THE GREATEST ESTATE DEVELOPER

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 311: The Compliment Linkage Effect (1)

“Actually, I can stop time!”

Lloyd dropped the bomb at the dinner table. He didn’t pull any punches. What else was there to do, right? He’s decided. Instead of beating around the bush, it would feel better to address this matter straightforwardly, considering the deep trust he had in the count and countess. This was the rationale behind his declaration. But there was something he overlooked, and it was that their trust in him was unimaginably deeper, heftier, and more incredible than he imagined.

“Honey.”

“Hmm?”

As soon as Lloyd spoke, Count Arcos and Countess Marbella started exchanging gazes with each other.

“It looks like our son has gone through a lot lately.”

“Hmm... Does it appear so to you as well?”

“Yes, my dear. He must be under an immense amount of stress to say something like that.”

“I feel the same way. Ha... I believe he is acting this way because of the expectations everyone has of him. He thinks he needs to make everyone happy and do something for them.”

“I am with you on that. The poor thing must have been struggling all by himself.”

“My heart is hurting. I think we have been too neglectful of our child.”

“We have been, my dear. It pains me to see him carry such a heavy burden all alone.”

“I wish we could help him in some way.”

“We should support him more at times like these, shouldn’t we?”

“Let’s lighten his stress a little first.”

“Yes, we should.”

The couple was on the same page. Tons of gazes were exchanged in this almost telepathic conversation, and they teamed up silently toward one goal: To alleviate their son’s stress. Count Arcos made the first move.

“Hmm, I see. That is amazing,” complimented Count Arcos ever so gently.

Lloyd looked at him with a dazed look. “You believed me so quickly?”

“I do. Have you ever lied to me before?”

“You are right. I never have.” Lloyd was glad that his words were well-received.

“Truly,” said Count Arcos, “I’m amazed at how hard you work every day. It takes a lot for a person to feel that they are frozen in time.”

“Eh...?” Lloyd lifted his brow, sensing that something was off.

“Honestly,” obliviously went on Count Arcos. “I, too, feel like I’m stuck in time sometimes. Very rarely, however. Lately, I mostly get that feeling when I give a hand to Marbella with her flower garden.”

“F-Flower garden?” muttered Lloyd.

The count smiled mysteriously. “Yes, her flower garden. As I crouch down under the strong sun with my hands covered in dirt, beads of sweat start dripping down my forehead. I can see the beautifully bloomed flowers while my stomach growls. Then I wonder to myself, “Oh, is it lunchtime now?”

“Ah... I don’t think-”

Count Arcos didn’t let Lloyd finish. “But when I stand up at that feeling and look up at the sky, I realize lunch is far yet to come. That is when I feel like I’m frozen in time.”

Lloyd pressed his lips.

“I wonder what it is with the gardening. I am truly mystified. So, at times __”

“Honey.” Count Marbella’s voice, which was ever so gentle, prompted Count Arcos to clamp his mouth upon belatedly realizing his mistake.

The smile on her face turned suggestive. “My, you told me you were happy when you helped me, but it appears that the work has taken a toll on your body.”

Count Arcos didn’t respond.

“What should I do now?” asked Count Marbella rhetorically. “I suppose I should work alone starting tomorrow.”

“No, no,” interjected Count Arcos hurriedly, “Honey, that is not what I meant—”

“What can I do?” Countess Marbella rubbed her nails. “The work makes you feel like you’re stuck in time. That is how dreadful the job is for you. I’m not going to force anyone to do something they hate.”

“I am happy!” cried out Count Arcos again. “Truly happy!”

“Do you mean that?” Count Marbella shot a meaningful gaze.

“Ehem...!”

“You should have told me if the work was that hard on you, my dear.”

“No, no, it is not hard on me... Ehem, it is just that sometimes I would like to ride my horse and enjoy the fresh breeze.”

“Then how about you take a break tomorrow and ride your horse?”

“M-me? Alone?”

“Yes.”

“Really?” Count Arcos’s face lit up.

“Yes, yes.”

“Th-Thank you, honey!”

“You are welcome.”

Staring at the overjoyed count and beaming countess, Lloyd heaved a sigh. “Um, it’s wonderful that you two love each other so much, but when I said that I can stop time-”

“It is all good,” Count Marbella interrupted softly, “I know what you mean. I am your mother.”

“Excuse me?” Lloyd asked.

“You do not have to think too hard. It’s okay to move forward one day at a time. Sometimes, failure is acceptable. Everything is all right, my son. You are doing very well already.”

“...”

“Stopping time?” She went on, “Changing the world? I do not expect such grand undertakings from you. You are my son, and that will never change no matter what you do. So, Lloyd.” She looked at Lloyd in the eyes.

“Yes.” Lloyd’s gaze met hers.

“Do not overwork yourself.”

“No, no, it’s not that.” Lloyd waved his hands.

“Shh.” Count Arcos put his finger on his lips to let Marbella finish. “You do not have to deny it.”

“I, too, have heard from your father,” Countess Marbella cast an appreciative look at Count Arcos. “How you did your utmost to stop the misfortune the Dragon King has enlightened you about. How you kept the matter and stress all to yourself because you were worried about us. How burdensome it must have all been for you, my Lloyd. How lonely.”

Lloyd slightly choked up, and he couldn’t say anything.

“The same is true now. Building a dam and a magnificent building called the Jewel... It must be difficult for you. I’m sure things will only get harder in the future. That is why I am saying this. You do not need to carry everything by yourself. If you are tired and struggling, tell us. We are your parents. Can you do that for us?”

“Um...” Lloyd gulped. “Yes.”

“All right, thank you, our dear son. Then should we go back to our meal? I rambled for too long. The food will get cold.”

Lloyd couldn’t refute their words or explain himself further, seeing their gentle smile. It wasn’t the time to press further. He couldn’t bring himself to erase the smile on the couple’s faces after hearing their words of encouragement and invigoration, which were spoken so carefully and considerately to him. At the same time, Lloyd felt wronged.

Argh... Please believe me, come on. I can really stop time!

How on earth am I supposed to make them understand me? Lloyd chewed and crunched salad as he smiled embarrassingly. The next day, however, something strange took place in the fiefdom. An incredible rumor spread across the place.

“Hey, did you hear? They say that Master Lloyd can stop time,” a woodcutter uttered to his brother.

“What?” The brother grimaced. “What are you talking about?”

“What do I mean? I heard it from my wife.”

“From your wife?”

“Yes.”

“Is she feeling all right?” asked the older brother skeptically.

“Oh, no,” he refused as he shook his head. “My wife overheard it from somewhere else too.”

“Somewhere else? Where?”

“From the servants in the lord’s manor.”

“What did they say?

“That Master Lloyd said he could stop time while having dinner with Count Arcos.”

“Haha, Really?”

The conversation between the woodcutter brothers took place under the tree shade. Soon, another conversation took place as well between a young shepherd and a young huntress in the meadow.

“Hey, did you know?” asked the boy as he tapped the ground with his staff.

“Know what?” brusquely asked the girl.

“Master Lloyd can stop time.”

“What?” She clucked her tongue as she shook her head. “You must have eaten something weird.”

“Nuh-uh. I’m telling the truth.”

She huffed annoyingly, “Where did you hear that nonsense?”

The boy crossed his arms. “From my sister.”

“Emily?” Her face softened.

“Uh-huh,” said the boy proudly.

“What did she say?”

“What the heck! You trust her but not me?”

“Obviously,” huffed the girl. “I’m not dumb enough to trust a liar like you.”

He gaped at her.

“Besides,” she went on, “If it’s coming from Emily, then it has to be true. So, tell me. What did she say?”

The boy pouted. “That Master Lloyd can stop time. He announced it while having dinner with Count Arcos.”

“And what was the lord’s reaction?”

“He laughed and comforted Master Lloyd. She said he looked pretty wronged.”

“Wronged?” she asked incredulously.

“Yes.”

“Then... It is true?”

“You agree?” exclaimed the boy delightfully. “Do you think so too? It doesn’t seem like nonsense, right?”

“Duh. It’s Master Lloyd. Right?”

“I think so, too!” The boy nodded.

At the same time, the bar owner raised his voice at his store.

“Oh, come on! What, did you think that Master Lloyd was that incapable?”

“Hey, old man, that’s not what I meant...”

The bar owner thrust his fist onto the desk. “Like heck, that wasn’t what you meant! It was all thanks to our young master that you have some land to farm on from the Maritz Wetland, isn’t that true? The rumor has it you did a fine job with your piece of land and sent your son to Cremo for school! So, how dare you question the young master’s capabilities!”

“Please,” the man reasoned pleadingly. “Don’t get worked up now-”

“How can I not?!” bawled the owner. “My young master is being questioned right now!”

“Come on, I said I believe it too!”

“You do?” At this, the bar owner’s voice softened.

“Yes, I do.”

“Then have a drink here,” he said as he poured a free drink. Then he said, “The thing is, I owe Master Lloyd a lot. You know about the ondol room he built outside the bar, right?”

“I know, yes.”

“My mother, you see, was able to be comfortable during her final days before she passed away, thanks to the ondol room. I’m still touched by his actions whenever I think of her. That’s why I’m doing this. If you see anyone questioning or insulting him, you know what to do.” The bar owner cracked his knuckles.

“My, I know. How could I not?”

“Anyway! He should be well enough to stop time! He sure is capable of doing such a thing! Yes, yes! Of course! I knew from the start that he was going to be someone big! Yes!”

“But didn’t you used to wail every day about how he wreaks havoc at the bar?”

“The past is a past!”

The rumor spread through the mouths of the servants who were there at the dinner table. It was about how Lloyd could stop time. Everyone bought the rumor without hesitation. The atmosphere of trust hanging in the air was antithetical to what Lloyd had initially expected. And when the messages appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes, he could clearly feel what was going on around him.

Ding Dong!

Hmm?

Lloyd opened his eyes wide. He was rolling around in bed as he struggled to fall asleep when a few messages popped in front of him.

[Rumors about you are spreading across the people of the fiefdom.]

[They completely believe your assertion that you can stop time and are growing excited about it.]

[Though dispassionate residents claim that it’s unrealistic, their opinions are being pushed aside by the general public.]

[The countless accomplishments and praises you’ve earned until now are allowing this kind of atmosphere to cultivate inside the fiefdom.]

[The title <Exemplifying Punisher> is at work.]

[The title <Builder of Dead Estates> is at work.]

[The title <Bell Saver> is at work.]

[The title <The Eldest Son of the Frontera Family> is at work.]

[The title <The Pathfinder to the Weary> is at work.]

[The title <Red Pill or Blue Pill> is at work.]

[The above six titles are bringing about a linkage effect.]

[The intimacy level with the fiefdom residents has increased from <Favor and Trust> to <Affection and Praise>.]

[From now on, the fiefdom’s residents will trust and support all your actions.]

What is this now?

Lloyd shook his head as he studied the messages in disbelief. Then he realized what they meant.

Wow!

The people believed in him. Not only that, they almost seemed to have blind faith in him as if they were his worshippers. Thanks to this, his Time Freeze skill was nothing strange to them.

I didn’t expect this at all.

Lloyd used to be strung out that they might consider him a dark magician for enabling something that goes against nature. He was afraid of losing their trust and receiving skeptical gazes. That was why he had chosen to discuss the matter with the count and countess first. His plan was to announce the Time Freeze skill to the people using the count’s authority to minimize the confusion and misunderstanding that may arise from his skill.

But I was worried for nothing. There won’t be any issues even if I use the time freeze right away.

Their trust in him went beyond his imagination. Lloyd smiled, the corners of his lips rising up to his ears. After all, the days he had spent busting his gut in this fiefdom weren’t all for nothing. Excited and overcome with a sense of reward, Lloyd couldn’t sleep at all. It was only after the sun began to rise that he fell asleep. After breakfast, he waited for the sun to be up just enough. That was when Lloyd strolled out to the manor and stood in the front yard.

Now is the perfect time. Since the flow of time outside this area will come to a complete stop, the position of the sun won't change. So, sometime between nine and ten will work just fine.

Freezing time at night would be problematic as then it would always remain dark out. The afternoon wasn't a good time either since the scorching sun would make construction extremely difficult. As such, Lloyd picked the morning time when the sun was in the perfect position. He opened the optional skill window.

Ding dong.

[Manaheart Skill Option 5: Time Freeze - You can freeze time of this world by borrowing the power of the Heart of Winter in the manaheart.]

[Required RP to use the skill: 3,000]

[Current RP: 11,755]

[Would you like to use the Skill Option 5: Time Freeze?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes.

Lloyd chose "Yes."

Now, time to build the dam and the Jewel of Truth.

***

At the same time, the heavenly world was completely unaffected by the frozen passage of time below. In the office of Gabriel the Seraphim, there came a scroll of an urgent report on his desk. The following statement was written outside it:

[Report of Illegal Construction Status on Earth: The Jewel of Truth Aotearoa]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 312: The Compliment Linkage Effect (2)

“Hmm?” A frown line appeared between Gabriel’s elegant pair of brows. It was because of the bundle of reports on his office desk.

Illegal construction status report from the mundane world?

It had been eons ago since he received a report like this. 9,184 years, 9 months, and 28 days in the earth’s time to be exact.

I rarely receive a report like this.

It was because any building that necessitated this kind of report was not even permitted in the heavens and out of reach for the mundane world due to its extremely demanding construction requirements. Those down below would struggle to dare attempt such a construction.

Who dared to build something like this? Hmm. Let’s see.

Gabriel opened the report. The wrinkle between his brows deepened.

The Jewel of Truth. The Aotearoa.

The name was familiar. Gabriel searched through his memories.

I remember this building being demolished. It was too powerful and demanding for mundane creatures to handle. It even had the potential to reveal the deepest secrets of the upper realms. The demolition order for it eventually came through.

As a result, a terrible war broke out, and the Jewel of Truth was destroyed. Humans. Orcs. Elves. Merpeople. Giants, centaurs, and so many others. With the help of countless beings like them, the building was successfully demolished.

And someone is trying to build it again?

Gabriel couldn’t understand it. What kind of apt creature was conceived in the lower realm that was capable of erecting the illegal building? He perused the report that detailed how the building materials were gathered and where the construction was being done. He flipped through the pages with increasing speed to find the information he was looking for. At last, he found the name of the developer.

Lloyd Frontera.

Gabriel’s gaze was fixed on the name. He reached out and shook the bell on the desk. Not long after, someone entered his office.

“Raphael, the Director of Inspection for the lower realms. At your service.”

“Thanks for coming. I called you because I have a special assignment for you,” said Gabriel.

“Yes, please just give me the word.”

“It’s because of this.” Gabriel soon saw Raphael’s eyes grow serious as the latter skimmed through the report. “Your job is to put together a special surveillance team and watch Lloyd Frontera. I want you to give me a periodic report about the illegal construction he is carrying out.”

“Understood. But...” trailed off Raphael.

“What is it?”

“The Jewel of Truth is not just any kind of illegal building but the one that is at the top of its class that’s able to expose heaven’s secrets. Is it not better to stop the attempt early on instead of monitoring the situation from afar?” asked Raphael.

Gabriel chuckled. “You are right. Doing that would certainly be convenient. However, it’s not possible, and you know why.”

“Yes, I am aware,” Raphael said as he cast his head down. “We are not permitted to intervene in the mundane world’s affairs as heavenly beings.”

“You are right. Whatever happens down below is their business, not ours, in accordance with the way of things. That’s how it should remain to the most reasonable extent possible.”

“What do you mean, Your Grace?”

“The construction will be excruciatingly taxing, as the world will see a host of variables. An unfortunate accident may occur during construction. Otherwise, a design error may ruin their plans altogether. However, if that human overcomes these obstacles and gets close to completing the Jewel of Truth...”

“Then you will make an intervention?” asked Raphael hopefully.

“I should,” said Gabriel as he nodded. “It is an unlawful structure. At that time, I will order you to demolish it.”

“I see. Then I will form a surveillance team immediately.”

“Good. Keep up the good work.”

“Yes.”

Raphael left the room with a sharp salute distinct to the heavenly officials. Now alone at his office, Gabriel went over the report again. He then sighed midway.

“Dragon King Verkis... You raised hell this time again. I wonder what you were thinking when you told a mere human about the Jewel of Truth.”

***

Meanwhile, in the Frontera fiefdom, Lloyd was completely ignorant of the special attention he was garnering from the archangel Gabriel. He was focused on the present moment for the sake of his peaceful retirement and using his Time Freeze skill while being showered with support from the fiefdom’s residents.

Ding Dong!

[Would you like to use the Skill Option 5: Time Freeze?]

[YES / NO]

Yes, yes, yes.

Lloyd happily selected YES. There was an immediate response.

[Manaheart Skill Option 5: Time Freeze has been activated.]

[You have spent 3,000 RP.]

[Current RP: 8,755]

[From now on, by the power of the Heart of Winter, the flow of time will remain frozen for one year. At this moment, you can designate a no-freeze zone where time flows normally.]

[The range of the no-freeze zone is determined by the total amount of mana you possess.]

[Current Range: 300km^2]

[Please assign the range of the no-freeze zone.]

According to the message before his nose, it looked like the range for the no-freeze zone could be as vast as half of Seoul city. Lloyd gave the answer he had determined in advance.

As large of a range as possible. But following the areas I outlined, not the shape of a circle.

As fiefdom as its center point, the no-freeze zone headed straight up north where the dam was to be erected and far into the east, covering the Prona River and areas around Lake Kapua. Lloyd wanted to make sure the fiefdom had a sufficient supply of drinking water while the Time Freeze skill was activated.

The river needs to keep flowing, and the waterway has to be operational.

Thankfully, that was possible within the amount of range he had.

Crackle...!

Ack!! Just like the last time, mana started to spill out of his manaheart like a strong tide. It almost felt like his esophagus and other organs were being yanked out of his body toward the heavens. The mana then turned into a gust of frigid air and shot toward the sky, forming a giant dome that was several miles tall. Soon, the passage of time outside the barrier came to a stop.

Ding dong.

[Time has been frozen.]

[The no-freeze zone cannot be changed until the optional skill is canceled.]

[The option is deactivated in the event the user goes out of the no-freeze zone.]

[Any creature within the range of the no-freeze zone will not age for a year.]

His view was filled with an onslaught of rewarding messages. Lloyd sucked in the breath he had been holding in.

Whoa. It worked.

Lloyd felt this time that the Time Freeze skill came with considerable side effects. It was as if all his strength had left his body. Despite that, the reaction from the residents made it all worth it.

“Mother,” asked a curious child, “What is that?”

“Yes, my dear son. That is the miracle shown to us by Master Lloyd.”

“Mother, what is a miracle?” the child asked again.

“Yes, my dear son. It is something Master Lloyd shows from time to time.”

“Mother, who is Master Lloyd?”

“Who else?” The mother said patiently, “He is our savior that you will serve in the future.”

The young lady gave the boy a big hug as she thought of the terrible fate that could have fallen on her child when the swarm of locusts invaded the land. Had it not for Master Lloyd’s zing, whew, what tragic fate awaited him! Master Lloyd was their lifesaver. As such, she had unshakable trust in her young master. Even though a strange wall was put up and the sun wasn’t moving, he must have a plan, she thought. Most of the residents had a similar reaction. They weren’t merely tolerating what was happening but enjoying the situation unfold.

“Hey, did you see that? What did I tell you? I was right!” exclaimed one of the woodcutter brothers.

“My goodness, you are right,” the older brother scratched his head embarrassingly. “Master Lloyd froze the sky. Does it mean that time has stopped outside? Outside the ice wall?”

“Yes, whereas we can move around like we always do. Wahaha!”

“But we are the only ones getting older.”

“Hush. You’re wrong. Did you forget who Master Lloyd is?” The young brother shot an incredulous look.

“Then what is it?”

“He said we won’t age.”

“While time is frozen?”

“Supposedly. Amazing, isn’t it?” He spoke with a smug on his face.

“Haha! Ha! If it is true, then we’re living longer for free!”

“That’s exactly right. A two-day celebration will be held to celebrate the occasion. Will you come?”

“Of course, I will be there. You don’t even need to ask.”

The woodcutter brothers excitedly went out of the house. A small festival had already begun in the central street. Everyone came to the festival wearing big smiles on their faces, joyous over the fact that they wouldn’t age and could go on with their lives normally, thanks to their young master who had stopped the flow of time. What a fantastic and exciting time it was to be alive, they thought. They gained an additional year of life filled with cheery mornings and sunlight for free. They merrily ate and drank, praising Lloyd for his amazing work. Even Count Arcos and Countess Marbella roamed through the streets and were content to hear the praises of their son. On the other hand, Lloyd put on a flustered smile as he watched the entire scene.

Wow. Look at these people. They’re no joke.

Lloyd had been concerned that he might be misunderstood. But he realized that it was the opposite. Instead of being misunderstood, he received loads of praise.

My, from the looks of it, they would’ve started booing me if I didn’t use the time freeze skill.

Seeing this, Lloyd contemplated whether he deserved their overflowing amount of trust and praise. Of course, the answer came naturally to him.

Of course, I deserve it all! I’ve done so many things for the people here!

Lloyd breathed heavily through his nose. He was the one who resuscitated the dying fiefdom, saved it from the Monster Domino incident, and raised the rural barony up to a county! As such, Lloyd decided to be more confident and brazen. When the festival came to an end, the dam construction ensued right away. The first step was to organize the laborers.

“Okay,” announced Lloyd aloud. “I’m sure you’ve heard already, but we are here today to hold up our shovels for the never-ending advancement of the fiefdom. Okay, Group One?”

“Dig! Carve! Scoop!”

Chop! Chop! Sir Bayern and the Engineering Corps took a step forward in unison at Lloyd’s calling. Their tanned skin and wrinkles around their eyes reflected their years of experience in the construction field. Whether they were in South Korea or here, they were sure to find work as supervisors.

“Engineers,” said Lloyd as he looked at them. “You are Group One for the joint project for the dam and Jewel of Truth. What’s Group One?”

“The center of the project!” Many among them shouted.

“Yes, indeed,” affirmed Lloyd with a nod. “I want you to think for a second here. Think of the time when you were new to shoveling. All the way back when you constructed the ondol with me.”

“...”

“You should never forget your resolution from then. And remember, nowhere is safe in the construction field. Accidents do not discriminate between newcomers and veterans. Keep that in mind and act as the center of the site. Regularly check in on your coworker’s work progress and set the right tone for the construction site. If you get it, then give me a chant.”

“Dig! Carve! Scoop!”

“Very well,” Lloyd said. “Next. Group Two?”

“Scoop! Transfer! Fill!

Lloyd turned. The White Cavalry. They were now addressed as the White Shovelers and held shovels and woven bags on their horsebacks. There was a time when they protested at the thought of holding a shovel. But now, everyone had evidently transformed into mobile shovelers. Lloyd’s gaze was filled with contentment.

“The White Cavalry. You will act as the lubricant for this project as it will require more dirt to be dug and transported than ever before. You are the greatest dirt transferrers I know. No one can move the heaps of soil better and more swiftly than you all. As such, why don’t you give me your chant as a promise to continue your good work this time as well?”

“Scoop! Transfer! Fill!” Their piercing chant rang aloud.

It was time for Group Three. But they didn’t have any chants and instead responded with the sound of clacking bones.

“Okay, Group Three?”

Clack!

The Skeleton Corps came forward with the sound of clacking bones. Since they couldn’t speak, they didn’t chant with their voice. Instead...

Raise! Raise! Raise! Turtle Neck, the leader of the group, Square Jaw, and Frozen Shoulder raised their pickets in order. The pickets had the Skeleton Corps’ chant written down on them...

[Overwork!]

[Burn the midnight oil!]

[Work until you die!]

Lloyd smiled with a glow of satisfaction.

“Good. You know it. You are tireless and strong. You don’t need any sleep or breaks. That is why I’m assigning you an important task. While Group One supervises the field and Group Two transfers the soil, you, Group Three, will be the main laborers working on the construction field. Therefore, I want to introduce you all to a new member.”

Clack?

The skeletons tilted their heads in confusion. Lloyd flashed a big smile and shouted, “Draggy! It’s time to greet your seniors!”

Boooom!

As soon as Lloyd finished, Draggy landed majestically and bowed at the skeletons. Every bone in its body shook in joy and overwhelming emotion. This was the moment it had been waiting for. It was finally enlisted in the Skeleton Corps. The skeleton members, too, jumped up and down at the news of a dependable newcomer joining them. They could proudly walk around with their chin held high now. They danced in sheer joy.

Just like that, a total of three groups were organized for the joint construction. One more group was added, and they were Javier and the fantastical creatures who would play the role of giant construction equipment. Then later, one more group, Group Five, was added, and it was composed of the blacksmiths, including Corgidus, and civilian volunteers. Its job mainly was providing support. When everything was good to go, the construction took off right away, starting with the foundation. The makeshift road was paved to allow the transfer of materials. Limestones and rocks were collected. Bangul produced volcanic ash for concretes. Each group had different tasks, and everything progressed smoothly.

One day, however, a telepathic message came to Lloyd out of the blue.

“You over there, my beneficiary. There’s a huge problem. You better hurry up here if you want to continue building the Jewel of Truth. Now.”

The telepathic message was from Dragon King Verkis. His voice sounded urgent.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 313: Swordmaster Syndrome (1)

“You over there, my beneficiary. There’s a huge problem. You better hurry up here if you want to continue building the Jewel of Truth. Now.”

Hmm?

Under the sun, Lloyd winced at the piercing voice that interrupted him while he was managing the construction site.

“Dragon King Verkis?” replied Lloyd.

“Yes, it’s me. You know where I am. Run over here within one second. Pronto.”

What could it be? The frown on Lloyd’s face deepened. He was confused about what was happening.

What does that sleepyhead need from me?

What terrified Lloyd more was the fact that the Dragon King woke up by himself. How serious could this possibly be?

I’ve never woken him up since I activated the Time Freeze skill.

As time had stopped flowing outside the fiefdom, Lloyd didn’t need to wake Verkis up in the morning. Verkis, too, had happily exclaimed, “Okay, I can freely sleep now?” and went straight into slumber.

Yet, he just woke up by himself. And he’s calling for me while saying that something terrible has happened. I’ve got a bad feeling about this.

Something had happened without a doubt. Something grave and dangerous, given the fuss this lazy dragon was throwing.

“Sir Bayern,” called Lloyd. “I need to go somewhere. Watch over the site for me.”

After entrusting the job to Sir Bayern, Lloyd rushed to the guest's chamber.

"Ha... Is something wrong?" Lloyd barged in on the room without knocking first. And then, he saw.

"Ah, there you are."

The Dragon King was lying in bed, but there was something awkward about his posture. To be exact, his neck was tilted in an unnatural angle. Wiping the sweat off his forehead, Lloyd asked, "I came running right away since you said it was trouble. Am I late? Did something happen?"

"Yes, something did," replied Verkis gravely. "But you're not late, thankfully. Here's what happened."

Lying flat on the bed, Verkis rolled his eyes to point his neck. He didn't even lift a finger.

And then he said in a cheerful voice, "I have muscle cramps."

"Come again?" Lloyd gawped.

"I have muscle cramps."

"..."

"This is bad," Verkis went. "I can't believe I have muscle cramps just from sleeping in the same position for a mere month. My body isn't the same anymore. Ha. I miss my younger days. I used to sleep for 500 years straight and not even feel an itch, let alone a cramp."

Lloyd didn't respond.

"Anyway, that's why I called you."

"Um..." Lloyd swallowed. "You see..."

"Okay, do speak now."

“So, you rushed to call me because you got a stiff neck while sleeping?”

“Yes.”

“…”

“Why? Is it not a big deal?” Verkis asked cheerfully.

No, it’s not!

Lloyd screamed but only inwardly. And if only he could, he wanted to jump and lay a double kick to the dragon’s gut.

I’m already slammed with work as it is!

