soldiers was thrown to spotlessly clean the facilities in the base in gratitude for their visit. As such, they had to drop everything and work as they bid farewell to enjoying their holiday in peace.

I can't be as shameless as them. I should quickly finish my business and leave.

The soldiers were hurrying things unnecessarily. Lloyd pushed aside the apologetic feelings he had had for them for a while and looked around to do what he came here for. The place was jam-packed with refugees, who lined up to receive food. He walked over to them and hovered, which was enough to create a stir among them.

"Wait, isn't it him?"

"Who?"

"Well, who else? It's Master Lloyd. The son of the Count."

"Oh! Him?"

The man gazed at Lloyd as he pointed with his finger. He confirmed that it was indeed Master Lloyd. The murmuring spread further.

“It really is. It’s Master Lloyd. It’s really him.”

“From what I heard, he was the one who convinced the count to take us in here, right?”

“That’s what I heard, too. And this refugee camp was made by him as well.”

“And he’s the one who built the warm floor...”

Slowly, the line of people started to jumble, and they started to surround Lloyd. The murmuring started to develop into words of gratitude.

“It’s really him! Master Lloyd!”

“Thank you! You saved my son!”

“Same here! My family is safe and warm because of you! Thank you! Thank you so much!”

The clamor spread fast across the refugee camp. Those who were standing in the other rationing area started gathering closer. Soon, more than thousands of them gathered up to take a peek at Lloyd.

This is massive.

A sense of overwhelming awe gripped Javier, who was walking beside Lloyd. He had never seen anything like this. Thousands of people gathered and rushed to meet one person and thank him and promise to return the favor. Some came running bare feet. Some teared up. Some held Lloyd’s hands with their wrinkled hands. Each time, Lloyd returned every single one of them with a merciful smile and gaze. The sight was truly heartwarming. And so...

It looks like Master Lloyd has something up his sleeve.

Javier’s eyes narrowed, and his eyes held a glint of doubt. The Lloyd he knew would never put on a magnanimous smile for no reason.

He’s small-hearted. A miser. The worst kind there is.

It was true. Lloyd detested even the smallest of losses. The loss of a single coin or a button vouched for a few days of grumbling. As such, he was the worst kind of miser there was in the entire world.

Yet, he willfully accommodated thousands, tens of thousands of refugees. Did he do so because of the order from the queen? For the long-term prospect of them assimilating here? Sure, maybe. But given Master Lloyd’s personality... There has to be something more.

There was just no way for Lloyd to give up on all his hard work and effort even if the order had come from the queen and was beneficial in the long run. If Javier had to pick one person that was farthest away from being a philanthropist, he would confidently pick Lloyd.

And yet, he’s smiling and chuckling as he savors the gratitude of the refugees? When he’s the nastiest bastard here? No way.

Javier knew best as he closely watched how petty and sly that person was. There was something he wanted for sure. Thinking so, Javier narrowed his eyes and observed him. And later, his prediction became true when Lloyd fished a thick wad of papers from the box he had brought from his office.

“Yes, yes, thank you for gathering up here on your own. So, may I please have your attention? Will you please take a look at the contracts here?”

Flip. Flip. Lloyd waved the contracts toward the refugees, and an evil smile, terrible enough to make even the worst scrooges bashful, bloomed on Lloyd’s face.

Chapter 135: No Free Lunches (3)

“Now, this is what you call a contract.”

Flip. Flip. Lloyd waved his hands, and the contracts fluttered in them. The gaze of the refugees darted toward them, and he continued to speak.

“What for? You might ask. Well, I won’t beat around the bush. I will be straightforward. It’s about the request to participate in the construction of the terraced rice fields in the eastern mountain range.”

“...”

Terraced rice fields in the mountain range? What? The name was long and complicated. Most refugees tilted their heads, and a wry smile formed on Lloyd’s face.

“I will call it the ‘Reclamation Participation Application’ for brevity.”

“...”

Aha. This enlightened them some more. The young master planned on reclaiming a land, so he brought a bundle of application papers. But why? The refugees looked at one another. Lloyd continued to speak.

“It’s for your sake. How so? By helping you get settled here. That way you won’t live forever in this crowded and narrow camp. You’ll be able to attain land for your family to make money off of and live again as decent human beings even after you move into the apartment complex,” explained Lloyd.

“...”

“I am sure that you don’t wish to live in this state forever,” said Lloyd.

Lloyd’s words, which were like a pebble, were hurled at them. The small pebble created a ripple in their hearts, and so they thought to themselves that he was right. Actually, they were starting to get sick of living like a penniless beggar.

My life is worth more than this...

It was what the refugees were feeling in their hearts. They were currently reduced to living as refugees without any land or a proper house in their possession. And “refugee” was a flowery way to call them. They were actually beggars forever doomed to depend on the unilateral kindness of the Frontera fiefdom. Their bleak future was despairing as the majority of them knew who they were before coming here. Some of them were once landowners, while some were farmers who had worked together with their families. Some were woodcutters. Some were shepherds. Even though their lives were modest, they led a rewarding and industrious life and put their own food on the table. In short, none of them had been a beggar, dependent on a refugee camp, until they came here. And no one wanted to remain in such a state in the future too.

Of course. That’s human nature.

Lloyd knew that people would rather work and sweat while living in their own houses rather than live a lazy life in an organized tent that was filled with strangers. They would rather live happily under one roof with their families, and that wish was only natural.

I thought the same as well.

Just then, Lloyd recalled the time when he was in South Korea, particularly the time when he lost his parents and home. It was the most wretched juncture of his life.

I had nowhere to go.

At first, he lived off his friends, lodging in their rooms. He did so in the spirit of friendship but soon learned that it couldn’t last long. Though his friends said it was okay, he felt self-conscious around them and thought it couldn’t continue. So, he left his friend’s room to stay in the student club room. But he soon regretted that.

I was more self-conscious there.

As such, Lloyd worked his head off doing part-time jobs and saved up whatever he could. He then moved into a rental room. Although he was more physically exhausted, it gave him a bigger peace of heart.

What I needed was my own private space where I could be free. I suppose the same goes for the people here.

Once they had their own spaces, they wouldn't have to be extra careful around each other, and that would help their pride. Lloyd decided to take advantage of their psychology and turn it into an impetus for growth. And that plan was the reclamation project which Lloyd had just announced.

"It's simple. Just participate in the reclamation project, and those who work hard will receive a portion of the reclaimed land. That is, you will be able to farm and settle there. And my promise will be vouched in this contract," explained Lloyd.

Flap! Lloyd waved the contract again, setting up the table before the murmur died down.

"Okay, first come, first serve!" yelled Lloyd. "You might lose the opportunity to work if you're late!"

The words "First come, first serve" worked. These magical words brought about a powerful effect, and the refugees, who were drawn to them, started to sit at the table one after another.

"So, young master, I can work if I sign the paper here?" asked an applicant.

"Of course, you can," Lloyd answered with a smile.

"But what work would I do?"

"You will be participating in constructing terraced fields."

"By constructing, do you mean-"

“Shoveling, pickaxing, or scooping and moving dirt. Have you never shoveled before?”

“I have, and I’m used to it. You see, I spent my entire life messing with dirt.”

“Great,” said Lloyd. “The talent I was looking for.”

“I-is that so?” murmured the applicant.

“Of course. That’s why you should sign here.”

“Oh, yes.”

One contract was signed.

“Um... Can girls work, too?”

“Of course. Work doesn’t discriminate.”

“Then, I am in,” said the woman.

“What about your husband?”

“He hurt his back.”

“I see,” said Lloyd. “Must have been tough. Just sign here.”

Two contracts were signed”

“We brothers want to participate!”

“Um, I don’t think that’s possible,” denied Lloyd.

“Eh? Why not?”

“One person for every family. You see, I expect to receive a flood of applicants.”

“Then....”

“Wait, did you expect to earn a bigger piece of land if all of you participated in the project?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes...”

“Well, you thought wrong. What you can do is take turns among your brothers. Then, you will be able to earn the same amount of land for less work. Be satisfied with that for now,” suggested Lloyd as he looked at the paper.

“...”

“Don’t you like it?” Lloyd added as he looked up at the applicant.

“O-of course! I will do it.”

“Okay. Sign here.”

Three. Five. Ten. A hundred. A thousand. The signed contracts started to pile up, making Lloyd put on a content smile on his face.

Sweet. I like their reaction, and the contracts are progressing smoothly.

Lloyd was destined to house the refugees regardless of his will anyway. And they would be settled here eventually. Now, they were made to join the development of the reclaimed land naturally and legally. A win-win situation for everyone.

“Did you visit the camp to get these contracts signed?”

“Yeah, of course.”

On the way back to the refugee camp, Javier asked Lloyd as he carried a box loaded with contracts. Lloyd shrugged at the former’s question.

“There is no such thing as a free lunch anyway,” answered Lloyd.

“...”

“What? Why? What? Do you think that I’m sly?”

“No. However-”

“Just for a second, I was relieved that you were born in a rural province like this.”

“Eh? What do you mean by that now?” asked Lloyd in confusion.

Lloyd turned around and faced Javier, who was putting on a mysterious smile on his face.

“If you were born in the capital, you would have become a terrible swindler,” stated Javier.

“...”

“Or a groveling disloyal subject.”

Lloyd was lost for words.

“Or a infamous swindler who cons people with his silver tongue.”

“Ha. Is that how you think of me?” said Lloyd with defiance in his voice.

“Yes.”

“This entire time?”

“Yes.”

“Dang. You didn’t even hesitate.”

“I am simply being honest.”

But soon, Javier grinned. He then uttered something that caught Lloyd by surprise.

“But I am relieved and thankful that you put your tricks to good use,” said Javier.

Lloyd didn’t say anything. He simply looked at Javier.

“Why are you making that face?” asked Javier.

“I am just figuring out whether what you said was an insult or a compliment.”

“It’s an insult for sure,” retorted Javier.

“I knew it was.” Lloyd snapped his fingers.

“Aren’t you going to lash out at me?”

“No, because I missed the timing. You know, it’s unseemly to get angry belatedly.”

“It was,” said Javier, “actually a compliment.”

“I don’t believe you.”

“Are you sure?”

“What, you want me to break into tears right now?” asked Lloyd.

“Please do hold back your tears. I do not think I can bear seeing it.”

“Right? I think so, too.”

A scoff escaped Lloyd. And the two walked side by side, and Lloyd thought about how the Frontera family used to suffer from crippling debt. The place had previously been nothing but a rural provincial fiefdom. But now, it was prospering. He wondered how much they had changed. Did we become better people? Lloyd asked himself. But Lloyd and Javier didn’t have a way of knowing the answer.

The following morning rolled around, and Lloyd kickstarted the reclamation project. The first step, like always, was surveying.

Whew. The slope is steeper than I thought.

It was early morning, but Lloyd climbed the foot of the eastern mountain range after passing the coal mine. He headed to the land he would terrace, and he surveyed the slope, soil, and water in detail, leaving nothing behind.

The construction is going to be meticulous, but this place is the best option I have.

Some might inquire Lloyd about the rationale behind reclaiming the foot of the mountain. There were other lands in the fiefdom anyway. There were flat lands. Some might even cast doubt on his plan as if Lloyd was doing something beyond them. But the truth was that the Frontera fiefdom didn’t have much land left to reclaim on a massive scale.

The development in the south is already finished. Then, there’s the Maritz Land. As for the west... It’s not ours. Even if we’re now a county, we can’t touch the land outside the fiefdom without permission. It is possessed by Her Majesty.

It would be treason to reclaim land that wasn’t his. Of course, he wouldn’t be accused of being a traitor. But it warranted enough rebuke and scandal.

No need to take such a political risk. So that leaves me with the land in the north, but it’s not really suitable for agriculture.

Actually, Lloyd thought about reclaiming the land in the north, but he scrapped the plan when the apartment complex construction began. The soil there turned out to be worse than he expected.

It wasn’t conducive to farming. The land was only suitable for weeds.

So, in short, the only land left in his choice was the foot of the eastern mountain range. It was fertile and had long been accumulated with leaves and leaf mold. That was why cleaning up the trees and plants and flattening the land promised productivity. What was more, it wasn't owned by the royal palace even though it sat outside the fiefdom territory. As such, successfully developing this part of the land would grant Lloyd with bragging rights, in which he could confidently say that he expanded the queen's territory.

So this is the perfect place. I should also leave some of the lands in the fiefdom empty for later.

There were some undeveloped lands between the villages, and they were meant to be used either for residential or commercial districts. Lloyd had to save them up for the future of the fiefdom, where he would design the place based on the blueprint of the new city in South Korea. He surveyed the area with that in mind. Once it was finished, it was time to decide how to construct it. So Lloyd removed himself from the world for the next few days and remained alone in his bedroom, deeply thinking about it as he stared at the survey results.

Retaining walls. It's the crux of this reclamation project.

The foot of the mountain was steep, and Lloyd meant to create agricultural land there. He referred to the rice terrace that was common in Southeast Asia. But to his grief, he lacked knowledge of the terrace fields, so he couldn't follow it haphazardly.

I might as well do it my way. Okay. Just think of this as a large-scale construction of several consecutive retaining walls.

The retaining walls were found easily. In mountains and hills, concrete walls stood to prevent the earth from falling. They were common everywhere in mountain villages, highways, and national roads. But constructing it wasn't as simple as it looked.

The job of putting it up looks so simple because it's common. One may even think that it simply involves planting some walls on the ground. But it's not.

It’s never easy. One wrong calculation or fault in the construction, and the whole thing crumbles to pieces.

If it happened, the roads would be destroyed and houses would get buried. A landslide would occur. As such, the retaining walls required meticulous calculation and accurate construction.

But we can still do it. I just need to use my design skills.

The big terrace fields. And each vertical retaining wall would hold a large number of floors. He decided to construct a gabion.

That’s the best option we have.

If one drove through the national roads or highways in South Korea, some areas in the mountains were cut, wrapped in wire mesh, and filled with rocks. There was even a warning, “Falling Rocks.” That was one form of gabions.

Relatively, it’s simple to construct. I just need to create a wire mesh and throw thick pebbles and broken stones into them.

At first, Lloyd thought about constructing a general concrete retaining wall. But he couldn’t do so for two reasons.

The construction is happening in the middle of winter. It’s too cold. It’s going to freeze and melt for sure. The cement won’t be able to deposit properly. Plus, Bangul needs some rest. She’s been overusing her volcanic skill during our apartment complex construction.

Bangul was now thoroughly exhausted, and if Lloyd forced her to work and continue using the volcanic skill...

I can’t. It’s better that she rests for a while. Her butt is going to hurt otherwise.

Even though it was for work, she needed to give a rest to the breaking wind. So, Lloyd racked his brain for a new solution.

Wait... there's one more problem in building the gabion.

It was the material to be used for the wire mesh.

How about using wires? No. Bangul needs to rest. Metal bars? I've got nothing left. I'm barely meeting the demand for the apartment right now with what I have. Then, ropes? Nah. It won't do. It's too loose, and long exposure to the sun will make it soggy and weak.

Lloyd furrowed his brows hard. Nothing came to his mind.

Even if I use wires for the wire mesh, I'm faced with another issue. I need to gild it in iron. Otherwise, it's going to get rusty, and if that happens… It's going to crumble, tear, blow up, and the wall will topple down, hurting families and my fiefdom... No. I can't let that happen.

Actually, Lloyd could gild it in iron. But that would cost an arm and a leg. His finances were limited at the moment even with the funds received from the royal palace.

So let's just leave the iron gilding as a last resort. The best alternative is to find a cost-effective method or new material.

From then on, Lloyd spent all day trying to come up with a solution. What could be used to build a wire mesh for the gabion? Not wires gilded in iron. It was expensive. Lloyd needed something cheap, tenacious, robust, and free from erosion.

Think... Ugh. Think!

Lloyd deliberated. A day passed. Two days sped by. But even after three and four days passed by, Lloyd couldn't come up with anything suitable. At the dining table, he simply nibbled his food, and a ubiquitous furrow sat between his brows all day. The fantastical creatures, who always followed Lloyd, grew concerned.

"Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong?"

Unable to watch any longer, Ppodong decided to work up the courage and dared to give advice to Lloyd, who was deep in thought.

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

“What...? Are you suggesting that I pick a new friend?”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong nodded his round head zealously. Lloyd, who had his chin propped against the desk, turned his head toward Ppodong.

“Do you mean the random game?”

“Ppodong!”

“What? Are you saying that I should expect that a new friend will come out to solve my concern? Hoping that this new friend can create a robust material that can be used as wire mesh?”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Hmm... I’m not so sure that would work,” sighed Lloyd.

“Ppodong?”

“Since it’s all random, no one knows what kind of a fantastical creature will come out.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“Do you really think that it would give me exactly the one I want? I’m kind of skeptical about it.”

The Random Summon Game was really random. It was just as the name suggested.

“So what I’m saying is... We’ve been lucky all this time, but there’s no guarantee that we’ll be struck with another one.”

Lloyd chuckled and smiled, as this was the truth. He thought that it was all luck when he summoned Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang. But just then, Bangul, who was quietly watching the two talk, slithered forward.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul. Bangul!”

“What...? That’s not the case?”

“Bangul!”

Bangul nodded, and the three started talking in the order they were in.

“Hamamang? Hamang! Hamamang!”

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong!”

“Bangul!”

The fantastical creatures advised Lloyd as they stood side by side. Lloyd’s eyes widened as he listened to them.

“What...? I didn’t know there was a special way to affect the outcome of the game!”

Chapter 136: Premium Random Game (1)

“What...? I didn’t know there was a special way to affect the outcome of the game!”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

The three fantastical creatures nodded their round heads. The three nodded so hard that their fat bellies shook. Lloyd rose suddenly, and fixing his posture, he spoke.

“Affect the probability? Wait, do you mean that I can up the chances of picking the fantastical creature I want?”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“...”

Their voices brimmed with confidence. Since these creatures never lied, their answer had to be true.

Oh, in that case… this is going to be very helpful.

Lloyd quickly did the math. Right now, he was deliberating about the material to be used for the wire mesh of the gabion retaining wall. But if a fantastical creature that could do the job came out, the problem would be solved. From any way he looked at it, it was a jackpot for Lloyd.

“Then,” said Lloyd expectantly, “can you tell me how I can do it?”

“Ppodong!” Ppodong beamed. “Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong!”

“Eh? I just have to desperately want it?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

“...”

“Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong?”

“Okay,” said Lloyd, “so all I need to do is envision a fantastical creature with a certain power of my desire, and it’s going to affect the result of the game...”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong nodded again as he tapped his belly.

“Ppo-do-dong. Ppodong!”

Ppodong was saying that he was the proof, adding that it was the same case for Bangul and Hamang. Lloyd’s skepticism started to dwindle as he listened to the creatures.

Hmm... It sounds sensible.

Does my strong desire affect the outcome? It sounded absurd, but as Lloyd heard Ppodong’s words and his experience with the game, he realized that it could be true.

Truly, I’ve been very lucky.

Indeed he was. Ppodong. Bangul. Hamang. Each of them was summoned with skills Lloyd needed the most at the time.

When I needed to excavate the land, Ppodong came out. For tunnels, Bangul was summoned, and I got Hamang when I had to get rid of the water in the Maritz Wasteland.

Up until now, he simply considered himself lucky. A blessing and nothing more. Lloyd thought that he was being compensated for all the times he had lost the lottery back in South Korea. But it turned out that wasn't the case.

I wasn’t just lucky. What affected the chances of the game was my dire wish in my unconscious mind. The images I unconsciously drew in my head as I played the game.

Just then, Lloyd saw hope. He started to think that it was doable. He, thus, made a decision.

“Okay, I made up my mind,” said Lloyd as he flashed a big smile toward his three friends. “Let’s play the fourth round of the random game.”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

Lloyd’s words elated Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang. Ppodong brought out a welcome sign on his own while Bangul opened a tent. Hamang got ready to throw confetti in the air.

“Woah... Did you prepare for this all this time?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“To use it on the day a new friend arrives?”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“But I won’t be summoning here. We’re in the bedroom,” said Lloyd.

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“Okay, okay, hold on. Wait, to the training hall? Now?”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“Hey. We can’t go out now. Why don’t we wait until no one’s around?”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“It’s afternoon right now, so there’ll be a lot of people. People think that I summoned you all through magic. So, it’s best to be unseen when I play the game.”

It surely was the case. No one, including the count and countess, Javier, and people in the fiefdom, knew about the RP system. They all thought that Lloyd was a well-trained magician.

“So, let’s head to the training hall past midnight after putting Javier to sleep. Okay?” suggested Lloyd.

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“You know you can put them down for now.”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“But we have hours until it’s midnight,” pointed Lloyd.

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“...”

It dawned on Lloyd that they had waited for their new friend for a long time. Hours passed, and he headed down to the training hall under the moonlight. He imagined the capability of the fantastical creature in his head.

I want someone who can create wire mesh. Or someone who can create a material that can replace a wire mesh.

Lloyd tried his best to envision the image of the creature in all his earnestness. And he opened the random game menu.

Ding Dong.

[Random Summon Game]

[Spend RP to pick a summon.]

[A strong and unique summon partner will provide their unwavering loyalty along with a wide range of skills to their master.]

[Cost of the 4th Random Summon Game = 150 RP]

[Current RP: 4,783]

Okay. I have plenty of RP.

Lloyd had saved up the RP like the miser he was, never using it unless there was an emergency. Thanks to his spending habit, he was able to amass a whopping amount of about 5,000 RP.

[Would you like to start the random summon game?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes. Let's gooo!

There was no reason to hesitate. He selected "YES" as he thought about the capability of the fantastical creature.

[The random summon game is starting.]

Fwoosh! A blinding light appeared in the air, and it rotated as it engulfed the darkness. Lloyd stooped a little as he saw it. Relaxing his shoulders, he stared at the lump of light, and his posture looked like an outfielder waiting for the ball to come.

Something's going to burst out.

It was always the case. The blinding light would flash brightly, and a new fantastical creature would come out to his embrace as it shouted its name.

It'll probably be the same this time too.

Lloyd waited as he stared at the lump of light. He waited for the new fantastical creature to come out and land in his embrace. But...

Psh... Psh...

The light stopped rotating, and it grew hazy until it vanished. Nothing burst out of the light. In its stead, a message appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

Ding Dong.

[Sorry! Looks like you weren’t so lucky this time. Please look forward to the next game. <3]

“...”

Whoosh. The cold night air blew. No one spoke at length until Lloyd finally burst out in awkward laughter.

“Ahaha... It happens. I mean, it’s random. Don’t you think so?” uttered Lloyd.

“Ppo...dong!”

Ppodong smiled awkwardly as he put down the welcome sign. Lloyd pulled himself together.

That’s right. I mean, it’s random. So, it’s possible that I won’t win.

Yes, yes, indeed. Lloyd considered that he was just lucky all this time. He should not be too perturbed by this. Thinking so, he opened the menu to play the game again.

[Cost of the 5th Random Summon Game = 225 RP]

[Current RP: 4,633]

[Would you like to start the random summon game?]

[YES / NO]

Great. I’m not going to fail this time!

Lloyd’s determination grew stronger than before. It was fiercer, and he was more desperate. He conjured an image in his head and selected YES.

[The random summon game is starting.]

Fwoosh! A pale light appeared once again in the air, rotating hard and illuminating the area around it. Lloyd gulped dryly.

Please!

But his wish was in vain. The light grew faint until the terrible message appeared again in front of his eyes.

[Sorry again! Looks like you weren't so lucky this time. Please look forward to the next game. <3]

Whoosh.

An air of awkwardness hung in the air around them.

What the? Every fiber of his soul was disturbed. It was as if someone had decided to add pineapples to his pizza without asking. Total chaos. Lloyd muttered aloud.

"Hey."

"..."

"I thought earnest yearning would give me what I want."

"..."

Bangul quietly folded the welcome banner. Lloyd bit his lips hard.

Okay, stay calm. Stay calm.

He shouldn't be swayed. This was nothing but the result of random chance. Today was not his lucky day. He was just paying for the times he was lucky. So, the third try would work.

"Whew."

Lloyd collected his thoughts and decided to trust his fantastical creatures once more. There was just no way he would not win on the third try, he thought to himself. But when he tried out the third time with such determination, he was once again faced with an unbelievable message.

[So sorry again! It really is unfortunate. Please look forward to the next game. <3]

Whoooosh.

"..."

What was life? And why was reality so hard and harsh? Lloyd found himself crying, and he wondered why. Just then…

"Hamang!"

Hamang, a clueless fellow that he was, sprinkled confetti high in the air. Ppodong and Bangul lowered their necks as they saw him. Lloyd, who was wiping his tears, spoke.

"Everyone, drop."

"Ppo...! Bang! Ha!"

Drop!

No one was an exception. The fist-sized creatures stuck their heads into the sand in the training hall. Lloyd wiped his tears as he looked at them.

"Whew..."

He had struggled to save up the RP. So many accomplishments and achievements. He had to fight the strong impulse to use it. But now, three failures cost him a whopping 713 RP. And now, he only had 4,070 RP.

Woah. Is this for real?

Lloyd felt bitter and empty. He wondered if this was what it felt like to gamble all your fortune away and ruin your family.

"Tsk," Lloyd clicked his tongue. Should I continue or not?

Lloyd was skeptical. He considered the strong yearning affecting the outcome of the game a bogus, which suddenly made him grow diffident.

Maybe it's wise to stop here.

He could go on, but that didn't guarantee a win. It seemed only right to give up hope that he would be as lucky as he always had. What was more, the next try was the 7th one, which meant that it would cost him 507 RP.

If I try again and lose...

Then, his RP would be reduced to 3,563. If he lost his cool and tried again in anger, only to lose again...

The 8th try would probably cost me 760 RP. Then, I'll be left with 2,803 RP.

He would lose half of what he originally had. The mere thought of it terrorized him. No, he wouldn't consider it. By this point, he realized that the action he had to take was given.

I should stop right now. If I let my emotions get the better of me and keep trying, I'm going to lose both my RP and sanity.

Today wasn't his lucky day. As such, he had to make an objective judgment and behave rationally. Thinking so, he threw his gaze toward the random game menu and tried to close it. Just then...

Ding Dong.

There came a clear dinging sound, and an unexpected message popped in front of him.

[Accomplished a hidden condition: Three Consecutive Losses.]

Eh?

Lloyd wondered what it was. He then read the cascading messages.

[You have accomplished the hidden condition in the game, <Three Consecutive Failures>, by spending a certain amount of RP. As a reward, <Conditional and Selective Premium Random Game> has been activated.]

What the?

Lloyd's eyes widened. He started to process things fast. The power and image of the fantastical creature of his desire. And its effect on the outcome of the game. Ppodong's advice.

That was all true?

It appeared so, indeed.

"Everyone, rise," said Lloyd.

"Ppo! Bang! Ha!"

The three jumped to their feet.

"Ppodong?" asked Lloyd as he looked at them.

"Ppodong!"

"Wait, is that what you were referring to in the first place? The premium random game?"

"Ppodong!"

"Did you know this from the beginning?" asked Lloyd.

"Ppo-do-dong?"

"That you had to lose three times in a row to enable this function?"

"Ppodong!"

“Then... did you suggest that I do this in advance, knowing this would happen?”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Ppodong nodded as though it was only obvious. At that moment, Lloyd became curious. Did Ppodong completely forget about the fact that he was being punished up until a second ago? Or was he forgiving Lloyd with a big heart? Ppodong was beaming, and his smile was so bright and shiny. Lloyd bit his lips without knowing.

And yet, I acted rashly.

He shouldn’t have taken it out on them. Lloyd felt apologetic, remembering that they wanted nothing but the best for him, and all they had was him. Penitent for being blinded by his own selfishness, Lloyd choked into tears.

You selfish bastard.

Lloyd wanted to slap himself. But Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang slowly approached him as though they saw what was happening in his heart. Rubbing the back of his hand, they comforted him.

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

“Um, yes, I should go with the premium random game since it’s going to work out well this time, right?”

“Ppodong! Bangul? Hamang!”

“Yes, thank you...”

Lloyd decided to keep his repentance deep inside his heart and trust his friends first. He once again opened the random summon game, and he noticed a new menu at the bottom.

[Premium Random Summon Game]

[You can amplify the chances of summoning the fantastical creature with your preferred power by investing slightly more RP.]

[Cost of a Conditional Random Summon Game = 800 RP]

[Current RP: 4,070]

[Would you like to start a conditional random summon game?]

[YES / NO]

Okay. It's a do-or-die situation.

He had gone this far. If he was doing it, he might as well do it right. Lloyd clenched his fist as he tapped the YES button. A new message appeared.

[Envision the power you wish the fantastical creature to own.]

Lloyd obeyed. He thought hard about the wire mesh to complete the gabion. He thought about the fantastical creature that would enable it.

Metal wire or rope that's robust and tenacious and unchanging. I want a fantastical creature that can give me that.

When he thought so...

[Your condition has been registered.]

Fwoosh! A brilliant light appeared along with the clear message, driving away the darkness under the moon. And it rotated violently until the outlines of a new fantastical creature appeared at last.

"Ggoming!"

In the light, there came a powerful and energetic shouting.

Chapter 137: Premium Random Game (2)

“Ggoming!”

In the light, there came a powerful and energetic shouting. Something was coming out. Something was definitely coming out. Lloyd braced himself, trying hard to make out the outlines that started to appear in the light. At that moment...

“Ggomiming!”

Bzzzzzzt! A small lump burst out of the brilliant light and flew toward his direction to nestle in Lloyd’s arms.

“Ggoming!”

“Eh...?”

The first thing Lloyd noticed was fluffy white fur.

Soft hair? No, is it a feather?

This creature was divided into a head and body that was fully covered with white feathers. It started to flutter its small wings. Its head was as big as its head. Its beak was cute, and its eyes were dark.

“A parrotbill?” said Lloyd out loud.

“Ggoming!”

A parrotbill, which was smaller than a fist, replied as he looked up. He looked like a baby bird that opened his beak to his mother to be fed. Lloyd gulped dryly.

“Um, you see,” called Lloyd.

“Ggoming?”

“Your name is Ggoming, right?”

“Ggoming!”

“But tell me, what’s a parrotbill doing here?”

“Ggoming?”

“No, um, I’m not trying to say anything against you, but I actually wished for the one that emits tenacious and inflexible wires and ropes.”

Lloyd thought that he would naturally receive the one that fits the condition because he was allowed to add it to the premium game.

I was hoping it’d be something like a spider.

A strong spiderweb could sufficiently replace metal wires. That was the reason why he wished for a spider-shaped fantastical creature. But contrary to his wish, right now...

A bird?

At the emergence of the creature that had nothing to do with a spider, Lloyd’s heart sank as he wondered if the premium random game was another loss. As he thought about the amount of RP he consumed in the premium game, Lloyd felt as though bile was surging through his throat.

Argh, my RP. I spent 800 on this. I’ve worked so hard to save.

Lloyd was rewarded 700 RP after constructing the first apartment complex on the continent. Therefore, he had just consumed as much as the reward of his historical achievement.

Ha, no. No. He has to be useful one way or another.

Collecting his thoughts, Lloyd shook his head and told himself that it was too early to give up. Hamang was initially thought to be a failure until Lloyd learned what the latter was capable of. First thing first. He needed to check what this new friend could do.

“Do you have a note with you? The one that has done what you can do,” said Lloyd.

“Ggomiming? Ggoming!”

“You have it. Can you please show it to me?”

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming buried his beak into his chest and fished a stamp-sized note from his fluffy feathers. Lloyd took it and opened it. Just as Lloyd had expected, it was written in tiny letters. So, he concentrated on making out the words.

[Ggoming User Manual]

[Ggoming is a cute parrotbill. Please show him love and care.]

[Ggoming will give his utmost loyalty to you, his master. A summon partner is a lifetime pet and a family member. Please do not abandon him.]

[Ggoming can change his size by eating one of the enclosed sunflower seeds.]

[Red Sunflower Seed: Will make Ggoming grow to gigantic proportions. Effective for a maximum of 12 hours.]

[Blue Sunflower Seed: Will make Ggoming shrink back to a smaller size. Feed this to Ggoming before the 12-hour limit is up. Ggoming will be dehydrated if he stays over the 12-hour limit without eating the blue sunflower seed. He will automatically shrink back to his small size, but he will not be able to grow gigantic for the next 24 hours.]

[One set of the two colors of sunflower seeds is 1 RP.]

[Ggoming can use a wide range of skills while she is gigantic.]

[Bangul’s Skill Log]

[Spiderweb Discharge (Lv. 1)]

[Spiderweb Shooter (Lv. 1)]

[Nest Construction (Lv. 1)]

[Dung Blast (Lv. 1)]

What is this?

Lloyd cocked his head after reading the manual. He was confused because he noticed two skills that obviously stood out.

Constructing a nest and blasting dung... Well, he's a bird. But what are these two other skills? Spiderweb Discharge and Shooter? What are those doing here?

It was strange. Lloyd wondered if Ggoming could discharge spiderwebs instead of feces. He stared at Ggoming on his palm.

"Hey, Ggoming," called Lloyd.

"Ggoming!"

"I have something I want to ask you."

"Ggomiming!"

"How do you discharge spiderweb?"

"Ggoming? Ggomiming! Ggoming!"

Ggoming wheeled around for Lloyd to see. And at last, Lloyd noticed a small bag Ggoming was carrying behind his back, and it was spider shaped. Lloyd's eyebrow quirked up as he saw it.

"Hold on. Could that be..."

"Ggoming!"

“Does the spiderweb come out from that spider-looking bag?”

“Ggoming!”

“Are you serious?” asked Lloyd in disbelief.

“Ggoming!”

“The bag can’t be a part of you, can it?”

“Ggomiming!”

“...”

Ggoming shook his head hard, and Lloyd finally felt as though a ray of light was shining down on him.

Anyway, I am relieved. It’s a spiderweb. The game wasn’t a complete failure, after all!

Spiderweb. It was the ability that Lloyd wanted the most because he needed a robust and non-rusting wire mesh or wire to put up a gabion. Suppressing a large grin, Lloyd spoke.

“Ehem! Great. I need to test it out then,” said Lloyd.

“Ggoming?”

“That spiderweb of yours. I think I need to test its function.”

It was an obviously required process. This spiderweb was going to be used as a core material for the gabion. As such, Lloyd needed to see how much weight it could hold and how it reacted to varying temperatures and water. Therefore, testing and verifying its function in various circumstances was imperative.

“I need to create the design based on how robust the spiderweb is. Otherwise, it’s going to cause accidents. Retaining walls can lead to massive casualties if they collapse.”

That was the case as a retaining wall was built after cutting steep and sloped areas in the mountains. Underneath, most facilities were roads and houses. So, its collapse meant they would be buried under tons of dirt and rocks. A landslide would consume everything in its way.

“It’s the same here. I plan to build retaining walls that will hold the paddies and fields, which will be the labor sites of countless people. So, if that collapses and leads to a landslide, there will be a total catastrophe. Won’t it?” asked Lloyd.

Lloyd held out a red sunflower seed after finishing his explanation. But Ggoming reacted in a way that caught Lloyd by surprise.

“Ggoming...”

Ggoming refused to take the seed. Instead, he looked at the seed and Lloyd’s face, his gaze holding a glint of a complaint.

“Hmm? What’s wrong?”

“Ggomiming...”

“Don’t you like sunflower seeds?”

“Ggoming, Ggomiming.”

“Oh, are you saying it’s not that you don’t like it, but you just can’t be bothered right now?”

“Ggomiming! Ggoming! Ggomimiming! Ggoming!”

“Um, so you don’t want to work, and you can’t be bothered by anything in this world, huh? Are you asking me to leave you alone and let you live because you hate flying and growing giant because you just arrived here?”

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming nodded as he fluttered his small wings. Lloyd was flustered.

What is this lazy bird?

The fantastical creatures were summoned for labor. But this one didn't want to work, and instead, he wanted to live the rest of his life lazing around? Lloyd realized that contrary to his looks, this cute little bird was a terrible goldbrick.

Ugh. I can't let that happen. No way. No way.

How could anyone dare to stay jobless when the economy was bad, and employment was unstable? How could he dare say that he wanted to slack off when he had done nothing?

I can never let that slide.

Even the master, Lloyd, was working his head off every day. Even if he wanted to live the life of Riley, he couldn't. He wasn't able to even take a small break. And yet, here was this little bird that wished to be a couch potato. Resentment swelled over Lloyd.

And to think I had invested such a huge amount of RP in you!

Lloyd had spent a whopping 800 RP for the premium random game. But if he added the three times he didn't win, Ggoming had cost him 1,513 RP. And what? He wants to rest already?

It's like recruiting the highest-paying baseball or football athlete into the team, only to see him refuse to train or play games.

This couldn't be tolerated. Until Lloyd lived high on the hog first, these fantastical creatures could never be bums. Resolving such, Lloyd lifted his head and spoke to Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang, who were all watching the situation by his side.

"You guys?"

"Ppo? Bang? Ha?"

"Looks like our newbie needs to learn some lessons."

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

The three answered with force. They had been closely watching the conversation between Lloyd and the newbie, and they had let out a cry of disbelief at the sight of this newbie rejecting work as soon as he was summoned. The world has turned for the better, they said sarcastically. During their time, it was only courteous for them to gaze at Lloyd with a glimmer in their eyes. It was only virtuous to shout and beg at Lloyd to bestow any form of work on them. As such, they clicked their tongue in resentment at the unruly and ill-mannered fantastical creature. Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang approached Ggoming. Ppodong grabbed Ggoming’s shoulder.

“Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong?”

“Ggoming?”

“Ppodong? (Do you have a minute?)”

Ggoming nodded at Ppodong’s kind words. Just like that, Ggoming, who was in the dark about what was coming to him, followed his seniors to the corner of the training hall. Meanwhile, Lloyd gazed at the moon above. It was brilliantly shining.

“My, what a perfect day to teach a lesson,” uttered Lloyd.

Thwack! Wham! Chirp! Crash!

Later, Ggoming scrambled toward Lloyd’s side, his feathers plucked out here and there. He flew to Lloyd’s palm in one flutter of a wing and started to chirp aloud with a glimmer in his eyes.

“Ggoming!”

“Hmm? Wait, are you asking for work? You want to eat the red sunflower seed that badly?”

“Ggomiming! Ggoming!”

“Good choice. I suppose your older friends taught you how you should behave, right?”

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming opened his beak wide as his head bobbed. Lloyd held up the sunflower seed with a smile.

The test was a success. It was actually more than a success. The spiderweb Ggoming discharged turned out to be the best of the kind.

This is better than an actual spiderweb.

The spiderweb wasn’t a replica, even if it came from a bag. It was way sturdier and stronger. When Lloyd grabbed both ends and gave a hard tug, it neither tore nor extended. Lloyd activated the Asrahan Core Technique, rotating the mana circle by adding one each. He pulled the web with more force by harnessing the amplified mana until he used three circles. On top of that, he used the optional skill of the Asrahan skill, “Latent Power Surge.”

Ziiiiing!

In a split second, the mana amplification rate became stronger five times for the next 30 seconds.

“Arghhh!!!”

Lloyd consumed every bit of his strength, and the spiderweb stretched just a bit. It was sturdy and enduring just fine.

This is good enough. No, actually, it’s much better than I expected.

In nature, spiderwebs were the byword for thin and robust material. It boasted three times the tensile strength and elasticity of a similarly thick metal. What was more, the strength remained unchanged even after 20 or 30 years because of its excellent durability.

And it's strong against humidity. It hardly changes shape and remains sturdy even after prolonged exposure to sunlight.

And Ggoming's spiderweb seemed to be better than the one in nature. Moreover, it held one more advantage that was useful to the gabion construction.

It's sticky!

It was quite a fight for Lloyd to tear the spiderweb he had grabbed for the test. Since it was extremely difficult to tear with his strength, he had to scrape it off using a knife. But it still wasn't enough. Only when he smeared his hands with the bean oil was he able to clean his hands. Lloyd was amazed by the viscosity of the web.

And if I use it to make the gabion for the retaining wall, I'll be able to hold the rocks and dirt inside the retaining wall without fail.

When a mountain slope was cut, and a retaining wall was built, there would be a space left in between called the "backfill." The backfill was the area where the dirt and other sediments would go into. Acquiring stable bearing power was a critical issue when constructing a retaining wall. But now that Lloyd felt firsthand how amazingly sticky the spiderweb was, he figured the bearing power would remain steadfast even after a thousand years.

So, the gabion and the space inside the retaining wall will be sheeted with several layers of mesh made of spiderwebs. One layer of spiderweb mesh, and some dirt on the top. After, the mesh will be placed again, and then the dirt. The outcome will look like a stack of pancakes.

Lloyd decided to make use of the modern method common in constructing retaining walls: Mechanically Stabilized Earth (MSE). Among the methods, he judged to apply the HDPE geogrid.

I just need to combine the geogrid method and the gabion method. Combine the two, and connect with this spiderweb. And the structure will last for thousands, no, tens of thousands of years.

Crack! Lloyd cracked his knuckles, assuring himself that he could do it. He was skilled in design, and his fantastical creatures were powerful and skilled. Ggoming now joined the crew, and he can discharge spiderweb. And there was also the large workforce that was composed of Javier, Sir Bayern, the engineering corp, and refugees. Compound all of those together, and Lloyd will surely be able to create terraced paddies that can last from generation to generation in a great quality that will be registered as one of the world's heritages. Thinking so, Lloyd kickstarted the design, and as soon as it was done, he moved on to the construction. A rumor spread like a wildfire among the refugee workers. It was about how they had seen Master Lloyd, the young master of this fiefdom, freely mobilize fantastical creatures. A magical genius, they said. The voice of reverence toward Lloyd started to grow louder.

Chapter 138: The Leader for the Weary (1)

“Hey, fellow over there. Did you hear it?”

“Hear what? What is it?”

“About the young master of this fiefdom.”

“Young master? Do you mean Master Lloyd?”

“Yes, him. I heard that he possesses powerful summon magic.”

“Is that true?”

The two talking were the refugee workers currently building the rice terrace at the east of the Frontera barony. One of the two motioned with his chin.

“There, do you see that?”

He pointed at Ppodong, who stood at the towering height of 32 feet. He was shaking his giant buttock, digging the ground.

“That giant mouse,” said the man, “I heard Master Lloyd summoned it.”

“Haha, he did?”

“That’s what I heard,” the man replied.

“Come on. That can’t be.”

“How so?” asked one of them.

“Just think about it,” another replied. “Just think how giant and strong that mouse is. His size alone tells how great he is.”

“Uh-huh, so?”

“His summoning magic has to be equally powerful to summon a creature of that size. But Master Lloyd barely looks 30,” the man argued.”

“Are you saying that it’s not possible for Master Lloyd to have not mastered the summoning magic of such caliber because he is still too young?”

“That’s my opinion,” confirmed the man.

“Then, how can you explain the mouse monster?”

“Master Lloyd must have picked a young monster in the eastern range and raised it.”

“I think you are off-base.”

“How so?”

“What kind of monster in this world grows gigantic by eating a seed only to shrink back again?”

“Are you drunk...?” said the incredulous man as he cocked his head to the side.

The man, who was asked whether he was drunk, chuckled and spoke.

“I saw it. I saw the young master feeding a red seed to the mouse. And the fist-sized mouse grew to become a huge monster.”

“Did you see it yourself? You?”

“Yes, I did! The others saw it, so you can ask around if you don’t believe me.”

“Haha. If that is true...”

“That young master is something.”

“Indeed.”

A host of rumors about Lloyd spread among the refugee workers. They were about how he could easily order the gigantic fantastical creatures and design such a large-scale construction. About Lloyd being a born genius in magic and how he can construct a building in the blink of an eye. About how he's a heaven-sent figure to deliver everyone from this disaster. All sorts of speculations, exaggerations, and imaginations about Lloyd compounded, leaving him at the center of the refugees' attention. Their reaction was understandable as Ppodong and Bangul grew gigantic simply after eating a sunflower seed. And there was also Hamang, who inflated to a giant size after drinking up a large volume of water, and Bibeong, who occasionally came down from the mountain to transfer heavy objects. And now, there was a new creature in the group: Ggoming.

Not even once did they imagine the existence of such creatures. They had never encountered these creatures in any book or legend until they started their work at the terrace construction site. The fantastical creatures worked with such force and dignity, and Lloyd was easily mastering over such breathtaking creatures. Everyone could not remain unsurprised. They were held in awe, and rightfully so. And as time passed by, there was a fierceness in the way the refugees behaved around Lloyd. The eyes of the workers on the construction site changed to that of the fangirling groupies who darted glimmering gazes at VTS.

However, Lloyd didn't correct the false rumors on purpose. No, in some sense, he rather encouraged them to be spread around.

"That's the power of one's reputation," said Lloyd, "So Ggoming."

"Ggoming?"

"Shall we fly higher?"

"Ggoming!"

Flap! Whoosh!

Ggoming replied as he fluttered hard with his 9.8-foot wings. It created a gust of powerful wind, and Lloyd was instantly taken in the air as Ggoming flew high, about 50 yards off the ground.

“Whew.”

Lloyd clutched Ggoming’s back and wondered if this was what it felt like to ride the pirate ship in amusement parks without any safety device. It was dizzying but exhilarating at the same time. Lloyd lowered his head, enjoying the full speed of the flight. He looked down at the construction site that spanned below.

“Wah!!!”

There came a roaring shout from below. The workers, who were transferring the earth, were looking up. Lloyd waved at the men, and their cheer grew louder. He smiled contentedly as he eyed the men.

The people and their families will regard me as someone great and distinguished.

In actuality, he was a nobody. He just had a secret resource called RP, which he made smart use of. Add to that, he had read up on the Knight of Blood and Iron, which allowed him to predict a few things ahead of everyone. But the people were ignorant of it, and thus, considered Lloyd as someone important.

If that’s the case, I should reinforce their belief more.

That was the power of one’s reputation. Everyone felt it at least a couple of times throughout their daily lives. Its power was mysterious because it brought about different reactions even when two people did the same thing. One could be received with exclamation and admiration, while the other invited mockery. That was what reputation did, Lloyd thought to himself. He had an obscene share of such experiences.

I was treated as a nobody.

Poor. No house, and no family. Lived in a cramped rental room. Barely having any clothes, he spent the entire year with two or three faded sweatshirts. He went to the cheapest barbershop every three or four months to save money. Dirty, ragged, and haggard facade and appearance. Stooped shoulders that have hunched as much as his small pride. Because of his unkempt appearance, he received terrible treatment anywhere he went. Every time he went to the convenience store for some food, a stationery store for a pen, or a barbershop, the employers and workers looked down on him so obviously that Lloyd could feel it in his bones. No, it was more than disdain.

One time, I was accused of being a burglar.

At that time, Lloyd teared up in resentment. But now, he could simply laugh it off.

That's why it's necessary to build up a good reputation. It doesn't matter if the impression is false. People put their faith in what they see, not in the truth. And that faith is what's going to help me in a critical moment."

That was why Lloyd flew around riding Ggoming. He inspected and checked the construction site in the air. What was more, there were practical benefits in doing this other than keeping up good appearances.

Woah. I didn't know it'd be this comfortable to inspect the construction site while flying.

Ggoming had grown to become 6.5 feet after eating the red sunflower seed. It couldn't be any more rejuvenating to fly on his back. It couldn't get any more comfortable as he surveyed the vast construction with one gaze.

This project is happening on a vast land, which is as extensive as the Maritz land.

But one thing differed from the Maritz land with its even ground. The land here was sloped and steep.

Goodness, just to think of climbing up and down the slope all day long. The thought of it just makes me sweat.

But thanks to Ggoming, his leg muscles were saved from exploding. But, of course, he had to go down and check things up close when he looked at the details.

“Ppodong,” called Lloyd.

“Ppodong?”

“This area you just dug today. I don’t think it’s leveled,” Lloyd pointed out.

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“I think you should dig a little more. And Group 16!”

“Yes!” answered the engineers.

“From here to there. Once Ppodong levels the ground, I want you to refine and flatten it with the shovels. You know how to do it, right?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes! Of course!”

Countless slopes were worked and touched according to the design. With a show of amazing strength and speed, Ppodong dug to form a stair-shaped mold. Afterward, the engineers were dispatched to level the surface of the earth, refining and polishing the dug areas. Meanwhile, the refugee workers transferred the earth Ppodong had dug to the foot of the mountain. And it was then left in the hands of Bibeong.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

Bibeong was the strongest one among the fantastical creatures, but he wasn’t put to digging the steep mountain because of his massive 3,000-ton weight. There was a risk of collapse. So instead of digging, Bibeong was entrusted with another work: straining the massive loads of dirt through a sieve.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beo-beong!”

Fwoosh! Bibeong grabbed a gigantic 32 x 49 sieve in his hands.

“Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

Rumble! Rumble! He shook the giant sieve hard, and the dirt started to separate from the rocks, small branches, and other particles. The dirt particles that were smaller than 0.7 inches fell to the ground, and it was to be used to fill up the backfill, the space in between the cut area of the mountain, and the gabion retaining wall.

This part of the job is crucial because how we fill up the backfill determines the stability and drainage of the entire retaining wall.

Lloyd made sure to inspect the dirt on a regular basis, and he mobilized Ggoming as well.

“Hey, Ggoming,” called Lloyd. “You know what to do, don’t you?”

“Ggoming?”

“Today, we’ll be building up a large and beautiful mesh. Okay, let’s go.”

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming flew in the air after eating the red sunflower seed. He flew across the sky, drawing an intricate grid using the spiderweb from his bag.

Fwoosh! The spiderweb was discharged out of the bag, dropping to the ground following his flight trajectory. It covered the ground after it fell. Just then, Lloyd shouted aloud.

“The White Cavalry! Your turn!”

“Yes!”

The White Cavalrymen, who were waiting with a shovel in each of their hands, started to get moving. Their shoveling was incomparably faster than ordinary soldiers. They scooped and sprayed the backfill material that had been strained by Bibeong. The backfill blanketed the spiderweb, and they pressed the earth with their feet. When the tramping was over, Lloyd shouted again.

“Ggoming! One more time!”

“Ggomiming!”

Swish!

Ggoming’s spiderweb intricately covered the pressed and flattened backfill material, and once that was done, the White Calvary proceeded to scoop and cover it with another layer of the backfill. This process was repeated several times. Ggoming flew and discharged the spiderweb. The lancers placed it on top of the backfill to be layered with another spiderweb mesh. The steep earth surface that was cut from the mountain slope was layered with ten sheets of equally thick spiderweb mesh and backfill. The outcome looked like a stack of ten pancakes.

Great. It’s going as planned.

The spiderweb mesh that sat in between the layers of the earth held the entire backfill together. Thanks to its powerful stickiness, the earth didn’t spill outward or below. It remained stable. Lloyd covered the gabion retaining wall in front of it. He then put up the spiderweb frame Ggoming had discharged. Next, he covered the front of the bevel, which was stacked up with backfill, with the frame. Then the engineers started to move. They poured the small and large pebbles and rocks he had prepared in advance.

“Okay, two, three! Pour!”

“Waahh!”

Rumble! Thwack!

The gabion was filled with a precise amount of rocks. And lastly, Lloyd tied the entire gabion and backfill with another layer of the spiderweb to hold it together. Thus, the first section of the retaining wall was finished.

Sweet. It’s going according to plan.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled up in satisfaction. The engineers, White Cavalry lancers, and refugee workers perspired, and their beads of sweat glimmered against the sunlight. From then on, the same construction process was repeated. They dug, pressed, sprinkled, stacked, pressed, and erected. The steep mountain slope slowly transformed into dozens of steps, each ensuring enough space for fields and paddies. The range started to widen progressively.

Sometimes, the weather was sleety. Sometimes, it was warm. There were also days when it snowed heavily and sharp, cold gusts of wind blew. But the construction never stopped. It was so as this construction was happening for themselves, not for others. This part of the land in the fiefdom was being reclaimed to ensure a new life for countless refugees. As such, everybody overcame the coldness of the winter through the labor of love. A day passed. Ten days passed. A month. Two. And finally, around the time the flowers started to bloom in the eastern range, everyone yelled aloud in excitement. It was early spring.

“Okay, the last one! You can do it!”

“Argh!!!”

“Two! Three! Pour!”

“Argh!!”

They poured the pebbles and rocks, filling the inside of the spiderweb gabion to the brim. The vast terrace was composed of hundreds and thousands of blocks, which required painstaking efforts to connect one another. And finally, the last block was erected to complete the picture.

However, Lloyd remained utterly calm. He didn’t rush to join the cheering crowd. He didn’t get carried away by the construction of the gabion retaining wall. The workers on the site were allowed to be joyful and excited. It was only natural as they were humans. But not Lloyd. Even when everyone jumped for joy, smiling and laughing at one another, Lloyd knew he should never let emotions get the best of him. After all, he was a supervisor who had to remain calm and act with aplomb. That was how he could prevent safety accidents.

“All right, listen up! Tell me, what’s the most important step of finishing up a construction project?” said Lloyd.

“Tidying up the site!”

“Accidents happen on what sites?” shouted Lloyd again.

“Untidy sites!”

“Got that? Now, it’s time to clean up. Let’s go!”

“Yes!”

The engineers had already internalized how Lloyd worked. They led the White Cavalry and the refugee workers to clean up the site and declutter the whole place. When the place was organized and spotlessly clean, everyone felt that the site was, at last, finished. But Lloyd didn’t join their cheer so easily.

It’s not over yet. I still have the last step to deal with.

The retaining walls were finished and constructed to endure the massive weight of the rice terraces. A sense of nervousness and reward rushed through Lloyd as he gazed at them. The following day, the day was murky, with dark clouds hanging in the eastern range. And it started to drizzle until it developed into a shower. It rained hard throughout the fiefdom. It was a seasonal spring rain that came every year. Lloyd’s eyes grew sharp as he gazed straight ahead.

Now, it’s time to test things out.

The last part of the construction. The safety check against the drainage and subsidence. The time was ripe to test its function.

Chapter 139: The Leader for the Weary (2)

Swaaaa! There was a heavy downpour, countless raindrops soaking the eastern range and gathering in its slopes and valleys. They flowed down to the lower ground, that is, toward Frontera county, until it filled up the terraced fields.

Splash! For thousands, tens of thousands of years, the water current originally flowed through the natural slopes. But not this time. A man-made terraced terrain stood in its way, causing the water to fill up the areas reserved for paddies and fields and the backfill by a large volume. Then, it gushed out of the spaces between the gabion retaining wall.

Sweet!

Lloyd shouted inwardly as he busied around the site, rain soaking him. Each time, he activated the Subterranean Scanning to observe in real-time how the water drains out from the backfill. The result was highly satisfactory.

The water is successfully draining right now. The earth inside isn't running down, and it's neither tilting nor sinking. Wow. Is this real? I can't believe I made this.

Satisfaction swelled over Lloyd as he checked the result with his own eyes. He wondered what his university professor would say about it if the latter saw the finished output. He would be showered with praise, given an A+ grade, and dragged to study in graduate school.

"…"

Lloyd immediately jolted himself out of his trance by shaking his head to focus again. It was the rainy season now, so it served as the best opportunity to test the functions of the retaining walls against harsh conditions. Throughout the season, Lloyd continued to test and observe, and nothing fell or showed signs of collapse. In other words, the construction was perfection itself.

Okay, onto the next part.

Lloyd proceeded to the next step of his plan. Things weren't over just because the retaining wall was constructed. Now, it was time to distribute the land to the people.

"Please sign all of these," said Lloyd.

"These...? All of them...?"

"Yes."

Thud! Lloyd dropped a thick stack of documents on the desk, and its leg jerked with a noise. Count Frontera flinched and moved back before looking up in a daze, wondering whether the tower of papers could touch the ceiling.

"What is all of this?" asked Count Frontera.

Lloyd grinned and said, "These are the contracts and the construction attendance confirmation papers."

"Contracts? And attendance what...?"

"To explain it succinctly, it's the list of the refugee workers who volunteered for the terraced rice fields and the register of their working hours," explained Lloyd.

"..."

"I asked the workers to stamp the register every time they arrived at the site, had lunch or a snack, and at the end of the day when they left for home. That is, I asked all the refugee workers to do so."

"Wh-why?"

"It's my way of meticulously managing the project. And to avoid proxies," reasoned Lloyd.

“What do you mean, Lloyd?”

“Some may pretend they worked when they actually didn’t. It can easily happen in a disorderly site that’s poorly managed. Especially right now when they have the opportunity to receive shares of fields and paddies in return for their labor.”

Lloyd shrugged because it was true. From the beginning, he wrote the contract and promised that their hard work would be paid in the form of reclaimed lands. So he encouraged them to participate in the construction site as much as their stamina allowed them.

But not everybody is as hardworking as their employers think them to be.

No matter where you went, there were always people that worked their fingers to the bone and became a freeloader. Lloyd thought that would be no different here.

“So I paid special attention to managing the work register, ensuring that proxy attendance is impossible. And the outcome is this tower of papers,” explained Lloyd.

“Then... I should-”

“You just need to sign them, my lord.”

“...”

“I, Sir Asrahan, and Sir Bayern double-checked the contents prior. And we have sorted it out in the order of most hours worked.”

“...”

“We had to stay awake for three days straight to sort them. And compared to that, I’m only asking you to sign them.”

“...”

The count feared that this signing might break his wrist once it was done. But even though he let out a sigh, Count Frontera didn’t turn down Lloyd’s request because he knew more than anyone else how his son had broken his back to oversee and commandeer the construction.

He really did. It was hard to see him even during mealtimes.

Count Frontera had grown concerned that Lloyd was overworking himself and that the latter would faint as a result of it. Fearing that Lloyd might fall ill, the count wanted to help in any way he could. He put on his thinking cap, but nothing really came to mind. So, he decided that the best way to help his son was to quietly cheer on Lloyd and manage the refugee camps so that its operation wouldn’t affect the construction project. That was the best the count could do, and thus, he spent the entire winter doing so, and such determination remained the same today.

“I see. I see that you are right as I listen to you. You have worked so hard lately, and it would be shameful if I refused to help you out by refusing to sign this.”

“Haha. Right?”

“Indeed,” agreed the count.

“So, I ask that you finish it by tonight.”

“Eh...?”

“Thank you, my lord.”

Slam! Lloyd immediately ran out of the office after he was finished. The count was left alone and dumbfounded.

Creak. The desk leg jerked with noise once again, breaking the silence in the office. That night, the maids and servants went to bed as they heard the count grumble as he grabbed his right wrist and signed the papers through the night.

Lloyd’s plan was smooth sailing. In return for Count Frontera’s sacrifice of his wrist joint, the distribution of the reclaimed land took place in an easy manner.

“Okay, your total work hour is... Oh wow, you’re on the lead,” said Lloyd.

“Oh, I see,” said the man.

“Let’s see. You have more choices because of your total working hours. Why don’t you look here first?”

Flap! Lloyd opened a large map on the table. It was the map of the terraced fields, and Lloyd directed at several points on it.

“Here. And here. Here too. They’re not so elevated, so it will be easy to travel. The drainage is working very nicely as well, but more than that, look at the shape of the field. It’s perfectly squared, so it’ll be convenient for you to sow seeds, harvest, and manage the land.”

“Oh, then I will go with it, young master,” said the man.

“Here? Good. Here’s the contract. You remember how I told you to write your signature last time, right?”

“Of course, young master,” said the man, “thank you so much for your kindness!”

Prior to coming here, Lloyd had organized and sorted out the working hours and other details of every refugee worker that helped reclaim the mountain. The distribution of the land took place based on this data and noted contribution.

This is how it should be done. Of course.

The hard workers received good parts of the land, while those who worked perfunctorily got the corners and smaller areas. Naturally, some grumbled, but they were a small minority. Even those who received not-so-good lands accepted Lloyd’s distribution. After all, Lloyd had proof. He had kept the work register with a fine-tooth comb. On top of that, the awe-filled public image Lloyd had promoted during the construction worked nicely to his benefit.

The young master is an incomparable genius. Not simply because he's a noble. He's just on his own level.

Such a public image of Lloyd was formed among the refugee workers. So even if the relatively poor lands were shared with them, most accepted it without complaint. It was Young Master Lloyd's decision, and it was beneficial to obey the results, they believed. Plus, they were acutely cognizant of their place. They had come here with nothing, so it was an act of great favor to give them a place to stay and work. Once the land distribution was finished, positive messages appeared to float in front of Lloyd's eyes.

Ding Dong!

[You have completed distributing the terraced fields in the Frontera fiefdom.]

[In this process, you have applied the retaining wall theory in real life for the first time on the continent. Your construction will be etched in the Lorasian history of civil engineering and present a new path for countless students.]

[You are now one of the ten most prominent civil engineers in the history of the continent.]

[Students of civil engineering will sigh and blame you for expanding the scope of their school tests.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[Current RP: 4,070]

Yes!

Lloyd clenched his fists as he read the message. But it wasn't because his name was going to be remembered in history. That was trivial. What thrilled him was the large amount of RP he was awarded.

800? Okay, I earned back the RP I used when I summoned Ggoming from the random game.

Although he didn't fully earn every RP he had lost, Lloyd was content with this reward. But that wasn't the end.

Ding Dong!

There came another dinging sound. At the same time, a series of new messages appeared.

[You have not only helped the refugees but also performed a great feat of successfully finishing a project, which will promote their independence and stability.]

[For this, tens of thousands of refugees are wildly cheering you.]

[You have earned a new title.]

[A new title <The Leader for the Weary> has been created.]

[The Leader for the Weary]

[Title Level: Fiefdom history]

I lost my home. I ran out of food. I didn't even have fire to warm me. I roamed without aim. Aha, this is how it ends for me. My tears and sighs were endless. I crawled, comforting my starving child. I wandered for a place to die. There was no paradise in sight. Not even somewhere to lie down. I gave up and despaired. Then, I met him. That was when I finally realized. Someone held out his hand to me. To me, who had given up on myself. I realized that there was one person left to save me.

[Compliment Effect: The refugees settled in Frontera county sincerely revere and look up to you. They will work the land in their utmost capacity to pay off their debts. For the next 30 years, the terraced fields will have 300% more chances of a bumper crop. The crop will be raised by 200% on default.]

[Title Region: Frontera county.]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 3]

[Current CP: 108]

Wow.

The corners of Lloyd's lips rose to his ears after he read the message.

Now, this is what I'm talking about!

The chances of a good harvest would be increased by thrice, and the crop would double by default. Lloyd quickly did the math.

So, my crop will automatically double for the next 30 years. Considering the vast land mass of the terraced fields...

This was a jackpot, to say the least. The terraced fields were as vast as the Maritz land, but its yield was now double the latter's. And if there was a good harvest...

The yield crop would increase by six times.

This was a prime example of hitting the jackpot. To put it into perspective, it was the same as having a monthly income of 3,000 dollars to be doubled over the next 30 years.

Wow...

Lloyd now had one less problem to think about. With this amount of yield, he didn’t need to worry much about the refugees going forward in the future.

Actually, the supplies from the palace barely met my needs. But now, I don’t have to worry about food starting next year. No more reclamation from now on. Goodbye to reclamation construction!

Lloyd actually had been planning on expanding the range of the reclaimed land after observing the situation in the terraced fields. He figured that was how he could depend less on the palatial supplies and remain independent, which was especially crucial during emergencies. So, he prepared himself for the reclamation that would take place in the future. But now, thanks to the title he had just earned, he could scrap that plan. There was less work now, and Lloyd was closer to living high off the hog.

Argh...! I love it!

Lloyd threw himself on the bed, flailing his arms and legs wide in overwhelming joy that was so intense it made his face red. He didn’t give a hoot about his behavior as no one was around. And after a long while of basking in elation, he looked at the ceiling as he collected his breath. Soon, rationality was restored. And the first thing that came to his mind was...

Time for an interim inspection.

Out of the blue, Lloyd wanted to know if he was doing things right. He wanted to know whether pushing ahead with the status quo would be all right. He questioned whether it would be a good idea to look over his broader plan at this juncture.

Actually, something doesn’t feel right these days.

It was true. He couldn’t put his finger on this feeling. But it just came randomly. This weird feeling. Was it his cautious personality at work? Or stress? Maybe, he said but shook his head later.

No. The situation isn't all bright and positive right now. Right now, if I approach this situation objectively, I know that danger is present all around me.

Everything seemed to be flowing well on the outside. After all, the apartment complex was constructed without any issues, and the terraced fields were completed successfully. On top of that, he now had a new title that ensured massive crop yields. As such, everything looked perfect. But... what if something went wrong? What if he faced an unexpected problem?

It could affect the refugees settling here. Or the reclaimed land might not operate very well.

That could seriously hamper the development of the fiefdom. In the worst case, the entire fiefdom could crumble and fall apart.

The population here grew way too fast.

Frontera county developed so much that everything had to be perfect. Otherwise, one wrong thing could be a challenge to clean up.

Any failures will just hurt me. I might have to spend the rest of my life working my ass off to clean up the mess. Seriously, I shouldn't ignore this weird feeling that grips me at times these days.

It was rare that such a hunch was wrong.

It's something that we all develop after years and years of living and trying to survive. It's sort of like a big data file of life. I think this gut feeling is quite credible.

Lloyd deliberated for a while. And he reached a decision.

Let's use it. I'm going to use the Ending Spoiler.

Lloyd had quite a lot of CP anyway. He opened his skill window and selected the Ending Spoiler skill.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Name: Ending Spoiler]

[Skill Class: ???]

[Required CP: 40 (Second)]

[You can take a peek at the portion of the ending scene that will unfold in this story by spending some of the CP. It may have a happy or sad ending.]

The CP cost twice more than the first one, but Lloyd didn't care much about it. He selected the "Activate" button at the bottom of the skill window.

[Skill Name: Would you like to use the Ending Spoiler?]

[Current CP: 108]

[YES / NO]

Duh. YES.

[Skill Name: Ending Spoiler has been activated.]

[You have used 40 CP.]

[Current CP: 68]

Right after he tapped the yes button...

Crackle...!

Time gradually stopped around him. The tilting afternoon sunlight remained fixed and frozen, and the thick dust that came about after Lloyd's violent expression of joy halted midair. And a round and blue pathway appeared five steps ahead of him. Lloyd saw a milky area within it. He had experienced this before. Thus, maintaining composure, Lloyd started to move, and he stretched his hands into the milky area inside the portal.

Splash... Flash!

Everything turned blindingly white. Lloyd felt nauseated for a split second. He then slowly opened his eyes and saw the ending scene of this story. The end of the secret came into his view. Just then...

What is this...

Lloyd’s eyes enlarged in surprise when he saw it.

Chapter 140: Second Ending Spoiler (1)

What is this...

Lloyd tried to open his eyes wide in surprise, but he couldn’t. His eyes didn’t move even though he willed them to. But it wasn’t just his eyes. It was his entire body as well. Suddenly, it became hard to breathe as if something heavy was pressed against his body. Searing heat rushed all over him at the same time, which was accompanied by a severe pang of dizziness.

Am I lying down?

His vision was hazier than usual, so Lloyd tried to make out his surroundings. Just then…

“Javier. It looks like… this is it for me.”

Lloyd’s mouth moved against his will. This Lloyd that was talking was his future self. His voice was coarse and exhausted and raspy.

What’s happening? What in the world is going on right now?

Lloyd’s heart sank. The words that just came out of his mouth seemed to suggest something ominous. His raspy voice, hot body temperature, and enervated body signaled that something was far from normal.

I think I contracted a disease.

It appeared so based on his observations.

I think I’m lying indoors. And judging from the blurry ceiling... Am I in a bedroom? The room looks somewhat organized though it’s not luxurious.

Future Lloyd was lying in such a place, gasping to breathe and suffering from a high fever. And he stammered when he talked.

I see what’s going on now. I’m saying my last words as I die from an illness.

Lloyd found his heart filling up with relief when he realized so.

Truly, this is the nicest and best ending there is for me. Though it's kind of uncomfortable that I'm seeing myself dying.

But Lloyd soon realized that he didn't have to make a big fuss out of it. The Ending Spoiler. After all, this skill allows Lloyd to catch a glimpse of how things would end for him. More than that, life always ended with death. No one lived forever. As such, he wasn't an exception.

Since I'm dying in my sickbed, it looks like I'm dying as an old man after enjoying decades of a sweet and good life.

Lloyd was relieved at the thought. So, he now observed the situation with more ease.

Well, let's just find out what disease kills me. I might then be able to prevent it. If I'm lucky, I might be able to have a couple more years of the good life.

This was the great thing about the Ending Spoiler. Lloyd concluded that this skill was incomparably better than TV programs that promote health and inform the viewers about diseases. The former allowed him to see how he dies and come up with the most personal disease prevention method possible. Lloyd was closely observing the situation when he heard a voice.

"No, Master Lloyd. Please bear a little more."

Someone came into Lloyd's hazy vision. From the direction and angle, Lloyd figured that it was someone who was taking care of him from the side chair.

I know this voice. It's Javier.

Lloyd's slightly blurry gaze moved to the side, and Javier's oval face and silver hair appeared in front of him in pieces like a mosaic.

Dang. He looks handsome even like this. How did he manage to keep that jawline all these years?

Lloyd suddenly grew envious when he saw Javier’s perfectly oval face. The latter’s voice, mixed with a groan, was heard just then.

“You can’t... You can’t leave me so soon.”

Javier’s voice dripped with sadness and anxiety. Lloyd felt his hand being grabbed. Javier was trembling.

This guy. Is he sad because I’m about to die?