It was true. He was really busy at the moment. There were countless elements to be taken into account to ensure the success of the construction of the dam and the Jewel of the Truth. He couldn’t take his eyes off the construction site. Taking a break was a luxury he couldn’t afford. He couldn’t even think of resting even after all the laborers left as he had to help wrap up the construction site at the end of the day. This meant staying alone at the site, inspecting the work that was done, checking over safety measures, and preparing necessary work materials and equipment for the following day. He wasn’t exaggerating when he said he had no time for rest. He barely had time to sleep or eat!

And as I’m working myself to death, the Dragon King urgently summoned me over a few cramps? Ugh, this bastard!

Lloyd yearned to grab the dragon by his collar and aggressively shake him. The violent impulse surged in him like a plant blooming in a green meadow. But instead of giving in to his emotions, Lloyd controlled himself and put on a smile.

“Certainly,” Lloyd groveled by force, “It is a big deal. It really is. Now, what can I do for you?”

Lloyd repressed all the murderous desire he had from seeping into his eyes and put on a big smile, transforming himself into a polite salesman.

But Dragon King Verkis was brazen and shameless. “Give me a massage.”

Lloyd stopped. “Excuse me?”

“Here.” Dragon King Verkis pointed at his neck with his gaze.

A few strands of hair rose at the back of Lloyd’s head. “Um, excuse me, Dragon King Verkis.”

“Yeah?”

“Isn’t it more convenient if you use your healing magic instead of getting a massage?” Lloyd stressed.

“Oh, that?” drawled Verkis. “That’s too much work.”

“...”

“I need to use my brain for that. But if I call you, I won’t have to do any of that. Much more convenient for me.”

“...”

“Okay. Start the massage.”

“Understood...”

Why are my eyes getting wet? But it was rage and anger that prompted such emotions. Lloyd grabbed the neck of the Dragon King.

Haah. I want to strangle him just like this.

Lloyd put his emotions into his hands and used all the strength he had to press down. Gripping the back of Verkis, his anticipation grew.

He’s going to end up screaming in pain for sure. My grip is quite strong with all the shoveling and construction work I do. This is going to hurt quite a bit for him. Kekeke!

And the moment the Dragon King groaned, Lloyd would feign surprise and put on an apologetic look and control his strength then. This petty idea for revenge pleased Lloyd. But his plan didn't go as he imagined. Crack!

Hmm? Lloyd stopped. I can't get my hands in. Why?

Even though his grip had enough force, his fingers failed to press into the dragon's skin. It felt like he was grabbing a rock. No, a chunk of titanium.

Why is this so hard?

Lloyd was flustered. The muscles under his skin were worse. Without exaggeration, it seemed that any sword would break in half before it even cut into his skin.

Is it because he's the Dragon King? How's he so sturdy and powerful even in his human form?

Lloyd felt dumbstruck. Then came another blow that contributed to his dismay - a scolding from the Dragon King.

"Come on. Do it properly!" demanded Verkis impatiently.

"Excuse me?" Lloyd's tone rose a little.

"I thought you were going to massage me."

"Um, I'm trying my best."

"No, you're not," huffed Verkis in an annoyed voice. "Not in the slightest. I don't feel a thing."

"..."

"Are you half-assing this on purpose because you're annoyed that I called you out in the middle of work? Are you taking your grudge out on me? Wow... I'm seeing a completely different side of you. I didn't know this was the kind of person you were. Had I known, I'd have never given you my help."

“...”

“Right. Humans are always like this. They don’t know how to be grateful. I gave you aid, sent you to another dimension to find the key materials for the Jewel of Truth, and even personally came to your fiefdom to sleep. And yet, when I call you for help, what do you do? You wrinkle your face in grimace and won’t even use any strength to massage me out of spite.”

“...”

“What, do you want me to get upset and cancel your sponsorship now?”

The warning knocked sense into Lloyd at once. “I will try harder!”

Crud! Crud! Crud!

Lloyd tightened his grip, almost crying inside. But it was far from enough to dig into the dragon’s skin.

Okay, my physical strength isn’t enough.

Ziiing! As such, Lloyd activated the Asrahan Core Technique, formed a three-strand circle, and activated it at full force. He then extracted mana from his manaheart, amplified it, and brought it back to his manaheart again. The manaheart sent explosive strength to his arms and hands. At last, the effect started to show.

I did it! I’m getting in!

Ever so slightly, his fingertips began to press into the back of the Dragon King’s neck skin. At first, it went in by a tenth of an inch. And then, it tripled. And some more until the facial expression on the Dragon King softened.

“Ugh, that tickles. You can do it!” encouraged Verkis heartily.

“Arggh! Argh! I will... My Lord!”

Massaging tense muscles was hard, but that would only be the case in the beginning. Once the knots loosened up, the muscle would soften, Lloyd thought. He buckled down and got to his task at hand.

You've got to be kidding me! Arggh!

Lloyd had never massaged anyone with this much devotion, not even his father in South Korea. A sense of shame started to bloom in him as he put in more effort to press down. His back began to become soaked in sweat. Lloyd painstakingly gave the king a neck massage for a seemingly endless period of time. As he did, a question came from the Dragon King.

"By the way, what do you plan on doing after building the Jewel of Truth?"

"Eek! Whew! What was that?" Lloyd wiped the sweat off his face.

"The Jewel of Truth. What do you plan on doing with it afterward?" Verkis spoke casually again.

"What do you mean what will I do? I'm going to ask how I can stop the restoration of destiny."

"Yeah, I know that part," Verkis retorted cynically. "I mean, after you go through all the steps to stop it. What will you do with the Jewel of Truth?"

Lloyd was speechless, not because he had nothing to say. It had finally dawned on him.

This is why he called me. It was to ask me this question.

At last, Lloyd understood. The muscle cramps and whatnot. It was nothing but a pretense.

Is he worried that I might misuse it?

Lloyd assumed so, and he was right. Dragon King Verkis was indeed worried about that possibility.

It never occurred to me that this human would build the Jewel of Truth.

Dragon King Verkis cast a remorseful gaze at his pillows as he lay down on his belly. In all honesty, he never knew that Lloyd would find the lot for the Jewel of Truth and find all the key materials for it scattered around the world. This was something Verkis had never even fathomed could happen.

It would be impossible for a dragon to accomplish such a thing, let alone a human. That's why I casually told him about it. The possibility of him finding all the materials for the jewel never crossed my mind. I didn't know the situation would get this serious or that the jewel would actually get built again.

But it was all coming true. That was why he was concerned.

What if he gets greedy after the jewel is constructed? What if he abuses its power?

What will happen then? What kind of evil will he do to the world? And what will I need to do then? These questions pestered Verkis.

Anyway, since I'm the one who taught Lloyd about the jewel, I'm responsible if he does something unnecessary and brings harm to the world.

Verkis thought he should take the fault if that happened. As such, he wanted to hear what Lloyd's plan was. The human would obviously get greedy over the Jewel, and the dragon wanted to know how he'd mask it. If Verkis sensed any perverted desire in Lloyd...

I'll destroy the silly thing then.

He would grind it into dust. That way no one would ever build it again. Thinking so, Verkis waited for Lloyd's answer. And eventually...

"Um... I..." Lloyd finally spoke. "I find the jewel to be quite burdensome, honestly."

"What?"

What a weak and shameless mask to cover his greed, Verkis thought as he frowned.

“Really,” Lloyd continued to speak. “To me, I feel that having high aspirations becomes a burden more than anything.”

“A burden? Why?”

“The thing is, I have led a life of struggle.”

“Struggle?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded. Now, his excited voice has calmed down, as if he was pouring his heart out. “I used to get nosebleeds every day. I had to get to work as soon as I opened my eyes in the early morning, sweating throughout the day even though I didn’t want to. Even when I was exhausted, I had to push myself to work. Amidst all that, I still had to study because of my future aspirations.”

“What was it?”

“To start an ordinary family,” casually said Lloyd.

“In the world you came from?”

“Yes. It’s just... All I wanted was a proper family that would greet me after I came home from work. With them, I thought it would be nice to live an ordinary and happy life with the money I make.”

“So?”

“So, I worked hard every day. That is, before I found myself here. But my dream hasn’t changed even after I got here.”

“To start a family?”

“Yes, though I’ve come to covet one more thing,” confessed Lloyd.

“What’s that?”

“Lazing around for the rest of my life.”

“Ohh?” Verkis sounded intrigued.

“Now that I have a prosperous life in this fiefdom, I want to protect it and enjoy everything that it offers. And now, I want to stay here and laze around for the rest of my life. With my family, I have come to yearn for the relaxed life of a retiree. And that is why....”

Lloyd meant every word he said, and his voice now contained force.

“It will be just burdensome for me to obtain more power, larger territories, a stronger military, or something along that line. I’ll be kept away from leisure to deal with it all. Doesn’t it seem like a lot of work? Thus, my only wish is for my family and the people around me to be at ease and happy. I want to live the rest of my life surrounded by their warmth without another day of work.”

“And that is why the Jewel of Truth is a burden to you?”

“Yes, since I already have everything necessary to make my dream come true. Nothing more is needed. So long I stop the restoration of destiny, I’ll be able to achieve my goal. Anything beyond that would just become a stumbling block to my dream.”

“...”

“So,” went on Lloyd. “I don’t plan to use the Jewel of Truth after stopping my destiny unless things get seriously dire. That’s my plan. Since I wish to lead a happy and relaxed life as a bum.”

“...”

“My king?”

“What?” blurted Verkis.

“Why are your eyes wet?”

“I’m touched.”

“What...” Lloyd was astonished. Verkis was serious.

Ha. I was wrong. This kid is a wannabe bum, just like me.

Lloyd's speech tugged at Dragon King Verkis's heartstrings, and this new profound realization rang in his heart. He could instantly recognize what Lloyd was. This human was a wannabe bum. Verkis knew this because he, too, was a master bum. Lloyd turned out to be a boy with modest aspirations for life. The desire to not work for life! The greed to be relaxed all the while! The attitude of the rich landlord who led the life of an unemployed bum! Due to his chronic laziness, he could see Lloyd’s desire and genuineness.

“Stop.” Verkis stopped Lloyd’s massage. And he started at him, slightly touched. “Thanks for baring your heart. I understand. Good luck with your goal.”

“T-Thank you.”

Dragon King Verkis decided. He wouldn’t destroy the Jewel of Truth. He would just watch over the construction process. Just like that, he accepted Lloyd’s dreams and aspirations. At that exact moment, the result of fully harnessing his manaheart and circle while massaging the Dragon King appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes.

Ding dong.

With an unexpected alarm sound...

[You have pushed your manaheart to its maximum capacity.]

[As a result, you have earned experience points.]

[The new experience points are being added to your current inventory of experience points.]

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Skill Name: Manaheart.]

[Stage: High-Level Sword Expert Lv. 1]

[Physical Ability Improvement Rate: 1,500%]

[Currently Owned Optional Skills: 1. Shock Neutralizer / 2. Complete Resistance to Poison / 3. Frenzy / 4. Half-Human Half-Dragon / 5. Time Freeze]

[Required RP to level up: 2,000]

[Your Manaheart skill level has risen to the rank of <High-Level Sword Expert>.]

Eh...? Lloyd's eyes widened at the unexpected message.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 314: Swordmaster Syndrome (2)

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Your Manaheart skill level has risen to the rank of <High-Level Sword Expert>.]

Eh...?

Lloyd's eyes widened at the unexpected message.

What is this? What the heck?

Lloyd was lost for words, and more so as he never expected this turn of events. But more messages continued to appear one after, unaware of Lloyd's astonishment.

Ding Dong!

[Your manaheart has gone through countless events thus far. However, you have intentionally limited its activity as of recently. But today, you have loosened your restraint and employed its powers in full force.]

[In the process, the small amount of experience points you earned created a ripple effect.]

[You have finally achieved the extraordinary feat of becoming a high-level sword expert.]

[For this special experience, you have been awarded with a new optional skill.]

[Skill Option 5: Swordmaster Syndrome - All your senses will be heightened to an extreme level. This hyper-sensitivity of your senses is close to that of a fully developed swordmaster. This optional skill is activated for 24 hours a day and cannot be shut off.]

[Current RP: 8,755]

Whaat?

Lloyd was shell-shocked. Once when he read the messages. Then again when his heightened senses overwhelmed him.

“Hey! What’s wrong?”

WHAT’S WRONG? WHAT’S WRONG? WHAT’S WRONG?

Ack!

Lloyd frantically covered his ears at the booming voice of Dragon King Verkis that was supposed to sound normal.

Wh-What the heck?!

Lloyd gulped in sheer dismay. And this time, another noise assaulted him: The sound of saliva sliding down his throat came like a clap of thunder. Furthermore, he could even feel the saliva slide down every cell in his throat!

What’s going on...

Lloyd rolled his eyes and sharply felt that movement as well. Shaking up terribly, Lloyd stared at Verkis.

Since when was this world so vivid? Or is there something wrong with my eyes? My sight is just... How did I see things back then?

Verkis appeared so vividly in front of him that Lloyd could even see the pores on the former’s cheeks. He could probably give a high-five to the mites living inside his skin. Simply put, his eyesight had drastically improved to the point of it being excessive.

Ugh. Hold on. Hold on a second!

A pang of dizziness suddenly hit him, and his feet ached. He had never felt this way before. The sensation of his weight pressing down his two feet felt overwhelming.

“Hey!” called out Verkis. “Are you okay?”

YOU OKAY?! YOU OKAY?! YOU OKAY?!

Ack!

Lloyd was afraid that his ears might burst. Collecting himself, he managed to say, “I am all right...”

“Then what’s with you all of a sudden?”

“Um, the thing is... I think I’ve become a sword expert...”

“Expert?”

“High-level,” muttered Lloyd in agony.

“What? Just now? You?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd managed to nod, which gave him another pang of shock because of the movement in his neck muscles and bones. But it looked like Dragon King Verkis was completely unaware of or disinterested in Lloyd’s pain and disquietude.

“Oh, really?” congratulated Dragon King Verkis nonchalantly. “Good for you.”

This is all because of you, you lazy dragon! Lloyd smothered the burning rage inside him. Then he began to somewhat grasp what had happened to him.

So, this is the swordmaster syndrome...

The message from a while ago informed him that he had become a high-level sword expert and was equipped with a new optional skill. Swordmaster syndrome.

Unbelievable. Lloyd was flustered by the hyper-sensitivity of his senses. Barely suppressing his dizziness, he struggled to adjust to his excessively heightened senses.

Wait, does this mean that Javier has been enduring all of this?

Lloyd pictured Javier from his past memories. From the moment he first met to the queen's assassination attempt. It was only now that Lloyd fully recognized the monstrous ability of the knight.

Haah. No wonder he has insomnia.

So, this was why Javier couldn't sleep. Heck, Lloyd even wondered if it was possible to carry on his daily life.

Javier and Scheherazade. Sir Blanc of the White Cavalry. They endured this kind of condition like it was nothing and never missed a single training for swordfighting?

Lloyd used to be nonchalant about this fact, but now that he suffered from the swordmaster syndrome, it became clear to him how impressive they were. More than just impressed, he respected them.

Ah... This is exactly the reason why I put a lot of effort into not becoming a high-level sword expert.

The swordmaster syndrome was a great obstacle any high-level sword expert faced. It was the final challenge that came before becoming a glorious swordmaster. Lloyd, to be honest, didn't wish for any of it. Not a single iota of his heart desired to become a swordmaster. There was no need for it, and that was the same now.

"Well then, I will be going now... Ack," groaned Lloyd.

"Sure, no problem."

Lloyd staggered out of the room after a brief greeting. An impulse to lay a punch to the dragon's face interrupted him on his way out. But he managed to suppress it and walked out to the corridor. When he came outside, his senses became with the chaos outside.

CHIRP! CHIRP! CHIRP! CHIRP!

SWISH! SWISH! SWISH!

FWOOSH! FWOOSH! FWOOSH!

Lloyd didn’t realize how many birds his fiefdom had until then. And the drifting breeze! It sounded like a storm. The grass frantically banged sideways against the wind. Amid the unfamiliar and new stimulations around him, Lloyd thought to himself...

This won’t do. No.

He decided that he couldn’t live like this. Impulsively, he opened the system window and checked his RP.

[Current RP: 8,755]

He didn’t have enough. It wasn’t even close. He thought he had accumulated quite a bit of RP. But that turned out to be untrue.

I’ll need at least 2,000 RP more just to level up my manaheart skill. That’s why this isn’t enough.

Lloyd rashly wondered if he could earn enough RP with his construction work to becoming a swordmaster. But he quickly shook his head.

No. That would be impossible.

Lloyd reiterated several times in his head that he couldn’t give in to his impulsive thoughts.

Sure, if I work hard to earn more RP, I might be successful. But what about the dam and the Jewel of Truth? The construction of the dam and the Jewel of Truth will take a few months to a year to complete. That will be the case without a doubt if things for according to plan. What about after the jewel is constructed? Who knows. I might find myself needing a lot of RP.

Such a thought crossed his mind. He was only a few months away before constructing the Jewel of Truth and asking for a solution to stop the restoration of destiny.

I can't even predict what answer it'll give. What if... the jewel demands a large sum of RP to answer my question?

Yet, if he had no RP left after spending it all to level up his manaheart to the level of a swordmaster and overcome his swordmaster syndrome?

That would be the end of everything.

This sort of disastrous and laughable situation seemed possible wherein he couldn't ask the question to the Jewel of Truth because he had used all his RP.

Of course, I might not need any RP to ask the jewel a question. But life is full of surprises. I don't know what's ahead of me... So, I should endure for a few months.

Upon consideration, it was obvious what course of action he should take. Even though he hated to admit it, there was nothing else he could do.

I can adjust to my heightened senses and bear through my insomnia for a bit. It'll only be a few months at most. During that time, I can quickly build the dam and the Jewel of Truth and then learn how to stop the restoration of destiny.

That should do it. If the solution did not require him to use his RP, he could easily buckle down and earn more until he became a swordmaster. That was the safest course of action he could take at this point in time.

Haah. But seriously, this is terrible.

Lloyd sucked in his breath in determination. In all seriousness, this situation was truly terrible. He had merely taken a few steps, but every sensation he felt was devastatingly overwhelming. As he moved forward, the sensation of the rays of sunlight against his skin as well as the weight of his steps, were painfully vivid. His head constantly ached from the sensations he felt. But he continued to walk, telling himself he'd adjust and adapt to the change. It would be similar to when he learned how to walk when he was a child. Every step he took was slow, careful, and measured.

Just like that, he strove to get used to the drastic changes in his senses. It wasn't easy. But eventually, by the time he arrived at the construction site, he managed to considerably recover from his nausea. However, it wasn't enough to fool Javier's sharp senses.

"Master Lloyd," called Javier.

"Yeah?"

"Are you all right?" asked Javier, studying the length of Lloyd from head to toe.

"Could it be..." Lloyd frowned. "You noticed?"

"Yes. Congratulations, Master Lloyd."

"Tsk. I don't know."

Javier was Javier. Lloyd had believed that he did a good job of not showing any signs of his change to Javier. But in less than three minutes of Lloyd's arrival, Javier sent a knowing gaze toward him, which indicated that he realized what happened.

Feeling the strong desire to clap his ears because of Javier's voice, the nearby shouting, and shoveling noises around him, Lloyd spoke, "Is how it's like for everyone else?"

"If you are inquiring about the swordmaster syndrome, yes. That is how it is."

"How did you cope with this?" groaned Lloyd.

“I regarded it as a form of training to gain control over my senses.”

“Training?”

“Yes,” affirmed Javier. “Train to flatten the sharpness of my senses, accept them as they are, and take the reins on them. I wanted to keep them at a level where my senses wouldn’t cause any disturbance but wouldn’t miss anything happening around me. I considered it as a key part of my path to becoming a swordmaster.”

“Argh...”

“What is wrong?” replied Javier with a soft smug on his face.

“Um, please, could you keep your words short?”

Javier crossed his arms. “Do you feel dizzy when someone speaks at length?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd pressed his temple. “It makes me feel sick.”

“Hmm,” observed Javier, “I suppose you have not reached the stage of being able to filter your auditory senses. Well, that only makes sense, given that you have just been inflicted with swordmaster syndrome. It was the same for me too. This conversation takes me back to my first day of having swordmaster syndrome. At that time, in the training hall-”

“Hey,” Lloyd said in an annoyed voice.

“Yes, Young Master.”

“You’re doing this on purpose, aren’t you?” Lloyd shot a look at Javier.

“Do what?”

“You’re doing it on purpose because I told you to speak less.”

“That’s right.” Javier gently lifted his brow.

“Wow. You won’t even deny my accusation.”

“This will all be nothing but beneficial for you later on.”

“Are you sure it’s not for your personal revenge and satisfaction?”

Javier suppressed his smile. “Not at all.”

“I’m right.”

“So, on the first night I experienced my swordmaster syndrome-”

“You’re not listening to me at all,” interrupted Lloyd again. “I do not have to listen to you. Anyway, on that first night, I thought that the hardship that came from my senses would nurture my growth. I believe I would become a proud swordmaster the day I overcame these hardships. So, even when a storm of sensations shook me up and pierced through my entire body like thousands of thorns, I did not give up.” Lloyd’s words, however, fell on deaf ears. “Can you please stop talking...?” Lloyd was almost begging by now.

“I cannot. This is truly a rare opportunity.”

“For you to harass me?”

“Who do you think I am?” huffed Javier as if he didn’t like being falsely accused. “I am sharing how my fierce efforts allowed me to overcome my swordmaster syndrome.”

“Oh, sure, sure,” drawled Lloyd, “I’m sure you are. Damn it.”

“By the way, why are you crying?” inquired Javier.

“Do you need to ask?”

“Personally, I never cried,” remarked Javier proudly. “And I did not miss a single day of training. Although, I eventually fell for your trick in the end.”

“Hold on,” Lloyd raised his finger. “What do you mean? What trick of mine?”

“Your lullaby, Young Master.”

“I thought you liked it. You said it was satisfactory.”

“Yes, but it had an addictive effect on me similar to a drug.”

“Aha,” remarked Lloyd. “You were happy on the outside, but deep down, you developed a grudge?”

“Speaking of, do you need my help?”

“Help? For what?”

“Won’t you have to overcome this?”

“Tsk. I should.” Lloyd grimaced. His ears loudly buzzed as he conversed with Javier, and it was making him lose his mind. The strange thing, however, was that his ears started to feel better throughout the conversation.

It’s almost like I’m undergoing an intense training.

Or as if he was being forced to adjust.

Whatever it is, I can’t continue on like this.

Lloyd figured that he had to overcome it one way or another. Otherwise, his everyday life would be affected. No, it would also impact his construction projects. Still, he obviously couldn’t use all his RP.

I have to make an effort.

This marked the beginning of Lloyd’s special training to overcome his swordmaster syndrome.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 315: Swordmaster Syndrome (3)

Swordmaster syndrome. A formidable obstacle every knight confronted before completely mastering their swordsmanship. Since the Lorasian Continent's inception, countless creatures across all races had experienced this syndrome. Hotheaded orc warriors, courageous merpeople, cold-hearted elf archers. The swordmaster syndrome pestered them as soon they reached the level of a high-level sword expert. Despite the continent's long history, only about 300 individuals overcame it.

Haa... In other words, there were many who failed to overcome it. I wonder what the exact number is. I'm guessing it's easily in the tens of thousands.

Lloyd was seated on the sofa. When he sighed, the sensation in his nostrils sent him into a state of shock. The wind passing through his nostrils felt too strong, and it caused the fine hairs inside him to clearly sway against his skin. Lloyd shuddered at the strange feeling.

I hate this syndrome!

Three days had passed already, but he still wasn't used to it. He worried whether he would ever get used to this. Before he knew it, dark circles appeared under his eyes.

I'm tired.

But sleeping was impossible with all the noise around him. Even when his surroundings were quiet and the window was tightly shut, the wind blowing outside sounded like a violent storm in his ears. And when he shoved his head into a pillow and clapped his ears shut, the pulse in his veins boomed like a beating drum.

So, I'm an insomniac now thanks to the swordmaster syndrome. This is nuts, really. Lloyd heaved a sigh. Just then, he heard the thunderous voice of Javier.

"You should not lose focus now. Please concentrate, Young Master."

“Ugh, you surprised me...” Lloyd frowned.

“Does my voice still sound too loud?”

“Obviously,” huffed Lloyd. “If you are going to speak, can’t you give me a sign before you do?”

“I cannot,” rejected Javier coldly.

“Why not?”

“Because that would not provide any training or allow you to adjust to your senses.”

“Come on. So, what, you want me to stay on the sofa and keep my eyes closed all day long like this?” Lloyd closed his eyes.

“You are practicing how to maintain this state of silence.” Javier’s voice sounded like that of a teacher.

“What does this change?”

Instead of answering the question, Javier instructed, “Throw yourself into the silence. Confront the sharp tail end of your heightened senses. Focus on where that sharpness is pointing. Embrace it. Tolerate it. Accept it. Only then will you be able to find genuine peace inside yourself.”

“Fine,” droned Lloyd, “I get it, Monk Javier Asrahan.”

“Monk?” retorted Javier in confusion. “What is that?”

Lloyd shrugged, still closing his eyes. “Something I heard when I was in Seoul.”

“What did you hear?”

Lloyd said, “There are people who are called monks in that world. I heard the others talk on my way from the bathroom.”

“And so, are you saying I resemble those people called monks?”

“Yeah. They love to use esoteric jargon, and you fit the bill.”

“...”

“In other words, I don’t get a clue as to what you mean,” Lloyd protested, shaking his head. “Sharp tail end of my senses? What in the world are you talking about?”

“Pay attention to your inner self,” replied Javier patiently, “And you will naturally feel what it is.”

“I am already paying attention right now,” Lloyd stressed every word to drive his point home.

However, Javier was unimpressed. “It does not look like it, Master Lloyd.”

Lloyd sighed. “I’m trying.”

“It’s still not enough.”

“Ack! Ack! Dammit!” yelled Lloyd as he suddenly tapped the arms of the sofa with his palms.

To this, Javier could only say, “Calm the rage inside you and find peace. Now, breathe.”

Lloyd obeyed. “Whew...”

“There you go,” cooed Javier. “Good boy.”

“Hey.” Lloyd opened his eyes.

“Focus, Young Master.”

Lloyd was about to fall into a rage the longer he thought about the situation, but there wasn’t anything he could do. Javier was the one with experience, living proof that he could completely overcome his syndrome. As such,

Lloyd could only follow Javier’s instructions, believing he would gain guidance on how to deal with his senses more efficiently.

From that day onward, Lloyd left the construction field to Sir Bayern and was engrossed in his quasi-meditation sessions on the sofa of his bedroom. He used the time to further familiarize himself with his sharpened senses. The effect of this was immense.

Wow. Wow... This is working.

Two days in, Javier’s voice diminished from being comparable to the sound of thunder to mere desk tapping. The sensation of saliva sliding down Lloyd’s throat and hair swaying in his nostrils had reduced considerably as well.

I guess Javier is still useful in one way or another.

As expected, Javier’s teachings were effective. From that moment on, Lloyd focused entirely on meditating. Three days passed. Then five days passed. At last, on the fifteenth day, Lloyd managed to suppress his heightened senses just enough to continue his daily life.

“Ha...” Lloyd inhaled and looked around.

His nausea was now reduced to a noticeable degree. It turned out that spending every minute of his day in meditation wasn’t a waste after all. However, there was still one hurdle left for him to cross.

“Okay, does this mean my insomnia is cured?” asked Lloyd.

“You shouldn’t get your hopes up, Young Master.”

Javier’s answer disappointed Lloyd. “Is that so...”

“Yes,” replied Javier cold-heartedly. “Even I could not overcome insomnia before your lullaby.”

“Okay, then how about we do this?”

A sudden idea popped into his head as he conversed with Javier.

Then, I'll listen to a lullaby, too!

Lloyd immediately brought out a piece of paper and pen, remembering what he had studied back in his college years. He then quickly scribbled down lesson content from some of his major-related courses.

So, this and that, bla bla... Here and that... Okay.

After a short wrestle with his memory, Lloyd was able to fill the entire page.

"Hey, read this for me," demanded Lloyd as he held out a paper.

"Excuse me?"