Lloyd guessed that his teasing friendship with Javier lasted as they grew old together.

“Just hold on a little more. Please.”

Javier spoke, almost pleading. Lloyd suddenly felt Javier’s grip tighten. At the same time, warm and clean energy flowed into his body. It was mana.

Emergency treatment?

Lloyd was right about it. Javier was sending his mana to Lloyd, and it traveled from his hand through the elbow to reach his chest, expanding its range at every beat and driving away the murky energy in his system. At the same time, it continuously pressed on his heart. Lloyd realized what Javier was doing.

He’s massaging my heart.

It appeared as though this future Lloyd would draw his last breath anytime soon. Javier was striving hard to extend his life at all costs. Lloyd’s heart ached as he noticed how desperate Javier was.

“Master Lloyd. Please bear a little more. The physician will be here soon.”

“No, no,” said the future Lloyd. “Whew... It looks like it’s too late.”

“But Master Lloyd…”

Lloyd’s heart ached at the sight. But his future self was comforting Javier. Later, after some more difficult breathing, Lloyd felt his mouth open slowly once again, and he instantly knew what was coming.

I’m about to say my last words.

Javier kept massaging Lloyd’s heart, but the pain didn’t subside. Mere breathing agonized him terribly. Lloyd suddenly felt a drop in his energy. He had only a few seconds before his time was up. After some last words, he would be dead for good. Lloyd became nervous.

Let’s hear what I have to say.

His future self moved his lips, forming words through his lips and air. Lloyd focused every fiber of his consciousness to not miss a word of his will.

“Last year...”

The words came out with great difficulty.

“I shouldn’t have spent it like that...”

What? Last year? What happened last year?

“After I expanded the reclaimed land... I thought everything was going well. I let my guard down. The freezing cold... I wasn’t prepared for the epidemic... So, really, this is all on me...”

“Master Lloyd...” said Javier.

“The refugees who lived through the harsh winter... Whew... Me too... This spring...”

“No, no, Master Lloyd...” begged Javier.

“I’m sorry... At least… you should flee...”

Every bit of strength in Lloyd’s hand vanished, and it dropped from Javier’s grip. It hit the bed with a thud. And his heart stopped.

“Haah...”

His last breath. He felt like he was being lifted into the air. Lloyd’s hazy vision grew clear for a split second, and he wondered if this was a normal part of the process or death’s last thoughtful consideration. Then, thanks to clarity, Lloyd was granted a full, clear glimpse of Javier, who was tending Lloyd at his side. But it turned out that Javier wasn’t old.

Eh...?

Lloyd halted as he experienced his final moments.

What?

Lloyd wanted to rub his eyes hard. But he actually didn’t need to do that because Javier was already holding his tears as he gazed at Lloyd. But his face wasn’t old. It was young. Not just young, he looked as young as he last saw him. Lloyd’s heart sank to the bottom when a realization hit him.

Hold on. What the heck? Could it be that he stayed young because he’s a sword master? No, no way. Aging is natural even to the sword masters. Javier wasn’t an exception in the novel too.

If Lloyd died sick of old age, it was only natural that Javier was equally old and aged.

But he didn’t. He looks young. That means...

The period of his death he was currently glimpsing at wasn’t very far from the present.

Wait, I’m not dying of old age?

He hurriedly scanned his surroundings, wanting more confirmation. Lloyd then noticed his own hand that Javier was holding. The back of his hand. It was thin but had no wrinkles. No spots were frequently visible among the elderly. Though thin, the skin was sleek and smooth, like a young person’s. That was all the confirmation he needed”

Fwoosh! A blinding light enveloped him. Lloyd shut his eyes.

“...”

Creak. Lloyd was now sitting on a bedroom chair. It was where he had used the Ending Spoiler. But Lloyd didn’t notice what he was sitting on. Instead, he simply leaned forward, propped his elbows on his knees, and covered his mouth with his hands.

Gulp. Lloyd’s Adam’s apple bobbed visibly as he did so. But his eyes were trembling more visibly in fear.

Oh, my freaking gosh. What did I just see?

Thump! Thump! Thump!

His heart pounded and raced, and the tip of his fingers started to shake terribly.

I thought I was seeing myself die of old age.

But it wasn’t. It turned out that he was seeing the near future. Javier was young so was the back of his own hand. There wasn’t any trace of aging.

This is nuts… This is nuts!!

A pang of terror gripped him by instinct. But it came with a sense of relief that he had made the right choice to check the ending. Two contrasting emotions swirled in him. His hair stood in fright.

Haah... Calm down first.

Lloyd sighed at length. He told himself that he wasn’t dying right now. He had in advance caught a glimpse of the future at least for a short while. The situation could definitely be avoided. Thinking such, Lloyd collected his thoughts. His pounding heart and raspy breathing soon found composure.

“Woah. This is nuts.”

Lloyd shook his head and chuckled. He was now calm. The ending scenes started to appear in his head one by one. Afterward, he was able to pick up a few things after coldly observing them.

Some pointers. I died. Died of disease. And this happened in the near future.

A few years later? Or a few months? Lloyd coolly analyzed his last words. And he was able to infer the time period of his death.

Next spring. I'm sure of it.

He had several clues.

I said that I let my guard down after expanding the reclaimed land the previous year. And I mentioned the harsh weather. So, this year's construction of the reclaimed land becomes the previous year. In other words, this winter is going to be freezing cold.

It appeared so, indeed.

And what I said last really backs it all up. I said that the same thing happened to me in the spring.

A vague picture was drawn as he gathered his thoughts. The construction of the retaining walls and reclaimed land. The unprecedented cold in the winter. The epidemic in the following spring. Then, his death.

The problem is that I'm dying because of an epidemic.

Lloyd clearly heard his last words, how he had failed to prepare against the epidemic. And it was all on him.

The fiefdom will be struck with an epidemic. Countless refugees will perish, and I will too along with them.

What happens after? What happens to Javier? There was no way of knowing that far.

Maybe he makes a tomb for me and leaves the fiefdom to start another adventure of his own. Just like how the Knight of Blood and Iron went in the very beginning.

If that were to happen, he would take a similar path in the story, just like in the novel. Lloyd wrinkled his nose at the irony.

Well, I don't have to mind that far.

There was a bigger fish to fry. The first thing he had to attend to was the prevention of the epidemic that was expected to come next spring.

Whew... I thought I could finally rest at ease after the reclamation project ended in great success.

But right now, his survival was dependent on whether he stopped the epidemic or not. From then on, Lloyd racked his brain, trying his best to speculate the origin of the epidemic through several clues he had earned from the spoiler. But there was one problem.

I know too little.

Lloyd couldn't think of anything. He had no way of knowing what kind of epidemic would hit the fiefdom or how it would happen. And so, he was troubled.

Maybe it happens because of the incoming flood of refugees? Possibly. But what if my guess is wrong? What if I work to prevent the event from happening only for the actual source to be from somewhere unexpected?

If that was the case, the ending he had just seen would actualize. He would fall ill at a young age and die without having been able to enjoy life. There was nothing more miserable and unfair than that.

No. A vague and general response won't prevent anything.

What Lloyd needed was a detailed preparation and response that was accurate, smart, and straightforward. To that end, he had to figure out the exact origin of the epidemic and infection route. And so, Lloyd thought about using the Ending Spoiler again, getting more observations and clues. But it was impossible.

The Ending Spoiler costs 80 CP since this would be my third try. Goodness, how the price jumps!

The second try had cost him 40 CP. It appeared that the price doubled each time he used it. Right now, he only had 60 CP in his pocket.

Haah... What then? How did that epidemic spread?

Lloyd agonized over it, cooped up in his room for half a day. The night came, and Javier visited.

“I came to pick you up since you didn’t come when it was time,” said Javier.

“What?”

“The time for a lullaby,” answered Javier.

“...”

Oh, right. I forgot about that.

Lloyd was supposed to sing a lullaby to this boy every night at this hour. But he was so preoccupied that he missed the time. Lloyd smiled wryly.

“Tsk,” said Lloyd, “Is that why you cried? Because you can’t hear my lullaby anymore?”

“Cry...? What do you mean?”

“You cried, I mean. At the ending.”

“Ending?” asked Javier again.

“There’s something like that.”

Lloyd shrugged and got up from his seat. The hours of deliberation had tensed his muscles. His head felt heavy. So, he decided to take a stroll and get some fresh air since he needed to put Javier to sleep anyway.

A new idea or clue might come up. Who knows?

Lloyd stepped out with Javier, and the two walked toward his quarter without any words.

“By the way,” Javier said as he broke the silence. It looked like something just came to his mind. “I forgot to report something to you this afternoon.”

“Report what to me? What is it?”

“It’s about the human waste at the camps,” said Javier.

“Yeah, what about it?”

“The pit we had dug previously is filled to the brim.”

“Already?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Hmm... I see. After all, there are a lot of people.”

Lloyd tilted his head. The refugee camps housed tens of thousands of refugees, and the number of feces and urines they excreted was unimaginable. Lloyd had instructed them not to dump those anywhere as they pleased. A specific hole was dug for that purpose, but now, it was already filled. Lloyd started to get a headache.

The future epidemic is already giving me a headache, and now this. Maybe I should make their meals smaller. That might make them go less. No, that’s too harsh. Dig more holes? Hmm... That seems like a superficial solution.

Since there were tens of thousands of people, the amount of waste produced was unimaginably large. There was a ridiculous amount left over even after using what they could as fertilizer.

There is a clear limit to disposing of them in the ground. Or should I just toss them into the Prona River? The northern downstream isn't touching the fiefdom anyway. It's a deserted land. That might be the easiest and cleanest way. Wait a minute.

As Lloyd continued his train of thought, something, an idea flashed across his mind. Lloyd stopped dead in his tracks. His head started to spin fast. Clues came to his mind. One by one, piece by piece, they started to gather and become whole. They connected until it vaguely formed a picture.

Epidemic... Feces and urine... River... Harsh winter... Spring... And epidemic.

The cause of the epidemic. And the feces and urine issue Javier just mentioned. Those two pieces of the puzzle were put together, finally enlightening Lloyd of the clue. This clue was something that actually took place on earth before.

"Winter of 1830. Vienna, Austria. Unprecedented cold. The freezing of the Danube River. And... cholera."

Lloyd clenched his fists. Finally, he found out the cause of the epidemic.

Chapter 141: Second Ending Spoiler (2)

“Winter of 1830. Vienna, Austria. Freezing winter. The freezing of the River Danube. And... cholera.”

Lloyd clenched his fists as the puzzle was completed in his head. And the answer was revealed.

Yes. That was it.

Lloyd gulped involuntarily, and Javier, who was beside him, cocked his head to the side.

“What is cholera?” asked Javier.

“Hmm?”

“You just murmured some things to yourself. Vienna, Austria. Danube River. Cholera. I think that’s what I heard.”

“Oh, those?” said Lloyd.

Lloyd had unconsciously murmured after his realization, but Javier must have heard him with his sensitive hearing. Lloyd smirked and quickly gave a vague answer.

“Those are the names of a long-forgotten ancient city and river,” said Lloyd.

“Ancient city?”

“Yeah, I came across the names in a book I read when I visited the academy to visit Julian.”

“But why are you saying them now-”

“Since it just dawned on me,” Lloyd explained, “that the situation of that city is akin to ours.”

“How so?”

“We both have an overcrowding issue.”

Thinking about it, he was right. Vienna of 1830 and Frontera fiefdom held similarities that went beyond their differing dimension and location.

They didn’t have any decent facility to manage bodily waste. But the city experienced a sudden increase in population.

In 1830, Europe was going through changes following the Industrial Revolution. Countless workers flooded into the city, and one of the cities that people moved to was Vienna, the capital of Austria. The deluge of workers led to a sharp increase in population in the city, posing a severe problem in managing human waste.

Duh. Prior to that, bodily waste was mainly used as fertilizers, and the rest was tossed in a river or on the streets. But when the population underwent a drastic change, such a method of disposing of waste didn’t work anymore.

Despite such a problem at hand, nobody came up with any measure, and winter arrived. Moreover, that winter was unprecedentedly cold, freezing the entire Danube River that cut across the city district of Vienna. But people didn’t mind at all. They innocently went on their usual way of dumping bodily waste into the river just like they had always done.

That was the start of the plague.

Originally, those massive amounts of human waste should have flowed along the river current and naturally decomposed by the host of microorganisms underwater. However, the Danube River froze up in winter, and that completely changed things. The waste didn’t flow down. It accumulated in the river, only to melt under the sun in the afternoon and freeze again at night, rotting in the process. Just like that, a large amount of rotten waste smeared deep into the earth, eventually contaminating the underground water in the area. The following spring, people who drank the water contracted cholera. The beginning of a large-scale epidemic plagued the whole city.

A similar thing is going to happen here soon. And the aftermath is what I had seen in the Ending Spoiler.

Lloyd realized what was happening. The Danube River froze, and the aftermath was the cholera outbreak. Lloyd modified some parts of the history and narrated it to Javier.

“I saw the record of how many people died in such fashion.”

“In an ancient city called Vienna?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, I believe the same thing could happen to us.”

Lloyd was certain about it. The situation here wasn’t much different. Vienna saw a wave of workers arrive following its industrialization. Here, refugees took shelter in this fiefdom due to the monster domino effect.

“Plus, we don’t have any waste disposal facility either. Just imagine what would happen if the upcoming winter is colder than expected and freezes the Prona River. The catastrophe that the ancient city went through will be repeated here, and the chances of it happening are very high.”

There was a force in Lloyd’s voice. The more he spoke, the greater his conviction became. He had seen how the infectious disease perished him through the Ending Spoiler. The future Lloyd had made a wrong decision at this point in time. He must not have come up with a proper waste treatment system in place and opted for the convenient way of doing things, which was dumping the waste in the Prona River. Now, Lloyd was able to wrap his head around what had happened. The situation was becoming clear and making sense to Lloyd. But not to Javier, who cocked his head to the side.

“Listening to your words, I come to think that it indeed may be the case. However, what is a waste treatment facility?”

“Hmm?”

“Is there a way better than digging a hole?”

“Yeah. Of course.”

Lloyd nodded. Javier clamped his mouth shut as he noticed how confident he was.

“...”

Truly, this young master was weird. No, he was marvelous. Javier’s mind flew back to the afternoon.

I visited Master Lloyd to report something to him.

Javier had knocked at his doors, but there was no answer. But he did feel Lloyd’s presence inside. And since the report was to be given, Javier carefully opened the door and entered the bedroom to make sure that Lloyd would not be disrupted. When he did, he was shocked.

I couldn’t find him anywhere.

Lloyd was nowhere to be seen. He was gone. Javier searched every corner of the room, the table, under the bed, behind the curtain... He checked every possible spot Lloyd could have hidden, but it was in vain. The funny thing, however, was that he was able to feel the latter’s presence in the room.

I never experienced anything like it before.

Javier rummaged through the bedroom, but Lloyd was nowhere to be found. It was an inexplicable mystery to Javier, and all the more so because he was a sword master.

There is no way Master Lloyd can fool my senses.

Javier was right about it. And yet, Lloyd was nowhere to be seen or discovered. It was as though Lloyd had become a ghost whose presence could be felt but not seen. Javier was flustered, so he left the bedroom, deciding to take care of other businesses that he was behind with. But when he returned later that night, Javier found Lloyd lazing around in bed as usual.

“...”

As he saw Lloyd, Javier wondered what had happened in the afternoon in this bedroom. He was curious what kind of trickery his young master resorted to disturb his senses. But there was no way of knowing. Even the abilities and knowledge Lloyd owned were beyond Javier.

Should I... doubt him? Or should I just be curious?

Javier wondered for a second, but the answer was simple.

I should just keep watching him for now with curiosity, nothing else.

The more Javier closely watched Lloyd beside him, he became more confident that something was going on with his young master. It must have been from the day Lloyd had constructed an ondol facility for the bar owner. Lloyd became a completely different person overnight. But Javier didn't want to grow suspicious of him just because of that. Even if the latter held a secret and mysterious power, Lloyd gave every bit of himself to develop the fiefdom, devote himself to people around him, and save his family and countless others from destruction. Therefore, right now, Javier should merely remain curious. He should stop there without probing any further.

That's my mission.

Javier chuckled. He was nothing but a loyal knight who pledged allegiance to the lord. So as long as Lloyd spent his efforts to develop the fiefdom, Javier had to do his best to protect this young master.

"Understood... Shall we go back to your quarters?" suggested Javier.

"Eh? Why?"

"Aren't you planning on a new project?"

"You are right, but..."

"You will be up all night, thinking and planning, won't you?" asked Javier.

"Probably?"

“That is why-”

“You will be keeping me company?” interrupted Lloyd.

“Yes. I will protect you,” answered Javier.

“What are you saying? You’re creeping me out.”

“…”

“Whew. That gave me goosebumps.”

“…”

“What, you will be loyal by working with me through the night?”

“Yes.”

“If you want, then by all means.”

“…”

“Let’s grab some midnight snacks then.”

A grin formed on Lloyd’s face. He had a lot of things to work on tonight. And just like that, the night of late work wore on.

The following morning, Lloyd revealed his plan to Count Frontera.

“What is that Lloyd? A large-scale sewage?” asked the count.

“Yes, my lord.”

“What is that?”

“It’s an underground tunnel that takes care of human waste,” explained Lloyd.

They were having breakfast. Nutty cheese, and fresh salad. Eggs and juicy sausages. All with a glass of warm milk, the meal was bountiful. Lloyd glanced at the table and spoke carefully.

“Hmm, if you wish me to discuss this project after we eat, I can come back next time,” said Lloyd.

“Not at all. I am fine.”

The subject of feces and urines truly didn’t suit the aromatic meal. Most would have furrowed their eyes, but not Count Frontera. He rather chuckled in amusement.

“It pertains to my fiefdom and the people living here,” answered the count, “and judging from your careful facial expression, I reckon that it is more significant than breakfast.”

“Thank you for understanding,” said Lloyd.

“So, a way to dispose of waste? I believe you brought it up because there is a need for it?”

“Certainly,” said Lloyd.

“Could you explain it to me?”

“Yes.”

From then on, Lloyd proceeded to narrate the same story he had shared with Javier the previous day to the count. As the story progressed, the count’s face darkened.

“Can infectious disease really happen in such fashion?”

“Yes. It appears so. It’s a fact recorded in history.”

“Then, are you suggesting that a similar thing can happen in the fiefdom?”

“It is likely,” said Lloyd.

“And that is why we need a large-scale sewage system?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded, for it was his conclusion. At first, he thought about dumping the waste in a place far away from the fiefdom. But there wasn’t a suitable location for that. The east had a mountain range, and disposing of the waste there could contaminate the underground water and water supply system. Dumping in the south, Lacona viscounty, was equally problematic.

And the outbreak there will eventually spread to our fiefdom in no time.

The west was out of the option, too, because it belonged to the palace. That left Lloyd with the north, but the mere thought of dumping massive waste there stifled him. The reason was simple.

There is just too much waste.

Honestly, it wasn’t rocket science. Considering that each individual let out about 7 ounces a day...

Multiply that by the number of refugees, and it’s about 9 to 10 tons of waste every day. A month, and it’d reach about 300 tons.

300 tons of human dung in just one month. 3,600 tons in one year. In ten years, the amount would be...

Tsk. Let’s stop here.

His stomach churned in nausea as he imagined it. Anyway, whatever means Lloyd would employ to transfer the waste, be it by carrying it in buckets or carts, the sheer amount of it would make it difficult to transport. Moreover, the Frontera fiefdom never saw its population grow over thousands before the arrival of the refugees, so it wasn’t like Cremo city and the royal palace, whose systems and infrastructure were well-established. So, Lloyd decided to refer to a similar case to deal with the waste disposal issue.

So I must refer to Vienna, Austria. The method they employed will help me greatly.

Lloyd made up his mind to set the Viennese case as his role model. He would figure out a way to prevent the fiefdom from being plagued by an infectious disease, and referring to Austria's response to their situation showed him the solution to their own.

From 1830 to 1835, the city built 4.9 x 6.5 feet sewers parallel to the River Wien. What was it called? Cholera Canal?

There was more.

Later, from 1890 to 1910, they constructed sewers that were larger than what they had already built. They were 49 ft x 26 ft. And the city connected the Cholera Canal and the sewage system together.

People at that time dug hard and built up a well-functioning sewage system. Thanks to that, at last, the cholera outbreak ended.

I need to learn how to do that.

Having organized his thoughts, Lloyd spoke.

"Actually, the concept is simple. I'm going to make all the feces, urine, and other waste in the fiefdom flow through a different underground path, that is, completely separated from the existing river water and underground water."

"I suppose that will allow us to prevent the contamination of the river water and underground water. Is that right?" asked the count for confirmation.

"Yes. You are perfectly right. So, I have a favor to ask."

Lloyd had set the right mood for the construction of the great sewer, and the count understood the necessity of the construction. The timing to push ahead with the work was now. They couldn't hesitate. Similar to pulling out a splinter, they had to act in one clean stroke.

"I need a lot of manpower. As such, I was wondering if you could put out an official paper."

“What is the need for that?” asked the count.

“To recruit people,” explained Lloyd as he looked at the count filled with curiosity. “It will be a large-scale construction that covers the entire fiefdom. The manors, villages, refugee camps, and apartment complexes... Almost all residential areas will be dug to install sewers. But that is not the end of it.”

“What else is there?” asked the count.

“The wastewater needs to flow smoothly to the deserted land in the north. And, of course, we will have to dig the ground there as well,” added Lloyd.

“The construction will be huge.”

“Yes, my lord. Therefore, I need as many workers as possible.”

Lloyd was speaking the truth. He needed more than the existing engineering corp. What was more, they were already busy building up the apartment complex, which was a priority. The same went for the elf rebar workers and orc warriors.

“At the least, I can employ the White Cavalry,” explained Lloyd, “but the number is still severely lacking. So, I need the help of the people in the fiefdom and refugees.”

“Hmm, so that’s why you want to take volunteers,” said the count.

“Yes.”

Actually, Lloyd pondered for a second about mobilizing them by force. After all, the Frontera fiefdom had been promoted to a county, and it granted Lloyd and the count a host of powers. So, it wasn’t a challenge for Lloyd to mobilize the people in the fiefdom and refugees by force. But he didn’t feel like doing it because he still had a chip on his shoulder about his days in South Korea.

I worked my butt off but never received any payments on time... It was so awful.

He had broken his back in those days to make a living. But the world wielded violence against him. Overlooked. Ridiculed. However, that kind of treatment was actually nice compared to the real issue. What really gutted Lloyd the most was his delayed payments.

Money. I worked my fingers to the bone while my nose bled for that alone.

But his supervisors just apologized and said that there was nothing they could do. They told him all is well that ends well and promised that they would be paid in full after a few days. They were smiling and comforting him, so Lloyd had no choice but to reluctantly agree. But afterward…

I never saw them keep their promise and pay in full.

One late payment delayed the following ones as well. It was strange, but that was the case. And so, Lloyd became a bundle of nerves at times when he feared that he wouldn't be able to pay rent. He grew so self-conscious around the rental room manager that he couldn't eat properly.

Shoot. Thinking about it pisses me off to this day.

And he was still frustrated by what happened. The strong emotions he felt then remained with him.

Thus, I will never ever put people to work by force and for free.

Lloyd didn't wish to do the same trashy things to his people. So, he decided to never resort to such. That was his limit, even though he already was a cunning man. Plus, from the practical point of view, mandatory labor didn't look like a sound choice.

The people will grow discontent.

Of course, Lloyd could always silence their complaint. But it could break their trust, and it would be difficult to restore the broken trust.

I'll be just making people turn away from me. From then on, people won't volunteer for the projects I do. They'll think among themselves that joining a construction project is a waste of time for them, that the work will harm their bodies without any reward in return...

If that happened, then Lloyd would be in a pickle. So, he quickly decided to never make a myopic choice, wherein he would exchange a long-term asset for a short-term benefit. With that determination in mind, Lloyd spoke.

“That is why we need the official document. To legally write a legal contract. But I’m guessing that there won’t be many volunteers,” said Lloyd.

“I believe so as well. After all, the harvest season is coming soon.”

The count nodded, and he was right. The spring was coming soon, and the entire fiefdom, including the refugees who recently received pieces of the reclaimed land, were getting ready for harvest.

“And yet, I have no choice. I must receive volunteers first and contract experts from Cremo city to make up for any lack of manpower afterward. That is, even if it costs money.”

“I see. Okay, I will write up an official document.”

The official document was written up in no time, and it spread fast and wide across the fiefdom. Lloyd didn’t get his hopes high about any volunteers because the conditions were very different from the time they constructed the terraced fields.

People went wild at that time because I promised them they would receive land if they joined the reclamation project. But it’s different this time. I can only offer them a regular wage this time. It will not appeal to them much when they’re already busy working their land. So, I should hire people from Cremo.

Thinking such, Lloyd flung himself on the bed.

“Whew.”

Drowsiness rushed through him. Lloyd wondered if it was because he had pulled an all-nighter the night before or moved around busily all day.

I should get some sleep first.

It was time to get some sound sleep. His worries could wait for the next day. Just like that, Lloyd drifted off to sleep with his shoes on. And soon…

Ding Dong.

[Your accomplishments and the compliments you have received until now are bringing about a comprehensive effect.]

[The majority of people in the fiefdom and the refugees who have read Count Frontera's official document "strongly" yearn to pay off their debts by helping you.]

A miraculous message, which Lloyd never ever expected, started to appear in front of his eyes.

Chapter 142: Unexpected Linkage Effects (1)

“Bibeong!”

The morning arrived in Frontera county. At Bibeong’s wild and ferocious roar, which came from the eastern mountain range, people, livestock, birds, skylarks, frogs, and bees woke up from sleep. Lloyd was one of those that was awakened.

What the heck is this?

Lloyd pressed and rubbed his eyes once. It was a sweet, nice sleep, and he had slept with his shoes on in terrible fatigue.

Is it because I slept like a log? I’m seeing things.

Lloyd frowned, still groggy from sleepiness. He then started to read the messages he thought were a delusion.

[The residents and refugees in the fiefdom are voluntarily rolling up their sleeves to help you out.]

“…”

Lloyd didn’t believe a single thing mentioned in the message. To him, there was no such thing as voluntary work or volunteering. And what was more, the majority of the fiefdom’s people were offering their help, not just one or two. And so, Lloyd couldn’t believe what he just read.

Who would work for free? People work when there is free stuff like a box of tissue rolls, coupon book, or otherwise, a wage.

Humans were motivated by rewards. No one would work without it. No good deed was done without payment. The world wasn’t free. Every favor came with strings attached. That was what Lloyd believed in, which he naturally came to develop from the harsh and hectic life he had lived in South Korea. And that was equally the reason why he neither gave anything for free nor tried to acquire something without payment. The same applied right now.

Roll up their sleeves? Like, I'd believe it.

All he did was simply plaster several official documents across Count Frontera. It promised appropriate monetary rewards for those who applied for the construction of the sewers. Although he announced the hiring notices, Lloyd didn't have high hopes for it.

The reward wasn't great.

And besides, it was spring, which was a busy season for farmers. Who would come to work for menial pay?

At most, I'd say a hundred. Still, even that's a generous estimation.

So, the rest were planned to be hired in Cremo. Lloyd shook his head as he confirmed the plan, driving away the dogged sleepiness that continued to harass him. But later, he noticed additional notifications below the messages that he couldn't believe were real.

[Your accomplishments and the compliments you received until now have compounded to bring about a linkage effect.]

"..."

What?

Lloyd's eyes started to move slowly. He selected a message, and it dropped open below for more detail.

Ding Dong.

[Long time ago, you punished the traitor of the fiefdom and created order. The people of Frontera county still remember the amazement and astonishment they felt toward you on that day.]

[The title “Exemplifying Punisher” draws basic trust in you from existing residents.]

[You have spearheaded the reconstruction of the crumbling fiefdom. Moreover, you took on a crucial role in clearing the family debt with your marvelous tenacity and planning. The residents of Frontera county are living witnesses of your endeavor and devotion.]

[Titles “Builder of the Dead Estates” and “The Eldest Son of Frontera” are greatly affecting people’s consciousness. No one in the fiefdom cast doubt on your construction plan.]

[You generously helped the refugees even when you did not have many resources. Tens of thousands of refugees deeply remember your grace and help.]

[Title “The Leader of the Weary” is drawing steadfast trust from the refugees toward you.]

[You have risked yourself and protected the people in the fiefdom by being their shield and fighting head-on despite the catastrophe ahead of you. Such feat numbers more than once. You charged underground to save the people during the wild ant invasion. You threw yourself into the dark magician’s dungeon to save the imprisoned soldiers. You volunteered as a bait to draw hundreds and thousands of locusts. The people in the fiefdom clearly remember your valor and sacrifice.]

[The title “Bell Saver” is spreading throughout the refugee camps through the mouths of the residents. The refugees, who already consider you their lifesaver, are overwhelmed with adoration by the marvelous tale.]

[A special effect has been created following the linkage effects.]

[All the people in the fiefdom and refugees came to revere you as one.]

[For a certain period, everyone in Frontera county will absolutely trust and support your plans and decisions.]

[Everyone, including the refugees, has determined to volunteer themselves for you without payment.]

[Compliment Linkage Effect Subject: Everyone in Frontera county.]

[Compliment Linkage Effect Period: Three Years.]

“Wow...”

Lloyd wondered if it was real. He gulped and read the message once again. Surely, what he was reading was true, so this was very real.

“My goodness.”

In fact, the great string of explanations that came afterward actually made it harder for him to believe they were real. He rose from his bed in a daze. Thinking that taking some fresh morning air would calm his excited heart, Lloyd drew the curtain and opened the bedroom window. But he froze in place once again.

“Waaaah!!!”

Clamoring cheers and roars blared as soon as he opened the window. Before Lloyd could take in a fresh morning breath, loud cheers harshly pierced his ears. The people were bustling outside. Beyond the courtyard and outside the main gate and at the manor entrance, there were at least a thousand people gathered despite it being early morning. They cheered and called for Lloyd, who appeared through the window.

Huh? Hold on a second.

Lloyd was flustered for a second. Reality hit him a second later.

It’s really true. That message just now was really true.

Lloyd got a grasp of the situation as he strove to regain composure. This was what seemed to have happened. His accomplishments and titles had accumulated together to bring about a compounded effect. As such, he became the most popular celebrity in the fiefdom, which enabled innumerable people to come to the manor this morning to participate in the sewer construction.

Woah.

Lloyd wondered if he was going to be treated like a king at this rate. Then, he would have to say goodbye to living a relaxing life. Reluctant to the idea, Lloyd decided to act wisely. He then arranged his clothes and hair and went out of the bedroom. There, he bumped into the count and countess, who were both red.

“Did you see what’s going on outside the window? The crowd’s been causing a ruckus since earlier. They are volunteering and asking for work, and they say they will work without any payment. I never expected a few official documents to bring about such a reaction...”

“Well,” said Loyd, “you are a skilled writer, my lord. People must have been touched by your words.”

“I-Is that so?” asked the count.

“Yes, probably.”

Lloyd grinned and continued speaking to Count Frontera, who appeared uplifted by the sudden praise for his talent in writing.

“This is great news. We won’t have to trouble ourselves by hiring people from Cremo anymore. I am thinking of going in front of them now. May I?” said Lloyd.

“Go ahead. These people are here to work for you anyway.”

The count tapped Lloyd’s shoulder. Lloyd smiled at him, left the manor, and stood in front of the legion of residents and refugees gathered at the manor. Lloyd skipped the cheesy speech. Instead, he simply put up a table, which was for signing contracts.

“Okay. Line up, people! Line up!”

Lloyd needed to make hay when the sun shone. There was a time for everything, and just like how the large mast had to be spread against the smooth wind, and the laundry had to be left hanging under the bright sun, he thought the same should be done for the work contracts. He wanted to have people sit at the contract table when they were in their most zealous state and ready to work. Like right now. Lloyd stared across from the table and spoke in a thick-skinned manner.

“Okay, write your name and address. Then, your age, sex, height, and weight,” demanded Lloyd”

“Eh? My age? And why my sex and height-”

“Because every person has a different amount of strength and stamina. And getting rest and recovering differs according to age as well. Tell me, do you want me to put you to any work without considering those factors? Is that it?”

“Of course, it’s not that, but...”

“Right? Just imagine me pushing you to work when you’re dead tired, threatening to cut your wage, or giving you some menial task when it’s a rest day. That sounds horrible, doesn’t it?”

“Yes, yes...”

“So you will receive a daily wage. Nothing is free.”

“Excuse me?”

“Didn’t you hear me? You will be paid for your work.”

“But Master Lloyd, we don’t need any compensation-”

“Tsk,” said Lloyd, “I’m just doing it because I don’t want to be at the center of the gossip in the future. So, just take what you receive.”

“Oh, yes. I see.”

“Yes, good. The work schedule will be released once the construction begins, so focus on your harvest meanwhile, okay? How’s the Maritz land doing so far? And how are you?” Lloyd barraged him with questions.

“H-how did you know I live there?” said the man, a bit stupefied at Lloyd’s remark.

“Why wouldn’t I? You signed a contract with me.”

“Yes... I did.”

“And your kids?” asked Lloyd. “You told me you plan on sending your kids to Cremo for studies when you have saved up enough money.”

“How did you remember-”

“Do you wish for me to forget it?”

“Not at all,” said the man as he waved his hands. “Not at all. It’s just that I’m amazed how you remember me when I’m nothing...”

“Well, it’s nothing to be surprised about. Anyway, take care and go now. Make sure you get ready for the harvest and to read the official work schedule when it’s out.”

“Yes. Thank you, Master Lloyd.”

“Okay. Next.”

Just like that, conversations continued to take place. The applicants filled out the contract with Lloyd, who asked them to register their sex, age, height, and other things about them. Lloyd predicted a host of more applicants would sign up, many more than what he needed for the job. So, he decided to rotate them by shifts depending on their physical characteristics.

Rotating shifts. Yes. I mean, otherwise, who would work on farms and raise cows?

Even though the construction was a pressing matter, the harvest was equally significant. As such, Lloyd planned to operate in shifts to make sure that they won't get affected by farming.

And a daily wage. I have to give it to them at all costs.

Lloyd vowed to pay them daily wages. He didn't want to hire them for free even though they were volunteers. It wasn't because he had plenty of money left or suddenly possessed a philanthropic spirit. It was for his own sake and future.

Because hiring them for free will certainly lead to a scandal in the future.

Right now, people trusted and worked for him, but there was no guarantee that it would be so for eternity. Their cheer today could turn into criticism next.

I must reward them appropriately, so they'll have this mindset that I pay my workers. That's going to relieve them.

Once that mindset settled among the people, it would be easier for Lloyd to hire them in the future, and they would be more available at the most necessary times. In short, trust would be built. And just like that, Lloyd spent the whole day signing contracts with thousands of applicants. He was smiling throughout the time, and it went the same for the applicants. Happy grins. It was a heartwarming spectacle. But there was one who thought otherwise. Javier.

Whew. Truly, people don't know Master Lloyd's true self.

Javier was in charge of delivering the contract papers beside Lloyd. He sighed intermittently as he did, confused by how innocent these people could be. He couldn't wrap his head around what on earth it was about Master Lloyd that made them go berserk over him. Although he kept close to Lloyd's side, it was beyond Javier.

You get to know him, and you'll realize that he's a cunning and sly person.

Javier wanted to shout aloud that Lloyd was a con man. Everybody run! But of course, Javier, being an objective and cool-hearted man, succeeded in controlling his emotions and groaning inwardly. The contract signing ended in success, but Lloyd didn't stop there. He had more stuff to deal with.

Just one? No. I got piles and piles of work as high as a mountain.

Once the contract signing was finished, Lloyd spread his arms and stretched his fatigued body. Sure, the labor shortage was solved, but that didn't mean everything was A-OK.

The labor's been taken care of. Now, for the supplies.

Construction required more than people. Structures required supplies and creating grand sewers necessitated large stones.

"So, let's get dinner," said Lloyd.

"Excuse me?"

Javier titled his head as he was organizing the contract papers.

"I thought you wanted to have dinner. Where are you going?"

Javier asked because Lloyd was doing the opposite. The latter had gotten ready to go outside.

"Follow me, and you'll find out," Lloyd grinned as he shrugged on a coat.

"..."

Javier wondered what scheme his young master was resorting to this time. Plus, dinner wasn't happening until a few hours later. The knight left the manor, growing curious. He hopped on a horse and ran parallel to Lloyd. The sun was fading now, and Lloyd's horse darted to the south.

Is he going to the Lacona viscounty?

Javier wondered if Lloyd's plan involved getting dinner at the Lacona manor. But he soon realized that his young master wished to squeeze more than just a simple meal.

Master Lloyd would be more than capable of that.

Once you became an enemy of Master Lloyd, that remained unchanged for eternity. Lloyd would never stop pestering and harassing you until you are in your grave. That was the kind of person Lloyd was. Javier soon realized that he was right as the horses entered the Lacona territory. They ran past some villages and fields to arrive at the luxurious manor, which was owned by Viscount Lacona. But Javier noticed a small ruckus in the front yard.

A fight?

Two men were fist-fighting. Judging from the clothes, they appeared to be the servants working in the manor. But the problem was that one young man, who was decked out in fashionable clothes, was watching the fight seemingly in amusement.

"Jab properly, you bastards! Come on! The loser will sleep in the storage, okay?! And obviously won't get dinner. Got that?" yelled the young man.

A sizable physique. Sly eyes. Javier soon realized who it was.

It's the son of Viscount Lacona. Was it Diego?

Javier had last heard that he went to the royal academy just like Master Julian. He wondered when the latter came back when...

"Hey."

Lloyd strode across toward Diego's back. He placed his arm on Diego's shoulder, who was much preoccupied with the fight.

"Eh? Who are you?"

Diego wheeled around in surprise and locked his gaze with Lloyd. At that moment, Lloyd beamed, and his eyes held a grin so evil that even the devil would’ve shaken its head at Lloyd’s depravity.

“Who else? It’s me. I’m asking this because I have some business here. What is your old man up to right now?”

But instead of giving an answer, Diego, the son of Viscount Lacona, hiccuped.

Chapter 143: Unexpected Linkage Effects (2)

Diego Lacona, the son of Viscount Lacona. This young man once received considerable expectations from people around him. Even though he was not a genius, he was clever enough, and thanks to his large physique, Diego was strong. Sword fighting was one of his talents, and Sir Curno, the knight of the viscounty, praised him for his skills a few times. Just like this, he grew up surrounded by people who looked forward to his future. When he grew up, he studied in the royal academy, and things were going pretty well for him, that is until he encountered Lloyd Frontera, that fiend.

But... what's he doing here?

Diego hiccuped, and his neck bobbed. Chills ran down his spine against his will. His happiness index dropped to the bottom when he laid his eyes on this frightening figure. Diego snapped his eyes open.

"Eh?! Eh..."

Diego meant to say something, but his lips didn't move as he pleased. His esophagus was supposed to push the air to his throat. But he couldn't utter as though his lips were frozen. In other words, he jumped out of his skin.

"What are you so surprised about?" said Lloyd as he scoffed. He then tensed his arm that rested on Diego's shoulder, tugging the latter's head to his side.

"You must be glad to see me, right? That's why you didn't hear me properly. I just asked, 'what does your old geezer do?'"

"It's... It's..." muttered Diego.

"Come on. Speak slowly."

"The thing is..."

"Are you scared of me?"

“…”

Diego clamped his mouth shut. He didn’t want to admit it, but he was scared. Lloyd Frontera. The sight of this bastard should blow my gasket, Diego thought to himself. He was supposed to foam at his mouth in the presence of Lloyd. That was the only acceptable reaction when he recalled how wretchedly Lloyd had trampled him the last time, how he got expelled following Lloyd’s report on the rampant corruption in the academy, and how he was thrown behind bars for three months.

I was angry. So much so that I couldn’t control myself.

Diego grew up in the limelight, and he was praised for being a rightful member of the academy. But not anymore. As though the expulsion from the academy wasn’t bad enough, he was imprisoned under royal order. What this signified was clear: Permanent excommunication from the world of nobles. He would never hold an important position in the royal palace for life. And so, Diego was almost exiled to his hometown, and all his days were gripped with venomous bitterness.

Each time a wave of emotion rushed through him, he drank. And he pestered his servants and maids. Blowing off his steam in such a manner worked and appeased his heart. The same went for today. He had summoned two servants to force them to duel, so he could watch. At first, they hesitated, saying they could not do it and didn’t want to fight. Diego then brought a whip and snarled that he would whip anyone who disobeyed him. Just like that, Diego pushed everyone to a duel. Servants punched and struck each other. Their noses bled, and their eyes went black.

Amused, Diego giggled and egged them on all the more. He threatened that the loser would have to skip dinner. Not enough with that, the loser was supposed to spend the night in the storage. Diego pressed them until one of them was knocked out. But was it because the servants did something wrong? No. They were innocent. And yet, Diego didn’t feel guilty at all.

I’m allowed to do that. They are servants. They are mine. Why can’t I take my anger out on an object I own?

If Diego could blow off his steam by directing at his subjects, that was good enough. This was exactly what was happening when Lloyd came here. And right now...

I am not... angry.

It was as though he was splashed with a bucketful of cold water. Diego had been waiting for this moment to come. He vowed to rip Lloyd to pieces if their paths crossed again. But right now, even when his wish was granted and he saw Lloyd standing in front of him, Diego wasn't angry. Instead, instinctive fear started to smother him.

Bathump! Bathump! His heart pounded so loudly that he could hear it in his ears. The color drained from his face, and his hands turned cold and sweaty. And... he couldn't meet Lloyd in the eyes.

"Hello? Hey! Mister!" called Lloyd.

"..."

Lloyd's gaze. His gentle voice. His arm wrapped around Diego's shoulder. Each of these brought back his memories of the past, particularly the pain of Lloyd's blows and punches. Pain and fear were etched on Diego's bones. When his memories and senses returned to that moment, everything turned to fear instantly. And now, his shoulders shrugged and hunched over like a mouse that met its predator.

Tsk. He's just like his father.

Lloyd scoffed. Like father, like son. The two were living embodiments of the strong against the weak, weak against the strong. Moreover, they both owned a cunning inclination, in which they became groveling in the presence of someone stronger, and vice versa. Lloyd slightly pushed Diego's back, which stiffened with fear.

"If you can't speak, then guide me with your body. I'm here because I have business with your father," stated Lloyd.

“Uh, i-it’s...”

“Come on. Move now.”

“...”

Diego clumsily led the way, entered the manor, and walked along the corridor. But Lloyd didn’t utter a single word throughout the walk. At last, Diego stopped in front of the viscount’s office, and he pointed at the door, his fingers trembling. Then, he quickly turned around to leave.

“Hey.”

At last, Lloyd opened his mouth. Diego, who made to leave the area, flinched his shoulder as though he was struck with an arrow. The corners of Lloyd’s lips curled up.

“Come to think of it, you were harassing your servants, weren’t you?”

“...”

“How does it feel to pick on a weak and defenseless person?”

“...”

“Answer me,” ordered Lloyd.

“It’s... It’s...” muttered Diego.

“Tsk,” said Lloyd, “Forget it. Largely speaking, you do know that the servants of this manor are the people of my county, right?”

“...”

“They may be residents of your viscounty, but at the same time, they are the residents of my county,” reminded Lloyd. “And go larger, and they are the queen’s people. But look at you. I didn’t know until today that you’ve been mistreating the people of the county and of the queen like that. You just live recklessly, don’t you? Hm? You’re completely ignorant and thoughtless, aren’t you?”

“Um, that’s... Well...” Diego found himself muttering.

“Are you trying to teach me how to murmur? I’m not interested. Learn it yourself.”

“...”

“I catch you treating them like that once again, and seriously, you can consider yourself dead,” threatened Lloyd.

“...”

“If you get me, then piss off.”

Lloyd didn’t want to talk diplomatically to this jerk. To Lloyd, Diego was like a beast controlled by his instincts, not by reason. It was as though his whole system was programmed to bite anything weaker than him. That kind of bastard didn’t deserve nice words.

“Tsk.”

Lloyd clucked his tongue as he looked at the back of Diego, who was scampering away. He then turned and happily knocked on the office door.

Knock knock.

“Who is it?”

Lloyd heard the viscount asking from the inside.

“Is dinner ready already?” The voice continued, “I thought I made myself clear that I don’t want to be bothered during my break unless the table is set.”

The viscount’s voice was now sterner. Lloyd, who was still standing outside the door, grinned happily.

“My, I am sorry, my lord. I didn’t know that, and-”

“You didn’t know? You didn’t know, and that’s it? What are you going to do when my sleep has already been disturbed, huh?” snarled Viscount Lacona.

“I swear,” said Lloyd, “I really was unaware. I truly was not aware it would bother you this much.”

“Are you kidding me right now?”

By now, Viscount Lacona’s voice had grown into yelling. But it only deepened Lloyd’s grin.

“My, my lord, please save me. I didn’t know. I truly mean it,” begged Lloyd.

“Ha, how persistent with you and your claim of ignorance! Who are you? You’re surely a servant, and you dare talk back to me? How dare you when you should have already opened the door and bowed your head down?”

“I am sorry. I profusely apologize.”

“My goodness! You are still apologizing?”

“But, my lord, you must understand my predicament. For you see, I have no way of knowing when you take your precious breaks as I do not frequent this manor very often,” explained Lloyd in a submissive voice”

“What? How dare you try to play games with me?”

“Of course not, my lord. What I am saying is true. Actually, I knocked on your door for a crucial matter.”

“A crucial matter?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“What could a servant possibly bring me a matter of significance that would disturb my break?!”

Slam! Clash! Lloyd wondered if the viscount hurled something toward the door. There was a ruckus inside following the viscount's shout. Then something shattered after hitting the door. This only made Lloyd happier. His grin deepened in amusement.

"I mean it, Viscount Lacona. I swear on it. I came due to a matter of grave importance," said Lloyd.

"If that is the case, you should open your door, bow, and report to me. Should I open the door for you when you're nothing but a lowly servant?!"

"Yes. You should open it for me."

"What is that...?" huffed the viscount.

"No, you will be made to jump to your feet and open the door for me. As the matter is that vital and important."

"What kind of gibberish and bullcrap are you saying now?" asked Viscount Lacona.

"It's neither gibberish nor bullcrap, my dear viscount."

"Ha... Hahaha. Hahaha? How dare you!"

The viscount's voice was now more violent. Lloyd could easily feel that the viscount's blood pressure was surging inside. He didn't need to see it.

"Fine. Fine. I will open the door for you, and listen to what you have to say. But I will punish you heavily if I regard your report as inconsequential."

"Yes, please do so."

"You won't stop will you…!"

"Please open the door, my lord," urged Lloyd.

"Fine! Tonight, I shall tie, whip, and skin you alive to let the people of this manor know what happens to those who make fun of their lord," warned

Viscount Lacona.

Rustle! Thud! Boink! There was a rustling noise of the clothes. Lloyd then heard the viscount stomping toward the door. The doorknob jerked heavily, and the door finally flew open.

Clack!

Lloyd put on a nonchalant smile on his face.

“...”

“Truly, the matter is of grave importance,” said Lloyd, “in accordance with the strict will of Her Majesty for reconstruction, I plan on pushing ahead and constructing a quarry in the southern land of your viscounty.”

Viscount Lacona simply stood looking at Lloyd, dazed and speechless.

“Eh?! Do you not think it is important? You are not going to tie, whip, and skin me alive now, are you?” joked Lloyd.

“...”

“My, it’ll be a big problem if you do that.”

Thump! Viscount Lacona, who seemed to be stunned to see Lloyd, dropped to the floor with foam in his mouth.

The negotiation was easily settled. Viscount Lacona regained consciousness after about ten minutes, and he continuously bowed toward Lloyd as soon as he woke up. He begged, saying that he had been having hearing problems these days and didn’t recognize Lloyd’s voice. A grave mistake has been committed. Please understand with grand generosity. Please don’t tell Count Frontera about it. Viscount Lacona grabbed Lloyd’s both hands with so much earnestness and plea, and so the negotiation was easy.

“Good. I will turn a blind eye to your impertinent behavior and how you verbally abused me. That is, provided that you do what I ask,” said Lloyd.

Lloyd then proceeded to share his demands. From now on, Lloyd would build a quarry in the southern part of Lacona viscounty. Plus, Frontera county would hold the right to construct and manage the quarry and its products.

“Oh,” said Lloyd after a pause, “I’m just saying this, so we’re on the same page. This isn’t robbery, okay? And it’s obviously not extortion. I am sure you are aware of how Her Majesty has designated the Frontera county as the hub of reconstruction in the east, right?”

“Yes...”

“So since you are so refined and reasonable, viscount, I am sure you understand that the reconstruction effort will require a lot of resources,” said Lloyd.

“Yes...”

“Good. That’s the whole point. What you’re doing is providing that resource to us. I mean, the stones that will be quarried.”

Viscount Lacona didn’t speak.

“Just think about it,” explained Lloyd, “The rocks that are quarried from the site will be used in various constructions. They will become the basis of countless structures across the Frontera fiefdom, as well as the pillars and walls and roofs. How nice is that?”

“...”

Nice to you, said Viscount Lacona inwardly as he despaired. But Lloyd didn’t care what the former thought about his plan. So, he simply went on to speak in a joking manner.

“So, this is a great thing for you, actually. The Frontera fiefdom is at the center of reconstructing the region under the orders of Her Majesty, and imagine if you supplied us with your stones, one of the key materials for the project. How glorious would that be?”

“Yes, yes, yes. I am honored...”

“Isn’t it?” smiled Lloyd. “So, if you want to shush me now, please sign here.”

“Ehem...”

At last, Viscount Lacona left a tear-soaked signature on the contract, and once again, the status difference between Viscount Lacona and Lloyd was highlighted. Just like that, Lloyd’s grand picture of the sewer construction started to flesh out.

Chapter 144: A Half-Meant Joke (1)

Quarry. The place to dig up rocks. The facility promised a great amount of quality stones for constructing various structures, sculptures, and anything else. It was also the facility Lloyd needed most at the moment.

Duh. I absolutely need loads and loads of stones to properly make a large-scale sewer.

The sewer was to cover all areas of Frontera county, including the villages, the Maritz land, the terraced fields, and the apartment complex. So, it went without saying that it necessitated a lot of piles.

Sure, I could use metal and cement since I have Bangul. But realistically speaking, it's almost impossible.

Most of the metal bars and cement Bangul produced at the moment were being used in building the apartment complex. As such, it would fall short, that is, even if Lloyd worked hard to encourage Bangul.

After all, my summon partners aren't machines.

They were animals with clear limits. Lloyd could never abuse them to work over their limit.

I can't do that. Her bottom is going to get sore.

She had been blasting metal bars and bursting cement every day without fail. Her buttock didn't enjoy a moment of rest, so Lloyd was especially feeding her high-quality dirt to prevent any injury.

As such, Bangul can't be mobilized for this construction. I can't give her more than what she's doing right now. It's wiser to use stones instead of cement to build the sewers. Besides, that's going to be more advantageous in the long run.

Cement was a versatile material. Yes, indeed it was. But it wasn’t the go-to material for all types of construction. It cracked and broke down over time, and such faults necessitated meticulous inspection and repair. The cracked areas needed filling. That was the only way for a cement structure to last long.

Otherwise, the facility gets quickly worn down and crumbles. It’s a common occurrence in rural parts of Korea. There are many abandoned buildings that aren’t renovated anymore.

Lloyd didn’t wish the sewers to meet the same fate as those buildings because constructing them required a lot of effort and time. As such, he wanted them to be kept strong and solid for as long as possible.

And that’s why it’s more advantageous to use stones in this construction project.

Managing the sewers was expected to be difficult because of the humidity, which would wear them down faster. Not enough with that, its massive size, lack of light, and terrible stench would give a hellish time to Lloyd in terms of maintenance. Thus, the structure needed to be low maintenance, so it could stand on its own even without much inspection and repair.

And that is possible if we use stone. Particularly the granite.

Granite. Its inside was extremely homogeneous, which meant that there were no layers inside. Since there were no layers inside, it wasn’t prone to tilting, cracking, or splitting.

That is, it doesn’t change even after a long time. That’s why granite is widely used in the modern world as a supporting stone for semiconductors or measuring devices that require precision. It’s also the stone used in curling competitions.

It could easily bear massive weights and prevent the water from seeping. It was completely protected from external contamination. That was why it was used to build lighthouses exposed to harsh sea conditions. Using it allowed the structure to remain unchanged even after a long period of leaving there without maintenance. Its robust and inflexible characteristics and permanent longevity were the reasons why Lloyd considered it the most suitable material for the upcoming construction.

“We’re going to make a quarry from here to there,” Lloyd instructed. “So, what you need to do is dig up all the dirt in this slope. Okay, let’s get started. Give me a shout before we start. Let’s go!”

Lloyd was at the foot of the mountain in the south of Lacona viscounty. He pointed at the area with his finger, and the engineering corp, the White Cavalry, and the orc warriors grabbed their shovels. Giant Ppodong gazed at it with a glimmer in his eyes. Bibeong stretched his towering front legs. The two of them were joined by five baby Mastodons Sir Bayern raised.

“Chuuu!!”

Even though these baby Mastodons were just seven or eight months old, they were double the size of ordinary bulls. Sir Bayern stroked them gently as they dragged across the land using giant plows.

Things are going great. As I thought, large-scale constructions are impossible without machines and equipment.

Lloyd’s eyes shone with satisfaction as they looked around the construction site, which he had looked into with his Subterranean Scanning skill. He learned that about 10 feet under the slope, there lay granite bedrock. He was already decisive about this place before visiting Viscount Lacona, almost forcing him to agree to the construction. Since Lloyd decided to push ahead with this project without any reservation and hesitation, he had brought all his summon partners and workers to help him.

“Clear the area, the trees, and everything else! Until the bedrock is revealed!”

“Wooo!!!”

“Oink!”

“Ppodong!”

“Bibeong!”

“Chu!!”

Lloyd grabbed a shovel and led the way, showing what shoveling was to the others as he used the Asrahan Core Technique. The engineers, who thought they were now seasoned shovelers, sent adoring and revering gazes at Lloyd. The White Cavalry became busier after suddenly being competitive. And the orc warriors happily shoveled as their pecs burst from their daily exercise. The construction picked up its speed, and after six days of ongoing shoveling, the mountain slope was perfectly transformed into a quarry. The thick bushes of trees were nowhere to be found, and the moist dirt was moved elsewhere. There was only a bedrock of granite left behind.

Now it’s time to build the transportation route to move the stones from the quarry.

There was more to the job than digging up rocks. They needed to be safely moved. To conveniently do that, a paved path was necessary as rocks were naturally big and heavy.

“Sir Bayern. You do know how to pave roads, right? You’ve done it before.”

“Yes, of course,” answered Sir Bayern.

“The process is the same. The width, depth, materials, and the order. Do you remember everything?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, I do,” Sir Bayern answered confidently.

“But I will attach the detailed design just in case. And Ppodong will be with you as he worked with you in the previous construction. As for the engineers... Will 150 be enough for you?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, that will be enough.”

“All right. So the route will start from the quarry, pass the Maritz Land, and go north until this point. You simply have to follow the construction plan and blueprint. Oh, and one more thing. All the roads must be kept as straight as possible. Make sure to remember this part.”

“I’ll make sure to remember your words.”

“Good. I’ll put my trust in you.”

“You can count on me, young master,” assured Sir Bayern with confidence.

Lloyd entrusted the job of constructing the southern highway to Sir Bayern, who held a plethora of experience supervising various projects in his three years of commanding the engineering corp. He was a stoic man, and that made him trustworthy. Although Lloyd had one less job to do, he still had a lot of other work.

Okay, next, the apartment complex.

It was spring already now, so the time had come to resume the construction of the apartment complex, which was paused due to the frigid temperature. Since everyone needed to move into the building before winter, Lloyd didn’t have any time to waste.

The good thing is that I have people who can lead the apartment construction while I focus on the sewers.

Lloyd grinned and turned to the elf archers.

“Right, Moira?” asked Lloyd.

“I don’t know what you are referring to, but I am glad that we have something to work on again,” Moira, the chief of the elf tribe, smiled faintly at Lloyd’s question.

She glanced at Building 103, whose foundation was currently being built.

“To be honest, I was bored all throughout winter. I wished for spring to arrive soon.”

“Why is that?” asked Lloyd.

“I wanted to jump around the high-rise apartment,” Moira said as her eyes darted to Building 102, which stood tall in its stately height. “I still cannot forget the early winter of last year. The time when I zoomed around the eighth floor of Building 102. I’ve never felt that way before.”

Moira’s voice sounded slightly faint. She couldn’t forget the feeling of slipping and slithering through the metal bars that shot upward on the tall building. It was rejuvenating to cut across the wind as she stepped on the outer wall and safety net. The sensation was akin to pleasure.

“The other elves have been waiting for spring to come too. We cannot wait to construct Building 103 to be taller.”

That way, they could fly around using the outer walls as footsteps. If there were dozens of apartment buildings in the area, they would then be able to jump around like squirrels from one roof to another. The mere thought of it charged Moira with excitement.

“Sounds great,” said Lloyd happily. “But you can’t do a perfunctory job just because you want it to finish fast. Then again, you are as meticulous as I am, so I have nothing to worry about.”

“Surely,” Moira agreed, you don’t have to worry, and besides, we all memorized the design blueprint you handed to us.”

That was how meticulous and thorough the elves were. And they had gained experience doing construction work last winter when they built the eighth floor of Building 102. Therefore, Lloyd decided that it was a safe bet to leave the construction to them, the natural metal rebar workers. Assembling the metal rebars and formworks could be assigned to them, and everything would be good as long as he put experienced and seasoned engineers at their side. And as for Lloyd himself...

I simply have to supervise them as I go around.

But he didn’t intend to rest. Even if he wanted to, rest was a luxury for him as there was a task only he was capable of. It was the survey of the construction of the sewer.

Woah. I can’t believe I don’t have any time to rest. Is this even real?

The next day, Lloyd went around the entire fiefdom, using the Asrahan Core Technique the entire time. After he recharged enough mana, he then used every bit of it to survey without a break. He scanned so much as the tiniest corners of the terrain in the fiefdom as far as his skill allowed. Then, he came up with the sewer model in the process.

It should be significantly larger than the pipes made out of concrete. It should be shaped like a large underground tunnel that’s big enough for people to enter.

That allowed for easy maintenance as people could directly enter the tunnels if there was a problem with the sewer.

So, I should go big. Just like the sewers in European cities.

The tunnel was to be composed of a central path where the waste and sewage would flow, and it would be flanked by pathways through which people could walk on foot. Lloyd decided to go with that juxtaposition.

And the lower part of the cross-section should be a reverse egg shape. That’s going to speed up the sewage and minimize junk piling up at the bottom.

Lloyd’s plan was fleshed out in his head, but that didn’t put an end to his deliberation. It only grew as the sewer plan started to take more shape. There was one problem that he couldn’t figure out, no matter how much surveying and designing he did.

Hmm. It’s just like I had expected. The sludge removal is the issue.

Sludge was a residue that accumulated in the process of treating sewage. When sewage was left in one place, liquid and semi-solid materials would separate from one another. The former naturally floated to the top, while the latter sank because of its weight. When the sunken residue piled up, it became sludge. At that point, Lloyd had to gather them together, divide them using microorganisms, and squeeze the liquid out of them.

Then, they have to be buried, thrown in the sea, or burned. That's how we take care of sludge in the modern world.

But right now, it was a bit of a conundrum in this world.

Sure, I can gather sludge since building a sludge thickener at the end of the sewers is easy. That would make the sewage flow and gather at only one point, and the sludge would sink eventually. But the question is, how do I treat the sludge after it's gathered?

Employ the engineers? Bury the sludge? Lloyd shook his head.

No, that's impossible.

First of all, there would be a massive amount of sludge and not to mention the poisonous gas emitted from it. The sludge was a highly concentrated, rotten form of human waste from countless people, so it produced an unimaginable volume of methane that would be enough to suffocate the engineers to death.

That would be the same for the orcs and elves alike, not just the engineers.

The fantastical creatures weren't suitable for the job as well. Moreover, even if Lloyd managed to dig up the sludge safely, there was another problem: There was no suitable place to bury it.

I don't have the land for that in my fiefdom. Take them and throw them away? That was going to be another pickle as the land wasn't Lloyd's. Even if it was, moving the sludge alone would be too expensive. Hmm... What should I do?

Lloyd grimaced, his brows furrowing.

The best method is to incinerate them with searing heat.

Just one plume of fire would decimate the gas, microorganisms, and whatnot. How convenient would it be if I could do it? Lloyd asked himself. From then on, he locked himself in his bedroom and deliberated for three days. When he finally left the bedroom, he called Javier and spoke.

“We should go for a picnic,” Lloyd suggested.

“Excuse me...?”

Javier’s brows rose upward. He then spoke, and his voice was filled with curiosity.

“Picnic out of the blue? Where and why?” blurted Javier.

“To a dragon lair. To meet a dragon.”

“...”

There was so much nonchalance in Lloyd’s answer. It was as though he was suggesting that they go grab lunch at the cafeteria or coffee at a cafe. As such, Javier regarded it as nothing but a silly joke, at least for now.

Chapter 145: A Half-Meant Joke (2)

There were untold numbers of caves throughout the world, and most had owners. For example, a tiger’s den was occupied by tigers, and you could find snakes coiling up in their cave. A cozy cave was for the brown bears to hibernate in the winter. And the fiery lair, located at the end of the southern end of the eastern range, wasn’t an exception.

“I hate being single... I want to fall in love.”

A resentful sigh rang aloud the deeper part of the fiery dungeon. Later, a large figure tossed and turned.

Thud! Thump!

Because of his 557-foot physique, a simple turn gave an impression of a hill moving. His 6,000-ton weight caused the entire dungeon to boom when his waist only touched the ground as he turned.

“I am so... lonely now,” Solitas, a red dragon owning the fiery den, murmured. But no answer came except for a meaningless echo of his words that traveled as his voice hit the walls of the vast place. The truth dampened Solitas’s heart all the more.

Dammit. It wouldn’t echo this much had I stacked up more treasures in here.

His red eyes scanned the center of the dungeon with annoyance. The place was empty and plain. There weren’t any crowns or treasure chests that were commonly found in dragon dungeons. There weren’t any rare jewels, let alone the comparatively mundane piles of gold. Solitas was, in fact, a penniless dragon.

Tsk. This is why I’m single.

Solitas’s gaze now reflected greater annoyance and grief. Once again, he sighed.

I wish I wasn't a dragon.

Solitas wondered what it would have been like if he were a human. Then, he would be free from the pressure of this money-grubbing destiny just to get married.

Probably. Humans look like they only need to farm to get married and have children and live happily until they die.

If this dragon's thoughts were spoken aloud in the presence of job seekers, newlyweds, younger generations, and others living in the twenty-first century, they would have cocked their heads, wondering if they heard him right. But being the ignorant dragon Solitas was, he drew a sigh and grumbled.

Ahh. I want to get married! I want to meet my wife!

But the problem was that Solitas didn't have any money. He lacked gold and silver. So even if he got married, he wouldn't have any food, that is gold and jewels, to feed his hatchlings. Gold and jewels were food for hatchlings, but Solitas didn't have any. As such, no dragon attempted to get married to him, and that was his biggest problem.

If times were different, I'd have ambushed human cities and threatened them.

Another sigh. Solitas had heard the story from his mother when he was still a hatchling. A long time ago, that is about hundreds of years ago, dragons had it easy. Accumulating treasures wasn't a difficult task. There were lots of convenient methods.

We simply had to attack cities and threaten the kings, kidnap hundreds of dwarf masters and put them into forced labor, or steal the treasure storage of greedy and scheming nobles.

Dragons of the past could easily accumulate wealth in that simple manner, and they got married quite easily. But now, such a method was no longer available. It was hundreds of years ago Dragon King Verkis cooperated with dragons of the older generations to declare to the world “The Dragon Commandment.”

To hell with the Dragon Commandment!

The commandment brought about a myriad of changes to their lifestyle. It banned them from pilfering human cities, and threatening was no longer an acceptable method. Kidnapping dwarves into slavery was equally forbidden. In other words, the commandment declared peace across all races and restricted all dragons from any activities that posed a threat to other races without a clear basis. That was what the commandment was about.

Up yours! It’s so disgusting how they act nice and gentle when they've spent their entire lives putting humans to hard labor and threatening to usurp mountains of their gold and treasures! What a bunch of hypocrites!

Sure, the dragon king Verkis had married a human girl and eliminated an evil dragon that once wiped out the world. And Verkis did devise the commandment with excellent intentions as he brought about peace and prosperity among the races. But Solitas was just a fledgling at 1,050 years old. To him, the commandment was beyond his reason, and he felt particularly so toward the “New Guidelines on Accumulating Wealth,” which was a recommendation in the Dragon Commandment.

No pilfering or threatening other races. And what, veins of treasure ought to be discovered on my own! And since dragons have massive strength and stamina, we are to directly dig up giant minerals that can be found in the mantle, which humans and dwarfs can’t reach. And we should process the minerals with our abilities and magic to produce treasures... Crap.

That was the problem. Solitas had complied with the guideline at first, so the first thing he did after becoming independent was searching for a vein of treasure. He rushed dozens of miles deep into the underground and finally came across a vein of diamond. He dug up large piles of unprocessed diamonds with superior strength and stamina. But he encountered a problem next.

I couldn’t process them.

Solitas put in quite a lot of effort, but his painstaking attempts didn’t translate to good results. Even though he further concentrated his attention and worked harder, the shapes of the diamond came out all rugged and unbalanced. Cracks and chips to the stones were frequent. Not even a single one came out successfully, even though Solitas processed a hundred of them. The reason behind his failure was simple.

Damn these clumsy hands!

Solitas berated his rough and unskilled craftsmanship. No matter how much he toiled away, the result was the same. He wondered if he was cursed with clumsy hands. So even though Solitas spent all his time digging up minerals, his efforts were useless as he couldn’t process the minerals properly. Since poorly processed gems and stones were worthless, he didn’t have a thing to store in his dungeon.

I’m a failure. After all, I failed to get treasures even after I became independent.

The thought caused Solitas to let out another sigh.

I should be accumulating treasures right now. That’s how I can feed my hatchling that will be born when I get married. But I got nothing in my hands. It means my babies will die of hunger even if they come into the world. What kind of foolish dragon out there would want to marry and have babies with me?

Solitas put himself in the shoes of the female dragons, and he instantly knew that he was hopeless. He had no chance in the marriage market, and that was where he was at.

Whew... I don’t know. Should I just give up on marriage?

It had been 50 years since he became a fully-grown dragon. And he was starting to have such thoughts these days. Solitas was scratching the floor of the dungeon in resignation when...

“Hmm...?”

Solitas, who was about to sigh again, stopped and lifted his giant head to gaze at the pathway that led to the outside. He felt something near there.

“Invaders?”

They weren’t near. Actually, the invaders were near the dungeon entrance, which was situated very far from where Solitas was. It was that the magical trap installed there had been activated. But Solitaas soon sensed that the trap got destroyed and dismantled. In other words, there was someone entering the dungeon after breaking the traps. Solitas activated his transcendental senses unique to dragons, and he identified who these invaders were in a flash.

Humans. Two of them. How dare they?!

Boom! Solitas lifted his giant body, his four pillar-like legs rising up later. His wings, whose one side stretched about 200 yards, spread far and wide. His red eyes held a glint of deathly anger.

Good. I was just getting stressed. I shall tear you two into tiny pieces. Grrrr...

Enraged, Solitas walked toward the direction where the invaders were.

Kaboom! An acidic solution was discharged from the stone to flood throughout the tunnel. But the attack didn’t last long.

Swish! Swoosh! A long sword glinted in the air vertically like a streak of lightning. It cut the space in one stroke, slashing the acidic solution that had filled up the space. Then, it was followed by a storm of wind created by the sword.

Kaboom! The overwhelming blow of the sword dried the acidic solution without leaving behind a single drop. And once a vacuum was created for a split second, Javier sprinted ahead.

Jump! Three light jumps. Those were all Javier needed to cover about 100 feet. Then, he wielded his sword as soon as he landed.

Clatter! Boom! A slab of stone marked with a delicate magic circle was sliced in half. The flow of the acidic solution then stopped.

“Whew.”

Javier breathed in. For a split second, Lloyd and Javier fell into danger as he had never expected that a terrible acidic solution would spurt from the stone. Javier turned and looked at Lloyd behind him.

“Are you okay, Young Master?”

“Yeah, roughly.”

Javier heard the nonchalant answer traveling from the outer part of the passage. Later, Lloyd shrugged and appeared in sight. Javier secretly let out a sigh.

What in the world am I doing here? Invading a dragon’s dungeon? Seriously?

It never occurred to Javier that Master Lloyd was being serious about it. Really. About ten days ago, Lloyd had suggested Javier go on a picnic. Javier was confused, so he asked with a grimace on his face why and where this picnic was taking place. Then Lloyd answered...

“To a dragon lair. To meet a dragon.”

At that time, Javier thought it was a joke. He thought so even when Lloyd held out a bag full of food and camping equipment and when they hopped on their horses. Javier simply thought that he was up to something again, but it would only require him to protect Lloyd, and that was it. Nothing more. This mindset lasted throughout their ten-day travel. Sometimes, Javier did ask Lloyd where they were heading, and Lloyd would shrug and say, “I told you. To a dragon lair.” Javier still thought that Master Lloyd was joking in an attempt to mask the real destination for some mysterious reasons. Javier thought that was the reason why Lloyd was throwing such a nasty and corny joke. So, Javier was absolutely shocked that they would be visiting the dragon lair right now!

“Whew...”

Javier never thought that the young master he served was this much of a nutjob. Javier suddenly felt a pang of resignation toward the human race as a whole.

“So I wish to ask once again. Do you have any thoughts on turning back here?” Javier asked sincerely, but Lloyd simply raised his brows.

“No, I don’t.”

“...”

“What? Why? What?”

Javier glared at him.

“I came here because I have a plan. So you simply have to trust me and break through the traps just like you did right now,” explained Lloyd.

“Whew... Sure, I can break through the trap whenever I want, but...”

Javier spoke as he sighed.

“How long do I have to break through these traps? I want to know if I have to charge forward until I encounter the dragon,” asked Javier.

“Yeah, you are correct.”

“...”

“You are to move forward until we meet the dragon,” Lloyd stated.

“...”

“I’ve been telling you all these times,” huffed Lloyd. “We’re heading to a dragon lair. And we’re going to meet a dragon.”

“But-”

“...”

Javier was suspicious of whether Lloyd had a plan. He was dumbfounded, but there wasn’t anything he could do. He had already set foot in the cave.

Should I just trust him again?

Javier gathered himself and remembered that Master Lloyd could be trusted when he acted like this. Lloyd frequently came up with plans that Javier had never even dreamed of in the past. So, he needed to put his faith in Master Lloyd.

And in case Master Lloyd’s measure doesn’t work, I’m going to run to the best of my ability.

Javier was determined such as he walked. He would protect his young master first should an unexpected danger appear.

Creak. Clank! Boom!

A host of traps tried to stop Javier in numerous ways. On top of the acidic solution, a streak of lightning, fire, poison-smeared arrow, and mist explosion attempted to kill him. Falling rocks and nightmarish ghosts. Frigid air and blinding flashlight. Each trap seemed to test Javier’s human limit. But Javier was a sword master and had already surpassed that limit. All he needed to do was wield his sword to slice, break, distort, and split the traps. No amount of clever trickery could deceive his senses, and the traps weren’t enough to hurt him. After moving forward and passing through dozens of passages and corners, a plain lot finally appeared in front of them. A giant creature with red skin was looking down at them.

“So you two are the ones who invaded my dungeon.”

Fwoosh! The red dragon threw the question at them, and it was a simple question. But that alone created a stormy echo across the whole space. But it wasn’t just a simple echo.

“...!”

Javier’s whole body trembled, and the pressure was so powerful that every single cell in his body seemed to scream aloud. So he hurried to stand in front of Lloyd when he felt the shockwave. Raising the sword high, Javier created an aura.

Bzzt!

The brilliant sword light wrapped the sword, and Javier reverberated the aura to engulf the whole space.

Bzzt!

The shockwave flowing from the aura shook the air and trembled at the same speed as the shockwave resonated and canceled one another.

Kaboom!

The two wavelengths crashed right in front of him and dissipated. Right after Javier defended the dragon’s first blow, he wheeled around and spoke.

“Master Lloyd, tell me the plan you have right now.”

It was time to respond. Javier’s voice grew hasty. The collision a moment ago convinced Javier that the dragon wasn’t a fabrication. It was real, so any haphazard response only meant death. Javier was right about it because Solitas drew in another breath once more.

Breath.

Javier could sense it. This dragon was breathing in to let out its most formidable weapon and power—breath. Time was running out. Javier pressed Lloyd once again as he had to act at once.

“Master Lloyd.”

“Yeah? Oh, but you see, my plan is already happening,” Lloyd said.

“Excuse me...?”

Javier didn’t understand what this young master was saying. How was his plan taking place right now?

Just then, Lloyd spoke with a strange smile on his face. “You.”

“Excuse me?” Javier asked again.

“I said, you.”

“...”

No way.

“What are you doing? Go fight,” directed Lloyd.

“...”

Is he serious?

“You can easily beat this dragon,” assured Lloyd.

“...”

Javier gazed at Lloyd incredulously and wondered if his young master had irrevocably lost it. But at the same time, Javier thought it was very strange that Lloyd was so composed. It appeared as though the latter fully trusted Javier without a hint of doubt. Lloyd simply looked at Javier with a composed face and gaze and pointed at the dragon with his cheek. Just then, the red dragon opened its mouth and discharged terrible heat.

Fwoosh! Solitas launched his breath, and the storm of heat, which was like fire from hell, swept over them.

Dragon breath.

Fwoosh! Solitas, the red dragon, opened his giant mouth, and a searing heat gushed out of his throat like torrential waves, burning and destroying the whole area.

“...!”

Javier’s eyes widened in surprise. His instinct signaled danger and commanded him to avoid it at once. Instinct preceded reason, and sense preceded instinct. Javier was already moving before he sensed danger.

Swish!

Javier held out his right hand but didn’t draw his sword. Instead, he grabbed Lloyd’s right shoulder, ducked down, slipped his left hand between Lloyd’s legs, and stood up, carrying Lloyd on his shoulders. Lloyd was taken in the air like a bag of rice. The lifting method was similar to the patient transfer technique taught by South Korean armed forces.

“Eh?”

Javier heard Lloyd’s surprised breath, but he had no time to respond. He jumped to his feet instantly.

Thwack!

He flung his body high with Lloyd on his shoulder, and the dragon breath swept the very spot the two were standing on.

Boooom! The breath overwhelmed the whole place, and Javier felt his hair rising from the horrendous spectacle. At the same time, he noticed something odd.

It’s not hot...

Javier had meant to haul his sword and block the attack with his aura shield as the breath was passing right beside him. That was the only way to block this terrible heat. He was grabbing the hilt of the sword when...

Why isn't it hot?

Javier didn't feel the heat at all, even as the gust of breath brushed just several feet away from him. It simply felt warm and nothing more.

How?

It was truly odd. Sitting in front of a small bonfire would be hotter than this. His face used to get hotter when he grilled meat on a pan. But now wasn't the time to entertain his curiosity.

Tap! Jump!

Javier landed only to leap high once again, growing more distant from the series of breaths coming at him. Just then, he suddenly recalled an event that happened about two hours ago.

Is it because of the cream Master Lloyd had given me?

Right before he entered the fiery den of the dragon, Javier was left rooted to the spot as the intimidating den appeared in his eyes. Lloyd then held out a large bottle to him and spoke.

"Apply it on your body. Make sure to cover every corner of it unless you wish to burn to death."

Javier didn't notice what it was until he opened the cork. An aroma assaulted his nose. It was the Elensia sap Lloyd had acquired from the elves' forest.

"It's not mixed with bean oil. It's in its purest form."

Lloyd spoke as though he was doing a favor to Javier, and he instructed him to remove his clothes and smear every corner of his body with the lotion.

He made him slather his clothes and even his sword. Not a single spot was missed.

“Apply it generously. Don’t even try to be frugal. I know it’s precious, but it doesn’t cost more than your life. So go all out! Smear it so thick that it not only blocks the heat but any human interactions.”

So, Javier did what he was told to do. Not a single strand of hair was left uncoated with the oil. Even the cuticles of his nails received a layer of the lotion.

All that was... for this moment.

Now, it dawned on Javier that this Elensia Tree sap was much more effective than he had vaguely imagined. He could feel it in his bones.

I suppose that was why he was so confident.

Javier actually wondered what it was that made Lloyd swell with confidence when they were entering the dungeon and how he could maintain such composure in the face of the dragon.

“Did you already expect that applying the Elensia sap would protect me from the dragon’s breath?” asked Javier.

“Well, yeah, something like that,” replied Lloyd.

Javier put Lloyd down as soon he landed and hid between the rocks. Lloyd, who was treated like a cargo load a moment ago, scoffed, thinking how right Javier was when he asked if Lloyd believed the sap would work.

“I heard about it,” added Lloyd.

“What do you mean?”

“This method was used by the knight of blood and iron.”

“The knight... of blood and iron?” repeated Javier, dazed.

“Yeah.”

It was true. Javier used this same method in the novel. He smeared his body in the Elensia Tree sap and made armor by solidifying it. Then, he confronted that red dragon, Solitas. The result? He was A-OK even when he was engulfed by his breath. The fight lasted for three days straight. At last, Javier succeeded in snapping the horn of the dragon, making him run for his life when the defeat was near. So, in other words, the act of smearing the Elensia Tree sap was verified to neutralize the red dragon’s breath in the novel.

“But I have a question.”

Javier’s eyes glimmered as he looked at Lloyd.

“I think you mentioned him the other time as well,” said Javier, “Who on earth is this knight of blood and iron?”

“Oh, him? " asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

Who else? It’s you.

Lloyd put on a grin and nonchalantly replied, “Someone who’s way more handsome, stronger, and more popular than you.”

“Are you sure?” Javier’s eyebrow quirked.

“Wow. Look how quick you are to doubt me,” said Lloyd.

“Fine, even if there is such a knight, this is just outrageous,” defied Javier.

“How is it outrageous?”

“This, fighting against the dragon.”

Javier’s eyes grew more serious. The discharge of the dragon breath was thinning now, and he quickly glanced around before speaking.

“It is beyond me what you are after that you should fight the dragon, but he’s never to be taken lightly. Let me correct myself. You will have to risk your life, but that won’t be enough. Did you not consider this risk at all?” asked Javier.

“Well, I did,” drawled Lloyd.

“Then why did you-”

“I had you, so I thought it’d be fine.”

“What?” Javier furrowed his brows, sending a confused gaze at him. He then looked around, and his face suddenly looked urgent. Lloyd continued to speak as he looked at Javier.

“I know that you feel pressured because it’s your first time fighting the dragon, but don’t get scared.”

“What are you saying-”

“I mean, go out and fight,” said Lloyd.

“Eh?”

Tap. Lloyd slightly pushed Javier. He staggered from the unexpected attack and was thrown out in the open.

“Master Lloyd...?”

Javier stared at Lloyd, wide-eyed. Lloyd clenched his fists and cheered the latter.

“You can do it!”

“...!”

Javier cursed his young master under his breath even though he wanted to ream Lloyd out aloud. But he just didn’t have any time for it as he locked his eyes with Solitas.

Whoosh The dragon’s tail flew down like a giant whip just then. It was as though Solitas wasn’t interested in finding out why they barged in. The dragon simply wielded his tail like how humans swatted flies with their hands.

“Hmph!”

Javier drew his sword, but he didn’t think of taking the blow of the giant tail with this sword.

I must ensure Master Lloyd’s safety first.

Jump! He leaped high to tear himself far away from the crack of the rock where Lloyd was hiding. To Javier’s relief, the dragon's tail pursued him, crashing down on him like a mountain falling down from the sky.

Boooom! The ground shook, and the inside of the dungeon blared. Javier, who closely avoided the splattering rocks and overwhelming shockwave, started to sprint ahead.

The dragon’s much faster than I’d thought.

Javier became nervous. He could feel his back breaking out in a cold sweat. The tail blow came half a second earlier than Javier expected.

If I had been a little slower and tried to induce him to attack me, he’d have killed me.

Javier’s hair stood on end. One blow, and he was done for. It didn’t make any difference that he was a sword master. From then on...

Then I must speed up as well.

Zing! He activated his three mana circles and made his movement faster.

Tap! He jumped to his feet, throwing himself as he dashed like the wind. Going against gravity, he ran as he used the wall as his footing. Solitas started to attack him.

Rumble! He whacked him with his tail and struck down with his front paws. Then, he spread his wings to create a storm, flying high and using magic against Javier. Fiery and icy blasts of wind wreaked havoc in the place. But Javier managed to closely avoid all the attacks and succeeded in drawing the dragon far from Lloyd. As he watched the fight from a distance, Lloyd brimmed with confidence.

I knew it.

Javier was strong, and he was now more powerful than when he fought against the dragon in the novel. So, there was a zero chance that Javier would lose to that red dragon.

That's why I brought you here. And besides, that dragon should be a surprisingly easy opponent.

The red dragon Solitas was a powerful dragon. There was no debate about it. But at the same time, he was not that powerful.

Sure, he's naturally powerful because he's a dragon to the point that no living creatures could dare compete with him. But he's weak when compared with the other dragons. He's almost the weakest, actually. The reason is simple. He's young. Just a fledgling.

The Knight of Blood and Iron's plot suddenly came to Lloyd's mind. It must have been the episode where Javier went on an adventure in the woods of the elves. The last part of the episode tackled the confrontation between Javier and Solitas, and it mentioned something about Solitas.

He's young. About 1,050 years old. Just 50 years since he outgrew the hatchling phase. He's about as old as a high school student.

A dragon's power was directly proportional to its age. That is, the older they were, the stronger they became.

It's similar to a human's wealth. People normally advance in their careers and make more money over the years on the condition that they get a job and work consistently. So, comparing a dragon's combat power to a human's wealth, he'd be on a similar level as a high school student's bank account at the moment.

That was the combat power of Solitas.

So, Javier, you can win. Don't cower. Trample him. Dampen his spirit and show that you're more powerful.

Javier's task for today was clear: highlight their difference in power and prove that he was on another level. That was the only way Lloyd could proceed to the next step of his plan.

Humans and dragons alike, it's the same. They all become meek and modest in the presence of the strong. That's why he must discourage him. So, that the red dragon will be ready to hear my offer. From there, I can start the negotiation.

Lloyd needed help from the red dragon to efficiently take care of the sludge that would come out from the sewer he would build next. And so, the dragon's help couldn't come without negotiation and persuasion.

Javier, don't just avoid his attacks! Whack him!

Lloyd stared at Javier, internally waving his cheer sticks at him. Javier was crisscrossing the area, closely avoiding Solitas's attacks that came incessantly. Suddenly, there appeared a light of determination in his eyes.

Dragging things will only put me at a disadvantage. It's going to put Master Lloyd at risk. I must barrage the dragon with attacks. I should do a hit-and-run. Knock him out and retreat.

Running away like this wasn't going to achieve anything. But it was equally foolish to fight the dragon head-on. It was more foolish to drag things to no end. Therefore, he ought to go all out in one stroke to stop the dragon from attacking. The moment the dragon flinched, he would take Lloyd and run to somewhere safe.

I can do it.

Evasion instead of direct confrontation. Javier's eyes flashed with determination after he decided on his tactic. His execution had to come without hesitation, and his offense had to be unreserved.

Grip! The moment Javier tightened his grip, the counterattack began.

Ziiing! Three mana circles rotated, sucking the mana around him. After he amplified it, he transferred it to his manaheart.

Crash! Boom!

His manaheart thumped with his heart, racing fast in rapid beats as the latter took in the amplified mana. The mana then was pressed and compressed with intense pressure, and it started to grow denser and purer. Javier shoved the mana once again.

Swoosh!

The highly purified mana that was compressed through the manaheart hung once again at the mana circle. It was amplified in that compressed state three times through the three strands of the circles. It went berserk as it rushed along his veins and muscles and cells and nerves and joints. All his senses were awakened. His energy turned fierce.

Fwoooosh!

Two contrasting auras appeared around Javier. They were sharp, clear, and vivid. But at the same time, they were soft, hazy, and vague. The two contrasting auras invaded the other's space, mixing, pulling, pushing, and resisting each other. But a second later, they collided at last.

Kaboom!

There came about a massive explosion in the sword. At the same time, an explosion similar to Javier's heart took place. It was a mana blast.

Boom!

The two strands of the mana circle crushed, wrapping around the heart, and the powerful surge of the giant mana ran along his veins like turbulent waves. They passed his hands and swirled around his sword to meet the collision of the two auras. The aura collision. Explosive mana blast. The two powers, which were likened to enraging waves, were mixed and worked to amplify each other. This explosive synergy became a torrent that swept everything away, and it came out of the sword's end to fearlessly aim at the shoulder of the dragon.

Thwack!

Javier's aura-charged mana blast, his trump card, pierced the dragon's shoulder.

Chapter 147: Single No More (2)

Kaboom! The mana blast was laden with the aura's cutting power, splitting the air and space around it. And it finally pierced the dragon's shoulder.

"Argh...!"

Solitas screamed in spite of himself as his shoulder was penetrated. It was about a 1.6-foot hole, and of course, it was small compared to his gigantic figure. And his life wasn't in danger because the attack simply hit his shoulder. To analogize, it was as though a pencil or pen was rammed into a person's shoulder. But since it was still an injury, Solitas was in pain. Very badly. Solitas never had any instance of this kind of injury after he was born into this land as one of the proud dragons. But right now, his mouth hung wide open by the unfamiliar pain that shook him. And it was too painful to act cool and endure.

"Arggggggh!!!!!!!"

He almost teared up and wretchedly yearned for his mother. Healing magic and whatnot, nothing mattered to him at all at this moment.

"Ack!! Ughh!!"

Flustered by the sudden blow, Solitas stomped as he retreated dozens of feet. He broke out in a cold sweat in between his scales.

What on earth is that?

He was flustered and couldn't wrap his head around it. His gaze darted to Javier.

That thing is human, right?

Indeed he was. Solitas couldn't find any trace of another dragon morphed into a human. But this human just penetrated his shoulder with a long sword that was the size of a toothpick.

If the attack pierced somewhere else like my head, neck, or chest, and dug a hole in my brain or lungs...

"..."

It wouldn't end with pain. He would be in much worse trouble.

I don't get it. How is this possible? He's only a human, and I'm a dragon. How can a human pierce my shoulder in one blow?

If he were to write a novel out of it, the story would only invite mockery and scorn from his dragon readers for its ridiculousness. But such an absurd event just took place. A sense of dismay rushed through him, along with pain. And another emotion started to surge within him. Anger.

How dare he?!

Fwoosh! Solitas's eyes changed, and his enormous body was wrapped in white light. The healing magic was at work. His shoulder was treated immediately, but the magic failed to heal his pride.

Don't you dare think you'll be safe after insulting me this much!

Solitas spread his ginormous wings wide, and he hurtled as he created a storm of wind enough to send the house away. He crushed the ground, and the whole dungeon rumbled with every step he took. Solitas wiped the space where Javier was standing with his mammoth head.

Crash!

Combine the head and neck, and the length reached well over 131 feet. The blow contained that much overpowering size and weight, and strength. The ground split, the walls crashed, and the ceiling collapsed. A portion of the dungeon was destroyed to dust by one blow. But Solitas didn't stop his attack because this despicable human, who penetrated his shoulder and hurt his pride, was easily avoiding the attack.

"You flea!"

Fwish!

Like an eagle going after a fruit fly or a polar bear trying to catch snowflakes in her hands, Solitas wielded and brandished his wings and body all around. He whipped with his head and neck, leaped high with his hindlegs, scratched with his claws, and created a storm by fluttering his wings. The demolition was happening in real-time. The inside of the plaza was crushed and collapsed, but Javier evaded every single ferocious attack. He was like a mosquito hovering over someone's head during summer or fine dust penetrating a mask filter. Javier managed to avoid and evade every attack and did so with great ease.

"..."

Javier was slightly disconcerted by this. To his surprise, he wasn't going out of breath. The dragon's attack was so obvious in his eyes, and as he avoided the dragon's front leg coming down, Javier thought to himself...

Could it be that the dragon is weak? Or am I strong?

Javier couldn't point out which one was which. But there was one thing that he was certain about. Dealing with the dragon wasn't as hard as he had pegged it to be.

This fight's doable.

Javier helplessly laughed though it was faint. Right now, the enraged dragon was going berserk with his ginormous body and weight and throwing every possible attack he could manage. But Javier wasn't particularly scared or pressured. Sure, the dragon's attack was fast and powerful, but he was faster. Even though the dragon closed in on Javier with his gargantuan attacks, Javier never failed to miss his chance to escape. All he needed to do was find the dragon's blind spot and counterattack.

Jump! Javier leaped high in the air and narrowly dodged the dragon's crushing tail. He heard the crashing noise down below, and shards of rocks flew up by the impact. But Javier succeeded in reading the trajectory of every single one of the hundreds of dangerous rock pieces at once. And his senses allowed him to react like a smooth flow of water. He stepped on seven rocks one after another as though he was climbing up a staircase in midair. He jumped, stepped, changed his direction seven times, and finally, he used the mana blast.

Boom! The repulsion power of the blast threw his body, and he was tossed to the ground. He came within a hair's breadth of getting slashed by the dragon's front leg.

Whoosh! Javier brought out his sword naturally as he saw the front leg pass him. He then summoned an aura.

Slay! Slash! He left a scratch on the dragon's front leg, skinning five layers of his scales. Blood gushed out of it.

"Eek!"

Solitas flinched his front leg after being slashed in his baby toe finger. He teared up a little at the sting. But Javier was merciless.

Slash! Clash! Slash!

Javier jumped and sat on Solitas's wrist, and he slayed him with his aura-charged sword, leaving three cut marks there.

"Ack! Ouch!"

Solitas quickly dusted off his leg and rubbed his wrist with the other leg. But Javier had already jumped and landed far away.

What the! Ack!

Solitas started to go bananas. He had heard of how humans frantically flailed about in the middle of the night in summer to catch an elusive fly during their sleep. And now, he understood what it felt like. But, no matter how many times he wielded his front legs and tried to swing his tails and wings and sweep the whole space clean, Solitas utterly failed to catch the little human.

Is he that infamous sword master? But he's so different from what my mother told me. The sword master I know about isn't this strong. He seems to be way stronger than those I'd heard of.

At the terrorizing realization, Solitas had to admit it. He can't put up a fight against this man, both in the physical and magical fight. To that man over there, he was nothing but a large punching bag, the good kind that makes people happy when they jab. As such, there was only one conclusion.

I should run.

Solitas was determined. He wasn't going to keep his pride as a dragon because he was sure that he'd die at this rate. No matter how hard he frantically tried, this human could not be caught. But, on the other hand, the man was doing clear damage to him. So, in the long run, he'd be defeated. It was the truth he didn't want to admit but had to.

My life is more valuable than my pride. He had 9,000 years more to live. So, he didn't wish to fight out of his pride and meet a meaningless death.

It's not like my pride will give me money. So it's wiser to live realistically!

So, it was decided. He had to escape before the situation got worse. Make a new dungeon in a more clandestine area. Train more and get stronger. Then, avenge.

50 years will be enough. That human brat will have weakened by then. So, I'm going to pester and harass him to the point he'll want to die and pay him back for the shame I felt today.

Since a decision was made, it was time to act. Solitas executed his escape plan right away. The first step was to let out a breath.

"You impertinent brat! Die! Hmphhh!"

Swooosh! Solitas snarled intimidatingly and drew in a large amount of air. He then mixed the mana of the dragon heart to his breath filling in his lungs. Then, let out a fiery burst of energy.

Kaboom! Fiery breath as hot as hellfire rushed out of his mouth to strike the elusive silver-haired brat. But Solitas wasn't happy. After all, the breath was just a decoy. Solitas proceeded to take the next step he had in mind.

Now!

Dash! He quickly moved his manaheart and covered the mana's arrangement he had artificially devised. At the same time, his gigantic body changed shape quickly.

Swaa...

A mysterious light enveloped his body. By the time it was gone, Solitas was already a human. Solitas just used "polymorph," which allowed him to morph into any race in the world.

Okay, time to get out!

The giant dragon was nowhere to be found now. There was only a tall red-haired young man. Solitas began to sprint toward the dungeon entrance.

Okay, faster now!

He had to get out of this dungeon before the impact of the breath he had just fired was lost and before the silver-haired man discovered his escape. He had to leave this area using teleportation as soon as he stepped out of the dungeon. That was the escape plan Solitas had in mind.

Dammit. I wish I could use teleportation magic right now, right here!

Solitas muttered to himself as he ran ahead. Teleportation allowed him to teleport anywhere in a flash, but he couldn't use it in his dungeon because he had meticulously installed the magic circle that disrupted the magic.

I was so foolish 50 years ago!

Certainly, he never imagined an event like this would occur when he first built the dungeon. It never occurred to him that he would have to abandon his dungeon to escape. So he did what the other dragons did, which involved following the exemplary and go-to method shared with him by his mother. He only paid special attention to protecting the outside invaders by faithfully referring to them. That was the reason why he thoroughly installed a magic circle that disrupted teleportation.

Dammit. Dammit!

He couldn’t use teleportation because of the disruption, using it would only distort and jumble the coordinates. In the worst-case scenario, he’d be disintegrated into pieces and sent to all sorts of places. He knew that better than anyone and simply endeavored to run as far as he could. He ran toward the exit to survive, trusting his two solid legs. But just then, his eyes met the eyes of the man of his nightmare.

“Dragon?”

“...!”

The silver-haired knight appeared out of nowhere and had his sword pointed at Solitas. Even though he had asked a question to confirm the latter’s identity, the intruder’s eyes brimmed with confidence that the man standing in front of him was the red dragon.

“I’m not a dragon,” Solitas blurted in a hurry.

“...”

The silver-haired knight grimaced. Solitas regretted, feeling his sixth vertebrae shiver. What a buffoon! That response Solitas just gave him was totally a silly answer. And he regretted keeping his hair color red after polymorphing. But it was too late. The silver-haired knight held up his knife and brought his blade to Solitas’s neck as he walked over. Solitas could feel it.

I’m done for.

He was cornered. Now, there was no time to go back to his original shape. His head would be cut before changing back. He could resist using magic, but it won’t do. His neck would be slayed the moment he moved his mana. The same thing would happen if he opted to ambush this human.

I barely put up a fight even when I was a dragon, so now, it’d be worse...

There was zero chance of winning.

If only I was 1,000 years older.

This kind of treatment would have been avoided if he were older. Berating his predicament, Solitas realized that his time had come. So, he prepared for the last time to resist the silver-haired knight, who was coming near. I might as well self-explode, Solitas said to himself venomously. He started to move his dragon heart little by little, rearranging his mana. The plan was to make all the mana in him collide and lead to a destructive explosion. It would be enough to wipe out this whole place. At last, when the knight came close, just three steps far...

Now!

The young dragon clenched his teeth and tightened the final trigger for self-explosion. Tears welled up in the corners of his eyes.

It’s so unfair. I’m going to explode now with a boom.

And his last moment was with no other than this despicable human. And just like that, he would perish without ever walking the aisle or dating a female dragon even once. All sorts of things he wanted to do crossed his mind. Holding front legs, walking to her dungeon and giving a kiss, exchanging love letters through telepathy, wiping the cream off the lips with dragon breath, proposing on one knee, etc... Solitas would be deprived of such sweet experiences, and he’ll end up a forever-alone bachelor dragon ghost. The thought of it made him feel cheated by life. It seemed like he would burst into tears as his eyelashes fluttered. But right before streaks of tears flowed down...

“Excuse me, Mister Dragon. Are you interested in listening to my offer? Then you’ll be able to get married within 10 years for sure.”

Just then, Solitas heard a sweet, tempting voice out of the blue.

Chapter 148: Single No More (3)

Solitas heard a sweet temptation out of nowhere. Just hearing it sweetened his ears. Solitas flinched at the unexpected cajoling.

“What...?”

He suddenly stopped the self-explosion he had meant to activate and turned toward the voice. Another human was standing there. Solitas had seen the guy right before he fired the first breath. This man was with the silver-haired knight, and he had dark hair.

“An offer? You? To me?” asked Solitas.

“Yes. Me. To you.”

Lloyd grinned and continued to speak.

“It is just as I said a while ago. If you are interested, please hear me out.”

“So what, you can get me married in ten years if I listen to your offer?” asked Solitas.

“Indeed.”

“How do I trust you?” Solitas grimaced as he alternately looked at Javier and Lloyd, who were both standing in his front and back. “To be honest, I was tempted to listen to you, but I simply can’t trust you. Think about it. You two are intruders who invaded my dungeon.”

“Excuse me? Intruders? No way.”

Lloyd noticed that Solitas’s eyes grew rough, so he licked his lips.

“I came here bearing a good offer and nothing more.”

“Ha! Bullcrap. Then why did you break down all the magic traps?” blurted Solitas.

“To live,” said Lloyd matter-of-factly.

“What?”

“The magic circles were too delicately laid,” defended Lloyd, “They were too fatal. So, I had no choice and did my best to survive. And in the process, I had to damage some of your traps. I offer my sincere apology if it upset you. I profusely apologize.”

“What...”

Solitas was out of words to rebut. The words this man was uttering made sense. And before Solitas could come up with a likely response, Lloyd intercepted the chance and spoke first.

“Anyway, that is why I worked our butt off to get here. To make you a nice offer.”

“And what could that be?” Solitas spoke with hesitation in his voice.

“Don’t you want to learn how to process jewels from a great craftsman?”

“What?” Solitas flinched, his eyes growing wide.

“I will get right down to business,” Lloyd hurriedly said, “my respectable dragon, I know your concern. You have clumsy hands, don’t you? You have been having trouble with processing jewels, and so you have been unable to save any treasures and were disheartened because you failed to get married. Am I wrong?”

“How did you...” murmured Solitas in disbelief.

“That problem can be fixed. It’s okay that you’re not so crafty. It can be worked with. That is, by receiving strenuous training from a great master for about ten years. Then, you’ll be able to master how to process raw minerals,” suggested Lloyd.

“H-hold on. Hold on,” Solitas stopped Lloyd just then, and with eyes filled with fright, he asked, “How did you know that I was clumsy and having issues with my marriage? How? How?”

Solitas was flustered and unsettled. He had never engaged with humans before; it had been only about 50 years since he became a grown-up dragon. That meant he had never had any experience or encounter with humans, not to mention other dragons or similar races. But here was a human who knew his exact personal concern. In fact, he couldn’t be any more right about it.

What in the world is this human?

Solitas couldn’t wrap his head around how a mere human was aware of his personal concern. Was he a ghost? Or was he an old dragon disguised as a human? Or was he a great magician or prophet who had reached the highest possible intellectual limit? Solitas was mixed with emotions. Caution and curiosity rushed through him. Lloyd smiled respectfully.

“It was not hard to find out,” stated Lloyd.

“How so?”

“The knight of blood and iron has told me.”

“The knight of the blood and iron?” repeated Solitas.

“Yes.”

“Who... is he?”

“A massively powerful knight. So strong and powerful that he can surveil this place, fooling your senses,” explained Lloyd.

“That’s a lie,” defied Solitas as he wrinkled his nose. “You are lying to me. A human can never be that strong. How can anyone slip out so furtively that my senses don’t pick it up? That is impossible. Do you think such a human exists?”

“Yes, I do,” answered Lloyd.

“How?”

“Did you not see that friend over there?”

Lloyd spoke nonchalantly before pointing at Javier.

“I am sure you can remember,” continued Lloyd, “how he managed to put up a great fight against you with nothing but a sword.”

“That’s because...”

“The knight of blood and iron is stronger than him,” Lloyd said with finality in his voice.

Of course, it was true. When Javier held the title of the “Knight of the Blood and Iron” in the novel, he was stronger than his present self. He was already a grandmaster. He had six circles, and fooling a fledgling dragon was a piece of cake.

“The knight has told me that there is a dungeon in this place but without any treasures. But even the small amount of collected ones are terrible in quality,” said Lloyd.

“So what, you just speculated about my situation based on his story?” Solitas said.

“Yes,” said Lloyd as he nodded. His voice now brimmed with confidence. “How can I dare then guess your predicament and concern in any other way?”

The aforementioned knight was a fabricated figure. He was the Javier that existed in a novel that wasn’t written in this world. So, what Lloyd was saying was actually a bluff. But there was no way Solitas could check whether he was lying or not. As such, Lloyd knew that he had to be more confident at a time like this. That way, the bluff that was likely to be called would be unquestioned and believable.

“Hmm...”

A deep wrinkle sat in between Solitas’s forehead. Doubt, concern, curiosity, and interest all fought in his head. Solitas wondered if he could trust this human and whether he was telling the truth. But something in his words was too convincing to dismiss it as a lie.

He hit the nail on the head when he spoke of my concern.

His clumsy hands prevented him from processing pieces of minerals and accumulating treasures. And his bleak prospect of staying single forever hurt and wrung his heart. Yet, this human boasted that he could solve his very secret that no one could've found out about unless they had spied on the inside of his dungeon. And so, what this dark-haired figure was ridiculously saying could be true. But Solitas wanted more confirmation first as it wouldn't hurt him anyway. So, Solitas made a decision after some thinking.

"So you came here with a good offer?" said Solitas.

"Yes, I did."

Gotcha, you're mine, dragon. Convinced, Lloyd put on a beaming smile written with the words "trust, faithfulness, and honesty." He salivated his lips. Javier was watching the whole thing and thought to himself...

Knight of blood and iron?

He had heard of the name before. Lloyd had mentioned it last time.

I wonder who that is.

Javier was curious. The knight was said to be stronger than him, but he had never heard of him even once.

Is he a nameless fellow who trains, shunning the world? That makes it even stranger. Why would such a man secretly help Master Lloyd?

The knight was said to be more powerful than him and have secret communication with Lloyd. However, Javier thought those two points didn't add up.

It’s strange. Really. Plus, I’ve never seen Master Lloyd meeting someone behind my back. Did he meet the knight after putting me to sleep with his lullaby?

The more he thought about it, he became nonplussed. At the same time, however, he didn’t consider the knight to be a fabricated figure. It was so because of the image he had built of Lloyd.

After all, he doesn’t operate based on untrustworthy information and plan.

To Javier, Lloyd was a small-hearted man who was stingy, fastidious, and sly. He also was the type to work his ass off to make sure things would always be advantageous for him. In other words, he was a cowardly man. It was a universal law that a timorous man tended to be more careful.

Master Lloyd is a fastidious and meticulous man. He never makes a move based on untrustworthy information and plans. Never. He’d think that would hurt him. So, it only means that Master Lloyd knew in advance of the dragon dungeon situation. He must have gotten some tips from a reliable source and operated after careful planning.

And the plan was happening right now.

So that only means that the knight of the blood and iron, who had tipped Master Lloyd, is an actual living person.

Javier wondered who on earth this knight was. The more speculative he became, the more he became curious. On the one hand, he was slightly awed by Lloyd for the simple fact that the latter was trying to strike a deal with the dragon.

He used the information to design this whole thing.

Master Lloyd brought him here to fight the dragon, and Javier managed to suppress the dragon and stamped in the latter’s memory that Javier held the upper hand in the fight, breaking the pride unique to dragons. Afterward, Lloyd proceeded to offer a sweet deal, showcasing his brilliant eloquence.

That silver tongue itself alone is a weapon.

But Master Lloyd’s eloquence didn’t appear randomly. He always first created an environment and situation that would make his eloquence 100% effective. The man always struck a perfectly crafted deal. That was why he was able to see such massive and efficient results.

Regardless, he’s a scary being.

And now, the poor dragon was falling into Lloyd's trap. Javier gazed at Solitas with a sympathetic gaze. Right now, Solitas was almost buying what Lloyd was saying.

“It is just as I have said. You are going to learn from the best craftsman. You will be his apprentice,” said Lloyd.

“An apprentice of a master?”

“Yes. You see, a great master lives in my fiefdom.”

“Who is that?” asked Solitas.

“He is Wels Corgidus, the royal dwarf master.”

“He’s a dwarf, eh? And his name is Corgidus?”

Solitas’s eyes trembled a bit. Since Corgidus was both a master and dwarf, there wasn’t any need to verify his skills. Obviously, the man was to be the best of the best.

“Then... I am supposed to be the dwarf’s apprentice and learn how to process the stones?”

“Yes. Tell me, is your pride hurt?”

“Hmm...”

To be honest, his pride hurt a little, but when he heard what Lloyd said after, his thoughts changed.

“Just bend your pride a little, and you’ll soon have a girlfriend. Become rich, get married, and have a lovey-dovey newlywed life. You’ll have children and start a happy family.”

“Is that so?” asked Solitas, intrigued. “And go on a honeymoon?”

“No need to ask such an obvious question.”

“...”

Breathing became heavier for Solitas. But he recovered composure being the dragon he was.

“Hmm, your offer is good indeed, and that’s why I am still doubtful,” said Solitas.

“Doubtful? How so?”

“Because it appears that you are giving me too much. I am sure you have something you want from me?”

“Of course,” said Lloyd, “I was just about to tell you.”

“Do tell.”

“Yes. I shall be straightforward. I want you to use your breath every once a month in a place near my fiefdom.”

“You want me to use my breath...?”

“Yes.”

Solitas was confused because he didn’t understand Lloyd right away. So, Lloyd continued to speak.

“My fiefdom is planning to build sewers. It’s a facility that divides, separates, and treats all sorts of sewage and bodily wastes through underground tunnels.”

“So?”

“It will leave a massive load of residue called sludge in the process.”

“Could you mean-”

“Yes,” said Lloyd, “You are a dragon. You guessed it already. And your guess is indeed correct.”

“Do you want me to burn this sludge with my breath?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head.

“The amount is just too much to treat and incinerate with my hands. It’s difficult and dangerous. But with your breath, all it takes is ten seconds. You can easily turn the sludge into ash.”

Lloyd was telling the truth. No matter how much he racked his brain, there simply wasn’t any way to treat the sludge. It was so even when he mobilized magicians.

Even the hellish fire magic by the best palatial magicians won’t do.

Sure, the hellish fire magic would be scorchingly hot, but it barely lasted a few seconds. The range of such magic was also narrow, so it would be needed more than once to take care of the sludge. There was also a chance of splattering the dirty and messy sludge. On the other hand, the dragon breath was different.

The temperature is just incredible.

Plus, its range and the time the high heat lasted were just on another level. In other words, one breath every month was enough to turn the piles of sludge into ash.

Then, I’ll be able to use them as fertilizers.

That was Lloyd’s plan. To actualize his plan, he finalized his pitch.

“If you consider the job of taking care of the sludge dirty, then I guess I cannot help you. You can turn down my offer and live the rest of your life in this dim dungeon forever alone.”

“...”

Forever alone. That gripped Solitas’s heart.

C-crap.

Hesitation gripped Solitas. The offer this human was making required him to break his pride twice. Once by being an apprentice of the dwarf master. Second by taking care of the sludge left by the bodily waste. But if he swallowed his pride...

I can live the rest of my life in happiness.

Successful courtship and marriage. The dream he has yearned for so direly would come true.

Should I give it... a try?

Solitas was intrigued. Of course, he was completely in the dark about what fate awaited him in the novel as well as how he confronted Javier regarding the woods of the elves. And how in the end, Javier cut his horn and made him run for his life. And how he met a tragic end after living 500 years in bitterness. But right now, instead of that life, he was put on a sweet path of new choices thanks to Lloyd. Solitas finally made the decision that would change his fate.

“All right. I shall take up your offer.”

“You made the right choice.”

Flap! Lloyd beamed as he took out a piece of document. It was the symbol of capitalism he had planned in advance for this moment. This paper was more grounded and wretched than a magical pact and not even humans, orcs, elves, and dragons could ever evade it. It was an outsourcing employment contract.

Chapter 149: Construction Guideline (1)

One day later. Lloyd, Javier, and Solitas returned to Frontera county. The trip was a breeze, thanks to Solitas, who teleported both of them with his magic. All they did was step out of the dungeon, stand out of the disruptive magic circle's influence, and allow Solitas to transport them to their destination. Then, after some flashes, crackles, and momentary pangs of nausea, a familiar scene appeared in front of “Welcome to Frontera county,” Lloyd said.“Please, follow me this way.”

Lloyd then guided Solitas to Corgidus, the dwarf master. As soon as Lloyd saw Corgidus, he immediately requested Solitas for a place here.

“Excuse me, master Corgidus,” Lloyd called.

“Why are you here? I am swamped with work,” the dwarf curtly replied.

“Of course, I understand that you’re busy. But this affair pertains to what I have told you before,” said Lloyd further.

“What you have told me before?” Corgidus, who was clanging his metal hammer aloud at length, said as he lifted his head. When he saw Solitas behind Lloyd, he raised his brows.

“I have never seen that face around here before,” he continued. “Is he-”

“Yes, he is the one,” said Lloyd. “You have accepted my request before, right? My request about how I asked you to take up an apprentice.”

It really was the case. Lloyd succeeded in persuading Corgidus in advance prior to leaving for the dragon dungeon. With expensive wine and delicious snacks in his embrace, Lloyd groveled as he drank together with the dwarf. And he made sure to inflate Corgidus’s pride as a master until the atmosphere ripened and Corgidus became a happy drunk. Lloyd then sneakily asked for a favor, how there is this young man who is very clumsy with his craft. He asked the dwarf if he could help this unfortunate youngster to get better. But of course, Corgidus flatly turned him down. Corgidus said that he despised the mere thought of having an apprentice under him. It was a fruitless and bothersome endeavor.

But Lloyd's response to Corgidus's rejection was unusual. With a solemn look on his face, Lloyd spoke straightforwardly and explained that this young man was actually a dragon. And the fiefdom was in need of that dragon's help. But it can only happen if the dragon was properly compensated with a reward, which was the teachings of the master, that is, Corgidus. It was rare for Lloyd to be this forthright, but it worked. No, who knows, maybe it was Lloyd's usual propriety and cap-in-hand attitude toward Corgidus that worked. Nevertheless, Corgidus accepted the offer. This was the event a few days ago.

"So... the one who stands behind you is the gentleman you mentioned the last time?" Corgidus said.

Corgidus knew that Solitas wasn't a human but a dragon, which was the race that was almost an enemy because it had enslaved a legion of dwarf masters in the distant past. Just then, a glint of naughtiness appeared in Corgidus's gaze.

"So, to borrow the expression of this young master, I heard that you are a helpless clumsy fellow, eh?" teased Corgidus.

"..."

Solitas nodded, his cheeks blushing red. But it was a mystery why it happened. It could be because of the truth bomb Corgidus just hauled at him. Or it could be because of the shameful reality that he had to stoop down to become an apprentice of a dwarf. Or it could be out of the awkwardness of being in a place other than the dragon dungeon. No one knew except for this dragon himself. Whatever the case was, Solitas behaved with courtesy and gentleness, which was surprising.

"Yes, and I came here prepared," Solitas said. "I am ready to lay aside my pride, so please teach me."

“It wouldn’t be easy even for the master to deliver the man from the curse of clumsy hands. Expect to be scolded, as it will happen a lot,” warned Corgidus.

“I expected nothing less. No, I expect nothing less,” said Solitas.

Going out on a date and getting married. Solitas had made the resolution to be humble to live a life of a happy dragon. He was willing to bear the brunt of learning from the dwarf. And besides, this figure was set to save him from the misery of being a poor craftsman. Solitas thought that this dwarf deserved to be treated as his master.

“Good,” said Corgidus.

A content smile appeared in between his beard. From that day on, Solitas became an apprentice to Corgidus. He was made to spend in the latter’s lodging and learned to process the jewels. Of course, the process involved all sorts of scolding. Nagging was an everyday event. There were also times when Corgidus reamed Solitas out so much that the dragon teared up. But Solitas never ever talked back to his master. He instead quietly put more effort, softly comforting himself that all of these were for getting into a relationship. Overcome this, and it was farewell to forever single. And because he stayed quiet and wordless, nobody knew that he was a dragon, minus Lloyd, Javier, and Corgidus. The rest of the people in the fiefdom simply regarded him as a red-haired young man who learned things from Corgidus with daily scolding and nagging. Anyway, Lloyd was relieved after he saw that he had successfully recruited Solitas.

It’s completed. I have the laborers, stones, and sludge treatment for the sewer construction. Every element is in place.

The sewer had to be constructed before the winter. That was the only way to prevent the spread of the infectious disease that would plague the whole fiefdom the following spring. So with that determination in mind, Lloyd swung into action and knuckled down to design the project. But before that, he didn’t forget to upgrade his design skills.

This project covers a vast area. No. It's super vast as it's happening across the whole fiefdom.

As such, the current intermediate-level design skill wasn't enough. He needed to improve his skill to design the whole place in one go.

Designing is quite different from surveying. For the latter, I can attain topographical data by simply looking around the place several times even if the range is limited. But it's not the case with the design. The data doesn't get picked up automatically. I'll have to design everything one by one.

But if the design range was narrow, Lloyd had to stop midway when he was designing very well.

To analogize, it'd be like the difference between automatic and manual transmission. Surveying gathers the data all by itself once I use the skill. But the design requires me to manipulate the data laboriously one by one. It's like pressing the clutch each time I change the manual transmission.

In actuality, it was more laborious than what he described. What was worse was that the design was prone to error when the design skill is used more frequently.

Even a tiny mistake is impermissible to this project. The moment the waste water leaks from the sewer, I'm done for.

Once it does, it will seep into the underground and contaminate the underground water. Then, it would be the start of the epidemic, a reenactment of what Lloyd had seen in the Ending Spoiler.

I can't let that happen. So, I should level up since it's been a while since I did.

Thinking that leveling up may be more convenient and reduce the possibility of making mistakes, Lloyd opened the skill window and selected the design skill in the list.

Ding Dong.

A detailed information of the design skill appeared.

[Intermediate Design: Lv 6]

[Volume of structure that can be projected at once: 729,000]

[Skill Options: ① Map Printing ② Floor Plan Marking (2D) ③ Simulation Mode]

[Required RP to level up: 200]

I'm already at intermediate level 6.

Lloyd didn't invest his RP to level up. But because he had finished several large-scale construction projects, the skill leveled up on its own.

Okay, time to splurge my RP now.

The job involved spending a large amount of RP, which was as precious as gold and his own blood. Lloyd breathed in and out first before clicking on the "Skill Level Up" menu.

[You are leveling up the design skill to <Intermediate Level 7.>]

[Required RP to level up: 200]

[Current RP: 4,070]

[Proceed and level up the skill?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes.

As soon as Lloyd nodded...

Ding Dong!

A message appeared along with a pleasing dinging noise.

[Skill Level Up!]

[Intermediate Design: Lv 7]

[Volume of structure that can be projected at once: 1,000,000]

[Skill Options: ① Map Printing ② Floor Plan Marking (2D) ③ Simulation Mode]

[Required RP to level up: 220]

He leveled up, and the design range increased. But he didn't intend to stop with this.

Duh. I should do it right while I'm at it. That is until my level is raised.

Since he was investing anyway, he might as well do so until his class increases and he gets a new optional skill. Soon, the level reached 7 and 8 and until 10. And when he invested 280 RP once more, the message Lloyd finally waited for appeared in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Your skill class has reached <Advanced>.]

[A new skill option has been made available following your change in skill class.]

[Current RP: 2,870]

Perfect.

Lloyd clenched his fists. The design's volume was four times wider, which set him back about 1,200 RP. But Lloyd now had a new optional skill.

Optional skill is important. What is this? Construction Guideline?

Lloyd opened the window to learn more about the optional skill.

[Skill Option 4: Construction Guideline - The blueprint you have designed is marked in the actual terrain in the form of the guideline. This guideline will be visible not only to the designer but also to the workers on the site, and the workers will learn in real-time whether they are faithfully adhering to the blueprint (The Construction Guideline is synced to ② Floor Plan Marking (2D.).]

What the heck?

Lloyd read the description once again, and that enlightened him a little more about what this new optional skill could do.

So, the floor plan marking only I could see will previously be visible to the workers from now on. At the same time, they will receive immediate notice whether the construction is taking place according to the blueprint.

Lloyd thought this skill was something. If it could do just what the description said, the work efficiency will jump to a whole new degree. Expectant, Lloyd rose up and stepped out of bed.

Let's see what it does.

Lloyd made for the training hall, and he saw Javier training hard under the searing sun all alone. He called for him.

"What brings you here at this hour?" said Javier.

"Why else? I came to see you," said Lloyd.

“...”

“What? Why? What? What’s so dissatisfying that you’re narrowing your eyes and glaring at me like that?” blurted Lloyd.

“I just can’t trust you.”

“Trust me?”

“Yes,” Javier said. “I am simply wondering what underlying motive you have this time.”

“Oh, are you trying to tell me that we’re the kind of people who never talk unless we want something?” asked Lloyd.

“Obviously,” Javier said as he wiped his forehead with a towel and folded it in half. “Please tell me what business you came here for.”

“All right. Shovel the ground for me,” said Lloyd without beating around the bush.

“Excuse me...?” Javier paused and cocked his head to the side. “You want me to shovel, young master?”

“Yeah,” Lloyd confirmed, “Here, take this first.”

Dazed, Javier took the shovel. Then, Lloyd spoke to Javier.

“Will you please dig up here?” said Lloyd as he pointed at the center of the training hall.

Javier frowned a little before he said, “Why are you telling me to shovel the center of the training hall out of the blue? Could you please at least tell me why?”

“Nah, I can’t.”

“...”

“Dig and you’ll find out. Just dig now. Trust me.”

“Whew.”

Javier sighed at length. He was actually gaining focus on his personal training after a while. The lessons he had learned from the battle against the red dragon were returning to him in the process. But here came this small-hearted young master disrupting him with his absurd instruction.

I should finish it quickly.

Javier decided to finish it fast because he had to do it anyway. Fixing his posture and grabbing the shovel, Javier got into action. He even harnessed the Asrahan Core Technique.

Crash!

It was the shoveling of a sword master. Even when the force was light, the shovel's head penetrated the ground very deeply. It was like Javier was scooping rice from a bowl of bulgogi rice with his spoon. Much to his surprise, Javier caught a streak of “line” in the ground sometime later.

Eh?

This line was blue and straight, drawn horizontally across the ground. But it looked strange no matter how hard he perceived it. It wasn’t a dye. It wasn’t a thread, either.

It’s light.

It was bright blue light. However, Javier could not identify its source. And since it was light, he couldn’t even erase it if he touched it with his shovel.

What’s happening...?

Flustered, Javier turned and looked at Lloyd. But the latter simply instructed with his gaze to keep shoveling.

“You see a mark, no? Will you keep digging following the line?”

“...”

Curious, Javier maneuvered his shovel to check what it was. He kept digging on and on, following the visible blue line. Later, an outline started to form with the blue line. He then dug following the outline. A shape, which the line formed, appeared. It turned out to be a cube, taking up a huge space in the ground. It was 6.5 x 6.5, and its volume was 8 . And so, his efforts of digging up the earth to the light resulted in a sleek, perfect cubic hole.

“What on earth is this?” asked Javier. The question came out of him involuntarily. Lloyd, who was looking down at Javier on the ground, spoke.

“It’s a construction guideline,” he said nonchalantly.

“Excuse me?”

Javier tilted his head in confusion.

From then on...

“So, what I’m saying is...”

Lloyd flapped his lips to tell a preposterous lie, and he chuckled as he looked at Javier. Javier was staring at him. And just then, for some mysterious reason, it dawned on Javier that Master Lloyd was always the same and unchanging. In moments like these, he always told white lies.

Chapter 150: Construction Guideline (2)

“Do you remember the last time we constructed the seokbinggo for the orc village? And how we executed the dark magician?” Lloyd asked.

Javier nodded. “Yes, I do.”

“Do you recall how we tore the whole place down and grabbed every magical material?” said Lloyd.

“Yes, of course.”

“I came across something amazing among the junk. This one. When I implanted mana, it turned out that I could create an illusion.”

Lloyd held out his hand, holding a round medal in it.

“So, did you draw the cube of light under the ground using that medal?” asked Javier.

“Yeah,” said Lloyd. “I thought it’d be handy to mark out the blueprint in the construction down the road. It will allow the workers to work conveniently.”

“What an amazing function,” stated Javier.

“Right? Me too. There’s more. Can you scoop up an area? Just once.”

“Anywhere?”

“Yeah,” said Lloyd. “Anywhere.”

“…”

Javier stared at Lloyd and stole a glance at the medal. Javier instantly knew. Sure, the medal was a magical trinket, but it was a lie that Master Lloyd had drawn the blue light and side in the earth with that medal.

“...”

Javier wondered if he should let it slide this time as well. After some hesitation, Javier silently held up the shovel and stuck it in one area inside the cube cave. A large dent appeared on one of the perfectly-straight sides. Then, something happened.

Beep!

The sharp beeping was followed by a change of color on the side. It turned red.

“Did you see that?” said Lloyd. “It notifies the worker once they deviate from the design.”

“Then...”

“They’ll quickly know if they’re not doing something right.”

“To me, it sounds like they will not be lazing around anymore.”

“But,” Lloyd said, “I make sure they’re well provided for, don’t I?” He plastered a smile commonly visible among vicious employers. He had wondered how the new optional skill, which he attained by increasing his skill class, would work. But when he tested it out, it turned out to be dynamite.

So, the blueprint I designed has been projected to the ground just the same. And it notifies the error in real-time.

The thing with the construction project was that it held a possibility of being a total failure if the workers did a horrible job. It was the case even when the design was perfect and meticulous to the hilt. Intentional ignorance of a design or busy work was actually quite common in construction sites. After all, it involved people.

But now, I can prevent that from happening. Any deviation from the blueprint is highlighted in color.

What was more, Lloyd was now able to designate the margin of error and standard permissible to him by marking them in red. As such, this optional skill allowed Lloyd to worry no more. It would be more so as he proceeded with this project, which required stringent precision and attention to detail.

And my story about the magical item and whatnot seemed to have worked.

Lloyd was relieved. He thought he had fooled Javier. So, everything was now all set. The time had come to take this construction to full swing.

The construction took off seamlessly.

“Now, I am sure you know very well what you all must do.”

The site selected for the first excavation was the area near the central village of the fiefdom. There, Sir Bayern gave a solemn speech.

“We have completed various projects under the supervision of our young master Lloyd Frontera. We have constructed countless ondol rooms, turned the Maritz Wetlands into fertile land, and built waterways that run from the high eastern mountain range to our fiefdom.”

As Sir Bayern enumerated the projects he and his engineering corp participated in, his face reflected with a swelling sense of pride.

“But that is not the end of it,” continued Sir Bayern. “The large apartment complex is currently under construction as per the design of Master Lloyd, and through the winter, we carved up the slopes in the eastern range and built up retaining walls to turn them into abundant terraced fields. And now! We are holding our shovels high to achieve something that surpasses all that we ever did.”

A sense of pride rushed through the engineers as they listened to the speech. Each of their uniforms was donned with varying embroideries, symbolizing the construction projects each had participated in. They were the medal of hard work and the proof of their career.

“Indeed. We will make history today. As we actualize the blueprint of Master Lloyd, and for the bright future of the fiefdom, on our honor, we shout! Safety first!”

“Safety first! Wow!!”

The forceful shout signaled the beginning of the construction. The seasoned engineer corp played a critical role and led the construction, while countless refugees and residents, who had volunteered for Lloyd, acted as their support. On top of that, the construction guideline ensured the job was convenient and precise.

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

Swish! Swish! Swish!

A large amount of dirt was scooped up each time Ppodong wiggled his butt. Just like that, a 13 x 13 hole that was 6.5 feet deep came to be. The engineers and workers who were watching the sight started to murmur among themselves.

“Over there, what on earth is that in the ground? I see a blue light,” a refugee old man murmured to himself.

An engineer soldier grinned at his side.

“Oh, that? That’s the guideline Master Lloyd drew out under the earth.”

“A guide...line?”

“Yes,” he confirmed.

“What does that do?” asked the curious old man.

“It shows exactly where to dig and where to avoid.”

“How is that possible?” he added.

“Well, I don’t know, but it’s visible to our eyes because it’s possible. I don’t know the mechanism behind it. Anyway, Master Lloyd says that we simply have to dig and build following that mark,” said the young man with a shrug.

“Haha, my goodness. How amazing.”

The civil engineer soldiers were briefed about the guideline before working. And the workers, who heard the same thing from the engineers, were amazed. The construction guideline grew more vivid as they looked at it. But they soon learned that it was a bit different from their expectations. It showed more than the outline, area, and depth to excavate. It was more detailed and elaborate. Even the location and range of the bricks to be stacked inside the hole became visible. It was as though a 3D blueprint hologram was installed inside.

“My goodness, it’s much more detailed than I had thought!”

The workers were astonished by how exhaustive the whole thing was. Just like that, they jumped into action, fine-pressing the shaft Ppodong had dug. Built in the central village of the fiefdom, it was meant to collect all sorts of sewage and bodily wastes people disposed of in the area.

It’d have been nice if I could build a modern sewage system in each household where they can directly throw their waste.

But he didn’t have the technology to do so and lacked money, time, and labor. A bitter smile appeared on Lloyd’s face as he looked at the ongoing construction. To be honest, he wanted to create a modern sewage system, just like the one in South Korea, if he could. It would allow the water used at homes to pass through the sewers and the people to flush their toilets. Clean and sleek. Lloyd wanted to devise a method wherein people could deal with the waste without extra effort or care.

But that’s impossible here.

To construct a modern sewage system, Lloyd had to connect the residential facility with underground pipes. But the current situation made it impossible for him to do so. Soon, the freezing winter would turn the Prona River into a giant block of ice. The accumulated bodily waste there signaled a large-scale epidemic. So, the sewers had to be constructed before the plague, leaving Lloyd no time to build and connect houses with pipes. He would need at least several years to perfect such a thorough system.

That's why I'm constructing a large sewage shaft in each village and region.

The sewage and bodily waste excreted from each household would be thrown into the shaft, and they would flow through the connected pipes to gather in one place. That was the crux of the sewage system Lloyd planned on constructing.

That would save me time and effort as well.

At the moment, Lloyd needed to opt for the most cost-effective method. With such a motto in mind, Lloyd led and supervised the construction. The earth was dug for the sewage shaft, and the ground was refined and processed. And he coated the shaft with granite bricks and cement to ensure that the sewage and bodily waste wouldn't seep underground. Then, he connected the sewage pipes for the sewage to flow out.

The ground was dug in an elongated manner, 16 feet deep. The floor received a thick coating of sand and rubble. Then, it was covered with flat granite plates to prevent the leaching of contaminated sewage. On top of the plates, a layer of cement was plastered, and granite bricks were placed to interlock one another. The bottom side of the sewage pipe was made to be shaped in a reversed egg, as this tapered design ensured a faster and more seamless flow of the sewage downward. These pipes were exactly 6.5 feet wide and high. On its side was a 23-inch pedestrian where people could pass by. And the area with finished pipes was completed with granite bricks and water-proofed. Then, they were covered with sand.

The maintenance hole worked as a staircase, from which the workers could safely travel down to the sewer if there were any clogging or leakage. It looked like just the "Cholera Canal," the sewage in Vienna, Austria. The first section was composed of the sewage treatment facility, which sat at the central village of the fiefdom, and the sewer leading from it. The construction took 20 days to finish. But it wasn't over.

Of course. This is just the beginning. All I did was construct the facility for one village. The real deal is the one we'll be building from now on.

The sewage and bodily waste would flow through the sewage treatment facility and sewer built in each village and apartment building, and they would finally stream out of the fiefdom through the main sewer. The construction of the main sewer took place. It was the extra-large version of the aforementioned Cholera Canal. Bibeong was mobilized for this project as well.

"Bibebeong! Bibeong!"

Stomp Stomp!

Bibeong stomped down the mountain. It had been a while, so he was excited to be here. He stole a glance at Bangul, who was sitting on Lloyd's shoulder in the distance. His heart fluttered with butterflies at the sight of his first love, and his cheeks blushed red. He moved his 3,000-ton front legs with all his might.

"Bibeong!"

Boom! Crash!

The ground was dug as though a gigantic excavator was at work. In a flash, Bibeong excavated a 65 x 65-foot hole. The engineers and workers were put to work just like that as they built sewer pipes. A ginormous main sewer, 32 feet in width and 26 feet in height, was dredged along with a 9.8-foot pedestrian zone on the side. The major sewer faced extended north. Each day, it got longer. The spring rain stopped the flowering of plants. Frogs croaked aloud. Roses bloomed their first petals. Three months later, the main sewer passed beyond the northern area of the fiefdom.

"Now, you must be careful from now on," intervened Lloyd, "I am sure you can remember. Do you know which direction the Mastodons charged after it ambushed our fiefdom because of the monster domino phenomenon?”

“To the north, young master!” The soldiers answered in unison at Lloyd’s question. The experience of driving the herd of Mastodons to the north using the river water clearly left an unforgettable impression on their minds.

“Good. I am glad that you can still remember. As you know, Mastodons are powerful animals. Sweeping them with the river water simply doesn’t kill them. Almost all of them would have survived after being swept away to this place and starting a new life here. In other words, we’re trespassing their territory and building something here.”

Lloyd continued to warn them.

“So, all you must be on your toes. Surely, Bibeong is here to deter them from attacking us so easily. But there are exceptions. Even if you take a rest, don’t go far away from the site, and if you have to go far for some inevitable reason, go by grouping yourselves into ten. Got it?”

“Yes, young master!”

The construction resumed after the warning speech. But to Lloyd’s surprise and embarrassment, not a single Mastodon was found even when the construction reached the tenth day since the trespass.

Whew, this is embarrassing. Did I give a speech for nothing?

Lloyd chuckled to himself, thinking that the Mastodons must have settled farther than he expected. Or it could be that Bibeong’s presence was deterring them from approaching.

If that’s the case, then it’s good for us.

Things were always better if they didn’t encounter dangerous monsters. It was especially so amid the noisy and chaotic construction site. However, around the time Lloyd was putting his guard down, something happened.

“Bibebeong? Bibeong!”

Bibeong, who was digging the ground, yelled. But his shout was suggestive. It meant, “Over here! Something’s here!”

Hmm? Something’s there?

What could it be? Lloyd wondered to himself. Jostling out of his trance, Lloyd headed in the direction of the calling and looked at the area Bibeong was pointing at. The ground was being dug up. But underneath the piles of dirt, an outline of something appeared in his view.

“Mastodon?”

It was a carcass, buried about 22 feet deep. But it wasn’t very rotten. In other words, it was killed just recently.

What the heck? Why is it buried 22 feet underground?

A landslide? Lloyd postulated to himself, but that wasn’t possible.

This area is a plain.

His next guess was the other Mastodons burying this carcass.

No, it can’t be.

Mastodons were monsters, so they didn’t have the intelligence to bury the dead. Soon, another strange thing happened.

“Bibeong? Bibeo-beong?”

Bibeong, who was looking at the carcass as he cocked his head, moved his front leg and carefully scooped the area next to it. Another carcass appeared. But there was more.

“What...”

As Bibeong continued to dig, dead Mastodons kept appearing without stopping. Ten? Twenty? No. More than a hundred.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong?”

“Yes, um, I’m looking at it as well. I can also see that they were carefully buried in a straight line, as though someone put in the effort to do so. What in the world is this...”

Lloyd couldn’t wrap his head around this. His mind flew back to the stories in the novel, but it never mentioned the clean burial of the Mastodons. The only similar incident as this one was about the Namaran’s Wall episode, wherein Javier learned how to use the mana blast. Just then...

Pshhh!

Amid the piles of dead Mastodons, an eerie and ominous noise pierced Lloyd’s ears.

Chapter 151: Runaway (1)

Pshhh!

There came an ominous sound. It was small and faint at first, but it gradually grew louder until everyone could hear it.

“What is it?”

The civil engineers, who were watching Bibeong excavate, cocked their heads to the side. Something strange was happening as hundreds of Mastodon carcasses were unearthed, all neatly lined up. This unexpected event was enough to make the workers curious. Soon, the White Cavalry and the refugees gathered around the hole as well, murmuring among themselves.

“What’s that noise?”

“I don’t know. Maybe it’s the sound of the stench coming out.”

“Stench?”

“You know, like how cows and pigs get all bloated with gas in their stomachs when their dead remains are left alone for a long time.”

“Aha. I’ve seen it as well. Their stomach inflates like a balloon and bursts with a pop.”

“Indeed. I think that’s what’s happening right now.”

“Could it be that they’re bursting now as we remove the dirt that pressed them down?”

“Probably?”

“Ha! This is going to be the most entertaining thing I’ve seen in a while.”

The engineers, the White Cavalry, and refugee workers observed the sight with a glimmer in their eyes. An air of expectation hung in the area as everyone anticipated what clamorous noise these huge Mastodons would make when their stomachs burst. Even the small dead cows and pigs gave a popping noise, which sounded like a beat of a drum when their stomachs blew up. Everyone was excited except one person.

That's strange.

A bad feeling gripped Lloyd, but he couldn't pinpoint why. These hundreds of Mastodons were buried in one clean line, but they didn't die naturally. It was someone's doing for sure.

Who could have done it?

Lloyd had no way of knowing, but something was loud and clear.

The carcasses have all decomposed similarly. Then it means that they were killed all around the same time. If that's the case, it could only mean...

Someone killed them on purpose. Hundreds of Mastodons were slaughtered in a short period of time. This was an act with clear intention.

But why? To what end?

There was no way of knowing that either. But at that moment, the Asrahan Core Technique worked to strike him with a realization. The bad feeling that stung his heart wasn't a simple, groundless prediction.

Eh?

Lloyd suddenly felt a flow of mana, and through the Asrahan Core Technique, he detected an abnormal strand of mana. And as though a magic circle was sucking the mana from the Mastodons, an abnormally large concentration of mana started to develop. At the same time, the sound of gas leaking amplified from the carcass. That only meant one thing.

"Everybody back off!" Lloyd yelled.

The workers turned to look at him with dazed expressions. Lloyd shouted louder at them.

“Move away from the hole!” he bawled. “As far as you can! I’ll take away the bonus of anyone who disobeys!”

Right now, Lloyd had to resort to a method that brought about an instant reaction, not understanding. That was the fastest way to make them evacuate. Lloyd was right for thinking so. At the warning of bonus forfeiture, everyone hurried away from the hole as there was nothing scarier than that.

Pssssh! Thwack! As soon as they went away, one Mastodon carcass emitted a flash and violently exploded. The gas, fire, and explosion compounded to bring another Mastodon burst. Then the one next to it burst again. And one after another, each emitted a flash, leading to a chain of destructive explosions.

Boooom! 50 Mastodon carcasses exploded in a flash, but the explosion wasn’t ordinary and natural. It wasn’t the burst of gas from their guts. What just took place was the explosion of mana, wretchedly destructive enough to turn the area into a nightmare. Lloyd knew of this type of explosion because he had read The Knight of Blood and Iron.

Dammit... I knew it... It’s corpse explosion magic.

The story popped up in his mind just then. A necromancer consistently processes the dead bodies and casts explosive magic. And when the set condition is met, they burst and explode with so much power to reduce the whole place to rubble. The power was tantamount to the size of the dead body. It was said that the size of a human corpse contains about the destructive force of an AT mine. But right now, things were worse than when they weren’t corpses.

Since a Mastodon is as big as an elephant, then... Argh!

Cursing under his breath, Lloyd jumped out of the hole to fix his grip on the shovel. Then he turned around and got ready to fire a triple mana blast into the grave. It was too late to completely avoid the explosions and shockwaves. It was wiser for him to contain them using the triple mana blast.

I have to try even if it doesn't work.

He rotated three circles as his eyes beamed. But just then...

"Bibeong!"

Everything turned black for Lloyd after he heard a loud shout. It was Bibeong, who blocked Lloyd with his giant body, and he curled to hug Lloyd as though he was trying to protect him from the explosion.

"Bibeong!" called Lloyd.

"Bibeo-beong! (Get down!)"

Lloyd got down by reflex, and the explosion and shockwave swept over the area.

...!

Lloyd neither heard anything nor felt the flash. But the sky and land seemed to have turned upside down, and his stomach seemed to churn tumultuously. The painful ringing in his ears engulfed every sound around him. Lloyd opened his eyes, but he couldn't see anything. He wondered if the white thing was the sky. But what about the dark one?

Bibeong...?

Lloyd found Bibeong lying on the ground. To Lloyd's relief, Bibeong was alive, which was evidenced by his moving stomach. Lloyd then staggered to his feet, enduring the pang of dizziness and checking on Biebong. No blood or serious injury. But he looked like Bibeong fainted from the impact of bearing the full brunt of the explosion.

What about the others?

Drip. A streak of blood dripped along his forehead. Lloyd wiped it with his sleeve and looked around. The ringing noise in his ears calmed a little at last, and the sound gradually came back.

Cough! Cough!

“W-what just happened?!”

“Argh... A-are you all right?”

Lloyd saw the nearby workers getting back to their feet. Lloyd was relieved that no one died or was badly injured. It was because Lloyd had shouted prior to the explosion to get away from the hole pronto.

What... the heck?

Lloyd slapped his cheek hard, and that finally restored him somewhat from dizziness and nausea. Just then...

“Oaaak... Oak!”

The inside of the hole, where the explosion took place, let out a coarse, ferocious roar. But it wasn’t just one.

“Kwoak!”

“Kwa...oak!!!”

At least dozens more began to roar in series, their cry ringing aloud the area ominously. The noise neared as the storm of dust subsided. Lloyd grimaced.

Wait a second. Is this...

Right when Lloyd wondered if the carcass explosion was just the beginning, something happened.

Fwish!

Something large loomed amid the sandstorm.

“...!”

He immediately ducked down and stepped back to feel something long, as long as a log, slashed the space right above his head.

Elephant nose?

No, it belonged to a Mastodon. It could only mean one thing. When he was hit with such an epiphany, a large figure broke through the dust and charged ahead.

“Kwoaaak!”

“...!”

They were Mastodons, but they weren’t alive. Lloyd could tell that right away by the blank eyes, which he thought were like a dead fish’s, and the rotten skin all over their bodies. But in terms of their ferocity and hostility, they were more alive and real than the living ones. They then hurtled toward Lloyd, wielding their tusk and horn, entirely bent on smashing him to pieces. They were undead Mastodons.

Argh!!