"Read it. This one," urged Lloyd again.

"Wait. Is this a lullaby for yourself?"

"Yeah. Can you read it? It's nothing too complicated. I made sure to avoid any difficult language, so it's easy to read. You just need to read through it without stuttering."

"..."

"Okay, come on."

Lloyd jumped onto the bed and covered himself with a blanket. He then sent an expectant gaze to Javier. Come on now. I can sleep now. I am a genius for devising this plan. Praising himself inwardly, Lloyd looked forward to sleeping well after fifteen days of insomnia. At last, Javier began to recite the lullaby.

"Hah. I see. Then, hmm... The Limit State Design method attempts to deal with the stability of the structure probabilistically by considering the load action and fluctuations of the material strength... Blah blah... Based on the mechanical behavior of the material... Whatnot... It is regarded as being displayed as it is in the completed structural system."

“Good. Keep going,” Lloyd urged.

A wide grin hung on Lloyd’s face. To his relief, Javier was reciting the lullaby without much stuttering. Lloyd’s anticipation grew. He closed his eyes, recalled his college days, imagined Javier’s voice to be that of a boring professor, and tried to fall into a state of happy slumber.

“However, no matter how much attention is paid to the quality control of materials, the proposed value in the design... This and that... In the application of loads, the load given in the specification is... Blah blah... Probabilistic considerations will ensure that the stability of the structure is properly assessed.”

“Okay, more. Keep going.”

Let’s go to sleep. Please let me fall asleep. I can do it! I can go fall asleep! So, continue! The corners of his eyes trembled. He engineered his brain to make Javier’s voice sound boring.

"In general, when designing a structure, the allowable stress design method using the safety factor concept has a small working load... Um... If sagging or cracking is not a problem… a bill... Development of structure interpretation and design capabilities...um... High-strength rebar and...phew...the ingredients... Zzz...”

“Hey?” Lloyd opened his eyes when Javier’s recitation stopped. Then, he saw.

“Are you asleep?” asked Lloyd.

Snore... Javier didn’t answer.

“I asked if you’re sleeping,” repeated Lloyd.

Phew...

“Hey,” begged Lloyd. “Hello? Professor?”

“Phew...”

Lloyd teared up. How was he to accept this situation wherein his attempt to make himself fall asleep with the textbook recitation made the reciter fall asleep?

Goodness. It’s not like I can read it to myself out loud.

Eventually, Lloyd gave up. Even though he had somewhat gotten used to his senses and could go on with his daily life and supervise the construction, getting sleep at night was a hopeless endeavor. There was no way to cure his insomnia, and he couldn’t neglect his construction site for much longer.

Fine. It’s not like this is my first time being sleep-deprived.

Abruptly, he recalled his days back in South Korea, particularly the days before he filed for college leave of absence. It was the most physically and mentally draining time in his life. Even when he hadn’t healed from losing his parents, Lloyd had to survive alone and work part-time. He also had school and heaps of assignments. There was just not enough time for everything, so he wished he had two bodies because he couldn’t overlook either side.

As such, Lloyd decided to do his best and ace everything. But there was one problem. Sleep. He couldn’t sleep at night. Whenever he closed his eyes, he began to see things, probably because of the pain of losing his parents or the haunting images of their last moments. His heart even felt stifled. Unable to sleep properly, he tossed and turned through the night. That period marked the harshest time period in his life, wherein he had to brace himself and remain strong even when his sleep deprivation, fatigue, trauma, and stress caused him to get regular nosebleeds.

At least I’m doing better than back then. My heart is in peace. I’m well-fed with nutritional food. I have people who wash clothes and clean on my behalf.

His current life differed from the period when he lived on plain rice and kimchi. He had servants to wash his clothes and clean his room and people who supported him by his side. This place was heaven. Thinking so, Lloyd accepted his insomnia and went out to the site. Every day, he was covered in sunlight and dust. The dam construction was not an easy project.

I've got to keep it as simple as possible. Stay faithful to the dam's main purpose. Exclude any complicated features. It just needs to be strong and sturdy.

The first task ahead of them was changing the direction of the river and drying the empty space left behind for construction.

It goes without saying that I can't build the dam when the water is still flowing. In order for the construction to continue, I have to redirect the current of the river even if it means I'll have to reverse it again later on.

So, Lloyd dug for a spillway to allow the direction of the river flow to change directions. He then built a temporary cofferdam upstream and downstream of the main dam. The upstream cofferdam directed the river to the spillway and blocked the water from flowing to the main dam.

As for the downstream cofferdam, its role was to prevent the diverted river water from overflowing and sinking the main dam construction site. As such, the spillway was dug as deep and wide as possible. The cofferdam for the upstream was built using the fill dam format, wherein soils and rocks were piled up in the rip-rap format. The measurement followed the design Lloyd had finished in advance. When he completed everything, the site for the main dam dried and smoothened. It was now time to begin the actual construction.

"You all can't be thinking that it's time for a break, right? Everyone let's get to work! Work!" Lloyd encouraged the workers all the more while keeping their shift schedule in mind and strictly complying with the established safety measures. He didn't give any time for slack. The reason was simple.

That's the only way for us to quickly finish the construction! It'll also help with my insomnia! I barely get any sleep at night and can't bear to watch you all cheerfully take a break! So, you should all be pushing yourselves to finish your work!

Lloyd planned to hurry his workers and finish the project swiftly. That way, he could activate the Jewel of Truth and find out if the solution for the incoming disaster required any spending of the RP.

If the solution doesn't require RP, I'll do anything I can to get more of it and level up my manaheart.

If so, he would be completely free from insomnia. That became his ray of hope and source of motivation to passionately put pressure on the workers. His plan worked as the construction progressed without a hitch. The core part of the main dam, which would support the heavy weight of the structure, was completed.

Next, Lloyd removed topsoil and alluvial soil from the area until the bedrock appeared. He then mana-blasted it to create a slope with infinite holes, which were then filled with cement. After, he grouted the areas where water would pool when the dam was ready.

This will essentially be a giant basin made of cement.

This was the only way to make the dam sturdy. It was more complicated than erecting a wall and trapping water behind it. Once the foundation was fully constructed, he proceeded to the most important portion of the project, the main dam. Lloyd referred to the Tibi Dam of Spain for the design.

Just like how the Tibi dam was built, Lloyd stacked together thick layers of limestone to build the structure. The interior of the dam was built using natural stone and cement. The exterior was made using uniformly sized rocks that minimized any gaps from appearing. In the end, they both came together to form a stable and dense arch. Lloyd simultaneously worked on constructing the Jewel of Truth at the same time.

Of course I have to. I need to finish it while the dam is still empty.

That was how he could make sure his construction of the Jewel of Truth would go smoothly. Thankfully, it was a relatively easier project than the dam.

It's a relief that I have a detailed blueprint.

Lloyd dutifully followed the Jewel of Truth blueprint, raising the foundation on the spot he had marked before. There, he inserted the sculpture he had found in the Mermaid Kingdom. After putting together a pyramid that resembled the Tomb of the General, he laid, inserted, and placed together all the key materials for the jewel.

Great. Let's continue on just like now. Just like now!

The construction processes in place couldn't go any smoother. There hadn't been any accidents, even minor ones, or other big challenges. Everything was progressing so nicely that Lloyd happily wished all his construction projects would be this relaxed.

One month later. Two months later. Three months later... One day, after six months passed, in the very morning Lloyd was finishing the final stage of construction for the dam and the Jewel of Truth...

Fwoosh!

Suddenly, a brilliant ray of light enveloped the construction site, and an entity no one ever anticipated to see emerged. He had a ring of iridescent light on his head and two fiery loops wrapping his whole body. This entity held the iron mace of punishment on one hand and the order of the demolition of illegal architecture on the other. It was Raphael the Throne, the Director of Inspection.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 316: An Angel Has Descended (1)

Raphael the Throne was a renowned angel with an unrivaled reputation. Was it because he possessed special powers? Or because of his irreproachable personality? No. In the distant past, Raphael used to be like the rest of the angels. He belonged to the Angels choir, the lowest of the ranks, spending all his days studying at the Angel Academy. Raphael had aspired to pass the heavenly public official examination until he luckily succeeded and became a public official of the heavens.

That was how ordinary he was, and those around him expected nothing more from him. Since Raphael had merely just passed the examination for the Angels choir, everyone believed that his career would follow the standard path: To be harassed with complaints coming up from the lower realm until he was promoted to an Archangel. Only this time, he'd be harassed by Principalities angels. And if he was unlucky, he would end his career as one of the Principalities angels. If he did okay, he'd join the Powers. That was the typical career track for angels. But if he got lucky, he would be one of the Virtues angels until he honorably retired. This was a realistic and ordinary future to dream of, and everyone expected nothing more from Raphael.

But Raphael proved them all wrong in contrast to his unremarkable performance as a student. When he was left to deal with complaints, Raphael showed a completely different side of him. He became steadfast in his job and never procrastinated on any task that was given to him. Every complaint that came in the form of prayer each day was fielded and resolved like clockwork, and the administrative measures, once decided, were executed on the spot without exception or concession. No form of compliment or flattery could curry favor with him, and his principled work ethic eventually prompted him to boast an unrivaled productivity among his peers.

As a result, Raphael's career advanced at a historic speed. In less than 100 years since he was appointed as part of the Angels, he was promoted to be an Archangel. Within 50 years, he rose to join the choir of Principalities. This shocked everyone.

But that was just the beginning. He continued to excel in his job and showed exemplary skills in managing corruption in all the offices he supervised. The offices managed by him served as a leading example for others to follow in heaven. Eventually, the stigma that heavenly officials were lazy sleazebags disappeared.

Thanks to this, Raphael earned countless commendation medals and awards and became a superstar among the panel for promotion. After he advanced above the choir of Powers and Virtues, high-flying Raphael easily joined the Dominion before becoming one of the Thrones angels in just a few thousand years.

His career flourished once more when he earned the position of the "Director of Inspection of the Under Realms," equivalent to being the right-hand man of Gabriel the Seraphim, the highest-ranking angel in heaven. Raphael had started out as part of the Angels but climbed up to the rank of the Throne. His rapid advancement hadn't stopped, however. Chances were that he could become a Cherubim or Seraphim. Appropriately, Raphael's presence exuded a distinct air of magnificence in heaven, and that hadn't changed as he stood in front of the Frontera Fiefdom.

"Hmm." Raphael's emerald eyes raked over the creatures past his iridescent light. Countless humans. Skeleton soldiers. The Bone Dragon. Lines formed in between his brows.

Skeletons. Bone Dragon. I can't believe there are so many creatures that defy nature, and what is worse is the humans. They are not terrified by these creatures. What happened here...?

The place was a mess, and Raphael wondered why.

A strong mana has been used to freeze the flow of time. This is giving me a headache. That human in particular.

Raphael’s gaze stopped at one spot, and he saw the man shudder at his gaze. “I am making this inquiry as part of my duties as a public official of heaven. Are you Lloyd Frontera?”

Frontera? Frontera... Frontera...?

His voice emitted a divine ripple that spread across the surrounding area, causing the skeleton soldiers and the Bone Dragon to tremble. The same went for Lloyd.

Ack!! My ears!

Lloyd’s body firmly trembled against his will. The booming echo of the divine voice from this strange figure in front of him was too much for Lloyd’s ears, which were overly sensitive due to his swordmaster syndrome. It felt like his ears were about to burst.

“Argh... Yes. And?” Frowning, Lloyd finally managed to answer. Deep down, he wanted to bicker and protest the thoughtless intrusion, which could have potentially caused an accident or injury. But he suppressed the desire when his vigilant mind noticed the holy light glowing around the figure and the imposing aura he gave off in his voice.

I don’t know what he is, but he’s surely someone important. I shouldn’t thoughtlessly antagonize him now. First, I’ll figure out who he is and what he wants.

Quickly reading the room, Lloyd asked, “Excuse me, but who are you?” He frowned, the pain in his ears still there.

“I am Raphael the Throne, the Director of Inspection.” Raphael frowned, too. “Lloyd Frontera and the silver-haired human beside you. I take it that you two have recently visited Hell. You both reek of its stench.”

“Th-that’s—”

“It is all right. That is not the reason I came down.” Raphael flatly interrupted before Lloyd could explain himself and held up a holy scroll in his hand. After opening it in a dignified manner, he recited its content in a steadfast and solemn voice. “An order to demolish an illegal structure of the mundane world. Developer. Human Lloyd Frontera. Demolition building. The Jewel of Truth. Aotearoa.”

“Excuse me?” Lloyd shot a look of surprise.

“The following structure,” Raphael nonchalantly went on, “Has been banned from construction due to its ability to reveal secrets that must not be revealed. Therefore, as per Paragraph 1 of Article 8 in the Special Enforcement Act of the Maintenance of Illegal Architecture and Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Executive Order under the same act, I hereby decree the demolition of this qualifying structure.”

Dazed by the news, Lloyd said, “Wait, please wait...”

Raphael ignored Lloyd. “Notice. In the event you object to the demolition order, you can file a complaint for the cancellation of the order through a desperate prayer within 30 days of the demolition order being issued. However, per Paragraph 3 of Article 8 of the abovementioned law, the demolition must take place if your plea is dismissed.”

“What is happening?” Lloyd let out an exasperated sigh.

“In other words, the Jewel of Truth you are currently constructing is a class one illegal structure in the upper realms. As such, you must cease its construction at once and demolish it.”

Lloyd cocked his head in sheer confusion, trying to make sense of this senseless interruption.

At last, Raphael folded the scroll and looked at Lloyd. “Are there any objections?”

“Yes!” Lloyd bellowed at once. How could he not? He didn’t know what else to say.

What? The Jewel of Truth is illegal? What in tarnation does he mean? Why should I stop my construction and demolish the jewel?

This didn't make any sense to Lloyd. He had worked hard to collect the key construction materials for the Jewel of Truth. He was nearly about to finish its construction.

This angel turns up from the sky and says what? That I must demolish the jewel because it's illegal? What does he expect me to do? Kneel down on the ground and obey his order because the decision came from the higher-ups in the heavenly realms or wherever it was. Like heck, I would. Ha! This is outrageous.

A sudden desire to slap that bastard of an angel with his shovel came over him for blurting out such nonsense. Lloyd wanted to demand why he needed permission from them when the construction was happening in his own world. He wanted to kick the glowing creature out of his fiefdom for trespassing on his territory.

But Lloyd decided not to do that. Instead, he let go of the shovel. Instead of raising his voice, he cleared his throat. Instead of kicking the angel out, he relaxed his eyes and put on a friendly expression on his face. And he feigned an ever so gentle smile.

"Excuse me? Mister Throne Angel?" Lloyd's voice sounded desperate.

"It's Raphael," remarked Raphael calmly.

"My, okay. Mister Raphael?" asked Lloyd pleasantly.

Raphael didn't say anything.

Taking this as a sign to continue, Lloyd added, "It must have been very difficult to come all the way down here with your busy schedule. Have you had a chance to eat?"

"I did."

“Haha, you did? How about then having a cup of tea as a snack? It must be your first visit here in a while.” Lloyd smiled.

However, Raphael was adamant. “I already had a cup.”

“Oh, I see...” Lloyd was starting to run out of ideas. “Then how about we move over there to the break room and have a calm discussion about this matter in more depth? I just happen to put down a comfy sofa.”

“I would rather talk here.”

“Ehem...”

Lloyd feigned his harsh cough as if he was spitting up blood. He was extremely rattled. It wasn’t the angel’s abrupt emergence or the demolition order that rattled him the most. It was something else.

This one’s a straight arrow.

Lloyd perceived that this angel was unyielding and steadfast. But he didn’t give up. Still putting on a friendly smile, he tried to cut a deal with the angel.

“Ehem,” said Lloyd. “Then may I ask you something?”

“If you have an inquiry to make, go ahead.”

“Yes. If I build the Jewel of Truth here, is it going to harm the upper realms you belong to?” asked Lloyd.

“It will not. But your realm will be greatly impacted by it.”

“Pardon?”

“The Jewel of Truth,” explained Raphael, “is a structure that gives you insight into the secrets of the future. These secrets have the potential to bring chaos and tragedy to countless groups of creatures here.”

Nodding, Lloyd replied, “Aha. Is that why the structure has been banned?”

“Indeed.” Raphael nodded seriously. As for Lloyd, he thought...

What a load of crap. He’s stopping me because it can potentially cause danger? Then you might as well get rid of the knives, too! It’s a tool that can lead to murders, after all!

Lloyd felt wronged. Who do they think they are to determine such dangers and order him around? Suppressing the righteous anger surging in him, Lloyd smiled calmly. “Um, then, can I not use it carefully? Moreover, the said structure was something that already existed in the mythical ages.”

“Until it was destroyed after being determined as an illegal structure.”

“That is because of the great war that broke out—”

“The great war itself,” Raphael adamantly refuted, “Took place because of the intervention of the heavenly realms. The event was given as an opportunity for the creatures of this realm to demolish the Jewel of Truth with their own hands.”

Not getting what Raphael meant, Lloyd asked, “What do you mean by that?”

“We are done talking, so I will execute the demolition order at once.”

“Excuse me?”

Instead of explaining further, Raphael immediately jumped into action, catching Lloyd by surprise. The angel passed him, flew in the direction of the Jewel of Truth, and held up the giant mace. His intent was clear.

Crap! Really? He’s going to demolish the jewel just like that?

This angel was absolutely incorrigible. His ruthless actions reflected his belief that all mundane creatures had to acquiesce to any orders from heaven. This was the part that flipped Lloyd’s lid.

What a load of crap!

Lloyd wondered if this was what it was like for people who got kicked out of their homes by malicious land developers. He felt a sharp surge of anger, and before he knew it, he was dashing forward with a shovel in his hand. He passed the workers who were in shock from the angel's appearance, jumped over the construction equipment and materials, and stood in front of the angel.

But Lloyd didn't express his anger. Instead, he opted for a course of action far wiser than that. He suddenly got down on his knees. With a pious gaze toward the angel and in a genuine and altruistic voice, Lloyd thus recited his desperate plea.

"I pray to the Father, the Son, no, to the sky, cloud, wind, and all the pure souls of this land, including the angel in front of me!"

"What...?" Raphael flinched. Prayer? Now? Like this? Unperturbed by Raphael's gawping, Lloyd continued to speak aloud his pious prayers.

"Yes, I am. I lift my desperate prayer to you, dear angel. I will pray now, tomorrow, and the day after that. On and on. I will pray here until you grant my prayer until my hands and knees wear away into nothing. Will my prayer then reach your ears someday? If you say yes, which I beg you to, I will shed tears of repentance in sheer gratitude and praise your mercy."

"H-hold on..."

"That is why I continue praying! I will not stop until my desperate prayer reaches your heart! Right here! Endlessly! I shall pray!"

"Excuse me? Wait, stop for a moment." Flustered, Raphael stopped Lloyd. With a serious look on his face, Raphael asked, "Tell me, are you lodging an official complaint through this prayer?"

"Yes," Lloyd nodded right away. "Didn't you say it just now? That I can appeal for the cancellation of the demolition order through a prayer?"

Raphael didn't say anything.

Reading Raphael’s expression on his face, Lloyd replied, “It appears that my prayer has reached the heavens. I am very relieved.”

Still, Raphael didn’t reply.

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction. Raphael’s eyes, on the other hand, held a glint of dismay. And he wondered if this human might be a demon.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 317: An Angel Has Descended (2)

I’ve heard stories of high-ranking angels but never saw one up until today...

Whoosh. Young Red Dragon Solitas was deep in thought as the wind blowing from the northern dam construction site brushed his skin.

This is troublesome.

Abruptly, he recalled what happened in the past few hours. He was going about his day like any other day, working hard in the studio of his master, Corgidus. This time, Solitas was preoccupied with shaping a rare piece of deer horn into a star. That was until he felt something.

A holy and oppressive storm of mana. A clear and relentless light that purified everything it touched. It was the first time I ever felt something like that on my skin.

Something was definitely off. His mind soon lost focus and ruined the deer horn decoration right before it was finished. But instead of glooming over the loss, Solitas leaped to his feet, bolted out of the studio, and ignored the shouts from his master, Corgidus. He decided it wasn’t the time to mind such trivialities. He immediately flew toward the spot that allowed him to see the dam construction site. Then, he started to think.

I wasn’t sure when I first felt the energy of a holy mana... I never imagined that a high-ranking angel would have descended down here.

High-ranking angels. Even though Solita was young, he had heard about them. And he knew one thing for sure.

He’d be stronger than me.

His mother’s teaching came to his mind.

She taught me that angels were strong. She told me how difficult it is to go against them because it’s not easy to leave damage on their body. It’s better to fight three or four low-ranking angels or one mid-ranking angel if you're an ordinary dragon.

And today, the angel that came down to this fiefdom appeared to be much stronger than a low or mid-rank angel. Solitas knew this because of the two fiery, rotating rings burning behind the angel's back.

I remember what it is. Mother said it's the mark of a high-ranking angel.

As such, that angel over there was a high-ranking one. In other words, he was an unassailable opponent. Yet, the angel seemed to be in a fury. That was the problem.

I can clearly feel there's a hostile yet holy aura around him. Is he here because he has business with Lloyd Frontera? Is it because Lloyd Frontera froze the passage of time in this world outside his fiefdom? That could be it. What's going to happen now? He's not going to destroy this entire place, is he?

Thousands of ominous possibilities crossed his mind. What if the angel punished the fiefdom and turned this place into a pile of ash?

That can't happen!

Solitas found himself shaking his head.

Corgidus hasn't taught me everything about the art of jewel refinement. And if this fiefdom turns into a pile of ash, there will be no more sludge, which means I'll be out of work and can't learn the craft in return!

The ominous thought continued to play in his mind.

Then, I'll never be able to improve my terrible skills and master how to refine jewels. Without being able to keep a hoard of jewels in my cave, I won't be able to propose to anyone since I won't have any jewels to feed my children.

Just like that, he'd die alone as a bachelor.

I can never let that happen…!

Solitas felt a surge of desperation. He made a decision.

I'll observe the situation. And if Lloyd gets attacked, I'll step in and fight. I have to protect this fiefdom.

Solitas decided to bravely fight to fulfill his lifetime wish of getting married, even if the opponent was a high-ranking angel. He figured the fight would be doable with Javier and the Bone Dragon. Around the time his resolution was solidifying in his heart, Solitas heard a carefree and relaxed voice beside him.

"Hey, you there. You don't want to recklessly engage with an angel."

"Eh?"

Solitas was surprised by the sudden voice that came out of nowhere. Thinking how it was possible for anyone to sneak up on him, Solitas swiveled around at lightning speed.

"Who are you?!"

"Oh. The Dragon King."

Solitas saw a slouched man sitting on the grass. His eyes were half-open in sleepiness, and his voice sounded as if the mere act of speaking was too bothersome for him. There was something about him that gave off a lazy-ass vibe, and he seemed to epitomize the word "slacker."

But Solitas didn't lower his guard just yet. He wasn't going to be fooled by the man's relaxed appearance and aura around him. Since the man managed to sneak up on him, avoiding Solitas's senses, the latter could only wonder what abilities the former held.

In a graver voice, Solitas asked, "I asked who you are."

Whoosh... Solitas emitted an oppressive energy unique to dragons as he asked. But the indolent man gave a yawn.

“Ha...” Dragon King Verkis yawned. “I told you. The Dragon King.”

“The Dragon King?”

“Yeah.”

“You are the great and divine King Verkis?” huffed Solitas. “You?”

“Well, if you don’t believe it, then don’t. Anyway, you don’t want to get involved with an angel. It’s only going to complicate your life as a dragon.”

“What?” Solitas stopped.

Verkis grinned mysteriously. “The devils in Hell pretend to obey you if you overpower them, but the angels are different. They’re a terrible bunch of inflexible folks who play it exactly by the books and never back off on a decision unless they agree with it. They’re as flexible as a piece of iron.”

“I do not get what you mean...”

“And now,” Verkis kindly went on, “An angel, a high-ranking angel at that, made a direct appearance in our world. What does that tell you? It shows that he’s here to implement a decision that was already made. So, stay out of this, kid. You can’t bend an angel’s dogged will with your powers, and even if you do, you’ll only leave a bad impression and make your life miserable.”

Solitas, however, was defiant. “I do not care. Also, what did you just call me? A kid? How dare you call me that, and who are you?”

“I told you. Twice already,” Verkis sighed as if this conversation was starting to wear him out.

“The Dragon King? You are the great and divine King Verkis?”

“Yeah.”

Solitas couldn’t hold his rage anymore. “How dare you?! Do you think you will be safe even after impersonating him?”

Exhausted boredom came over Verkis's face at last. "Ha... How annoying. Should I just kill you now?" He was too bothered to explain or convince the young dragon, and instead, softly flicked his finger.

Flick! A ripple of mana appeared on his fingertip and wrapped Solitas's whole body.

"Eek?" As soon as the young dragon opened his eyes wide in surprise, a change came immediately.

Pop! A growing plume of smoke enveloped his body, and by the time the smoke thinned out, Solitas was gone. There was only a tiny red gecko.

"This is your punishment. Stay like that for a day," ordered Verkis. "You're going to believe my words now, right?"

The red gecko, Solitas, nodded.

"Okay. Good boy. But know it's too late even if you nod now."

Solitas simply stared at Verkis.

Verkis appreciated the silence. "Look how nice it is now that you're calm. You remind me of my salamander. You're exactly like it. My little Deoddeok that my wife took on her trip."

"Anyway," Verkis went on, "I have to fulfill the terms of my sponsorship to revive my beneficiary from death. That's why I'm out here, even though it's bothersome for me. So, stay quiet. All right?"

Solitas fiercely nodded his head in shock. He finally understood the meaning of Verkis's words.

Hold on right there...

Frightful chills ran over Solitas's body. At the same time, he also felt reverence. Swallowing dryly, he turned toward the construction site for the dam.

Beneficiary? Sponsored by the Dragon King? Lloyd Frontera is his beneficiary? And he's going to die today?

***

Should I just... kill him?

Such a thought crossed Raphael's mind. How could it not while he was currently facing Lloyd?

This human is making false prayers. And his attitude is nothing short of a demon's.

No, he could be worse than a demon, Raphael thought. The prayer this man was offering could not be any more impure. Behind it, there was only greed to purely gain something for himself. Furthermore, he had the audacity to be brazen as well.

"Now, my complaint has been filed officially, correct?" asked Lloyd earnestly.

Raphael felt repulsion and hatred for the gaze and smile Lloyd Frontera threw at him on his knees. Raphael's fists clenched on their own.

How dare he pray in this kind of manner.

Raphael was not pleased. Prayers weren't created for this purpose.

It is the final resort a desperate man from the lower realms can rely on to ask for help from the upper realms. When no one is out there to help the creature in their world, when there's no one they can lean on for support, when they are left completely alone, a prayer offers them a chance to seek help from the heavens.

With only such desperation in their hearts, would the heavens accept their words and forward them to the angels in the form of a complaint, which the angels would review and process.

Most prayers are accepted. That's how pure and desperate prayers usually are. Even if their prayers are not answered in the current life, they eventually actualize in their afterlife. That's how precious and significant sincere prayers are. But this man... How dare he offer this kind of prayer?

Raphael shuddered. He didn't want to accept the man's prayer. But he didn't have any choice but to accept it.

"Fine..." finally muttered Raphael. "Your sincerity has been accepted."

There was only one criterion for whether a prayer would be accepted as a complaint: Sincerity. Lloyd's brazen prayer, to Raphael's repulsion, met the criteria.

Even if it's not pure and with blemish, even if it's borne out of personal greed... it is still sincere.

Personal greed was sincere, and that was what Raphael found to be more disgusting and repulsive. Naturally, contempt filled his gaze as it fixed on Lloyd.

"Are you requesting for the cancellation of the Jewel of Truth demolition?" asked Raphael.

"Yes, that is it." Lloyd nodded fervently and clenched his fists.

It's working. I succeeded.

Lloyd hadn't been entirely sure about this tactic. He had simply taken his chance by remembering what the angel had read aloud. But to his relief, it worked, and Lloyd decided it was time to push forward.