These monsters looked like they should be starring in horror movies. So, the sight of these undead creatures hurtling toward him made his skin crawl.

Carcass explosion, and the undead?

It was clear. The necromancer who performed this dark magic was a considerable magician. Hundreds, not just one or two, but hundreds of undead Mastodons, excluding the ones that just exploded in the hole, stampeded toward Lloyd.

Dammit!

Every hair on his body stood. Lloyd wanted to run away. After all, he wasn’t the brave main character of an action movie. He never cared about risking his life and putting himself in harm’s way to be a hero.

So why is this happening to me?!

Lloyd berated his fate. He was just making a sludge treatment facility when out of the blue, this event took place. If Javier were here, he'd have tossed the mission to him being the brave fellow he was. It would have been a cinch for him. Just his usual amazing sword tricks and the undead Mastodons would be done for. But Javier wasn't here as he was cutting up the metal rebars with his aura at the apartment construction site. In other words, everyone's life depended on him. Otherwise, they would perish.

"Everyone, run!"

Lloyd bawled as loud as he could. Thankfully, his shouting was effective. The workers, who were frozen in surprise and fear, flinched. It appeared that they had finally read the situation. They were taken aback.

"A-aaack!!!!"

"Run!"

"Run for your lives!"

Most of the workers were residents and refugees. Some engineers were a little stronger than the rest, so none stood a chance against the undead Mastodons. Throwing their shovels and pickaxes in fear, they skedaddled southward where the fiefdom was. But unfortunately, their frantic steps provoked the undead.

"Kwoaaak!"

The leader in the group roared ferociously, and with its half-rotten, muscular nose, it pointed at the workers. The entire herd stampeded toward them.

"Gwoak!"

These undead Mastodons burned with hatred for life. They rushed as the ground shook underneath their feet, and their hostility signaled the ferocious determination to trample everything in the way. But something did stand in their way. Six men. The members of the White Cavalry.

“We! We are the sword and shield to Her Majesty!”

“As the sword and shield of Her Majesty! We must protect the people!”

Lloyd wasn’t spared a second to stop them. They immediately charged with a shout after pulling out the sword toward the incoming herd of monsters. It didn’t matter that they were on foot and without armor. They charged. They were trampled.

“Gwoack!”

These Mastodons were stronger than the living ones after being perverted into the undead. Their spears and swords didn’t even leave a single scar on them.

“...!”

And those six members of the White Cavalry were tossed and thrown and trampled by the herd that they lost their lives. Lloyd gritted his teeth when he saw the sight.

I told them to run! What are they doing?!

They had just shoveled with him until earlier, but now they were dead. His hands shivered. No more lives could be lost like that. As such, Lloyd needed to come up with a plan. Anything. The pieces of information, the situation, the terrain, and the forces were processed individually in his head to devise a method that would keep everyone safe. Just then, an epiphany struck him, and he developed a feasible plan.

“Ppodong!”

Lloyd reached his hands into his inner pocket and brought Ppodong out.

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

Ppodong must have been reading the situation as well. He opened his mouth as soon as he was brought out, and Lloyd tossed a piece of red sunflower seed there. Then, he hurled Ppodong high.

Boom!

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong turned giant.

“Stall them first!” shouted Lloyd. “As much as possible!”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong nodded and bolted toward the head of the Mastodon that stood in the front.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Crack! He rammed the undead monster with his body. Ppodong’s body was 32 feet tall, while Mastodon was only 13 feet tall. And he was heavier than the Mastodon many times. Even if the latter was a ferocious undead monster, the weight difference could not be overcome.

“Gwoack!”

The seven monsters in the front stumbled and fell to the ground like pins in a bowling alley. But the real problem came after that.

“Gwoak!”

Those behind them rushed like a tsunami. Lloyd ballparked the number to be at least 300. And Ppodong wasn’t strong enough to fight them all alone.

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

And so, he removed himself from the herd with a struggle, but not without any injury. The horns and husks poked his butt a few times, but he didn’t bleed. Nonetheless, the pain was unbearable. Ppodong wasn’t going to give up, however. He rushed forward only to steer and turn back. Then, going faster, Ppodong rammed those in the front once again.

“Ppodong!”

Crash!

Five and six Mastodons flew in the air every time. That slowed their stampede. While this was happening, Lloyd ran toward the workers and found the civil engineers and the White Cavalry, who were lining up and getting ready to fight.

“Sir Bayern! Sir Blanc!”

The former led the civil engineer corps, while the latter led the White Cavalry.

“Master Lloyd, please evacuate now. We will protect this place,” Sir Bayern said.

“Leave this to us, the White Cavalry. I will prove to you that our valor is not groundless.”

The two men promised with determination on their faces. Lloyd shook their heads fast as he looked at them.

“No, I want you all to run away. You two. The corp and the cavalry. Everyone.”

“Excuse me?”

“I’m saying that I’ll buy time for you. So, hurry up and take the others and leave pronto. Right now. Got it?”

“Master Lloyd. I’m not sure what you mean...”

Sir Bayern’s face paled. On the other hand, Sir Blanc grew stoic.

“What do you mean?” Sir Blanc asked. “Are you saying that the Cavalry must turn our back when the enemy is there?”

“Yes, that’s exactly what I mean,” Lloyd immediately answered him.

“There’s no point to this fight. So, protect the workers and head down to the south. I’ll buy you all enough time.”

“But I cannot follow your request. You see, the White Cavalry-”

“This isn’t a request.”

Lloyd interrupted, and he stared at Sir Blanc, cold and void of any emotion. And to prevent any unnecessary sacrifice and save everyone, Lloyd spoke, his voice dripping with strictness and sternness.

“This is an order.”

Chapter 152: Runaway (2)

“Hmm?”

Solitas, who was paying close attention to the work in the forge, stopped what he was doing. The wood sculpture and the graver left his hands, and Solitas gazed out at the north.

I just felt an explosion.

It wasn’t near here. It was yonder over the northern area of the fiefdom. A human couldn’t feel it because it was far, but he could since he was a dragon.

Is it just a simple explosion? No. I felt the mana.

He found himself already standing. Then, concentrating his senses on the north, he walked over in that direction, and the remnants of the mana could be felt more clearly the closer he got.

An explosion of mana. Magic. The pattern of the mana shaking. Necromancer’s bringing of the dead. Then, could it be the corpse explosion? But it was way more powerful than the usual ones.

The excellent dragon that he was, Solitas could almost get an accurate picture even though it happened miles away from his studio. And he was also aware of who was in the direction of the explosion.

Lloyd Frontera. Hmm. I wonder if he’s involved.

Solitas waffled over whether he should help out. But he couldn’t be bothered. Then again, he thought it was only right that he should go. As the internal debate took place in Solitas, there came an acid comment behind him.

“Well, well, look at you! During my time as an apprentice, I hyper-focused on my work and never did anything else, be it a cough, until I was done with what my master assigned me to do.”

“...”

When Solitas turned, his gaze locked with Corgidus, his teacher, and the latter was stringently looking at him.

“Tell me, are you done with the carving I told you to do?” asked Corgidus.

“Um, no. Not yet.”

“Then, you should finish it.”

“...”

“Focus on the work I gave you. Start with the wood, and then we will move from plaster to granite to metal. Once you get used to them, I shall let you work on the pebbles that are the size of a nail, and only then will you learn how to deal with jewels. How long this will take all depends on you.”

“Hmm, I see.”

Solitas agreed with his teacher. After all, Corgidus was right. But there was one more reason why he easily got back to work.

Javier Asrahan. Does he have the same level of senses as mine?

Solitas’s gaze moved to the main road, and he saw the silver-haired knight dashing in that direction. It was Javier, and he was zooming northward.

I knew it.

Solitas figured that the knight, too, felt the explosion a moment ago. That must be the reason why he was sprinting northward. As such, Solitas was relieved.

He’s on another level. I felt it from our last fight too.

Once that man of monstrous caliber went to help, Solitas had nothing much to worry about. If there was anyone he should be worried about, it was himself.

Whew. Why is carving wood so difficult?

Solitas returned to the studio and picked up the block of wood again. It was ugly, with its edges all pointy and irregular. But Solitas had put a lot of effort into this. He sighed as he looked at his product. The future was undoubtedly bleak and hopeless at this rate. It would take eons until he worked the stones well and got ready for marriage.

But I'm not giving up. Dating, marriage, or revenge.

Javier Asrahan. Solitas vowed to himself that he would pay back the shame decades later. Resolving such, he picked up the graver again.

"Whew."

Lloyd picked up the shovel and gazed at the south. The workers were growing distant now, surrounded by the protective engineers and the White Cavalry. Just then, an event that happened a moment ago came to his mind.

Sir Blanc is one stubborn figure.

Lloyd said he would buy them some time so no one was to fight the undead Mastodons head-on. The rest must help out with the evacuation and run together. But the plan prompted violent opposition from Sir Blanc, who clamored that it could never be done as they were the swords and shields of Her Majesty. As such, the suggestion to turn back in the presence of the enemy was preposterous. The man voiced strong determination as he sternly looked at Lloyd. And so, Lloyd was left with no choice but to order.

"This isn't a request. This is an order."

Lloyd put on a straight face and spoke strictly on purpose. He said that the authority to give an order belonged to him as the White Cavalry was dispatched to the Frontera county under the orders of the Queen at the moment and thus rightfully subjugated to the orders of Count Frontera. And the person in charge of the construction supervision was him, that is, Lloyd, as the count had relegated his powers and authority to Lloyd. And what about the White Cavalry, which joined the construction project as workers?

“Obviously, you are within the boundaries of my responsibilities. Moreover, since an unexpected accident took place to risk many lives, the operation control to command the whole site belongs to me all the more. Plus, tell me, what is the point of this meaningless debate? Do you not think that it is right to take action as one amid this crisis instead of chitchatting?”

Lloyd spoke fast, emphasizing each word and never drawing his breath until he was done. Then, he stared Sir Blanc in the eyes. The trick must have worked. Sir Blanc finally nodded.

“It appears... that you have a plan in mind. Anyway, do be safe out there.”

After that, Sir Blanc joined the rest of the workers as he led the White Cavalry in the rear formation. Sir Bayern and the engineering corp were with them. And once they were gone, Lloyd was left alone in the wilderness of the undead Mastodons. Actually, Lloyd was with five baby Mastodons.

“Anyone not happy with the plan?” asked Lloyd.

“Chuuu!!”

“No complaints, right?”

“Chu!!”

The five baby Mastodons flared their noses in nervousness as they shook their 6.5-foot tall body. An apologetic smile faintly formed on Lloyd’s face.

“Yes, I’m sorry,” Lloyd said. “I’m not doing this because I want to do this, but I need your help on this one.”

“Chuuuu!!”

“All right. Okay. Okay. Don’t lick my face. You haven’t brushed your teeth.”

“Chu!!”

Lloyd soothed the baby Mastodons for a while. The sudden explosion and the following herd of undead Mastodons shook the babies to the hilt. It was reasonably chaotic and terrorizing. Nonetheless, they had to remain calm.

“So, I need you all to move with me calmly. Okay? That’s how you and I all can survive,” explained Lloyd.

“Chuuu!!”

“Okay, okay. Good kids. So, are you ready?”

“Chuuu!”

Rumble...

The ground was shaking now, and Lloyd turned toward the north to spot the herd of undead Mastodons charging in his direction about 200 yards away. He also saw Ppodong, who was running way ahead of them.

“Okay!” said Lloyd. “Ppodong, come here!”

“Ppodong!”

Lloyd hopped on Ppodong’s back when he arrived, all panting and breathing hard. His hair was a mess, as though he had a big scuffle with the Mastodons as he stalled them. Lloyd was hurt with a pang of gratitude and sorriness. He then lifted his head. The herd was now about 100 yards away. Now, things mattered from now on. It was the real deal. Lloyd had to do it right to propel the Mastodon herds to stop pursuing the workers and be on his heels instead. Come hell or high water. That was the only way to ensure the workers’ safety. Resolving such, Lloyd grabbed Ppodong’s nape.

“All right, let’s go! Off we go!”

“Ppodong!”

“Chuuu!!”

Ppodong leaped, and five baby Mastodons followed beside him.

“To the west!”

Lloyd sped, and he soon turned around to bawl at the undead Mastodons that were heading south.

“Look here!”

Lloyd held up his shovel and pointed at the baby Mastodons, who were running parallel to Lloyd.

“I got your babies in my hands!”

Lloyd’s shout grew louder.

“Unless you come to save them! What do you think I will do to them? I am going to kidnap them! And take them to the slaughterhouse! And! Their horns and tusks will be pulled out! I’ll also skin them alive and sell them for a good price!”

Lloyd wielded his shovel violently, and using the Asrahan Core Technique, he loaded the mana into his voice.

“Can you hear me?!”

Lloyd’s mana-charged yelling clanged aloud throughout the wilderness until it came within the earshot of the undead Mastodon herds heading south. Lloyd observed their movement with bated breath.

Please... Take a right. Please.

Just then, Lloyd recalled a part in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

Mastodons. They were giant herbivore monsters who lived in vast plains. It was said that they live in groups and collectively raise and bred their babies as one, much like the buffalos inhabiting the fields of the North American continent.

The book also said that they're obsessive when it comes to babies. It was so serious to the point that such motherly instincts still existed in part even after they became undead.

From the moment Lloyd was hit with the part in the story, he thought he could capitalize on their strong instinct, which was even more powerful than death. So, he devised a plan in a flash and evacuated everyone to a safe place. Lloyd figured that he could buy them enough time for them to run away.

"Okay, so! I have your babies! I'm going to kill them! I'll kidnap, hurt, beat, and sell them!"

Fwoosh! He wielded the shovel violently, and the baby Mastodons wailed after being terrified by the ferocious shovel.

"Chuuu!!"

Just then...

"Gwoak...?"

The Mastodon herd charging south slowed at once. They turned to Lloyd's side. And their blank eyes suddenly held a glint of a vague motherly emotion.

"Gwoak... Gwoak!"

Babies. The babies were there. Fledgling and young babies who still needed the protection and care of their mothers. They were crying there. When they realized the presence of the babies...

"Gwoahhh!"

Gallop! Thwack! The undead heart changed the direction to the west. They angrily made for Lloyd's side.

Awesome.

Lloyd clenched his fists. He succeeded in drawing their attention. Right now, the only job left was to safely run away and lose them.

"I already had the path in mind. Ppodong. Continue to head west!"

"Ppodong!"

Lloyd cut across the wilderness, and at times, when the distance with the undead neared, Lloyd fired mana blasts. When he did...

Thwack! Thump!

"Gwoak!"

The Mastodon on the lead got knocked out by the mana blast, which pierced from the head to the butt in a straight line. It flopped to the ground and burst.

Kaboom! Corpse explosion. The file was greatly disturbed, at least for a while, and Lloyd broke out in a cold sweat as he saw it.

Good that I didn't choose to fight them head-on. I made the right call by sending the White Cavalry away.

It appeared that the corpse explosion magic got activated automatically when they were neutralized. Had the White Cavalry proceeded and fought head-on, they would have suffered huge casualties by the explosion.

I made the right call. Good job, earlier Lloyd.

Lloyd continued to run and sped faster. Sometime later, at last, there appeared a steep cliff on the edge of the wilderness. Lloyd pointed at one area of the cliff with his shovel.

“Hey, Ppodong. Over there! See that?”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“The valley on the side of the cliff!”

There was an entrance to a narrow valley where Lloyd was pointing at. The valley was so narrow that it was as though someone wielded the ax to split the cliff in half.

“Enter there! We’re going to pass straight through the valley!” yelled Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

Past the valley, there was a forest of considerable size.

We can hide there. I can make Ppodong small again. Then, we can lose the undead very well.

Lloyd and Ppodong hopped into the valley as he thought about the plan again. But a few minutes later, he learned that a great hurdle lay ahead of him.

What the heck? Why is the valley torn down?

Lloyd had to stop Ppodong, and with disappointment and despair in his eyes, Lloyd gazed at the blocked wall that stood in front of him.

“Dammit...”

The valley had collapsed, and the path straight ahead was blocked entirely. Both sides of the cliffs crumbled, causing tens of thousands of tons of dirt and rocks to barricade their way.

Is it because of the spring rain?

It appeared so, indeed. Lloyd’s heart pounded violently.

Crap. If it’s like this, my plan’s a failure.

Behind him was the herd of undead Mastodons that wanted to kill him. And in front of him, the valley he thought was well-paved was blocked by the landslide. The path he had taken to get here was long and narrow, so there was no way to the other side. In other words, Lloyd was at an impasse.

Shoot.

Lloyd heavily broke out in a cold sweat, but he didn't allow himself to be gripped with panic. He didn't waste his time by fussing about this predicament, either. Instead, he immediately shouted aloud.

"Everyone! Get close to the cliff!"

This cliff wasn't suitable for climbing, and it was evidenced by his quick surveying skill.

It's sandstone. They break easily. Try to climb the cliff, and you're sure to free fall. Besides, the ground is still wet from the recent rain. If I'm out of luck, I'm going to cause a landslide.

And he would be buried alive. As such, the attempt to climb up the cliff and make it out alive was better put aside, especially when Lloyd was with Ppodog and baby Mastodons. Lloyd, having done the math in seconds, stared at Ppodong.

"Listen to me carefully now," Lloyd said quickly and straightforwardly. "I need you to hug the baby Mastodons. And stay right close to the cliff. Don't come near me until I tell you to do so. Okay?"

"Ppodong?"

"Got it?!" demanded Lloyd.

"Ppo...dong!"

"Good boy."

Ppodong was always a good boy. Being a good boy, Lloyd stroked him once before turning around. He then headed to the narrow path he had taken, and in the distance, he noticed one undead Mastodon rushing along the curved path of the valley.

“Gwoack!”

Kaboom! There was a murderous look in their eyes. But Lloyd didn’t stop. Instead, he simply stepped forward to face them as he lifted up his shovel. He clashed three manas and fired the triple mana blast into the sky.

I can’t use the mana blast at them in this narrow place as the corpse explosion will cause a landslide. So... this is the best shot I have against them.

He used every bit of his energy to use the triple mana blast. The wretched exhaustion and dizziness following it forced Lloyd to collapse to the ground. And he scoffed as he looked at the violent herd coming his way. He was resolved. He closed his eyes and allowed himself to fall into a trance. At the same time, a clear alarm rang in his head.

Ding dong.

From then on...

Ziiiiing!

The undead Mastodon herd was ready to pulverize the valley. Lloyd flopped in front of them with aplomb. And he, who became a mana blackhole, started to engulf everything that came his way.

Chapter 153: Mana Predator (1)

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Supercharge has been activated.]

[You are absorbing a large amount of mana from random surroundings.]

Ziiing!

Lloyd's eyes closed, and he gradually lost consciousness. Something took place in his heart. Three strands of circles that wrapped the heart accelerated. At first, it was slow, soft, and calm. But later, it became fast, violent, and ferocious. They rotated at a limited speed, only to transcend and break it. No more hesitation. Indiscriminate object. At last, everything was regarded as an object to be absorbed.

Kaboom!

The three circles roared, going tyrannical as they wielded influence all around them. Everything that came within 44 feet transformed into a storm, and he started to absorb everything that came into the zone.

Crack! Crack!

The moisture in the ground dried up in an instant. The ants on the earth, a nameless beetle, the fireflies flying nearby, and the ticks in the dust entered the supercharge zone and lost their mana. Their skin dried up, and they lost blood. And they cracked, soon reducing to ashes. The undead Mastodons weren't an exception.

"Gwoack!"

The one in the lead let out a ferocious roar, and its eyes held a glint of deathly sensation as they shot daggers at Lloyd. But when it took one more step, its eyes changed.

“Gwoak...?”

Ziiing! Its head entered the zone first, and its eyes, which held more water compared to other parts of the head, shrunk first.

“Gwoak!”

Thwack! Its eyes dried after its mana was lost. It sank and broke, and at least its mouth and ears twitched.

Crunch! Crunch! The inside boiled and the mana was lost in an instant and dried up. The layer of cells that held up the rotten tissue was instantly torn.

“Gwack!”

The skin and muscles split to turn the horns and husks into ash. Its joints and marrows broke and smashed to pieces, and the seven-ton body collapsed. And a second later, one more final thing happened. It was the evil magic the necromancer cast when they made the undead. The carcasses began to explode.

Whoosh! Kaboom!

The staggering and shrinking undead Mastodon exploded. It took place just about 15 feet from where Lloyd was sitting. The ferocious blast and shockwave. There seemed to be nothing that could protect Lloyd from the flicking flames. But it wasn’t the case. Lloyd was safe because he even absorbed the explosive force of the explosion.

Ziiing! Lloyd’s mana circle roared ferociously, and it rotated ravenously as it revealed its evil greed. The supercharge skill trapped the flames that flew toward his way and the shockwave that was enough to rip his body. It didn’t matter that the explosion took place. Actually, the skill welcomed this magical explosion as it offered Lloyd more amplified mana.

Ziiing! Lloyd devoured the explosion in a flash, and messages appeared in front of his closed eyes.

Ding Dong!

[You are absorbing a large amount of mana through the Supercharge skill.]

[The amount of mana being absorbed is going over the manaheart limit.]

[Your manaheart is being expanded by force.]

[You have attained a skill experience point.]

Crack! Crunch!

The mana inherent in Mastodons, the energy imbued by the necromancer, and the explosive force of the corpse explosion all transformed into mana. And it was absorbed by Lloyd in a short period. Indeed, it overstrained his manaheart, but it only worked to help him grow.

[The manaheart skill has been upgraded.]

Ding Dong!

If Lloyd had his eyes open and could read, he'd have welcomed the arrival of these messages.

Cough!

His manaheart grew too fast. Lloyd's body tumbled from the great impact. But even while this was happening to Lloyd, the Mastodons kept coming at him.

"Gwoack!"

Since they were zombies, they were barely intelligent. Yet, even when the others were reduced to ashes and exploded, they rushed without any end or stop. One after another, they continued to come and shrink as Lloyd usurped their mana and eventually exploded. But even the burst of energy was absorbed before they could hurt Lloyd.

Cough! "Argh!"

Every time the large volume of mana entered Lloyd's system, his upper torso tumbled as though he was caught in a storm. This experience differed from the time when he absorbed the mana of Queen Magentano.

Argh! Ack...!

The queen's mana was extremely pure. It was refined, processed, and spotless. And so, it was quickly absorbed, although its extreme density required him to enlarge his manaheart. As long as he did so, he could take the queen's mana just fine. However, the situation right now was poles apart from that time.

"Eek!"

Cough! Lloyd coughed violently, and blood spluttered out of his mouth. He was coughing blood because the mana of the undead Mastodons was too thick, dirty, and rough.

"Argh...!"

The mana belonged to the dead and decomposed creatures, and it was foul and evil because it received the curse of an evil necromancer. This mana would be the dirtiest one in the world, and it obviously left serious damage to the body that took it.

Grit! Lloyd gritted his teeth even as he was in a trance. Pain gripped him so severely that his body shook like a leaf as he endured the pain. He nonetheless maintained the absorption, and the more he absorbed the evil and corrupt mana, his body parts indirectly experienced death.

Thump! His heartbeat became irregular. Ventricular fibrillation took place. His heart muscles twitched, and cardiac infarction stifled his heart. But then the muscle soon returned to normal. The same thing took place in his respiratory system.

“Ha... Cough!”

Asthma attack. His bronchial tube narrowed in seconds. Breathing became labor, and several red spots dotted his face. The alveoli in his lungs rot only to become normal soon. This strange phenomenon took place throughout his body. An ulcer appeared in his stomach. Gall bladder stones were produced in his gall to block the pipes. Biles surged to fill up the liver. Bilirubin in his gall accumulated in his system. Jaundice. His liver tissue was ripped apart. Fibrosis. Acute hepatocirris.

His muscles went numb. Proteins were destroyed. Osteoporosis and arthritis plagued his bones. His blood turned strange, and his lymph nodes refluxed. His nerve tissues snapped, and his cartilage disappeared due to wear. Just like that, Lloyd’s body became half-dead in real-time, only for his body to fight back and activate the manaheart to the maximum. The destroyed tissues were restored, and the anomalies in his body were made normal. Destruction and regeneration. Death and resurrection. The repetition of these processes allowed Lloyd to train his body.

“Argh... Eek!”

His whole body twitched and shook like a leaf. His breathing turned raspy as he endured the pain. Even when he was in a trance, the pain was overwhelmingly great. The discomfort could not be expressed in words. But that process alone became training for Lloyd. After all, that was what training was all about. The ultimate purpose of the training wasn’t empowerment or development or making progress. Its true purpose was facing the uncomfortable reality.

That was why even those who trained their minds and the ascetics that did penance accepted such a strenuous process with open arms. The discomfort in the body, mind, breathing, psychology, and memory. The objective was to discover the discomfort through daily training. And by facing, acknowledging, admitting, embracing, and internalizing such discomfort, you can move on to the next part of the journey, which is discovering another level of discomfort. That was the objective of proper training.

Empowerment. Progress. Improvement. They were nothing but byproducts obtained in the journey toward one's goal. In that sense, Lloyd was forced to enter true and real training, and it had nothing to do with his will. In his training, he was thrown into the unending chain of extreme and radical discomfort and made to overcome it.

"Ack... Ah..."

His raspy voice was close to a moan. But, instead, he embraced the pain more desperately. He would've never done it if he was sound in mind and even a bit conscious. But on top of his trance, something else allowed him to perform such transcendental patience. It was his optional skill.

Ding dong.

[Manaheart Skill Option ③: Frenzy has been activated.]

[You blindly focus on one goal after falling into a state of frenzy for 60 seconds.]

Just in time, the Frenzy skill was activated. From then on, Lloyd's countenance turned peaceful. He endured the pain and continued the Supercharge. The corrupt, thick, rotten undead mana was received as it was, and Lloyd turned it into his own. At the same time, his manaheart expanded to a greater degree.

Just then… A new message appeared and covered the skill description message.

Ding Dong!

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Your Supercharge time is up.]

Ziiing... The mana circle went quiet following the emergency message. The violent rotation slowed down, and the devouring mana absorption ended.

Whoosh. The wind blew. The 22-foot absorption zone was carpeted with a thick blanket of dust. But the wind blew it all away. This dust was the dozens of undead Mastodons left with nothing but bones after entering the zone. Once the dust wind blew, an ominous silhouette appeared.

“Gwoack!”

More than a hundred Mastodons were left due to the narrow valley. Only one could enter at a time. Five minutes were too short to absorb the entire herd.

“Gwoack!”

Those who didn’t die by the Supercharge skill roared with hostility. Then, they hurtled toward Lloyd, who was still on the floor.

“Gwoackk!!!!!”

Stomp! Stomp! Stomp! The ground shook. The 13-foot undead monsters galloped. Lloyd, on the other hand, was sitting composedly in his posture without any protection. He didn’t look like he was going to stand and run away. It looked like this until Lloyd slowly opened his eyes.

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong!”

Ppodong, who felt that things weren't going smoothly, moved. He remembered Lloyd's warning to never get near, but he couldn't help it. At this rate, Lloyd would be stomped to death, and he had to prevent that. So, he rushed ahead without thinking. But when he passed by Lloyd and tried to ram into the incoming Mastodons, Ppodong heard Lloyd speak. Had it not been for Lloyd's calling, Ppodong wouldn't have thought twice about flinging himself to more than a hundred Mastodons.

"Ppodong, stop."

"Ppo...?"

The voice was calm. Ppodong stopped. Lloyd's eyes were open, and they were staring at the undead Mastodons. But something strange took place.

"Gwoack?"

The charging undead Mastodon in the very front stopped dead in its tracks. Strange. It merely met his gaze, but it was as though it was struck with lightning or gripped with terrorizing fear.

"Kwoaaak!"

And when the front one stopped, the entire herd followed suit. Just then, a new message appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

[Manaheart Skill Option ④: Zombie Domination has been activated.]

Chapter 154: Mana Predator (2)

“Gwoack?”

The undead Mastodon was hurtling straight ahead as it shook the ground under its feet. But the merciless stomping came to an immediate halt as if it was struck with a bolt of lightning or covered with ice water. Its body flinched visibly, and it was rooted to the floor.

“Gwoack...?”

The undead never got scared. On the contrary, they always gave off an air of fearsome hostility, even in the presence of the most potent foes. No fear or hesitation. That was their biggest advantage. But right then, the undead Mastodon was gripped with a vivid and clear sense of trepidation when it locked eyes with Lloyd, who was sitting right in front of it with a composed gaze.

Ding dong.

[Manaheart Skill Option ④: Zombie Domination has been activated.]

A new message popped in front of Lloyd. The meaningful messages took a portion of Lloyd's view, like a bundle of surprise gifts or a medal of honor given to those who overcame hardship.

[Your manaheart successfully processed the extremely corrupt energy during your frenzy. For this special experience, you have been awarded new optional skills.]

[Skill Option 4: Zombie Domination - You can now control an undead creature whose mana is smaller than yours for a limited period of time. The domination period is contingent on your and the undead’s mana. During the domination period, the undead creatures will faithfully obey your commands. However, the dominated creatures obey you only when they are facing you. If this condition is not satisfied, they will immediately turn hostile and aggressive. There is no limit to the number of domination entities. You can only use this once per day.]

It's just what the message said.

Lloyd's mind flew back to the event a while ago. It must have been right after he used the Supercharge. His deafened ears picked up the noise around him. He opened his eyes and saw the undead Mastodon charging at him. He was about to jump to his feet and evade when he spotted a message that Zombie Domination had been activated. His eyes then met the undead Mastodon rushing in the front, and a pang of terror appeared in the latter's eyes. The monster looked like a friend who borrowed money from you and ghosted you for a whole week. In other words, the Mastodon was scared.

So, to get this straight, I now have a skill that can dominate the undead for a certain period because I'd absorbed a large volume of undead mana with my Supercharge skill.

That was what happened, and it was evidenced by the herd of Mastodons that stopped in its tracks.

Ha. Who would have thought I'd obtain this sweet optional skill? Not me.

It was a spur-of-the-moment decision when Lloyd decided to use the Supercharge. He just thought that it was the most efficient and best way to stop the herd in this narrow valley. But now, he had earned a sweet optional skill.

I even became a mid-level sword expert.

Lloyd could feel that his senses were entirely different from before. The vigor in his body couldn't be compared to the past. To analogize, he was like a scrawny teenager visiting the gym for the first time when he was a low-level sword expert, but now, he instantly evolved into a ripped gym rat who could lift heavy weights without breaking a sweat.

My goodness, this feels like coming across a 100-dollar bill in my coat I had hung in my closet the previous winter.

But Lloyd knew that he couldn’t simply bask in the happiness at the moment. His gaze then moved downward toward the message window, where it showed the time left for the optional skill.

[Number of dominated zombies: 108]

The number of Mastodons left in this valley was 108, and he now had only about 4 minutes and 50 seconds until the domination was over.

I don’t have much time. My, if only there was more time, I could put the zombies, skeletons, and the other undead creatures to work without charge.

There had to be a way to actualize his wish, but not now. Not a second could be wasted. Facing the undead monsters, Lloyd rose and walked backward near Ppodong and the baby Mastodons.

“Everyone all right?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

“Chuuu!!”

“Yes, yes, I am relieved. It was scary, right?”

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

“Oh, you weren’t? You were hugging the babies, so they won’t get scared?” said Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

“What a good boy,” complimented Lloyd.

It looked like Ppodong was hugging the baby Mastodons tight while he was in a trance due to the Supercharge.

“So,” Lloyd said as his eyes continued to look at the Mastodons, “let’s get out of here. Ppodong, listen up.”

“Ppodong!”

“Chuuu!!”

“We’re going to step on their backs to jump over them and make for the exit of the valley. We have no time, so don’t ask questions.”

“Ppodong...!”

“Chu!!”

They seemed to read that the situation was far from favorable. So, they simply nodded without any questions.

“Ppodong, put me on your back,” hurriedly instructed Lloyd. “And as for you babies, grab your tails with your noses. Like you’re playing with trains. Interlock yourselves like a string of sausages. You don’t get it? Here, like this. Good. Good job. Make sure you hold each other tight and never let go until we’re out of here. Okay?”

“Chuuu!!”

Since the valley was jam-packed with the undead Mastodons, Lloyd needed more than five minutes to push each and clear the road. So Lloyd was left with the option to hop out of here on their backs before the spell was up.

“Let’s go then!” shouted Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

“Chuuu!!”

Time left: 4 minutes and 26 seconds. As soon as Ppodong and the baby Mastodons leaped, Lloyd commanded the herd of undead Mastodons.

“On your knees!”

Crackle! His order was processed in their heads, and the reaction was immediate.

“Kwo...ack!”

The one in the very front lowered its front leg after a short hesitation and did the same with its hind leg. Stooping its huge body to the lowest level, it then lowered its head and stretched its thick nose forward. Its position looked like a stair good for climbing.

“Okay, as fast as you can!”

“Ppodong!”

“Chuuu!!”

They stepped on the head and back of the first one and got up. And the whole area came into view.

“Gwoack...!”

More than a hundred Mastodons were in a line, filling up the entire valley.

“Let’s gooo!”

Everyone moved in perfect order.

Sprint! They stepped on the back of the first mastodon and kicked the forehead of the second. The third one’s butt was used as a foothold. From that moment on...

“Gwoak!”

Each time they stepped and passed by them, the trampled Mastodon sprang to its feet as though it was never laid down in the first place and was never under Lloyd’s domination. Each rose up with hostility and pursued Ppodong and the baby Mastodons with a deathly aura. The reason behind their changed attitude was simple.

Just look at how they change their attitude because I'm not looking at them anymore.

The condition of the optional skill, which was locking his gaze with the undead, was not satisfied as Lloyd passed by them on Ppodong's back. But he could not turn around and look at them since that would make the silent ones in the front stand up and attack. In other words, there was only one thing Lloyd could do.

"Run! Run faster!"

"Ppodong!"

"Chuuu!!"

Ppodong darted off faster as he understood the situation. His chubby waist jerked up and down, and his fluffy buttocks wiggled. Ppodong sprinted and dashed against the wind with every fiber of his being that his tiny feet and hands became invisible by his sheer speed. He was followed by the five baby Mastodons, who jumped and leaped in the air.

"Chuuu!!"

The eldest one, who had locked Ppodong's tail with its nose, cried out in surprise. It tightened its grip around Ppodong's tail some more. The same went for the second, third, fourth, and youngest. Believing each other, they stiffened their noses and buttocks. As a result, no one was left behind.

"Good. We should keep going like this. Run faster, Ppodong!"

"Ppo-do-dong!"

Time left: 3 minutes and 25 seconds. Lloyd quickly counted the remaining number of the undead Mastodons lying flat on the ground.

There are about 50 left. We're in the middle of the herd now. Since we left when we were at 4 minutes and 26 seconds, it took us one minute and one second to cross halfway. We can pull this off. At this rate, we can get out of here without any problem.

Lloyd felt hopeful. Safe escape was near. Feeling more confident, he encouraged Ppodong to continue dashing.

“Good! You’re doing a great job, Ppodong! Just a little more!”

“Ppo-do-dong! Pant! Pant!”

“You kids behind us! Don’t let go of each other’s tails!”

“Chuuu!!”

Good. Things are going very well. We should get out of here just like this, said Lloyd to himself.

“Okay, let’s gooo!!”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong ran faster. The number of Mastodons in front of them started to decrease. From 20, it became 15. Eight, five, three, two. Finally, Ppodong jumped over the last one. Leap!

“We did it! Head to the valley exit!”

“Ppodong!”

“Chuuu!!”

Now, the undead Mastodons were freed from the skill. Lloyd could turn around now, but he wouldn’t be able to dominate the monsters. Why?

The skill said that I can only dominate once a day.

So, the only thing left for them was running their butts off. Before anything, they had to get out of the valley, and then, blast the cliffs flanking the valley with a mana blast. The landslide would then bury the undead Mastodons. Once the plan materialized in his head, Lloyd encouraged Ppodong to dash along the narrow path. He jumped over a creek and turned a few corners. From a distance, there appeared the valley exit. A faint ray of hope appeared. Lloyd became more confident they would make it out of there alive and safe. He thought so. But soon, he learned that he was wrong.

“Gwoack!”

Fwoosh! A ferocious shout came along with a rush of air. Lloyd felt something flying behind him.

“Huh?” Lloyd ducked down by reflex in surprise, and right at that moment...

Boom! A large, dark lump, flying at a great speed, brushed past Lloyd’s head.

“A rock?”

It was almost 10 feet tall. It looked like one of the Mastodons catapulted the rock with its nose.

I’d have kicked the bucket if I got hit.

Lloyd was relieved, but he nonetheless broke out in a cold sweat. But the next moment, he learned that his relief had come too early. The rock that passed him flew straight in the air toward the towering cliff on the side.

Eh...?

It flew hard and crashed down without stopping. Boom! The rock smashed the cliff, and the whole cliff began to rumble.

Boooom! Since the valley and cliff were narrow, the banged rock created a blaring noise and echo. The entire cliff shook to Lloyd’s fear.

No way.

A sinister feeling suddenly grew in him, Lloyd lifted his head and activated his design skill. Then, he saw.

A crack is spreading throughout the cliff.

The crack was tiny, but Lloyd could visibly see it grow bigger over time. Chills ran down his spine.

“Ppodong!” Lloyd found himself yelling in a high-pitched tone. “Run faster! As fast as you can!”

At that moment...

Crash! Boom! He heard a tilting sound and something exploding and then being crushed flat. Several areas of the cliff began to crumble. It was happening. The landslide.

“Dammit!”

Slam! Crash! Rocks came down everywhere. Ppodong dashed ahead, avoiding each from hitting him. He jumped, rolled, retreated, and rushed to survive. But there were too many rocks.

No. I can’t see the way out.

Doom. Despair. The tips of Lloyd’s fingers grew cold. The exit was near, but every path that led there was falling apart. No, everything that came into Lloyd’s view broke into pieces. Thousands and tens of thousands of tons of earth and rocks slid down all areas. There was no way out. And the mana blast wasn’t enough.

Really? This is how I die?

Lloyd was dumbfounded by this situation. Laughter escaped. He looked up. He felt victimized. He regretted saying that he would take the matter into his own hands. He should have escaped with the workers instead of risking it all by himself. But it was too late to regret now. No matter where he looked, the sky was no longer above him. There was nothing but dirt and rocks surrounding him. And so, this was really the end for him.

“I’m sorry you all...” Lloyd spoke as he realized his time was up. But at that moment...

Whip!

“…!”

Something white came down somewhere and wrapped around his arms, legs, and body.

“Ppodong?”

“Chuuu?”

The same went for Ppodong and the five baby Mastodons. Before they could respond, they were twined in something that resembled a white net. It was...

“A spider web?”

Lloyd’s eyes widened. The next moment, a shout came above the sky as if to answer Lloyd’s self-talk.

“Ggoming!”

“Ggoming!”

A shout, coming from the sky, rang aloud. At the same time, something white flew in his direction and wrapped around him in a flash like a net. Fwick! Whip!

“...!”

Lloyd flinched at the abrupt ensnaring and stared at the white net that wrapped his body.

A spider web?

It was white and sticky. But Lloyd wasn’t the only one bound by the web. Ppodong and the five baby Mastodons were swathed with the spider web, too, as though they were parcels. And there came a tug. Stretch!

“Eek...”

The spider web was pulled with great vigor, and they were tugged in its direction as a result.

“Ppodung...!”

“Chu...!”

Tug! Ppodong was already sprinting fast, so when the spider web around him tugged forward with great strength, the two forces compounded to propel the former to an explosive acceleration. As a result, his speed increased by two-fold, and he was saved from the giant rock by the skin of his teeth.

Boooom! The mere noise of the rock falling to the ground created a blaring din. Lloyd wondered what would have happened if he had been crushed by it.

Well, no point in wondering! I'd probably have been pressed into a pancake.

Lloyd stole a glance behind him as he panted. Chills ran down his spine. But he didn't have the luxury of time to relax as he heard a shout above.

"I'm going to pull harder. Hold tight."

"...!"

At the same time, Lloyd spotted a familiar outline of a figure over the valley.

"Ggoming!"

A large parrotbill glided in the air with his wings spread wide. A silver-haired knight was on his back. It was Ggoming and Javier.

"Haha, ha! Javier, how nice to see you up!"

Stretch! Once again, the spider web roughly pulled Ppodong, but this time, it wasn't doing so forward. It was pulling him up. His two feet left the ground, and the same went for the five baby Mastodons. That is, Ppodong and five baby Mastodons were lifted in the air, tightly and painfully wrapped around by the spider web.

"Ppu-pu-dung!"

"Chuu!"

Everyone flailed in dismay. Ggoming's wings fluttered faster, and everyone was lifted off the valley ground. They barely passed through the tons of dirt and rock that were cascading down. They flew higher and higher until they arrived at the top of a safe cliff. Around this time, Javier's voice came from Ggoming's back.

"Sir Ppodong? I'm going to cut the web. Brace yourself."

"Ppodung!" Ppodong answered gallantly. Javier's sword glinted above.

Thwack! The spider web, which had been impressively holding up until now, was cut. Ppodong and the Mastodons fell to the ground safely. But not Lloyd. The spider web that tied him around wasn't cut. Dangling in the air, Lloyd cocked his head to the side.

"Eh? What about me?"

"Master Lloyd, please come up," Javier said.

Lloyd wondered whether Javier's voice sounded colder than usual. Grimacing, Lloyd grabbed the spider web and pulled himself up until he finally got up on Ggoming's back.

"Woah."

Lloyd let out a sigh of relief at the realization that he was seriously close to death today. But he couldn't sit and relax. He didn't even have the time or luxury to get the sticky spider web off his body.

"Are you hurt anywhere?" asked Javier.

"..."

Javier, who was sitting on the front saddle on Ggoming, sounded unusually cold. Lloyd's hand that tore the spider webs off his body stopped. Then, Lloyd took the seat behind Javier.

"What if I am? Are you going to blow my wound?"

"I plan to cut it up, so it won't rot," said Javier.

"Ack..."

If Javier's attitude was weather, it'd be a heavy snowfall. That was how cold and icy his responses were.

"By the way," Lloyd replied as he glanced down at the landslide, "how did you find us?"

“I heard it.”

“What do you mean?”

“I heard the explosion,” answered Javier.

“Wait, the first carcass explosion?”

“That was probably it.”

Javier nodded and recalled the events that led up to this point. He was simply doing his work in the apartment complex construction site and chopping the metal rebars Bangul excreted when he heard an explosion in the far north. Javier sensed that something was sorely wrong. The explosion was, though faint, loaded with sinister and evil mana. So, he left the site and looked for Ggoming first. If he was right about the accident in the north where Lloyd was...

I’ll be too late if I run there.

He was fast, but not faster than Ggoming’s flying. So, he searched for the bird and explained the predicament, how he wanted the bird to get big and take him there. Thankfully, Ggoming carried a red sunflower seed, which Lloyd gave each creature for emergencies. And once he became large, Javier flew to the site. On his way to the north, he bumped into the evacuating workers and heard a summary of what happened from Sir Bayern, who was leading them. He also learned about Lloyd’s various actions. This made him mad. Very mad.

“Woah. So, that’s what happened. Thank you. If you didn’t come to save us, then, whew. The mere thought of it is just horrible,” said Lloyd.

“...”

Lloyd was catching his breath behind Javier, thanking the latter for coming at the right time. Such an expression of gratitude was very rare for Lloyd, so it was precisely why Javier hated Master Lloyd more today and drove his point home.

“So,” asked Javier, “are you happy?”

“Huh?”

“I’m asking whether you’re happy about being saved by me.”

“Hmm... By the way, did something happen to you?” asked Lloyd in confusion.

“Nothing happened,” said Javier.

“Then, why are you so moody?”

“Moody? I would never,” denied Javier.

“Yes, you are. You are moody. Aggressive too.”

“...”

“Did I upset you?”

“Yes,” Javier confirmed

“Wow. So blunt.”

“I am,” said Javier, “trying to hold it in but can’t.”

“How so?”

“Are you seriously asking me that?”

“Is it because of the sacrificed White Cavalry?” asked Lloyd.

“Not at all.”

Javier shook his head hard, thinking that this young master was seriously clueless about what he had done wrong.

“The six knights of the White Cavalry did their job. They fought to protect the people as the swords and shields of Her Majesty, and they died with honor,” explained Javier. “That is their duty and responsibility. So, I may respect and mourn their sacrifice, but it is not something to feel sorry for. The problem is elsewhere.”

“Elsewhere? Where is it?” asked Lloyd innocently.

“The problem is that you, Master Lloyd, had taken the same action, forgetting your place.”

“What?” gaped Lloyd.

He really doesn’t know, said Javier to himself. This young master was completely in the dark about how important he had become to this fiefdom.

“Master Lloyd, have you ever considered what would happen if you disappeared?” blurted Javier coldly.

“Um, yes, I have.”

“Then, you should know what I’m going to say next.”

“I do. There will be no one to finish or continue the things I started once I’m gone. So, the whole fiefdom will perish and fall apart. That’s what you want to say, right?” asked Lloyd.

“Exactly,” confirmed Javier with a sigh. “It wasn’t this much of an issue before. I simply considered you a precious member of the Frontera family, the eldest son, and the successor to the lord... Nothing more. So, I thought in the worst-case scenario where I had to choose between the lord and you, I would pick the lord without hesitation. But now...”

“I have become important?”

“Yes,” replied Javier. “But not because I’ve grown fond of you. It’s because you are more responsible for the fiefdom’s future than before.”

“You know, you don’t have to add the last part,” said Lloyd.

“But-”

“Anyway,” interrupted Lloyd, “is that why you are so upset and sulky?”

“I was never sulky.”

“Yes, you are. You are totally sulking. I could see you pouting from behind.”

“Master Lloyd, do you think I am joking right-”

“I am not kidding.”

“...”

Lloyd’s voice sounded calm. He looked down at the herd of Mastodons gradually perishing under the landslide and recalled the moment of great emergency a while ago.

“I fully get what you are saying,” Lloyd continued. “And I know you have good intentions. You’re telling me to run safely and don’t take things into my own hands when danger arises. Right?”

“Yes,” Javier confirmed

“But you’re upset because I always get winded up in this situation by risking myself, totally ignorant of my place. I’m right on this one, too, right?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, that’s right.”

“But what else can I do? I don’t think I can be more careful in the future.”

“Why is that?” asked Javier.

“There are people that trust and work for me.”

Javier wanted to refute and fight back. But he couldn’t come up with anything, so he stayed silent. Lloyd continued to speak amid his silence.

“Of course, I don’t want to be in danger, either. I’m scared. And I hate dying all the more. But you see, everyone has their own responsibilities,” said Lloyd.

Lloyd was being frank with Javier. It went without saying that he hated the idea of getting hurt or dying. But he knew that such sentiment went the same for everyone who worked for him.

“If it weren’t for me, they wouldn’t have dug up the ground in the northern wilderness. I mean, the workers today. Don’t you think so? This construction project began because of me, and I’m the one in charge.”

“But-”

“You know, do you know what being responsible means to me? I may be the biggest liar there is and trick those who trouble me, but I never do such to those who at least trust and follow me.”

Just then, his experiences in South Korea came to his mind. Construction fields were always dangerous. Careless mistakes and accidents happened everywhere. Although he was never in an accident due to sheer luck, he heard of an accident every time he watched the news. There were reports of a fire breaking out in welding sites, old tower cranes falling, and many other safety accidents outside of those events. The victims were always the workers.

But no one took responsibility. No one really came out to be liable. If there was, it was the field superintendents, and they would get some disciplinary actions from the construction companies. Then, there came meaningless and nominal apologies and words of comfort. Companies sought ways to reduce the already shamefully small amount of compensation they had to pay.

That was it. Then, similar accidents repeated. No one came to get rid of the root cause of the accidents. Why? Because it was expensive and laborious. Maintaining the status quo and compensating the victims' families was cheaper than putting up safety measures. So, companies deflected all their responsibilities citing financial reasons as the excuse. Lloyd loathed them for it.

“So, I do not want to turn a blind eye to my responsibility toward the construction site I took charge of.”

Lloyd spoke, meaning every word, saying he would always be like this. He would never let go of his responsibility for the workers. He would take responsibility even when fear, annoyance, and laziness pressured him.

“Even so,” Lloyd added, “I will try to play safe since I don’t want to die or get hurt, either. I will do so just for you.”

“For me?” Javier cocked his head as he sat in the front, wondering what in the world Lloyd could mean. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose mischievously...

“The lullaby service.”

“Excuse me?” asked Javier.

“You better tell me honestly. You’re doing this because there’s no one to sing the lullaby once something bad happens to me, right? Aren’t you scared because of that?”

“That is just outrageous...”

“Eh, looks like I have driven my point home. You’re upset.”

“Not at all. That is simply absurd,” defied Javier.

“Really?”

“Yes,” Javier confirmed

“You sure?”

“Of course.”

“Then, why are your ears getting red?”

“It’s because of the cold wind,” said Javier.

“There. Your voice cracked just a little.”

“This is troubling. Could something have happened to your hearing earlier?” asked Javier.

“My, my. Are you going to deny it like that?”

“There is nothing to deny.”

Javier jerked his head to the side after uttering coldly. Just then, an unexpected yet welcomed message appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes.

Ding dong.

Dang.

Lloyd cast his eyes over the bright messages, and a smile naturally formed on his face. His eyes growing slightly more mischievous, he stared at Javier's chestnut-like head.

"You rascal. Are you happy?"

"I'm not sure what you mean..."

"I'm asking if the speech from this wise, old friend of yours was touching," teased Lloyd.

“Don’t get excited. Not even in the slightest. That will never ever happen,” defied Javier.

Lloyd wondered why Javier’s shaking of his head looked particularly more aggressive today.

“I could never be touched by your words. How can I be touched by a man who jumps to danger without knowing the importance and significance of his life to others? And besides, I am not your friend,” reminded Javier.

“Why? You’re five years younger than me.”

“I am young, and not to mention, lively.”

“Hey, give yourself five years, and you’re going to be as old as I am.”

“You’ll grow older as well then,” pointed Javier.

“Shoot...”

“Anyway,” continued Javier, “I do not intend to think of you as wiser or older just from physical age. So, you can do away with your pointless expectations early on.”

“Are you pushing me away?” asked Lloyd.

“Our relationship was always like this in the first place.”

Javier’s voice remained cold. Laughter escaped Lloyd because he saw something he couldn’t help but point out.

“You know. Your words really don’t match your behavior,” said Lloyd.

“I am not sure what you mean.”

“You are grabbing my sleeve.”

Javier turned around wordlessly and looked down.

“You’ve been doing this from before. From the moment you got me on Ggoming’s back.”

“...”

“Are you grabbing me because I might fall?” asked Lloyd.

“You got it all wrong,” denied Javier again.

“How so?”

“I wished to grab your collar because of what you did, but my hands just don’t reach that far.”

“Aha. So, that’s why you’re clutching my sleeve?”

Javier was silent again.

“Makes sense though,” Lloyd agreed, “after all, I am an important and respectable man.”

“...”

“My goodness. What a good boy you are, Javier,” teased Lloyd.

“Do you want me to shove you down the cliff?”

“Really? Do you mean it?”

“I think this height is enough to cleanly send you off in one try. Just enough to end your tenacious life.”

“I think you’re being sincere now,” pointed out Lloyd.

“Obviously.”

Even when Javier went on uttering viciously, he never let go of Lloyd's sleeve as though he was worried that Lloyd might fall off. The tight grip allowed Lloyd to take a closer look at the situation beneath. The valley under Ggoming's wings was being crushed. Hundreds and thousands of earth and rocks were pouring into the valley, and Lloyd noticed intermittent explosions amid the overwhelming catastrophe. They were the zombie Mastodons bursting under the crushing weight of the earth and rocks. Those explosions led to a chain of more landslides.

Not a single one will be able to make it out alive.

Complete annihilation and burial. Even after things calmed down, Lloyd circulated around the area a few more times to closely check lest any creature survived. Thankfully, Lloyd couldn't spot any Mastodons that made it out alive.

"I heard from the workers evacuating a moment ago," Javier said in the front. "The undead Mastodons came up from the ground?"

"Yeah."

Lloyd recalled the previous event. He was digging up the hole to make a sludge treatment facility when he came across a legion of Mastodon carcasses.

"But they weren't buried randomly. It was all lined up in order."

"Must be the doing of the necromancer that made them," presumed Javier.

"I would assume so." Lloyd nodded as he spoke. "Who could it be? Anyone in mind?"

"No, not at all."

Javier paused for a second before continuing.

"No one comes to my mind. On top of that, necromancers are hard to come across."

“Hmm,” wondered Lloyd, “could it be related to the one we took care of the last time?”

“Do you mean the warlock that kidnapped our soldiers in the eastern range?” asked Javier.

“Yeah,” said Lloyd. “When we were building the seokbinggo in the orc village. Do you remember him?”

“Yes, of course.” Javier nodded. “Indeed, it could be that it is the work of the necromancer related to him. But I presume it is too early to think so-”

“Yes, I know. We’re jumping the gun.”

“Yes, I think so too.”

Lloyd stared down at the destroyed valley, confused. He was absolutely in the dark. Who created the undead Mastodons and buried them near the fiefdom?

I don’t have a lead to conclude whether it was a random chance that we came across the monster or whether it was to actually hurt my fiefdom.

Lloyd couldn’t figure out the answer even as he recalled The Knight of Blood and Iron. Hundreds of undead Mastodons were buried in the wilderness north of Frontera county. This was something that never happened in the novel. And obviously so. The monster domino effect never even occurred in Frontera county inside the novel. The Mastodons living in the plain beyond the eastern range never came down here in the story.

Ugh. But I can’t just ignore this problem.

However he looked at it, Lloyd now had a problem to solve. In the case the Mastodons were buried for some other use, Lloyd had destroyed the necromancer’s storage. The victim might ask for compensation or hold a grudge against Lloyd. But otherwise, if they were intentionally buried to harm the fiefdom, Lloyd would be in greater trouble. Either way, it was bad for his future.

“Tsk.”

But Lloyd had bigger fish to fry at the moment. The first one on the front burner was to clean up today’s mess. The sewer construction had to go on. Lloyd would search for a lead to this mysterious necromancer in the process. Right now, he had to focus on his priorities.

“Let’s go. Over there.”

Lloyd first decided to tend to Bibeong, who lost consciousness when he protected Lloyd from the initial explosion. Thinking so, Lloyd pointed at the east. Ggoming’s fluttering of wings became faster.

To Lloyd’s relief, Bibeong was safe. It was thanks to his massive tenacity that came from his giant physique. He was A-Ok even if the explosion burst right at his face. All he had were a couple of burned hairs and some signs of concussion.

“So Bangul,” said Lloyd.

“Bangul?”

“I think it would be good if you nurse Bibeong,” said Lloyd.

“Ba-bangul!? Bangul?”

“Oh, are you saying that Hamang would be more suitable for nursing him? Sure, throwing a bucketful of water will wash Bibeong very well and help him regain consciousness.”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

“Hmm, but I disagree.”

“Banguuul?”

“It’s because Bibeong isn’t hurt that badly in the first place.”

“Bangul?”

“I think it’d comfort him more if you stay beside him instead of throwing water to his face,” said Lloyd.

“Bba-bangul? Bangul? Bangul?”

“I mean it. Trust me. You have the ability to do so.”

“Banguuul?”

Bangul cocked her to the side and kept it that way. But she nonetheless tended to Bibeong, patting his head and keeping his side. Lloyd’s prediction turned out to be on point.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong! Bibeong!”

Once Bibeong regained consciousness, he went berserk at the sight of Bangul. He argued that he was perfectly fine and that the explosion meant nothing. His hair was singed, but putting on some saliva would make it better. The same went for the concussion. He had experienced it before as well. He said that he was on the ground lying flat for a long time because he was tired. After he jolted up, he plastered a shamelessly confident look on his face. Bangul then started to scold him.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

Cut the crap, Bangul dismissed. A patient must lie on the bed and sleep. Otherwise, she was done nursing him. This prompted Bibeong to hurl his body back to the ground at lightning speed.

“Bibeo-beong!”

Before he knew it, Bibeong put on a wide grin. Lloyd realized that he didn’t have to worry about him anymore. Afterward, he moved busily and first took care of the remains of the deceased White Cavalry with care. Cleaning up the accident site took him a few days. From the hole the Mastodons were found to the destroyed valley, Lloyd and the others thoroughly organized the places and searched around in the hopes of coming across a clue that might point to the necromancer. But even after a few days of searching, nothing solid came out.

“But do not be too anxious. You see, you have no idea how glad and grateful I am that you are safe.”

Click. At the dinner table that came after a long while, Lloyd stared at the plate the countess held out. And he spoke.

“This plate seems to be a bit different from what you told me a while ago,” said Lloyd.

“Different? How?” asked countess Frontera.

“You dragged me here on my way out, telling me to at least eat a light snack even if I’m busy.”

“Yes, I did,” she said.

“That means I thought I came here to have a quick snack.”

“Correct.”

“But how do you explain the mountain of food on my plate...?” asked Lloyd.

“Why, is it because you want some more?” asked the countess, worried.

“No, I am worried that my stomach might burst open.”

“Do not worry. You have more to eat.”

“...”

Shut up and eat. Your opinion doesn’t matter. Lloyd wished the countess would be forthright and tell him that to his face. With a look of despair, he looked at the plate. The plate itself was huge. It was about 20 inches in diameter. So technically speaking, it wasn’t a plate. It was a round tray loaded with all sorts of food there. Lloyd thought that this food plate should belong to a person who came to a buffet for the first time in their life or to a mukbang streamer. Salad, sausage, egg, steak, marinated meat and bread, pasta and mashed potatoes, buttered goose and salmon, cream-filled corn, and fried chicken... The list continued, and there seemed to be enough food to circle the training hall five and a half times.

“Um, I don’t think I’ll be able to finish this...” muttered Lloyd.

“It is all right,” said the countess. “You can take as much time as you want.”

“Um, it’s going to take me over ten days.”

Lloyd was flustered. He had a lot of work to tackle, so he needed to clean up the construction before sunset and check tomorrow’s work area in advance. Though he was exhausted and wanted to lie on the bed and doze off, he had things to finish. But Countess Frontera, who was well aware of his hectic schedule, was especially adamant today.

“I get it. I get that you are busy and wish to head to the construction site fast,” she said.

“Then, I will eat this sausage and leave-”

“When will I get the chance to see you if I do not do this?”

“...”

“Though he does not voice it, your father is distraught these days. He says that you are overworking and trying to carry all the burden by yourself.”

Lloyd didn’t reply.

“That is why I want you to listen to me. At least for one day, eat up until your stomach is full and rest. Give a break to yourself and to those who follow you,” she said gently.

“...”

Her quiet words seemed to touch his heart. No, in actuality, the countess had approached him with open arms. And with a concerned voice, she cooed over and assured Lloyd, who thought that her comforting words were like a pat on his back.

“So sit now, my son.”

“Okay...”

Lloyd wanted to know why his mind suddenly flew back to the time when he was in middle school. He thought about his mother, who urged him to eat dinner before leaving the house to study. Lloyd had told her that he couldn’t because he was busy.

I told her that even when I wasn’t actually going to study.

In actuality, he was skipping his studies to head to the internet cafe with his friends. He ignored his mother and bolted out of the house to get on time. One day, he found a bill in his jacket pocket. It was a crumpled ten-dollar bill his mother stashed to make sure that her son didn’t go hungry.

“...”

Lloyd regretted not listening to his mother. Maybe it was because of his remorse that the countess overlapped with his biological mother. But why? Was it because their gazes were the same? Or was it just because he missed those times? Crinkling his nose, Lloyd sat at the table and slowly chewed the food on his plate. Quietly, he kept eating.

He did so as he thought about his mother’s food he’d refused to eat in the distant past. One after another, he ate as though he was asking his mother for forgiveness. But no tears streaked down, or he didn’t even choke up. But it was very strange. For some reason, the food in his mouth tasted slightly saltier than usual.

Chapter 157: A Responsible Person (3)

Two days passed, and during those past two days, Lloyd halted all his operations after taking Countess Frontera's advice for periodic breaks. Thanks to that, everyone sweating heavily in the field relaxed to their hearts' content and appeased their spirits troubled by the recent accident.

"Since we have rested up, we will be resuming the operation starting today," said Lloyd.

"Are you sure it is fine?" asked the count.

"Well, yes," replied Lloyd at Count Frontera, who was having breakfast. "The past two days gave everyone enough time to rest."

"Except you," said the count with a worried look on his face.

"I am always like this."

Lloyd smiled brightly and picked up some salad with his fork. The past two days were a break for the workers, indeed. But it wasn't for him.

"After all, people died."

The undead Mastodons ruckus killed six knights of the White Cavalry who gave their lives away to ensure everyone else could evacuate. They bravely formed a defense line against hundreds of monsters and sacrificed their lives. As such, Lloyd held a formal funeral ceremony for those brave souls, but he didn't bury them here. He instead collected their tattered remains, cremated them with care, and contained them in silver-studded jars. Afterward, Lloyd gave 30 knights of the White Cavalry a special leave and had them transfer the jars to the capital, along with a sincere letter of comfort and compensation.

The letter said that your beloved deceased was a man of valor who chose honor and gave his life to save others. It seemed like a platitude thing to say, but nothing else came to Lloyd's mind for the bereaving families. And besides, Lloyd was feeling those words in his heart. He came to revere the deceased. So, he went further and sent another letter, this time to the queen, detailing their accomplishments and courage in their last moments and the honorable death they chose. Lloyd wrote as flowery as he could, thinking his eloquence would prompt the queen to take more care of the widows and children. Afterward, he visited Corgidus's studio and requested the dwarf to build a memorial stone that engraved the six knights. He did the best he could for them. Why? The reason was simple.

They are worthy of this kind of treatment, after all.

They had sacrificed their lives to protect the people of this fiefdom, so it was only obvious that Lloyd should be grateful to them. And his gratitude brought about a visit from an unexpected figure.

Sir Blanc visited me last night.

Just then, he recalled what had happened the previous night. It was around the time Lloyd came back after putting Javier to sleep. He found Sir Blanc hovering around the manor courtyard, and upon coming up to him, Sir Blanc said that he had been waiting for Lloyd.

"Thank you."

He first thanked Lloyd.

"You see, death is common for us. And as we stomp through the battlefields and wars, death is our friend, a daily occurrence. Maybe that is why I became slightly insensitive to losing my men."

Sir Blanc, standing beneath the faint light of the crescent moon, had watery eyes.

"So I was very surprised. I had never expected your family to formally bid farewell to my knights. So, thank you. They will be joyful that their death wasn't for nothing."

"Oh, I simply did what I had to-"

“Nobody has done this until this moment.”

Lloyd was silent.

“It was the same for the royalty. Of course, we are loyal to them. But not even once did the royal family ever mention the subject of proper burial and compensation for the deceased soldiers. So, at times, I could not erase the feeling that we are a formality, a small but special commodity and nothing else.”

Sir Blanc continued to speak.

“Therefore, I thank you. Thank you for not taking my men’s death for granted. Thank you for respecting our honor.”

At that moment... a new message appeared.

[Sir Blanc has opened up to you.]

[Sir Valeradi Blanc, the commander of the White Cavalry, is deeply touched by your noble character.]

[He has decided to sincerely follow you as an honorable knight while being loyal to the royal family.]

[He secretly wishes to be bound to your command.]

[From now on, you can increase likeability and earn RP from him.]

[50 RP has been rewarded for forming a new connection with another human.]

[Current RP: 3,290]

[Your likeability with Valeradi Blanc has increased by 5 points.]

[Current RP with Valeradi Blanc: +52]

[You have earned 45 RP by improving your relationship with a character.]

[Current RP: 3,335]

Dang.

Lloyd sucked in his breath. What he received from Sir Blanc was an indirect and secret pledge of allegiance. He felt guilty and happy at the same time.

It'll be problematic if the queen finds out about this.

Sir Blanc worked for the royal family, yes, but here he was, promising allegiance to someone else. Lloyd quickly smiled and encouraged the knight commander.

"I understand you, Sir Blanc. It is truly unfortunate and sad that you lost your men. I am sure Her Majesty feels the same way as I do."

Lloyd had mentioned Her Majesty on purpose, and it was only then that Sir Blanc looked like he had made a mistake. But his facial expression was removed after a second, and he bowed without a word and left. Lloyd was recollecting the event of the previous night when he heard someone call him.

"Master Lloyd... I have something to show you."

"Huh?"

A voice interrupted Lloyd's trance. He turned to the sound.

"Sir Bayern?"

Sir Bayern was in the dining room.

"What brings you here in the morning, Sir Bayern?" asked the count.

"As I said a while ago, I came to show you something. It's this."

Sir Bayern spoke and placed something on the table. It was a freshly cut head of a goat. But something was stuck in its forehead. It was a half-burned and ripped embroidery of the symbol of surrender.

“I have been conducting a search around the premises during the two days of rest, Your Excellency and young master,” said Sir Bayern. “It was done autonomously along with some men from the White Cavalry. And we found this late last night.”

“Late last night?” asked the count.

Sir Bayern nodded.

“Yes, Your Excellency. A member of the White Cavalry found it buried near the hole where we came across the undead Mastodons. We thought of reporting to you immediately, but we came here early in the morning since it was too late at night.”

“Hmm.”

The count observed the embroidery symbol and said, “A grim reaper with the head and wings of a black dragon. How strange. I have never seen it before.”

“Yes, Your Excellency,” agreed Sir Bayern. “I have never seen it before, either. But judging from the buried area and the goat head, I can guess that this is a talisman symbolic of the undead preservation magic circle.”

“It probably is. After all, a magical device would have been necessary to preserve the legion of undead Mastodons underneath.”

The count and Sir Bayern held a rich discussion about the symbol. It was their first time seeing such a symbol, so they put their heads together about its origin and the rumors surrounding it. As for Lloyd, he lost all appetite at the sight of it. But it wasn’t because he saw the goat head during breakfast. Sure, it was a grotesque thing to behold, but he had a strong stomach. There was another reason why he lost it. That symbol of a grim reaper with a black dragon’s head and wings was familiar to his eyes.

That... appears in the novel.

He remembered it, but where? In the novel, particularly in the new flag the queen adapted. It was the symbol of the flag that fluttered at the top of the royal palace.

Queen Magentano chose it as the new symbol of royalty after she lost one arm and turned into a tyrant. That is after she takes up advice from one of her people. That must have been when her tyranny and terrorizing reign began.

It was the beginning of the dark age. So, this dragon head grim reaper symbol was synonymous with tyranny and the dark age.

But what's it doing here?

Lloyd swallowed absentmindedly, and for a second, a scary thought crossed his mind. He wondered if Queen Magentano was behind the recent incident. He immediately shook his head.

No, it's not that.

There was no way. What would she get by harming his fiefdom? It didn't seem right. There was absolutely nothing she could gain from it.

I think it'd be more sensical to think that the one who proposed the symbol to the tyrant queen in the novel has something to do with this event.

The chances of that were more likely. The queen in this world didn't lose an arm or turn into a draconian ruler. Even if Lloyd rushed to the palace and showed the symbol to her right now, she would only tilt her head and think how funny the symbol looked.

So, it looks more likely that the person in the novel is involved in this... Hm... That's a pickle.

Lloyd frowned because he couldn't put his finger on who this figure was in the novel. The reason was simple. The novel didn't directly mention the person.

Not even a name appeared in the story. The figure was indirectly mentioned in her thoughts or monologues and nowhere else.

Lloyd wondered how they appeared in the story. It seemed likely that the person came up in sentences like, “Queen Magentano recalled the counsel of an advisor she recently hired” or “She looked back to the meeting with the advisor she recently hired.” That was why the online forum on the novel had some readers posting their guesses there. They theorized that this mysterious advisor was a disloyal subject trying to leech off the queen or that the figure was just a nobody. Some postulated that the figure was the true dark secret. But no one got the answer.

The advisor was never revealed, even after part one of the book. And the sequel never got published.

So, that was why this advisor was veiled in secret, only to be surrounded by so many speculations and assumptions. Lloyd was bitter that it had to be this way.

This is the reason why some authors are not good. They don’t have any sense of responsibility, not even a bit.

Lloyd internally cursed the author of the novel, how the author was irresponsible for not finishing the story and foul-tempered for leaving the readers hanging.

But still, it’s great that I know at least this much.

The difference between knowing an enemy and being entirely clueless was the same as the difference between the sky and the land. The knowledge of the enemy, regardless of how vague it was, allowed Lloyd to at least come up with some sort of preparation. He could even think of ways to attain more information in the future. At the very least, it pushed him in the right direction.

The reason Sir Bayern and the others searched the site for several days was to find a hint that will push us in the right direction.

So, for the time being, Lloyd had to rack his brain to find who the culprit was. He was planning to gather clues and have his ear to the ground about what was happening in the palace while doing his other work. Having decided what he needed to do, Lloyd spoke.

“Hmm... Sir Bayern,” Lloyd called.

“Yes?”

“I hope you did not bring this goat head for breakfast.”

“I did not, young master,” said Sir Bayern.

“Then, please remove it from the table,” said Lloyd.

“Oh...” he gaped.

The goat head boasted an amazing sense of presence with its tongue pulled out on the breakfast table. That was only when Sir Bayern realized what he had done. A flustered look appeared on his face. At that moment, a maid entered the room carrying a tray of cookies. She screamed her heart out when she saw the beast's head, her yelling ringing aloud the whole manor.

“Ackk!!!!!!”

Once that commotion was over, the construction for the sewer resumed.

“Bibeong! Bibeo-beong!”

Bibeong, who recovered after being injured in the explosion, passionately dug the ground. The area for the sludge treatment grew wider. The soldiers, knights of the White Cavalry, and refugee workers alike grabbed their shovels and worked like a dog as though they had never experienced the accident. After one, two, four, and eight days passed, their hard work and sweat actualized in the sludge treatment facility. Lloyd chose to use the gravity thickening method for this sludge treatment facility.

Simply put, it uses the force of gravity to concentrate the sludge to the bottom. It's much like the pit toilet used in provinces a long time ago. So, the structure is simple. I can also store and reduce sludge at the same time. It doesn't use any chemicals and is easy to maintain.

Actually, there was another sludge treatment model, but it wasn't suitable as this world lacked the right technology and equipment for it. He didn't have any choice, to begin with. Thus, he opted for the sludge thickener type, which was suitable for this place. The sewage and waste would gather in one place through the main sewer and flow into the sludge thickener. Once they were in, the sludge would sink to the bottom, and the remaining liquid and buoy would flow out of the letdown line. And he made a giant wooden lid on the upper side of the sludge treatment facility for Solitas, who was expected to take care of everything inside.

That way, we will be able to treat sludge with magic. Open the lid, and take the sludge out.

Lloyd actually wanted to opt for a more sophisticated method. But he couldn't do it. There was just no way to operate and manage the sludge hopper or sludge discharge pipe like in the modern era.

So, I should just do what I can.

He went on with the construction, doing what he could. Then, one day, in the middle of the hot summer, something other than the sweltering heat arrived. Letters. Marriage proposal letters from 59 noble families across the kingdom barraged the Frontera family.

Chapter 158: Sweetness in the Air (1)

“Excuse me, Young Master.”

Lloyd was exceedingly worn out tonight. With the equipment belt around him, Lloyd had sweated buckets on the site as he supervised the construction under the searing sun. He wanted to wash up and jumped into bed. But against his wishes, he was met with a maid as soon as he set foot in the manor.

“Master Lloyd, the count instructed me to bring you to the office once you get home,” she said.

“He wants me in the office?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, Young Master,” she said with a smile. “The count appeared happy. It looked like he had good news.”

“Did he?”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Lloyd wondered what the occasion was. He shrugged.

Did he win a lottery or something? Obviously, that can’t be. Good news from the palace, perhaps?

Could it be, Lloyd mused, that the queen announced she would provide additional aid? Or did she decide to pave a direct road to the palace from the fiefdom? Lloyd wished that such a good thing had taken place. Thinking so, Lloyd followed her until they arrived at the office. She knocked on the doors, and the count meekly spoke from the inside.

“Let him in.”

His voice sounded slightly brighter than usual. Something good did take place, for sure. Lloyd’s heart started to thump in anticipation.

“Thank you for escorting me, Emily.”

It appeared that she never expected Lloyd to know her name. She blushed red and left the office. Lloyd turned and saw the count and countess sitting on the reception sofa.

“Welcome back. Tough day?”

“A little.”

Lloyd sat across from them, and the countess poured some tea on his teacup.

“I am sure it was more than a little hard,” the countess said. “It must have been tiring to work outside all day in this heat. You must be thirsty. Drink this first.”

Trickle. Lloyd took the chilled teacup, and as he wet his throat, he observed them both.

“Anyway,” Lloyd said, “why did you call me? Did something good happen?”

Both of them were all smiles. The corners of the count’s lips were literally hanging up to his ears so plainly. And the countess, though she maintained an elegant smile on her face, couldn’t mask the satisfaction that was written all over his face.

It looks like there really is something.

Lloyd searched his memory. These two nobles weren’t rash people. They knew how to express their joy or grief in an elegant manner. And so, he had never seen the count and countess be this joyful in the past two years. The only time this similar emotion appeared on their faces was when they paid off their crippling debt.

So, this means that the news is as big as debt clearance.

What could it be? As curiosity grew in Lloyd, the count spoke up first.

“Oh, my, look at me. I called you here but did not explain why. Here. Take this first,” said the count as he placed a thick bundle of envelopes on the table. It looked like it easily contained at least 50 letters.

“What is this?” asked Lloyd.

“See for yourself.”

“...”

More than 50 pages worth of letters? But the sizes and colors of the envelopes were at variance. The commonality was that the envelopes were all flashy.

What is this seriously?

Judging from the quality of the envelopes, the letters inside seemed to have come from an expensive place. Lloyd scratched his head as he picked up the one on the top. He carefully tore the sealing wax, and inside was a letter with a flashy insignia. Considering the soft texture of the paper, it looked like it was of good quality. He opened it up and started to wade through the letter.

Dear Count Frontera, I pray for your perpetual glory. In recent days, I cannot help but feel that your family’s reputation and honor are on the rise. It was then that I came across the news that your eldest son is not wedded yet. Fate has it that my second daughter has no suitable partner yet, so it is my wish to have a serious discussion with you, Count Frontera. Once again, I pray for your perpetual prosperity and success. I look forward to receiving a favorable response and hope we are lucky and blessed enough for an opportunity to deepen the relationship between our two families. Sent from the south. Count Cordona.

“...”

Lloyd blinked several times. He wondered if something had gotten in his eyes during work or if he suddenly couldn’t read.

Not wedded yet? Second daughter?

In short, it was a marriage proposal. It was a suggestion to form a strategic partnership between their families through the means of marriage.

“How do you like it?” the count asked.

Leaning very forward in his chair, Count Frontera gazed at Lloyd with glimmering eyes that reflected so much anticipation. And he looked so joyful. Putting on an ambiguous smile on his face, Lloyd spoke.

“Um, do the rest of these letters address the same topic?”

“See for yourself,” confessed the count.

“...”

“Since these are the official request for marriage between nobility, the letters were gathered at the House of Peers before being sent here. And actually, I organized them a little for myself,” the count said.

“What do you mean?”

“I arranged them in the order of family history and reputation.”

“From the top to bottom?”

“That is exactly what I did.”

“...”

“So, it will be easier for you to deliberate and make a decision. Um, do you think I am overdoing it, my son?” asked the count.

“N-no, it’s not that. It’s not that, but…” muttered Lloyd.

“But what?”

Lloyd couldn’t tell the count that this situation was a little burdensome.

Ha...

It was honestly startling. Making sure that he didn’t show the tumultuous emotions on his face, he scanned through the rest of the letters. Count Perano from the north, Count Esperia from the west, wealthy Viscount Sicily in the southwest, and so many others... Viscounts, barons, and other small nobles were mixed in the bundle. Actually, it wasn’t an overstatement to say that Lloyd received a marriage proposal from almost all nobles across the kingdom.

What’s happening?

Lloyd had never been this popular before in his life. 59 families asking for his hand? Total the number of times he flirted and had a crush, heck, add even the Korean singers he liked. The number wouldn’t reach 59.

“So, any family you are attracted to?” asked the count.

“...”

The count, who looked more pleased than before, asked. Lloyd emptied his cup before giving him the answer. Don’t get carried away, he told himself. When Lloyd drank the cold tea water, his troubled spirit found peace. Calmness returned, and his thoughts cleared. The reason for the arrival of a flurry of letters crossed his mind first.

There’s only one explanation. My family is rising in popularity.

But his family wasn’t just entering the limelight. It was one of the few fiefdoms that survived the monster domino that swept the whole area in the east. Thanks to that, his fiefdom had become the hub of the eastern reconstruction. The queen then announced relief plans and promoted his fiefdom to become a county. Not only that, Lloyd had the great accomplishment of saving the queen from an assassination attempt. In other words, Frontera county received unreserved, generous support and favor from Queen Magentano.

This means that my family will now be the strongest family in the kingdom for the next 20 or 30 years. We are a rising star. A stock set to soar to the moon. That's why everyone sent marriage proposal letters to tie the knot before we go higher.

Lloyd now had a clear understanding of what was happening. Once he knew, he also realized how he should act.

"Please forgive me for saying this in your joy, but I think we should turn every offer down," stated Lloyd.

"Eh...?"

The happy countenance cracked. The count froze. Lloyd spoke.

"I do not think it is time to get married," said Lloyd.

"How so? Why?"

The count's eyes held a glint of dismay and disappointment. Lloyd understood such emotion very well. As a father, Count Frontera must have been extremely joyful for his son to receive marriage proposals from such powerful families. But Lloyd was telling him that he had to turn everything down. Making sure that the count would not be hurt, Lloyd continued.

"To explain some more, I do not think it is very timely. I must concentrate on the reconstruction right now, and there will be hardly any benefits to getting married at the moment," Lloyd explained.

"Hardly benefit us? What do you mean, Lloyd? Are you saying, even if you got married, the possible material assistance would hardly matter?" asked the count.

"Yes, my lord," Lloyd defended. "The palace is sufficiently providing us with materials, and it's not going to be entirely free to receive things from the other family. Moreover, there is another reason it's too early for me to get married."

"Could you explain it to me?" asked the count.

He fixed his posture. Lloyd began to speak carefully.

“Answering their marriage proposals at the moment is the same as getting manipulated.”

“Manipulated...?”

“I suppose you can already guess why the nobles want to form ties with us through marriage. It is because we are currently being favored by Her Majesty.”

“Of course,” said the count.

“That is the exact reason. Our family has not reached its peak yet. We have more peaks to climb. Our value will only increase, so we should wait for a little longer. Our value will be proportional to the time we spend waiting.”

The Frontera county was like the land in Gangnam city before its development plans were announced. Or it was like a company waiting to dominate the market with its mobile phone. The heyday of the Frontera family hasn’t come yet. They had only started their ascent, and taking up a mildly appealing offer now would bring regret to the entire family in the end.

“As such, I believe it’s too early for marriage. Please wait a few more years. By that time, a family with greater reputation and status will send us a marriage proposal.”

“Hmm, what you are saying is that we do not have to precipitously form relationships with other nobles early on,” summarized the count.

“Yes, that is what I mean,” said Lloyd, “for time is on our side.”

“But I do not think time is on your side,” refuted the count.

“Excuse me? What could you mean, my lord?”

“You are a bachelor.”

“Argh...”

The count’s words were like a punch to his stomach. His words pierced into Lloyd’s ears.

“Think about how old you are. You are already 27. What kind of eldest son of a noble family stays single for that long?”

“Um, but...”

“Do you not think the time has come for your old man to have grandchildren?”

“...”

Here we go, Lloyd said to himself. The grandchild attack. Sure, the count made sense. He was 27 years old. In Korean society, he was still young and youthful, but in the standard of the Lorasian continent, he was clearly an old bachelor.

Still, I have to put my foot down.

Lloyd collected his thoughts. To be honest, he wasn’t interested in an arranged marriage with a noble lady when he knew nothing about her character, hobby, and face. He simply wanted to fall in love with an ordinary girl and get married like an ordinary couple. So, the time wasn’t ripe yet. Marriage could come when he met someone he really liked. Only then would he express his desire to get married to the count. Lloyd shared these thoughts with the count, emphasizing again that it was too early to get married. After all, all these families cared about was the things they would benefit from the marriage. They would turn around and abandon us if we staggered and went down, he said. Reasoning such, Lloyd calmly persuaded the count.

The count didn’t interrupt Lloyd. He simply listened, never being able to get rid of this sorriness in his heart. But the one who put an end to this battle of stubbornness was the countess.

“My dear, let us do what he wishes this time,” the countess said.

“Honey...?” asked the count in disbelief.

“Lloyd is the one who will get married, and he doesn’t want it. It is not likely that we will get married on his behalf.”

“...”

“Lloyd has always been a reliable child. So, let us trust him this time as well.”

“Whew.”

The count finally said “uncle.” With a dismayed look, he told Lloyd, “Is that what you really want?”

“Please forgive me,” said Lloyd as he looked down.

“Ha, I see. What do you want me to do then?”

“Simple. Please send a letter of denial,” Lloyd said firmly.

In moments like these, Lloyd had to be firm. He felt apologetic to the count, but there was nothing he could do.

“Ha. I really suppose there is no other way.”

That night, past midnight, Count Frontera was still in the office. He restlessly paced around the office, unable to take a seat. Sighing at length, he couldn’t help but feel unsettled over what happened at dinner earlier.

That boy, I wonder if he has any plans to get married.

The count was concerned. A long time ago, he was worried about his son causing all sorts of nasty troubles, but now, he was anxious that his son was too virtuous.

Sure, it's nice that he is putting in the effort for the construction and working so hard. But I wish that he would get married soon.

Time was passing, and Lloyd was still a bachelor. There was no parent in the world who wouldn't feel anxious in this situation. On top of that, more than 59 families had sent them a proposal letter. But he had to turn every single one down. His heart sank as much as his heart had elated after receiving the bundle of letters.

But... I must respect his wish, seeing how adamant he was about it.

That was the respectful choice he could make. So, he had to do what Lloyd wanted. Taking a seat at the desk, Count Frontera picked up the empty letter and held up a pen.

"Whew."

The count's reluctant hands began to move, each stroke of writing containing a swelling amount of regret and sorriness.

Dear honorable Count Cordona, I pray for your perpetual glory to your honorable family. I cannot express the happiness I found myself in your kind proposal in the letter you sent me, and that alone has deepened the trust between our families. I also learned how an unexpected offer of hand from someone can be a source of great blessing. As such, my heart is filled with regret to no end. There are no words to express my sorrow. My heart is torn that I cannot form a special bond with your family, whose reputation and honor are well-known in the kingdom. Indeed, I am overwhelmed with grief as I write down this reply. It prompts me to wonder, is this what it feels like for the world to end? Therefore, please do not misunderstand my response. I sincerely express my gratitude for your proposal, but it is with profuse reluctance that I express my rejection... Blah blah blah... Despite that... Blah blah... Since my heart is sincere...

Just like that, the count wrote rejection letters through the night. The next day, 20 pigeons, carrying 59 regret-filled rejection letters, fluttered and left for the House of Peers in the palace.

Chapter 159: Sweetness in the Air (2)

“It’s about the seventh operation in the east, Your Majesty.”

In the most luxurious and secretive conference room of the Magentano palace, Sir Elkamo read down the report with fierce eyes.

“First of all, Your Majesty, the previous operations focused on defeating the monster herd that caused damage in the eastern region, but the latest one concentrated on sweeping the remaining monsters in the areas that we have defeated.”

“And?” asked Queen Magentano.

“We have eliminated the remaining monsters in parts of the Sortino fiefdom and Adrano fiefdom. In the process, we have discovered three monster colonies that have settled in the borders of the Vasto fiefdom.”

“Was there,” the queen asked, “an unplanned battle?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“How was the damage on our side?”

“77 deaths and 182 injuries from the 20th infantry and 16 injuries from the ranger special forces, Your Majesty.”

“Those are considerable numbers.”

“I ask for your forgiveness,” said the secretary of the military and hung his head.

Sitting on the upper seat in the conference room, Queen Magentano waved her hands.

“It is not your fault, so do not be too distraught. Focus now on transporting the injured and dispatching additional troops to the area. Do your best in managing and dispatching the supplies.”

“Your words are my command.”

The secretary took his seat, and the queen secretly drew a sigh under her breath.

Damn those monsters.

The monster domino phenomenon had swept the entire eastern region, and the kingdom still suffered from the aftermath of the destructive disaster. Of course, there weren’t any more monsters laying siege. The phenomenon itself was over, but the issue was nonetheless still ongoing. That was because the monsters that crossed the eastern range remained instead of peacefully returning to where they came from after destroying the human fiefdoms. Instead, they settled and found homes in the regions ravaged by their attack.

And we cannot just let them be.

And so, the kingdom was at its seventh attempt in launching a large-scale sweeping operation against the monsters. But the end had yet to come. Queen Magentano, pinching the space between her eyes, looked at the secretary in charge of the kingdom’s internal affairs.

“Next,” she ordered.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Rising from his seat, the secretary reported to the queen about the reconstruction efforts in the east and the assistance given to Frontera county. Aside from that, many more reports were given to the queen. Once the representative of internal affairs was done, the speaker for external affairs stood, and in a slightly high-pitched tone, he reported the brazen response of the sultan kingdom in the east, how it still claimed innocence to the monster domino phenomenon, and how it dismissed it as an accident. The queen furrowed her brows as she heard the report.

Sultan... How brazen.

For a second, she wondered if she should resort to force or give him a final chance. Queen Magentano considered filing a formal complaint against the sultan kingdom and sending an envoy who could return with a diplomatic reward. Suddenly, one person came to her mind.

Lloyd Frontera.

She thought about putting the gutsy man in the delegation. Surprisingly, that idea didn't seem bad, and his sly silver tongue would be helpful. Moreover, sending Lloyd with the delegation sounded appropriate and reasonable, as Frontera county was one of the fiefdoms directly affected by the monster domino.

It sounds all right. I should consider it more seriously.

She was still deep in her thoughts when all the officials finished giving their report. Once it was over, she chaired a regular meeting for the next half a day. A small question popped into her head, and she decided to ask it later after the meeting was over. Once it did, she called the secretary of internal affairs, who was about to exit the conference room.

"I have a question I would like to ask you," said Queen Magentano.

"I am at your service, Your Majesty," said the secretary and waited for her to speak.

"The members of the nobility fall under the jurisdiction of the internal affairs, right?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"I have recently heard," continued the queen, "from a noble that a handful of proposal letters have been sent to Frontera county. Do you know what happened afterward?"

"Yes, Your Majesty. The response letters arrived at the House of Peers yesterday, and the letters were delivered to each family, Your Highness."

"I see."

Responses have arrived? Lloyd Frontera, that sly fox. I wonder what family he will choose to marry into.

She secretly wished that the family Lloyd would form a relationship with would be helpful to the reconstruction of the fiefdom. That way, the foundation of her kingdom would be more robust and act as a reliable shield in the east. As such, the queen was excited when she learned that the letters had arrived.

A few more days later. The sludge treatment facility neared its completion. Its overall shape resembled a giant bucket buried in the earth. The process went like this: the basic concrete was firmly laid out on the ground, and a granite mold was inserted. The granite was a giant lump whose diameter reached over 50 yards, a product Javier had to laboriously and annoyingly sculpt and chisel for four days straight until it became bucket-shaped. This masterpiece was the body of the gravity thickener. Once it was finished, Bibeong moved the object to the treatment facility.

“Bibeobeong! Bibeong!”

Everyone cheered as Bibeong’s 3,000-ton buttock wiggled. Moving such a rock was not easy, even for him. Even if it was empty inside, the rock was still half the size of Bibeong. It was comparable to the struggle of pushing a car that ran out of gas a couple feet forward to get it to move again.

“Bibeo... beong!”

Bibeong sweated profusely on his feet, but he didn’t give up or express any difficulty. Why? The reason was simple. Bangul was there watching him.

“Bibeong!”

A true man, Bibeong believed, never appeared weak in front of his first love. Even when his back was about to snap in half, breathing became hard, and his legs trembled, he only wanted to show his good side to his crush. As a man, that was Bibeong’s sincerity towards his first love.

“Bibeo-beo-beo-beo-beong!”

He clenched his front teeth, and finally, he succeeded in planting the sludge thickener into the earth.

Bam! The sludge thickener fit into the ground with a rumble like a perfect puzzle piece. The sludge treatment facility was now completed. But the construction of the sewer wasn’t.

Sludge treatment requires a lot of water.

The principle was the same with the flush toilet, which needed constant running water. That was how lumps of bodily waste could travel to the sludge treatment facility. Otherwise, all the bodily waste and sludge would eventually dry up and stick to the pipes, piling up filth and clogging them. Once that happened...

No need to think about that...

Lloyd quickly pushed the thought away as he was going to lose his appetite. Anyway, from then on, Lloyd proceeded to construct the water pipes that extended from the Prona River to the shafts. This took five days. A portion of river water was made to travel through the pipe until it reached the shaft, which sat in the central village of the fiefdom, and flowed through the main sewer. This was the completion of the first section of the sewer. That day, Lloyd summoned the residents living in the central village.

“Okay, I am sure you all know why I gathered everyone here.”

The summer sun was fading, and about 300 residents gathered around, each holding a large bucket in their hands. Inside the bucket was...

“Did you all collect what I requested in advance?” asked Lloyd.

They nodded instead of speaking aloud. Every single one had towels or clothes over their nose and mouth. Not a single exception. Why? The bucket contained a few days of bodily waste and sewage. Lloyd quickly pinched his nose.

“Okay... Good job. From the smell, I can tell that everyone worked very hard to complete my request. I am pleased. We just have to successfully finish this test today. Then, you can stop collecting starting tomorrow since all the waste can be thrown away into this shaft right away. Got it?”

Everyone nodded, and this time, their nodding was more hurried than before. It was because of the stench. The weather was searingly hot, and the heat had fermented the bodily waste for several days. The stench was no less awful and terrorizing than any biological and chemical weapon. So, everyone hoped that Lloyd would skip his speech and save everyone. Lloyd didn’t betray their sincere wish.

“My gosh. I can barely breathe,” said Lloyd with a frown. “You all don’t mind if I skip the speech, right? Line up, everyone, and pour your buckets into the shaft one by one. But don’t rush. We don’t want them to splatter. Okay?”

Swoosh!

Once again, everyone was silent. Any more delay and their olfactory senses would start degrading. Everyone moved in a hurry instead of answering. The residents poured the bodily wastes that they meticulously collected for the past few days into the shaft. Later, Lloyd walked down into the shaft through the manhole together with Javier.

“Is there a reason why you had to come down yourself?” asked Javier.

“Of course.” Lloyd shrugged after he spoke. “I have to check with my own eyes whether the sewage travels well, and how it flows. Otherwise, it could turn into a disaster.”

Lloyd was telling the truth. Even if he built a giant sewer, he must never be relieved because this structure was a pathway for waste materials. As such, it was imperative to check whether it was solid and free from clogging.

“The thing with the sewage pipes is that you don’t notice they’re clogged until after a few days when a funky smell hits you or sewage surges out.

Once that happens, whew, it’s too late. It’ll probably be a hundred times harder to clear that than when we constructed the sewer,” said Lloyd.

That was the reason why Lloyd had personally come down here. He planned on checking whether the large volume of bodily waste the residents had just disposed of traveled to the sludge treatment facility without any problem. However, Javier remained serious and grim even if Lloyd kindly explained his presence.

“Then, is there a reason why I am down here with you?”

“Uh-huh,” drawled Lloyd.

“...”

“Cover your mouth and nose with this before you start to retch. But obviously, it won’t really matter if you do vomit. It’s going to flow along the sewer anyway,” said Lloyd with a mischievous smile as he held out a handkerchief to Javier.

Lloyd had already covered his lips and nose tightly with a towel. That was the only way for him to breathe. But even so, it was still hard to breathe.

This is seriously no joke.

Dozens of feet under the ground, Lloyd and Javier were walking along the narrow sewage pipe that led to the main sewer. It was so narrow that the sidewalk only had room for one person, and a large volume of rotten and fermented sewage buoyed away beside. The mere sight of it churned both of their stomachs. The stench was worsened due to the lack of ventilation, and since Lloyd was a mid-level sword expert, his heightened senses agitated him even more than before.

This is nuts. If I could, I’d get rid of my nose. No, I just want to reset my manaheart skill. The heck with being a sword expert. I take it all back.

Covering his face with a towel barely worked. It was torturous. How bad was it? Lloyd was as tormented as when he entered a gas-filled CBRN room at his military boot camp and removed his mask to let the tear gas assault his senses, jumping up and down and singing the national anthem. So, Lloyd made a resolution.

If ever I have the chance, I'll reject leveling up as a sword expert.

Actually, Lloyd had planned to stay at his current level even without this experience. It was because of the sword master syndrome.

Javier had terrible insomnia because of that.

All your senses became so sensitive that they pushed past human limits. So much so that you couldn't control their heightened senses. For 24 hours a day, you could hear everything around you, even the sound of a needle dropping to the ground. Furthermore, all your other senses like smell or touch were equally heightened. It was the same for your vision.

Your eyes become as sharp as an eagle's. You can even see the pores of the person in front of you.

Lloyd wondered if Javier had been perceiving him that way all along. Chills ran down his spine. Lloyd shook his head and turned around to face Javier.

"Here, aren't you going to take this?"

Javier didn't accept the towel Lloyd held out to him. But his face appeared too calm and nonchalant without it. Lloyd was about to ask why when Javier spoke first.

"I am all right," said Javier.

"Really? Are you sure?"

"Yes."

Javier nodded with a scoff on his face.

“I have blocked my sense of smell the moment I entered here with you.”

“You blocked it...?” asked Lloyd, goggle-eyed. “Your sense of smell? On purpose?”

“Yes.”

“How is that possible?”

“Well, since I am a sword master...”

“Are you saying that you’re not smelling this stench at all?”

“No.”

Lloyd was dumbfounded.

“Actually, I can adjust my senses and change the stench to a floral scent.”

“Good for you,” blurted Lloyd.

“Thank you,” said Javier with a smile.

“...”

All of a sudden, Lloyd was gripped by the desire to flop down and throw a tantrum, but he had to walk ahead nonetheless even when all his happiness was draining out of him with every passing second. Lloyd and Javier walked along the long pathway filled with bodily wastes and sewage from more than 300 people. They ambled to the sludge treatment facility and observed and studied the inside of the main sewer. The outcome greatly satisfied Lloyd.

Good. There’s no blockage at all. Everything’s flowing smoothly like a drain cleaner was used.

From that moment onward, Lloyd entrusted the remaining sections of the sewer construction to Sir Bayern. He instructed that the shaft be built in the remaining villages, the apartment complex, and the count manor.

The bodily wastes collected from the shafts will travel through the Cholera canal sewer pipes, the main sewer, and then, finally, arrive at the sludge treatment facility.

This was the sewage system Lloyd had designed. Time passed by, and the structure expanded one section at a time. One day, two days, ten days, two weeks... Meanwhile, the residents in the central village, who were the first to enjoy the sewage system, continued to produce bodily wastes and toss them into the shaft. As days passed by, sewage started to pile up at the sludge treatment facility, and about a month later, when the solid and liquid waste became completely separated...

Kaboom! Solitas breathed fire at the northern border of the fiefdom after opening the lid of the sludge treatment facility. The lump of the sludge was made to float in the air with magic. Solitas breathed out hellish fire at the lump.

...!

Flames measuring tens of thousands of degrees engulfed the lump of bodily wastes produced by roughly 300 residents in the central village. Then, not giving the stench any time to spread, it was scorched to ashes in a flash. Just then, a welcoming message appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes.

Ding Dong!

Chapter 160: Sweetness in the Air (3)

Ding dong.

[A new title <Red Pill or Blue Pill> has been created.]

A welcoming message floated in front of Lloyd's eyes, just as he had expected.

Well, I knew this would happen since I completed the first section of the sewage system and the very first sludge treatment.

It was always like this. Even when he reclaimed the Maritz Wetlands and terraced the fields using the retaining walls. The system didn't award him with any honors or titles just because he completed a construction. It was only after he had used the structures to accomplish something that he was rewarded.

I wonder what this title is about.

He wanted to know what kind of sweet effect it has. Expectant, Lloyd moved his eyes.

[Do you want the red or blue pill?]

[Title Level: Kingdom History]

A long, long time ago. In a remote fiefdom in the east, there lived a petty young master. This young master, owning such a foul and warped character, stuck his nose in everyone's business, even regarding their bathroom habits. People thus then asked, young master, my dear young master, why must we collect our poop and throw it here? The young master enthusiastically waved his hands and said, it's smelly, so you might as well hurry. They tilted their heads. But a few years later, they realized. They realized that their villages, fiefdoms, and fields no longer held traces of any infectious disease. From the moment the news spread, people from all over the kingdom, most of the residents in the fiefdom no longer disposed of their wastes anywhere they could.

[Compliment Effect: The chances of an infectious disease plaguing the fiefdom are zero for the time being. Moreover, any infectious disease that starts outside the fiefdom will be stopped and eradicated with 100% certainty.]

[Title Region: Frontera county.]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, the time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 6]

[Current CP: 218]

Woah.

Lloyd covered his mouth with his hand once he read the compliment title.

This is awesome.

Lloyd had secretly hoped for a good option, but this reward exceeded his expectations by a mile. A zero probability of a disease outbreak. In other words, the title signaled the complete prevention of the cholera outbreak slated to occur in the coming spring.

Now, even if it's not cholera, it doesn't matter. Any epidemic will be prevented.

It was mind-blowing to every extent. Actually, Lloyd wasn't utterly relieved despite the ongoing construction. Nervousness lingered in the corner of his heart because he couldn't guarantee that the impending epidemic he saw through the Ending Spoiler was cholera.

It's not like I'm a public health expert or anything. I just presumed that it was cholera based on several circumstantial pieces of evidence.

So, there was a slight possibility that the plague he saw wasn't cholera, which was why Lloyd planned on using the Ending Spoiler once more after the sewage system construction to check.

Of course I will. My life depends on it.

He couldn't relax and laze around just because he completed the sewers. As the old saying went, he needed to look before he leaped. Lloyd had to inspect if his work prevented the epidemic from striking the fiefdom in the coming spring. But not anymore. There was no need to.

The possibility of an epidemic is zero. 100% guaranteed prevention of an epidemic. On top of that, this will continue for the next 50 years.

It was perfect. He wouldn't die next spring from a disease. There wasn't a reason to use the Ending Spoiler anymore.

And I got to save some CP as a result.

That really pleased Lloyd as well. In any case, he wanted to save as much CP as he could. CP was hard to come by, and the Ending Spoiler required a lot of it.

Unlike RP, it's hard to save up CP. The former is like a regular wage that comes each time I increase my likeability or accomplish something. The latter is similar to a salary that is only released once a month.

And he merely received 36 CP every month, but what was the price of the Ending Spoiler?

A whopping 80 CP. To just use it once! What about after that? I'd have to spend 160 since the price doubles with each try. And the one after that would cost me 320.

What if he thoughtlessly used the Ending Spoiler right now? Later on, he would need to spend hundreds of CP to just get a glimpse of the future, which would take several months, or worse, years to save.

That would be troublesome.

That would prevent him from using the skill when he needed it most. But now, thanks to the effect of the title he just earned, he avoided wasting his CP and doubling the CP price for the Ending Spoiler. Killing two birds with one stone, Lloyd swelled with satisfaction, so he grinned at Solitas, who morphed back to a human after breathing fire as a dragon.

“Thank you,” said Lloyd. “You took a large weight off my shoulders.”

“Well, no need to thank me.”

“Please, you have been a great help.”

“Have I?”

Phew. Solitas licked his lips, his mouth growing bitter. He was swamped with work as he doubled down on his craftsmanship these days. It was only yesterday that he received a compliment from Corgidus, his teacher, for his ability to chisel wood blocks, albeit telling him it was narrowly acceptable. His days were quite rewarding. That was why he didn’t think much when Lloyd called him, shoved the outsourcing contract, and brought him to the sludge treatment facility.

He simply thought that he was doing his job, paying back for the crafting lessons. As such, he shifted to his original shape, let out a breath, and turned a couple of tons of bodily waste into ashes. It was only then that Solitas was hit with a pang of bitterness, which was as acute and deep as a shot of espresso. A sense of shame overwhelmed his dragon heart. Solitas couldn’t believe that he was reduced to a human dung cleaner when he was born a proud dragon. From what he heard, there would be even more poop in the future, including from orcs and elves. Solitas was scared particularly with the latter. He had heard their poop had a vile smell as a result of their carnivore diet.

What am I doing with my life?

Solitas felt dismayed to the deepest part of his soul. He felt like he had become an abbreviated piece of nothing in this vast universe. If there was any value in him at the moment, he was nothing but a high-tech, advanced waste burner.

“…”

Solitas wondered if he should call it quits and give up on dating and marriage. Should I go back to the lair? He mused, considering living the life of a bachelor dragon. A healthy and beautiful soul liberated from the considerations and silliness of life. Just like that, Solitas was getting strongly drawn to the powerful epiphany that struck him now. However, just then...

“By the way, oh, how I wish I could travel to the Cordona region on a day like this.”

Lloyd’s voice interrupted his resentful trance. Sensing he was brought back to reality, Solitas furrowed his brows and spoke.

“Cordona?” he asked, “Where is it?”

“Eh? Don’t you know?”

“Of course, I don’t...”

“It’s a popular honeymoon destination that’s been trending these days,” Lloyd said.

“What?”

Honeymoon. The word made Solitas flinch. Dating and marriage. Unaccomplished dreams. Hopes and sorrow, though faint, poked Solitas’s heart, and the word “honeymoon” heightened his fading desires a little more.

“I heard,” Lloyd continued to say, “it is known for its gentle and beautiful landscape all throughout the year. I heard that the ‘Hot Spring Beach’ is especially popular among newlyweds.”

“Hot Spring? Beach?”

“Yes. It’s a unique sandy beach that has a hot spring.”

“What? A sandy beach with a hot spring?” gaped the dragon.

“Yes. That’s what I heard. They said that you can just go anywhere on the beach with a shovel and dig until you take a bath. And once you do, people say spring water will surge from the ground. Then, et voila, there’s a hot spring bath for you and your loved one.”

Gulp. Solitas’s neck bobbed when he imagined it. Lloyd continued to speak, his words flowing out of him like sweet honey.

“There’s more. It’s said that the Cordona region sees a downpour that lasts exactly an hour at midnight due to seasonal wind patterns.”

“Downpour? That does not sound very nice,” said the dragon.

“No, it’s actually very good.”

“How so?”

“Think about it. You go on a dip with your lover in the hot spring water, gazing at the stars in the sky. Then, it starts to pour. Your body is warm in the water. Your shoulders and face are cool from the rain. And your ears are filled with the sweet melody of the ocean waves.”

“Oh? Ah...” gulped Solitas.

“Can you imagine?”

Nod. Solitas found himself clenching his fists, and the resentment and bitterness that overwhelmed his heart were now gone. In its stead, there was only passionate determination, even more intense than before.

I’ll get married and go to the rainy hot spring!

Now, his dream had become more detailed. Solitas became determined to exterminate human poop, orc poop, elf poop, and anything else. He could infinitely incinerate them to achieve his dream. Lloyd's eyes held a glint of satisfaction as they looked at the dragon.

"Whew," sighed Lloyd. "I wish I could visit a place like that. Don't you agree?"

"I do..."

Lloyd succeeded in appeasing the dragon, whose troubled mind needed some calming. Lloyd returned to the manor, his steps light.

It looks like I'll be able to relax for the time being.

Before he knew it, summer was coming to an end. The sun still beat down the fiefdom with its scorching heat, but Lloyd felt it getting slowly shorter. A few months from now, and the fiefdom would be covered by red fall leaves to give way to snow.

I have enough time.

The construction of the remaining sections took place seamlessly, and the apartment complexes were getting erected without any problem. These two projects would be finished before winter arrived. And now that the predestined epidemic was gone, Lloyd didn't have much to worry about.

I just need to make a little more money to keep as a sort of pension. It makes me a bit nervous to be dependent on the water bill and the queen's support. Once I find another source of income, I can live my life as a couch potato.

Lloyd patted himself on the back for the recent bone-breaking work he had finished. And for some reason, he was especially exhausted tonight. Was it because he verified his accomplishment and the outcome of his efforts with his own eyes? Was it because all his pent-up tension was now gone? Exhaustion, which had built inside him over the past few months of hard, self-negating work, came crashing down on him tonight.

Let’s eat, take a bath, and get a good night’s sleep. Tomorrow and the day after that as well, if I can.

Lloyd thought about taking a break for the next few days. Such life was something he could only dream of when he was in South Korea, living in a rental room. As such, Lloyd decided to actualize his dream and enjoy every second of his break. But the moment he stepped into the manor, he was confronted with an unexpected spectacle at the main chamber of the first floor.

“Huh?”

Lloyd spotted Count Frontera chatting with a lady he had never seen before. She seemed to be in her early 20s. Decked out in flashy clothes and ornaments, she didn’t appear to be a maid or a peasant. And she sided with a man who seemed to be her guard knight.

A noble?

Not a hair out of place with a knight escorting her. She certainly was a noble.

But what’s a noble lady doing here?

It was around the time Lloyd had that thought that the lady’s gaze traveled to his side. She then put on a courteous smile.

“I presume you are Lloyd Frontera,” she greeted.

Lloyd nodded rather reluctantly.

“Yes, I am. But who are you?” asked Lloyd.

“It is a pleasure to finally come to your acquaintance. My name is Carlotta Cordona of the Cordona family.”

A bad, sinister feeling gripped Lloyd as he quizzed himself about her presence here. Soon, he was confirmed.

“Um, do not be surprised,” said Count Frontera. “I am sure you remember that you received a letter of proposal a few days ago. After receiving my response, Count Cordona sent his daughter here.”

“Excuse me? Why?” Lloyd blurted out in shock, but it was Lady Cordona who answered.

“It appears that my father still has a bit of hope for the marriage offer. That is why he pushed me to come here.”

“…”

Lloyd pieced things together in his head. It appeared that his rejection was returned with one more chance to talk about the marriage. That was why Count Cordona sent his daughter here.

Is this how he appeals? Gosh, the man is quite aggressive.

Just then, Lloyd broke out in a cold sweat. It never occurred to him that anyone would actually send his daughter after getting rejected. Calming his flustered heart, Lloyd turned to Count Frontera.

“Um, did you not send a clear letter of rejection?” asked Lloyd.

“Um, um, you see, I did, but...”

“…”

“I, too, am surprised by this. Hahaha.”

Count Frontera laughed with evident embarrassment on his face. He was sincerely flustered because he, too, never imagined this situation to happen.

Did I express my rejection too vaguely? But I definitely did reject him without a doubt. Or could it be that the letter exuded the immense regrets I had? That could be it.

A pang of guilt poked a corner of his heart. Count Frontera wondered if he should reveal to his son that the culprit was his vague response. Just then, while this internal debate was taking place, Lady Cordona smiled softly and stepped forward.

“Please do not be too troubled,” she said.

“Excuse me?” Lloyd cocked his head to the side. “What do you mean by that?”

“To be frank,” continued Lady Cordona, “I do not intend to go through an arranged marriage. And as I have told you, I came here with a reluctant heart. I could not resist my father’s insistence.”

“Oh...”

“So, please do not be troubled. Do permit me to be indebted to your family by spending a few nights so my father will be satisfied. I will quietly reside during my time here and then return.”

“Do you mean that?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes,” Lady Cordona nodded with confidence. Lloyd clenched his fist in joy in his heart.

Th-thank goodness.

Lloyd was scared that he would have to suddenly deal with the issue of marriage, which he didn’t care for at all. But contrary to his concern for the unexpected storm, the lady was cool and calm, to his relief.

“I see,” said Lloyd, “please make yourself at home for the next few days.”

“Thank you.”

After a formal handshake with the lady, Lloyd returned to his bedroom with a lighter heart and sprawled on the bed.

Dating or whatever. I’m not interested. I want to rest. I’m just going to enjoy my free time and relax.

And so, Lloyd decided that it was time to get a good night's sleep. He would sleep in the next day too. Just like that, he fell asleep in peace. But when the morning rolled around, the peaceful Frontera manor received four more visits by the ladies of different families.

Chapter 161: Predicted Disaster (1)

“Bibeong!”

There came a ringing and clear shout of Bibeong from Lake Kapua in the eastern mountain range, announcing the arrival of the morning across the Frontera county.

“Hmm...”

It was an unusually refreshing morning for Lloyd, for it had been quite a while since he slept this well. The first thing that crossed his mind when he opened his eyes was...

Why do I always wake up so easily when I’m on vacation?

It was truly strange. And it had always been like this. On school days, forcing his eyes open in the morning couldn’t be any more difficult. But strangely, he rose automatically on days there wasn’t any school. The same thing was happening today.

I have nothing to busy myself with for a while.

Lying on the floor, Lloyd recollected the events in his fiefdom. The apartment complex construction had gone smoothly. The project picked up its pace after Building 103 was finished because every building looked exactly the same as the other as if they were copy pasted. And as the workers grew more experienced and accustomed to the job, the increased speed in their work translated to better performance and results.

And so, I can just entrust the job to them from now on.

The same went for the construction of the sewers. The main sewer and the sludge treatment facility, the central parts of the sewage system, were already completed. The only thing left was to construct shafts across the villages, apartment complexes, and sewage pipes. Then, connect the shafts to the main sewer.

That can be left to them as well. I just need to do the inspection.

Long live Sir Bayern. Long, long live the engineers, elves, and orcs. What a great blessing that he had a huge, reliable team and a system that allowed construction to progress on its own without requiring his intervention.

But, of course, our funds are a bit lacking.

A slight wrinkle appeared between Lloyd's brows as he lazed around his bed. If he was being honest, the fiefdom's finances weren't always enough. There were just too many things to spend on. First, there were tens of thousands of refugees. The cost to feed and clothe them was unimaginable. But the terraced fields in the eastern range had only taken their first step.

Sure, there is the water bill from Lacona viscounty, some other minor funds, and the aid from the palace... But we don't have enough.

Lloyd first thought that they had enough, but after a string of large-scale constructions, he realized it wasn't sufficient at all. So, if he ever got the chance, he needed to acquire a stable source of money.

It's not like the palace is going to assist us forever.

The royal support they received could be cut off anytime. Though the palace said it wouldn't under the queen's promise, the world was full of surprises. Promises weren't the only thing that the universe listened to.

Who knows. There could be a natural disaster, political upheaval, or war that puts the entire palace at risk.

As such, there was always the chance that the support they received from the palace could be cut off. Then, his fiefdom would inevitably die of hunger. Lloyd wanted to avoid such a situation as much as possible. If he could, he wanted to acquire a more stable source of income.

But... I can think about that tomorrow. Tomorrow.

Today, he would really just relax. After all, he had worked on all sorts of projects in the past few months, from the apartment complex to the retaining walls and sewers. Lloyd was filled with exhaustion, feeling as if his body was being torn into several pieces. While Lloyd tossed and turned with that thought in mind, and as his bed creaked, someone knocked on his door.

Knock knock knock.

“Master Lloyd, do you wish to eat your meal inside your room?”

There came knocking on his bedroom door. It was followed by a maid’s question. He didn’t notice that it was breakfast time already. Rising up from bed, he hurried and put on his shirt.

“Yeah, come in.”

The door opened to reveal the maid carrying a tray in her hands. It was Emily, whom Lloyd was familiar with among the manor's maids.

“How was your sleep, young master?”

“Good,” he said, “Have you been waiting at the door with that tray until I made a noise?”

“I didn’t wait too long,” replied Emily with a grin on her face as though she was telling Lloyd that it was nothing.

“But Master Lloyd,” Emily continued as she placed the sausage, egg, salad, and hot milk off the tray. “I am not sure what you will make of what I will say, but it must be so nice, young master.”

“Hm? Me? Why?” said Lloyd quizzically.

“Why else, young master? Such a gentle and friendly lady has traveled here to propose,” she answered.

“Oh, her?” Lloyd chuckled involuntarily, his thoughts flying back to Lady Cordona he met shortly after the previous day. Indeed, Lloyd thought to himself, she was very courteous and cool. It appeared that Emily felt the same about her.

“Sure, but what can I do? Lady Cordona nor I am not interested in an arranged marriage.”

Lloyd spoke with a bitter smile, but this brought Emily to cock her head to the side.

“Um, but I was speaking of Lady Perano.”

“What?” asked Lloyd.

“Oh, I forgot.”

Emily then clapped her hands, and she added as though she forgot to tell Lloyd something, “Come to think of it, I suppose you haven’t met her yet. That is, Lady Perano.”

“Hold on... Lady Perano? Who is that?”

“She came early in the morning,” Emily answered.

“Early in the morning?”

“Yes, young master. Very early. Before the sunrise.”

“Very early. Before the sunrise. While I was asleep”? repeated Lloyd.

“Yes, yes, young master,” said Emily. “I woke up early because I was in charge of drawing water at dawn. That’s how I saw her. She had twelve knights in a very fancy carriage. Even then, how gentle and kind she was.”

“Woah... Hold on. Hold on right there.”

In a panic, Lloyd wondered what Emily was saying.

“I’m still trying to grasp the bomb you dropped on me, so let me ask you one thing,” said Lloyd.

“Yes, Young Master.”

“Could you be saying now that someone else other than Lady Cordona came here? In the early morning?”

“Yes, Young Master. She is having breakfast with the count at the moment.”

“...”

“Young master?”

Lloyd jumped out of bed, his heart pounding violently. This is nuts! Lloyd shouted internally, thinking that he was wrong to believe everything was taken care of after the situation with Lady Cordona was resolved. He was seriously mistaken. The marriage issue hadn’t been solved. Lloyd feared that the issue would blow out of control like wildfire. He started to put on his shoes before he knew it.

“Yeah, Emily. I’m sorry. I think I need to get going,” said Lloyd.

“Young master?”

“I need to go there right now. No, I need to fix this situation. I'll eat it in the dining room.”

“Then, what about this food-”

“You eat it,” said Lloyd.

“Excuse me?”

“Eat for me. But don’t tell the others. Okay?”

“Oh, young master-”

“There shouldn’t be any leftovers,” interrupted Lloyd.“You’ll get punished. In hell, they’ll mix up all of your life’s leftovers and make you eat it.”

“...”

Lloyd got out of his bedroom, leaving Emily, whose face was becoming pale. Lloyd quickened his steps down to the dining room.

“Woah.”

The morning passed by like a storm. No, to be exact, a mind-boggling lunchtime had come.

“So... was that when you stopped hesitating to firmly give a blunt rejection during your first encounter with the ladies?”

“Uh-huh.”

Lloyd and Javier were near the main gate of the Frontera manor. Slouching on the wooden bench like wet laundry, he nodded.

“What’s the point of beating around the bush?” said Lloyd.

“Was it to avoid any misunderstandings?” asked Javier.

“Uh-huh.”

Lloyd nodded his head again at Javier’s question. Just then, he recalled what he had gone through in the morning.

“So, when I came down to the dining room, Lady Perano, who arrived at dawn, greeted me with a bright smile on her face. But the atmosphere was just, whew.”

“What was it like for you to react this way?”

“Just one nod from me, and she was ready to settle in here.”

“So?”

“I spoke by reflex because the situation didn’t feel right.”

“What did you say?”

“Nothing special. I flatly told her to enjoy her stay here for a few days and go back since I don’t have any intention to marry her.”

“Your rejection was too straightforward. I wouldn’t be surprised if Lady Perano was offended,” Javier said.

“That’s probably why she berated me with a smile on her face.”

“What was it about?”

“She said that she came here with high expectations but was disappointed when she actually saw me,” answered Lloyd.

“Why?”

“She said she couldn’t tell whether I look like this because I took a weird drug or didn’t take the one I need.”

“It appears the answer is the latter,” said Javier.

“I don’t need you to answer that question...”

“Anyway,” Javier went on ignoring Lloyd, “is that how you also treated the two ladies that came after her?”

“Yeah. I gave my rejection as soon as I saw their faces. I was insulted twice more, thanks to it.”

What Lloyd said did take place. After Lady Perano, the ones that came next in the morning were Lady Esperia and Lady Sicily. Lloyd rejected them the moment they stepped out of their carriage. Feeling severely mortified, the ladies hurled curses at Lloyd. He did feel that he was being severe on them. But he couldn’t do anything else as he was able to slightly presume why this unfortunate event took place.

The count likely gave a vague, ambiguous response.

Though he wasn’t certain, the circumstances pointed in that direction.

The count was very wistful when I asked him to reject the marriage proposals.

Lloyd figured that the count’s reluctance could be seen in his response, leading the recipients to form misguided thoughts.

That’s why the families started to second guess themselves even after receiving a rejection letter. They must have felt that pushing us once more would change my answer. And so, out of such hope, these powerful and wealthy families sent their daughters directly here. They put their trust in the reputation of their family. That is, to obtain my acceptance.

So, Lloyd decided that his answer this time could not be ambiguous. Even if he was a little rude, he had to be firm and straightforward, like a straight shooter. His rejection had to be as sharp as a blade. That was how he could avoid dragging things out and make sure that the other parties would give up soon. Lloyd thought that was the best for both of them.

“Anyway,” Lloyd continued, “I am full. I am not hungry at all, even though I skipped breakfast and lunch. I wonder if all those insults made me lose my appetite.”

Lloyd laughed aloud as he spoke, and Javier chuckled.

“If that was the case, you should be full all the time.”

“Hmm? Why?”

“Thanks to me,” said Javier.

“What? Wait, do you always insult me inside your head?”

“Obviously.”

“Wow. You aren’t even trying to deny it.”

“Sincerity and honesty are the virtues of a knight,” defended Javier.

“Can you at least pretend at a time like this?”

“I cannot.”

“How firm you are.”

“I appreciate the compliment.”

“Forget it. Oh, there. There’s another one coming.”

The usual banter between them came to a halt. Lloyd’s gaze traveled down the hill, and he saw a carriage driving up the sloped approach. It wasn’t a cargo cart. Decked out with flashy ornaments, four white horses led the carriage, and even the horseman was cleanly dressed. Around it were eight knights on horses. It was noble for sure, and it went without saying why they were coming here.

“Woah. She is the fourth person to come today alone.”

Lloyd wondered what kind of insults this lady would hurl at him. Does your breath smell like hot trash? Or do I want to alter your face by punching you so many times? Lloyd got up from the bench, feeling strangely expectant. Meanwhile, the carriage climbed the hill, and he stopped at the entrance.

The eight knights queued up, and the horseman grabbed the door handle. The gold-rimmed door slowly opened, and Lloyd gulped at the same time. He then got ready, the words of rejection right behind his lips. But when he looked at the lady appearing from the door, Lloyd flinched involuntarily.

Eh?

Even though his brain told him to shoot the words of rejection before the greeting, he couldn’t do it. Was it because he fell in love with her? Was she his ideal woman? No. He stopped because he knew who she was.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. The novel contained a couple of illustrations, and I saw her in one of them.

Lloyd searched for his memory in which part he saw it. Which scene? The lady's heels clacked as they touched the ground. That revived the searching piece of memory.

She wasn't a villain.

She was a protagonist, but a pitiful one. She sacrificed herself for many people. She threw her life away, her sacrifice granting Javier a chance to fight back. The unbreakable wall crumbled to save countless people and prevent catastrophe. That place of incident was...

"Naraman county. Siluria Namaran."

Lloyd's words came out on their own against his will as the memory recovered. The lady grew wide-eyed as she heard it.

"Excuse me? Do you know me?"

"..."

Lloyd intensely stared at her instead of giving a response. In the story, people in the city were on the brink of getting sacrificed by the warlocks. Javier then invented the mana blast for the first time ever to prevent the disaster. But there was one lady Javier failed to save from meeting a tragic end. That was Siluria Namaran, and she was now grinning at Lloyd.

Chapter 162: Predicted Disaster (2)

Namaran's Wall. It appeared in the middle of the novel, and Lloyd found it the most impressive part of the story. The powers of the dark magicians were finally unveiled to clash with Javier for the first time. Lloyd's mind flew back to the part of the story.

The dark magicians tried to sacrifice all the people in the city as they enclosed the city walls with a powerful magical barrier.

The magical wall was impenetrable, and that remained true no matter how much Javier tried. Perhaps, it was thanks to the hardship and danger then that the mana blast, which was the most advanced piece of technology in the novel, was invented right in front of Namaran's Wall.

Javier clashed a mana circle for the first time as he went beyond his limits to use his mana to penetrate the wall. It was by chance that Javier instinctively understood to blast the power coming from the clash.

That was the birth of Javier's signature skill, the mana blast. He mixed the aura with the mana blast, and the indomitable Naraman's Wall finally came down. Javier and the Naraman knights entered the castle. The battle dragged out for about two days. In the end, Javier got rid of the dark magicians and saved the people in there except for one. The only daughter of Count Namaran. She sacrificed herself when one of the dark magicians attempted to summon Hell's Knight as he clung to his last straw. Thanks to her sacrifice, Javier stopped attempting to summon the knight who could overpower even a sword master and was about to confirm his victory.

I think Javier's victory was made possible by her sacrifice.

Jolted out of his trance, Lloyd lifted his head and looked at the lady standing before him. She was cocking her head to the side with a grin on her face.

"I believe you murmured my name just a while ago. Did I hear it wrong?"

Siluria Namaran.

Lloyd had felt like this before. A strange feeling always swelled over him when he personally encountered a figure he only saw in illustrations. It was the case when he first met Javier. And right now. It was terribly more so right now when he knew what tragic fate awaited this character in the story. But now wasn't the time to be engrossed in such emotions. Lloyd quickly removed the restlessness that was coming up in him and put on a plastic smile.

"Oh, please forgive me. What a blunder to commit to our first meeting. My name is Lloyd Frontera, and welcome to Frontera county."

"You are the rumored young master Frontera," Siluria said.

"Indeed. I am the rumored hooligan."

"How modest you are," she said, "and you already know my name."

"Oh, I saw the symbol engraved in the carriage."

"You have sharp eyes," she said.

"And my head is growing from your compliments."

Lloyd shrugged after he spoke.

It's a bit worrisome, really.

Lloyd thought to himself as she looked at the lady in front of her. Just then, he became curious. He wondered if that disastrous incident about the Namaran's Wall took place here.

Though Namaran isn't in the east, it's still not very far.

Technically speaking, the city was located in the mountainous area between the east and south. But if something did take place over there, his fiefdom would be affected as well.

I need to go and check over it.

Actually, there was enough chance that the events in the novel would not take place in real life. A lot of things deviated from the story. Lloyd was alive, and Javier was here. Queen Magentano didn't lose her arm. The period and result of the monster domino effect were changed. Port Cremo was cleared off the Gigatitan to be prosperous, and the Frontera fiefdom, which was only a provincial village in the story, came to house a host of refugees and became the city in charge of reconstruction. Like this, this world underwent countless changes. Namaran could be the same. The tragic incident in the novel might not happen. With such hope in his heart, Lloyd spoke and asked a question.

"Tell me, is renowned gentleman Cannavaro at your estate?" asked Lloyd.

"I beg your pardon?" Lady Namaran's eyes widened.

"From what I heard," said Lloyd as though he was testing her. "A wealthy man by the name of Cannavaro is doing philanthropic activities in Namaran. I personally have a lot of respect for him."

The truth was that Cannavaro in question was a dark magician, the culprit behind the Naraman tragedy. But at this period in time, he was disguising himself as a regular wealthy man.

Like so, he makes a great name for himself. How? By personally taking in a considerable number of migrants and covering their expenses.

In the novel, once Queen Magentano turned into a tyrant, the southern region attempted a coup against the queen. That brought about a cruel, large-scale suppression effort, displacing an alarming number of people in the process. Some of them arrived at Namaran, and it was Cannavaro who took care of them. But did he do so out of compassion? Of course not.

It was mentioned in the story that it was so he could use them to experiment with dark magic.

But right now, things had changed. Queen Magentano was A-OK, and there was no coup in the south.

So, Cannavaro doesn't have any way to accept people under his care.

And his fame won't be able to grow anymore. In other words, Lady Namaran had to answer his question, saying, "Cannavaro? Who is that?" That would assure Lloyd that the place would be safe for a while, as it meant the warlock couldn't test his magic out yet.

Which means that I don't have to worry too much about the people down there. Tell me you've never heard of Cannavaro! Now!

Lloyd begged internally. Just then, Lady Namaran smiled brightly.

"Oh, mister Cannavaro? How surprising. Has his reputation spread all the way here already?" answered Lady Namaran.

"Excuse me?" gaped Lloyd.

"He is an excellent man. It is never easy to care for the destitute. It's a difficult job for any normal person regardless of their wealth."

"By the destitute, you mean..."

"The people who suffered from the tragedy that happened in the east. I am sure you know of it as well, right? The monster domino effect."

"Oh." And that was it for Lloyd.

"Yes, that is right. Some of the refugees came to Namaran in the aftermath of the disaster. About 400 people, I'm guessing. My father tried to take care of them at first, and that is when mister Cannavaro volunteered."

"To take care of the refugees?"

"Yes, he did. What an amazing man. However, he cannot be compared to Count Frontera, who is feeding and housing tens of thousands of refugees here."

“Haha, you flatter us.”

Lloyd swallowed dryly.

Crap. More than 400?

The number of people was significantly more than in the original story, which was only 100. In short, the situation was set to be worse than it was previously.

Crap. Crap!

Lloyd had an ominous feeling.

“Whew. My goodness.”

Lloyd flopped on the sofa after he came back to his bedroom. The pressure of his body caused the sofa to let out an airy noise. His sigh was the same.

I succeeded in rejecting her, but I’m not happy at all.

He thought about Lady Namaran, with whom he had chatted a while ago. Once they moved on from discussing the situation in Namaran and Cannavaro, Lloyd quickly said that he had no plans to tie the knot with her family. Thank you for traveling a long way, so make yourself at home, he said unilaterally. This was the sole reason he had waited for her in front of the manor at first. Sure, the Namaran incident was serious, but what was equally serious was a forced marriage. Thankfully, Lady Namaran’s reaction couldn’t be any calmer. She revealed that she, too, traveled up here by the passionate urging of her family and thanked Lloyd for being frank. The pressure was now gone, she said with a bright and pristine smile on her face.

“...”

So, Lloyd was bothered all the more. Lady Namaran, who just smiled at Lloyd, could wind up in a mishap and die.

Should I warn her in advance?

The thought crossed his mind, but he realized it wasn't a smart idea upon more reflection. This Cannavaro figure's fame was skyrocketing at the moment. No one would believe that he was actually an evil warlock. It would be Lloyd who would be considered a fool. Besides, he didn't have clear evidence to prove the man's evil plans as there was no exact explanation in the story of how the wall was made.

Should I just turn a blind eye?

He lay on the sofa and blankly stared at the ceiling. To be honest, he didn't want to care. But how could he not? Ignoring the situation could have a huge consequence on his fiefdom.

Hell's Knight.

This knight from hell was the entity that warlock Cannavaro attempted to summon by offering the people's lives. What if nobody stopped it from happening? What if Hell's Knight was summoned, unlike the novel? That hellish situation would be on another level compared to what happened with the monster domino effect.

The story says that Hell's Knight can overpower sword masters.

They didn't directly appear in the novel, but Javier mentioned them to himself in the latter part of the story. He said that even though he was a grandmaster, he stood no chance of winning against Hell's Knight without the Asrahan Core Technique.

In other words, Hell's Knight is almost the same as an ordinary grandmaster.

Even Javier stood no chance at this period. It would be so even if there were ten Javiers. That was how destructive and powerful a grandmaster was.

I must stop him from coming into this world at all costs.

If he didn’t, it meant the destruction of Namaran and the entire country. It would be impossible for Lloyd’s fiefdom to survive in those circumstances.

Dammit. What should I do? Send Javier to Namaran? No. What if that changes the story? But it already has. The change might be the reason why I can’t stop the incident.

If possible, he had to head to Namaran himself. That was the only way for him to actively respond to the changing situation. So, he needed to come up with an excuse to go there.

Should I just say that I want to travel there for vacation? But that’s a bit strange. Hmm.. ask Lady Namaran to pretend to marry me for three months? No, she would slap me for sure.

In honesty, Lloyd was already swamped with work at the Frontera fiefdom. The construction of the apartment complex and sewers was finalizing. He couldn’t think of an excuse as to why he was abandoning all those projects to visit Namaran. Just then...

Knock knock.

“Master Lloyd, are you inside?”

The knocking sound was followed by someone’s question. It was the administrator. Still lying on the sofa, he told him to come in.

“What brings you here?”

“Oh, I came to report to you the things you asked me a few days ago,” replied the administrator.

“Report? Oh, do you mean the statement of accounts for the workers?”

Lloyd rose up, recalling that he did assign the task.

“You’re done already?” asked Lloyd in surprise.

“Yes, the daily work log was very detailed, so it was a breeze. Here.”

But contrary to the administrator’s reassuring words, his eyes were dominated by dark circles. Feeling sorry, Lloyd took the wad of statements. He checked the total amount first.

“This is a lot more than I imagined...”

Lloyd felt bitter upon seeing the report. To tell the truth, the pay for the workers was considerably larger than he expected.

Well, it makes sense. It was a big construction that lasted for a long time.

In particular, the apartment complex construction started last year, and the construction of the sewers required the participation of the engineering corp, the White Cavalry, and regular workers. So, personnel expenses were expected to be high.

I’ll be stretching myself thin if I pay for everything at once.

The truth was, the financial situation in the fiefdom wasn’t enough. Lloyd was barely making it through with regular assistance from the royal palace and the water bill from Lacona viscounty. It was difficult enough to cover the expenses for the materials needed in all the various constructions. Just then, the administrator spoke in a careful voice.

“Um, young master, how about we pay them in parts instead of paying them all at once?”

“Hmm?”

“Since paying a large amount at once will burden the fiefdom. So, we ask for the workers’ consideration and give the payment until about the latter half of next year-”

“No.”

Not a chance. Lloyd shook his head right away.

“That’s not what I promised. The work contract didn’t mention anything like that in the first place.”

“But-”

“Stop. That’s enough. Contracts exist to be kept.”

Contracts were the same as promises in almost every way possible, and not keeping them would kill trust. No one would then roll up their sleeves and volunteer to work.

I’ve had enough of skipped and delayed payments in South Korea.

Lloyd experienced countless times in South Korea. His daily wage was often pushed back and given much later. Each time, he endlessly complained inside his head. And he wouldn’t repeat such a trashy practice just because the tables were turned for him in this world.

“Anyway, money is the problem.”

Lloyd let out a sigh after sending the administrator away. It couldn’t come at a worse time, as he was already preoccupied with the Namaran incident. Now, he had a financial concern on top of everything.

I need a new source of money.

Of course, he didn’t lack money. His fiefdom could live from hand to mouth if he tightened his belt. But it was time to break the status quo.

This isn’t good for my future as well. Everybody needs a pension to enjoy life as they get old, right?

The more, the merrier. Having more money was always good. It went the same right now. Though he had the palace and Lacona viscounty to fund his fiefdom, they weren’t guaranteed to help forever. The former might experience turmoil, while the latter could suddenly go bankrupt. If all his sources of income were cut off like so, Lloyd would struggle and die of hunger.

That won’t do.

Lloyd shook his head. For a more bountiful and beautiful life and to fulfill his promise to the workers, Lloyd had to earn more and acquire more funds.

The problem is how. It's not like money grows on trees. I already have enough on my plate due to the Namaran situation. Haah. I wish there was a way to make money while preventing the Namaran Wall at the same time. Could there be a way to acquire a construction project in Namaran... Wait a minute.

Lloyd sat upright as his grumbling turned into an epiphany. The answer turned out to be so obvious and simple.

"Wait a minute, I simply have to throw a pretext for a large construction project."

That would work. This would allow him to get paid for the construction and prevent the predicted disaster during the project. It was catching two birds with one stone and reaping double benefits at once.

So, what's the fitting construction for Namaran?

Lloyd searched for his memory, returning to the novel as much as possible. Small details started to come back to him. Namaran. The magical wall was built around there. Javier, struggling to break that. But he had a difficult time as the city was built on the edge of a high cliff similar to a pyramid. The slope was too steep, and the cliff sides crumbled so quickly. It was a much larger challenge than fighting on flatland.

That's it.

The side of the cliff crumbled easily, and the city sat at the very top. He thought about what problems that kind of terrain would cause the lord. As Lloyd put on his thinking cap, he started to see an answer.

Found it.

Before he knew it, Lloyd was out of bed. He passed the corridor and stairs, crossed the main building, headed to the annex building, and knocked on Lady Namaran’s room.

“To what business do I owe you?”

One of the guard knights of the lady opened the door, and Lloyd immediately slipped his foot between the door like a salesperson who went from one house to another proclaiming he was selling an amazing product at a staggeringly generous price. He licked his lips and darted his gaze further in, behind the knight’s shoulder, toward the lady. And with the goal of saving everyone from disaster and making some money, he spoke.

“I don’t make this offer every day. I also don’t carelessly tell this to just anybody. The crumbling cliff and collapsing ground. They’re actually not much to worry about. Have you heard of the slope stabilization method that builds up crumbling cities and stabilizes collapsing cities?”

Chapter 163: A City on a Cliff (1)

“Have you ever heard of the slope stabilization method?”

“Excuse me?” asked lady Namaran.

“I knew it,” said Lloyd with a wistful look. “You have not heard of such a great thing? There is nothing more unfortunate than that.”

“...”

With one leg on the door to stop it from closing, he used the signature tactic of salespeople in South Korea. Lloyd put on a plastic smile. Lady Namaran, upon seeing his smile, thought to herself whether he had lost his mind. But Lloyd didn’t care about what she thought. He simply got ready to fire his sales pitch.

“If you do not mind, may I enter and talk inside?” suggested Lloyd.

“What if I mind?”

“Then, we will converse just like this.”

“What if I do not wish to continue this conversation?” asked Lady Namaran.

“Then, you will be missing the perfect opportunity to solve the biggest conundrum your city faces,” said Lloyd confidently.

“You speak as though you can see through my hometown.” There was vague annoyance in her tone.

“Why wouldn’t I? Is there a law that forbids outsiders from knowing the problem with building a city on top of a cliff?” rebutted Lloyd.

“Of course, there is no such law.”

“Yes, you are right. And that is why...”

Thankfully, Lloyd was able to strike a conversation, and it was time to lay an attack. In a straightforward tone, Lloyd got to the heart of the matter.

“I will take care of your cliff problem.”

“You will?”

“Yes, I will.”

Lloyd shrugged. He was brimming with confidence to persuade her to trust and leave the matter to him.

“Your city is built on the cliff, but the foundation is weak. So, it is crumbling very slowly but surely, and in ten more years, the foundation of the city walls will be in danger of toppling. Am I correct?”

“...”

“Surely, Count Namaran must be striving hard, resorting to every means possible to find a solution. He probably tried planting trees on the cliff and plastering them with clay. But I would be surprised if it was effective at all.”

“You talk,” said Lady Namaran, “as though you can take care of it.”

“Because I can.”

“...”

“The slope stabilization method. With this method I mentioned, I can solve the problem. How about it, my lady?”

“What is this...”

Lady Namaran was surprised and at a loss for words. Truthfully, she was flustered by Lloyd’s abrupt appearance in her room and his aggressive and slightly hostile behavior and suggestion. These two factors were strange enough to make her doubtful of his intentions.

Who is this man?

She wondered if he was flirting with her. But she soon shook her head after a second.

It doesn't seem likely. He firmly put an end to the discussion of an arranged marriage earlier.

And more than anything else, he seemed too sincere for someone who was making a haphazard offer. His gaze and attitude were proof of it. To add to that, the queen had bestowed the title of mastery on this man.

I heard he built a bridge under the queen's order that makes you feel like you're walking in the sky. What's more, the people of Cremo admired him for his work in their city.

This man was the queen's favored engineer. Lloyd's name was well known all throughout the kingdom, so she was very familiar with his reputation. It seemed he could be trustworthy, maybe.

"Your suggestion, are you serious about it?"

She asked him as she remembered her hometown, Namaran, a city that was erected on a steep cliff similar to a pyramid. But it wasn't a big city from the beginning. About 400 years ago, Namaran was nothing but a small fortress built to watch over and supervise the trade route between the south and east.

However, the location was too perfect. Since it sat in an excellent location to watch over a major trade route, many merchants began to rest and unwind around the fort as it was safer than staying outside with mountain thieves, wild animals, and various monsters. Soon, inns started to appear in response to the group of resting merchants in the area, which also led to the construction of restaurants and multiple facilities. The fort grew in size as a result, expanding on and on. More people came rushing in, and the fort grew more vibrant. Once again, that led to another influx of merchants. There was even a trading post set up. From then on, Namaran was no longer a rest stop for traveling merchants. It became a destination for trade. The city explosively developed until the current problem arose.

It was never meant to develop into a large city in the first place.

The fort was only meant to monitor trade. But it gradually grew larger to become a city, and the problem wasn't that the land on the cliff was narrow. It was that the city grew too big and expansive to the point that the cliff couldn't house it all. Making things worse, the soil on the cliff wasn't strong enough to bear the city's giant weight. That was when its slope started to crumble and fall apart, the process going on for decades. Slowly yet surely, the top of the cliff started to narrow.

That was where they were at now. The foundation of the wall was in danger of falling to pieces. Give a few more years, and the people's concern for the complete destruction of the wall could potentially come true. Lady Namaran waited for Lloyd to answer as she went over the situation in her head. Lloyd's answer was clear.

"Yes."

He could do it. He knew he could solve this problem. He said everything that needed to be said and tried to appeal to her as much as possible. It would be pointless to persuade or explain anything more. That would only make him look pathetic and clingy. As such, he pulled away, so the ball was in her court.

"Whether to trust me or not is your decision. So, please sleep on it."

Lloyd removed his leg from the door and retreated as though he never approached her in the first place. He flashed a nonchalant gaze. The choice was for her to make. He had nothing to lose. He smiled in a relaxed manner.

"I will take my leave now. Thank you for having me."

Without so much as a glance behind, Lloyd left.

"Wait, what-"

She wondered if this was what it feels to witness a passing storm. With the door left half ajar, her gaze was filled with daze as it stared at the door. The next day, Lloyd's strategy proved to be effective.

"I am thinking of leaving the construction to you," said Lady Namaran.

"Have you decided?"

"Yes."

Lady Namaran, who came to meet Lloyd the following day, nodded.