Looking up at the angel, Lloyd said, "I would like to file an official complaint. Please cancel the order to demolish the Jewel of Truth."

"Do you have a basis for the cancellation request?"

"Of course I do." Lloyd collected his breath before speaking. "I am honestly curious. I do not understand what harm building the Jewel of Truth will do to this world. Certainly, it is a mysterious building that can answer any question it is asked and has the potential to be used for evil. The thing is, however, does that not also mean that it can be used for good?”

When Raphael saw Lloyd stop, he said, “Continue.”

“Thank you, your grace. That is why I am making this request. Please cancel the demolition of the Jewel of Truth. If you are worried about the abuse of the building, I would be happy to set a condition for its usage.”

“What condition?” asked Raphael the Throne.

“Wouldn’t it be all right if you come down and watch over the jewel whenever it is at work?”

“Are you saying that you will use the Jewel only in the presence and under the supervision of an angel?”

“Yes. That is exactly what I mean,” said Lloyd.

“I see... I will forward your complaint above. Please wait.”

Raphael took a step back and closed his eyes, contacting his direct supervisor through the angelic ring on his head. An answer came immediately. Raphael opened his eyes and looked down at Lloyd. His eyes were now changed. They were glacial and adamant. The same change could be felt in his voice.

“Human Lloyd Frontera,” Raphael announced. “I received the answer to your request. In short, your request to cancel the demolition has been rejected.”

“Excuse me?” blurted Lloyd in shock.

“The Jewel of Truth holds the potential to divulge secrets that must not be revealed. As such, it is at the top of the list of structures that need to be demolished even in heaven, and that cannot be changed without a special cause.”

“Wait, hold on... By special cause, then-”

Raphael cut Lloyd short. “Your personal reasons do not constitute a special cause. Moreover...” His gaze toward Lloyd grew more glacier. “As I have notified you, in accordance with Paragraph 8 of Article 3 of the law, the demolition will take place instantly as your prayer request has been rejected.”

“Nothing more.”

With that, Raphael made a move. He immediately passed Lloyd and neared the Jewel of Truth before the latter could stop the angel. Standing on its top, Raphael raised his iron mace and prepared to strike down the Jewel top. Just then...

“Hold on!”

It was Lloyd who shouted. Before Raphael knew it, Lloyd was standing right in front of him and stopping the demolition. His breathing was raspy. This time, Lloyd neither kneeled nor looked up. Instead, he had his shovel aimed at the angel’s forehead as if to say, “Over my dead body!” Lloyd stared at Raphael with wide eyes, resisting and fighting hard.

What else can I do? What else can I do when this whole thing makes no sense?!

Lloyd felt wronged. He couldn’t lose the Jewel like this. He had to stop destiny and protect Count and Countess Frontera, Julian, and everyone else. He wanted to happily spend the rest of his life with them, who had become his family now. As such, the Jewel of Truth had to be erected. Lloyd resisted the angel with such resolutions in his head, ready to desist the intruder, come hell or high water. Over my dead body, Lloyd told himself as he tensed his eyes and bit his lips.

“Human Lloyd Frontera,” Raphael spoke. “Are you interrupting the completion of my heavenly duties?”

“Come again?”

“This is my last warning. Move away.” Raphael’s icy voice pierced into Lloyd’s ears. However, Lloyd remained and glared at the angel without giving any response.

Lloyd was hell-bent on staying rooted to the ground. He then racked his brain on what he had to do to stop that square, unyielding angel.

Think. Use your brain. Think of something smart. Think of something! Please!

Lloyd frantically racked his brain. But even before he could come up with something, Raphael made a chilling declaration on Lloyd.

“I have received your intent. Be aware that what is about to happen is on you. You have disobeyed a decision from heaven and attempted to stop an angel without permission. This is considered an attempt to interfere with the official duties of a heavenly official, and the punishment for it is immediate execution,” Raphael announced in a voice void of any emotion.

“What?!” Lloyd then saw what was nearing him.

Fwoosh! Lloyd saw the angel’s iron mace coming down from the sky, ready to slice through Lloyd and the Jewel of Truth. It charged down unopposed at lightning speed. Lloyd could feel the attacker’s determination.

“...!”

Lloyd’s eyes flew open. The trajectory of the mace came vividly in his eyes, thanks to his swordmaster syndrome. Its movement was read so clearly that Lloyd observed and caught the angel’s grip, movement, and weight shift. However, despite his hyper-sensitivity, he couldn’t react and dodge the attack.

My body can’t keep up with my senses.

Even though Lloyd’s senses bordered on the level of a swordmaster, his body was still equal to that of a high-level sword expert. As such, it failed to react even when his eyes could see the incoming mace. Lloyd failed to move and avoid the attack. It was as if he had become a snail.

I can't avoid this.

Although he didn't want to, Lloyd imagined what would happen to him if the mace knocked him right in the head. Even then, the mace continued to move down, slicing through the air, crashing across the area, and charging down to strike his head.

Dammit.

Lloyd was dumbstruck. Will my skull break just like this? Is this what I worked so hard for? An empty scoff escaped him. Just then, a flash of light appeared before his eyes.

Clang!

Was I hit? The thought crossed Lloyd's mind. But it turned out not to be the case. Someone was standing in front of Lloyd, and the man had blocked the angel's mace. And soon, Lloyd heard an adamant and cold voice coming from the man.

"I, Javier Asrahan, the knight of the Frontera County, will immediately execute the trespasser for threatening my lord's family."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 318: How to Corrupt an Angel (1)

“I, Javier Asrahan, a knight of the Frontera County, will immediately execute the trespasser for threatening my lord’s family.”

“Hmm...?” Raphael stopped at the icy, adamant voice and gaze directed at him. He couldn’t believe what just happened.

My mace was blocked? By a mere human?

Raphael was flustered and dumbstruck as his mace wasn’t any ordinary typical. It was imbued with the holy powers of heaven, so an inferior creature from the lower realms should never be able to block it, even if his attack was against a swordmaster.

How dare he!

As if it wasn’t enough to block the mace, this man also made an arrogant declaration. Raphael glared at Javier with an intense look in his eyes.

“Human of the lower realms... Your name is... Javier Asrahan. I suppose you did not think about the consequences of your action,” warned Raphael solemnly.

Javier didn’t respond.

“Foolish. I feel sorry for you. Your power to block the offense of a Throne angel amazes me, but it fills me with remorse to see you waste your talent and skills on such precipitous actions. Therefore, Javier Asrahan. Please step back and think again. You are committing the grave crime of obstructing the duties of a heavenly official.”

Thwack! Clatter! Raphael put more strength into his iron mace. But Javier’s sword was equally strong. It didn’t sway or shake against his. And Javier’s gaze was just as adamant as his sword.

Javier didn’t speak because he didn’t have to. It didn’t matter whether he was an angel. All that mattered was that this angel had threatened the well-being of his fiefdom.

There is nothing left to do but get rid of this angel.

Twang! Javier jerked his sword upward, bouncing the mace off.

Swoosh! Javier then lowered his body at lightning speed before closing in and setting a distance that allowed him to leave a fatal hit. He then rocked his sword’s trajectory.

Fwoosh! His sword emitted a brilliant aura and produced dozens of remnant light strands aligned to its shaky trajectory. As each strand glinted and changed hundreds of times, tens of thousands of brilliant remnants of the aura appeared. Raphael’s eyes shook in dismay.

Eh?

Raphael tried to track the changes to spot the real aura but failed before he could step back and distance himself. One of the tens of thousands of light strands thrust into his stomach.

Raphael sensed that the blow was unavoidable. But he neither tried to defend himself nor dodge the incoming blow. Instead, he simply proceeded to raise his mace as a counterattack, aiming toward Javier’s head. Then something extraordinary took place.

Fwish! Right before the sword penetrated Raphael’s stomach, the two fiery rings on his back suddenly rotated and unleashed themselves, blocking Javier’s sword strike.

Javier’s eyes trembled at the angel’s unexpected defense mechanism. But Javier was far from being perturbed. It only triggered him to lay more attacks. Clang! Clang! Clang!

Awakening hundreds and thousands of manahearts, Javier transferred the turbulent wave of mana into his sword. He soon became one with the sword. He slashed, struck, stabbed, swung, and lashed out. Thwack!

Raphael didn’t stay put either. His iron mace reverberated when his heavenly rings awoke and received their holy and pure energy. His mace struck, punched, assaulted, crushed, and suppressed.

Kaboom! Javier. Raphael the Throne. Their collision created shock waves that went on for several miles and produced thick storms of dust. The impact shook the whole area. Lloyd, who had been watching their entire ruckus unfold, was caught in between them.

Ack!

And it was killing him. It was because of his swordmaster syndrome that had anomalously heightened his bodily senses.

Boom! Crash! Kaboom! Slash! Clang!

Ahh! Eek! Ugh! Argh! Ackk!

Every time Javier and Raphael’s weapons clashed and created a storm of shock waves, Lloyd had to cover his ears and roll sideways in agony.

Two of you! Stop! Ack!!

Lloyd was in agony. His ears were hurting already due to his swordmaster syndrome, which amplified the sound of anyone’s voice outside his own. The thundering sound booming from beside him made him feel like someone was throwing an EDM party inside his head. No, it actually felt like he had been transmogrified into a beetle trapped into a gigantic speaker at a heavy metal concert. Despite this, however, Lloyd didn’t just sit back and writhe in pain. He couldn’t stay put.

Ackk! This is nuts. I never expected such a messed-up situation to happen.

Beaten to a pulp by the noise and shock waves and despite his whole body shuddering, Lloyd forced himself up. He then opened his eyes wide and stared at the cloud of dust blooming around him until he could make out Javier and Raphael.

Ha... How did this happen? A clash with an angel?

The sight drew a sigh out of Lloyd. He wanted to avoid a confrontation with the angel at any cost because he knew what the novel had said about angels.

The novel said that these angels from the heavenly realms were equivalent to public officials on Earth who have control and power over global affairs.

As such, nothing good would come out of fighting against such creatures. It would be a complete loss for him. It was similar to how nothing good came out of antagonizing and making an enemy out of your supervisor at work. In the end, the subordinates would be the ones who would suffer from it. As such, Lloyd wanted to avoid having a conflict with the angel if he could help it. That was why he had desperately given a prayer and tried to have a discussion.

But it didn't work. So I guess there's nothing else I can do.

Lloyd felt bitter. Remorseful, too. But this was water under the bridge. The best thing he could do now was to mend the situation. Even if this clash made them an enemy of the heavenly realms, Lloyd resolved to desist Raphael from executing the outrageous demolition order of the Jewel of Truth.

And if my ties with them get completely severed... Well, then, I'll ask the Dragon King or the King of Hell to help me out.

Lloyd resolved in his heart that he would stop the restoration of destiny, even if it meant involving the corps of demons from Hell. With that, he watched the breathless confrontation between Javier and Raphael while rooting for the former.

Please! You can do it, Javier!

Lloyd knew not to interfere in the middle of their fight. And he was right for thinking so. Javier was a grandmaster, and Raphael was almost as strong as Javier. Seeing no place in the fight where he could jump in and help out

Javier, Lloyd concluded that he'd be like a mosquito in between two aggressive dinosaurs if he intervened.

That's why you need to win! Let's go! Come on!

Lloyd rooted for Javier while enduring the painful booming sounds and shock waves.

Thwack! Boom!

Okay, you're doing wonders, Javier! Push him more! More!

Clang! Clang! Clang! Clang!

Right! That's it! Hey! Over there! Ahh!

Kaboom! Boom!

Eh? Hey! Don't let him get to you! Stab him!

Thwack! Crash! Boom!

Ohh! Oh...!

Lloyd joyously exclaimed each time Javier succeeded in pushing Raphael back. And he mournfully groaned each time Javier retreated. In the process, one thing became clear to Lloyd.

It's a losing game for Javier if this fight drags out.

Lloyd's observation was on point. As the fight dragged out, Raphael was beginning to gain the upper hand. Javier seemed to have it at first. But that was only for a short period of time. Raphael started to become more relaxed over time, while Javier started to opt for a more defensive posture. Lloyd instantly realized why this was happening.

It's because of those fiery rings.

Lloyd paid attention to the two rings of fire that enveloped Raphael's body. And at that moment, they started to move again. Blaze!

They rotated and intersected each other before precisely blocking Javier's sword as if they predicted the trajectory of its movement. Afterward, they exploded. Kaboom!

It turned out that those rings did more than block against incoming attacks. They generated fiery explosions and shock waves while fending off Javier's strikes. Naturally, this prompted Javier to spend one more second regaining his balance, costing him the chance to lay simultaneous attacks. As such, even if Javier was originally in an offensive position, he was later forced to take on a defensive posture when his offensive streak began to falter.

Those rings are moving like a piece of artificial intelligence.

Their defensive powers were top-notch as well. Not only did they manage to stop Javier's grandmaster-level attacks, but they also absorbed the impacts of his blow and sent it back to him.

That's what's giving that angel the energy to just focus on his attacks. On the other hand, Javier...

Javier was in a completely different position. He had to focus both on his offense and defense. To paint a clearer picture, Javier was comparable to a traditional racer driving a manual car, whereas Raphael was...

He's driving an advanced AI-operated self-driving car, leaving the wheel to the AI as he enjoys a cup of coffee and a bag of chips.

Their fighting method had differences in terms of efficiency, which meant the level of strain put on each of them differed. In short, things would go badly for Javier if the fight continued to drag on longer.

I can't sit back and watch.

Thump! Thump! Lloyd's heart raced fast at the ominous prospect. He realized he had to do something, like getting rid of those fiery rings.

Otherwise, Javier would lose.

I can't let that happen. No one will be able to stop Raphael once Javier is gone. Dragon King Verkis? There's no guarantee that the bum is going to help me, even if he's my sponsor. No one, including me, will be able to stop the Jewel's demolition.

A sense of alarm swelled over him. Lloyd's brain started to tick at full speed.

Think. Come up with something. How can I help Javier to give him the upper hand in this fight? To help him win, what should I do? How do I turn the tide in his favor?

The current situation. The future awaiting them. Javier's strengths and weaknesses. Raphael's tactics and characteristics. Lloyd considered every factor he could see and predicted to develop a solution. He did the math. He made speculations with the clues he had. And finally, an idea popped into his head.

Oh, right.

It came to him.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. There was a brief explanation of the angels in the novel. The high-ranking angels. The Seraphim. The Cherubim. The Thrones... Right! The fiery rings of the Thrones angels!

According to the novel, the Thrones angels carried fiery rings that fended off all the attacks of their enemies and boasted an impeccable defense capability.

The source of their power was... That's right. Having a good and pure heart inside them.

A pure heart. A pure goodness that didn't have a single blemish. It was said possessing a righteous and pure heart was what powered their rings. In other words...

I just have to corrupt their pure hearts. How?

The answer was already clear. As soon as Lloyd came up with his course of action, he calmed his nauseated stomach and jumped to his feet. He then worked his legs to stand at the peak of the Jewel of the Truth. Javier and Raphael's fight was taking place on the ground. Lloyd cleared his throat as he looked down at them.

The way to corrupt an angel's heart. There is only one way that comes to mind.

For a split second, he felt wistful.

I didn't want to have this kind of reputation in my own fiefdom.

But his hands were tied. Stay on the fence any time longer, and Javier might lose out. Lloyd's time to act was now. And this was the most efficient and quick course of action.

Let's do it.

Lloyd resolved to himself. Finally, he opened his mouth. And then, he sang.

"You were created to be loved! Throughout your life, you are loved!"

Lloyd's off-tune cacophony thundered across the air. From then on, there came a rage-inducing sound that would propel even the most merciful saints to jump out of their graves and slap Lloyd in the mouth. The sound started to terrorize Raphael's eardrums.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 319: How to Corrupt an Angel (2)

Singing. It was a skill that allowed someone to create multifarious sounds and melodies with their respiratory system and vocal organs. It was not just a skill, however. It was an art capable of tugging the heartstrings of its listeners. Raphael the Thrones adored this auditory form of art. As a public official, singing was his one and only source of invigoration amid his strict and methodic work environment.

I thought I was happy and felt lucky.

The music of the upper realms was beautiful. The melodies of Heaven boasted impeccable harmony. Raphael, thus, regarded his greatest blessing as being born a divine creature under heaven.

Listening to music never failed to wash away his day's worth of fatigue. It overwhelmed him with happiness and peace. The same went for today. As he descended into the lower realm, Raphael was determined to enjoy listening to Heaven's Symphony No. 2, his favorite song, as soon as he finished demolishing the Jewel of Truth, to wash away all the exhaustion with its clear, vivid melody. It was his reward to himself. But the reality, to his misfortune, was nothing less than a disgusting cesspool.

"Wh-what in the heavens?"

Raphael was beginning to have the upper hand and oppress his human opponent, who continued to put up a good fight despite his fiery rings. Nonetheless, he was confident that the tables would turn eventually and his enemy would start to crack with a little more pressure. That was when his ears picked up a terrorizing cacophony.

"You were created to be loved! Throughout your life, you are loved!"

Ack...

An avalanche of horror gripped him. He almost dropped the iron mace from his grip as he was suddenly overcome with the desire to cover his ears. The music coming into his ears was plain horror. Its tune, rhythm, and everything else about it was wrong. The singer's screeching voice, too, sounded like a drowning hen.

Where could this sound possibly be coming from? Can this be considered singing? Wait, was this a demonic cry from Hell? Or a curse from the Purgatory? As he strove to collect his chaotic thoughts, Raphael swiveled to the sound's source. He then found Lloyd singing at the top of the Jewel of Truth.

"From the beginning, God has shown his love for you! As we greet and bless each other, love blossoms! Because you are with us, we experience tremendous joy!"

Stop it! Please stop it! Raphael begged inwardly as the words were lost in his mouth. A desire to suddenly offer a prayer for this human surged, followed by a desire to tear out his eardrums.

"Ack...!"

Wham! Just then, Raphael heard the booming sound of his fiery rings blocking a blow, which had come like a bolt of lightning. Raphael shuddered when he realized how the awful singing had distracted him.

Argh!

The blow didn't hurt Raphael. But it compromised his counterattack.

I was doing a good job of suppressing him. Tsk.

Grandmaster Javier. Raphael had been trying to defeat his difficult opponent through suppression. But now, all his momentum had dissipated after his momentary lapse of focus. As a result, the tables had turned against him.

Wham! Boom! Crackle! Javier's sword glinted in a series of motions as soon as it was liberated from the oppressive salvo of attacks from the angel. He was now on the offense and charged to strike down Raphael. His violent attacks seemed to be ready to destroy Raphael’s fiery rings, which acted as his shield.

Arggh!

Raphael began to busily move as it was only a matter of time until his defense capabilities, however strong they were, would be neutralized by the blitzkrieg coming from his opponent. He couldn’t sit back and solely depend on his rings. As such, he looked up, trying to remain calm.

“Human Lloyd Frontera,” Raphael called as he deflected Javier’s sword. “I understand your desire to sing, but could you please stop your singing for a second, as your voice is not quite compatible with my tastes?”

Raphael believed that his gracious and cordial attitude would prompt Lloyd to accept his request and he would understand the former’s dismay. But Raphael could not be more mistaken.

Lloyd’s response came in the form of singing. “O suffering one, stretch your hand out! With the Lord’s promise, take your stand!”

This hymn was something Lloyd used to sing aloud on Sundays at the military when he attended church because they gave out chocolate-coated bread with marshmallows. Lloyd gave everything he had to sing this song aloud. Of course, he didn’t have to purposefully try ruining the song. He simply just tried his best to sing well. But it was just that his best efforts only strained his neck, making his veins pop and voice crack, ultimately perverting his singing into a screeching shrill. Raphael, upon hearing Lloyd’s hymn, writhed in excruciating agony.

“S-stop... Stop!”

Raphael shook his head as he trembled. Why was his day going like this? If he just finished his mission today, he could return to listening to his melodious song.

This singing... This sound... It’ll be stuck in my head even after a thousand years!

Chills ran down his spine. The desire to purify his ears swept through him. He held up his iron mace in desperation and wielded it roughly at Javier, who was charging at him.

Boooom!

Javier was pushed back into a distance when he blocked the mace. Having earned a second to himself, Raphael looked up and pleaded to Lloyd in a shaky voice.

“Please! Human Lloyd Frontera! Do not defile the value of a beautiful song and music!”

Lloyd fervently replied, “Avalokitesvara! The Heart of Prajna Paramita Sutra! He illuminated the Five Skandhas and saw that they were all empty!”

Just then, several lines of vein appeared on Raphael’s forehead. Raphael the Throne, the angel of justice and austerity, almost lost his patience and cursed aloud. He clamped his mouth shut.

I can’t curse. It’ll ruin my purity.

The pure heart represented the will of the heavens and was the source of his power. This meant his purity would be defiled the moment he yelled out curse words due to an emotional outburst. That meant the loss of his main source of power. Remembering that, Raphael strove to keep his mouth shut and push the curse words out of his thoughts. And then, he came to a decision. Since Lloyd wasn’t listening, he would have to forcibly stop the human from singing.

“Arggh!”

Boooom! Raphael leaped high and zoomed toward the peak of the Jewel of Truth to get to Lloyd.

Lloyd, however, didn’t stop singing, even when the raging angel was charging at him. He simply continued to sing with ease. Why? It was because of his new supporter in the fight.

Whoosh! Boom! A humungous tailbone swept the whole area and struck the incoming angel. Even though it barely had any impact, the effect was immense. Raphael was sent dozens of yards away. The tailbone belonged to no other creature than Draggy.

Clack! Crack!

Draggy stood tall in front of the Jewel of Truth after giving Raphael a taste of what it felt like to be a home-run baseball. It opened its chest wide as if to say no one could pass here and Lloyd would be protected. The Skeleton Corps joined Draggy.

Claack! Crack! Clack!

200 skeletons cracked noisily, and their clacking bodies added a special beat to Lloyd's singing, which successfully distracted Raphael one more time. Now, Raphael was losing his mind.

I beg you... Stop!

Raphael's face crumpled. This was a serious test of his patience, even for an angel. However, the situation turned for the worse when Javier suddenly appeared and launched a series of attacks. Clang! Clang! Claaang!

Javier's sword welted down on Raphael, leaving him breathless. Thousands of aura strands pressed him, and even though the fiery rings blocked most of them, he wasn't entirely uninjured.

"Argh... Urgh!"

Crunch! Raphael's two feet were now stuck deep into the ground, much like a nail hammered into a woodblock. His body started to crumple from the relentless blows.

"Ugh! Argh...!"

Raphael tried to save himself by producing shock waves with his fiery rings. But Javier's violent onslaught of attacks dissolved and absorbed them into his sword before using the force to strike harder.

This is not... good. At this rate, the mission will be a failure.

Raphael's eyes went ablaze with a sense of alarm. But it wasn't because he felt like he was going to lose.

My career has never seen any failure... I can't put a stain on my spotless record!

Raphael gritted his teeth. He had the world at his feet up until this moment with his impeccable performance. That was what had allowed his rapid promotions. It was also his source of pride to keep his nose to the grindstone as a perfectionist and serve the heavens by guarding the order of the world. Raphael regarded it as his reason for existence. But now, his pride was about to crumble, and he couldn't let that happen.

All I need to do... is stop that human from singing!

Raphael believed he'd then be able to regain his focus and exert all of his energy in the fight. At that time, he'd take care of the annoying silver-haired knight, demolish the Jewel of Truth, and save his pride in possessing a spotless track record for his job.

"Argh!!"

Thwack! Employing every bit of strength in him, Raphael rose up and bawled at the top of his enraged lungs.

"This is my last request and sincere warning! Human Lloyd Frontera! Please now! Quit your awful singing! If you do that, I will let all your actions of today slide and forgive you! And clear the charges against you for interfering with a public official from conducting his duties!"

Raphael was serious about this and wanted to negotiate if he could. If only he could stop that human from singing, he would gladly turn a blind eye to Lloyd for obstructing justice. He was sincere about this.

And now, since he had been generous and openly announced his concession, Raphael anticipated with bated breath that Lloyd would acknowledge his sincerity and quit singing. He hung on to whatever little humanity was left on this earth with a faint sense of hope.

Soon, Lloyd’s response came. It came in the form of a yodel that tramped every ounce of humanity out of Raphael’s heart.

“She taught me to yodel! Yodel-oh-ee-dee! Diddly-oh-ee-dee!”

Raphael was shocked.

“She taught me to yodel! Yodel-oh-ee-dee! Diddly-oh-ee-dee-ay-dee!”

The terrorizing, ear-splitting cacophony only continued, and when Raphael saw the brazen smirk on Lloyd’s disharmony-producing mouth, something snapped in him.

“You...I...I asked you, and yet...!”

Crack! Clang! Boom! Crash! Amid Javier's restless, raiding blows, Raphael left his fiery rings to deal with them as he barreled upward in anger.

“Had I not asked countless times?!”

Now, there was nothing that Raphael’s vision caught, except for Lloyd. His eyes were completely focused on the human’s despicable face. Raphael hurtled like a raging bull or a charging tank toward Lloyd, hell-bent on iron-macing his face to a pulp.

“Why are you smirking?”

Boooom! The distance with Lloyd narrowed. Raphael’s fiery rings burned behind his back as they endured Javier’s blows and allowed Raphael to raise his iron mace high.

Twenty yards. Ten yards. five yards.

When Lloyd came within the hitting range, Raphael bawled in anger, “Did you like that now, you bastard? Dammit!”

The moment the word “Dammit” spilled out of Raphael’s mouth...

Fwoosh... Puff.

Abruptly, Raphael’s two fiery rings were put out. The fire vanished. The rotation stopped.

“Huh?”

Raphael stopped dead in his tracks. Just then, Javier’s sword glinted from behind him. Slash!

Past the extinguished fiery rings, Javier’s aura storm engulfed Raphael’s body.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 320: Every Little Bit Helps (1)

“Eh...?”

Slash! Raphael froze at the unexpected turn of events. A shaft of shock rushed through him at the unbelievable sight that caught his eyes.

The fire in the rings is... gone.

Raphael could not believe it. This was the first time that this had happened in thousands of years, and Raphael knew why.

It’s my fault. I allowed myself to curse.

He had failed to suppress his momentary emotional outburst that he had never before experienced during his time as an angel. As such, rage got the better of him despite his benevolence and mercy. The price he paid for defiling his purity was a heavy one.

Clang!

Ack! Raphael felt an intense pain in his back. It was Javier who had landed a forceful strike on him. Soon, Raphael was engulfed by thousands of aura strands from the swordmaster.

Fwish!

The world blinked in Raphael’s eyes. Every ounce of energy in him left his body as if he was electrocuted, and his knees reflexively buckled.

“Eh... Argh!”

Were my legs this feeble? Was the iron mace I carried around this heavy? At last, Raphael knew.

I lost.

He felt his body roll off the Jewel of Truth and was unable to stand back up. His shivering body and wobbly legs refused to listen to him, even though he wanted to stand up. He was glad that he was an angel as his sturdy body had saved him from being slashed by Javier's sword. However, this was still the most serious injury he had ever received throughout his life.

I suppose this is the capabilities of a grandmaster from Earth.

Raphael's initial impression of Javier had been mere amazement after seeing his fiery rings block the latter's attack. But now that his body received a direct hit from him, he felt an almost chilling sense of awe. But on the other hand, he was...

Pathetic.

He had lowered his guard because he was a high-ranking angel and his enemy was a mere human. His confidence and certainty had eventually turned into arrogance.

I thought too lightly of this job.

He had never failed a mission and always dealt with whatever he was given. That was why he thought it would be the case this time as well. The reality, however, was different.

Lloyd Frontera. Javier Asrahan. Who are these humans?

Feeling his strength and consciousness fade away, Raphael introspected and chewed over his insolent mistake. Meanwhile, Lloyd and Javier spoke.

"Hey, are you okay?" asked Lloyd after clearing his strained throat.

"Yes, I am fine. Except for my defiled ears," quipped Javier.

"Tsk... Even then, you were able to take a breather thanks to me."