"I thought about it after you left."

The truth was that she didn't sleep a wink because of the issue. Lloyd couldn't be any more on point about the problem in Namaran. The confidence he manifested, and his reputation. She decided to trust him. It didn't sound like it would harm herself or her homeland, Namaran.

This might be the chance to impress my father.

Lady Namaran was actually forced to travel here by her family as they insisted on forming a good relationship with the eldest son of the Frontera family. They reminded her that this was the opportunity to solidify their family status. She recalled how her father escorted her with the evident expectation the day she left for this place. She felt pressured. She hated the idea of an arranged marriage. So she planned on returning home empty-handed, but at the same time, she felt apologetic. But not anymore.

I'm not going empty-handed at least. Though I'm taking him home not as my husband but as an excellent engineer.

Even though she wouldn't be satisfying her father's wish for marriage, she'd be able to make him happy by solving the ongoing issue of her city. That would be a good enough accomplishment.

"I am thinking about going with you on your return to Namaran. How does that sound?" suggested Lloyd.

“I welcome it, of course.”

Lloyd flashed a bright smile at her. Mission success. Now, all Lloyd had to do was fix the Namaran city, save the people there, and squeeze money out of them.

The preparation for departure was simple. Prior to the day, he gave several instructions and notes about the apartment complex and sewage section construction to Sir Bayern. He entrusted the latter with the remainder of the project, and then bid farewell to the ladies in the manor. Afterward, the count and the countess sent him off on his path with Lady Namaran. Lloyd climbed mountains, traveled over the sea, and crossed a plain during his 12-day journey until he arrived at Namaran. The average altitude off the ground was 1,000 meters. And at the center of the high area, there stood a pyramid-shaped cliff.

“Ah... I’m craving a Drumstick cone...”

As soon as his eyes took in the city, he was reminded of his favorite ice cream in South Korea. The cliff that carried the city looked just like an upside-down ice cream cone. Javier, listening to him on the side, cocked his head to the side.

“What is a Drumstick cone”?

“Don’t worry about it. It’s a type of ice cream,” Lloyd said lazily.

“Do you mean the cold dessert that the royal family enjoys in the palace?”

“Yeah. Something like that.”

Lloyd nodded as he looked up at the cliff and the Namaran city at the top. The pyramid-shaped cliff reminded him of a melting Drumstick with cream spreading down the cone.

In other words, the cliff is a Drumstick cone melting upside down, and the city is one strawberry that was precariously placed on top.

The wall and the city looked exactly like what he just described. At the same time, Lloyd could easily figure out the reason behind its continual deterioration.

It's as I expected. Most of its foundation is made up of sandstone and slate.

Sandstone was a sedimentary rock that formed from compounded sand particles. Slate, the metamorphic rock, was a solidified form of shale after it was pressurized and heated. The two varieties couldn't be classified as hard rocks.

Yet, they built a city on such a foundation. No wonder the ground is unstable.

Lloyd climbed the cliff and looked around the ground using his survey skill. The way up was comparatively easy because the paved and wide road twirled around the cliff perimeter, allowing Lloyd to look in advance at almost all areas with his skill. So, he was able to naturally come up with a plan for what kind of work this city needed.

Retaining walls won't be enough in this case. No matter how much I build the walls on the outside to support the weight, it won't last long. It goes the same for Ggoming's spider web. I can cover up the cliff as much as I can, but it won't last.

This place was fairly sloped, and since the rocks were on the softer side, wrapping the outside would only be a band-aid solution. As such, the solution lay within.

I'll use piles and anchors. With it, I need to bind the surface and base foundation of the slate together. That way, I can properly support the pressure coming down from the crumbling sides of the slope and prevent a collapse.

The outline of his plan was formed in his head. Lloyd considered the necessary equipment, labor, time, and budget. He even thought about the construction process and timeline. He climbed to the top of the cliff as he came up with a broad idea in his head. But when he entered the castle gate, a slightly peculiar scene caught his eyes. More than a hundred people were gathered in the plaza of the inner part of the castle. Most were raggedly clothed, and Lloyd caught a whiff of a nutty smell in the air. This scene seemed familiar.

That's...

“It is the meal center mister Cannavro runs.”

Lloyd didn’t realize that the window of the carriage was slightly opened. Inside, Lady Namaran was grinning.

“You did say the first time we met, right? How you came to respect mister Cannavaro after hearing his rumors,” she said, “Yes, that is right. That is the meal center he runs for free. Most of the people who fled from the east are in debt to his kindness.”

“I see...”

Lloyd studied the people in the center a little more. In contrast to their ragged clothing, everyone looked healthy and well, which must be due to good rest and diet.

But they must be ignorant of what his favor actually means.

Lloyd was scared for a second when he thought about how they’ll be sacrificed as an experiment. But completely oblivious to it, they were gathered around the center with happy smiles on their faces. Their eyes danced with gratitude as they looked at the one scooping up the food. Just then, Lady Namaran spoke.

“Oh, he’s just over there.”

“Excuse me?”

There? Who?

“Mister Cannavaro is there,” she said with a laugh. “Over there.”

"..."

Lloyd's gaze followed her finger outside the carriage window. The meal center. The focal point of people's gazes and smiles. A man holding a ladle with his sleeves rolled up. He was plump and looked meek. His warm smile toward the people thanking him could not be warmer.

"Do you see him? He is mister Cannavaro. Like always, he is taking good care of the refugees."

Lady Namaran's voice contained satisfaction and pride as though she was speaking of a city monument. But Lloyd could not agree with her. Was it because he knew what Cannavaro was? Or was it because he suddenly remembered that this man killed Lady Namaran in the novel? No. There was another reason why he clamped his mouth shut.

The grim reaper with a black dragon head.

There was a symbol embroidered on the shoulder of his clothing. At a glance, it looked like an ordinary family symbol. But Lloyd knew what it was.

The undead mastodons.

It was the symbol the necromancer that buried them used. Also, it was the symbol Queen Magentano selected in the novel after becoming a tyrant. And that sinister and ominous symbol was also on Cannavaro's clothes.

Chapter 164: A City on a Cliff (2)

“You must be Lloyd Frontera. My, how unjust the rumors are as I behold you with my own eyes! Not a single rumor spoke of your dashing handsomeness. Hahaha!”

Here we go again...

Lloyd sighed lightly and lifted his gaze to find an older man striding across the flashy reception room of the manor. He was Count Namaran, whose appearance was likened to Santa Claus. The man walked over to them and tapped Javier’s shoulder with a look of satisfaction.

“I hope the journey here wasn’t too harsh,” the count said.

“It was not unbearable.” It was Javier who spoke.

“I see. Come over here and take a seat. Haha. How dashing you look. I can never get over it.”

The count’s smile deepened as he looked at Javier. The mere sight of the exchange forced Lloyd to put on a bitter smile.

Ha. What should I do? Correct him and say that I am the real Lloyd Frontera?

Lloyd shook his head.

No, I feel like that’ll make me even more miserable.

His nostrils flared twice, left and right each. Just then, to his relief, Lady Namaran stepped forward.

“Um, father?” she said.

“Hmm?”

“Actually, this man is...”

She pointed at Lloyd with a slightly flustered look, and it was only then that Count Namaran's gaze moved to Lloyd's side. He tilted his head to the side.

"Him?" the count asked, and with a look of realization, he then said, "Oh, oh! You must be the guard knight of Lloyd Frontera. The rumors told me that his guard knight, who is a sword master and goes by Javier Asrahan, looks like a sculpture crafted by the gods. And you... You definitely are not Sir Asrahan based on your looks."

The count then turned to Javier and continued.

"I suppose you did not bring Sir Asrahan with you this time. It was my wish to meet the kingdom's rising star and sword master. How unfortunate," the count clucked his tongue in regret.

The bitterness of life once again rushed through Lloyd, and Lady Namaran, this time terribly more flustered, spoke.

"Um, father. This is the young master. Lloyd Frontera." She then pointed at Lloyd Frontera awkwardly.

"Hmm?"

"This is Lloyd Frontera..." she murmured.

"..."

The count froze. Three seconds of silence followed in the room. His white beard jerked.

"This man?" the count gasped.

"Yes, father," Lady Namaran answered.

"This is Lloyd Frontera?"

"Yes, father."

"Then, who is he?"

“That is Sir Javier Asrahan,” she replied.

“The sword master?” asked the count again.

“Yes.”

“Ehem! Ehem! But, no matter how hard I look, that man looks nobler than him.”

“Oh, father...” she pleaded softly. “Even though we both cannot deny the fact that Sir Asrahan looks more opulent and noble than Lord Frontera, how could you say that out loud...”

Lloyd wanted to give up and go home immediately. His breathing grew heavy as he felt the wretchedness of lookism. But he needed to remain calm at times like these.

“It is an honor to meet you,” said Lloyd pretending to not hear what they just said. “My name is Lloyd Frontera.”

Lloyd introduced himself as the chance to present himself finally appeared. Count Namaran let out an embarrassed chuckle.

“My... Do excuse my impertinence.”

“It is fine, Your Excellency. I’ve had a similar experience before.”

“Is that so?” the count replied, “I knew it.”

I knew it, my ass!

Lloyd yelled internally, thinking about how the pair of father and daughter loved to verbally jab him. But strangely, Lloyd wasn’t offended. He felt rather sorry for the innocently smiling count as he remembered the scene he saw on his way here.

The count is completely oblivious to the fact that his city is entrenched with powers that aim to ruin this place.

Cannavaro. The man Lloyd met a while ago. The man behind the Namaran incident in the novel. On top of that, something else caught Lloyd by surprise.

I never imagined Cannavaro would use that symbol.

The grim reaper with a black dragon head. This symbol was found in the burial site of the undead Mastodons, and Lloyd presumed it was used by the necromancer responsible for it. Moreover, this symbol was used in The Knight of Blood and Iron after Queen Magentano started her terrorizing reign. And here was Cannavaro, using that symbol. What it entailed was crystal clear.

He has deep connections with the necromancer that buried the undead Mastodons near my fiefdom. Or he's the same person.

Something was brewing here, and it was serious. Lloyd considered that whatever this was, it was developing into something big. So he must delve into it someday. With that conclusion in mind, Lloyd lifted his gaze to focus on his business with Count Namaran. Then, putting a salesman smile on his face, Lloyd got ready to throw the eloquent pitch he had prepared.

"Count Naraman," Lloyd said, "it is my honor to be your acquaintance. Moreover, it is a greater honor for me to extend my hands to solve the long-standing problem that plagues your city."

"Hmm? What do you mean by that?" the count said.

Count Namaran cocked his head to the side, and he asked, "A long-standing problem? Tell me, you aren't talking about my daughter's inability to find a husband, are you?"

"No, Your Excellency. I mean the problem relating to the collapsing cliff."

"Cliff?" asked the count.

"Yes."

"But what about marriage?"

“Oh, that’s...” Lloyd murmured.

“Wait, are you here not to accept the marriage proposal but to repair the cliff of my city?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

Lloyd realized that the count was misunderstood once more. Smoldering his wry smile, Lloyd spoke.

“Please forgive me for saying this, but your daughter is much too good for me. I am sure that she will meet someone better.”

“Ehem...” the count said, “But still, I cannot say that I am not disappointed.”

“I am sorry, Your Excellency. But if I may change your perspective, your daughter can get married later in the future, but that is not true for the cliff. Once it collapses further, it cannot be undone.”

“Is that so?” the count asked.

“Yes, Your Excellency. I think so.”

“What a silver tongue you have.”

“Thank you,” he said.

“And brazen.”

“Please forgive me,” Lloyd replied.

“So, you came here to fix the cliff that is crumbling at the moment?” the count summarized.

“That is perfectly correct.”

Thankfully, Count Namaran seemed to be a realistic man. From then onward, he never mentioned the matter of marriage; instead, he looked grave and professional.

“I am well aware of your reputation as an engineer,” the count continued, “as I often heard of the rumors. That is, about your accomplishment in Cremo and the royal palace. But do know that I tried my best to solve the problem, calling renowned engineers across the kingdom. But they all failed. Yet, you are confident?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

Lloyd didn’t feel the need to talk at length. He simply went on to speak what he wanted to say.

“You just need to provide the necessary funds and labor while I supervise the construction. But in the case that the construction fails or a serious defect is found, I will pay you a penalty fee that we agree upon in advance.”

“Penalty fee?” asked the count.

“Yes, Your Excellency. Will you look at this first?”

Lloyd fished a document out of his pocket. The count lifted his brow a little.

“What is this?”

“It is a construction contract.”

Lloyd had it made a day before leaving his fiefdom. He pointed to several points in the contact.

“As you can see,” Lloyd said, “Your Excellency will be entrusting me with the authority and responsibility of construction to me. I will be a supervisor that oversees and provides technical support in the process of surveying, designing, and constructing the project. In return, I will be paid a small fee after the construction ends successfully.”

“Hmm... The price is... considerable,” the count commented.

“No one can do it but me, after all.”

“And you are confident.”

“I say this is a rather inexpensive investment given that you will be stabilizing the city’s foundation for good.”

“But what is this item over here? Long-term maintenance fee?”

“Oh, that refers to the cost of maintaining the facility once the construction is over.”

“Does this mean I will pay you this fee every quarter?”

“Yes, Your Excellency,” replied Lloyd, “Continuous maintenance is a must even after a successful construction.”

“Hmm... This looks like...”

Count Namaran stroked his beard, gazing at Lloyd with suspicious eyes.

“Is this your scheme to squeeze money out of us over the years? You are quite a greedy man, aren’t you?”

“I am only receiving proper payment for my job. And that is also why the item regarding the penalty fee is included,” replied Lloyd.

“Yes, penalty,” mused the count. “I was curious about that. Let us see.”

Count Namaran read down the bottom of the contract with his gaze. Then, he nodded.

“I like this part,” he said.

“Do you, Your Excellency?”

“You will be paying thrice the construction fee if the project fails or a major fault is discovered. Are you sure this is doable?” asked the count.

“Yes, after all, it’s a contract.”

“Is that why you are writing this document?”

“This way, we can at least form some trust between us.”

Lloyd grinned. A contract was precisely that. It was the device that guaranteed minimal trust between the two parties. That was Lloyd’s take on contracts.

We’re turning our promises into permanent evidence. It’s more problematic if we don’t have a contract.

The one who got in trouble without it was the employees. Things turned against them, and there was a far, far higher chance for them to get harmed. Lloyd’s life in South Korea was proof of it.

When was it? Was it the time I had gone to Pohang for work?

Lloyd recalled the time he frequented the construction sites for work. One day, he received a call from a superintendent who used to favor him very much, saying that there was this two-week project in Pohang and that food and lodging would be provided. But he’d be working until late at night, and it would be lucrative. Lloyd gave a yes as soon as he heard it. And just like that, he headed to Pohang and got to work right after a safety education. But in the process, Lloyd committed a grave mistake.

I didn’t write a work contract. They told me that we can write it later after the project since everyone’s super busy at the moment.

Lloyd just let it slide, not thinking twice about it and fearing that his supervisors wouldn’t like his rigid attitude when it could be written at any time in the future. He hated the idea of standing out from the rest, so he agreed and got to work immediately. But that turned out to be a fatal mistake.

Eventually, my payments got delayed and delayed until I received only half of my money.

They said that payments would come the next day. The next month. They gave all sorts of pretenses that this wasn't what they wanted. There was an emotional exchange of excuses and yelling. Eventually, only the team managers and the supervisors who issued the payment bill as a re-subcontract agreement received the money, while the rest was left uncompensated. As a result, Lloyd went back to Seoul, emotionally and physically tattered. He financially struggled for the next month and laid low as he couldn't even pay his rent. That painful experience taught Lloyd one thing.

Contracts must be signed. Even if the sky collapses and the earth explodes.

That was how he could keep everything neat and organized after a project. Everyone, the contractor and service provider, stayed happy and peaceful when a contract was signed. Just like that, Count Namaran and Lloyd signed a contract.

"Thank you, Your Excellency," said Lloyd. "So, as per the contract, please prepare the funds, resources, and labor for the construction."

"How much should I prepare?" asked the count.

"I will come up with the plan and schedule soon. Once things materialize somewhat, I will let you know separately."

"Haha. You are a thorough man."

"I try my best."

Lloyd bowed courteously at the count and left the room. When he arrived at the visitors' quarter, where he would spend a while, he started unpacking and stared at Javier.

"Hey."

"Another job for me?" asked Javier.

"You have become quick-witted."

“I always have,” blurted Javier, who was bringing out his personal toothbrush, towel, and other items as he stood across from Lloyd. “Normally, you call me for one of two purposes.”

“What would those be?”

“To joke around or to give me a special order.”

“And you felt it was the latter this time?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.” Javier nodded. “Your left nostril isn’t flaring right now.”

“What?” asked Lloyd in disbelief.

Hold on, Lloyd said to himself as he wondered what this was about. He was in a daze when Javier replied back.

“Did you not know? You always flare your left nostril when you make a corny joke. Every time. Without fail.”

“...”

“When you do that, it reveals your nose hair very well,” added Javier.

“Y-you’re lying.”

“It does not matter whether you believe it or not. It is the truth.”

“...”

Lloyd suddenly felt lost, completely defeated by the sudden blow to his stomach. But since there was something more urgent to be dealt with first, he decided to play cool even though he was having a mental breakdown inside.

“All right. Let’s just say that you’re right. But do what I tell you to do first.”

“What job is it?” asked Javier.

“Do you remember Cannavaro? The guy at the soup kitchen in the plaza.”

“Yes,” said Javier, “Do you want me to do a background check on him?”

“How did you know?” asked Lloyd in surprise.

“I saw it too. The small symbol embroidered on his shoulder.”

“Then, I suppose I can save my explanation.”

“Of course. However...” paused Javier.

“But what?”

“In my honesty, I do not like the idea of looking into a man behind his back.”

Javier slightly furrowed his brows as he spoke.

“It does not befit my status or principles as a knight,” he said, “But I am simply following your order as I also think that the symbol is closely related to our fiefdom’s safety. Please do not forget this part.”

“So, you’re telling me that you are chary of doing this but feel the need to investigate that symbol, yeah?” asked Lloyd.

“That is right.”

“Then, off you go.”

“...”

Though Javier had expressed his distaste, he didn’t add anything.

“I will be back.”

Javier left the room after a sigh with a sword in his belt. Once he was gone, Lloyd went out to the city by himself, taking a closer look at the city walls and the foundation of the surrounding. That alone took up a whole day. At last, when the night wore on, Javier returned to his room. It was past midnight with unfamiliar constellations adorning the night.

“Master Lloyd, I have something I must tell you.”

Seeing him, Lloyd wondered what could possibly Javier have seen in the last few hours that he should gaze at him so gravely. Javier, with a forbidding look on his face, spoke.

Chapter 165: Undercover (1)

“Master Lloyd, a terrible accident has happened.”

“What?”

Javier spoke with a grim expression, and an old fluorescent light faintly shone behind his back. Lloyd rose up from a creaking bed.

“What’s going on?” Lloyd asked as he rubbed his sleepy eyes.

“It looks like we do not have enough to pay the rent for the rental room.”

“What...?”

What on earth is he saying? Lloyd asked, snappily coming to his senses. He looked up and found that he was in the room rental where he used to live back in Korea. Javier was standing against the wallpaper that had yellowed over the years. The sight was transcendental. Just then, Javier spoke, this time looking graver.

“Moreover, the news just reported that the convenience store will be raising the price of triangular gimbap to 100 dollars.”

“Hey,” huffed Lloyd, “What are you talking about?”

“I am not joking. It’s an official law. And the United Nations announced it as a grave matter. It’s set in stone now. Among them, the Jeonju bibimbap flavor, which is your favorite, will jump to 150 dollars.”

“Hey, man. Are you out of your mind? Hello?” said Lloyd as he waved his hands.

“I am sound in mind. It is all because of him.”

Javier pointed behind his shoulder with a serious look. Just then...

Clack. The old door opened, and a man dressed in black entered his tiny room. It was Cannavaro, the philanthropist Lloyd had seen this afternoon.

“Nice to meet you. I believe this is our first meeting. I am the new manager of this rental room,” introduced Cannavaro.

“Excuse me...?” Lloyd was dazed.

“I heard that you will be behind on rent this month. Please vacate this room right away.”

“Oh, what are you talking-”

“And your grades are not quite good enough to get a scholarship,” Cannavaro griped, “Wahaha!”

“Wh-what? Excuse me?”

What in the world was happening right now? Lloyd was at a loss and scared. He wanted to find out why on earth he was back in this tiny room again. And why were Javier and Cannavaro staring at him like that? But what about the things he went through? Frontera fiefdom? Lloyd Frontera? Chills ran down Lloyd’s spine.

N-No! Wait a second! No!

He shouted in a hurry, that this wasn’t making any sense, that it was unfair. But his emotional bawling, which was almost a plea, didn’t come out of his mouth. As if a terrible nightmare was playing with him, Lloyd could not utter any noise. He would have remained in that state if it weren’t for a hand that jerked his shoulder.

“Master Lloyd?”

“Eh... Argh!”

“Are you all right?”

“...!”

Lloyd opened his eyes, bolting upright in his bed. This time, the expensive bed didn’t creak. And the faint fluorescent light and yellow wallpapers were replaced with dancing lights and a luxurious interior. Amid the light, Lloyd spotted the knight of the blood and iron, Javier.

“J-Javier?”

“Yes, it’s me. Is everything okay?”

“I...”

“I fear you had a bad dream. A terrible nightmare was haunting you.”

“...”

Dammit. It was a bogus dream. A terrible one, even. Lloyd let out a sigh of relief. It was pretty nasty for a dream. But it was quite real. Lloyd was terrified as he thought about it. He shook his head sideways, shaking the fatigue and nightmare off his mind.

“Anyway, when did you get here?”

“I just arrived,” Javier said, “I have something to tell you.”

“This isn’t about whether the triangle gimbap got more expensive, right?”

“What is a triangle gimbap...?” Javier threw a weird look at Lloyd.

“That’s what you said in my dream.”

“Did I appear in your dream?”

“Uh-huh.”

“And that is why you had a nightmare?”

“Uh-huh.”

“...”

“Anyway, so what did you need to tell me?”

“It pertains to Cannavaro,” Javier replied.

“Something suspicious?”

“Please see for yourself…”

Javier unpacked the bundle he was carrying on his shoulder. It contained four pieces of clothing. One coat that was considerably thick. Three comfy inner shirts. Each had a different color and shape, but there was one commonality. It was...

“Dragon head grim reaper embroidery. Where did you find them? Did you steal them from his house?” asked Lloyd.

“Not at all.” Javier shook his head. “I bought it at the market.”

“What?” Lloyd said, his brows quirking up, wondering what he was hearing.

“Since I went out this afternoon,” Javier continued, “I began the background check at the soup kitchen as per your instructions and looked into his manor. I dressed like a normal merchant and studied his behavior.”

“Did you hide your face?”

“Yes, somewhat.”

“So?”

“Several parts of his manor were protected by magical devices that prevented entry, just like any other rich man. But I did manage to roughly look around the rest of the estate. And I was able to continuously study his movements in the process. But...”

“But what?” hurried Lloyd.

“I did not detect any suspicious behavior in my hours of studying him. No, it was the contrary.”

“Contrary?” asked Lloyd, and Javier wore an expression that Lloyd found incomprehensible.

“His actions were filled with goodness and kindness. To the point that I wondered if he was not the most generous person I have ever met.”

“But you just saw him for a few hours,” Lloyd pointed out.

“Surely, the hours aren’t much, but he... he nursed the patients in his manor after his work in the soup kitchen. Sick patients whose entire bodies were wasting away.”

“So?”

“He was carefully wiping down the pus spilling out of a patient’s body for hours. He never frowned once.”

Javier expounded the sight one after another, saying how clear it was in his eyes. What Cannavaro did went beyond normal human capacity. Who would, Javier had asked himself, do such a thing to a total stranger in this world? And who could put on a gentle smile without any expression of tiredness?

“He moved me,” Javier said with conviction.“That was when I felt regretful. Here I was sneaking behind him, doing a background check when he owns such an exemplary character. That is when I found it.”

“Found what?” asked Lloyd.

“There were patients in his care that wore these clothes.”

“So?”

“I struck a conversation as I changed a patient’s bandage, pretending to be one of the volunteers,” he explained, “as the conversation progressed, I threw out that the embroidery on his clothes looked interesting. The patient told me that I could buy it at the market."

"Market?"

"That is right."

Javier's gaze moved over to the clothes. "It was true. Some merchants were selling them."

"And you bought all of them?" asked Lloyd.

"No, just a portion of it. I saw dozens more at the market. That was how common the symbol was," concluded Javier.

"Whew."

Lloyd sighed at length. The print turned out to be so common that it was sold at a market. This changed things. Lloyd racked his brain as he furrowed his brows.

The dragon head grim reaper was commercialized? That's unexpected. But still, Cannavaro is surely the head of the dark magicians.

That was the case in the novel, and he surely had to be the leader. As such, Lloyd could not retreat like this. The investigation had to go on.

There's no guarantee that he'll move and do things exactly as in the novel. The chances are likely that he'll behave differently. I might find myself in hot water if I only base my plan on what happened in the novel.

Knowledge of an enemy ensured unfailing victory. So, Lloyd decided to be more alert and vigilant in monitoring Cannavaro. Every piece of information, even small and trivial, like the number of forks in his house and the color of his underwear, had to be tracked until something suspicious came up. Once Lloyd chanced upon the smoking gun to prove Cannavaro's evil scheme, he would report it to Count Namaran and have the man arrested. With such a plan in his head, Lloyd spoke.

“You’re not telling me you want to stop following him around, are you?” asked Lloyd.

“Surely...”

“Don’t stop here. Keep going.”

“But Master Lloyd.”

“I have a bad feeling about this one. Something is definitely going on here,” Lloyd insisted.

“...”

“Can’t you trust me?” asked Lloyd as he stared at Javier.

“I don’t.”

“Your responses are unusually fast during times like these.”

“You are mistaken.”

“I don’t think so.”

“...”

“Do trust me a little,” said Lloyd. “I get that you are reluctant to check on him behind his back, but we are just playing it safe.”

“Playing it safe?”

“Yeah. It’s not like me being right about this matter will hurt our fiefdom.”

It was true. If Lloyd was right about this, the Namaran incident would be prevented, and it could lead to discovering a future threat to his fiefdom.

“So, it’s an order. Keep digging for more information,” ordered Lloyd.

“Normally,” Javier replied, “People try to pull at their listener’s heartstrings instead of placing an order in this kind of situation.”

“Why should I do that?”

“...”

“Why try persuading or making a request when ordering works better?”

“...”

“I say jump, and you say how high,” said Lloyd nonchalantly.

“Whew. I shouldn’t have woken you up earlier.”

“Why,” asked Lloyd, “so I’ll suffer from my nightmare?”

“You know it.” Javier clucked his tongue as he got up. “I will take my leave then.”

Javier was already gone like the wind before he was done speaking. The only traces of his visit was a candlestick, opened window, and a swaying curtain. Lloyd was astonished by his speed.

Sword masters are truly amazing.

Lloyd was already a mid-level sword expert, but he couldn’t sense Javier’s movement at all. He didn’t notice that the latter left until he was gone. And that was the reason why Lloyd was relieved. There was nothing to worry about him spying on the man.

Time to focus on my job while he’s gone.

Closing the opened window, Lloyd sat at the desk and decided to leave the matter pertaining to the dark magician in Javier’s hands. Meanwhile, he would get ready for the construction project. He opened the design skill thinking so.

A few days passed, and Lloyd was able to flesh out his construction project.

It's as I had thought before. I should use piles and anchors.

Since the city was supported by the sandstone slope, solidifying the facade wasn't enough. There needed to be piles and anchors inserted deep into the slope to create a firm, steadfast foundation. But there was one problem.

I need to manufacture anchors.

The anchors were to be planted into the foundation rocks after countless holes were bored into the cliff slope. However, this job involved more than sticking metal bars inside. Moreover, logs and bamboo sticks weren't enough. To succeed, Lloyd needed a modern version of anchors.

That's how I can fasten the anchors inside the holes bore in the slope. The force from the foundation rock to the facade will prevent the cliff from crumbling down. But to do that, the anchors have to be properly fastened first.

And so, once he was almost finished with the design, he visited Count Namaran.

"Please introduce me to the most competent blacksmith in the city," Lloyd said.

"A blacksmith?"

"That is right."

Lloyd unraveled his general outline for the construction and anchors. In particular, he showed the blueprint to the count, as he explained his plans for the anchors.

"This construction requires this object," Lloyd explained, "And to do that, I need the help of a competent blacksmith."

"To make these anchors?" asked Count Namaran.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

Actually, this anchor Lloyd designed was closer to the “wedge lock bolt” used in South Korean construction fields. The basic principle went like this…

A large nut will be attached to the end of a long cylindrical bar. I’m going to push the bar deep into a hole that is burrowed as far as the foundation rock. And once I twist the nut at the end, the bar will expand once it penetrates inside, and as it does so, the bar will be completely fixed inside the hole.

It was a magical stick that thickened as the nut rotated.

Anyway, I need to carve spiral grooves into the nut to make that structure.

The spiral grooves would function as a bolt. Only the best and most competent blacksmiths would be capable of creating them to their exact size.

It’s not like I can call Corgidus here.

Corgidus was most likely pounding down on the metals that would be used in the apartment complex today. Lloyd couldn’t make the busy man come all the way here.

“So,” Lloyd said, “I need the best blacksmith in the city. We can’t properly carry out the construction otherwise. And without the construction, the cliff will collapse. If the cliff collapses, you will be very sad. If you become very sad, I will be very sad as well.”

“Haha, really?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“I expect it will be an amusing sight.”

“And that means...”

“Of course, I shall introduce you to the best blacksmith in my city.”

“Thank you,” Lloyd said.

“No need to thank me since we signed the contract. I will have the administrator get to work, so follow him.”

Lloyd stepped out of the office, hearing the count’s laughter, and the administrator appeared as he waited in the corridor. Lloyd was then led out of the manor through the city district, passing by countless ordinary citizens under the early autumn sun. As he did so, he paid close attention to his surrounding.

Every piece of evidence counts.

Lloyd wondered if Javier was doing a good job. It had been days since he left his room. Lloyd was passing the plaza with the administrator, wondering if Javier was doing a good job when he spotted something extraordinary.

“Whew. I see the rumors are true. There are too many people crowding the soup kitchen.”

The administrator, who was walking ahead, paused and spoke. Surely, there were more people around the soup kitchen than before. Curious, Lloyd stopped as well.

“Is it because the number of refugees has increased?” asked Lloyd.

“Oh, that is not the case I heard.”

“Then, what is it?”

“I heard that a beautiful lady started volunteering in the past few days.”

“A beautiful lady...?”

Lloyd tilted his head, and his reaction invited a more passionate and joyful response from the administrator.

“Honestly,” he started, almost spitting, “I have not seen her with my own eyes. But the rumors tell me she is breathtaking. One of a kind. I heard her beauty is so pristine that even the stars and constellations are jealous of her. Ha... That is likely the reason why so many people, who are not refugees, have been flocking to the kitchen.”

“To take a look at this beautiful lady?” asked Lloyd.

“Why else?”

The administrator shrugged, and then, he stole a glance at Lloyd as though he was testing the latter.

“Speaking of, how about we stop for a moment and take a look at her? That is if you are not too busy...”

“...”

Lloyd paused for a moment to decide what he should do. He was curious as well, but not because he wanted to take a look at this ravishing beauty the administrator just described.

I might come across a clue that’s related to the dark magicians.

The appearance of a belle when the Namaran incident will take place soon? This wasn’t in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Something didn’t seem right. Lloyd nodded.

“Good,” Lloyd said, “Let us go take a look.”

The administrator grinned ear to ear, and the two squeezed their way into the crowd. They shoved, squeezed, and wiggled inside the crowd to get some space, making Lloyd recall the times he had to fight his way through the train station to find a seat during rush hour. Finally, after some struggle, they managed to get in, and the soup kitchen appeared in their sight. Everyone’s gaze focused on one point. And there, he saw beauty. Though she wore a modest apron, her eyes glimmered like dazzling stars, and her straight silver hair flowing down looked like a constellation. And this belle, this enchantress with a ladle in her hand was...

Javier?

Lloyd, who was rubbing his eyes, almost poked his eyes with his finger at the sight.

Chapter 166: Undercover (2)

Javier?

Lloyd was rubbing his eyes, and he almost poked his eyes with his finger. It was the only rightful response. The sight was that dismaying.

And he tells me what? That he hates digging up someone's background? He feels resentful because this job is below him?

Lloyd recalled the conversation that took place a few days ago. The moon was bright that night, and Javier returned to the lodging with a face overwhelmed with guilt and resignation. He had opposed Lloyd's order to do a background check on Cannavaro. Lloyd had to soothe and persuade him to put him back on the scene. And it had been a few days since Lloyd heard from him. Now he knew why.

You were actually enjoying this, Javier...

Modest dress. Silky and straight silver wig. Light makeup. Lloyd sighed and let out praise at the same time. Since he was already a handsome, gentle, and noble man, a simple disguise was enough to turn him into a stunner.

Not to mention, he's slim and muscular with little body fat. And so, Javier looks very fit when he's dressed. Though he's a bit too tall, I suppose he just looks like a supermodel to others.

Anyway, his appearance brought raving popularity throughout the kitchen. Lloyd wondered for a second if he was at a meet-and-greet for a famous celebrity. Just then...

"Hey, mister."

Someone tapped Lloyd on the shoulder from behind. He turned and found a refugee man shooting a nasty look at him.

“Seriously, if you’re in line, move faster,” demanded the man. “Why are you so slow?”

“Oh?” said Lloyd, dazed.

“Stop dazing out, move now. Come on.”

“Eh!”

The man began to shove Lloyd with his whole body, but it wasn’t just him. Dozens of people from behind moved forward with their whole weight pushing up the line, and the experience strangely felt familiar.

It’s like I’m on the second line at the train station in the morning

Lloyd was reminded of the Shindorim station during rush hour. It was far from a normal train station. All sorts of people pushed and shoved through each other, turning the platform into a battlefield, and it was also a mysterious place where movement didn’t require the exercise of two feet. The others did it for you as they pushed their way forward. That event was taking place right now to Lloyd in this world, who had scooted his way to take a look at Javier. And by some random turn of events, he found himself in the line for rations, and it was too late to slip out. Now stuck in the queue, Lloyd was moving forward as people became intimate with each other toward Javier, the goddess of the soup kitchen.

“...”

“...”

Javier blinked as he stared at Lloyd. The latter smiled nastily at the former. The silence was short-lived, however, for Javier put on his character and played his role.

“Your plate, please.”

“Oh.”

Lloyd picked up the wooden plate by reflex and held it to him. And Lloyd involuntarily asked a question to Javier.

“Excuse me, but what is your name, my lady?” asked Lloyd.

“Oh... It’s Ella.”

“Yes. E-l-l-a. Ella.”

“...”

Lloyd figured that Javier was flustered just as much, given his unusually dazed response.

This bastard.

Lloyd knew Javier went undercover in this kitchen to learn more about this place. So, he left to ensure he wouldn’t make things more awkward for Javier.

“Thank you, Miss Ella. So long.”

He took the soup and chugged it in one gulp and removed himself from the scene, though it also required some struggle. Now freed, he was collecting his breath when the administrator approached him.

“Haha, Lord Frontera, I did not peg you to be a man of such character.”

“Excuse me?”

Lloyd tilted his head to the side, wondering what this man was talking about and his smile. The administrator flashed a grin that wrinkled his nose as though he was telling Lloyd to stop playing dumb.

“When I told you about this beautiful lady,” he said, “you seemed barely interested. But now, you are more forward than I am after you caught sight of her.”

“…”

“What was it like talking to her directly? What was her voice like? And her manner of speech?” the administrator urged.

“Goodness, check for yourself if you’re curious. Let’s get to work, ahem!” huffed Lloyd.

Lloyd gulped as he pretended to huff at the administrator. His mouth was itching to break the shocking news to everyone. All of you’re being deceived. Miss Ella is actually a man who’s far from being gentle and lovely. Furthermore, he’s incapable of falling asleep without a lullaby because of his terrible sleeping habit. If Lloyd could do it, he wanted to spread this news to all corners of the city as he felt sorry for the people who worshiped Ella, not knowing her real identity. But Lloyd decided to stay silent for a greater cause.

Javier is undercover right now.

Javier wasn’t the type to make jokes like this, and there had to be a reason behind his actions. There had to be something fishy going on to explain how far he was going with his disguise.

I should trust him for now.

Lloyd decided to leave him be and walked away. Now that he saw that Javier was working hard to fulfill his order, Lloyd thought he should do his part too. So, he went to the blacksmith at the administrator’s guidance and requested the anchor bolts. The blacksmith cocked his head at first, which was a natural response given the unfamiliarity of the anchor itself. But when Lloyd expounded the item with the help of his blueprint, the blacksmith finally nodded in understanding.

It’s a relief. Since he’s the most reliable blacksmith in the city, I can entrust him with the anchors. Though he won’t be as great as Sir Corgidus.

That was one less burden off him. Next, Lloyd went out of the castle alone and walked along the cliff slopes that surrounded the castle. He then activated the Subterranean Scanning, an optional skill of his surveying.

Since I have to plant the piles and anchor bolts around here, I should survey this place more thoroughly.

Lloyd looked closely at the construction area, particularly the location of the piles and the angle and depth of the anchor bolts.

Hmm, I should plant the piles in these flat roads and increase the overall structural stability. And I should install the anchor bolts in the slopes to prevent any slippage. Repeat this process from the upper area in the castle wall, to the lower part of the cliff, and that should do it.

With such a plan in his head, Lloyd obtained the data of the terrain, sweeping through every corner of the foundation rock and collecting every detail. As he did so...

Hmm?

He was looking into the ground with his optional skill when he detected something strange down there.

What is that?

About 20 inches under the ground, Lloyd found something that at first glance thought was a rock. But it wasn’t. The upper part was white and round while the lower part was rugged.

Is that a skull? What’s it doing here?

Lloyd frowned. It really was a human skull buried underground. But no matter how much he looked at it, this place hardly looked like a suitable area for a grave. Not to mention, there was only a skull here and no other bones.

Could it be that those who were beheaded have been buried down here?

Lloyd shrugged nonchalantly. After all, he was around a large, historical city. All sorts of things must have happened throughout the years. There was no reason to fuss about a skull as it could be the result of execution. Thinking so, Lloyd ignored it and resumed focusing on his work. He activated the optional skill and moved around until, sometime later, he discovered another skull.

What the?

Lloyd frowned. It was very similar to the previous one. Similarly, a skull without a body was buried about 20 inches deep in the ground. This time again, Lloyd brushed the thought away, simply cocking his head to the side.

This doesn't feel good. Or is my luck just off today? If I were in Korea, I'd have bought lottery tickets.

He scoffed at the sudden thought, which allowed him to dismiss the bad feeling away. He then got back to work again. Ten minutes later, however, the smile on his face was completely gone.

What the heck? Another one?

Once again, there was another skull buried in the same depth. However, this time Lloyd found that upon a closer look that the skull was buried upright, facing the city, just like the previous ones.

"..."

Lloyd stared behind him with a serious look and observed the points where he first found the two skulls. As he used his surveying skill, he shockingly noticed there was an even distance between each skull.

Something's going on here.

Now, his previous theory of skulls being buried as the result of execution proved to be false. Plus, the three skulls faced the same direction in the same depth. Not to mention, the interval between them was almost all the same. The difference was only about five inches.

It looks like someone used a ruler to bury them. So, it wasn't buried here randomly or by chance. Something's really going on right now.

Lloyd hurriedly raked through his bag and fished a foldable pickax. He then dug the area with a lot of effort until he excavated the skull. He stretched out his hand to pick it up.

Bzzt!

“Argh!”

An electric shock hurt his fingers. Lloyd quickly withdrew and observed the skull.

Magic?

Lloyd didn’t feel any magical force when it was under the earth. But now that it was out in the open, he could feel it. And the Asrahan Core Technique allowed him to discover that the mana, which was extremely gloomy, dark, and evil, was highly concentrated in the skull.

Wait a minute. Could this be...

Lloyd started to rack his brain. Skulls are buried in regular intervals. A high concentration of gloomy mana. Lloyd theorized, predicted, and considered the facts at hand without anything amiss. The evidence and phenomenon that appeared before him were put to inference and estimation. At last, as the small pieces of puzzles were put together, Lloyd slowly reached a conclusion.

These were used to make Namaran’s Wall.

Chills ran down his spine at the realization. He recalled the scene with Namaran’s Wall in the novel, where Javier experienced dramatic growth after a series of suffering and despair. The story only focused on his heroic feat, not on the mechanics behind the wall.

Yes. This is it. Skulls with black magic. They were buried around the city’s perimeter.

Lloyd stared at the skulls and thought that he could eliminate the dark magic in them if he could dissipate the mana. And he’d be able to prevent the erection of the Namaran’s Wall.

Let’s give it a try.

Lloyd observed the amount of mana concentrated in the skull, and he inspected the Asrahan Core Technique.

Triple Circle level two.

Would mobilizing everything here allow him to discard the concentrated mana inside? Lloyd searched for an objective answer.

I can do it.

He found his answer. And so, there was no need to hesitate.

Ziiing! No one was looking at him just in time, so he activated the Asrahan Core Technique and turned the mana absorption skill to the max. When the tips of his fingers touched the skull...

Hmph.

Exceedingly depressive mana flooded into him like a tsunami.

I can’t eat this. I’ll get sick.

He rotated the three-stranded circle as much as he could, sending the depressing mana flowing into this body to the other side of his hand. The process was delicate and thorough, like untangling a ball of yarn. The mana was sent out into the air little by little. A few minutes later...

“Whoa!”

Lloyd sighed heavily, and though his face turned slightly pale, he wore a satisfying smile on his face.

I did it.

Lloyd wondered if this was what it felt like to be part of the EOD. Thankfully, the three circles held up very well in absorbing and discharging the mana. Now, the gloomy mana, heavily concentrated in the skull, was completely gone. He picked it up to get a closer look.

Clack. Just then, there was a jingling sound inside the skull. He heard something small and hard rolling around.

“Huh?”

Lloyd’s eyes widened when he looked at the inside.

“A jewel?”

Lloyd found a jewel, which looked like an obsidian, placed inside. It was the size of a thumbnail. With one look, Lloyd noticed its glossiness. The jewel looked super expensive.

Hold on. So, the skulls were just a box that held the jewels, and the jewels were what held the concentrated mana. Okay, so since this jewel is normal now that I washed the mana away... Thank you. It’s mine now.

Grin. A capitalistic, avaricious smile appeared on Lloyd’s face, and his heart started to pound at great speed. From then on...

Time for a treasure hunt!

Lloyd’s feet profusely sweated as he ran around the cliff slopes, like a puppy panting as it searched for a bone or a child fishing for bacon in a bacon salad. His eyes reddened as he searched the ground. To resist the evil plan of the dark magicians, to send a stunning gift to his enemies, and to pocket some expensive jewels and fatten his wallets, Lloyd gave everything to this greedy race in the name of justice.

Chapter 167: Undercover (3)

There was a common saying that said, “money doesn’t grow on trees”. It meant money wasn’t something that was freely found. Normally, that was true. You didn’t often find money just lying anywhere on the ground. However, Lloyd’s current situation was a bit different.

Money doesn’t grow on trees? That’s right. It comes from the ground!

Lloyd’s content gaze moved toward the hole he had just bored. About 20 inches deep down, there was a skull. A real one, not the kind used in biology class at school. Any normal person would have shuddered at the sight, but not Lloyd. He was different.

Whew. My precious.

His gaze, which was stuck to the skull, resembled that of a greedy man looking at his golden goose. Or that of a passerby who spotted a 50 dollar bill amid a pile of leaves in the fall. However, this was hardly surprising as the skull contained a precious jewel.

So, in other words, I simply have to clear the concentrated mana, and the jewel will be mine. Like this or that way.

Ziiing! Lloyd rotated his three-strand mana circles with the dream of being filthy rich, sucking the mana pressured in the jewel. The rotation disintegrated the mana structure, and the process was likened to getting rid of the fuse in a time bomb and pulling out a Zenga block from a delicately put pile. He disintegrated and disassembled the mana structure. Then, he moved it to the other side of his arm.

Psssh... The mana, which became innocuous now, dissipated and spread throughout the air. Sometime later, around the time sweat started to drip from his forehead, the dangerous energy loaded in the jewel finally disappeared. A rewarding smile appeared on his face.

Now the jewel is mine. Mwahaha.

Clack! The jewel rolled out of the skull and landed on his palm. How pretty and wonderful it was to behold. He studied the jewel and all its dimensions. Mirth danced in his eyes.

Nice. There isn't even a single blemish. It's perfect.

This was the 24th one. Lloyd had been roaming around Naraman's wall for several hours now, and he discovered 24 skulls and just as many jewels. His bloating pocket pleased him. But it came with a tad bit of guilt.

"I do not know what terrible thing you went through, but may you rest in peace."

After taking the stone, he placed the skull on the ground, giving it a respectful bow. And he set the skull into the sack with care lest he damages it. Three more sacks lay around him, containing all the 24 skulls he had found.

It's a relief that there were clothes in my bag to turn into sacks.

Otherwise, he wouldn't have thought of carrying these many skulls.

Although I can't hold a funeral for them, I should at least bury them in good soil.

These victims were buried without anything else but their skull. And worse, they were abused by no other than dark magicians. So, it went without saying how resentful their souls must be after they were half-heartedly buried in this cold earth with an evil stone planted in their skulls. Lloyd hated to leave them here. Though the job was slightly bothersome and laborious, it was the proper thing to do. The least he could do was give them a proper burial in fertile land. And so, Lloyd made sure to take the skulls along with the stones, so engrossed in the process that the sun was already hanging on the west horizon before he knew it. The night would come soon, and his surroundings would grow dark.

Should I return to the lodging first?

Lloyd took the skull-loaded sacks and placed them in his lodging. And he once again stepped out. This time, he had more sacks with him.

Duh. Why should I stop this treasure hunt just because it's dark?

The hay must be made when the sun shines. The mast must be raised when the wind is good. The same went for keeping the treasures in the ground. Lloyd had to take this chance and abuse it, much like going to a buffet with the intent of expanding your stomach or taking the chance to progress your situationship with your crush after they confessed. As the opportunity presented itself to Lloyd, he had to sweep the entire area for hidden gems, even if it meant pulling an all-nighter.

This opportunity won't last long.

Since the job involved sneaking around and stealing the stones containing dark magicians' magic, it was only a matter of time before they noticed the disappearance of the magic circle they had painstakingly crafted.

I have to take as many as possible before they notice anything. I can do it.

Lloyd rushed out of the castle, so speedily that the callous in his feet started to sweat. It was as though he was darting to a store after it announced a one-day mega sale and giveaway event. He dug, dug, dug, and dug, his every scoop reflecting the heart of a farmer harvesting a bumper crop and a fisher pulling up a net of riches. As a result, Lloyd discovered countless skulls, dissipated the mana in them, and pocketed the jewels. He also earned an unexpected reward in the process.

Ding Dong!

Yes!

Checking the message in front of his eyes, Lloyd clenched his muddy fists. He had been using the Asrahan Core Technique to its maximum capacity as he removed the evil mana in the stones. The job itself turned out to be a great source of training for his skill.

Oh, I made the right choice by coming to Namaran.

Lloyd now desisted from the dark magicians, obtained a boatload of expensive jewels, leveled up his Asrahan Core Technique, and thoroughly checked the construction site for the slope stabilization method. Lloyd, who could utilize the Subterranean Scanning and the Asrahan Core Technique, was the only one able to do all this work at once.

Lalalala! Yes, yes!

He started to hum subconsciously. The humming became his companion and stayed with him all throughout the night he mined the jewels.

“Did something happen to you?”

The next day, around midnight, Lloyd was smugly smiling as he counted the jewels he had scavenged the previous night in his lodging when he heard a familiar voice out the window. It was quite icy. Lloyd turned and found Javier slipping into the window.

Cocking his head, Lloyd asked, “By the way, what tremendous event led to you becoming a flashy lady?”

Javier was making his way through the window in the exact countenance Lloyd had seen the previous day in the soup kitchen. Modest and humble dress. Silky silver hair. He was Lady Ella at the moment. Javier was embarrassed to be in such a fashion, so he wrinkled his nose and spoke.

“I had no choice,” blurted Javier.

“You had no choice? Did you run out of clean clothes to wear?”

“Your response is terribly incorrect and offensive. That is definitely not it,” defied Javier.

“Then?”

“Like I told you, there were areas in Cannavaro’s house that were off-limits.”

“You mean the areas protected by magic?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, the basement.”

“Did you disguise as a woman to peep at the place?”

“Yes,” Javier said as he nodded. “I had no other choice even though I am a sword master. The magical protection can’t be penetrated. So, this was the only way for me to make my way there without being caught.”

Javier frowned slightly, and Lloyd wondered what he was thinking about.

“At first, I didn’t mean to cross-dress. But my face was the problem.”

“Because you’re too handsome?” joked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“What. Are you seriously saying that?”

“It is the undeniable truth.” Javier sounded like he was talking about something very obvious. “I was too conspicuous. I could disguise myself, but my face can’t be altered. So, I thought outside the box.”

“Which was dressing as a woman? Because even if you draw attention, nobody will guess it’s you?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, they will never think even for a second that a renowned knight would put on a woman’s disguise. That’s what I thought and why I did it.”

Javier slightly lifted his front skirt with his hands.

“I was worried a little at first, but no one doubted me.”

“And you are now the ravishing beauty in the city, Lady Ella.”

“Please erase that from your memory...” Javier chuckled, shuddering at the thought. “Anyway, thanks to my disguise, I was able to enter the basement on the fourth day on account of running an errand. But I found the place to be slightly off.”

“In what way?”

“There was another basement in the basement.”

“My, my. Were you able to get in there?” asked Lloyd.

“Not yet. It looked like only the closest cohorts of Cannavaro could enter inside.”

“I see,” said Lloyd, “this is very fishy.”

“Are you still doubting him?”

“Of course.”

Lloyd looked at him, his head cocked in a haughty manner.

“Do you still consider him to be a good man?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes,” said Javier confidently.

“How so?”

“I have not found anything that ties him to be an evil man,” Javier answered. “And he is still spending every minute of his day taking good care of the refugees.”

“Tsk,” said Lloyd, “You’re saying this even after you saw the basement situation?”

“It could be a secret vault, which is common among wealthy families.”

“Then,” Lloyd argued, “why did you disguise as a woman if you plan on defending him?”

“I would like to remind you once again that this is all to fulfill your order to the utmost capacity.”

“That’s a good answer,” Lloyd said sarcastically.

“I learned from you, Master Lloyd.”

“You are brazen.”

“Thank you very much,” answered Javier.

Javier then smiled faintly before asking Lloyd a question.

“By the way, I asked you a while ago, but did something happen to you as well?”

“Hmm? Why?” said Lloyd quizzically.

“The dark circles around your eyes deepened. But strangely, your expression is brighter.”

“Does it show?”

“Yes, very much.”

“Haah. Actually, I discovered these.”

Lloyd brought out one black stone and showed it to him, explaining everything that had taken place the night before. How he had come across a skull in the ground while surveying. How it was concentrated with mana. How removing the mana in the skull made a jewel appear. An incomprehensible expression appeared on Javier’s face after he heard the story.

“So you stole, no, excavated these jewels all night long?” asked Javier.

“Yeah. And I think the skull and the stone have something to do with Cannavaro.”

“Do you have proof?”

“That’s your job to find out from now on,” Lloyd said.

Of course, he didn’t have any evidence yet. There wasn’t a single piece of evidence to prove that Cannavaro was behind the skulls and jewels. However, Lloyd knew.

This is his doing. I’m completely sure.

Lloyd was sure because he had read the novel. Cannavaro was the man responsible for the incident with Namaran’s Wall. And a similar thing was to take place in this world.

“So, I’m telling you,” stated Lloyd. “You said that there is another basement underneath, right? Look into it. There’s got to be something in there.”

“Master Lloyd,” called Javier suggestively. “Did it ever cross your mind that you may be falsely accusing Lord Cannavaro?”

“Yeah, so you’ll have to check if my conviction is wrong or not, right?” asked Lloyd.

“...”

“Moreover, if this jewel really belongs to Cannavaro, something about him will change tomorrow. After all, he’ll think the jewels were stolen. He’ll act differently, or his people will be busy. Try to take advantage of that moment.”

“...”

“What, want to make a bet or something?” joked Lloyd.

“What kind of bet?” asked Javier in a serious tone.

“If I thought wrong and Cannavaro has nothing to do with this, I’ll call you ‘Master’ for a year. That is when no one else is around,” suggested Lloyd.

“Make it three years. How does that sound?”

“What?!”

“Are you scared?” smirked Javier.

“No, not at all. But in case I’m right, you will wear this costume when we return to Frontera county.”

“...”

“Scared?” asked Lloyd.

“No, not at all.”

“Good. But we have to be honest in front of the truth that will be revealed. Got it?”

“Of course. After all, this bet is just for fun.”

That went without saying. Javier, too, sensed something serious was happening in this city when he heard the story of the skulls and jewels. Dark magic. An evil scheme was brewing in this city. Getting an ominous feeling in his gut, Javier nodded in a serious manner.

“Then, I will return as soon as I come across something. Until then, please be safe, Master Lloyd.”

“Good,” said Lloyd. “You too.”

Javier left through the window, and a gust of fresh air came into his room. Lloyd’s head cleared as he breathed in, and it allowed him to go through his plan once more.

I need proof. I need damning evidence that Cannavaro was the one who buried the skulls and jewels.

Once he found it, he would go look for Count Namaran.

Then, let the games begin. Even if Cannavaro is a dark magician, he’ll be arrested on the spot when the knights ambush his place.

If that were to happen, he wouldn’t have to take any action. There would be no need to take on any dangerous risks. And he’d be able to prevent the incident regarding Namaran’s Wall.

So, Javier, I trust you.

Lloyd knew that Javier would be able to do it. Thinking so, Lloyd sat at the table and counted the jewels he spent all night collecting. And the next day, when morning rolled around, Cannavaro’s eyes swelled with rage when he realized that every single noctanium, the cursed stone, he had buried around Namaran’s wall was stolen.

Chapter 168: A Philanthropist's True Colors (1)

“Most of the noctaniums have gone missing in the past two days.”

In the basement of Cannavaro’s manor, which was heavily protected with a host of magical devices, there gathered Cannavaro and 30 dark magicians. Seated around a large and elongated table, these 31 magicians relied on only one flickering candle for sight. Cannavaro lifted his gaze against the dim and gloomy scene. With his hands placed on the table, he noticed a fruit fly flying around.

“...”

He was suddenly curious as to how in the world the fruit fly made its way into this space, which allowed no intruders. Then, he wondered if these creatures just came into existence out of a void. This mystery was unsolvable even with his profound magical knowledge. However, he soon pushed the thought away. Something else mattered more, and it definitely wasn’t a fruit fly. The noctaniums had gone missing. He spoke toward the dark magicians.

“As you all know, each was placed in its location after we considered all potential factors. It sat in the area farthest from the gazes and footsteps of the people coming to Namaran, and it was the place that could create the strongest magical vibration for the wall. And yet, the noctaniums went missing. Every one of them.”

“Could it be that Count Namaran has taken notice of things?”

The magicians were wearing a hood that hung down heavily. One of them spoke. Cannavaro shook his head.

“That is not the case. There are no signs that he is on the move,” replied Cannavaro.

“And yet the skulls and noctaniums went missing in the past two days?”

“It is the case, even though it sounds hardly believable.”

“...”

A heavy silence hung over everyone. Cannavaro spoke to break it away.

“We do not know who did this. But an organization or individual with unexpectedly great power is certainly behind this.”

“It is certainly the case. The skulls bore countless magical spells that prevented any robbery, including magic that evades detection.”

It indeed was the case. That was why everyone had lowered their guard. They believed with a firm conviction that no one would be able to discover these skulls, and even if it happened, removing the magic would be an impossibility. But reality turned out to be different.

The magic in the skulls was lifted? And all the noctaniums have disappeared.

Everyone was flustered, and they felt empty. It was like a year’s worth of harvest was stolen in one day. They clenched their fists in rage, recalling the blood, sweat, and tears they put in to produce and bury the noctaniums. But now wasn’t the time to be consumed in anger. Cannavaro, controlling his anger, raked over everyone with his cool gaze.

“Now, let us think objectively,” he suggested, “what’s gone is gone now. There is no point in focusing on what is no longer in our hands.”

“Then, what do you plan on doing?”

“We cannot let this small tribulation become a hurdle to our great cause,” he answered.

“That means...?”

“We will push ahead with the revolt as planned.”

“But how can we?”

One of the dark magicians asked, and his question received several affirming nods from the others. Installing the noctaniums took a lot of time and effort. But the day of the revolution was coming soon, and there was only one final preparation left.

“Our revolution is impossible without the noctaniums. I thought you knew that better than any of us...”

“I know it very well,” Cannavaro replied coolly.

“Then?”

“Instead of installing the skulls, we can activate the wall ourselves. Then, it will go according to schedule without delay.”

“But-”

The dark magician’s mouth, which was revealed under the hood, jerked in dismay. But before they could rebut him, Cannavaro interrupted.

“After all, the skulls were our vehicle in the first place, a proxy to ensure we won’t have to erect the wall on our own.”

“Yes, that’s right. It is important that we do not expose our identity during the revolution.”

“But think about what is important.”

“...”

“Our identities staying hidden? Or is our revolution coming to fruition?”

“...”

“I presume no one in this room will tell us that our safety comes first, am I wrong?” demanded Cannavaro as his gaze swept across everyone at the table.

“Well, that’s-”

“Aren’t I right?”

“...”

Cannavaro’s eyes held a glint of madness. The dark magicians clamped their mouths shut altogether.

“Originally, I wouldn’t have chosen this option, but our hands are tied. The revolution must proceed as scheduled. I’m sure all of you already know. This affair is bigger than us. Our job is only one of the many cogwheels that revolve toward a grander scheme. In other words, our delay will only become an obstacle to the entire group,” argued Cannavaro. “There cannot be any more delay or postponement. We must move forward on our own. But we do not have to take on all the risk like a fool.”

“Do you have any plan in mind?” one of the magicians asked.

“I am thinking of activating the wall at the safest moment.”

“By the safest moment...”

“When the knights in the city all remain in the castle,” replied Cannavaro.

“Oh...!”

Everyone gaped in amazement. Yes. The noctanium wall they planned on erecting was a powerful curse that concentrated life into one place after absorbing the energies of every creature inside the wall. And no one could cross to the other side once it was up. No one could enter from the outside or leave. Penetrating it was impossible unless the person was a sword master. So, if they put up the wall at a time when the knights and other forces were within the castle, no one would be able to come out of it. And they’d be sucked out of life. That alone would eliminate all the enemies that threatened them.

“How about we mobilize reinforced zombies as guards?” one of them suggested.

“Good idea.”

“But I am still concerned. If we expose ourselves when we do not know who stole the noctaniums...”

“You have nothing to worry about.”

“Do you have a backup plan?” asked a dark magician.

“I will protect you all.”

“Are you saying you will protect us?”

“Of course, I will. After all, you all deserve at least that much protection,” answered Cannavaro.

“Oh...”

At last, a sense of relief rushed through everyone. They can stay rest assured if Cannavaro was out there to protect them. He was that much of a powerful dark magician.

“Besides, the defensive magic, a corollary to the magical wall, will protect you all on its own. Only a sword master can hurt you. Otherwise, not a single soul can even touch a strand of your hair. With my protection on top of that, there is nothing you should be afraid of.”

“You speak the truth. I am now relieved.”

The dark magicians grinned, and Cannavaro did so, too, as he looked at them.

Fools.

The promise of giving them protection was obviously a lie. These magicians were nothing but replaceable goods to Cannavaro. Sure, though it was slightly a waste for them to die so easily, nothing mattered more than activating the wall. Once it was activated, there was no way to stop it other than break the wall itself.

“So, now, let us flesh out our plan.”

Hiding his heart that was as venomous as a viper, Cannavaro smiled with great satisfaction.

A few days passed.

Now, let's go over the plan once more.

Javier sat as he pondered hard. He stared at his apron, and it was wet because he had intentionally spilled water there. The insides of both his skirt and shoes were wet as well.

"My goodness, what should I do?"

A woman stamped her feet in anxiety, for she thought she was responsible for the spill. That was understandable as Javier bumped into her stealthily and on purpose. And he had let go of the bucket in his hand at that very moment by design.

"My golly! Please watch where you are going, ma'am," said Javier.

"It could have been worse. Miss Ella? Are you hurt?"

People, who were moving food ingredients in the soup kitchen, lashed out at the woman. She apologized several times, thinking that it was her doing. Javier put on a soft smile.

"I am all right," cooed Javier.

"Far from it. Your skirt and shoes are a mess. Whew. You could've hurt your pretty feet because of me. So, do you have clothes and shoes to change into?"

"Um..."

"I suppose you don't."

"..."

She looked more apologetic right now. Javier, too, felt sorry as the pang of guilt attacked his conscience. But he didn't show it. Instead, he simply hung his head and rubbed his hands. That alone did wonders.

"Then, will you change into mine? I left them in the small quarter beside the food storage. Do you know where it is?" the woman asked.

"..."

"It may not be your size, but I am sure it will be better than working in a wet skirt. Go and change, all right? I'm asking because I feel bad."

"Thank you, ma'am."

"Don't even worry about it. It was my fault."

"..."

I sincerely apologize madam, Javier apologized internally as he bowed inside his mind. Then, he hurried out of the kitchen. But he didn't go to the storage as she'd told him. Instead, he made for the Cannavaro's house.

He goes to the basement at this hour.

Javier learned this fact after a few days of observation. He wouldn't have learned this had he not volunteered in the kitchen as a woman and, by chance, ran an errand in the basement. So today, he meant to look into the second floor of the basement. That was why he'd spilled the bucket. He needed an excuse to leave the kitchen.

Sprint! Javier moved like the wind. And his wet apron and clothes hardly mattered at all. One marvelous wringing. That was all it took to lose most water dripping down. And when Javier arrived at Cannavaro's manor, he cut across the garden through the blind spots and rushed into the small door behind the garden. Thankfully, he didn't bump into anyone on the first floor. Like a shadow, he then slipped down to the basement, where the gate stood shut in front of him. It was bolted shut with a magical lock. Javier raised his hand.

Ziiing! Javier rotated one magic circle as he recalled the mana pattern he had seen a few days ago. The mana pattern was in the magical key the butler used to go in and out of this door.

Crackle...! A geometrical shape of mana appeared along his fingertips, and his mana smeared into the lock as it followed the precise and accurate mana pattern. The lock then shone.

Clack. The lock opened.

Perfect.

Javier's eyes glimmered. Surely, he held enough power and strength to break or smash the magical lock as he pleased. But he could not do so. It would leave a trace, which would put the others on alert. This was the moment his efforts of a few days to make his way into the basement came through. Just like that, Javier entered the basement.

"..."

Javier cut across the dim and unpopulated basement and later found a stair that led to the second floor of the basement. But instead of going any further, he stopped in the corner and stood breathless, even stabilizing his palpitating heart and blood flow. Every rhythm in his body and energy were made to harmonize with his surroundings. In other words, he removed all traces of his presence from the area. Then, he waited. First, for ten minutes. Later, for thirty minutes. And when his waiting reached about an hour, Javier heard footsteps from afar.

Step. Step... Someone was approaching, their steps were careful. Javier noticed that the man studied his surroundings at each step to check for anyone hiding around or following behind him. He seemed to have an unwarranted amount of awareness of his surroundings.

Cannavaro.

Javier's eyes were slightly contracted. Cannavaro was down in the basement with a careful look on his face, and he stood in front of the gate to the second floor of the basement, with Javier watching him. Then he fished something out of his pocket. A mana-loaded key. Bzzt!

The mana inside the key entered the lock, vibrating and rotating the magic circle. The lock opened. Clack!

Cannavaro looked around once more before heading down to the second floor of the basement. The door finally closed, and the magical bolt was locked. Afterward, Javier stood in the corner without moving for the next 30 minutes until Cannavaro came out again, passed Javier, walked up, and disappeared. But Javier remained rooted to the ground and remained still like a statue. Only when he could not feel Cannavaro's presence did he move again.

"Whew."

Javier was at the gate that led to the second-floor basement. He stretched his hand toward the lock and recalled the mana flow and pattern the key gave off when Cannavaro pulled it out of his pocket. Javier reenacted the same mana pattern using his Asrahan Core Technique. He succeeded in copying it.

Clack. The magical lock opened.

"..."

Javier collected his breath, asking himself what would lie beneath down there and whether what he was doing at the moment was right. That is, his current actions as he was secretly digging around someone's background.

"..."

If Mister Cannavaro's basement was revealed to be nothing special, that is, if it was a secret vault of any other rich men, Javier promised to himself that he would grab Lloyd by the collar and declare that he must accept defeat and keep his promise. Thinking so, Javier grabbed the doorknob and turned it. It opened.

Creak. The door created dissonance as it revealed the basement. And the truth was revealed at the same time.

“Grrr?”

A zombie, aimlessly going around with its head missing, stretched his two arms at Javier.

“Grrr?”

A body turned Javier’s way, and Javier saw it lacked a head. It then leaped toward him as its rotting neck jerked spasmodically, its two limping arms outstretched.

“Grrrrr!”

“...!”

He could hardly believe how fast it was, starkly contrasting its limp movement. It reached Javier in a blink of an eye, its tar nails bent on scratching his face. But the very opponent it went against was no other than Javier. In other words, it was out of luck.

Bam! Javier’s legs moved before the zombie could scratch his face, and he kicked it in the gut at the speed of lightning.

“Grr-!”

The zombie, whose voice came out from what was left of its throat, cried aloud strangely as it was sent away by the blow, probably around five yards ahead. The blow shattered its spine when it crashed against the wall. The bone-cracking sound noisily rang aloud throughout the room, and at the same time, the doors on both sides of the corridor snapped open.

“Grrrrr!”

“Grr...!”

More headless zombies flooded out of the doors. That number was about 60. A bitter smile formed on Javier’s face.

“My... Looks like I will become a laughingstock when I return to my fiefdom for a while.”

The sight called to mind the bet he'd made with Lloyd, who insisted Cannavaro was a dirty man with secrets. But he disagreed. He thought that the young master was doubting the man unnecessarily and his order to do a background check on the gentleman was improper. Cannavaro didn't deserve such doubts. That was why he agreed to the bet.

Haa. I cannot believe I have to dress like this when I return to the fiefdom.

Lady Ella. An angel dressed in a modest apron. A goddess of the soup kitchen. Javier was to put on such a disguise the day he returned to Frontera fiefdom. That would be his punishment for losing the bet.

"..."

Javier shuddered, and his hair rose as he thought about it. So, he pushed it away and instead laid his eyes on the sight that was much less frightening than the praises he would earn as Lady Ella in his fiefdom.

"Grrrrrr!"

Roughly 60 headless zombies charged toward him, and the gurgling sound they created clamored in the air. Their hostility was more apparent than before.

Are these reinforced zombies?

They were too fast for an ordinary zombie, and it naturally meant that they would be on another level in terms of strength compared to ordinary ones. But it didn't matter to Javier, who was a sword master. To him, both reinforced and ordinary zombies were nothing but walking corpses. It was the case even when he only carried a block of wood instead of his sword.

Crack!

Javier stretched out his hand and snapped off a leg from a table. Now, he held an excellent club. But did he prepare the club because he needed a weapon? No. It was as the thought of punching the zombies with his bare hands grossed him out.

Craaack! Crack! Pow!

Javier's legs alternately moved across the floor, turning and twisting just in time to stab, jab, smack, smite, evade, and shake off the zombies.

Tumble! Kaboom!

Three or four zombies were thrown against the walls each time Javier charged forward through the corridor, and at last, every one of the reinforced zombies was cleared. And when he reached the end of the corridor, he kicked the door open.

Boom! The door snapped open in whole by force, and it landed on a man who was pulling out a weapon.

"Ack!!!"

Now, the door was metal and easily weighed more than ten pounds. Adding the velocity, it was as menacing as any other deadly weapon. The blow knocked him unconscious, but Javier was merciless.

Crunch! He smacked the man's legs with his club and broke them. At the same time, he kicked his six o'clock.

Pow!

"Argh!"

A man, who was trying to ambush Javier from behind, got a blow in his lower chin. He was left unconscious as well. Next, Javier stretched out his club and aimed at the third man's eyes. Javier gazed at him icily.

"Tell me. What you are doing here, and what you're up to. And your relationship with Cannavaro."

"E...eek!"

The third man shivered like a leaf. He was so surprised that he had wet his pants.

Wh-what is this monster?!

The man could not believe this. When he heard the noise of someone walking down to the second floor, he thought it was Cannavaro. But it dawned on him that he was wrong when the first zombie got rammed into the wall. There was an intruder. So he immediately released the other zombies and observed the corridor from a small window attached to a door. The man was hopeful until that point. After all, these 60 zombies were reinforced ones, so he thought that they would be able to rip this intruder to pieces and that he would hear a live man's scream after a long while. So, he remained in his room, watching the fight with an expectant heart. But he saw it. He saw how the groups of zombies were thrown into the walls in mere seconds and how this silver-haired intruder dashed over here afterward. And so, the guy racked his brain, and at last, the name of this intruder, who was pointing at him with a club, came to him.

"E-Ella! Miss Ella?"

"..."

"What are you doing?" The man begged. "You know me, don't you? It's me, the guy who works in the kitchen during the morning-"

"Say that name again," growled Javier, "and you shall never be able to speak again."

Hiccup! Javier's eyes held a glint of iciness, which was colder than an ice rink. The man immediately shut his mouth, intimidated by the former's gaze. And he finally realized that no petty tricks would work. This silver-haired man standing before him was bent on making no concession.

"Wh-what do you want?"

"Truth," said Javier curtly.

"..."

“I asked you a while ago. Your business here. Your plans. And your relationship with Cannavaro. Tell me everything.”

“...”

The man rolled his eyes, laying them on his two colleagues, miserably lying on the ground. But that was a mistake.

Bam!

“...!”

One of his knees was directly hit by a club that suddenly came flying toward him.

“Urghh!”

The man fell to the ground as he clutched his leg. But Javier’s gaze didn’t have any sympathy.

“I’m sure you guys made those headless zombies. But why are they without any heads? Where could they be used for? I think I know,” said Javier.

The things Lloyd had told him several nights before came to his mind. His young master had told him that the former had found plenty of skulls under the ground, which contained mana-loaded jewels. The skulls. The mana-laden jewels. The headless zombies. Javier desperately wished it wasn’t what he thought it was as the puzzles pieced together in his head.

“Speak now. Each time you hesitate, stall, or lie, I’ll break your bones.”

Javier’s gaze was filled with contempt and rage. The man could feel it burning through him as he sat on his knees. He knew that Ella was serious. Her threat wasn’t a bluff.

“I-I...”

The man immediately spoke as fear overwhelmed him by instinct.

“I am a mortician. S-So, are all these men...”

“A mortician?” blurted Javier.

“Yes, sir!”

“Am I the one that’s confused?” asked Javier. “I thought morticians conducted funerals for people, not make zombies.”

“T-the thing is that I learned it from Sir Cannavaro!”

“From Cannavaro?”

“Yes, sir!” hurriedly answered the man.

“Tell me more.”

Javier’s gaze grew bleak, and the man started to speak faster.

“A-as I told you, we were originally morticians. But around the end of last year, mister Cannavaro came up to me and asked if I could help with something that would be worth a lot of money. H-he promised to provide a generous compensation that’s better than I could even imagine...” the man explained.

“So, you learned how to make zombies?”

“H-how else could we have learned to use dark magic then? W-we simply were responsible for taking care of the corpses mister Cannavaro gives us,” defended the mortician.

“Then what about the magic that makes zombies?” probed Javier.

“Mister Cannavaro... And the others...”

“Who?”

“There’s mister Gordo... And mister Mikelan... And most of them work in the trading post. So, those who manage the post and write records with mister Cannavaro...”

“The workers in the trading post are dark magicians?”

“Yes, yes, sir! I didn’t believe it at first-”

“Then,” interrupted Javier, “why don’t the zombies have heads?”

Javier’s voice was as sharp as cut glass. The Adam’s apple of the mortician bobbed.

“Um...”

“Answer.”

Grip!

When he heard the squeezing sound, the mortician shook off all his hesitation.

“We took care of the head separately.”

“Be more specific,” ordered Javier.

“Um, you see, the thing is... when the corpses arrived, we removed the head first before we cleaned them up. We were told that the skulls were going to be used for a special purpose. So, we cleaned everything inside, leaving only the bone...”

“And?”

“We placed it in all sorts of different solutions. Yes, those were provided to us by mister Cannavaro. I don’t know the exact details either. He said that it was just a valuable magical potion... There were about 15 distinct kinds.”

“That many?”

“Yes, sir. I believe around two days per solution. It took a whole month to treat a single skull using all the potions. Unsurprisingly, we continued to treat a new skull every two days since there were a lot of different solutions...”

“Then what?”

“Mister Cannavaro and the men in the trading post cast all sorts of magic to it. But we didn’t notice any visible changes,” the man said. “Yet, they all took the skulls with a look of satisfaction. That’s all I know about the skulls... I am telling the truth.”

“No, that’s not all.”

Javier’s face turned stern.

“I get how the skulls are made and how those headless zombies were created. But there seems to be something you have left out. Where did you get the corpses for the skulls and zombies?”

“That’s...”

“Tell me.”

“I-I’m sorry. I really am sorry. Please forgive my crime,” the man said and broke out in tears.

Javier’s eyes remained stern, unmoved. His icy gaze continued to pierce into the man, who flinched and quickly wiped off his tears with a shudder.

“They are... refugees,” the man finally confessed.

“What?” Javier’s voice grew by a pitch.

“They are the refugees mister Cannavaro looked after. They were already sick. Diseased or fatally injured-”

“So, you killed them?”

“Yes...”

“You do know that them being sick doesn’t justify your actions?”

“Th-that’s...”

“And you must have lied to the remaining refugees.”

Javier felt dehumanized, and his mind flew back to what had happened a few days ago. The refugees talked among themselves in the kitchen, how some were being transferred to a protective facility, and how it would be helpful as the place was warmer and more comfortable. But not everyone could be taken there due to its capacity limit...

Most refugees wanted to be taken there. They wished that those who went ahead would be healed completely to open up some slots for them. They waited. Counting down for their day to come.

But it turned out that the place was here. This place of death. The comfortable protective facility didn’t exist in the first place. Javier, wrinkling his nose, asked.

“I heard that there were almost 200 of them,” Javier said.

“Sir?”

“The jewels. The number of skulls that contained those jewels.”

“...”

“I didn’t hear that there were almost 200 terminally ill patients among the refugees.”

“Th-that’s...”

“You couldn’t have possibly killed those that weren’t terminally ill, right?”

“...”

“You did,” Javier said.

“Th-the thing is!” the mortician shouted in a hurry.

“You see! I was told that it was a medicine that makes them comfortable! I really thought so! That’s why, that’s why!”

“You gave it. That is, to the refugees. That’s how you killed them.”

“I really didn’t know!” the mortician pleaded.

“Really?”

“Yes, sir! Yes!”

“Really”?

“Sir...?”

“Who brings a patient to be treated by a mortician? A medicine that provides comfort? What, does the mortician nurse the patient after they take the medicine and get comfortable? Doesn’t that sound ridiculous even in your ears?” demanded Javier.

“Um...”

“Enough with your lies and excuses.”

“Please... Don’t kill me!”

The mortician fell flat on the ground and burst into uncontrollable sobs, his back flinching.

“I sincerely didn’t know this was the job! I just did what I was told. S-so please, extend your mercy-”

“I’m not going to kill you.”

“Sir?”

“I’m not going to kill you,” said Javier again.

“Then that means... T-thank you, sir! Thank you!” The man shouted as he bumped his head to the ground several times in gratitude.

“I am not going to kill you,” said Javier, whose face had grown icier than before. “But do you remember what I told you a while ago?”

“Sir? What are...”

“Each time you lie, I’m going to break one of your bones.”

“Um, I-I...!”

Thwack! The club swung in the air, and it smacked the mortician’s shoulder. The mortician’s face crumpled at the sound of his broken bone.

“A-ack!!”

The mortician collapsed to the ground as he clutched his shoulder. But Javier’s eyes were merciless as he gazed down.

“A medicine that gives comfort? You did not know anything? You merely did what you were just told...? Your excuses are too sloppy and crude. Did you want to try being a good person even in the end? But I don’t think the fairly large amount of money you’d have accepted from Cannavaro reflects that.”

“A-argh! Please d-don’t kill me-”

“I told you,” said Javier coldly,” I am not going to kill you.”

“...!”

Javier lifted his club again. And soon after, the sound of three or four consecutive thrashes rang aloud.

A little later, Javier went out of the basement. He was now dressed in something else. His silky hair and modest apron had disappeared. Instead, he wore a black hood that the dark magicians left hanging on the wall. Javier's face was stern and serious under the hood.

I don't have any time to waste.

The truth he had discovered in the basement. The situation he had uncovered through punishing the morticians.

It's more serious than I'd thought. Cannavaro and the dark magicians in the trading post are up to something. I can't leave them like this.

Informing Lloyd and Count Namaran crossed his mind. It was the right thing to do in principle. But he decided that right now was an exception.

Cannavaro and the dark magicians might catch on if the count gets involved.

That would really be the case. If the knights and forces moved to Cannavaro's manor to search and apprehend him, they would lose the opportunity to catch the dark magicians. They might hide and run away.

Master Lloyd, please forgive me. I need to take care of them first.

Act first, report later. Javier made for the trading post after he reached the decision, carrying a sword in his chest covered with a hood and cape.

Chapter 170: In Front of Namaran’s Wall (1)

A trading post. It was a place that bustled with merchants and facilitated the exchange of goods and currencies between cities. The same went for the trading post in Namaran. It was the most frequented place among the southern and eastern merchants in the kingdom. Although it had grown quieter over the months when the east was wiped out, it was still vibrant nonetheless. However, that wasn’t true today.

“...”

Silence. That was Javier’s first impression of the place when he arrived. There was too much silence when it should have been crowded and jam-packed with people. There were no people in sight, nor any carriages or carts that should have been rolling by at this hour. The laborers, who should be sweating as they carried the cargo, and the merchants, who should be haggling in high-pitched voices, were nowhere to be seen. Not a single person could be found in the front yard of the trading post and the unloading station.

It couldn’t be.

Javier was slightly furrowed, his forehead revealing only somewhat under the hood. Something was happening right now. The truth he had found out in the basement and the silent scene of the trading post overwhelmed Javier with nervousness.

Boom! Javier entered the trading post by kicking its door. Empty. No one was inside. The clerk who should be welcoming merchants when they arrive was also absent.

“...”

Wondering if they had noticed already, Javier raked through the place from the basement to the third floor. But he didn’t find a single soul. It reminded him of an abandoned ship that was in perfectly good condition.

How is this possible? Did they already realize that I found out about their basement?

No, Javier concluded, there was not enough time for that. He had come here as soon as he learned the truth. To do that, he had delayed making a report to Lloyd and Count Namaran.

Five minutes.

That was how long it took for him to arrive here from Cannavaro's house. So, it was unrealistic for Cannavaro and the dark magicians to have realized their predicament and flee after cleaning out this place.

There was not enough time for that. Then why? How is this possible?

Javier debated whether to rush to Lloyd or conduct more searches around the premises. He anxiously walked some more with a lot on his mind. But the moment he grabbed the doorknob to leave...

Boom! A thundering noise blared across the land. But it didn't come from the sky. It came from everywhere around him. Outside the trading post. From all directions. A banging noise, a din of something exploding, roared all around him. At the same time, his stomach churned.

"...!"

His stomach tightened in a flash. His heart started pounding against his will. His vision shook. His mind became foggy in a second. And mana simultaneously slipped out of his body into the air!

What the?

If he wasn't a sword master capable of infinitely circulating mana and instinctively using the Asrahan Core Technique to harness the force of the abundant mana around him, he would have passed out right then and there.

"Argh...!"

Javier shifted his manaheart in a hurry and activated the Asrahan Core Technique. The three-stranded circles rotated to the hilt.

Ziiing! The circles roared as they stopped the sudden discharge of his mana, and it was only then that his stomach and heart calmed down. His vision returned, and his mind cleared.

What in the world is happening?

Javier was shocked perhaps because the air around him had changed so drastically. He wondered if this was the feeling of having the air around you suck the life out of your body. That was when it hit him.

My mana is trying to escape out of my body into the air at a menacing speed.

It was happening even now. So, he had to continue using the Asrahan Core Technique. Otherwise, if his mana circle stopped spinning, he would experience the same thing again.

What in the world just happened?

The blaring noise echoed across the land. The anomalous phenomenon that came after. Something was happening right now. He opened the door, feeling sinister every minute. Then he saw it.

“No...”

The city was enclosed by a giant wall, but it wasn’t physical. It was made of a purplish mana that had a color close to black. It swayed like a heat simmer, wrapping the whole city at a fierce speed. It was hundreds of feet tall, towering over the castle easily and bent on piercing the sky. When the sky above the city was covered with the color of its energy, the sun lost its shine. Its light was now perverted into something purple and beamed down everywhere. And the main road was littered with unconscious people. Every single person in his line of sight was on the ground.

“Hello?” Javier asked after running to one person on the ground. She was an old woman with rich white hair.

“Ah... Ha...”

She was unconscious, and her whole body was shivering. Eyes rolled back, her mouth was overflowing with foam.

“Shoot...”

She was losing mana, much like before he activated the Asrahan Core Technique. But unlike him, she had no means to defend herself. But she wasn’t alone. All of the people on the ground met the same fate as her and went through the same experience. Though Javier couldn’t pinpoint the cause, he could guess somewhat. It was the wall. This sinister mana wall that had surrounded the city. That indeed had something to do with what was happening. It was possible, Javier thought, that the wall was sucking people’s mana out, even the basic amount that was required for survival. Then what about Lloyd?

“Master Lloyd.”

Javier’s heart sank. He wouldn’t be able to push through. It was so even when he had the Asrahan Core Technique and was a mid-level sword expert. He wouldn’t last because he wasn’t a sword master and didn’t learn how to circulate the mana infinitely. He may last a few more minutes, but that would be it. Eventually, he would lose consciousness and be left incapable of using the Asrahan Core Technique as he’s mercilessly robbed of all his mana. And just like that, he would die.

“I apologize for failing to protect you... But I promise I will fix this situation. So, please hold on until then. Please,” Javier apologized as he put her down under a shade.

There was nothing more he could do other than give a heartfelt apology. The only way to save this old woman and all the unconscious people around him was to resolve the situation as soon as possible. Javier ran forward with that in mind. He crossed the main road in front of the trading post, sprinted across the plaza, and rushed toward the Count Namaran manor. He noticed people lying on the road and those convulsing in the plaza. He even caught the woman from the soup kitchen passed out on the floor. Each time, he bit his lips and ran faster. He sprinted and sprinted, even using up the last bit of mana he had left after activating the manaheart to prevent him from being sucked dry. At last, he arrived at the lodging for the visitors.

“Master Lloyd!”

Bam! He entered after kicking the door and searched for Lloyd. But he was nowhere to be found. Lloyd was not here. Javier sank to his knees.

Where is he?

Javier told himself that he had to hurry and locate Master Lloyd. That was the only way he could save Lloyd and everyone in the city.

Master Lloyd undoubtedly seemed to know something.

Upon more thinking, that was true from the beginning. Javier recalled how Lloyd was suspicious of Cannavaro from the moment Lady Namaran arrived at Frontera fiefdom. And how the latter suddenly inquired about Cannavaro on the first encounter. As such, Javier told himself that Master Lloyd knew something as well as the way to solve this situation. His wisdom. My power. We must work together and help each other out, Javier concluded. That was the only way to save everyone in the city. But... Lloyd was nowhere in sight.

“Master Lloyd!”

Javier tore the whole place down to look for him, his voice growing more hurried and alert.

“Ah, not here either?”

Stab! A metal shovel dug into the earth, and beads of sweat dripped down near the shovel head stuck deep into the ground. Lloyd’s lips pursed together as he took in the sight.

“It looks like I came down here for nothing.”

Lloyd lifted his head as he grumbled and looked up at the upper part of the cliff slope. About 30 feet above stood Namaran. Lloyd was way farther down from the sloped cliff of the city, and he was here for a simple reason. To get his hands on more jewels.

Previously, I only searched around the wall.

He had obtained about 200 pieces of jewels that way. Though he was pleased, he wanted some more. He wanted to acquire more jewels as this was a rare opportunity. That was when it hit him that he hadn’t traveled to the lower part of the slope yet.

I had no reason to hesitate.

There wasn’t much to lose from trying. He just needed to break some sweat and do a little more work. From that, he could get lucky and obtain more expensive jewels. So, he immediately took the shovel and sack with him and worked his butt off, exploring the lower part of the slope. But his efforts turned out to be in vain.

“Tsk,” said Lloyd, “I thought I saw a skull.”

Was it around two or three times? He did find some skulls buried underground with his Subterranean Scanning. However, he joyfully dug the earth only to find out they were ordinary skulls. There was no mana or jewel in them.

I think these are actually the bones of those who were executed during ancient times.

“Tsk,” clucked Lloyd again.

Was I too greedy?

He had come to test his luck, to see whether he still had a shot at coming across treasures. But it looked like he was out of luck this time.

Ugh. I'm done. I'm done! I should rest today.

He had sweated enough. Thinking so, Lloyd took the metal shovel and empty sack.

"Ggoming?" Lloyd asked as he looked inside his inner pocket. "Are you asleep?"

"Ggoming...?"

"Tsk. Never mind. Go back to sleep."

Lloyd laughed when he saw Ggoming lifting his head with half-closed eyes after dozing off in his pocket. Lloyd had thought for a split second of riding Ggoming back to the city. But come to think of it again, he realized that it would be wasteful to use a red sunflower seed that way.

I'll just walk to get some exercise.

After packing up, Lloyd started to walk around the road that circled the cliff slope. The late summer breeze felt fresh for the first time in a while.

"The weather is nice."

And the searing heat was no longer painful as a cloud covered the sun just in time. He started to hum before he knew it. But just then, the cloud darkened without any warning. It changed from a fluffy white cloud to a dark thundercloud. At the same time, he noticed a strange vibration of mana coming from the city.

"Huh?"

What is it? What's happening? Lloyd was puzzled. He alternately looked at the sky and the city. Just then, a nearly black mana wall with a purple hue started to get erected.

Bzzt!

"...!"

The wall rocked as it went up like a fog. Then it surged upward at great speed, covering the sun, tearing the cloud, and engulfing the city. Lloyd's eyes widened.

What the? No way. Is that Namaran's Wall?

Lloyd wanted to violently rub his eyes. He couldn't believe the sight he was seeing.

It seems like that is the Namaran's Wall. I mean, it's the same as the illustration I'd seen in the novel. But how is this possible? How?

Lloyd couldn't understand. Surely, he had gotten rid of the skulls and jewels and destroyed the magic circles that enabled the wall. But to his dismay, as though his efforts were all for nothing, the Namaran's Wall was rising up, enclosing the city. And with its dreary, evil, and nauseating energy, it started to usurp all the mana and life that was inside the city wall. It was after he made this realization...

"Dammit. Ggoming!"

Lloyd hurriedly woke Ggoming up.

"I'm sorry. I'll explain later. Eat this first."

"G-ggoming!"

Ggoming seemed to have felt the ominous energy as he was dozing off. He was already wide awake even before Lloyd woke him up. He immediately ate the sunflower seed and grew gigantic. Wham!

"Let's go! Above!"

"Ggoming!"

Lloyd hopped on Ggoming, who started to fly up. And they arrived at the city after passing the cliff slopes in mere seconds. But entering the city was impossible.

It's really Namaran's Wall.

Lloyd bit his lips hard. From the sky, he was able to perceive the overall outline of the wall. The blackish-purple mana wall. That opaque wall had completely surrounded the city. There was not a single gap in it. Not even a bird or fly could pass through.

I can't break this.

He wasn't powerful enough. It wouldn't be enough, even if he used the triple mana blast. This cursed wall couldn't be broken even with a sword master's aura. Lloyd wondered if what he was feeling at the moment was what Javier felt in the novel.

Seriously, how did this happen?

Lloyd had put his nose to the grindstone to prevent this situation from happening. But now the wall was up. Lloyd nibbled his lips as he stood before it. I must do something, but what? He asked himself. He must find a way, a way to shatter the wall instead of glancing at the wall so helplessly.

Should I use my RP? Do I need to become a sword master by leveling up my manaheart? No, I don't have enough RP for that. There's a much higher chance that I'll only become a high-level sword expert. Then, should I Ievel up the Asrahan Core Technique? What if I increase the number of circles and use a quadra mana blast instead of the triple? Will that do it?

But Lloyd shook his head.

No. A quadra mana blast won't be enough. The number of blasts doesn't matter here. What matters is combining the mana blast with an aura.

He needed to combine his mana blast with an aura, which held the strength to slice through almost anything. But he couldn't do it. He wasn't a sword master.

Then what am I supposed to do...

Lloyd felt stuck. And just then, he spotted something on the ground.

“A person?”

Lloyd noticed people scattered all around the wall. There were about 90 people, and it looked like they were in groups of three. Their clothes strangely looked familiar to his eyes. Dark robe. Dark hood. They were exactly the same as the illustration in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

“They’re the dark magicians!”

A grin appeared on Lloyd’s face. He was happy. Just in time! He shouted internally. He had been racking his brain on how to break through that wall. And here they were. The creators of that wall. For now, it would do to beat them to a pulp. That would enlighten Lloyd on how to discard the wall.

You can take back the wall that’s nothing but a nuisance!

Swish! Gripping his shovel hard, Lloyd ordered Ggoming to take a nosedive toward the nearest dark magician.

Chapter 171: In Front of Namaran’s Wall (2)

Swooosh! The wind brushed past his ear. Everything in front of his eyes shrunk as the extreme speed overwhelmed his vision. It was incomparably faster than the rollercoaster he had ridden before. But he felt fine and wanted to know why.

It’s do or die now!

Lloyd exclaimed internally. The situation commanded him to take swift action as the wall was now put up and more people inside the city were collapsing to the ground with every passing second. He didn’t have any hesitation left after having that thought. But did he feel that way because he was a man of justice?

To be honest, no... It’s just that the person who’s paying me is in there!

Namaran could not be destroyed. What was more, Count Namaran could not die. The two had to be protected, and the construction had to be completed, so he could get paid. Burning with such determination, Lloyd gripped the shovel in one hand and lowered his body as Ggoming made a steep descent.

Let’s go!!!

The ground neared, and he saw a black-robed man standing there, his outstretched arms facing the wall. There was a mysterious and gloomy mana flowing around him. Lloyd was certain that he was a dark magician. Lloyd’s eyes glimmered.

“Ggoming, now!” yelled Lloyd.

“Ggoming!”

Lloyd gave the saddle a hard tug, and Ggoming spread out his wings, shifting to horizontal flight after a vertical drop. Ggoming then glided across the ground, keeping the drop speed intact and hurtling toward the magician. When Ggoming brushed past the man, Lloyd immediately lifted his metal shovel and wielded it to strike the warlock's thigh.

Got you!

The blow was impossible to withstand. He was likely to collapse to the ground, grabbing the foot. Lloyd would then figure out a way to neutralize the wall after suppressing him. It was at that moment, that moment when Lloyd drew that hopeful picture in his head, that his metal shovel bounced with a massive repelling force.

"...!"

Lloyd almost lost the shovel as his right grip went numb. In all seriousness, had it not been for the shovel skill and his mid-level sword expert status, the shovel would have left his hands.

"Argh!"

However, holding on to the shovel turned out to be his misfortune. His shovel recoiled and he was forced to bend backward, pushing Ggoming to do just the same.

"G-ggoming!"

Ggoming immediately lost his balance, and his right wing jerked when Lloyd's torso violently tugged to the right. As the direction drastically went to the left, Ggoming lost both altitude and balance. He flapped his wings in a hurry to restore balance and fly up. But it was too late.

"Ggo...ming!"

"Argh!"

In a split second, the ground neared him much too roughly. Crush!

"...!"

Drop. Crash. Twist. The ground and sky swirled around Lloyd dozens of times. He couldn’t pull himself together. Lloyd was only able to open his eyes once the rough greeting came to an end.

“Argh...”

His whole body was sore. But he felt comfortable, and soon, he learned that something soft, warm, and comfy had wrapped around him. It was a pair of wings.

“Ggoming?”

Lloyd spoke, goggle-eyed. Ggoming must have wrapped Lloyd with his wings while they were falling. Ggoming had his eyes closed, and so, Lloyd wondered if his friend took the brunt of the fall on his behalf.

“Hey, Ggoming!”

Lloyd’s heart sank. He hurriedly shook Ggoming. He slowly opened his eyes.

“G-ggoming?”

“Ha. Are you all right?” asked Lloyd.

“Ggoming!”

“Are you hurt?”

“Ggomiming! Ggoming! Ggoming!”

Ggoming wasn’t hurt. He was completely fine. But contrary to his confident words, Ggoming couldn’t rise up easily. Lloyd checked on him, and thankfully, he didn’t have any major injuries. It looked like Ggoming simply needed some time to recover from the fall.

Ha. What’s seriously going on?

Feeling slightly relieved at last, Lloyd shook his head as his muscles screamed in pain. He then picked up the shovel tossed nearby and turned to look at the warlock. A scoff escaped Lloyd.

“Hahaha...”

The warlock still looked perfectly fine, even though Lloyd had definitely hit him with a shovel earlier. The man still had his arms stretched out toward the sky. In other words, he was completely unharmed.

Wait, is he using a protective spell?

Lloyd wrinkled his nose. It looked like so. The blow he just sent to the magician was substantial. Ggoming had ramped up his speed to the max with the drastic drop. There were also his and Ggoming’s weights to consider. On top of everything, it was infused with the mana that came from his manaheart. The blow contained enough power to dominate most lancers in heavy cavalry. It was comparable to being directly hit by a van.

But all that power completely bounced off him. And thanks to it, we crashed to the ground.

Lloyd trembled when he thought how his bones could have been crushed and shattered without Ggoming's protection during the drop. So, he tapped Ggoming as the latter recovered from the impact.

“Thank you,” said Lloyd, “Just wait here for a moment.”

“G-ggoming!”

Lloyd left Ggoming alone and approached the dark magician. If hitting him didn’t do, he would use the mana blast to defeat him. Thinking so, he tightened his grip on the metal shovel.

“Grrr!”

“Grr!”

But Lloyd was immediately stopped by the appearance of two creatures. Both didn't have any heads, and they reeked of rotting fish, assaulting Lloyd's nose. They were zombies. Worse, they were headless zombies.

"I saw from the sky that they were scattered about in groups of three. So, it seems like there are two zombies and one warlock in each group."

It appeared so, indeed.

This is a little overwhelming.

Lloyd shrugged, his shoulders flinching as the pressure to fight against the zombies weighed down on him. Right off the bat, it was harmful to his mental and eye health to see the gory creatures in real life. Then there was the stench.

Goodness, I wish I could just cut my nose off right now.

If he was guilty of anything, it would be that he rose to become a mid-level sword expert. Now that his senses were sensitive by multifold, he feared that his nose cells would rise up against him and beg for their destruction. However, Lloyd knew that he could not retreat, and there was no reason to, either. After all, he held an excellent optional skill for suppressing zombies. Hurriedly opening the skill window before the zombies jumped at him, Lloyd activated his optional skill of manaheart.

Ding dong.

[Manaheart Skill Option ④: Zombie Domination has been activated.]

"Grrr?"

The two zombies jerked visibly right before they charged at Lloyd. But that was it, and nothing more. They soon turned hostile. Simultaneously, a disappointing message appeared in front of him.

[The two zombies that were targeted for domination do not have heads. As such, they cannot "face" you. The important condition of Zombie

Domination has not been satisfied.]

[You have failed to dominate the zombies.]

“Grrr!”

Bam! A headless zombie charged at Lloyd, who was reading the message in the background. He wrinkled his nose.

“Oh, come on!”

He didn’t want to fight. However, he wasn’t going to stall if it was inevitable. Hell-bent on taking them down, Lloyd avoided the attacks from the zombies charging at him like a bull. He slid his shovel and pushed them to the side, putting them to bump into each other. Their legs got caught on one another and fell to the floor in one lump.

“Grrr!”

They let out another ferocious roar and flailed to get to their feet. But that was the last movement they could manage. Before they touched the ground, Lloyd blasted their bodies with his mana blast. Kaboom!

“Gr-!”

The mana blast that shot out from the metal shovel penetrated their bodies until it began to expand, growing 20 inches in diameter in just mere seconds. Everything within the range took the effect of the blast.

Boom! Their bodies vanished. That was the end of them.

“Tsk,” clucked Lloyd.

Though it was a relief that the zombies were taken care of, he felt worse. If he was being honest, the zombies didn’t do anything wrong. He was rather sorry for them.

Technically speaking, they’re the bad guys.

Lloyd’s gaze traveled to the warlock standing some feet away. That warlock deserved to be beaten to death. That evil figure was nothing but a pest. A horrible menace to society who killed innocent people to use them as zombies and put up a strange wall that sucked the life out of those inside it.

So, one blast for you too.

He would take the warlock down but not kill him. Instead, he would beat the daylights out of him until he confessed the method to neutralize the wall. Flashing with deadly determination, Lloyd stared at the warlock as he got ready for another blast. And he shot.

Kaboom! The violent wave of rough mana came out from the outstretched shovel and made its way as it pierced the space. It then hit the warlock’s leg. But it bounced off him. Plop!

“Huh?”

Lloyd widened his eyes in disbelief. It was a mana blast!

Did it bounce off?

He struggled to believe what he just saw. But he couldn’t deny what happened in front of him.

Is this real life?

Lloyd pondered if he should use the triple mana blast. But he soon told himself that there was no guarantee. What else should I do? He asked himself, falling into deep thought. And later, Lloyd noticed something strange and unusual about the warlock.

Hold on. That warlock hasn’t been moving since a while ago.

It really was the case come to think of it. Even when Lloyd struck him hard with a shovel in the air with Ggoming, when he fought with the zombies, and when he fired the mana blast. The warlock remained standing like a statue whose arms were stretched out toward the sky. This only meant one thing.

“Hey,” called Lloyd. “Can you not move?”

He sounded the warlock out, slowly approaching him and speaking when he was about five steps away. But no response came from the warlock. There wasn’t any reaction from him either. Actually, there was one, though it was menial. He rolled his eyes to Lloyd’s side, but his whole body stayed frozen.

“Ha,” said Lloyd. “It really is the case. You can’t move.”

Lloyd found himself laughing. The situation started to make a little more sense.

That warlock can’t move while he maintains the wall he’s erected. That’s why he protected himself with a powerful protective spell.

The protective magic was so strong that it bounced the massively strong blow from his shovel and even the mana blast. A sense of confusion rushed through Lloyd when he realized this.

What should I do then?

Lloyd thought hard about it. Triple mana blast? Supercharge? As he racked his brain for a solution, he felt a flow of familiar mana from the warlock.

“Huh?”

Lloyd lifted his head, and his gaze followed where he could feel the flow of the mana. It was in the warlock’s chest. And there he saw it.

“A jewel?”

A dark purplish gem was stuck to his necklace. Lloyd walked closer to him, even openly observing the stone in the necklace. That was when he knew.

It’s the same thing.

The skull he had dug from the ground and the jewel in it. The warlock carried the same kind. Even the mana flow in the stone was almost the same. A mana so drearily and gloomily concentrated was jolting heavily, reverberating the wall around Namaran. So, I was right, Lloyd said to himself, this stone was the means through which the warlocks put up the wall. Now, things were different. From that moment onward...

Bingo.

The corners of his lips rose as he had a lightbulb moment. Lloyd had acquired rich amounts of those gems by removing the mana to the point that he had grown accustomed to their mana structure. And here was a warlock using that in front of Lloyd.

It's like he set down a meal in front of me to enjoy.

Lloyd didn't have to needlessly struggle to break the wall. He just had to take care of the magical source that fueled the wall. And in this scenario, there was a better method than merely disposing of it.

"Hey, man."

Lloyd smugly stared at the warlock after recovering his usual composure. And of course, the warlock didn't say anything. Lloyd continued to talk to him.

"You must feel very relaxed," Lloyd asked, "Confident, aren't you? You have the protective magic with you, after all. You're pretty confident and relieved that my smacking, kicking, pinching, and anything else I could possibly do won't work, right?"

"..."

The warlock shot Lloyd a gaze, the kind wherein he seems to scoff and say, "Duh!" But Lloyd wasn't affected by this unnecessarily. In a moment like this, the one who reacts first loses. Lloyd simply responded by smiling more, by deepening his crow's feet.

"Relax. Why should I punch you? I don't want to waste my energy. Instead, I just have to attack the center."

“...”

“Oh, what is that? You’re asking me what I mean? Listen carefully. You see this gem you have? I’m going to alter its function.”

“...!”

“Oh, yes, I sure can. I know how to do it,” said Lloyd.

“...”

“I’m serious! You want to see?”

Lloyd held out his hand and grabbed the noctanium stuck in the warlock’s necklace.

“You see, I may not know magic well, but I’m pretty good at absorbing and rearranging mana. Plus, I spent so many hours of my life drawing blueprints that I can do it in my sleep now. You get what I mean?”

“...”

“This gem of yours. I’m going to alter the mana pattern concentrated in it. And so, I’ll change whom the wall will try to absorb the mana from. From the people inside the wall to those who are responsible for it. That is, you.”

“...!”

The warlock’s eyes shone with doubt. Just then...

Ziiing! Still clutching the gem, Lloyd rotated his three-stranded mana circle and ran the Asrahan Core Technique, a skill especially fit for absorbing and rearranging mana.

Chapter 172: In Front of Namaran's Wall (3)

Ziiing! The noctanium shivered violently in Lloyd's tight grip. It was its way of resisting and fighting.

This is no joke!

Lloyd involuntarily flinched as he realized that the gem the warlock wore in his necklace was not to be taken lightly.

It's going berserk.

Lloyd's brow quirked. It felt like he was riding an untamed wild horse or driving up a hill in a truck with a broken brake. But Lloyd didn't care about it at all. He simply spun the mana circle faster, absorbing and discharging the force coming from the gem as it resisted him. At the same time, he sent a portion of his own mana into the gem. This was only possible because he had the Asrahan Core Technique with him.

Let's see.

Lloyd closed his eyes and focused his senses on the mana he put inside the jewel. The mana structure of the jewel appeared to him like one panorama.

It's complex.

It looked like a labyrinth, whose countless dots, lines, and sides crisscrossed and jumbled in a mess. Lloyd suddenly felt like he had become a provincial boy arriving in the main capital city of the country or a newbie driver who came out to the busiest part of the street during rush hour right a day after he got the license. The structure was overwhelmingly complex. He felt a sense of transcendental bleakness and confusion. It felt like he was trapped inside a jungle. But Lloyd didn't allow himself to be dismayed. Instead, he pulled himself together all the more with steadfast determination.

This is a blueprint. A design outline. I just need to imagine it's one that my groupmates majorly messed up on. So, what now? I need to fix it. Modify it.

That way, I can save my grade and keep my scholarship!

Losing his scholarship was the worst thing that could happen to him, as he barely met his rent. Without a scholarship to cover his tuition, he'd have to spend one whole year working after filing for a leave of absence. He didn't want that since it meant delaying when he'd get a job and prolonging his tiring life in poverty.

My engineering degree! I have to get it fast!

Lloyd yelled as he remembered his emotions during college. Mind control. Success. From then on, he was able to maintain composure amid the complicated and frustrating mana fuse. He remained composed, identifying the whole space with aplomb. Then, in a slow and measured manner, like untangling a yarn, Lloyd analyzed all of the dots, lines, and surfaces in front of him. He identified the structure of the mana in the gem and understood it. And soon, the solution appeared on its own. Lloyd learned which areas he should fix or change and what kind of results it would bring. A smile formed on his face when he figured everything out.

You guys are all dead.

Now, he knuckled down, modifying the mana structure, which turned out to be a breeze when he had it all figured out. The job was very familiar, after all.

It's more than familiar. I've done this so many times that I'm sick of it!

This was a blueprint, and he was tasked to fix it. Such an approach comforted Lloyd, who boldly and carefully revised and rearranged the mana pattern of the noctanium. After some time, the results of his efforts started to show.

Crackle...! A portion of Namaran's Wall began to shake. Even the color of the sky changed. Its ominous signature color of black with a purple hue shifted into a light glowing complexion, and the warlock's face simultaneously changed.

“Humph...!”

The warlock sucked in his breath involuntarily, and his eyes snapped open in horror. Was it because he was surprised? No.

The mana... in my body!

It was leaving his body at a rapid speed and absorbing into the wall.

Argh!!

The warlock’s heart pounded irregularly, yet he couldn’t do anything. The noctanium was already activated and could not move due to the protective magic. And there was no canceling it.

How... How?!

The warlock was terribly dismayed. The man, Lloyd, had suddenly appeared before him and shot his mouth off about how he could change the target of the mana absorption. The warlock thought it was all a bluff, and his reaction was only natural because what this man said was beyond common sense. An impossibility. But now, he learned that he was wrong. Every word the man said proved to be true!

How? How in the wooor...

He couldn’t endure any longer. The warlock despaired, but he couldn’t fight. With his arms stretched forward, he was robbed of his mana. His vision grew hazy. His hair fell out in clumps. His skin grew wrinkly, and the blood in his body dried up. His muscles quickly atrophied. His liver and heart shrunk. He was being mummified alive. Even his last drop of mana got stolen by the devouring power of the wall. Lloyd opened his eyes right after.

“…That scared me.”

Lloyd opened his eyes to meet the warlock’s face that had turned into a mummy. Since he was standing close, clutching the necklace, Lloyd almost took in a full shot of the mummy’s face.

“Ugh. Seriously.”

Lloyd hurriedly stepped back as he shook off his goosebumps. The upright warlock had already died. Though Lloyd felt a little wistful, he didn’t necessarily pity him. After all, he reaped what he sowed. This was his own doing after trying to massacre thousands and tens of thousands of people using that awful wall. When Lloyd thought about how he was only paying the price of his sins, he didn’t feel bad at all and quickened his pace.

“I don’t have any time to space out like this. Ggoming!”

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming fluttered his wings and strutted toward Lloyd when he called. To Lloyd’s relief, it looked like he had recovered pretty well from the shock.

“Can you fly?” asked Lloyd.

“Ggoming!”

“Really? Are you sure? You don’t have to push yourself if it’s too hard. I can just run around instead,” comforted Lloyd.

“Ggomiming! Ggoming!”

Ggoming eagerly shook his large and round head.

“Ggoming! Ggomiming!”

“What did you say? Even so, the situation is serious, so you can’t just sit still and watch?”

“Ggoming!”

Then Ggoming turned around, prompting Lloyd to hop on quickly. As he did, Lloyd already had his eyes on the next target. Another warlock was standing quite far from the cliff slope. He, too, was standing up with his arms stretched out.

“That way. I see another one there. Let’s go!”

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming spread out his wings forcefully, and Lloyd fixated his eyes on the next target.

You guys are all dead meat.

Lloyd made up his mind to change the target of the wall so that it would absorb the dark magicians’ mana instead. And next, he would take their jewels from them. Every single one of them. His heart pounded in excitement at the thought.

Meanwhile, something was brewing in the public hall that stood in the city downtown. Owned by the count, this structure served as a meeting room, conference room, and lecture hall for the people. Today was the same. The public hall bustled with visitors who came to enjoy various artworks by local artists. Happiness permeated the air as everyone enjoyed, admired, and complimented the art pieces and conversed with one another. But this scenery took an abrupt halt just 30 minutes ago.

“That is what is so ironic about life. You never know what lies ahead of you. Don’t you think?”

Cannavaro smiled. He was Namaran’s most famous celebrity and gentle philanthropist, making him the subject of admiration for all the people here. This man was known for his smile. It never left him, even in bad times. That smile of his warmed anyone who laid their eyes on something so innocent and mellow. His smile was almost symbolic. The same went for today. About 30 minutes ago, most citizens flashed a grin at him when he showed up at the public hall. They thanked him for visiting the exhibition despite his busy schedule and how they were glad to see him. He responded to them with the same content smile, and that was when Namaran’s Wall became activated.

“It doesn’t just apply to people’s behavior but their inner thoughts as well. Everyone considers me a philanthropist. They say they respect me. But do you think no one thought otherwise? I doubt it. There probably were those that cursed me, saying that I’m boosting my ego by squandering my money this way. Yet, they would have still smiled in front of me just in case I might give them something nice. Well, I get it. That’s just the way of life.”

Cannavaro’s magnanimous smile twitched. A corner of his lips rolled upward, and his gaze moved to a guy on the floor. The man looked to be in his 30s. He was a knight under Count Namaran.

“Argh...!”

Unlike the rest of the people, this knight had not passed out yet. He was dearly holding onto his fading consciousness as his body convulsed from the flood of mana leaving him. He had only one reason. It was because of his young daughter in his embrace.

“Why... are you... doing this?!”

The knight muttered, obviously racked with excruciating pain. He couldn’t wrap his head around this whole thing. Why is this happening? Why is mana leaving my body this fast? Is this how I, my daughter, and everyone else die? So meaninglessly? The knight asked himself. He was simply enjoying a vacation with his daughter. As he wondered about the cause behind this incident and the way to save his child, fear and resentment flooded his heart in the face of the hopeless situation. And making things worse, Cannavaro looked perfectly fine amid this tragedy. It looked like he didn’t have any mind to help people out. Heck, it looked like he was enjoying it. That terrified the knight more.

“What do you mean why?” Cannavaro’s thin lips rose to form a scoff. “Quietly perish like the good sacrifice you are.”

“What...”

Wham! Cannavaro kicked the knight’s head, and he instantly passed out. Cannavaro, once a philanthropist but now a warlock, hummed as he walked away. He pushed and shoved people in his way as though he was cleaning up trash from the road, heading toward the biggest sculpture in the exhibition.

“Ha.” A chuckle escaped Cannavaro as he looked at the sculpture. “The fall of an angel?”

The sculpture was of an angel crumpled on the ground after losing his wings and crashing down. But his head was looking up straight at the sky. His gaze did the same as though he was blaming the one who took away his wings and resolved to take revenge. It was an image of a fallen angel sending a gloomy and venomous gaze at the sky.

“This artwork pairs very well with the revolution today.”

His smile grew more content. He brought his hand to his lips and bit it hard. Blood came out of his finger, and he stroked the body of the angel, drawing a variety of strange patterns. His smile deepened in the process. Now, the preparation to summon Hell’s Knight was finished. All that was left for him to do was wait.

I only have to wait until midnight.

He would have enough mana by then, and Hell’s Knight would reign on this land, turning this kingdom into a living hell. As Cannavaro was getting emotional at the thought...

“Ah...”

Cannavaro heard a groan from behind, and he looked back with reflex. A strange sight caught him.

“Cannavaro... Have you lost your mind?”

The knight who had passed out was coming back to his senses. Still hugging his daughter tight, he glared tiredly at Cannavaro.

“Hah,” huffed Cannavaro.

What happened? How did he recover consciousness after passing out?

There would be nothing strange about it if it had been any other day. However, the wall was currently erected.

Sure, he was just barely able to hold on using his manaheart earlier. However, he should have never been able to wake up after passing out due to all the mana he lost during that time. It was beyond Cannavaro, but he didn't worry about it. If this knight was up again, then he should simply stomp him back to unconsciousness again. He was about to walk toward the knight when...

"Ugh...!"

"Mom... Mom..."

He started to hear groans coming from all directions. It was from the people, who were lying flat throughout the public hall. Each of them slowly mumbled, writhing in pain, and opening their eyes. They were waking up, lifting their heads as they looked around in confusion and agony.

What's going on?

Cannavaro's smile trembled. Something that was impossible was taking place. As though it wasn't enough with the knight bearing the manaheart, all the ordinary citizens had begun to regain consciousness one after another.

How is this possible?

Cannavaro turned with a sunken heart, wondering if something had happened to the wall. Something was definitely wrong. The people couldn't wake up when their mana had been sucked out of them. Only one could remain safe within the wall, and it was he who was protected by his noctanium and exempted from the curse.

So, why? How?! How in the world are these peasants coming back to their senses and sending a look for help at him? I have to check now!

Growing hasty, Cannavaro bolted out of the public hall and checked outside. His eyes widened in fright when he saw the wall.

“The wall is...”

It had changed. Instead of a blackish purple, it was glowing in various colors. And people around the public hall started to wake up one by one.

“...”

It was clear now. There was definitely a problem with the wall, and it was no longer absorbing mana. But that wasn’t the end of his despairing realization. Amid the groups of lethargic people painfully opening their eyes, Cannavaro noticed a silver-haired man walking over his way.

Swish. Javier Asrahan. The silver-haired knight drew his sword as soon as he laid his eyes on Cannavaro. When their eyes met, Cannavaro was gripped with fear. For the first time ever, his smile vanished from his face.

Chapter 173: Blood and Iron vs. Hell (1)

Where could Master Lloyd be? That question had dominated Javier's thoughts the most today. To be technically correct, that question dominated Javier for the past 20 minutes. He wanted to find his young master but couldn't. From the moment he left the count's manor and his lodging, he sprinted across the plaza and the main road, passing through every alley and opening every door within sight. Javier yelled until his voice gave way. But Lloyd didn't answer. There was only desperate groaning of the citizens on the streets. His heart grew hastier in those moments because he was forced to overlook them and because of his mission to find Master Lloyd any second faster. He ran desperately as his heart sped. After some time, Javier noticed mana gathering to one point, and that was the wall that enclosed the city in an ominous manner. The absorbed mana was concentrated in one place. So he rushed there, hoping to find Lloyd there. He ran and ran until he arrived and saw.

"..." It was Cannavaro, the man responsible for this incident. Javier drew his sword the moment he discovered him from afar.

Swish! The sword in his hand glinted coldly. Cannavaro's eyes widened in fright at the same time.

How is he okay?

Cannavaro's heart sank when he saw the silver-haired knight that appeared in the distance. From the moment their eyes met, the former's heart pounded violently, and his instinct yelled danger.

Sure, the wall is not working properly right now, and the mana absorption has been paused... But it was working properly until a while ago. So, the wall should have drained all his mana!

But strangely, the silver-haired man stood fine, collecting his breath slightly as if he'd rushed to get here. And he was holding a shiny sword that was shining brighter than his glowing eyes. From the moment Cannavaro realized this silver-haired man was dangerous, which was a second after their eyes met, Cannavaro immediately moved his hands.

“Hmph!”

His fingers and palms interlocked, and they pulled away again quickly. The mana was then connected, assembled, distorted, and torn according to consistent regulation and arrangement. And then, he pushed it in the air.

Fwoosh! A spatial door opened in front of his outstretched hands. Darkness within darkness. Perhaps the end of another dimension—hell. Something charged out of the door.

Clink! A metal chain composed of 13 links poured out. Each link was as large as a large tree trunk. There was more.

Cruuush! The chain swept through, and everything in the area crumbled to pieces. But it wasn’t because of its force and power. As though the chain could fast-forward time a thousand times, everything it touched became old, corroded, crumbled, and broke. The rocks, the earth, and the carriage... There was nothing left untouched. But Javier didn’t even bat an eye.

“…”

It was nothing. That was Javier’s take on the incoming chain. Next, his sword moved.

…!

There was no sound or flash. It was just a horizontal cut, and everything that charged toward him split in half. The chain and its fierceness were cut in one stroke. Everything the sword slashed and touched emitted a brilliant light.

Crackle! The aura that developed all of a sudden snapped the chain. It swept through the space and added more momentum to its movement. When Cannavaro saw it happen, he immediately turned and ran toward the public hall without looking back once. It was only natural that he did because he knew that he would die if he hovered around this place. That much was clear to him.

Crap! Is that a dragon or something?!

Cannavaro hurriedly opened the door to the public hall as a thought crossed his mind. Is he a sword master? No. Even a sword master was incapable of doing that, which was creating an aura that cut through his strongest dark magic in one stroke right after having been usurped of mana for almost an hour inside the wall.

I don't know who he is, but he's not just a simple sword master. He may not be a human, to begin with.

Cannavaro couldn't think of anything else. But his misunderstanding was truly only natural. After all, he was ignorant of Javier's arrival in the city as Lloyd had kept his visit here unofficial and discreet. Lloyd and his delegation simply joined Lady Namaran and her delegation to get here, and after such a quiet arrival, Lloyd proceeded with the construction right away. As such, Cannavaro never learned that a renowned silver-haired knight lodged in this city worked in his soup kitchen, and came here to execute the former. Although Cannavaro knew nothing of this, one thing was clear. He was in a crisis.

I'm going to lose unless I do something.

Cannavaro had no doubt that he'd be done for. After all, the previous magic was the best he could come up with, but it was sliced in one stroke. No tricks or gimmicks would ever be enough to overpower that man with silver hair.

Then...

Cannavaro's gaze moved nervously toward the center of the main hall, particularly to the fallen angel sculpture. It was covered with shamanistic symbols drawn in blood.

"..."

Hell’s Knight. Cannavaro wondered if he should summon it now. But the wall was broken, and mana wasn’t enough. There could be complications even if he summoned it.

But if I don’t summon it right now... I’ll die.

His deliberation was short-lived, and the decision was made in no time. Cannavaro placed his hand on the sculpture, which was all ready for a ritual minus the final activation. Starting the summoning rite was easy, as all he had to do was imbue some mana into his hand. That was enough.

Ziiing!

The bloody symbols marked all over the sculpture beamed with a scary light, and at the same time, a legion of mysterious ghosts appeared and floated around, emitting light as they wiggled, surged, rose, yelled, and convulsed. And at last, the sculpture shrunk and burst.

Thwack!

“Argh!”

Cannavaro was knocked to the ground after one of the rocks that splattered following the explosion hit him. Though his wounded forehead bled profusely, he didn’t even think of wiping it off. He instead looked up and checked the creature he had just summoned.

“Hell’s Knight...”

Psssh... A dark fog flowed down from the marble display where the sculpture once stood before the explosion. A red glow, which came from its eyes, glimmered, and it looked around in one breath and removed the fog on the second breath, finally revealing its form. But there was something off about it.

“What...”

Cannavaro scowled as his gaze hurriedly studied the whole length of the knight’s body. When the dark fog that veiled the creature cleared,

Cannavaro could easily spot its defects. It wasn’t riding the Horse of Hell. It lacked one arm and leg. In other words, it was single-armed and legged and without a horse.

“Arggh! What the heck?!”

Cannavaro wrapped and squeezed his head with his hands in despair. I’m doomed! He shouted internally. As expected, it was all due to the mana absorption glitch in the wall. It had failed to sufficiently collect mana, and there wasn’t enough to summon a proper Hell’s Knight.

But still! How?!

All the effort and money he had invested up to this point and his grand plan waiting to be achieved popped into his head. Despair. His legs gave way, and he keeled over. And he looked up at the lacking Hell’s Knight with a disappointed gaze. Just then...

“Did you do all this to summon that?”

A voice rang aloud in the public hall. It was Javier, who was already inside. He was frowning, his steps careful and alert. And his gaze was fixated on Hell’s Knight.

“...”

As Javier stared at Hell’s Knight, it also turned its gaze at him. Blue eyes and red eyes. Their gazes met. The next moment, they were already clashing their swords. They had understood from the moment their eyes locked that the other was an enemy.

Clack! The long silvery sword clashed with the black two-handed sword. The brilliant aura collided with the cursed energy. These contrasting characters initiated an unyielding power struggle, and the moment their swords struck one another, the impact created a massive storm that swept across the whole area. Javier’s eyes widened.

“...!”

Its force was beyond his imagination, and his sword nearly moved backward. But something else was more surprising.

From my hands to my shoulders, my bones are sore.

Javier furrowed as he recalled the clash a moment ago. Right when their swords collided, icy energy traveled from its sword body and entered him, penetrating into his skin as deep as his muscle tissues and marrows. It invaded his system as it followed the veins upward from his elbow. Had Javier failed to rotate the mana circle right after he sensed the invasion and pushed it away with intense mana pressure, his heart would have been seriously damaged.

He's a powerful foe.

The knight wasn't just any other strong undead or skeleton soldier. It wasn't to be taken lightly because it lacked an arm and leg. With only one clash, Javier managed to almost precisely identify its capacity.

It's as strong as me.

It became clear to Javier that this knight was more powerful than an ordinary sword master like Queen Magentano. There should be two or three of her kind to put up a fight. This meant that if this hellish creature came with both arms and legs, Javier would not stand a chance, either.

But not now.

Javier was certain that he could do it. He could. Convicted, Javier's blue eyes flashed with fierce determination. His sword became more precise and violent by a notch.

Thud! Twang!

Javier, the knight of blood and iron, attacked his enemy without any mercy. When Hell's Knight sliced, he whammed from the other side to change the direction upward, and when it tried to defend the attack, Javier stabbed it.

"...!"

Hell’s Knight’s skull jerked violently, and it wondered if all humans on earth were like this man. It was thrown into such confusion as the very first human it fought after landing on the earth was no other than Javier.

“What the...”

It had heard that humans were weak. So, it was convinced that no one in this world would ever be enough to stop it even though it came in imperfect shape and could only harness half of its original power. Unfortunately, its conviction shattered within a minute when its rib was slashed by a sword.

Crash! The long silvery sword slashed through Hell’s Knight’s chest, and the armor and ribs fell to the ground. But of course, Hell’s Knight wasn’t going to stay still and let this human attack so freely.

“...!”

It shouted the language of hell and wielded its sword, creating a cursed shockwave that swept across the whole area in front of it. But Javier didn’t bother to evade the attack. Instead, he simply accepted it head-on.

Swing! Javier started to stab the air at lightning speed with his long sword, the sheer speed turning the sword invisible. Next, he calmly used the mana blast to pierce the shockwaves Hell’s Knight produced. Javier stretched his hands further, aiming at the skull of his enemy. The mana blast was fired and pierced its skull.

Crack! The mana blast penetrated the front of Hell’s Knight’s helmet, digging further into its skull. And at last, it was shattered to pieces.

“...!”

Hell’s Knight’s whole body convulsed now that its head was gone. And a second later...

Clank! Its sword fell from its hand. The entire joint fell apart to the ground like a sand castle collapsing. This was the moment when Hell’s Knight, the very knight from hell who overpowers sword masters, was reduced to ashes.

“What is...”

Cannavaro gaped, his mouth hanging down wide open. He couldn’t even blink. The clash between Javier and Hell’s Knight had involved a complicated exchange of attacks and defenses, but to an untrained eye like Cannavaro’s, it merely lasted a few seconds. As such, from Cannavaro’s perspective, the very creature he worked so hard to summon was ultimately reduced to a pile of bones after only lasting for a few seconds.

Am I... having a nightmare?

Cavannaro kneeled over to the ground as strength left his legs. Gutted, he looked up at the silver-haired knight who was approaching.

“If you had committed a common serious felony, it would be only proper to execute you on the spot,” announced Javier gravely. “But you committed too many crimes, so you must be taken into custody in the palace.”

“...”

The long sword was now pointing at Cannavaro. He gulped as he saw its tip.

Where in the world...

Where in the world did this monster come from? Cannavaro could not believe he wasn’t dreaming as he looked at Javier. That sense of shock and daze was actually understandable. Javier was perfectly fine even when he was currently inside the noctanium wall. And even though it had defects, he was able to easily defeat Hell’s Knight. Even though he saw everything with his own eyes, it still seemed unrealistic.

Is he a dragon pretending to be a human? No, that’s just not possible. A dragon will never intervene in human affairs without reason. If so... If so... Hold on, is he...?

Cannavaro paused. After straining himself to restore composure and racking his brain, Cannavaro remembered something.

Javier Asrahan.

He had heard of the name. Javier was said to be a young sword master that appeared from nowhere and was stronger than the queen. It was also rumored that he was gorgeous with silvery hair, which resembled a constellation. And now, the very monster that was approaching him with a sword in hand fit the description very well.

But what's he doing here?

There was no way that Cannavaro would not have known Javier Asrahan came to the city. Could it be, Cannavaro mused, that he came here on an unofficial visit? Could it be that he had seen through the revolt in advance? There was no way of answering. But he didn't despair, for his eyes spotted something behind Javier just when he thought the end had come.

"Haha, ha!"

The corners of Cannavaro's lips rose involuntarily. A pile of black bone was regenerating on its own and getting back on its feet behind Javier.

Crack... Crack...! The Hell's Knight's black skull helmet was restored in no time. And now, its eyes held a glint of more menacing hostility.

Chapter 174: Blood and Iron vs. Hell (2)

Creak! Creak...! A sinister noise echoed through the public hall. The joints of Hell's Knight rose up and were swept by a black magical force. It was as though it had received the blessing of an immortal being and had never been crushed to pieces. The bones were assembled from its legs to the pelvis, spine, ribs, shoulders, and skull. The dark armor then covered its whole body. A helmet was thrown on.

Flash! A reddish glow, which was its eyes, glittered inside the helmet. At the same time, Hell's Knight stretched its one hand, the huge two-handed sword lifting from the ground to fly back into its grip. A fierce mana was set ablaze around its giant blade. At the same time, Cannavaro broke into laughter.

"Haha, ha! Hahaha!"

Cannavaro, who had been dropped to the ground, hurriedly crawled far away from Javier.

"Oh, my Hell's Knight! Execute our enemy! Quickly!"

Cannavaro's sharp shouts rang aloud in the public hall, prompting a reaction from everyone inside. The collapsed citizens painstakingly lifted their heads and stared at Cannavaro even while a pang of dizziness continued to haunt them. Their gazes were filled with disappointment, resentment, and hatred. That man used to be a gentle philanthropist, the pride of the city. But now, he was nothing but a traitor who revealed his true color. But Cannavaro nonchalantly ignored their gazes. He didn't care at all about them. His gaze was laser-focused with admiration on Hell's Knight only, who had come back to life.

"Oh, my Hell's Knight!"

Cannavaro shouted, almost pleading, once again. The yelling prompted Hell's Knight to pull its sword. Javier, on the other hand, had his sword already aimed at Hell's Knight. A second later, a fight began without any noise.

"...!"

Boom! The shockwaves of their clash swept the whole area, and everyone on the floor was thrown away like a leaf. Javier and Hell's Knight neared each other only to become distant. And they hurtled toward each other again.

Thud! Kaboom!

Javier lifted his long sword with his arms and laid it horizontally above his head, his wrists moving at a mysterious angle. Its front blade quickly drew a half-circle, and the flash of light swished as it aimed at the side of Hell's Knight's head.

Clang!

Hell's Knight's grand sword defended Javier's long sword, creating a repulsive force. But Javier smartly used that force to his advantage and transferred it to his sword, his two overhead wrists moving again at a strange angle. And his right hand then rotated clockwise as the left hand was used as an axis. The sword rotated as it drew an arc above the head. And this time, Javier used the back of his blade to attack the other side of his opponent's head.

"...!"

Hell's Knight immediately jerked its head back, and the silvery aura sliced a portion of its helmet. It then laid a counterattack right after, its black sword sweeping across the space with overwhelming technique and skill.

Thwack!

Its blade was brought down so fiercely that the floor snapped, the pillar shook, and the ridgepole cracked. A countless number of shards flew around at fatal speed, mostly toward Javier. But some of them flew toward the citizens. Javier snapped his eyes open.

“...!”

Clash! Slash!

His long silvery sword swung and slashed through the air like greased lightning, and the hundreds of shards turned to powder. Javier hurtled right through the powder, still drifting in the air. His long silvery sword acted as a fang from that moment.

Thud! Twang! Thwack!

If the long sword was a fatal fang, Hell’s Knight’s sword was a deadly gun. The sword master and knight from hell rushed at each other with an unreserved desire to end one another, and the scene was likened to a white and black beast chomping at each other. And like the relentless battle between the light and darkness, Javier and Hell’s Knight charged, focusing on each other and nothing else. Javier pierced, and Hell’s Knight stabbed. Hell’s Knight swung down, Javier charged forward. Smack, charge. Charge, evade. Evade, smite. Smite, uppercut.

Boooom!

The black sword cut downward, and the silver longsword defended upward. Those two deadly weapons collided in the air once again, blocking each other’s forces. With that, shockwaves burst out without reservation. And yet, neither one of them retreated. Frozen to the ground, they continued their power struggle.

Clang! Clang!

The black sword shoved downward, and the long silvery sword endured against it. A fierce friction took place as the two faced one another. Their gazes locked as embers burned and splattered from their blades. The glow inside Hell’s Knight’s eyes burned redder.

“You are strong, human.”

“...”

“I am Giolexius, the commander of the First Corps, and I serve the Master of Hell. How wonderful it would have been had my body been fully intact. But still, this fight has truly gone above my expectations. Therefore, I wish to inquire about your name, human knight.”

“Javier Asrahan,” replied Javier.

“Nice to meet you, Sir Asrahan. I ask that you do more and fight harder.”

“Whew. Although, I do not welcome fights like this.”

This power struggle where no effort was to be spared... Javier blurted as their blades touched each other. Hell’s Knight cocked its skull.

“How so?”

“No one welcomes a burdensome fight.”

Javier smirked cynically, thinking how ridiculous he sounded. But he was being honest. No one in this world welcomed a burdensome fight. If he could, he would simply avoid it. But the situation called for him to face forward and fight. That was why he remained there. Even so, however, it was a struggle. Hell’s Knight was gradually getting more forceful in its grip as it pressed its sword. He was in a frightening situation.

Will I be able to protect the people at this rate?

Javier was concerned. He looked at the people around him. They were thrown and sent to all corners of the hall when shockwaves came at them in series. No one looked to be okay enough to stand on their own. In other words, no one was capable of leaving this place on their own. So, there was only one thing left for Javier. Fight and win. That was the only way to protect the people here.

Like this!

Thwack!

Javier momentarily lowered the end of his long sword, and a slope appeared following the downward movement. Hell's Knight, who was pressing down on his sword, slid as the angle shifted, creating fierce sparks.

"...!"

Hell's Knight's eyes shook. Even before it was able to adjust to the shift in strength, its sword slipped sideways, and Javier used the chance to lift his right hand. A dagger was in his hand.

Kaboom! Mana blast jetted out from the dagger, aiming at its chin.

"Argh...!"

Hell's Knight jerked its head back at a tremendous speed. Then it proceeded to make its next move and fight.

Crash! It rammed into Javier with its shoulder, and to him, the blow felt like a large rock bashing him. And when Javier and Hell's Knight were about to start another beastly battle, there came a sound.

"Over there! Look at me!"

A piercing shout interrupted the fight. It was Cannavaro.

Slam! The long blade and black sword were still clashing together in the air, and Javier stole a glance sideways and scanned the area where the shout came from. What he witnessed shook him. Cannavaro, the once-respectable man in the city for his philanthropic deeds, the man that once surprised Javier for being exemplary, was held hostage.

"If you want to continue this fight," Cannavaro bawled, "you might want to think it again! Put down your sword! Or I will behead all these pests one by one!"

Cannavaro smirked slyly and grabbed a man's hair. Holding a dagger in his other hand, Cannavaro lightly pierced the man's neck. A streak of blood dripped from his neck. And a girl, who was still lying on the ground, whimpered aloud.

“Papaaa!”

“Argh... Eek! I-I am fine. I am fine,” said the man, trying hard to calm his daughter even when his neck was covered in blood.

“I’m fine, my ass,” Cannavaro scoffed, “and shut your mouth unless you want to be beheaded.”

“Arggh...!”

The dagger moved slightly. More blood came out of his neck. Cannavaro’s eyes moved to Javier.

“See that? I’m going to count to three. I’m giving you time to think. And if you still don’t put your sword down, this girl will see her father’s throat get slit.”

“...”

Javier didn’t answer. He wordlessly resumed the fierce battle against Hell’s Knight, but he didn’t tear his eyes from the hostage situation completely. Cannavaro put on a twisted smile, pleased that Javier was in agony.

So, throw that sword away! Now!

Cannavaro was convinced that Javier would put down the sword. Why? He was a renowned knight in the kingdom. A rising star, and a sword master.

Isn’t that true, Sir Javier Asrahan?

A knight of such popularity would certainly value his reputation. So, he wouldn’t be able to easily give up on the hostages. Eventually, he would succumb and accept defeat. That was what mattered to Cannavaro at the moment.

Then I’ll get rid of him right away and restore the wall.

The wall could be restored and mana could be accumulated again. If he scraped all the life out of the citizens, he could fix Hell's Knight to be in perfect shape. Nearly all the kingdom's territories could be wiped out during the one month its summoning lasted. If forces came to fight, Hell's Knight could smash them. It would be a breeze for Hell's Knight as long as it was fully equipped. Decapitating the queen would even be possible. And that would be his dream come true, his dream to establish a new royal family as the current one was full of hypocrisy.

So, throw that sword away! Now!

Cannavaro glared at Javier, his gaze growing more intense. Then he got ready to make his next move. Once Javier put down the sword, he would slice this pest and help Hell's Knight by using the moment of shock to cast dark magic on him. Left without his sword, he would helplessly be defeated... Just then...

Kaboom! A mana blast was fired in Cannavaro's direction.

"...!"

Cannavaro snapped his eyes open in terror. At that moment, he finally realized what had just happened.

That fool!

Javier didn't throw the sword. Instead, he silently fired a terrible attack.

Arggh!

Cannavaro's heart pounded. Left with no time to think, he instinctively flopped to the ground backward and held out both of his hands to cast a defense spell.

Boom! But the mana blast was faster. Before his defense magic could be fully activated, it broke the magic apart and slayed the end of his index and middle fingers. And then it resumed its course to blast and penetrate the public hall.

“Argh!!!!!!”

Cannavaro rolled on the floor as he clutched his injured hand. Javier’s eyes drooped in disappointment.

“Tsk.”

Javier had aimed at the heart but failed because he was currently in a breathtaking fight against Hell’s Knight. He had fired the mana blast in a split moment, but his aim was missed. He failed to kill the warlock. Just sliced some fingers. Wistful of the result, Javier became anxious.

I should have finished him in one blow just now.

The price of failing to do so was high in two ways. First, Cannavaro would now be watching out for any mana blasts. That meant it’d be impossible to resolve the hostage situation by using the same method. Second, it was...

Boom!

“Argh...!”

Javier blocked the sword with some struggle. A bitter smile formed on his face.

I’m not sure I can win against him even after giving it my all.

When Javier fired the mana blast to suppress Cannavaro in between the fierce exchange of offense and defense, he had to ignore Hell’s Knight for a moment, and that broke the equal balance in their fight. That was the second price he had to pay.

Slam! Kaboom! Whack!

He aimed the mana blast in a different direction and wasted his energy with it. Because of that, the offense was now entirely in the hands of Hell’s Knight. It went the same for movement. Breathing and flow. The direction of the offense. The advantage of timing was now given to Hell’s Knight, and it was hard to get it back because the Knight began launching an unreserved amount of attacks once it realized that the ball was in its hand.

Clang! Thud! Kaboom!

Smack, break, penetrate, wham, and grind. Instead of resorting to small techniques, Hell's Knight relied on its sheer strength and force. Such destructive attacks pushed Javier to the corner of the public hall as he couldn't find any time to counterattack. One thoughtless attempt and he'd be losing more than what he gained. That was how destructive and thorough its offenses were. The situation, moreover, gradually turned for the worse.

"Wahahaha! Hahaha! You! You thought that would work?!"

Cannavaro got back on his feet, and he picked up the dagger as his sliced fingers continued to bleed hard. He then once again grabbed the fugitive's head and put the dagger near his neck. This time, he used the man as his shield.

"Now, I'm ordering you again! Put down the sword!"

His vile shout echoed loudly in the public hall. Javier, who was barely holding up after being cornered, put on a dark expression. It was impossible to use the mana blast in his current situation. And putting down his sword was surely going to make Hell's Knight slash him in half.

What do I do?

Javier's eyes trembled. Watch the fugitive die to keep fighting? Throw away the sword to save the hostage first? Javier was dismayed as he could not judge what the right decision was. Of course, he knew continuing the fight was a gain for him. But he felt massively burdened to make that decision. There was the man, bleeding in the neck in the hands of Cannavaro. And there was his daughter crying as she watched her poor father. And there was him, a selfish knight debating whether to fight or not.

What do I-

Javier’s lips turned pale. Cannavaro smiled as he could see his victory was near.

“I’m going to count to five!”

Javier’s shoulders flinched. In a hurrying gaze, he looked at Cannavaro.

Wait a minute.

“Three!” Cannavaro yelled.

Please.

“Two!”

Stop.

“On-”

Bam! All of a sudden, there came a clear sound from the back of Cannavaro’s head, and his shout immediately halted at the same time.

“Eh...?”

His eyes rolled backward. His body staggered. His legs gave way. And when he flopped to the ground, it revealed a figure. Lloyd. He was holding his metal shovel, which he had just wielded in full swing. And he shrugged as he scoffed at Javier.

“Lady Ella, do you need a hand?”

Chapter 175: Shoulder to Shoulder (1)

Bam! A clear, pure sound resounded throughout the whole area, and Cannavaro's eyes reversed.

Eek...?

His head hurt. The floor and ceiling pounded, and his world suddenly grew low. No, it was his body that did so. Even the cold flooring that touched his face felt distant and bleak.

What just...

Cannavaro thought of getting back to his feet. So, he desperately wiggled his body and fumbled on the ground. But that was as far as he could get.

Thwack! Once more, there came a clear ringing noise.

Ack.

That was one last shout before Cannavaro passed out. And someone scoffed above his fallen body.

"Goodness, this man's surprisingly tenacious."

Lloyd looked down at Cannavaro as he shook his head. What a tenacious man. Lloyd never imagined that the latter would writhe in agony and try to get up after getting knocked out by his blow on the head.

"Oh, well," drawled Lloyd, "I just need to hit you one more time. Anyway."

Lloyd lifted his head and looked toward Javier.

"Want some help, Lady Ella?"

But Javier didn't answer. It was because he couldn't. He was barely enduring the full brunt of Hell's Knight's focused attacks. But he managed to send a welcoming gaze toward Lloyd, who immediately picked up the hint.

“Okay. I’ll take care of things here and go there right away. Hold on a little longer,” said Lloyd.

Lloyd knew that eliminating a source of future trouble was the first priority, and he had to completely suppress this menacing warlock. With such a thought in mind, Lloyd looked back.