"By the way," Javier said, ignoring Lloyd's question, "you were too reckless back there, Young Master."

“Reckless? How?”

“Just a while ago. The iron mace could have killed you if I was even a little late.” Javier looked at him solemnly.

“I trusted you.” Lloyd shrugged.

Javier narrowed his eyes.

“I mean it,” pressed Lloyd. “I knew if I pushed the angel into cursing and created a weakness for it...”

Javier asked, “That I would take care of everything afterward. Is that what you believed?”

“Yeah.”

Javier narrowed his eyes some more.

“What? You don’t believe me?”

“Well, of course—”

“Just believe me in times like this,” blurted Lloyd. “Come on. By the way, what should we do now?”

“I wonder too,” remarked Javier with equal uncertainty. “Should we chain him up for now?”

“I don’t think that’s enough. He’ll easily be able to snap through something like chains once he recovers his strength.”

“You have a point, Master Lloyd.” Javier nodded. “What do you want to do then?”

“Well. I should talk to him first.”

Lloyd walked toward the angel and asked a question.

“Excuse me, over there. Mister angel?”

Javier narrowed his eyes some more.

Raphael, in his fading consciousness, found Lloyd to be extremely shameless. But Lloyd continued to speak.

“Um, this is kind of funny for me to say this after all that we did, but... Raphael the Throne? Your Grace? If you think about it, you started all of this today. Don’t you agree?”

Raphael simply listened without giving any response.

Lloyd continued to speak. “You threw the first jab... And we had no choice but to defend ourselves and our property. So, let’s make this point clear. What we did was self-defense. Do you understand, Your Grace?”

Javier narrowed his eyes some more.

Raphael didn’t want to understand. He wasn’t interested in listening to this human’s drivel.

I only came here to complete my heavenly duties.

This job was entrusted to him by his supervisor, Gabriel the Seraphim, and the demolition had been decided after a long discussion between the directors and managers inside their department. As such, he only was doing what he was told to do.

But I failed. No, I am about to fail.

Raphael never experienced something like this before. He hated every aspect of his current situation, his helpless surrender, and Lloyd’s inconsiderate ignorance and chatter.

Does this mean my career advancement will stop here?

The chances were likely. After all, he had come from the lowkey rank of an Angel. The only thing that enabled his promotion was his impeccable record. But now, it was about to be ruined.

Is that why I am...sad?

Raphael considered the question for a moment. No, he wasn't sad that there would be a blemish on his record. He was frightened and saddened over the possibility that he may fall into despair and never be able to do greater things for both Heaven and Earth than he did before. As such...

I mustn't let this stop me.

The heavens and the world had a lot of things to do before they got better, and Raphael was ready to put more effort into that end. As such, he couldn't fail. He needed more status and power until he became useful to the world.

That's my reason for existing!

Raphael clenched his teeth after coming to a decision. He could not give up his duty now. Something had to be done. Anything.

I don't care if I can't go back to Heaven for ten or so years!

He had lived for tens of thousands of years. Ten years would pass in a blink of an eye. As such, he decided to double down and jumped into action.

The moment the venomous resolution bloomed in Raphael's heart, the ring over his head glimmered and got sucked into his body. Soon, an immense amount of holy power started to surge and bubble inside his body until it exploded.

Kaboom!

By the time Lloyd widened his eyes and raised his arms at the unexpected burst of holy energy, both of his feet were already off the ground. No, more precisely, he was being catapulted into the air.

"Master... Lloyd!"

Lloyd picked up a faint, frantic shout belonging to Javier. He reflexively held out his toward his knight, thinking that the latter did the same. He was right. His finger brushed Javier’s but failed to grasp it.

Sent away into the air, Lloyd lost sight of Javier after they grazed past each other.

What’s going on...?

Every passing moment came in slow motion because of Lloyd’s heightened senses. He felt how he was getting further from Javier, sent off the ground, and hurled into the air amid the booming, explosive noise and shock waves until he landed on the peak of the Jewel of Truth.

Thwack!

Lloyd wondered if his whole body had been crushed. Was this what it felt like to be hit by a truck? He couldn’t breathe, and he couldn’t even move a single one of his fingers. His body lay flatly on the ground.

Ha... Ha...

Lloyd doggedly grasped his fading consciousness, assured that he wasn’t dead yet. Afterward, he hurriedly awakened his manaheart and sent mana throughout his body for a quick check-up. Thankfully, no bones were broken, and his organs were all fine. However, he couldn’t rise or move around due to the still significant damage he received from the impact of the fall.

Dammit. That angel is so needlessly strong.

It never occurred to Lloyd that such an explosion would be possible when Raphael had lost after Javier’s sword strike. He never imagined that Raphael had enough strength to cause an uproar and throw a stronger attack.

Did he... absorb his overhead ring?

It appeared so. Lloyd spotted Raphael emerge from the dusty storm, spread his wings of light, and charge straight toward the peak of the jewel. Raphael looked completely fine, uninjured from Javier's attack. There were only brilliant rays of light enveloping his body and the mace in his hand.

Dammit.

Lloyd could sense that Raphael was charging forward to simultaneously destroy him and the Jewel of Truth. Breathing hard, Lloyd struggled to rise up but couldn't. He turned his head and stared at Raphael. Just then, Javier suddenly came into his vision and blocked the angel's mace.

Crash! Another shock wave spread across the area. Javier's body trembled as his feet slid several yards back. Raphael, on the other hand, was completely unaffected. A furrow appeared between Javier's eyes.

Javier narrowed his eyes some more.

Javier felt his hands tingle in pain. His manaheart and mana circle were now running wild in alarm. That was after just blocking the mace one time.

He's different from earlier.

Javier's eyes tensed when he realized he was now going up against a different kind of enemy. The speed and strength weren't the same, and the blow a moment ago proved it. Even if Raphael had put a lot of strength into his blow just now and he hardly had any time to put up a good defense, Javier never thought one blow would put this much strain. Javier coldly assessed his opponent.

Now, he has the same amount of strength as a grandmaster, even without his fiery rings.

Javier had no way of knowing how that happened nor the time to dwell on it. Right now, his job was crystal clear.

I will not retreat.

Grab! Veins popped in Javier's knuckles, and his eyes held a glint of intense determination. He would root his feet to the ground and not take a single step back. He would protect Master Lloyd and the jewel, come hell or high water, particularly the former. But in the process of solidifying his resolution, a thought interrupted him.

But why?

A question suddenly pestered him. Why was he trying to protect Lloyd? While throwing his own safety out the window? All of a sudden, his decision seemed odd.

Because he is the son of my lord? No. That is not why.

That Lloyd over there wasn't real. He was a fake. So, technically speaking, he wasn't the lord's son. That he was protecting Lloyd because he was the lord's son made no sense.

And yet, why am I trying so hard to protect him?

He had no way of knowing. But one thing was clear. It was a very simple matter.

I want to protect him. Lloyd is my true master in my heart.

Lloyd was his friend. And now, Javier wanted to protect Lloyd. He would sincerely protect him with everything he had.

So, come at me.

Javier's eyes flashed with resolution, and he aimed his glinting sword toward Raphael. His body gave off the serious determination that he would never take a step back in protecting Lloyd. At the same time, a string of messages appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

Ding dong.

Eh...?

Lloyd was losing consciousness when the dinging noises woke him back up. His eyes opened, and he saw what was in front of him.

[Javier Asrahan has finally become aware of his feelings of friendship and loyalty toward you deep inside his heart.]

[His impression of you has greatly changed.]

[Deep inside him, you have become “Someone I genuinely wish to protect” from “Someone I am forced to protect.”]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by 45 points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: +68]

[You have earned 810 RP by improving your relationship with a main character.]

[Current RP: 9,385]

[The intimacy level with Javier Asrahan has increased two levels from <Average Favor> to <Close Friendship>.]

[You have earned 200 RP as a bonus for the upgrade.]

[Current RP: 9,585]

Dang.

This message was not expected. It, however, wasn’t the end.

Ding Dong!

[The Commander of the White Cavalry, Valeradi Blanc, was moved by Javier Asrahan’s action.]

[He has always considered you his lord.]

[He has gripped the shovel and risen up for you.]

[Your likeability with Valeradi Blanc has increased by 1 point.]

[Current RP with Valeradi Blanc: +59]

[You have earned 9 RP by improving your relationship with a main character.]

[Current RP: 9,594]

What the?

Lloyd became goggle-eyed. Sir Blanc? Against Raphael, the angel? Fight him? It wasn't over, however. A cascade of messages continued to appear as if the system was grinning at his widened eyes.

Ding Dong! Ding Dong! Ding Dong!

[The vice commander of the White Cavalry, Orlando, has shouted.]

[He has willingly grabbed the shovel to join the combat and protect you.]

[Your likeability with Orlando has increased by 2 points.]

[Orc warrior Arosh is flailing his nose as he watches your predicament.]

[Arosh has dropped everything and is running over with his bulging muscles.]

[Your likeability with Arosh...]

[Elf archer Siroko's ears perked up.]

[Siroko still remembers the delicious taste of the barbecu you personally grilled in the past and determines that he cannot lose such a precious friend like you.]

[Siroko joins the combat to help Javier's solitary battle to protect you.]

[Your likeability with Siroko...]

[Engineering Corps soldier Rexton raises his pickax.]

[He shouts and urges others to protect you, their young master.]

[Engineering Corps soldier Arbok...]

[Orc warrior Tuarek...]

[White Calvary lancer Blaser...]

Ding dong. Ding Dong!

Messages appeared in series, one after another, with no sign of stopping. The 500 lancers of the White Cavalry, hundreds of orc warriors, elf archers, and human soldiers united their efforts to protect Lloyd, and his likeability with them continued to increase bit by bit. Even though the rewards of RP weren't much when considered separately, the actual sum became significant because there were about 2,000 individuals in total.

Ha...

Lloyd swallowed. Shazam!

Just like that, he was now earning heaps of RP that he could use to become a swordmaster.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 321: Every Little Bit Helps (2)

Is that...?

Lloyd unconsciously gulped. Hundreds of messages continued to appear with no end in sight, making it impossible for him to give them a proper read. But skimming through them was enough to awaken his fading consciousness.

Unbelievable... My RP is rising like the stock market during the 2008 housing bubble.

Utterly dazed by the whole thing, Lloyd rubbed his eyes, his hands shaking. When he read the messages again, he once again confirmed that he wasn't dreaming.

Ding Dong! Ding Dong! Ding Dong!

[White Cavalry member Tivoli holds up his shovel to protect you.]

[Orc warrior Equinox roars and his heart is burning with spirit.]

[Elf archer Mehari hardens her resolve as she remembers the meat you grilled for her previously.]

[Engineer Camaro convinces his friends that he cannot lose you here.]

[Skeleton One Leg Short rushes forward, clacking its bones.]

Everyone burned with an eager resolution to protect Lloyd and held up their shovels and pickaxes to fight the angel. Seeing this, he grew apprehensive.

Will they be all right?

Their opponent was a mighty angel, whom even Javier couldn't easily defeat despite his status as a grandmaster. Lloyd wasn't sure the White Cavalry members, orc warriors, elf archers, Engineering Corps, and Skeleton Corps would be safe. Soon, his concern materialized.

Boom! A noise came from Javier and Raphael's collision. It was a collision between two transcendental powers, with Javier making history by showcasing his superhuman powers and Raphael unleashing his full capabilities after absorbing the angel ring. Their clash produced fierce, tsunami-like shock waves, knocking down and pushing away everything and everyone in their way.

"Ackkk!"

"Eek!"

"O-oink!"

Despite their bravery, agility, and strength, the White Calvary members, elf archers, and orc warriors, as well as the Engineering and Skeleton Corps, were all scattered away and rolled on the ground like styrofoam beads in front of a fan on its highest setting against the strong wind. But they didn't easily give up.

"The White Cavalry... Never backs down in front of an enemy!"

"Orc warriors, fight! Oink!"

"We will not retreat without a fight!"

"Engineers! Let's show him what our well-built muscles can do!"

Those rolling on the ground quickly got to their feet, their eyes burning with resolution. They once again picked up their shovels and pickaxes, and each time they did, a string of messages appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

Ding Dong! Ding Dong Dong! Ding Dong!

[White Cavalry member Berlingo has made a resolution to fight for you.]

[Your likeability with the Berlingo has increased by 1 point.]

[Current RP with Berlingo: +41]

[You have earned 3 RP by improving your relationship with a main character.]

[Current RP: 17,673]

[Orc warrior Tycan’s muscles are bulging with more intensity.]

[Your likeability with Tycan has increased by 2 points.]

[Current RP with the Tycan: +39]

[You have earned 2 RP by improving your relationship with a main character.]

[Current RP: 17,675]

[For you, Elf archer Cayenne will...]

[Engineer Cherokee swears to protect you...]

[Current RP: 17,891]

[Current RP: 18,741]

[Current RP: 20,1...]

[Current RP...]

“...”

It was outrageous. He couldn’t believe how much his RP increased. Lloyd found himself dryly swallowing again, and only now did it plainly dawn on him what had happened while he was half-conscious on the ground.

It looks like I’ve been able to form a good network at the very least...

Lloyd pieced together what had happened. He fell. Then Raphael tried to end him. But Javier fiercely defended him against Raphael. That was when everyone was provoked to raise their weapons and protect him by joining the battle. It didn’t matter to them that they were going against an angel. This eagerness of theirs to fight for him must have been what sparked the increase in likeability.

Thanks to that, I’m raking in RP now.

The 500 members from the White Cavalry. The hundreds of orcs and elves working on the dam construction. And the Engineering Corps and Skeleton Corps. Even though the rewards of RP weren’t much individually, they added up to an extraordinary amount together.

Ha. It’s like collecting a dollar from each resident in a city with a population of one million.

The outcome was incredible. Feeling his heart pound, Lloyd looked at the last message.

[Current RP: 23,534]

And at last, Lloyd was able to garner a shockingly large amount of RP. It was so large that it had immediately jerked his fading consciousness back to life.

I need to do something with this. Anything.

Just then, his gaze traveled to Javier’s back and Raphael wielding the iron mace to break the former’s defense. He then watched another shock wave scatter everyone into the air.

Do I have enough to become a swordmaster?

He could be able to help if he became one. Even though he wouldn’t be able to fight at the same level as Javier, Lloyd presumed he would at least be able to help somewhat. He knew this was the time to be clever, and racked his mind for a plan.

I did manage to amass a lot of RP. But is investing most of it to become a swordmaster a good idea? What if it requires me to use all of my RP? Then what? What happens afterward? What if I need the RP to stop the restoration of destiny?

Such concerns suddenly filled his mind. But soon, he shook his head.

No. This isn't the time to think about the future. Tomorrow has yet to arrive, and the current moment is what's in front of me.

Right now, it was time to stop Raphael. Otherwise, the Jewel of Truth would be demolished, and it would be game over for them. As such, right now...

I will pay dearly if I act like a cheapskate in this situation.

Grit! Lloyd made a decision. With some struggle, he raised his body and opened his manaheart skill window.

[Skill Name: Manaheart.]

[Stage: High-Level Sword Expert Lv. 1]

[Physical Ability Improvement Rate: 1,500%]

[Currently Owned Optional Skills: 1. Shock Neutralizer / 2. Complete Resistance to Poison / 3. Frenzy / 4. Half-Human Half-Dragon / 5. Time Freeze / 6. Swordmaster Syndrome]

[Required RP to level up: 2,000]

[Current RP: 23,534]

Let's give it a try.

Having decided, he selected the level-up button.

[You can invest a small portion of your RP to level up a skill.]

[Would you like to invest RP in your Manaheart Skill?]

[YES / NO]

Yes!

There was no time to be on the fence. He had to quickly level up as high as he could and help Javier out. Lloyd nodded.

Ding Dong!

[Skill Level Up!]

[Manaheart: High-Level Sword Expert Lv. 2]

[Physical Ability Improvement Rate: 1,700%]

[Required RP to level up: 2,200]

[Current RP: 21,534]

Boom! His heart gave one big thump when his manaheart expanded. At the same time, everything around him suddenly grew clearer.

Hmph!

As his manaheart leveled up, his syndrome worsened. But Lloyd held on by clenching his teeth.

It has begun. I have to see it through to the end.

Right now, it was a do-or-die situation. He thus poured all of the RP he had to level up his manaheart skill. From level two to four... Then level five to six... From level eight to nine... But when he reached level ten, he found himself short on RP.

[Manaheart: High-Level Sword Expert Lv. 10]

[Physical Ability Improvement Rate: 3,300%]

[Required RP to level up: 3,800]

[Current RP: 334]

“Tsk... I knew this would happen.” The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose bitterly. But since he had predicted this would happen already, it didn’t rattle him.

This isn’t my first time leveling up with RP. It’s just simple math. I needed 2,000 RP to level up from level one to two. Then I needed 2,200 and 2,400 next. So, the required RP rose in increments of 200 for every level up.

Lloyd could easily calculate the numbers while he poured his RP into the system, thanks to that.

I knew I’d lack 3,500 RP to reach the last level. Just like now.

And since he had predicted this, Lloyd had a solution for it as well.

This is how I will solve it!

Jumping to his feet, Lloyd suddenly yelled aloud enough for everyone to hear. “Everyone! Except for Javier and Draggy! Let’s evacuate to somewhere safe!”

SAFE! SAFE! SAFE!

He shouted at the top of his lungs, and his booming voice caused everyone to stop. Not missing the chance, Lloyd shouted once more.

“I like you all! Thank you! For fighting for me! I’m filled with gratitude! But you see! This isn’t a fight I want! Why?! I don’t want you all to get hurt because of me!”

Lloyd feared his vocal cords and eardrum would burst and shatter. His own shout sounded too loud in his head as his swordmaster syndrome was now at its peak. Instead of giving up, however, Lloyd flexed his legs and waist, stood at the top of the Jewel of Truth, and bawled louder so everyone could hear him even more clearly.

“You all were brought out here to work, not fight and get hurt! The White Cavalry! The engineers! Orc warriors and elf archers! Everyone! I don’t want to see a single one of you get injured and die!”

He was sincere in his words. Everyone had come here to help construct the dam and the Jewel of Truth. He didn’t want them to be sacrificed in a battle they never planned to join. That would also be inefficient.

Duh. The angel is as strong as Javier, who’s a grandmaster. The White Cavalry? Orcs? Elves? Engineers? Regardless of their big number, they would hardly be any help. They’d just get hurt from joining in.

It’d only lead to unnecessary casualties. As such, he had to prevent that kind of disaster from happening.

“So, stay back! Evacuate to somewhere safe! I will protect you instead! I will go to the front and fight for you!” Lloyd shouted at the top of his lungs as if he were testing how long his lungs and vocal cords would hold out. This time, there were some lies mixed in between his sincere words. Furthermore, he put on a dramatic performance that he had planned in advance.

Everyone’s starting to get moved. Okay, the time is now. Here I go!

Ziiing! Lloyd rotated his mana circles, amplified a small portion of mana, and sent it to his right temple, where there was a bloody scab from being thrown on the ground. He sent the mana to the area behind his injury, causing his scab to pop.

With a popping sound like a cork being removed, the bloody scab was pushed out by the mana and widened until a stream of blood gushed out. It was also significantly more than he had expected.

All of a sudden, everyone was invited to a bloody fountain show. But Lloyd pretended to be all right even when his cheek was now wet with blood. He instead used it as a prop to make the situation more dramatic.

“I am all right!” yelled as he wiped his cheek with his hand. “Even if I’m beaten and hurt! Even if I have to give away my life! If it’s to protect you!

For the happiness and well-being of the fiefdom! For you! I'll sacrifice myself! And fight for each one of you!"

Lloyd's voice boomed across the sky. He then raised his shovel high as the final act of his dramatic performance. This set everyone's heart on fire.

"Waah!!!" everyone shouted, their voices sounding like a clap of thunder. And when they raised their fists up high, Lloyd saw messages he was glad to see.

Ding Dong!

[Your passionate and iron-will eloquence and actions stirred up strong emotions in everyone at the site!]

[Your likeability with Wrangler from the White Cavalry has increased by 1 point.]

[Orc Warrior Targa...]

[Elf archer Cayenne...]

[Engineering Corps Panamera...]

Ding Dong! Ding Dong Dong! Ding Dong!

His likeability with countless individuals went into a frenzy. As a result, Lloyd earned a massive amount of RP, much more than he needed.

[Current RP: 4,612]

This is what I'm talking about. Haha! Every little bit helps!

Lloyd clenched his fists and opened the system window. Now, he had enough. At last, the time had come for him to become a swordmaster.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 322: Attack Design Skill (1)

Haha! Every little bit helps!

Lloyd clenched his fists and opened the system window. He had more than enough RP to level up.

[You are leveling up your manaheart to a higher rank.]

[Required RP to level up: 3,800]

[Current RP: 4,612]

[Proceed and level up the skill?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes.

Since it wasn't the time to be stingy about RP, he didn't think twice about selecting "YES".

Ding Dong!

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Skill Name: Manaheart]

[Stage: Novice Swordmaster Lv. 1]

[Physical Ability Improvement Rate: 4,000%]

[Currently Owned Optional Skills: 1. Shock Neutralizer / 2. Complete Resistance to Poison / 3. Frenzy / 4. Half-Human Half-Dragon / 5. Time Freeze]

[Required RP to level up: 10,000]

[Current RP: 812]

[Your Manaheart skill level has risen to the rank of <Novice Swordmaster>.]

[Your manaheart has finally made a huge jump through your innumerable hours of training until now and has risen to an impressive rank of sword mastery. This special and successful experience brought about a change to your manaheart skill.]

Messages restlessly flooded Lloyd's eyes. He couldn't afford to skip over a single message, especially the one informing him of a new optional skill.

[An optional skill has been removed.]

[Skill Option 6: Swordmaster Syndrome has been removed.]

[You have now become a swordmaster, which means you have full control over your heightened senses.]

Finally, the shackles that had been restraining him were now gone. Instead, he obtained a pair of wings that would take him to new heights.

Ding Dong!

[A new optional skill has been added.]

[You have become one of the most notable swordmasters in Lorasian history. Moreover, you are the first person to reach this level through a method that hadn't existed before now. Your unique process of growth and success has greatly affected your skill set. Accordingly, you will be receiving a large reward.]

[One of the skills you own will be randomly merged with your manaheart skill to create a combined optional skill.]

A combined optional skill? Linked to another skill?

What could it be? Lloyd carefully looked at the message, and he immediately found the answer.

[Your converged optional skill has been registered in your manaheart skill.]

[Skill Option 6: Attack Design - After surveying your skill history, “Designing” was used the most aside from your manaheart skill. You have spent countless hours designing buildings, and this strenuous experience has been combined with your manaheart skill. From now on, you can design and put aside potential attacks of your opponents and yourself and the outcomes of those actions in advance to utilize at the present moment.]

[For more information, please select the “more information” button below.]

What the? I can design my attacks?

Lloyd gulped dryly. He knew from one quick glance at the message that this new skill was going to be something special.

More information.

He pressed the button below, and more information cascaded down immediately.

[Skill Option 6: Attack Design]

[More Information (1): Attack Design is an optional skill that allows you to design your and someone else’s actions in advance and apply it in real life.]

[More Information (2): You can transfer the data you collected with your surveying skill regarding an individual’s physique, weight, etc., into the virtual design space.]

[More Information (3): You can manipulate and design the spatial location, posture, order of movement, weight transfer, etc of the figure in the design space. However, you cannot design movements that are physically impossible to do for the individual that is being modeled.]

[More Information (4): You can transfer your own data into the design space and freely design your location, action, attack route, speed, strength, and striking point. However, just as in information (3), you cannot design movements that are physically impossible to do with your body.]

[More Information (5): You can also save “combination” that combines you and your object’s actions you had designed in your design space.]

[More Information (6): Once you finish using the design space, the collected data can be saved and applied in real life at any time.]

[More Information (7): The save capacity for the attack design space is three. However, it can be expanded by leveling up your optional skill.]

[More Information (8): The subject of design is limited to one.]

[More Information (9): The length of time for the movement you design is limited to five seconds.]

[More Information (10): Designing movements and collecting data does not cost anything. However, executing the collected data in real life consumes 250 RP for every try.]

Lloyd gleaned the information, forgetting to breathe as he did. His fists balled up and clenched on their own. That was how incredible this optional skill was. He could tell the moment he read it.

This is nuts! Completely mad!

This optional skill allowed him to design movements and put them aside to use in real life.

So, that means I can exert full control over someone for five seconds.

Five seconds. Sure, it was a short amount of time, but in a desperate and urgent situation, this was more than enough. Plus, the optional skill had more to offer beyond that.

I can even design movements for myself. This means that I can coordinate my moves to align with the ones I design for others. In that case, I can use the skill similar to how movie stars coordinate their moves with stunt doubles before shooting an action scene.

The exciting stunt scenes on TV, which looked incredible and impressive inside movies, looked ugly and messy in real life. The actors looked more like a group of emotional teenagers trying to punch one another. Real life wasn't carefully orchestrated like films, and the same was true with sword fighting. Using controlled and elaborate sword movements to combat and block your opponent was nearly impossible to do unless you were on the same level as Javier or Queen Alicia. It went without saying that Lloyd couldn't do it.

Not even worth thinking about.

That was the reality. That is, up until this moment. Now...

It's a completely different story.

Lloyd was convinced as he looked at his new skill. Five seconds. He held complete control over someone for that time period. He could manipulate someone's body, design an attack to use on them, and bring it all to life. The skill, however, wasn't his only reward.

Thump! Thump—!

His heart was racing. No, it was his manaheart. It was on a rampage as it spread a strong vibration and pounding sensation to his heart, muscles, tendons, bones, skin, internal organs, arteries, and capillaries, pumping him with a new sense of invigoration.

This stormy sensation, the flooding charge of power... All of these belonged to him. The expanded and controlled sensation of the sword master paved a whole new world before him. When he lifted his gaze, he realized that swordmaster syndrome was a joke compared to the actual experience of being a swordmaster.

I see it. I see everything.

His gaze moved down to the fierce battle between Javier and Raphael below, and his eyes were able to catch all of their movement. He wasn't at the same level as a grandmaster or high-ranking angel yet. But he was able to get a vague read of their moves. That was particularly true for Raphael.

Now, I can see it. Javier is at least two times better than him in terms of the rapidity, precision, and variety of moves. But Raphael is... strong. Much stronger than Javier.

A thought crossed Lloyd's mind as he watched the fight. Maybe all the angels were high-end punching bags in their past lives. Raphael, literally speaking, was outrageously strong. The small blows from the two's stormy exchange of offense and defense had a minimal effect thanks to Raphael's incredible resilience and restorative ability. He attacked. Then got hit again. Yet, he continued to endure everything thrown at him and push back.

To compare them to animals... Javier is a weasel with fatal offense capabilities, while Raphael is...a strong wild boar from the rough mountains. There's only one way to end this fight. It's to overpower the boar with a fierce punch.

That was what Javier was failing to do at the moment. It wasn't that he lacked the strength. It was that there hadn't been an opportunity for him to throw his final blow.

Raphael's fighting skills are nothing to look down on after all. He's allowing Javier's smaller blows to land on him and dodging all the bigger ones. What a troublesome opponent he is. Well then. Time to create a momentary slip in his defense. Survey!

Lloyd activated his surveying skill.

[Scanning will begin.]

Bzzt! Lloyd's sword master senses scanned Raphael's moves and his physique. Once he turned it into a set of data points, he uploaded the information into the virtual data space.

[You are uploading the surveyed subject, “Raphael the Throne” into the design space.]

[Manaheart Skill Option 6: You can freely control the surveyed subject’s movements.]

[Would you like to activate the Attack Design mode?]

[YES / NO]

Why else would I survey him? Yes!

The space for the Attack Design appeared in his view. Raphael floated in the air, and Lloyd’s hands moved faster as they got to work.

Okay. How should I deal with him? Like this. This way. That way.

Swish! Swish! Lloyd coordinated a string of moves for Raphael to follow in his virtual space. There wasn’t much to do since the moves had to take less than five seconds to complete. Next, he designed his own attack before saving his work.

[Please name the design that will be saved in slot 1.]

Space Out!

[Slot 1 has been saved as “Space Out.”]

Lloyd wasn’t satisfied yet.

While I’m at it, I should fill up all the slots!

Attentively designing more sequences of movements and attacks, Lloyd rushed to use the rest of his slots and quickly set it all aside for later.

[Slot 2 has been saved. “Bent Leg Twist.”]

[Slot 3 has been saved. “Thwack.”]

[You have filled all three slots.]

[You must delete an existing slot to save a new Attack Design in the system.]

Okay. It’s done.

Lloyd clenched his fists now that everything was all set. He then jumped off the Jewel of the Truth peak with a shovel in his grip, and as he jumped off the stairs, Lloyd rotated his three-strand mana circle and thrust his shovel forward just in time to fire a triple mana blast at Raphael.

Kaboom! The burst of mana jetted from his shovel to engulf Raphael and finish him. But the same attack that had once penetrated the Gigatitan’s body was neutralized when Raphael casually deflected it with his free hand.

Boom! Lloyd, however, wasn’t disappointed even though his blast disappeared into the sky.

That was just a greeting.

The real fight started now. Raphael may have put up a good fight against Javier and troubled the latter with his incredible strength. But now, he was nothing but a toy at Lloyd’s disposal.

See how I do it.

Lloyd then made a landing right in the middle of the fight. He found Raphael towering over himself when he lifted his gaze. He also noticed Javier coming to save him in surprise. Disregarding them both, Lloyd activated his Attack Design skill.

Ding Dong!

[Manaheart Skill Option 6: Activating Attack Design.]

[Please select the slot of data you saved.]

Space Out!

Lloyd shouted inwardly as if he waited for his skill to activate. The response was immediate.

[Uploading data for “Space Out”.]

[You have used 250 RP for the skill.]

[Current RP: 562]

A message appeared in the corner of his vision. Even then, the situation was developing at a breathless pace.

“Master Lloyd!” Javier yelled frantically from behind.

Despite Raphael’s iron mace, which was ready to strike Lloyd in the head, Lloyd stayed still and didn’t move an inch. Despite Raphael’s ghastly energy and Javier’s frantic efforts to protect him, Lloyd merely cast a cool and confident gaze at Raphael.

[“Space Out” data has been actualized in real life.]

When the message appeared...

Thud! The iron mace suddenly dropped to the ground with a sound. And then, Raphael slumped forward and took on a dazed posture.

“Eh...?” A dull sound came out of Raphael’s mouth.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 323: Attack Design Skill (2)

“Eh...?”

A dull sound spilled out of Raphael’s mouth. It wasn’t intentional. He was startled.

What’s happening to my body?

All of a sudden, out of the blue, a mysterious force drained Raphael’s strength. His arms drooped on their own, and his neck craned forward while his back curled into a ball. His knees gave way and buckled.

What on earth is this?

Raphael’s heart raced in sheer panic. This was bad. This couldn’t be happening. He was in the middle of his important task from heaven to punish those obstructing justice.

Why did I let go of my mace? Argh! Ugh!

Raphael tried to bend lower to pick up his mace and subdue the two humans in front of him, Lloyd and Javier. But his body froze and refused to obey his brain.

What is happening?

The moment he tried to overcome his dismay and confusion, Raphael heard Lloyd Frontera speak.

“Hey! Step on him!”

Thwack!

A shot of pain rushed up his ankle. Just then, everything around him shook. His body collapsed.

Hmm?

Suddenly, the world turned upside down, and Raphael noticed his own two feet up in the air. It was followed by a pang of pain at the back of his head.

A shovel? Did he hit my ankle with that?

Right before he fell flat on the ground, Raphael saw a glimpse of the shovel in Lloyd's hand. That was when he was able to make out what had happened. It looked like Lloyd indeed hit his ankle with a shovel.

Unbelievable. That's how I lost balance? What's going on?

Thud! It didn't hurt much when the back of his head hit the ground from his fall. He accidentally bit his tongue, but it hardly left any real damage to his sturdy physique.

Like this can hurt me!

Provoked and ashamed that he collapsed from being attacked by a human's shovel, Raphael tried to get back to his feet. But he found the task impossible to achieve.

Hmm?

For a split second, Raphael's brain froze. He knew what he had to do. Get back to his feet. Punish these despicable humans. But his body refused to budge.

Why?!

Raphael screamed inwardly, but it was useless. His desperate mind was betrayed by his oblivious body slumping down in a lifeless state.

Why? Why is this happening? Arggh! Come on!

Thwack! Thwack! Clang! Then, there came several blows towards Raphael.

Ack! Argh!

Raphael's frantic effort eventually allowed his eyes to roll sideways.

There was Lloyd, beaming as he swung his shovel by its side without stopping in a rhythmic motion, as though he was playing a game of Catch a Mole.

“Hey! What are you doing? I said, trample him!”

A new look came over Javier’s eyes at Lloyd’s shout. That was when Raphael’s heart finally started to sink.

Lloyd’s shovel strikes didn’t do much damage. But a grandmaster’s attacks? That would be a completely different story.

I can’t let him hit me!

Feeling another rush of frantic urge to move, Raphael used all his focus to squeeze out every bit of his strength from his body, which finally freed him from a limp state.

“Argh!”

A gigantic sword immediately came down on the very spot where Raphael lay down a second ago.

CLANG!

Thousands of aura strands rummaged through and tore apart the area. If Raphael was even a tenth of a second late, his upper torso would have been engulfed by the aura storm. The thought sent a chill down his spine.

Auras are dangerous.

There was only one form of attack in this realm that could damage his angelic body. An aura.

Since auras are crystallized forms of pure mana, they can leave direct damage on my body which is made of spiritual powers. Moreover, this grandmaster’s aura is... particularly more dangerous.

He was overpowered earlier with another attack, but this was much more dangerous. If he was hit now, he'd be neutralized for good. Which meant...

I'd fail my duty. I can't let that happen.

The accomplishments he had achieved to this day and his future of serving the heavenly realm and the world. Everything would go down the drain. Raphael wasn't going to let that happen.

Ackkk!

Resolved, Raphael immediately turned and rolled over, picking up his iron mace as he did before springing back up and raising his weapon to defend himself against Javier's attack. Their collision produced raging shock waves all around them. Breaking the shock waves, Raphael hurtled toward Javier.

Thud! Twang! Twang! Thud! Raphael swung, stabbed, slashed, struck, and slammed down his mace. But Javier brilliantly parried and received every attack he received, replicating the same scene that everyone had seen countless times until now. Lloyd, who was also watching the scene, smiled, the corners of his mouth going up to his ears.

Great. Just perfect. The Attack Design is much more useful than I expected.

Lloyd recalled what happened a few seconds ago. He wasn't completely confident beforehand, but the attack design skill was perfectly able to apply itself in a real fight.

The design I saved in slot 1 forced its subject to stand still in a dazed state.

Since it was his first attempt, Lloyd figured he should first start with a simple move. He aimed to create the simplest and most effective design possible. That ended up being to make Raphael take on a dazed posture.

The movement design was accurately carried out. Just like my design, Raphael dropped the mace and became defenseless.

There was more. The offensive attacks he included were just as accurately executed.

The part where Raphael was to fall down after I struck his ankle with a shovel and then receive a blow from the ground by me again went exactly as envisioned. But one disappointing thing was that Javier reacted slightly late.

Lloyd had hoped that Javier would immediately join in and trample Raphael. But that didn't happen as Javier raised his sword right when the five-second time limit passed. This, however, wasn't a problem for Lloyd.

I've got two more data slots!

Lloyd then sneakily moved behind Javier, taking advantage of Raphael's tendency to ignore him and focus only on the latter. It was also the safest spot from the angel's attacks and their resulting shock waves.

"Hey, Javier," said Lloyd after settling down at the safe spot, "Why didn't you listen to me back there?"

"Master Lloyd? What do you mean?"

Clang! Clang! Clang! Twang! Thud! Amid the countless exchange of attacks, Javier quickly cast a glance toward Lloyd and asked, "I have a question for you, Young Master. What in the earth did you do back there?"

"Do what?" innocently asked Lloyd.

"The angel stopped attacking the moment you laid your eyes on him."

"Oh, and?"

"You attacked him right afterward as if you had been waiting for that to happen."

"Did that look strange to you?"

"Yes." Javier briefly nodded. "I cannot erase the feeling that you were waiting for something specific to happen."

“Feeling, my foot.” Lloyd chuckled off. “I’m not some sort of divine entity that can predict an angel’s moves. Does that make any sense to you?”

“...”

“The bastard just got distracted in the middle of the fight,” Lloyd insisted.

“Are you sure?”

“Obviously,” huffed Lloyd. “Look at him even now. He’s busy rushing forward to attack you no matter how much I stare at him.”

Booom! Clang! Clang! Clang! Clang!

Lloyd was right. Even during their current conversation, Javier had to concentrate all of his focus on fighting Raphael. That was how fierce and ferocious the angel’s attacks were.

But something was strange before.

Javier soon concluded that there was no way to prove Lloyd wrong. After all, it wasn’t like Lloyd possessed any sort of extraordinary power that would let him subdue a high-ranking angel with just his gaze. Raphael, who was listening to their conversation, had the same thought.

Argh... I knew that was the case.

Raphael frowned as he wielded his iron mace to neutralize Javier’s defense, emitting rays of light with his wings and scolding himself at the same time.

Yes. That human, Lloyd Frontera, was right. There is no way I fell for a trap from a lowly mortal and ended up in such a pathetic state.

Come to think of it, that really was the case. Be toyed by that human? Ridiculous and impossible. So, there was only one conclusion he could draw.

I lowered my guard.

Raphael concluded that he had unconsciously lowered his guard because he was up against a few lowly humans and got distracted in the middle of their fight.

Tsk! I was too relaxed. I became unconscionably arrogant because of my continued success thus far. This won't do. I'll take this as a painful lesson for myself and reflect on my mistakes. I can't behave so stupidly again.

Clench! Raphael gritted his teeth with a penitent heart and gripped the iron mace, feeling a sudden rush of adamant resolution. But it didn't last long. Just a second later, when he locked eyes with Lloyd, it happened again.

Bent Leg Twist!

Ding Dong!

[Manaheart Skill Option 6: Activating Attack Design.]

[Uploading the data for "Bent Leg Twist".]

[You have used 250 RP to activate the skill.]

[Current RP: 321]

Eh...?

The moment Raphael sensed that something was off and a chill ran down his spine, a new message appeared in front of Lloyd.

[The data for "Space Out" has been applied to real life.]

Just then.

"Eh? Eh? Eh?"

Leap! Propelled by a mysterious force, his body was thrown to the ground, and his arms spread apart while his legs rose to a 45-degree angle. This naturally caused his abs to tense. Eventually, Raphael suddenly found himself in a posture utterly unsuitable for combat.

Hahaha! How do you like that? One of the physical training postures! Bent Leg Twist!

Lloyd's lips curved into a villainous smile. This time, as well, his attack design was effective.

"Hey!" bellowed Lloyd. "Trample on him properly this time!"

Lloyd pointed at Raphael with his shovel. This time, Javier didn't disappoint him. As soon as Raphael lay on the ground, Javier immediately held up his sword.

I knew it. This was his doing.

Javier was certain about it despite Lloyd's denial. There was no other way to explain Raphael's eccentric behavior. It couldn't have been that the angel had lowered the guard. He had undoubtedly fallen into a trap set by Lloyd. But it didn't matter to Javier.

I can't miss this opportunity!

Fwoosh! Javier brandished his sword, slashing down the air and ravaging Raphael who was lying down in a strange posture.

Slaaash!

"Gargh!" Raphael screamed aloud, totally exposed to the blow. Unable to put up any defense, he could only accept Javier's attack while positioned flat on the ground.

Gargh...! Ha...

He was in despair. It felt like his whole body was being ripped into atomic particles.

I cannot... lose like this!

Raphael clenched his teeth, extracting all of the divine spirit inside his body and amplifying the holy power he attained by absorbing the angelic ring to its maximum capacity. He invested every bit of his strength to defend the aura storm attacking him. Then he prayed for greater strength, the will to endure this hardship, and for the support of the great heavens. At last, his body returned to normal after five.

Cough! Cough! “Argh!”

Am I alive? Raphael wondered as he struggled to sit up, propping his hands against the ground while his legs were glued to the ground. He repeated in his head that he had to wake up and guided by a will that he couldn’t make out to be his own or the heavens, Raphael crawled forward. His eyes burned with passion.

I refuse to collapse. I refuse to be overpowered by a mortal human. I refuse to face defeat just like this!

But when he lifted his head, he noticed the shovel coming for his forehead.

How dare he! With a shovel!

Raphael tensed his forehead, thinking how absurd the human was for trying to injure him with a mere, auraless piece of metal. He would easily be able to hold out against it. After enduring its attack, he just needed to raise his body, stall for time, and recover from the damage he had received.

This is doable. I can quickly recover and fight again. Even if that knight is a grandmaster, he’ll get tired soon. Victory will be mine in the end. I will complete my mission!

Raphael yelled inwardly. He had come to a decision. But there was something Raphael was ignorant of. It was that this whole scenario where he was positioned to defend himself against Lloyd’s shovel attack was based on the human’s attack design.

A brilliant aura suddenly appeared at the shovel as it flew forward for the final blow, a blow that’d spark passionate conflict between Lloyd’s fiefdom and heaven. Thwack!

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 324: The Throne Angel in the Guest Chamber (1)

Thwack!

A bell tolled in Raphael's head. To whom was this bell tolling? He wondered. Was it for himself who ended his first failed mission? Or for the lowly human who fiercely fought him? Or for the mundane world that would soon descend into chaos from breaking the order of Heaven?

It's funny.

Raphael found himself bursting into laughter. There was no way to explain his collapsed state, how he ended up in this condition, nor what caused him to fail his mission so tragically.

I need to stand...

But Raphael was out of energy. Drained. He had emptied all the energy he acquired by absorbing his ring.

I was undeniably defeated.

He had thought about when his first failure would occur. But he never even imagined it would involve a mere human who used a shovel as a weapon. That part was the most ridiculous part to him.

"Ha. Haha... Ha." Amid his fading vision, Raphael turned to the side and found Lloyd looking down at him. "Lloyd... Frontera... Do you really insist on killing me and treading the path of evil?"

"No," drawled Lloyd." I'm not going to do that."

Raphael stared at Lloyd.

"Why would I tread the path of evil from here?" The corners of his lips rose a little.

"..."

“That’s one serious and ridiculous question.”

Raphael continued listening.

Lloyd went on, “I don’t have any plans to kill or put an end to you. I’m worried about what would happen afterward if I do that. Come on, please just let us have a discussion. That is, before you pass out.”

“What now...” Raphael blinked hard, the eyelids feeling heavy. He couldn’t understand what this human wanted if his plan wasn’t to kill him and tread the path of evil. “Talk about... What...?”

“I would like to talk about who’s liable for this ridiculous situation and the cause behind it.”

Lloyd chuckled as he flopped on the ground at Raphael’s side. “I made it clear to you a while ago, do you remember? I don’t want to get into a conflict with you. However, you proceeded to attack me first, and that’s why this happened. Wouldn’t you agree?”

“That doesn’t make any-”

“Doesn’t make any sense?” put in Lloyd irritably. “It’s the undeniable truth and fact of the matter. Tell me, did I attack you first? No, right? You started talking about the obstruction of justice or whatever it was and then attacked me. Am I wrong?”

Raphael refused to talk. He only blinked.

“Haa…” Lloyd flared his nose. “You really know how to push my buttons. I’ll give you that. Here’s what happened. You appeared out of the blue to demolish the Jewel of Truth. When I resisted, you threatened to kill me by smashing my head with that absurd-looking iron mace over there.”

“...”

“Let me ask you one thing,” continued Lloyd. “Is the heavenly realm made up of thugs?”

“Of course not,” defended Raphael indignantly.

“Then why did you do it?”

“Well, for the good of the public-”

“Good of the public?” Lloyd raised his voice. “What good?”

Speaking ever so slowly and heavily, Raphael began to present his case. “It was a decision to maintain order in Heaven and this world, as well as for the best interest of the public,” Raphael spoke without hesitation. Even though he was losing strength and fading deeper into unconsciousness with every passing second, his voice sounded completely firm. “It is a banned structure. I mean, the Jewel of Truth. The heavens have forbid it from being built in this realm... due to its potential to reveal dangerous secrets. That’s why it can’t be built here… That was the final decision, so it’s only right for the jewel to be demolished.”

“It’s not right,” Lloyd opposed curtly after listening to Raphael’s argument.

“Excuse me?”

Lloyd noticed a slight flutter of surprise in Raphael’s eyes. “Why is it right?”

“What kind of drivel are you talking-”

“Excuse me,” Lloyd said as he raised a finger at Raphael. “Mister Angel. Drivel? Do you even hear yourself? For the good of the public? To maintain order? That’s why it was not authorized for construction? Who made this decision?”

“Well, of course, the heavenly realm—”

“Okay, so those gentlemen up there. Did they come down here and even try having a single conversation with us?”

“That is...” Raphael broke off.

“No, right? So, what do you mean by for the good of the public? You all unilaterally made a decision, came to a conclusion, and determined what would happen next. And then, boom! You came down like a bolt of lightning and ordered us to accept your decision because it came from the heavens. Can you really say that behavior aligns with public interest and order? Come on now.”

“...”

“Think about it from our perspective,” went on Lloyd. “It’s irritating. It feels like I’ve been given the middle finger after all the work I poured into building the jewel. Did you even stop to consider that?” By now, the confidence in his voice started to sound more emotional and irritable. “Seriously, I’m getting more pissed from talking about this. Look now. Is this how you always did your job? This duty of yours as a public official. Was it always carried out this way?”

“That is...” Raphael stopped short before finishing his sentence.

“I’m right. That’s exactly how it is. You’ve always carried out your work like this,” Lloyd continued. “Please answer honestly, Mister Angel. Have you ever bothered to listen to the people impacted by your work? I’m sure you never even allowed them to give their input.”

Despite Lloyd’s accusation, Raphael had nothing to say.

“I’m asking if you ever thought things from other people’s perspectives.”

Raphael clamped his mouth shut. He wanted to defend himself against the human who had dared to argue with an angel. But somehow, his mouth remained shut tight and refused to budge. Meanwhile, Lloyd continued to speak.

“Did I say anything wrong? I didn’t. That’s why you have nothing to say. You’ve always looked down at us from Heaven in the sky, made decisions without any outside input, and forced orders on us. That’s how it’s been until now. Without exception. Please do correct me if I’m wrong.”

“...”

“I’ll ask you one more time.” Lloyd paused a second. “Do your actions really uphold public interest and order?”

“O-Of course-”

“It upholds the public interest and order of your realm,” Lloyd completed Raphael’s sentence.

Raphael was speechless. Lloyd’s words left no room for argument. In his silence and fading consciousness, Raphael looked back on his past and his countless successes in completing his duties as a public official. Upon reflection, something became crystal clear.

What that human said isn’t wrong.

In hindsight, the human’s words were right. He had never bothered to hear the opinions of those impacted by his work during the countless years he spent dealing with an even greater amount of civil complaints. He never considered or asked for their perspective.

I’ve merely been a robot that mindlessly completes tasks and follows orders from my superiors.

Was that really to promote public interest? To maintain order? Perhaps Lloyd was right, Raphael thought. He was only upholding the public interest and order of his realm.

“I...”

I don’t know. I really don’t know, Raphael thought. Raphael didn’t know what to say. Why his heart suddenly felt bitter. Everything was a blur now. With that final thought, he lost consciousness. Raphael the Thrones. An icon who achieved rapid career advancement and historic success. This marked his first failure and coma.

***

Coma. Dizziness. Where am I? Why am I lying down? And why do I feel comfortable right now?

Raphael slightly opened his eyes, and the light blinded his vision. But it wasn't sunlight in his eyes.

It's back. My rings of fire.

The two rings floated over his body and were burning with holy fire as they did before. They were warm and reliable, ready to protect him at any time. Raphael felt relieved at this sight.

What a relief. I thought I'd permanently lost them.

Raphael suddenly recalled how he used a curse word for the first time in his life. Consequently, he defiled his purity and lost his rings of fire. But now that the fire was back, he figured that his impure heart had been completely cleansed once again.

Hold on. What about the human?

Raphael shuddered when he started to regain his memories of what he experienced bit by bit.

I was about to demolish the Jewel of Truth, but someone interrupted me... And when I tried to punish Lloyd Frontera...

He had been defeated. By being struck in the forehead with a shovel. His first loss. He had even fainted!

Raphael bolted upright in bed at the frightening memory, dropping the white blanket covering his body to the side. This shocked Lloyd, who was sleeping beside the bed.

"Hmph? Ugh, you surprised me," muttered Lloyd as he wiped his lips.

"..."

"Oh, I must have dozed off. That is, while nursing you."

Raphael simply stared without saying anything.

“I am telling the truth. I’m not sure if you know, but I’ve been suffering from terrible insomnia lately. Haah. Yet, I still fought against my fatigue and nursed you. Doesn’t that make you feel touched?” Lloyd yawned as he stretched his arms.

“You nursed me?”

“Yes.” Lloyd chuckled as he wiped off the sleep from his eyes. “I’m serious. You slept like a baby after you passed out.”

“Yesterday?”

“Yes. It was yesterday when we got into a bloody fight against each other.”

“And you chose not to kill me?”

“Why would I do that?” Lloyd shrugged. “To be honest, my knight wanted to do just that, seeing how dangerous you are. He said that you might attack us again. But, well, as you can see, I’m a generous man.”

Raphael cast an alarmed look.

“Ha...” sighed Lloyd dramatically. “I can genuinely say that I have a generous heart. Up until yesterday, you were swinging mace all around and trying to destroy years’ worth of my work. But here you are, in my guest’s bedroom, being nursed by me while I fight against my fatigue. Ahh, I should actually charge you a lodging and medical fee, you know.”

Raphael merely continued to stare at Lloyd, feeling slightly dazed. Listening to this man’s chattering, it became clear.

I was truly defeated.

But it looked like the man had forgiven him. Raphael knew that the human had plenty of time to kill him while he was out for an entire day. But Lloyd didn’t do that and took care of him instead.

“Then,” Raphael found himself speaking up. “I will stay here for a while.”

“Eh?” Lloyd softly jerked back in surprise.

“I mean, instead of returning to Heaven, I’d like to stay in your fiefdom for around ten years.”

“Wait, hold on—”

“Yes?”

“I’m saying out loud that I need to charge you, and yet, you announce that you will stay here for ten years? Mister Angel, where are your manners? Were you some sort of thug in Heaven?”

“No.” Raphael found himself grinning. After organizing his thoughts, he added, “Even if I want to go back now, it is impossible. I lost my halo.”

“Halo?” asked Lloyd. “Oh, you mean the ring on your head?”

“Yes. An angel can’t enter Heaven without it. It’s like a travel pass.”

“Then-”

“Don’t worry too much,” put in Raphael. “It’ll re-appear on its own after ten years.”

“Isn’t ten years too much time?”

‘‘To angels, ten years is equivalent to a period of one month for humans.”

“You know a decade is considered a very long period of time here, right?”

“I will be all right. I am an angel.” Raphael smiled gently as if he was doing Lloyd a favor.

“No,” said Lloyd, almost chuckling. “I’m saying this because it’s not okay for us.”

Lloyd gave Raphael a dumbstruck look.

What the heck? What? Why is he trying to leech off us now?

But even before Lloyd could give a flat rejection, Raphael spoke first. “To be honest, it’s because of the advice I heard from you yesterday.”

“Eh?”

“The piece of advice you gave me before I passed out.”

“Advice...” Lloyd searched for his memory.

“You told me yourself about how we angels carry out our duties…and that we never consider anyone else’s perspective when making a decision. That we never think about those who are impacted by our work.”

Lloyd remembered.

“I wanted to deny your words when I first heard it,” went on Raphael, “But when I thought over them, you had a point. It made me look back on my work.” A remorseful smile suddenly appeared on Raphael’s mouth. “It was a shocking revelation. I always thought I was helping the world, but I realized it could’ve been for my self-righteousness and pride all along. As such, I plan to reflect on what to do from here, what attitude I should have while carrying out my duties, and what I will do if I have a disagreement with my supervisors during this process.”

“Oh, so you want to stay here to heal and think over your concerns for free?”

“Yes, I don’t know what answers I will find, but I have around ten years to organize my thoughts.”

“Um... You know I didn’t permit you to stay yet.”

“Then, are you going to kick me out?”

“That depends on how you will be able to help us,” casually answered Lloyd.

Obviously! I’m not going to take in a useless leech! My house isn’t a homeless shelter!

As such, Raphael would have to pay for his meals and prove his worth. This went without saying out loud.

Even Dragon King Verkis, who seems to be doing nothing all day, is contributing in his own way. He’s my sponsor in any case.

And here was Raphael, an angel with nowhere to go, declaring he would stay in his fiefdom for free. There was no way Lloyd would approve of this senseless announcement. Lloyd shot a deathly glare at Raphael, who flinched. It was the angel’s first time receiving this unfamiliar gaze with such an oppressive force coming from it.

Unaware that the prickling guilt in his heart was due to the pressure Lloyd put on him, Raphael finally made a promise and gave what the other wanted in return. “Well, if you let me stay here, then I will...”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 325: The Throne Angel in the Guest Chamber (2)

“Um, well, if you let me stay here, then I will... provide you with news from Heaven. How does that sound?”

“Oh, news from your realm?” asked Lloyd. He was piqued.

“Ah, yes. Since I need to provide help for you to permit my stay here.”

“We’re off to a good start. Please elaborate on what you said. Ehem!”

Lloyd forced himself to cough so he could stop the corners of his mouth from rising. But he couldn’t stop his tongue from hula-dancing in his mouth.

Great. This is perfect.

Lloyd had a faint suspicion about the angel’s naivety. And as expected, his hunch was proven correct. Raphael had a pure heart that hadn’t been tainted by the evils of the human realm. He knew this by other man’s inclination to quickly give in to his demand with a petty attitude and just a little bit of pressure. Just like now.

“Elaborate?” said Raphael. “Hmm, what should I say? Even though I cannot return to Heaven because I lost my halo, it’s still possible for me to communicate with them to some extent. This is especially true as I hold a fairly important position.”

“Does that mean you can hear guidelines from your superiors?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes,” affirmed Raphael. “It’s something like that.”

“Then,” gulped Lloyd, “Does that mean you could inform me when any additional decisions or reactions come from the heavens regarding the Jewel of Truth?”

“I assume so.” Raphael nodded.

Suddenly, Lloyd became curious. Cocking his head to the side, he asked, “But are you okay doing so?”

“Come again?”

“Mister Angel, no, Raphael.”

“Yes?”

“The thing is, you are the angel from above with considerably high status. Are you sure it’s all right for you to provide me with intelligence on your realm?”

“Ah, yes,” replied Raphael, understanding what Lloyd was referring to. “Since my work was suspended the moment I lost my halo.”

Lloyd nodded. “Hmm...”

“I am simply informing you on the decisions made by the higher-ups, and it is up to you to decide how to use it. Moreover, they will likely not discourage me from doing so.”

“That is a relief on my part,” replied Lloyd. “But how can I trust you?”

“What... do you mean?”

“You could be feeding me false information on purpose.”

“Lying, you mean?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd nodded his head again. “You could pretend to be cooperative, only to demolish the Jewel of Truth behind my back.”

Raphael looked Lloyd in the eye. “That is not true. I have no plans of doing that.”

“And why is that?”

“Because of your words. It’s questionable to me whether the unilateral decision to demolish the Jewel of Truth without discussing the matter with you all was right... I’ve developed some doubts about it, you see.” Raphael smiled gently.

Raphael was speaking from his heart. A part of him obviously was crestfallen over the first failure of his career, but on the other hand, there was a sense of liberation in his heart to his surprise. He also came to perceive his occupational calling with a bit of resignation as it became plain to him that his success was wrongfully earned.