“Ggoming,” called Lloyd.

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming, who got here with Lloyd, answered from the loft of the public hall when Lloyd called. A large parrotbill spread his wings to glide down.

“You know what to do, right?”

“Ggoming!”

Lloyd didn’t have to spell out his plan. All he did was point at Cannavaro pinned to the ground. Ggoming then gave his bag a shake.

Pssh!!! A spider web that was sturdier and stronger than metal was discharged from his bag, tying up Cannavaro’s hands, shackling his legs, and coiling his body up. Like a spider tying its game in the wild, Ggoming tightly bound Cannavaro, even more firmly than 30 layers of bubble wrap. Just like that, the warlock was completely suppressed. But Lloyd didn’t stop there.

“Hey, man.”

Lloyd helped the man breathing on the ground beside Cannavaro. Wiping the blood off his neck, Lloyd spoke.

“Can you move?”

“A-a little bit...” The man nodded with some struggle. “Aren’t you Master Lloyd? Nice to meet you, my lord...”

“I knew it. I knew I wasn’t mistaken. You visited my fiefdom with Lady Namaran, didn’t you?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, my lord.”

“Then I suppose you can heal faster than the rest of the people here.”

“Sure... Eek.”

The knight sucked in a breath at the abrupt entrance of mana into his body when Lloyd placed his hand on the knight’s shoulder.

“Woah. No need to be surprised. I’m putting some mana into your body, so you can get well.”

“But why...” murmured the knight.

“Why else?” asked Lloyd as he glanced around the hall. “Do you see the people around you?”

“Yes.”

“Take them outside. I fear it’s going to get messier from now on.”

“Yes.”

An elaborate explanation was unnecessary as the knight had watched the entire situation unfold from the beginning. Thankfully, no one was severely hurt by the shards of rocks or the shockwaves. However, there was no guarantee that luck would always be on everyone’s side like this. The knight raised his body, and it looked like Lloyd’s Asrahan Core Technique did a lot to restore much of his energy. Carrying his daughter, a nearby old woman, and a middle-aged man altogether, the knight spoke.

“Please be careful, my lord, I shall come and help fight soon.”

“I don’t expect you to,” dismissed Lloyd. “Move the people out of here. I gave you mana for that job, not to fight.”

“Yes... My Lord.”

“Hurry up.”

“Y-yes.”

The knight hurriedly moved, carrying people out of the public hall. Ggoming helped out in the effort as he strutted around and fluttered his short wings. It was only then that Lloyd sighed in relief.

“Whew.”

The surroundings were organized somewhat. Fighting can take without any concern for casualties. Lloyd grabbed his metal shovel in relief, and in his other hand, he grasped Cannavaro’s head.

“Let’s get started.”

Dragging Cannavaro with his one hand, Lloyd walked over to the center of the public hall. Javier and Hell’s Knight. He moved toward the very place where this transcendental fight was taking place. A look of confusion appeared on Lloyd’s face.

Wow. How did I come this far?

It was a match between two transcendental figures. Lloyd’s shoulders flinched as he watched Javier and Hell’s Knight blast shockwaves in the midst of their fight. Lloyd hated fighting. He never enjoyed it. Yes, originally, he was no one other than Suho Kim, an average fellow living in South Korea. So, what happened? How did he get involved in this fight?

Duh. I’m doing this for money.

It was too late to return to his old, ordinary lifestyle. No, he didn’t even have the desire to go back. Once he reached that conclusion, Lloyd grasped the metal shovel and sought the best timing. Right when Hell’s Knight was about to pummel Javier with great force, he lifted his shovel up and aimed at Cannavaro’s head. Determined, he shouted aloud.

“Over there! Hell’s Knight! Stop moving! Or else he dies!”

Lloyd’s yelling, which was charged with mana, effortlessly pierced Hell’s Knight’s skull.

“...!”

Lloyd’s inference created a tiny room for an attack on Hell’s Knight, which was wielding its sword so powerfully. And Javier was no fool to miss it.

Thwack! Clang!

The silvery long sword cut out a brilliant ray of light, parrying the black sword in one stroke. This thankfully allowed Javier to slip out from the unceasing offense of its opponent without harm and finally manage to maintain some distance and catch his breath for the first time Hell’s Knight had the upper hand. But Hell’s Knight was looking somewhere else, and it didn’t even look wistful. Instead, it turned and looked at Lloyd with dismay.

“What?”

Hell’s Knight glared at Lloyd in disbelief. Lloyd flinched instinctively when he received the hellish gaze, but he gathered his thoughts and looked straight at it.

“Can’t hear me?” asked Lloyd. “I thought I said it loud and clear! Wait, is your hearing bad because you’re a skeleton?”

“What is it that you want to say...?”

“Come on, I told you. I’ll kill this man if you don’t stop attacking.”

“Is this a fugitive situation? Against me?”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd nodded his head like it was obvious, so confidently that he seemed to say, “You’re done for!”

“This one summoned you, didn’t he? He dies, and you’ll be transported back to Hell. Come on, did you think I didn’t know about that?”

It was true. Cannavaro was the one who summoned it to this earth. It was he who marked the sculpture with his blood. And that shamanistic symbol was used as a means for Hell’s Knight to get here. So, if Cannavaro died, the summoning would stop as Hell’s Knight was brought here by the blood of Cannavaro.

“It’s simple. It’s exactly like taking a loan from a bank. Cannavaro put down the security, and he issued the certificate of proof with his own blood. That was how he allowed your arrival. But what if... Cannavaro, your security, dies? What do you think will happen to you?” asked Lloyd.

It was very simple. If the security was gone, the document was no more useful than tissue paper. Then the loan process would be a moot thing. That was the way it was.

“So, give up that scary sword and surrender. That is if you want to stay a little longer in this world, unlike Hell.”

Lloyd’s confident threat rang aloud the hall. Hell’s Knight was dismayed.

“Ha. How dare you. Tell me, are you not from this world?”

“What?”

“Your words and actions befit Hell, no matter how I look at it. Did you get banished from Hell and put on a cover as a human?”

“Not at all. You’re completely off-base.”

“Is that so? Anyway, I see your point. But you are missing something.”

“I’m missing something?” asked Lloyd.

“Indeed.”

“What could that be?”

“That human can die, but I can still stay here for an hour before I get transported back.”

“What?”

At that moment, Hell’s Knight lifted its sword, its movement frightfully swift and abrupt. The energy of death discharged out of its blade was like a tsunami and passed through the air to claim Lloyd’s life.

“...!”

Lloyd leaped midair as he tugged Cannavaro wrapped up in a spider web. He closely managed to avoid the blow, only to see the black sword charge down at him.

“I will slice you in half along with my human summoner.”

“Huh?”

Swooosh! Its sword cut the air and swung down. It was too fast and hostile. Lloyd couldn’t dare block it with his shovel. No, it came down too rapidly that he couldn’t find the time to do so. Had it not for the silvery long sword that intervened, Lloyd would have been sliced in half.

Thwack!

“...!”

A long sword suddenly came into view, blocking the black blade, ready to end his life. Then it parried the sword away.

Clang! Lloyd feared that his entire eardrum would burst. The banging noise threw Lloyd to the ground.

“Argh!”

“Get back on your feet. If you want to live.”

Javier icily spoke in Lloyd’s ears. Lloyd immediately jumped to his feet without thinking and grabbed his shovel and fixed his posture. Shoulder to shoulder, Javier and Lloyd stood as they faced Hell’s Knight, who stood ramrod straight.

Whoosh...

Lloyd unconsciously gulped, finally registering how formidable Hell’s Knight was. The aura and energy that it gave off became so evident as he stood face to face. It was terrifying even when it was without its horse and lacked an arm and leg.

Goodness, it feels like a novice gamer got involved in a battle between masters.

Chills ran down his spine. Every part of his body tensed up. His grip that grasped the shovel became wet with sweat. He never planned on getting so deeply involved in the fight. He simply wanted to use some trickery and shoot the mana blast at this hellish creature from afar.

“It appears that it regarded you as my weakness.”

Javier’s voice was stern.

“I know,” awkwardly smiled Lloyd. “It looks like it did.”

Hell’s Knight will lay a concentrated attack on me, Lloyd thought, and Javier will put himself in harm’s way to protect me.

That’s how it’s going to create a weakness. I’m a crack in a dam, and it’s going to focus on the crack. Just like how a small hole can cause a dam to collapse. It plans to take care of us both at once.

Hell’s Knight became plain and evident to Lloyd. But it was too late to give up and leave.

“Do not step back so hastily. You are now in its offense range. The moment you half-heartedly try to back down, you’ll be done for in less than a second,” warned Javier.

“I know. I know that too,” Lloyd smiled awkwardly

“Then apologize.”

“For what?” huffed Lloyd.

“For calling me Lady Ella just a while ago.”

“Okay. I’m sorry. I’m apologizing. You’re a good boy, Javier, aren’t you?”

“...”

“Now, what? What do you want me to do?” asked Lloyd as he stole his glance at Javier.

“Endure.”

“What?”

Right after that moment...

Whoosh! Lloyd wondered if this was what it felt like to take the full blow of a storm. Hell’s Knight hurtled forward after leaping up with one leg. And it brandished, no, swept its huge sword to the side.

Argh...!

Sensing that facing it head-on would get him sliced in half with him and his shovel, he instead rushed toward the incoming sword. He then stretched his shovel and shot the most powerful blow he could manage. A triple mana blast. Kaboom!

“...!”

His triple mana blast boasted an amazing power for a split second. Such an unexpected burst of power squarely collided with the incoming sword. But the latter wasn't affected. It instead slashed the triple mana blast force abreast and made its way further in.

Slash! Its sword sliced the triple mana blast in half, but it failed to cut Lloyd in half as it grew minutely weaker to slice the pressure of the triple mana blast. Lloyd used that opportunity to roll to the ground.

"Now!"

Lloyd yelled as he rolled under the incoming sword and held out both of his hands to hug the knight's pelvis and leg. That toppled, though very minimal, off its balance. Javier's long sword glinted ferociously just then.

Bam! His aura-charged long sword penetrated into the giant sword almost half, and Hell's Knight tried to shake Lloyd off its leg. But it couldn't do so as Javier started to lay into it without giving a moment to spare.

Thud! Twang! Thwack!

"...!"

Underneath was a human that was glued to it like a leech. Above was a determined knight who overpowered a sword master. Hell's Knight's gaze trembled. The situation turned for the worse for Hell's Knight as Lloyd began uttering mysterious, shamanistic chants as he clutched its leg.

"You are! You are born to be loved! And in this life of yours! You are loved!"

"...!"

Its gaze trembled some more. Its upper torso received the full brunt of Javier's swords, and its lower body was tortured by Lloyd, who continued to sing exotic songs. And these two discordant attacks doubled its agony. What was worse was that there was just no end to these contrasting attacks. Rattle! Rattle! Rattle!

Javier began to go all out in his attacks as the opportunity finally presented itself to him. And Lloyd's medley of exorcism chants became more diverse.

"Mahayana! Paramita! Sutra! Avalokitesvara! Prajna Paramita! Trayaya! Kamkani! Sutraaaa!"

"Argh...!"

What kind of bizarre sorcery was that? Hell's Knight was thrown into greater confusion. Of course, there was no direct damage from the songs. But its mind and spirit were utterly disturbed and confused. It was already receiving the full offense from Javier, and that alone demanded its full attention and power.

But this human that had latched himself on its one leg was singing this eerie incantation to his heart's content. Hell's Knight was on the verge of losing it. And how out-of-tune he was! Hell's Knight wondered if this was what it felt like to hear nails scratching a chalkboard or cicadas crying right into its ear. What was more than its noise was the discordant tunes. Yes, that was right. Lloyd was the worst tone-deaf, the worst kind that even Hell's Knight would be sickened of.

"Stop...!"

Finally, no longer able to endure any longer, Hell's Knight violently shook its head and leaped in the air with Lloyd still latched onto its leg. It was how much it wanted to wrench him off its feet. But that turned out to be a mistake.

Slash!

"...!"

It lost focus in a split second, and Javier's aura-charged silvery-long sword penetrated Hell's Knight's skull.

Chapter 176: Shoulder to Shoulder (2)

Slash! The aura-charged long sword radiated light, penetrating Hell's Knight's skull with the force of a lightning bolt. At that moment...

"...!"

Hell's Knight was leaping in the air, and its sword moved. Boom!

The sword swept through the space above it, right where Javier's blade came down. But its sword didn't overlap with the latter's trajectory. Was it because it missed? No.

It's aimed at Javier.

Lloyd's eyes flew open. Glued to its leg, Lloyd could see the whole thing just by lifting his head. And that was how he was able to see through Hell's Knight's intentions.

That monster is trying to die with Javier.

It appeared that it didn't intend to prevent its skull from getting pierced. Instead, it was trying to make use of that opportunity and grind his body whole. Lloyd immediately racked his brain posthaste and deliberated on the direction this fight must take onward.

I have a bad feeling about this.

Hell's Knight and Javier. What if they left fatal injuries to one another? Javier would be the only victim here. Hell's Knight would be relatively fine. Then left all alone, Lloyd would become its next prey.

I have to stop it!

Javier's long sword and Hell's Knight's sword. They were already charging toward their targets. The former toward the Hell's Knight's skull. The latter toward Javier's body. At the very moment they almost stabbed and slayed, Lloyd lifted both hands and grabbed his enemy's ribs revealed under its breastplate as though he was grabbing a metal bar. The Asrahan Core Technique, manaheart, and elbow and back muscles. He tugged as powerfully as he could, as though he was doing a pull-up.

Ack!!!

Crack! The Knight's torso was lightly pulled, and its movement shook for a split second less than one millimeter to the side. But that tiny difference changed the sword's trajectory.

Fwoosh! The grand sword sliced through the air but missed its target, and Javier twisted his body and held out his long sword up to the end.

Slash!

"...!"

Javier's long sword finally pierced its skull, and Hell's Knight jerked terribly at the blow. But as though it wasn't ready to give up yet, as though it was going to struggle for the last time, it wielded its sword as it twisted and turned its whole body, bent on destroying everything within its range. Javier didn't move back as well. Instead, he danced to its tune, and, in a magnificent burst of movement, he wielded his long sword to stab and slash Hell's Knight at every given chance. Each time he did so, the latter's body shook visibly. Lloyd joined in on the effort as he tightly hugged its pelvis and leg. After limiting its movement with his arms and legs like a cicada, Lloyd made innovative use of a weapon he could freely use. It was his mouth.

"Give me peace! Give me peace! Give me peace, peace, peace! Give me! Peace! Peaceee!"

Lloyd sang at the top of his lungs, reviving the memories he was in the military and recalling the times he used to follow his mother to the temple. Every Christian and Buddhist lyric he could remember was brought to use. His throat jerked heavily as he fired the ammunition of exorcist songs. But technically speaking, what came out of his tongue was more like a flood of discordant melody.

“May I be free from anger! Homage to him, the Gracious, the Exalted! Emptiness is nothing other than form! May I take care of myself and be happy! All dharmas are marked with emptiness!”

Lloyd sang, struggling with all of his might. Tunes were out, and his voice turned hoarse often. But it wasn’t intentional, of course. He was pretty serious about hitting the right tune. But the heavens didn’t bestow an iota of singing ability to him though it gave him the gift of studying. So yes, Lloyd was a horrible singer. The worst kind of all.

Dammit. I’m not... doing this because I want to, okay?!

Putting every ounce of his might and soul into singing, Lloyd recalled a past event. It must have been when he was a private. Singing gave him a massively hard time. Whenever everyone went out for a morning run, his senior ranks reamed him out for being a terrible singer. His singing was anything but acceptable, even when cadence hardly placed importance on getting the tones right. That wasn’t the only occasion. For a period of time, Lloyd regularly attended church for the first time in his life to eat the moon pie they handed out. But he wasn’t welcomed there. On the day he attended the church service and sang the hymn, Lloyd attracted a lot of glares due to his unforgivable singing. It was the case even though he had sung with quite an effort. The chaplain was flabbergasted by him.

He shot me a look as if I was a devil who descended on earth! His gaze is still clear in my head!

But that wasn’t all. There was another heartbreaking incident. It must have been right after coming back to school after his leave of absence. That marked the one and only time he had dated a girl in school. But one day, they headed to a karaoke room together, and as a result, they broke up the next day.

Okay, this is making me sad. Let’s stop thinking about this.

Lloyd decided to admit it. I am a horrible singer, he told himself. But that wasn't something to be ashamed of. Sometimes, that lack of skill can be used as a weapon!

Like now! Time to chant Thousand Eyes and Hands Sutra!

Lloyd's mind traveled back to his childhood days when he went up to a temple, her mother's hand in his. And the chant the monk had read aloud called to his mind. A flash of determination appeared in his eyes. From then on...

"Time for some mantra clean verbal karma!Suri Suri Mahasuri Susuri Savaha!"

Lloyd's voice, filled with distrust, started to echo through the land with more determination. That caused Hell's Knight to be massively disturbed.

"Stop...!"

Stop it, you animal!

Hell's Knight wanted to beg for real. It was already hard enough with this silver-haired knight alone, but this weirdo stuck to its leg was singing songs that even the devils would grow sick of. Moreover, his voice was terribly loud and high-pitched that his skull pierced with the sword would crack open. No, it actually was happening right now in real-time. It didn't have enough time to recover from the stabbing blow of Javier. And the consecutive blows that followed broke, smashed, and damaged Hell's Knight. And at last...

"Master Lloyd, now!"

Javier yelled, and an aura-charged mana blast burst out at the same time. Lloyd stopped singing at that moment, letting go of its pelvis and leg. And then he jerked to the side, the mana blast sweeping over him right then and attacking the upper torso of Hell's Knight.

"...!"

Kaboom! Hell’s Knight’s armor melted. Its sword moved forward for protection, its bones that gripped the sword and whole torso, everything got rampaged by the mana blast from the aura. Everything melted, crumbled, turned into powder, and vanished in thin air.

Clack! Its lower torso, which was barely left intact, shook. Its one knee went down, staggered to the side. Its joints snapped.

Crash... Now turned into powder, the upper torso vanished in thin air, and its lower torso was destroyed. A strange silence gripped the public hall. Lloyd, who had flung himself to the side, caught his breath and stood up.

W-we got it.

Lloyd internalized what he and Javier just did. The two of them had defeated Hell’s Knight. Just then...

“It is too early to be relieved,” Javier said. “It’s going to come back to life again.”

Javier spoke with a stern expression on his face. He even had his sword pointed at the pile of bones.

“Come back to life? Like a resurrection?” asked Lloyd in a daze.

“I don’t know. But...” Javier quickly replied to Lloyd. “It was like this before. Before you came, I killed it. But it came back to life completely intact and free of harm.”

“Hold on,” said Lloyd, “That means-”

“Its mana is still here.”

“...”

It was actually true. Lloyd could feel a large volume of mana in the pile of bones of its lower torso through using the Asrahan Core Technique. Nothing was gone. But that wasn’t all.

A large volume of mana is being held together in the air.

The bones that got crushed into powder after taking Javier's mana blast were drifting in the air. Lloyd could sense powerful mana coming from there as well.

What the heck?

His hair rose. The fact that the mana lingered in the air meant that Hell's Knight was still alive.

This is not good. That's right. The novel mentioned a similar thing as well.

Just then, Lloyd was reminded of a story in the novel. It was about what Cannavaro said right before the Namaran's Wall incident took place.

Cannavaro was confident that everything would be over once he summoned Hell's Knight. Yeah. He said that it's extremely powerful and endlessly revives since the creature is from Hell. I think it said that Hell's Knight can come back to life even after its bones become reduced to powder.

That was how persistent Hell's Knight was. And at the same time, the novel briefly mentioned the method to defeat it.

The only viable method is to deplete its mana. That was why Cannavaro brimmed with confidence. Honestly, it's understandable. To exhaust mana, one has to severely beat an object until it's left without any strength or absorb mana using a special magic spell or instrument.

Who in the world could render Hell's Knight to such a state? And what instrument or magic could absorb such a massive load of mana out of Hell's Knight? It was possible only in theory, and the world had no person, instrument, or magic that could do so. Therefore, the fictional Cannavaro ascertained that Hell's Knight was close to being invincible. In other words...

That goes the same right now.

Judging by what Javier said, it looked like Hell’s Knight was indeed capable of endlessly coming back to life.

“I will take care of it,” said Lloyd with finality in his voice.

“What?”

Javier turned to Lloyd, his eyes bulging in surprise, and it made Lloyd grin at the sight. It reflected very well how caring and worried Javier could be during critical moments, even though he acted grouchy about almost everything on most days.

“I will take care of it. You know it, too, right? What I am capable of,” Lloyd said.

“Do you mean the indiscriminate mana absorption?”

“Uh-huh.”

Supercharge. That was what they needed right now. Lloyd and Javier had to exhaust all the mana out of Hell’s Knight. Otherwise, they would have to take care of him every time he came back to life, and so, there was nothing as effective as the Supercharge skill to stop it altogether.

“So, step back, and make sure no one comes near.”

“Master Lloyd.”

“I know, I’m worried as well. Scared, too.”

Lloyd was scared. But he chuckled instead as he faced Javier, who was wearing a worrisome expression on his face.

“I am sure you will know as well. I don’t particularly enjoy overeating,” quipped Lloyd.

“Will you be all right?”

“I have to be. To be frank with you, I don’t like it either. But I don’t see any other alternative. My stomach will hurt, I fear, but I’ll do whatever I can now.”

Lloyd playfully shrugged his shoulders, and he was actually worried. In all seriousness, he was about to absorb Hell’s Knight’s mana. Lloyd wondered if he would be all right after indiscriminately absorbing its mana. When he thought so, a sense of resignation rushed through him as it looked absolutely outrageous. He was averse to the idea and scared.

But we’re going to die if I don’t do this. Javier can’t deal with Hell’s Knight forever, even if it’s him. The same goes for me. And for this city.

The chance to subdue Hell’s Knight was here, and he had to take it. It could never appear again. Everyone would be done for if he blew this chance, including him.

So, it’s do or die now. I die if I don’t do this, and I die if I fail. But if I succeed, I live.

There was no other alternative. He had to give it a try. Biting his lips, Lloyd stepped forward to the crushed lower torso of Hell’s Knight. He collected his breath and got ready.

“Step back.”

Javier stood back. And without any hesitation, Lloyd grabbed the metal shovel.

Boom! The full-blown triple mana blast penetrated the ceiling of the public hall, pushing his stamina and bringing a terrible pang of dizziness. Lloyd opened the skill window as he fought faint nausea. And he selected the optional skill.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Supercharge has been activated.]

[You are randomly absorbing a large amount of mana from your surroundings.]

From that moment, the three-stranded mana circles roared as they began to suck every mana around the place. It took in everything in its way, the marble flooring, the rolling specks of dust, Hell's Knight's leg, the bone powders in the air, and the mana. Everything was engulfed and absorbed. Nothing wasn't discriminated against. Both those that are easy to absorb and that are not, the pure and the impure were all absorbed. The suction power usurped, exploited, and stole everything around it. If Hell's Knight was summoned with all parts intact and didn't remain in such a vulnerable state, it would've been able to cope with it and resist the Supercharge. But not now. It was summoned with defects. It had been defeated and remained vulnerable.

"...!"

As the suctioning power rampaged the whole area, Hell's Knight, Sir Giolexius, the Corps Commander of Hell, screamed as it perished. That was the end of it. And later...

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Your Supercharge time is up.]

The rampaging mana absorption was over. The roaring mana circle calmed down. Lloyd slowly opened his eyes, and his eyes noticed a host of messages floating in the air.

[You have eliminated Hell's Knight, Sir Giolexius the Corps Commander under the King of Hell.]

Chapter 177: When Skeletons Pay Their Debts (1)

[The 4th optional skill of the manaheart, “Zombie Domination,” has been separated to become an independent skill.]

What?

Lloyd opened his eyes wide right after he used the Supercharge. He had risked himself using the skill to decisively end Hell’s Knight and succeeded in stopping its infinite resurrection power. It was either do or die. The first thing that crossed his mind when he opened his eyes was...

I’m alive.

Then he noticed the pleasing messages in front of him. What pleased him more than the content was that he could see the messages themselves. It at least meant that he didn’t die.

What happened to Hell’s Knight?

Lloyd quickly looked around like a kid sneaking into the kitchen trying to steal cookies from a cookie jar without getting caught by his mother.

It’s gone.

He couldn’t feel Hell’s Knight’s mana. The violent and evil energy was now completely gone. What it meant was clear. Hell’s Knight had been eliminated. It worked. Now relieved, Lloyd moved his gaze to the messages. Now that the crisis was overcome, it was time to reap the benefits and party. And like a fisherman gazing at a net full of fish, Lloyd read through the message.

[Zombie Domination skill has been upgraded.]

[Zombie Domination skill has been reinforced.]

[The various restrictions and conditions attached to Zombie Domination have largely been relaxed and eliminated.]

Oh!

Lloyd was off to a good start. He had a good feeling as well. His heart pounded in expectation. His eyes moved faster.

[Your manaheart has absorbed and processed the mana of Hell's Knight. But since you are a mortal, you cannot make all of it yours. However, a portion of the mana in your manaheart can now reverberate with the mana of the undead.]

[This characteristic has escalated your manaheart's optional skill, Zombie Domination, into an independent skill.]

[Skill Name: Zombie Domination]

[Stage: Basic Lv.1]

[You can dominate low-grade undead soldiers at a set scale. The undead soldiers under your domination will provide unconditional allegiance and faithfulness to you.]

[Types of undead soldiers you can dominate: zombies and skeletons.]

[The number of undead soldiers you can dominate: 200]

[The current number of undead soldiers under your domination: 0]

Wow.

Lloyd was agape after he read the skill. This was incredible. Was it because he could dominate undead soldiers?

No! I was given free laborers to use from now on!

His eyes glimmered. Now, he held 200 laborers who were extremely efficient. No pay. No rest. No mercy. These skeletons could shovel on and on even under the harshest circumstances. And Lloyd didn’t have to feed them. Not even breakfast or anything else. And what about their lodging? Just 200 coffins that fit their bodies. That would allow them to find their own coffins and cover the lid and rest. Simply put, Lloyd earned 200 work robots that wouldn’t demand any wage or food.

Good. Covering the workers’ wages was getting out of hand.

A large grin hung on his face as he thought about it. Lloyd was a seasoned engineer who had completed a host of construction projects. And throughout his career, he never even once missed paying his workers. Regardless of the size of the construction, even if it meant emptying his own wallet, Lloyd dutifully ensured that his workers got paid. Come hell or high water. Given the depressing experiences he’d gone through back in Korea, how could he not?

I didn’t want to stoop down to their level and become trash.

Lloyd’s heart stung whenever he thought about unpaid labor. There was a time he had worked hard but failed to receive his wages. He would file a complaint to his managers, but it would only invite mockery and ignorance. The supervisors dismissed him, saying that he should stop acting like a rookie and that everyone has their own situation to consider. These employers acted brazenly that they, too, were in a difficult spot. Lloyd hated them for that. And that was the reason for it. Lloyd never wanted to repeat those disgusting deeds now stuck in his heart like a dagger. As such, Lloyd faithfully paid his workers the best he could when it came to their wages. There were times when he pushed himself beyond his limits to pay his workers. Coming to Namaran was one example. He decided to come here for the sole purpose of acquiring money to pay the workers.

Sure, there’s the side objective of preventing the Namaran’s Wall incident, but still.

Projects like the apartment complex and sewage system, which covered the entire fiefdom, required Lloyd to pay a large sum of money to the workers at the end of the year. That was why he came here and took on the slope stabilization project. But once everything was over and the wages were given out without any issue, Lloyd wouldn’t have to worry about this anymore.

Now, I can use these undead soldiers for small construction projects. And I’ll team them up with some engineers. That’s going to let me cut down the labor costs by a good amount.

The engineering corps could supervise the scene and make sure everything happened according to plan. The undead soldiers would be in charge of the chores. Lloyd could see it happening in his head. But that wasn’t the last of his rewards. An additional message appeared.

Ding dong.

[You have participated in heroic combat to eliminate Hell’s Knight, the corps commander from Hell.]

[In the process, you have merited great credit in turning the table in hopeless combat by seriously damaging your opponent’s hearing.]

[Some of the citizens in Namaran city have witnessed and heard the scene of resolve, courage, and outrageous off-tune.]

[For this, a unique title of yours will spread throughout the city of Namaran.]

[You have earned a new title.]

[A new title <Hell’s Singer>.]

[Hell’s Singer]

[Title Level: Regional Epic Tale & Scary Story]

The Namaran’s Wall stood tall and high. People fell, crying out loud. Everyone searched for redemption when the silver-haired knight got to his feet. Combat he did against Hell’s Knight. But he was outpowered. The power of Hell was overcome, only to return. The silver-haired knight pleaded before the mysterious power. Who shall stand shoulder to shoulder and fight with me? Who shall, with valor, come forward for everyone? I only seek one. Then someone called out. I want peace! Mahavanya Suri Suri Sabaha! Like a leech, the man clutched the Hell's Knight's leg. The thunderous voice plunged the Knight into doom. Stop it! Do not sing! No more noise, please! Those were the last words of Hell's Knight.

[Compliment Effect: You have become a celebrity among all existence, including the undead. You are now notorious for owning a devilish musical sense in this earth and hell. For this, every creature in this earth and hell will fear, or at times respect, your singing.]

"..."

Now, it was nationally acknowledged that Lloyd was a bad singer. No, since the region included Hell, his out-of-tune singing had become known globally and in another dimension.

It sucked that things ended badly with my crush just because I sang terribly, and now, this?! Right, Eunhyang?

Lloyd called the name of his former crush in his head bitterly, but no reply came back. Instead of her, Lloyd only saw Javier's gaze boring into him, completely oblivious to what was happening in the former's heart.

"...All right?" asked Javier.

“Huh?”

A hand waved through the messages, breaking Lloyd’s trance. It was Javier who was motioning his hand in front of Lloyd.

“Are you all right?” Javier asked again. His studious gaze seemed to be more discreet than usual, just a little bit.

“Wait, are you worried about me?” asked Lloyd as he chuckled.

To his surprise, Javier nodded without denial.

“Yes, I am worried about you.”

“The heck? Have you lost your mind?”

Javier’s honesty flabbergasted Lloyd.

“You. Who are you?” asked Lloyd in astonishment.

“...”

“Javier isn’t the type of person to do this. Be frank with me. Where did you hide my dear Javier? Did you kidnap him? Lock him up? Or tie him down? Is he alive?”

“I... was neither kidnapped nor locked away,” said Javier lightly.

“Then how? What change of attitude do you have to tell me that you’re worried about me? Do you have a favor to ask me?”

“No, of course not. But...”

Javier’s eyes grew serious.

“As I listened to your song, I became worried.”

“While you were listening to me sing?” inquired Lloyd, quite not following with Javier.

“Yes.”

“What about it?”

“Your melody and tune were hellish. Hearing them alone hurt my ears. I almost used the mana blast on you, not the skeleton knight. I was provoked.”

“Hey...” muttered Lloyd.

“That is why I am worried. Are you mentally all right? Has the warlock put horrible thoughts into your head without your knowledge?” asked Javier, every one of his words serious.

“Hey, I’m-”

“Are you,” Javier interrupted, “truly fine?”

“...”

Looking at his grim and serious gaze brought an onrush of bitterness in Lloyd’s heart. Biting the underlip hard, Lloyd retorted, “I am perfectly fine!”

“Do you really mean it?”

“Uh-huh.”

“But how do you explain such eerie singing then-”

“I tried my best,” huffed Lloyd as he cut in.

“Master Lloyd, then could you be-”

“Don’t go there.”

“Tone-deaf...”

“I said, don’t go there.”

“...”

The worrisome gaze vanished instantly to be replaced with regret and pity. Lloyd sighed. For almost a second there, he was touched by Javier’s surprising concern.

“Tsk,” replied Lloyd as he changed the subject. “Now’s not the time for that. Let’s move now. We need to check on the people, too. By the way, how about you? You all right?”

“Yes. I’m fine.”

“Let’s go then.”

“Yes.”

The joy of victory lasted only briefly as the noise outside the messy public hall brought them back to reality. The noise came from the people who had passed out after the wall usurped all of their mana. Lloyd and Javier collected their breaths, slowly activating the Asrahan Core Technique when they figured out the source of the noise. Then they turned toward the exit of the public hall. The situation was not yet over. People needed emergency treatment.

“In a situation like this, the Asrahan Core Technique will be effective,” said Javier.

“Yeah. Should we transfer the mana into them after absorbing the mana in the air?” asked Lloyd.

“It sounds like it will be a long and tiring day.”

“Yes, I agree.”

With faint smiles on their faces, they left the public hall.

The situation was taken care of with ease. And thankfully, no Namaran citizen died from this incident. It was because the wall that devoured people's mana was neutralized relatively early, so most people didn't lose mana to the point of losing their lives. But there were quite a number of those who were seriously worn out and exhausted. Lloyd and Javier focused on those people.

The Asrahan Core Technique specialized in absorbing and discharging mana, and that undoubtedly played a critical role. It saved the people who were dangerously mana-depleted. It awakened those who were passed out. It revitalized those who were barely holding on. And as for Cannavaro, he was moved to the palace like cargo, neutralized and incapacitated.

He'll probably be questioned in the palace. A team of the best of the best royal magicians will brainwash him to get a confession out of him. After all, Queen Magentano is merciless and unreserved when it comes to these matters. She's extremely blunt.

On the second night of straining themselves in treating people, Lloyd sank on the bed, dead tired as he pushed away his idle thoughts. But strangely, he couldn't fall asleep even when he was on the bed. Could it be because he was too tired? His body lay flat on the bed like a wet laundry, but his mind drifted back to thoughts that distracted him.

I envy you, Javier, in times like these.

Lloyd glanced at Javier, who was already sleeping well on the bed beside his. One lullaby, and that was all it took to put him to sleep. Lloyd was envious. He direly wanted to sleep, but it didn't allow him to. Instead, all sorts of thoughts and concerns continued to attack him.

Thankfully, the Namaran situation is over. And though Count Namaran is terribly worn out that he needs some days to rest, he's overall fine. Then nothing to worry about, I guess No, I don't think that's the case.

The Namaran situation was over after a tediously long process. But Lloyd continued to frown. Why? The reason was simple.

Sure, it's good that the situation is over, but construction-wise, it was a huge stumbling block.

It was true. Now that the people had lost great volumes of mana, they were wretchedly exhausted. They could walk around but needed time until they recovered enough energy to do any work that required strength.

You know, like work on construction sites.

Construction projects were laborious. They involved transferring heavy materials and shoveling, pickaxing, and hammering all day in both hot and cold environments. And those in charge of such tasks were the people of this city. In other words, those who were supposed to be put to construction needed to rest as they'd lost a large volume of energy.

They need to rest for at least 15 days to restore their energy. Shoot, I hate delaying construction schedules.

The slope stabilization project Lloyd had earned here in the city was almost done in design. The timing was perfect for forming a team and starting with the basic construction, but now, an unexpected labor issue raised his hackles.

I want to finish the construction fast. I want to earn a lot of money and go back home. I want to retire in my fiefdom without worrying about money.

He wished that the undead soldiers would show up now. That would allow him to mobilize the laborers using the zombie domination skill.

It's not like I can dig graves now.

He couldn't, and that frustrated him. The Zombie Domination skill was a good skill, except for the part where getting his hands on the undead soldiers was a bit tricky.

Should I learn dark magic or something? I'm too lazy to bother with that. I don't want to, either. Oh, what the heck. Let's just sleep.

Lloyd tossed and turned in his bed. Enough with thoughts and concerns. It was time to sleep as he was tired. Resolved, he closed his eyes, and his body started to grow tired, and he started to become drowsy.

Okay, very good. Just like this. Nothing more. Then goodnight every-

Just then…

Knock knock knock. There was a knock on his door, immediately reviving the frown that left his forehead. Oh, come on! Lloyd exclaimed internally as he was just about to fall asleep.

I'm going to ignore it.

This time, Lloyd lay on his belly, covering his head with the pillow. But the unwelcome visitor seemed to have no thoughts of leaving him alone.

Knock knock knock knock knock!

Lloyd wanted to yell at the person to leave. But he was already rising up from bed.

Ugh. Let's make this quick.

Lloyd wondered who in the world it could be that the knocking was so fervent. A person from the count? Another emergency? Lloyd sighed.

This is nuts.

He knew from past experience that it was better in these situations to just give the person what they desire. That would make the visitor leave quickly, and he could fall back to sleep in peace.

"Now, what could bring you here to knock on my door in the middle of the night while I was trying to sleep."

Lloyd grumbled as he opened the door, and then he stopped dead. Lloyd was completely frozen when he saw the visitors.

Skeletons. Headless skeletons were in front of the room, and the number seemed to be about 200.

“What now…”

A visit from skeletons at this hour? Lloyd was trying to make sense of things when every single of them suddenly got on their knees. They bowed ceremoniously as their bone joints squeaked. Then the one in the front held out a sketchbook-sized paper, flipping page after page slowly. There were messages they had written in advance.

“You did not throw away our skulls.”

“You are our lifesaver.”

“We want to pay our debts.”

“We will do anything.”

“Can you take us in as we have nowhere else to go?”

“...”

The group of skeletons had come to return a favor during the middle of the night. At their unexpected offer, all sleep left Lloyd, and he became wide awake.

Chapter 178: When Skeletons Pay Their Debts (2)

“Are you saying that you’re boundlessly grateful to me for not throwing away your skulls?”

Crack!

Slightly past 12 midnight, Lloyd, who was still unable to turn out the candlelight in his room, pressed his eyes hard. He was fatigued. He had been busy all day. After fierce combat with Hell’s Knight, he had to use the Asrahan Core Technique to treat people in the city. And just when he thought he’d be able to finally get some rest, Lloyd received 200 skeletons as unexpected visitors.

“We are more than thankful.”

One skeletal soldier nodded at his question. Then it jotted down a response quickly on the paper. Lloyd wondered if it was the leader of the group. It introduced itself as “Turtle Neck.” Grabbing the piece of soot in its hand, Turtle Neck wrote next.

“We were lost. As if that wasn’t bad enough that we died an unjust death, only our skulls were buried in the cold ground. And our bodies were used as headless zombies.”

“Oh,” reacted Lloyd in realization, “So, the zombies that protected the dark magicians yesterday were you guys?”

“Yes, that is right.”

“And now?”

“Most of the dark magicians are dead. The power of Cannavaro has been shackled. As a result, we were freed from the curse. In the process, all of our rotten flesh has disappeared, leaving us as nothing but bones.”

“Um, then what about the zombies I killed?”

“They are over there.”

Turtle Neck pointed to one side, where two soldiers were raising their bony hands.

-From left, they are Square Jaw and Frozen Shoulder.

“...”

“When you first attacked the warlock yesterday, they were completely knocked out. Their bodies were gone.”

“Oh, yes, that happened,” agreed Lloyd.

“But once the curse was lifted, the bones that turned into powder were restored. But we do not know the detailed reason or explanation behind it.”

“Whatever the case is, it’s all good, isn’t it?”

“Yes, that is right.”

Turtle Neck nodded its skull. It flipped to the next page, as there wasn’t any space left to write, and started to scribble on a new piece of paper. Its black letters filled the white paper.

“Once the curse was gone, we were gathered in one place. We discussed among ourselves what we must do onward. To tell you the truth, it was a short discussion as we all had the same feeling.”

“Feel what?” asked Lloyd.

Turtle Neck tapped its skull with its hand.

“Our heads.”

“Skulls?”

“Yes. We already had the same feeling. That someone had excavated our skulls. Moreover, the person hadn’t thrown them away, and instead, kept them safe.”

“Wait, are you talking about what I did with the skulls?”

“Yes.”

Turtle Neck nodded once again.

“I have heard everything. How you respectfully bowed at our skull each time you took a jewel. How you wished us peace even though you didn’t know what hardships we went through. How you wished for us to rest in peace.”

“...”

Lloyd shut his mouth. Those words were what he said out loud every time he dug out the skulls. He had thought that was the decent thing to do for the dead as he pitied those that were used by the dark magicians. He simply spoke his heart out loud, promising himself that he’d bury them in good soil.

I didn’t know they were listening.

Lloyd was slightly content but embarrassed at the same time. Just then, a thought interrupted him. One winter, when he was still living in a rental room in South Korea, he was coming back home after receiving his set wage for the day from the construction site. On his way, he spotted an elderly woman setting vegetables on the street. All she was selling were about three or four baskets of plants, but it looked like she wasn’t making any sales. And without any fur hats or gloves, she strove to clean up the piling snow from the vegetables. Her hands were blistered. It was probably because of this sight that prompted Lloyd to walk up to her and ask how much the vegetables were. He then brought out an envelope that contained his pay.

Later that day, I thought I was wild for doing that.

Sure, he did an act of kindness, and it was a good deed. No doubt. But how he regretted it after that night! A loser. A buffoon. An idiot. Lloyd was berated with regret that he was the most foolish person. Why? He had to go for several days without food since he spent all his money. From that day onward, Lloyd refrained from being too kind. It was only natural after learning the price of an impulsive act of kindness. Being kind was good, but it had to be done within his capacity. He had been living his life with such resolve. It had been the same as in his recent days and even right now. And so, it was no different when he excavated the skulls to get his hands on 200 stones. He kept the skulls because it was something that fell within his capacity. He had done it out of respect. It was beyond Lloyd's imagination that he'd be rewarded in this manner.

"Um, in short, are you asking me to take you all?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes, that is right."

The leader of the skeleton soldiers, Turtle Neck, nodded and wrote its response.

"Without you, we would not have found our skulls to this day. They were buried with a magic spell."

"Is that so?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes."

"But if you follow me, you'll be put to strenuous work. Is it okay with you even if you can't rest while you're dead?"

"We have been given life after our deaths anyway. There is no rest for us. Our only destiny is being wiped out by adventurers and armies as we wander in the wilderness. Instead of that life, we choose to live under your official and reliable protection."

"Huh. That makes sense. Right?"

Lloyd grinned as he turned to the side. Javier was sitting on the edge of the bed, his eyes still heavy with sleepiness.

What is going on?

Javier sighed loudly. He was sleeping well as usual after hearing Lloyd's lullaby and enjoying his dream until the bedroom started to grow noisy. Javier started to hear Lloyd's voice, and there were a lot of clacking and cracking sounds. Wondering if it was an enemy, Javier slightly opened his eyes, only to be terrified by what was happening in the room. Anyone would have screamed in a panic if they, too, witnessed their room packed with 200 skeletons right after waking up. Had Lloyd not explained the situation to Javier just in time, he would have charged and smashed every single skeleton he saw in a snap.

Who'd have imagined that I would meet a person who uses skeleton soldiers as construction workers?

That very person was the young master he served. Another sigh. While Javier sighed, Lloyd distributed the employment contract to the skeleton soldiers.

"What is this?"

Turtle Neck cocked its skull.

"An employment contract," replied Lloyd obviously.

The corners of his lips were pulled upward. Why? He had a lot on his mind about the labor supply problem, and he had been wistful for not having undead soldiers even when he held the Zombie Domination skill.

[The number of undead soldiers you can dominate: 200]

[The current number of undead soldiers under your domination: 200]

And now, I've got an infinite amount of workers free of charge!

The rewarding message appeared in front of his eyes, and Lloyd smiled in contentment.

The next day, Lloyd went out of his lodging once the sun rose. He was heading to Count Namaran's office, and in his hand was a roll of documents. They were the construction plan and construction blueprint.

Lalala! Lala!

Last night, Lloyd was able to solve the labor supply issue thanks to the contract. As he had been industriously surveying and designing the construction before the wall incident broke out, he managed to outline the construction schedule in advance. Now that everything was set, it was unnecessary to delay the date. All he needed was to hand the construction plan to Count Namaran and ask for the latter's cooperation in providing the materials needed for the actual construction.

Finish the construction. Get the construction money. Go back to my fiefdom. And et voila! A shining life of clover awaits me now that the apartment complex and the sewage system has been completed.

This construction would be the last. With just one more push, he'd be able to receive a maintenance fee from this fiefdom, which would become a good enough pension to last him for the rest of his life.

Lalalala! Yes, yes!

His shoulders quirked in joy on their own, and humming, which was all out of tune and melody, flowed out. He even tap-danced his way up to the count's office. But when he entered, something entirely unexpected met him.

"Will you be my son-in-law?"

"..."

What was going on now? Lloyd stared at Count Naraman as he felt his breathing losing that previous excitement. The count was covered with a thick blanket, and he had a terrible coughing fit.

“Ehem!” Cough! Achoo! “Was my request too abrupt?” asked the count.

“Ah, yes. Just a little...”

“To be honest, I did not expect to make such a request, either.”

The count bitterly smiled with a wretched face.

“Lloyd Frontera, I am sure you can look at my face now. How do I look?”

“Um, slightly ill, Your Excellency.”

“Right? And that is the reason.”

The count sighed and continued to speak.

“This incident... It has been terribly difficult for me. My body feels like it belongs to someone else. The doctor tells me that a year of recuperation will help me, but... I am not sure. The evil warlock took away too much of my energy with his game. To be honest, I wish to rest now.”

“Excuse me?” asked Lloyd in surprise.

“Is that so surprising? Haha. I am saying I wish to rest. Retire.”

The count chuckled happily.

“If I were an ordinary old man, I would not have done this. I would have tried to stick to my place. But who am I? I am the ruler of this city. How can I then rule over the city when I cannot even take care of my health? No. No. That is not the case and will only hurt everyone.”

“But Count Namaran-”

“I love this city,” the count interrupted first, “I devoted my whole life to this place, Namaran. And that is why it will only create problems for this old man to reign over things when I should be recuperating. So, I thought that I should find someone stronger, healthier, and smarter. Someone who can help my city. That kind of person should govern the city.”

“Ehem, Your Excellency? I do not think I was being frank with you a while ago, but...”

“Hmm?”

“You look more than fine.”

“...”

“So healthy that you could get to your feet now and run until you reach the opposite side of the wall.”

“Haha, this fellow.”

The count chuckled, and all of a sudden, Lloyd felt alarmed. His attempt to dismiss his words didn’t work. The count appeared adamant as though he had a firm resolve. Soon, Lloyd’s thoughts were actualized when the count called someone into the office.

“You must have been waiting for long. Step out now.”

Right after the count spoke, a door in the office opened from which Lady Namaran came out. Head down, her cheeks glowed in rosiness as she sat beside the count. The count looked at her daughter with a contented gaze, which moved to Lloyd’s way.

“What do you say?” asked Count Namaran. “How about starting a relationship with this child? Moreover, do rule over the city for me.”

“...”

“Do accept the request of this old man.”

“...”

The count’s voice grew more desperate. Lloyd was flustered to the core.

Woah, this is wild.

Lloyd had thought the Namaran’s Wall incident was over. And that was why he only Goodness, I think I accomplished too much for this place.

Lloyd sweated profusely in his hands because it looked like he had over-accomplished things here. The city redemption and killing Hell’s Knight. Though he had expected that a reward that wasn’t ordinary would await him, it never occurred to him that the count would be willing to present him with his daughter and the whole city. This, in all seriousness, was a massive offer. Just one nod and he’d become the count that rules over Namaran. And if he was bequeathed with the Frontera fiefdom in the future, he’d amass the tremendous power of governing two counties.

But...

For some reason, he didn’t want to. He wasn’t feeling it. Was it because he wasn’t greedy for power? Or because he felt it was way too much? No.

It does not sit well with me.

That was his honest opinion. And he didn’t like the idea of tying the knot with Lady Namaran, whom he had no feelings for. Besides, ruling over two counties would only give him a headache.

Reigning over the Frontera fiefdom is hard enough. It’s complicated and tiring. All I want is to stay in a quiet fiefdom and spend the rest of my life enjoying the goodness of life. But everyone seems to be hell-bent on giving me more responsibilities.

If he held the power to select his life genre, he’d choose the calm, peaceful life story. Or he’d choose to become a character who enjoys life as a landlord. Ambition for power, risky adventures, overcoming disasters... All of those options weren't his cup of tea. They wore him out, and it was more so because he had already worked his ass off in South Korea. All he really wanted was a modest, peaceful life. And so...

I have to turn down this offer.

Resolved, Lloyd racked his brain for a reasonable way to reject the count's offer, one that would forever stop him from making this kind of offer ever again. What would it be? What excuse would prevent him from doing so? Lloyd's gaze suddenly moved to Lady Namaran, and it naturally hit him. He recalled the tragic and dramatic ending of her story arc. Her noble sacrifice for the city.

"Your Excellency," said Lloyd, "I well understand what you mean, and your cause. But please forgive me. I cannot accept your offer to be your son-in-law and to rule over this city."

"What...?"

The count's eyes shook.

"Turning down such an amazing offer?" the count continued in dismay, "Do you not know what this offer means? What could be the reason for your rejection?"

It looked like the count was flustered considerably. Well, it made sense. After all, he was proposing to hand over his daughter and the whole city. Any normal person would have begged on their knees to receive this offer. But not Lloyd. He instead fixed his eyes on the count with aplomb, and in a serious face and voice, he spoke.

"As there is a ruler who is more befitting than I am to rule this city. And she is here."

Lloyd pointed at Lady Namaran.

Chapter 179: A Reliable Supporter (1)

Lloyd's hand moved and pointed at the seat beside the count across from Lloyd. He was pointing at his daughter, Lady Namaran, and that made count's white beard twitch.

"My daughter? She is an excellent ruler?" inquired the count.

"Yes, Your Excellency."

"What do you mean by that?"

Followed by his beard, his eyebrows twitched next. Lloyd's words were a mystery. Old and in severe need of rest, he needed a successor to rule the city after him. And unfortunately, he didn't have a son but an only daughter. As such, he contemplated the matter for several days. Who was a suitable candidate? Or should he overtax himself and endure a little longer? That was when it occurred to him that there was Lloyd. Practically and nominally, he was a good candidate.

He's young and competent. He's clever, industrious and has accomplished a great thing for the city. Not only that, he is greatly favored by Her Majesty. There is no one better than him who can reign the city.

That was the conclusion the count drew at last. And so, he had made an offer to Lloyd. Marry my daughter. Be my successor and rule this city. Assured that Lloyd would accept the offer, the count waited in anticipation. From the count's standpoint, no, according to common sense, his acceptance was only obvious since it was a tremendous opportunity to become a count at a young age and rule over the great city. But what?

He refuses and tells me that my daughter is a more fitting ruler for the city?

Such a possibility never crossed his mind. His daughter was just his daughter and nothing more. He simply wished that she would marry a good man and help advance the family line. Though he cherished and loved her, he never imagined handing the countship to his daughter, who had been sheltered and had never seen the harshness of life. Her being a ruler never crossed his mind.

“Are you mocking this old man?”

Count Namaran scowled, wrinkling his eyes. Though old and sick, he nonetheless gave off the force befitting a man who has ruled over a city his whole life. But Lloyd remained calm and unperturbed despite the other’s glare and tone of voice. He neither grinned nor shrugged. Instead, he looked at the count with a more serious look.

“Your Excellency, I am being sincere,” said Lloyd.

“Sincere?” asked the count.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

Lloyd slightly nodded, alternately looking at the count and Lady Namaran.

“What will I ever attain by mocking you?” asked Lloyd, emphasizing every word. “I have no intentions of that. So, please consider my words, Your Excellency.”

“Then where are you getting at? How is my daughter a suitable ruler of this city?”

“I also meant every word when I said it,” said Lloyd.

“Sincere?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“And where is your basis?” demanded the count.

“I saw it myself. I saw how her unreserved hesitation and sacrifice the day the cursed wall was erected,” said Lloyd solemnly.

“What could you mean...?”

“I saw how exhausted she was after guiding the old servants and maids to the shade.”

A soft smile escaped him. Lady Namaran. His smile deepened as he thought about her more. It was because of the deeds she manifested in the novel and this life.

How could she be so relaxed?

In the novel and his current life, in both worlds, she wore a pendant, which was her father’s childhood gift. But it wasn’t an ordinary pendant. It was rare and held the invaluable power of partially protecting the effect of various spells and curses. Thanks to it, she managed to stay awake longer than other people, even when the wall was put up. She had enough strength to crawl with some struggle.

And that was how she thwarted Cannavaro. By crawling. She used all of her body to thwart and disturb that warlock who was in the ritual to summon Hell’s Knight. That was how she died, and those few seconds she bought allowed Javier to stop the summoning ritual.

That was how she met her end in the novel. And what about here? Though she didn’t die, she did good deeds relying on the power of her pendant as she strained to take care of the elderly servants and maids. She guided them towards some shade and massaged their arms and legs. Then, even when she was on the brink of fainting, she continued to nurse and tend to them until, at last, she passed out.

“I accidentally spotted her while I moved around treating people. And I heard it too. The servants and maids were all praising her,” Lloyd said, “the sight they saw as they lost consciousness. How the lady strove to take care of their menial existence. How they will never forget that scene for the rest of their lives.”

Lloyd sent a content gaze at her. But her face was bright red. Could it be because her good deeds were revealed? This made his eyes glint with more contentment.

“That is the kind of person your daughter is, Your Excellency,” Lloyd continued, “She is always ready to sacrifice herself and give her life to this city and its people anytime.”

“But this girl has never reigned-”

“Certainly,” Lloyd cut in modestly, “she lacks experience.”

Before the count could rebut, Lloyd began to speak, slowly persuading him.

“Of course, she’ll probably make many mistakes at first. But she will learn from them. But will it not be the case for me as well? I am also certain the same applies to you, that is, when you were young, Your Excellency.”

“Ehem...! Ehem! Why do you have to cite me as your example?” huffed the count.

“I simply wanted to say that we all start somewhere,” defended Lloyd, “especially in a position that involves ruling a city and shouldering countless lives. And that is why...”

Lloyd pointed at Lady Namaran again.

“If everyone will be inadequate in the beginning, why not leave it on someone who is ready to completely devote herself to the city?”

“What about you?” asked the count.

“I am not cut out for it, Your Excellency. I can’t.”

“Why do you say so?”

“Because I am greedy,” replied Lloyd with certainty in his voice. “I might increase the tax by tenfold right away. Why shouldn’t I? This isn’t my hometown. And I’m not particularly attached to it. Well, speaking straightforwardly, I couldn’t care less whether the people here starve or not,” drawled Lloyd.

“I can see that you are saying that on purpose,” pointed Count Namaran.

“Yes. I am trying to emphasize that at least your daughter will never do the things I just said.”

“...”

“What’s more, she is a local here. This is her home. She will be more knowledgeable than a stranger like me.”

“...”

“How does that sound, Your Excellency?”

Lloyd grinned after finishing speaking. Count Namaran shot a meaningful gaze at him. “My good fellow, why are you doing this?”

“My lord?” asked Lloyd in mild surprise.

“I offered a position,” the count went on, “one which anybody would be envious of. I even offered my daughter’s hand with it, making it all the more legitimate. How can you remain so nonchalant as you refuse this offer?”

“I have told you, Your Excellency, I am greedy.”

“What?” Count Namaran frowned.

“In all honesty,” Lloyd said casually, “money isn’t the only thing I’m greedy for. I am avaricious when it comes to leisure as well. That is why I secretly pray every night that my Count Frontera will live long, even after he reaches 100 years old.”

“Your reason... seems far from filial piety.”

“That is right,” Lloyd answered. “It’s more convenient for me if he lives a long, healthy life.”

There wasn’t a single lie in his words. He liked Count Frontera as a respectable leader. And so, he dearly wished that the count would live a long life. After all, a count’s son had fewer responsibilities compared to the count. The less work there was for him, the more things he had to enjoy. Just like that, he would lead a comfortable life of relaxation.

“That’s who I am,” continued Lloyd, “After going through a lot physically and mentally, I am now drained. I want to rest. I don’t want to be burdened by too many responsibilities. I simply want to live a quiet life, enjoying what I already have,” replied Lloyd, his voice dripping with exhaustion.

“Do you not have any grand ambitions or dreams as a man?” inquired the count.

“Ambitions and dreams do not put food on the table, Your Excellency.”

That certainly was the case. A modest life. An ordinary life. A life of having just enough. Lloyd simply wanted to live without a care in the world and pass away when his time came. His ultimate dream and wish were to live as a lazy landlord.

“I see... Since you are adamant... I cannot force my will on you,” said the count in resignation.

“Thank you, Your Excellency, for acknowledging my will.”

“But I won’t immediately agree with your drastic plan to designate my daughter as the count. However, I will give my full consideration for it.”

“That is very relieving to hear. I was getting worried that I crossed the line,” answered Lloyd.

“Haha, what a brazen fellow you are,” chuckled the count.

“While you are complimenting me, Your Excellency, please say that I am tactful.”

“Tsk. It would have been wonderful if you reigned the city,” the count said wistfully.

“Lady Namaran will do a much better job than I ever could, Your Excellency.”

“Now, where is the man that worried whether he had crossed the line?”

“Was there such a man?” joked Lloyd.

“Ahaha. How strange. I do not hate you even when you act like this.”

“There is nothing special about me. It is all because of your generosity, my father-in-law, oops. I meant to say, my count.”

“Hahaha! Look at you!”

The count finally burst into laughter, and he gazed at Lloyd more meaningfully than before.

“I see... I will seriously think over your advice.”

“Thank you, Your Excellency.”

“No,” the count said as he waved his hands, “the gratitude is mine. Had it not for you and Sir Asrahan, I, my daughter, and this city would have perished. While we are on this topic, I have something to say. Thank you very much. I will make sure to give a detailed report to Her Majesty about your accomplishments.”

“Um... About that...” mumbled Lloyd.

“Why,” the count asked, “do you not want me to?”

“The thing is, having too many accomplishments can also be troublesome.”

A bitter smile escaped Lloyd. The count’s gaze grew with more contentment.

“Hahaha. Is that so? I see. Then I will hire a skilled writer to narrate your dramatic feat to Her Highness in great detail.”

“Please, spare me, Your Excellency.”

“I will not,” refused the count. “This is my way of getting revenge for how you coldly turned down this old man’s favor.”

“...”

“Anyway, let us put this subject behind us. What do you have over there?”

Still holding the grudge, the count spoke as he pointed at Lloyd’s side. Lloyd’s face lit up at his question.

“Oh,” said Lloyd, “it is the blueprint and plan for the slope stabilization project.”

Welcoming the change of subject, Lloyd immediately brought out the document and opened it up.

“First, I analyzed the characteristics and current state of the cliff slope that supports the city. I found that the slope is considerably damaged... Blah blah blah... The pressure on the side is expected to be high... Blah blah blah... Therefore, the piles in the ground must be installed in a file, and the anchor bolts will increase the friction resistance... Blah blah blah...”

Lloyd started to pinpoint and explain the blueprint so eloquently that the count was left speechless. A proud smile bloomed on Lloyd’s face as he spoke. He had succeeded. He peacefully turned down the unexpected proposal and passed off the responsibility of ruling the city. Therefore, his plan was completed. Once this construction ended and he went back to the Frontera fiefdom with money, he’d be able to achieve his modest dream of living high off the hog.

Lloyd continued to explain the project with an expectant heart, and he finally got the promise of assistance necessary for the project. Count Namaran glanced at Lloyd with the most satisfying gaze as he listened to the latter’s explanation. His gaze was likened to the warm look of a grandfather looking at his grandson with a 4.0 GPA. But such a gaze had nothing to do with Lloyd’s amazing explanation or his stellar accomplishment. None of it.

He’s really a man I’d like to keep by my side.

Lloyd Frontera. Young and competent. But there was something else the count paid more attention to. Despite Lloyd’s competence, he was humble and never crossed any lines. He had the wit to evaluate himself objectively and never went beyond his limits. Count Namaran judged that such a character wasn’t something most ordinary young men could manifest.

By and large, a competent man usually holds confidence that equals his skills. And so, he starts overstepping boundaries while becoming arrogant and conceited. Losing the capacity to objectively evaluate himself, he falls into delusion. That is when he makes a mistake, hurting himself and everyone around him. But Lloyd? He’s different. He already knows how to restrain himself despite his skills.

The power to restrain himself despite holding such tremendous talent. That quality was greater and rarer than his talent itself. That was at least the way the count saw him.

I tried to win over him too easily.

Count Namaran realized that Lloyd wasn’t the type of person he and his city could easily get a hold of. He reprimanded himself as he looked at Lloyd and secretly made a resolution.

A sharp nail may try to hide under a cloth, but its end will inevitably pierce out. Talent is the same. No matter how much he tries to leave in peace, someone will eventually desire his talent. And eventually, he will find himself in turmoil at least once in his lifetime.

Count Namaran resolved that should such a time come for Lloyd, he would step up and protect this young man, the savior who saved his daughter and the city. When a chaotic storm rushed to hit Lloyd Frontera, he would strive to protect this man’s peace even if it took everything he had. He would return the favor he received at least once in his lifetime. Resolving such, Count Namaran eyed Lloyd with a gentle look. For Lloyd, that marked the birth of a reliable supporter who was set to become a great help in his future.

Chapter 180: A Reliable Supporter (2)

Now, the construction took off in full swing.

We can now get started since the anchor bolts I ordered came out perfectly.

It probably was the day after Lloyd declined the count's offer. The blacksmiths in the city visited him early in the morning, lugging about a 23-foot metal anchor bolt in length.

It was high quality for a prototype.

They surely were the blacksmiths highly recommended by Count Namaran. The anchor's size and functionality mostly satisfied Lloyd. In particular, the wedge part of the bolt they'd produced after referring to the wedge lock bolt was done so wonderfully that Lloyd nearly gasped in amazement. It met almost all of his demands.

The furrow of the wedge end is perfectly burrowed.

Thanks to that, the construction gained more momentum. Lloyd ordered a considerable amount of anchors to be produced based on the prototype. And with that, he knuckled down to constructing.

"All right, you might feel awkward because this is your first construction with me. So, I have a question I want to ask first. Is this anyone's first construction?" asked Lloyd.

"..."

"Since you guys can't speak, raise your hands. Raise your hands if this is your first time in a construction like this."

Clack! All 200 skeletons raised their hands. Lloyd's eyebrows quirked slightly.

"Seriously? All of you are rookies?"

Clack!

“How so?”

This actually was the very part Lloyd had been worried about. Seeing Lloyd’s flustered expression on his face, Turtle Neck, the leader of the Skeleton Corps, stepped forward and held a piece of paper and soot.

“Do not worry so much. They simply cannot remember their life before this.”

“What?” asked Lloyd. “They can’t remember?”

“Yes. It goes the same for me too. Nothing comes to my mind. What I used to do, and what kind of person I was.”

“Aha. Is that the reason why you guys called yourselves Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and whatnot?”

“Yes. We completely forgot our old names.”

“Hmm. You all are like a blank piece of paper.”

“But there have got to be some of us who worked on a construction site before. Who knows, our bodies might remember something.”

“Well, I hope so. Ehem! Anyway.”

Lloyd’s gaze moved to the Corps.

“This may be the first construction some of you take part in while others may remember their past experiences. Regardless, it is everyone’s first time doing construction with me.”

Clack! 200 skeletons raised their hands, happily clicking their lower jaws. Lloyd smiled.

“Oh, you don’t have to raise your hands anymore. Anyway, I want you to mark this in your bones. Safety first. The most crucial thing in construction is safety. So, don’t scurry or scramble. It’s bad for your joints. Even if you have to work slowly, be safe and precise. Or else, you’ll be the one who suffers the consequences of getting injured. Got it?”

Screech! Creak!

“Did you actually mark my words in your bones...”

The Skeleton Corps marked the words “Safety First” in their bones before holding their shovel. Javier, listening to Lloyd’s speech beside him, lifted his sword as he took on the most crucial role in the slope stabilization project that was about to start.

“You know what to do, right? Bore the holes,” instructed Lloyd to Javier.

Lloyd then held up a large brush, painting several points in the slope with red paint. Though his action seemed random, all the marks he made had been carefully calculated and designed. Javier knew this because he was an old hand in constructions like these that were led by Lloyd.

“Please tell me the direction, angle, depth, and diameter of the hole,” requested Javier.

“Vertical. Thirty-nine feet in depth. Three feet in diameter,” said Lloyd.

“Yes, Young Master.”

Javier held up his sword high right after the numbers for boring the holes were laid out, and he stared at the painted floor. His grip tightened, and his eyes held a glint of faint rage. But was it because he was regarded as a piece of construction equipment? No. It was the opposite.

I am ashamed of myself.

Javier was mad at himself. He had no right to complain about being forced into construction work. After all, this was the only thing that he was good at. When it came to fighting a powerful enemy, he struggled and couldn’t handle it by himself. Even though that very enemy was no other than Hell’s Knight, it didn’t change the fact that he wasn’t enough and that he required the help of Lloyd, the very person he was supposed to protect. That indisputable fact washed over him as a wave of shame and guilt. His duty, responsibility, and mission. He was overwhelmed with self-hatred for failing to uphold even one of them.

Yes, I have been too insolent.

It must have been after he rose to become the sword master. He was unwittingly getting too content with himself. In the corner of his heart, he was telling himself that this was enough. Holding this much power was enough. Could it be that he was settling for the present too soon? Could it be that he was thwarting improvement by doing so?

I cannot deny that was the case... The moment I deny how I was, I won't be able to even dream of improving in the future.

He had pathetically struggled in his fight against Hell's Knight. He'd have been defeated without Lloyd's help. Javier repented deeply in his heart as he replayed those moments in his head. And so, he resolved that he would improve further. He would never again put his master and the fiefdom in danger. Therefore, he couldn't even overlook the time he spent at construction sites like this. He would treat these moments as opportunities for training. With such resolve, he opened his eyes, which flashed with determination. Next, his sword radiated light.

Flash! His sword moved like the wind, stabbing down like a flash of light and bursting like thunder.

Kaboom! Kaboom! Each time Javier moved and stuck his sword in the earth, the mana blast burst, but its explosion was somewhat different from the past ones. Whereas the previous mana blast caused a rough explosion in the ground, this one never went an iota of an inch beyond the range Lloyd instructed. It was because Javier had controlled the range of the explosion by nano inches with all of his might. That was a tremendously difficult job, and it was exhausting. But Javier kept using it on and on nonetheless.

Speed of power. Range control. More meticulously. More powerfully in the targeted areas!

Each sword strike would add to his training. Even when all he did was swing his sword at a construction site, it would be the case. From now on, even breathing and walking would be regarded as training for him, a step toward self-improvement. Just like that, Javier's sword continued to dance in a fierce and meticulous manner as he continued thinking. Dozens of sleek vertical holes that were 39 feet in depth and 3 feet in diameter were bored into several areas of the cliff slope. Next, it was time for the Skeleton Corps to work.

"Okay!" shouted Lloyd. "Let's move it!"

Crack! At his shouting, the Skeleton Corps rose, carrying a 42-foot long and 3-foot thick log on their shoulders.

"Focus now! And don't forget! You have to move at my shout to avoid getting caught in your feet! One fall, and it's going to ruin the balance of the people around you, and everyone could fall under the logs! Mark my words!"

Clack! The skeleton engineers nodded, moving ahead in order at the shouting and moving the large and heavy logs. These were the round piles that would be inserted in the vertical holes that Javier had excavated in advance and stabilize the foundation.

They're like the toothpicks used to hold burgers together. Stick them in, and the patties, bread, and lettuce won't fall to the side. The same goes for the land. The sturdy foundation rock and the weak surface have to be held together by sticking these logs into the earth.

But unlike with a burger, there would be more than one stabilizer used. The piles would be inserted in a series for a stronger effect. Lloyd was greatly satisfied by the trees that were used for the piles, and the credit was due to the climate of the region.

It's always dry and cold out here throughout the year because of the high altitude. That makes the wood as robust and sturdy as metal. Moreover, they grow plentiful around here.

The thick stump was about 3.2 feet in diameter, and it was more than enough to work as a pile. Lloyd knew it was the case because he had tested it with the simulation skill a host of times.

“All righty, up next, Ggoming!”

“Ggoming!”

Around the time the Skeleton Corps brought the piles in front of the vertical holes, Lloyd yelled, and Ggoming, which was on standby in the air, replied, fluttering his wings to get down. After biting a rope that was tied to one end of the pile, he soared high, and the piles stood up straight.

“Skeletons! Fix the pile!”

Crack! They approached the now hanging pole in the air and adjusted it to fit into the vertical hole. After checking it was good, Lloyd ordered aloud.

“Ggoming! Lower it!” he shouted.

“Ggomiming!”

Ggoming fluttered his wings and slowly came down, and the piles started to get inserted into the holes. A few minutes later, they were all fully in.

Good. Just perfect.

Lloyd clenched his fists as he observed how perfectly the piles fitted in. The pile was produced to be 3 feet in diameter and 42 feet in length to perfectly fill the holes without leaving any space. In other words, the construction had gone perfectly, from the excavation of the vertical holes to the insertion of the piles into the empty spaces in the ground.

“Good! Let’s continue on like this!”

“Ggoming!”

Crack! Lloyd shouted, Ggoming answered, and the Skeleton Corp clapped, the construction moving forward without a break. 15 days passed, and dozens of piles were inserted, each spaced out from each other by two feet. Wooden planks were then laid across the top parts of the piles to support the force of each other, and the next job was the anchors. First, Lloyd instructed the surface the anchor bolts would be installed in to be smoothed out, and once Javier bored holes there, the workers pushed the anchor bolts into them.