Pointing at his fiery ring, Raphael said, “I am born to only tell truths, not lies. I lose my purity the moment I lie. You have seen it. How the fire on my rings went off the moment I said a curse word.”

“Uh-huh.”

“If you are still doubtful, you can test me.”

“May I?”

“Of course.” There was confidence in Raphael’s voice.

Lloyd thought for a second before extending his hand out. “Okay. This is my hand. Is that right?”

“You are right.” Raphael’s answer, being truthful, didn’t extinguish the fire in his rings. Lloyd followed up with another question.

“On to the second test, then. The knight you went up against before. He is a good-looking man. Is that right?”

“I cannot agree with you more.” Raphael’s answer, which sounded very natural, didn’t extinguish the fire in his rings this time as well. Lloyd rushed to move on to the third question.

“Objectively speaking, I, too, am a man with a decently handsome appearance. Is that right?”

“You... are right.”

Puff. The fire on his rings was extinguished.

Suddenly, an air of embarrassment hung in the room. Tears welled up in Lloyd’s eyes.

A second later, the awkward silence was broken by Lloyd’s enraged shouting. “I think your rings are broken!”

“...”

“That’s right,” insisted Lloyd. “They’re broken. Those things are totally unreliable. Hahahaha!”

Raphael put on a pitying smile.

“Honestly, doesn’t it seem that the fire on your rings comes and goes just based on your mood, not purity? Right? That’s it. My, you spooked me for a second.”

“Excuse me, here.” Raphael was holding a handkerchief.

“What’s with the handkerchief?”

“I don’t know what you are thinking,” comforted Raphael. “But please wipe the tears off your face...”

Fwish! The fire in his rings returned. Larger drops of tears rolled down Lloyd’s cheeks. At last, he was forced to admit it. The angel’s rings of fire were working properly. There was no doubt that he could fully trust the information Raphael delivered to him.

Great. I’ve got exactly what I wanted.

Even though he was hurt by the unexpected truth bomb, Lloyd was quite satisfied with the deal he was able to squeeze out from Raphael, who planned to settle in his fiefdom for the next ten years.

The novel mentioned that the angels could communicate with the heavens in any situation they were in and receive instructions from their superiors. So, I thought that the most simple and effective way for Raphael to help me inside my fiefdom would be by keeping up with any updates from Heaven.

It was possible that receiving updates on what was happening inside Heaven in real-time and thus being able to prepare a response made this the most important piece of information for him to obtain in the present.

The construction of the Jewel will be completed soon.

He was moving into the final stage of the construction before being interrupted, anyhow. As such, with a little more effort, it'd be completed soon.

I'll use the jewel right away once it's finished being constructed.

He just needed to find out how to stop the restoration of destiny. And then what?

In the worst-case scenario, the heavens might issue a stricter measure. But I don't care. If the risks are too high, then I'll go and destroy the building myself. By then, I'll have received the solution to stop the restoration of destiny.

That was Lloyd's conclusion. All he needed was to construct the Jewel of Truth and find out how he could stop the restoration of destiny, and being updated on the situation in Heaven was critical to take action if they decided to push forward with the demolition. The chances of successfully stalling or resisting them only increased if he could plan ahead, and that was impossible without receiving intel. With that thought, Lloyd smiled with a glow of satisfaction.

"Whew, all right. You seem reliable enough."

"Is that so? Can I stay here, then?" asked Raphael joyfully.

“Yes, on the condition that you keep me updated in real-time on whatever is going on in Heaven.”

“I understand. Please take good care of me.”

“Haha, me too.” Lloyd flashed a big smile. “Okay, then, should we draw up a contract?”

“Excuse me...?”

Lloyd didn’t respond. He instead fished out two blank pages of paper.

Raphael tilted his head in confusion. “What’s that?”

“Can’t you tell? It’s a contract. A lease agreement.”

“...”

“Like everything else,” explained Lloyd, “Any promises or transactions should be recorded down in the form of contracts. That’s common sense. Maybe this isn’t the case in Heaven, but only the strongest make it out alive here.”

“...”

“So, to summarize what we’ve agreed to a moment ago...”

Lloyd’s aptitude for drawing up a contract allowed the whole process to be completed in no time. Raphael, flustered by the other man’s attitude, dazedly stamped the contract. Just like that, the lease agreement between the two opposing sides was signed and sealed.

***

Two days passed. During this time, the construction site was neatly organized after becoming a mess from the fight that ensued after Raphael’s arrival. There were quite a large number of workers, so the clean-up was able to be swiftly completed.

“Of course, there’s no time to take a break! Now, let’s get to work. The Skeleton Corps! Chant your slogan!”

“Overwork!”

“Burn the midnight oil!”

“Work until you die!”

The Skeleton Corps was put to backbreaking labor all throughout the day and night. They were completely fine with the schedule, even without any food or sleep. They were model laborers who believed that working overtime late into the night was the greatest virtue of all time.

I mean, of course. They like to rest and have fun too. But I’ve got to focus on the situation at hand.

The construction of the jewel had to be finished swiftly. Otherwise, the heavens could make another decision to demolish the Jewel of Truth right before its completion.

So, I have to hurry. It’s a speed war from now onward.

Lloyd made a firm resolution. The construction resumed the moment the final piece of trash was picked up. The remaining parts of the dam were put up nicely and solidly to endure any water pressure it would experience.

I can’t trap water inside it like a regular dam. So, I should do this.

This was the very reservoir where the Jewel of Truth would be operated, which meant that a huge tidal wave would occur.

It can’t hold up the wave by force.

Lloyd once did the math and concluded that the dam’s sturdiness alone wouldn’t be able to endure the force of the wave. As such, he decided to lower the center top area and create a sharp protrusion, the design being like a carton of milk with an open edge.

The sharp opening will minimize the water pressure and allow water waves to flow out.

Like how a milk carton spills the liquid through its pointy opening, the wave would trickle downstream from this hole when the Jewel of Truth was in operation.

I've done countless simulations already and completed all the inspections.

Lloyd was absolutely certain that it'd go as he intended. At the same time, he put his back into the final stage of the jewel construction. The architecture's facade looked exactly like the Tomb of the General, a large pyramid, and Corgidus was an immense source of help here.

"My goodness! You can't dig like that! Come on!"

Solitas, receiving tons of earfuls from Corgidus, continued to imprint decorations on the wall. Just like this, every process was done smoothly and swiftly. Lloyd's level of satisfaction increased day after day as he supervised the scene. At the same time, Javier's doubts toward Lloyd grew deeper as well.

"That is why I am telling you," Javier said, "I find you very suspicious."

"What?" What in the gibberish is this now? Lloyd frowned when he heard Javier speak in his usual icy voice as the two made their way home after a day of work. "Suspicious? What is?"

Could it be that Javier noticed that I'm not real? Lloyd asked himself. The twinge of guilt made his voice edgy. Javier, however, spoke in a calm voice.

"Your skills," replied Javier.

"My skills?"

"Yes."

Lloyd gulped. "What about them?"

“Up until a few months ago, you were barely able to become a high-level sword expert.”

“Oh, that?” Lloyd felt a swell of relief. “As expected, you realized it before I even told you.”

“Of course,” replied Javier. “I have seen the aura formed on the tip of your shovel.”

“You did? When I struck the angel on his head?”

“Yes, but that is not the only thing I saw.”

Lloyd became tense again. “What else did you see?”

“I also saw the angel’s unnatural movements, as if he was being manipulated by you.”

Lloyd decided to play ignorant. “Yeah, you’re delusional.”

Javier was offended by this. “I am not delusional.”

“You were mistaken,” huffed Lloyd. “What am I? Some sort of superhuman? A magician? And even if I’m one, you really think I could control no other than an angel?”

“Well...”

“No matter how you look at it, doesn’t that seem ridiculous?”

Javier suddenly realized Lloyd was right. “Indeed. In hindsight, I must have gone mad and overestimated your abilities.”

“...”

“Indeed. You are not capable of such things. Well, I supposed that the rank of a swordmaster isn’t difficult to get with some luck amidst an extremely pressing situation like fighting an angel.”

“...”

“But the ability to control an angel?” Javier coolly spoke. “I must have lost it for a second. I mean, who are you? You are merely Master Lloyd. Ha! Logic and common sense compel me to conclude that you are absolutely incapable of such a feat.”

“...”

“Um, but, Young Master.”

“What.”

“Why are you tearing up?”

“No, I’m not. My eyes are just shiny.”

“And your nose bridge is red.”

“I caught the flu.”

“Your lips are trembling too.”

“Must be my my nerves.”

“Why?”

“Because of you, my goodness. You put me down like this all day, every day. You’re a heartless monster.”

“I told you many times before, but I have never used violence against you, Master Lloyd.”

“Tsk, you are brazen.”

“That is your specialty, may I remind you.”

“That’s correct,” chuckled Lloyd. He was relieved. It looked like Javier didn’t cast too much suspicion on Lloyd’s extremely rapid growth and the Attack Design skill used against Raphael.

I mean, I can feel that he thinks it's strange, but he's got no choice but to trust me. And the Attack Design is not easily detectable, so I can just pretend to be ignorant. But as for becoming a swordmaster in a few months... Tsk. Oh, well. I couldn't think of a better solution given the situation, so there's nothing I can do now even if he found it odd.

Lloyd concluded that he should just act shamelessly. He was about to present his shameless defense when...

"Fellow over there! Lloyd Frontera!"

It was Raphael flying with his wide-open wings from the Frontera manor.

"The news you have been waiting for! An update about the Jewel of Truth! An additional measure has been enacted by the heavens!" cried out Raphael as if he was announcing an urgent news.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 326: You or Me (1)

“The news about the Jewel of Truth! An additional measure has been enacted!” Raphael landed on the ground as he folded his wings. His cheeks were slightly flushed.

"By that, do you mean a direct order has come from the heavens?" Lloyd inquired with delight. This was the news he had been waiting for. The reason he had let Raphael settle in his fiefdom.

“No,” Raphael said as he shook his head. “There has not been an official announcement yet. However...”

“What?” urged Lloyd.

“There have been rumors circulating among the Thrones angels about what additional measure the heavens will undertake.”

“Rumors circulating?” echoed Lloyd. “Are more angels coming down here?” He felt a pang of shock. One angel, Raphael, was enough to stir a commotion down here. But more Thrones angels were coming? Several of them?

I’ll never be able to stop them.

It would be the case even with Javier and his current self, who recently became a swordmaster. However, Raphael flashed an innocent smile and shook his head.

“Oh, there will not be more angels coming down from Heaven.”

“Then what is it?” asked Lloyd, feeling a swoosh of relief.

“A rainbow briefly appeared a while ago.”

“A rainbow?” Lloyd wondered where Raphael was going with this.

“Yes, a rainbow. That is what us angels use to exchange messages or information by displaying our writing on the stripe of color associated with our status.”

“Wait a minute,” mused Lloyd. “Like a group chat?”

Raphael cocked his head. “What’s a group chat?”

“Oh, never mind,” Lloyd said as he waved his hand. “Please go on and explain.”

“Yes. Seraphim uses the red stripe on the rainbow. Cherubim uses the orange stripe. Thrones, which I belong to, uses the yellow stripe. Principalities and everyone else use the purple stripe. All angels have the liberty to upload any thoughts or information they have in their rainbow stripe.”

“Okay,” observed Lloyd, “So, you saw a message appear in your group chat, I mean, the yellow stripe of the rainbow?”

“Yes. It mentioned my failure to demolish the Jewel of Truth and an additional measure that was enacted toward you and your building.”

“What did it say?” Lloyd gulped.

“They are going to summon you to Heaven.”

“What?” Lloyd felt shell-shocked. Then, with a heart full of fear, he asked, “Does that mean they’ll take me in?”

Raphael looked Lloyd in the eyes. “Yes, essentially.”

That made Lloyd gape in horror.

“But don’t worry,” Raphael assured after noticing how pale the other man was. “They won’t resort to savage methods as if they’re rounding up a criminal.”

“What will happen then?”

“It appears that the archangel wants to have a talk with you.”

“Talk with me...” This rather relieved Lloyd to a certain degree.

“I suppose he plans to make a judgment after hearing you out, given your fierce resistance to the demolition.”

“Hmm.” Lloyd looked at Raphael as if an idea came to him. “Then, I shouldn’t expect him to make a favorable decision for me in the end, right?”

“I’m sorry. I cannot predict that far ahead...” Raphael smiled apologetically.

“In that case, when will I be summoned? It’s not right now, is it?” Lloyd inwardly begged that he wouldn’t be taken away immediately. Thankfully, Raphael shook his head.

“No. There’s no way of knowing exactly when you will. Right now, it’s just a rumor going around the Thrones angels.”

“I guess then it’s not official yet?”

“You’re right.” Raphael nodded. “It isn’t.”

“But the official announcement will come soon?”

“Yes, perhaps. If things happen fast, it’ll be out within a month, and a group of Thrones or Dominion angels will come down.”

“Tsk.” Lloyd clicked his tongue. He knew that he wouldn’t be able to hold up against Thrones or Dominion angels.

Should I just be grateful that I’m not being immediately summoned? That means there’s only one way left for me.

A war of speed. Lloyd found his answer.

I won’t be able to reject the summoning. That will be true even with Javier and Draggy. My hands will be tied when a bunch of Raphael-level angels show up. It’s smarter to just hasten things up and build the dam and the Jewel of Truth as soon as possible.

That appeared to be the best solution.

Since I'm in the final stages of construction already, I should finish and activate the building within a few days. I’ll then be able to find out how I can stop the restoration of destiny. That will do. After all, that was why I built the Jewel in the first place anyway.

Lloyd would be able to achieve that goal at the very least. And then?

Summon me or not. They can do whatever suits them.

Lloyd couldn't care less about being summoned and interrogated afterward at that point since he'd have already accomplished his goal. Furthermore, if Lloyd felt that the pressure from Heaven was too much to bear, he could simply accept their terms and give them whatever they wanted.

Still, it’s too much of a waste to throw the Jewel away, so I should first carefully listen to what they want before giving in to them. I likely won’t receive a harsh punishment then either. What more can they say if I agree with the demolition, after all?

This was the I've-got-nothing-to-lose-because-my-goal-was-met operation. Lloyd didn’t want to make even the smallest concession. He refused to live his life with that kind of attitude.

In this time and age, you’re a fool if you sit back and can’t take what’s yours.

Lloyd didn’t care if the others pointed their finger at him for being sly and deceitful. It was more important for him to claim what was his, and this time was no different.

I can’t fall behind. It’s a race against time from now on.

Now that Lloyd had learned of Heaven’s plan from Raphael, there wasn’t any time for him to waste. Lloyd put everything he had into finishing the construction of the dam and the Jewel of Truth while also devising a proper response to Heaven’s decision.

The dam is almost finished. I’m glad that almost everything in the design could be perfectly executed.

As a result, the dam seemed to be far more effective in resisting external pressure than he originally expected it to be. Despite his success, however, Lloyd did not finish the project halfheartedly.

Maintaining the dam is more important than constructing it.

Lloyd put in extra effort during the final stages of construction, keeping in mind the need for long-term management and maintenance of the dam. He evaluated everything, including the water pressure, earth pressure, vertical subsidence, horizontal displacement, shear displacement, and positive pressure acting on the dam. He also calculated the potential stress that might occur on the structure from the expansion and shrinkage of concrete and checked to see if the dam had sunk during construction. Aside from all of this, Lloyd constructed a spillway for water to pass during emergencies and installed thick wire fences in the spot where any excess water from the dam would flow out.

These fences will filter any twigs and floating sediments that come upstream and clear the pathway for water to spill out of the dam.

Because it was such a large dam, there were numerous elements to inspect and touch up, even in the final stages of construction. He couldn't be careless about anything. The construction of the Jewel of Truth, on the other hand, was...

It’s light work compared to the dam.

All he needed to do was stack together the perfectly sized rocks he had prepared in advance. The job would have been difficult before now as there were so many large rocks to move. But the situation had changed.

“Draggy. Bibeong. Let’s stack them up!”

Clack!

“Bibeong!”

There were two different machines on site whose bodies extended over 300 feet long. That was bigger than the Jewel of Truth, which was 216 feet in length and 98 feet in height. To Draggy and Bibeong, this job was similar to a game of Zenga or Rego blocks.

But they need to work with a lot of precision. There can’t be any mistakes made on where the blocks are placed and how they are fastened into place.

That was the thing with the Jewel of Truth. Everything had to be precisely pieced together. There wasn’t room for even half an inch of error.

This isn’t an ordinary building. The structure itself is a huge magic circle.

Not a single block of perfectly carved stone could be misplaced. He couldn’t allow any leeway on this job.

If I did, any slight errors would cause a subtle change in the building’s flow of mana and make it malfunction eventually.

Lloyd had the impression that the Jewel of Truth was closer to being a giant electric circuit than a magic circle. Anyhow, his eyes became bloodshot as he oversaw the final phase of the dam construction, checked for any errors in the blocks making up the jewel, and scanned countless pieces of engraved rocks with a magnifying glass for any damage or misplacement.

And at last, after about 15 days, just when he started seeing spots in front of his eyes, both the dam and the Jewel of Truth were completed. Lloyd proceeded to fill the dam with water right away. Woooosh!

As the water started to fill to its brim, Lloyd intensely gazed at the Jewel of Truth and the dam after activating his surveying skill.

Great. It’s holding up well. Perfect.

The dam handled the large volume of water with ease and also withstood the water pressure around it. The Jewel of Truth, too, stood upright in the water, exactly as Lloyd had planned for it to. Finally, a string of messages began to appear in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong!

[The first concrete dam in Lorasia, the “Frontera Dam”, has been built inside the Frontera Fiefdom.]

[You have showcased a new and unprecedented way to build a dam, and it will be remembered as an important achievement in Lorasia’s history of civil engineering.]

[In the future, engineers will study, analyze, and replicate the Frontera Dam to build more dams across the continent.]

[You will always be regarded as the most experimental and innovative civil engineer in history.]

[Countless civil engineering students will snap their pens in half while cursing your name in anger during their examination periods.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 1,500 RP.]

[Current RP: 1,571]

Whew...

It was just as he had predicted. As soon as the finished dam started to fulfill its purpose, a series of messages about his achievement appeared. Lloyd, however, was still dissatisfied. After all, he had also constructed the Jewel of Truth.

What about my reward for constructing the Jewel of Truth?

He slid his eyes to the side as he had that thought. Soon, his eyes were filled with more welcoming messages.

Ding Dong!

[You have constructed “Aotearoa” or the Jewel of Truth from the mythical ages.]

[It is a structure that possesses immense power and a great cultural legacy that had been lost for all living creatures in this world.]

[You have accomplished a great feat by restoring a great artifact of history.]

[At the same time, your accomplishment caused a variety of different reactions from countless creatures of this world.]

[The Frontera fiefdom residents feel prideful about your accomplishment.]

[The merpeople have become interested in traveling to the Frontera Fiefdom.]

[The angels of the heavens are casting a gaze of concern on Earth.]

[A handful of powerful figures will greed and thirst over the jewel after being enlightened of its existence. This may become a seed of conflict in the future.]

[The demons of Hell, sensing a conflict arising, have brought out their bags of popcorn.]

[For your achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 8,500 RP.]

[Current RP: 10,071]

Eek.

Lloyd clapped his hand over his mouth.

I have 10,000 RP in total.

RP was always the right answer. The more, the better. And this much? Perfect.

I used to jump in joy over earning a few hundred RP.

There were many things he could do with just that much RP. And now, it felt like he was swimming in RP. Despite this, Lloyd remained calm.

This is nothing more than just a simple reward. There's something more important I need to keep in mind.

The RP was comparable to a paycheck. It was something he received as a form of compensation for building the dam and the Jewel of Truth. He then reminded himself of a task he needed to complete. One that had been on his mind since hearing about the Jewel of Truth from the Dragon King. And so, Lloyd dove into the dam to accomplish his goal.

Splash! The water around his body felt cold. When he opened his eyes, he caught sight of a few swaying rays of sunlight, and he swam down toward the Jewel of Truth until he reached its peak. Lloyd then stood in front of the altar made from the Kiaora he found as the final key material for the jewel's construction.

This is how I'm supposed to activate it, right?

Lloyd recalled the operation method attached to the blueprint and placed his hands on the altar. Then, he activated his manaheart and manacircle.

Ziiing! The mana was soon absorbed into the altar from his hand, arousing the Jewel of Truth. The structure began to vibrate, and a shaft of light fell from the sky to illuminate the building. At last, the jewel revealed its truth. Lloyd flinched in response to the booming voice in his ears, as well as the bright droplets of water and streaks of light dancing across his vision.

[You who wish to acquire the answer from the Jewel of Truth... In exchange for an answer, you must reveal one hidden truth about yourself that no one knows about to the world.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 327: You or Me (2)

Everyone has a secret that they don’t want to reveal. This was even more true for someone who was hiding their true identity.

[In exchange for an answer, you must reveal one hidden truth about yourself that no one knows about to the world.]

A voice rang in his ears while droplets of water dizzyingly assembled themselves into words in front of Lloyd. It was a message from the Jewel of Truth, which demanded that Lloyd pay for its services. He scrunched his nose.

What is this? Reveal a hidden truth? A secret about me that only I know? That’s what I need to provide to activate the Jewel of Truth?

Lloyd’s question was answered immediately as if the Jewel of Truth read his mind.

[That is correct, the one who seeks the truth.]

He had doubted his ears, but they were right. To confirm, Lloyd asked once again in desperation.

Wait, does that mean I have to reveal the secret about my identity? Like how I’m actually not Lloyd Frontera or something.

[That does not satisfy the requirement to activate the Jewel of Truth.]

What? Why is that?

[Someone knows that secret aside from you.]

Lloyd concluded that it must be the King of Hell or Dragon King Verkis. Lloyd gave a sigh of relief.

Well, that’s for the better. It’d have been more problematic if I had to reveal that secret.

On second thought, it really was the case.

No one in the fiefdom knows that I'm not the real Lloyd yet. Javier, the count, and the countess don't know. Even the residents of the land are unaware. They merely like and respect me for advancing the fiefdom and all my accomplishments because they think I'm their Lord's son who's next in line to inherit the family name.

What if the fiefdom discovered he wasn't the son of Count and Countess Frontera? Would the people's favor and respect for him remain? Lloyd trembled. He wasn't optimistic about it, and in the worst-case scenario, he would lose all his honor and be exiled.

But still, I have to tell the count and countess one day.

Lloyd had made a promise to the real Lloyd back in Hell that he would come clean to them about what happened to their real son. The thought of breaking their promise never even crossed his mind. It was also what he was compelled to do out of respect for the count and countess. However, now wasn't the right time yet.

Once I finish all my work first, that's when I'll tell the truth, but only to them.

After making that resolution, Lloyd's mind moved on to the issue in front of him.

What am I supposed to reveal to the Jewel of Truth, then? The King of Hell and the Dragon King know about my identity, so that won't work. What could be a hidden truth about me that will be harmless to reveal here?

Lloyd pondered for a long time. At last, something appropriate popped into his head.

Um? How about this? It's a small one.

Lloyd spoke to the Jewel of Truth inwardly.

When I pick my ears, I cotton-swab the bottom first before going clockwise. I move then to the left, top, and right to excavate that gunk. Afterward, I rotate the swab exactly five times on each side to make sure everything's out. This has been my ear-picking routine since I was a child. Does this count?

He tried just in case. That would make this situation a lot easier for him if it did. At last, the Jewel of Truth replied.

[You have shared a truthful secret about yourself that no one else knows about in exchange for a truth you desire to know.]

Oh, oh! It worked!

Lloyd clenched his fists. A split second later, words written in light appeared on the altar's flat surface. They spelled out the secret he had revealed earlier. Bzzt!

Similar to a white inscription on a black background, the pale, shiny words began to float until they catapulted out of the water and fixed themselves in the sky for everyone to see. The glittering words were printed across the sky in the same vivid and clear quality as a modern computer screen with QHD resolution.

[Jewel of Truth's Announcement: Lloyd Frontera has a unique way of cleaning his ears. First, he cotton-swabs the bottom... Clockwise... For a successful excavation, five rounds each way... What a wonderful routine of his! This is the truth coming from the Jewel of Truth that tells nothing but the truth.]

When Lloyd looked up at the sky, a wave of shame washed over him. For a long time, he stood in a daze, unable to speak.

Dammit. I should have thought a little harder.

But it was too late. He had to pull himself together.

Okay. Embarrassment is a fleeting emotion. I should be happy I met the requirement without compromising my identity. Now, I can hear the answer I've been looking for.

Yes. It was all good. Embarrassment was a fleeting emotion. There were greater things to come. Thinking so, Lloyd was about to proceed when...

Splash! Abruptly, someone dove into the water and came by his side.

Javier?

Lloyd spotted Javier swimming toward him. His face looked a bit stern for some reason.

"Hey. What brings you all the way down here? I thought I told you to stay far away for safety reasons." Lloyd talked using his underwater breathing skills.

Javier, who couldn't speak, simply gave a nod and made a hand gesture.

"Are you saying that you're fine?" asked Lloyd.

Javier nodded again.

"Hmm, are you here because you wanted to check out what the words in the sky were?"

Another nod.

"I see," continued Lloyd. "You came here because you were worried that something dangerous might happen once the Jewel of Truth is activated."

Javier nodded again.

"So, in short, you were worried about me," said Lloyd, touched.

This time, Javier only gave a hard stare, and his eyes seemed to say, "You're pathetic." He then gave a sigh and shook his head.

“Wow. Are you saying I’m not worth worrying over?” Lloyd guessed aloud from Javier’s gesture.

Javier nodded.

“Why are you here then if you aren’t worried about me?”

Javier didn’t speak. He looked away.

“Seriously,” tutted Lloyd. “You just can’t ever be honest with yourself. So, are the engineers and everyone else somewhere safe now?”

As Javier continued to nod with a straight face, Lloyd couldn’t help but laugh.

This bastard, really.

Lloyd was grateful. Even though Javier was never afraid to lay into him whenever the opportunity arose, he was always there for him in times of need. That was always the case, whether it was when he was trapped in the cave of ants, fighting against Hell's Knight, or battling the Gigatitan. There were more dangerous incidents that followed than he could list, but Javier was always the first to run over and protect him by his side, facing everything with him. With the exception of his muttered complaints, Javier had never seriously expressed his displeasure or left Lloyd alone. The knight was a loyal comrade to the other man.

If I hadn’t intervened in the original plot of the story, Javier would have become a renowned knight across the entire content at this point in time.

But because Lloyd hadn’t died like in the original novel, Javier remained as a knight of his fiefdom, ready to rush toward his side at any time. Lloyd felt both apologetic and grateful for this.

That’s why, you bastard. I’m going to take care of you until the very end. Once I, your wise and older friend, solve the restoration of destiny problem, you’re going to enjoy the rest of your life by my side in peace.

Even though Lloyd wouldn't be able to make him a renowned hero across the continent, he could offer him a lifetime of leisure and indulgence. Thinking so, Lloyd smiled at Javier.

“Fine, you bastard. I’m going to activate the Jewel of Truth now, so stay put and don’t do anything foolish.”

Javier blinked. It was an affirmation. Lloyd then turned around toward the Jewel of Truth and placed his hand on the altar to find the best answer to his question.

I want to find out how I can stop the restoration of destiny.

Lloyd inwardly spoke aloud the question he had been keeping deep inside him. He waited. Soon, the answer came.

Bzzt! His manaheart automatically made a movement, transferring a small amount of mana to the altar. After being amplified, the mana shot up dozens of feet high in the water until it burst through the surface.

A ripple spread across the dam's water, causing a violent shockwave that brought the Jewel’s answer into Lloyd's head.

[Lloyd Frontera is not the main protagonist of this world.]

Eh...?

Lloyd froze at the voice inside his head. He’s not the main protagonist of this world? What could that mean?

Well, that’s just an obvious fact that even I know. Javier is the main protagonist. But my question was how I could stop the restoration of destiny. What’s wrong with this answer?

Something was off, Lloyd could tell. An ominous feeling gripped him. The Jewel continued to answer.

[Lloyd Frontera was originally supposed to die, but he did not. You revived Lloyd Frontera and came to act as the main protagonist, who was originally supposed to be Javier Asrahan.]

What?

His heart plummeted. A sense of nervousness started to grow in him.

[A person who is not the main protagonist has come to act as one and changed the rule that governs this world. Therefore, this world has perceived you as an error.]

Me? An error?

Lloyd couldn't believe it. Because he took away the main protagonist's role? Because he was acting as one in place of Javier?

[As a result, this world has begun to react in order to return the main protagonist's position to Javier Asrahan and to fulfill Lloyd Frontera's fate by routinely inserting unexpected dangers throughout the story when there is an opportunity to do so. It was all to get rid of you and reintroduce Javier Asrahan as the main protagonist.]

Lloyd was too disoriented to speak. He took a deep breath in and went back to the events that had led up to this point. It finally dawned on him.

So, the ant cave. The warlock. The Gigatitan. The undead Mastodons. Hell's Knight. Draggy... Everything?

They were the world's way of intervening to get rid of him. The thought was outrageous, of course, but it was senseless to deny it. Meanwhile, the Jewel continued its response.

[But you did not die. By surviving each event, you interrupted the intended flow of the story and did not return the role of the main protagonist to Javier Asrahan. Therefore, the world has decided to opt for an alternative plan titled "Incomplete Reset" and remove your existence that is seen as an error.]

The world was forced to resort to a plan called "Incomplete Reset" because he refused to die.

Wait. This incomplete reset... Is it...?

[The “Incomplete Reset” the world has decided to pull is what you are aware of as the restoration of destiny.]

Of course, Lloyd thought.

Dammit.

His fists clenched by themselves. He was taken aback by the revelation about the restoration of destiny.

Ha. So, my existence itself was the problem.

It finally dawned on him. A scoff escaped him as he recalled the plot of The Knight of Blood and Iron. Lloyd Frontera who died at the beginning of the story. He had desperately tried to lead a respectable life after he found himself in his body. However, all of his choices and actions had disrupted the natural flow of this world. Lloyd, on the other hand, didn't let the revelation hurt him. Instead, he chose to be shameless.

Ha. Why. What? So, what?

Lloyd shot a poisonous glare at the altar. It didn’t matter to him whether the world was trying to kill him or that he had disrupted its natural flow. Up to this point, all he had been doing was diligently working toward building a good life for himself.

So, there’s no need to feel wronged or get discouraged. Everyone tries their best to have a good life, don’t they? Is that a crime? Is that so wrong? What a load of bull.

There was nothing that what he heard now would change even if it was shoved in his face as the truth.

I plan on continuing the life I’ve built for myself until now and allowing myself to leisurely enjoy all it has to offer. The cause behind the restoration of destiny is completely irrelevant. The only thing that matters to me is how I can stop the damned restoration of destiny and the incomplete reset plan.

That was all he cared about. Lloyd didn’t care what the world thought of him or whether they desperately wanted to destroy him. None of it was his problem, and he had no plans to pay any attention to it.

All right, so give me the solution.

Lloyd stared at the altar when he felt a touch on his shoulder. He found Javier staring at him when he turned around.

There was a look of worried concern on Javier’s face. He seemed to be asking if everything was all right.

“Oh, everything’s fine, dude,” assured Lloyd in a bland tone, realizing that his face must have looked pretty grim. He smiled at Javier and thought to himself. You're my only friend, Javier. I couldn't have overcome all the obstacles in front of me without your help. So, my trustworthy and reliable comrade, stick with me until I become a lazy lord and you become my personal guard. I hope we will be able to grow old together...

Just then, the Jewel of Truth gave its answer.

[As a result, in order to stop the restoration of destiny, you or Javier Asrahan must die or vanish from this world.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 328: You or Me (3)

[As a result, in order to prevent the restoration of destiny, you or Javier Asrahan must die or vanish from this world.]

What...?

Lloyd froze, doubting his ears. What did he just hear?

Has it lost its mind? What nonsense did I just hear?

He hoped he heard wrong or that there was some kind of a technical glitch. But the response the Jewel of Truth gave next was as cold as the previous one.

[It is an undeniable fact. At the moment, all the errors of this world happened because you were acting as the main protagonist of the story without permission. As such, you have two choices. Die and give Javier Asrahan the position of the main protagonist. Otherwise, kill Javier Asrahan and become the rightful main protagonist.]

Lloyd turned and gave a glance at Javier, who was eyeing him with more concern on his face.

My face must have become paler.

It appeared to be. That would explain the worried expression on Javier’s face, which was uncharacteristic of him. Lloyd tried to quickly put on a smile that he hoped didn’t look too awkward. The Jewel of Truth, on the other hand, continued to speak as if it didn't realize what state Lloyd was in at the moment.

[Once one of you disappears, the world will finally choose the remaining person as the rightful protagonist and perceive there to be no more error to fix. That is only when the incomplete reset plan to carry out the restoration of destiny will come to a halt, and the story will develop around the existing hero.]

By this point, Lloyd was so drained that he didn’t have enough energy to even sigh. Sure, he had grown vaguely concerned over the past months that the restoration of destiny was linked to his possession of Lloyd's body and the resulting change of plot. But it never occurred to him that the solution would necessitate him to make such a cruel decision.

Just tell me that I need to earn more RP to prevent the restoration of destiny. Come on.

Lloyd sincerely wanted that to be the case. He was willing to pay tens of thousands of RP if needed. No, even if it cost a whopping 100,000 RP, that would be about 100,000 times better than the solution he was given.

If that was the answer, I would just need to do more construction projects. Then, I would still have a chance to solve the issue even if it required strenuous effort and backbreaking work from me. But... I don’t know what to do with this.

It was either him or Javier. One of them had to die. Vanish from the face of this world. Otherwise, the infuriating restoration of destiny would not be stopped.

What am I supposed to do now?

I don’t know. I really don’t know. Not a clue. Lloyd thought to himself in despair. He wasn’t sure if he would be able to devise a solution.

Wait a minute... What if I die and use my benefit from Dragon King’s sponsorship? And come back to life? Would it stop the restoration of destiny since I’m technically dead?

The Jewel of Truth gave an answer to Lloyd’s sudden idea.

[That is impossible. Eventually, you will come to exist again in this world, so the restoration of destiny will resume as soon as you are revived.]

Dammit. That seemed like a clever plan for a moment, a faint light amidst the darkness around him. But Lloyd didn’t give up. Grasping at straws, he tried another question.

Then, how about an alternative solution? Is there any other method that doesn't involve either of us dying? Any way to the slow restoration of destiny?

[There is none.]

Its curt response severed Lloyd's last strand of hope. Even after that, he tossed out a few questions in the hopes that one of them would work, such as making a declaration to give over the protagonist's role to Javier or revealing that he was not the real Lloyd and asking for everyone's forgiveness. Better yet, leaving the fiefdom altogether. Lloyd tested any idea he could think of using the Jewel of Truth. But the answer he received remained the same.

[It is impossible.]

It was beyond him why all of his suggestions were rejected. Maybe it was because he was labeled as an error, and there was no way of changing that. Perhaps the story had deviated too far from the original plot for his proposed plans to work. There was only one thing that was clear for him.

It's me or Javier. Just one of us. That's the only solution.

Suddenly, it felt like his vision clouded over with darkness. Even as the Jewel of Truth created massive waves above him that crashed against the dam and overflowed into the spillway, Lloyd was blind to what was going on around him. He couldn't even care to notice anything.

What am I supposed to do now?

It felt like his heart was being ripped in half. Javier, unaware of his feelings, continued to ask if he was okay with his gaze.

"Yeah, I'm fine. Really," managed Lloyd. He forced himself to smile. But Javier was unconvinced. The knight asked through his gaze if the Jewel of Truth had not given him an answer, or worse, if it provided a nonsensical response based on the grim look on his face.

“I’ve found the answer. And thankfully, it’s nothing strange. It looks like we can stop the restoration of destiny without much difficulty.”

If one of us dies, that is. Lloyd smiled, thinking to himself.

The more his heart continued to throb, the bleaker his situation seemed to be. Lloyd tried to put on a brighter smile. And later, even on his way up to the surface with Javier, he continued brooding over the matter. But nothing in particular came to his mind.

This is bad. I really don’t see a way out this time.

A sudden desire to bury his face in his hands came over him.

Scams and tricks only work when there’s a loophole I can take advantage of. They work by exploiting a weak point that no one else can see. But this time, there’s no loophole for me to use. The Jewel gave a clear-cut response with no room for interpretation. There is no other way out of this situation without choosing between me or Javier.

One of the two had to die or vanish from this world. There was no other answer. No matter how hard Lloyd agonized and thought over the issue, he couldn’t find a clever solution.

What if one of us went to another dimension?

Asking Dragon King Verkis to send him to another dimension seemed doable.

Like the last time I went to Seoul.

He could go or send Javier. The person who left would never come back. That would stop the restoration of destiny without a doubt.

I don’t like that thought, though. No, I hate the idea.

Lloyd shook his head forcefully.

It wouldn't be right for me to send Javier away. Even if I don't have a conscience, I know that would be going too far. But on the other hand, making myself return to Seoul sounds even worse.

The mere thought of returning to Seoul and staying there forever made his nose scrunch up.

I hate that city.

Lloyd honestly despised the place. He knew no one and was practically an orphan there. Plus, the city was filled with bad memories rather than good ones for him.

That's why I busted my gut in this world. I saw my chance to live a more meaningful, happier life here. Whereas in Seoul, I was going to die after living a life of emptiness.

That was why Lloyd was able to accomplish so much here. And thanks to it, the fruits of his labor were beginning to emerge recently. For the first time in his life, he was treated with dignity, respect, and admiration.

Yet, I need to throw all that away and go back to Seoul? Not a chance.

The more he toyed with the idea in his head, the sicker he felt.

Plus, if I get there, I'll be Lloyd Frontera. Not Suho Kim. I'll have no family, home, property, bank account, passport, or even a transportation card. I'll be a poor, undocumented immigrant as soon as I get there.

Death seemed to be a better choice than going back. Lloyd naturally drew a conclusion from that.

I'm scrapping any plans of going back to Seoul.

He would look for other methods instead. There had to be a way out that he wasn't seeing. A brilliant, clever scheme was certainly waiting to be unearthed by him.

I still have some time. There are still two years left until the restoration of destiny begins. And if I need more time, I'll just freeze the flow of time and try to think of something.

There was no need to rush into disappointment just yet, let his heart drown in despair, or give up hope. With that resolve, Lloyd rose toward the surface with his legs. He wrapped up his thoughts, calculations, and final decisions in a span of a few seconds as he swam up. A cheering crowd greeted him as soon as his head popped above the water.

"Huraaaaay!"

"Eh...?" He blinked hard as exclaiming voices boomed across the land. As he removed a cluster of hair stuck to his face, Lloyd looked around to find a cheering crowd.

"The water flowed just as you had designed! It is a success, Master Lloyd!"

"Sir Bayern...?" Sir Bayern came into Lloyd's view. He was standing on the edge of the lake that was created from the dam. Lloyd also noticed the engineers with shovels in their hands. They were not, however, the only ones he saw. There were members of the White Cavalry shouting and scribbling something on their hands on the other side of the dam. Lloyd's senses as a swordmaster allowed him to pick up on some of their words.

"Hey, do you have any coal left?" Vice Commander Orlando asked the guy beside him.

"Ah, hold on, Sir Orlando," muttered the guy. "I'm writing something on my palm right now."

"I'll forget what I was planning to write at this rate."

"I can write for both of us," replied the soldier casually, still focusing on his writing.

"Then make sure you don't make a mistake. As far as I can remember, Master Lloyd cleans his ear from the bottom."

“Yes, I remember, too. Then, he goes clockwise. It was five rounds in each direction. Right?”

“You are right,” Orlando affirmed. “It did say that. Make sure to write that down. That’s the ear-cleaning method of a sword master. It may seem like nothing but could hold an important meaning that we haven’t realized yet.”

“Of course,” observed the guy, still jotting down, “After all, this is a routine habit of a man who is a swordmaster.”

“Indeed. We must follow his ways and learn from them at every chance. This is the best and most updated form of education we can get.”

“You are right, sir. We must overcome our own swordmaster syndrome soon too.”

“That is what I’m talking about!”

These kinds of unbelievable conversations were taking place amongst the White Cavalry.

Stop it, you nut-jobs. I can understand your desperation because I’ve suffered from it too... But this is just too much.

Lloyd felt a shaft of fright run over his body. But he had no choice but to deal with it because even after those burdensome praises, exclamations, and compliments, a slew of new cheers appeared. When Lloyd met the orc warriors, their faces turned scarlet as they shouted, “I knew Lloyd could do it! Lloyd is our friend, oink!” “Lloyd is awesome!” “He made a large dam, oink!” “Lloyd is cool! He even constructed the Jewel of Truth, oink!” “But he can’t find a girlfriend, oink!”

Their passionate, over-the-top reaction was infectious. Even Moira, the elf chief, was affected by it.

“Lloyd Frontera, you are truly amazing,” remarked Moira when she bumped into Lloyd one day.

“Excuse me...? What are you talking about?” replied Lloyd, baffled.

“I have seen it with my own eyes.”

“Seen what...?”

“The Jewel of Truth’s activation,” she explained softly. “The wave in the artificial lake spilled into the spillway extremely smoothly. Your actions saved a host of plants as a result.”

“Oh, do you mean the bushes growing around the lake?” Lloyd did remember them.

“Yes,” she affirmed as she put her hand over to her chest. “I was touched just like the time you moved all the plants around the construction site of the dam that would be hit with its waves.”

“Oh.” Lloyd put on an embarrassed smile. “That’s because those plants were valuable medicinal-”

“I am sure,” Moira broke in, “You built the dam considering even something like this in mind. What a kind man you are.”

Saving a bunch of medicinal plants happened by chance. It was an unintended outcome of his actions. As a result, he could only give an embarrassed smile in response to the compliments he received. Moreover, to be honest, Lloyd didn’t have time to acknowledge every compliment he was given. He was smiling on the outside, but there was a storm inside him.

It’s me or Javier.

The tyrannical path of destiny would only stop if one of them died. What kind of disgusting joke was this? Every time he thought about it, his head ached. It never occurred to him that the Jewel of Truth he had worked so hard to construct would present him with such an awful solution to prevent the restoration of destiny.

Oh, crap.

Would he be able to find the solution if he continued to ponder like this? What if he was wasting his time here? Even as he reassured himself that everything would be fine, Lloyd had to fight and suppress the ball of nervousness that was growing inside him.

And yet... people are praising me, totally ignorant of everything.

Lloyd suddenly felt a surge of loneliness. He wanted to share his worries with someone, but no one knew he even had any concerns. This made him feel like a lost child, separated from everyone. After five days of forcing himself to laugh over meaningless compliments and put on a bright smile, someone at the dinner table extended a helping hand to him.

“You have had a gloomy expression on your face recently. Is something troubling you?” Countess Marbella carefully asked him a question as if she was gently patting him on the back.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 329: A New Grand Plan (1)

“Is something troubling you?” The question was set in an ever so careful and comforting tone, like a gentle pat on his back.

“I'm sorry?” Lloyd was startled out of his reverie when he noticed Countess Marbella looking at him across the dinner table. That's when he realized he'd been fiddling with his salad without eating. “Oh, I've got something on my mind,” he said hurriedly, forcing his lips to move upward and putting on the same bright smile he'd been showing often as of late. Count Marbella, on the other hand, was not convinced.

“If you are tired, you can say so, my dear. It is all right.” She smiled as well. It was faint, but there was warmth unlike his. “Your father and I know how hard you’ve continued to work. How can we not after seeing all your accomplishments?”

“That’s...” Lloyd couldn’t finish his sentence.

“Did you not get the answer you wanted from the Jewel of Truth that was built recently?”

Lloyd clamped his lips shut. Mothers. They saw through everything.

I thought I was hiding it perfectly.

Lloyd hadn't stopped smiling in the past few days. When people showered him with compliments and praise, he proudly shrugged in an effort to act like he was enjoying every moment of it. But it turned out that he was mistaken. What Count Marbella said next confirmed his realization.

“Sir Asrahan has told us that you have been acting strange lately,” she remarked while locking her fingers together on the table.

“He did?” Lloyd raised his brows.

“Yes. He says that it looks like you are avoiding him.”

“Well, that’s because I’m a busy man. Hahaha!”

Count Marbella’s eyes ran over Lloyd in suspicion at his sudden outburst of laughter.

“He didn’t whine about how upset he is, did he?” Lloyd asked nonchalantly.

“He was very worried about you. And Sir Asrahan is not the only one that is.”

“What? Then, who else-”

“Sir Bayern submitted a report yesterday to Arcos. It said that you have been acting unusually upbeat these days.”

Lloyd cleared his throat.

“He is worried too,” added Count Marbella. “Because to him, it looks like you are acting that way on purpose. He wrote your face is smiling, but there is a gloominess to it on a closer look.”

Lloyd was utterly dazed. He couldn’t speak at all. It turned out that his behavior had been transparent all along.

“There are others,” she continued softly. “Sir Blanc, Arosh, Moira, and Turtle Neck. Everyone is worried. They all say that you seem to be brooding over something after using the Jewel of Truth.”

“...”

“Your father and I have made a similar observation.” Countess Marbella spoke, her voice dripping with concern. “You have been unusually quiet recently and often forcing yourself to smile, only to be lost in your thoughts once again. Did you think we would not notice?”

“Um, no...” Lloyd honestly didn’t think they’d notice. He thought he had been putting on a good act. As he scratched his head in embarrassment, his face turned crimson red.

Wow. I guess I was too obvious, and my feelings were written all over my face. My act must have been terrible.

Lloyd couldn't believe that everyone had been whispering their concerns behind his back while he walked around like a fool with a bright smile on his face. Lloyd grumbled, his face flushing with embarrassment.

Dang. If I was that obvious, someone might as well have told me I was. No one here has good manners.

In one part, however, Lloyd understood why they weren't able to say anything to him. They were worried that bringing up the subject might stress him more. They must have simply watched him from afar for his sake.

My goodness. Haah. These people are too kind.

Lloyd exhaled like a deflating balloon, the corners of his lips rising. He wanted to keep the matter to himself and solve the issue on his own. It wasn't something that could be discussed openly. His plan was to struggle alone to find a solution. He never imagined anyone would notice his behavior in the process. Even if he was exposed, however, he had no intention of sharing his concerns with them.

I'll just thank them for their kind intentions.

His dilemma couldn't be revealed in any case. How could he reveal to the others that either he or Javier had to die?

No one knows what Javier will do once he finds out.

Javier would immediately throw his life away if he found out that one of them had to vanish for the safety of the Frontera family. That was the kind of person Javier Asrahan was.

He'd do it even if he hates me. His loyalty toward Count Frontera is absolute.

Lloyd was well aware that Javier was always prepared to make any sacrifice necessary for Count Frontera and his family.

So, I can never tell him about the Jewel of Truth's answer to my question.

There was another problem with explaining his dilemma. It was that he'd have to reveal his identity and explain how he'd taken Javier's role as the main protagonist. Lloyd wasn't going to do that. The time was not yet right.

"Um, I am sorry." Lloyd craned his head a little lower and spoke in a grave tone. "To be honest, something is indeed worrying me. But I can't share my concerns with you at the moment."

"Is there a reason for that, my dear?"

"Yes." Lloyd nodded as he looked down.

She gave a concerned look. "Is it related to the restoration of destiny that you told us about the last time?"

Lloyd looked her in the eyes. "I can't tell you in detail, but yes. That's largely it. But I assure you..." He paused for a moment. "I will tell you everything when this whole thing is over." That was it. When the time came, he'd tell them about all the worries that had plagued his mind and the truth about his identity. Everything would be revealed. Lloyd hoped that the day would arrive as soon as possible.

Countess Marbella gave a gentle smile, and her voice sounded more assuring than a second ago. "I see. Until then, I will continue to cheer you on."

"Thank you." Lloyd felt grateful that she didn't press further.

"But promise me one thing."

"Yes?"

"Whenever you are going through a hard time, please tell us honestly," urged Countess Marbella. "Even if you try to hide it, everyone will be able to see through you.”

“Ehem...” Lloyd cleared his throat. “I will.”

“And one more thing.”

“What is it?”

“You may think I am being nosy here... If something is worrying you, try to focus on something else for a bit.”

“Come again?” The suggestion took Lloyd by surprise. “Focus on something else...?”

“A simple problem you can solve right at the moment.”

“A simple problem...”

“Yes,” she suggested. “A simple problem. A trivial and easy problems that you can solve without much time or effort. At times, focusing on such problems can lead to answers for a bigger dilemma.”

“Oh.” Lloyd felt his world become brighter as soon as he processed the advice in his head as if a ray of light shone ahead of him. His world had been dim and dark since the Jewel of Truth's response, but for the first time, his heart felt liberated.

That could be it.

Of course, it wasn’t that he found the solution. But he did manage to have a realization from her suggestion.

I was too caught up thinking about a problem that couldn’t be answered right away. My perspective has narrowed. This won’t do. The more I obsess over one problem, the harder it will be to come up with a dynamic solution.

Looking back, Lloyd realized that this particular dilemma had taken over his mind for the past few days. He would never be able to find a new approach or solution in this state.

Okay. She's right. I have to shift my focus. Let's try to work on another problem. Hmm... How about the side effect of the Heart of Winter?

That, too, wasn't a simple issue. But it was relatively easier to deal with than the dilemma of choosing whether Javier or he should die.

That's right. One thing at a time. I need to prioritize urgent matters first. Ice Dragon Tyrannus said that ignoring the negative side effect of absorbing the Heart of Winter will cause it to spread across my entire body like cancer and drastically shorten my lifespan.

In some ways, this could be seen as a more urgent issue. It could be what calls for his attention before anything else.

So, for the time being, I'll take care of the side effects from absorbing the Heart of Winter first. At the same time, I'll continue to think about how I should deal with the information I learned from the Jewel of Truth.

In any case, he had nearly two years until the restoration of destiny would begin. Lloyd became suddenly convinced that he could solve the problem while dealing with other issues in front of him.

"Ha..." Finally, he felt a weight lift off his shoulders. He regained his lost appetite for the first time in several days. "I will do that. I really appreciate it." Lloyd bowed again to Countess Marbella as he picked up his fork. Even a moment ago, he couldn't get himself to care for any of the food placed in front of him. But he was suddenly hit with an intense pang of hunger.

It's been a while since I had an appetite.

And then he began digging in his meal. Lloyd was disappointed that he couldn't have kimchi jjigae with mackerel and white rice instead of salad and sausage. However, he still enjoyed the dishes on his dinner table. Countess Marbella looked at Lloyd with a satisfied expression on her face. And she thought to herself...

Lloyd... used to loathe cleaning his ears.

Lloyd had a particular aversion to it since he was a child. Every time she tried to clean his ears, he acted as if he was having a panic attack, threw tantrums, and floundered around. Thus, he made it impossible for her to use the cotton swabs on him. Eventually, she gave up on trying.

He's been like that since he was a baby. When he got older, he grumbled about how much he hated the feeling of a cotton swab entering his ear. He said it was disgusting, even. He believed it was harmless to not clean his ears.

That was Lloyd. The child who vowed to never clean his ears. Countess Marbella knew every single detail about her son. As such, a part of her was saddened.

The Jewel of Truth, on the other hand...

It wrote an announcement in the sky about Lloyd's special way of cleaning his ears. She couldn't believe what she saw. There was only one of the two possibilities, she had concluded to herself. The Jewel of Truth, that mythical building, had lied.

If not...

Count Marbella stared across from the table. Lloyd was busily enjoying his meal. A shaft of grief filled her eyes.

***

Ha. This is sad, very sad. Why do I have to do this now?

Lloyd grumbled as he walked to his room after a satisfying dinner. But his face was more relaxed than before, and at times, a random chuckle escaped him. It was because he had an epiphany at the dinner table while listening to Countess Marbella's advice.

I feel calm for the first time in a while. Now, I can focus on a problem I can solve right now.

Lloyd had mulled over a solution to treat the side effects he suffered from absorbing the Heart of Winter during dinner.

The solution is actually simple. Tyrannus told me what it is. I just need to attain a divine item that possesses the opposite nature of the Heart of Winter.

The Tears of Summer. It was another divine item of the House of Magentano.

I just have to get it in my hands. The problem is how.

Lloyd had racked his brain for the entirety of dinner. The things he could do. The things he couldn't do. Any loopholes he could capitalize on. And countless possibilities and outcomes that could follow. Lloyd pondered, speculated, and weighed over the situation.

As he took the last bite of his salad, a brilliant epiphany struck him, lifting so much weight off his shoulders that he practically floated back to his room. He then summoned his maid, Emily, and assigned her an errand. She returned from it by the time he finished cleaning up his room. On the tray she was holding was a bowl of cold water.

"Um, young master, I brought the cold water you asked for," announced Emily with uncertainty in her voice.

"Okay. Thank you. Just put it over there," instructed Lloyd casually.

"Are you not going to drink it?"

"Nope. Leave it there and be gone now. Thank you. Good night."

Lloyd practically shoved Emily out of his room and shut the door. He looked at the bowl on the desk after smoothing his clothes. He knelt, clasped his hands against his chest, and began to beg the heavens.

"I pray, I pray. Lloyd Frontera of the beneath world prays to the upper realm's holy angels. Please transport me to the heavens. Please summon me. I am a sinner. I defied the demolition order by attacking and harassing an angel. I'm sorry for what I've done. So, I implore you! Please! Take! Me! Right away!"

His prayer had an ulterior motive. Lloyd begged and begged toward the cold bowl of water to be summoned immediately, recalling Raphael's prayer of complaint. Was he acting this way because he had suddenly gone mad? Absolutely not.

This is how I will attain the Tears of Summer!

Lloyd frantically prayed, recalling his grand plan. Could it be that his prayer worked? The heavens intervened about an hour into his fervent hand-rubbing and murmuring, just as he was beginning to question its efficacy.

Fwoosh! Abruptly, his bedroom was enveloped with brilliant rays of light, which was followed by an emergence of angels one after another.

It worked!

A total of six Thrones and Dominion angels. Lloyd gave them a welcoming smile as they arrived.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 330: A New Grand Plan (2)

“Wow! This must be what Heaven is like.” Lloyd's gaze swept the breathtaking surroundings. Everything he saw was spotlessly white. The sleek floor. The temple pillars, the sky, and the holy sun in the sky. Everything was white and radiated pure holiness.

“Woah,” observed Lloyd. “Doesn’t it feel like we’re a germ or cockroach that intruded inside somewhere we shouldn’t be.”

“You know, Young Master, you can keep those kinds of thoughts to yourself...”

“Nope,” defied Lloyd. “Can’t do that.”

Irritated, Javier tightly pressed his lips together, and a notion occurred to him while he gazed at the divine sight around him. How did he end up here after being pulled out by Lloyd from his comfortable position in bed?

Ha... It’s my fault for getting involved with this man in the first place.

Why, of all people, did this type of man have to possess Lloyd Frontera's body. Why did he have to take him to such unexpected places at every chance he had? Javier resentfully reflected on the past. However, there was only one conclusion he could draw.

It’s just because he’s a bad person.

His mind went back to the events that had occurred prior to his arrival. He was lying on his bed about an hour ago, having finished the cleanup for the dam’s construction site and completed all his exhausting chores for the day while also worrying about Lloyd’s evasive behavior recently. He was tossing and turning in his bed, trying to sleep, when the door burst open with a voice saying, “Hey! Let’s go to Heaven!”

I thought he had lost it at first.

Who barged into someone’s room and demanded they travel to Heaven? Javier tried to calm Lloyd down and help him get a grip on himself, believing that he had finally gone mad. Javier even considered knocking him out for a few seconds as a form of medical treatment. Lloyd's next move, however, surpassed his imagination.

“Come on! Let’s go!” Lloyd held out his hand to grab Javier’s and yanked it up, leaving no time for the knight to respond.

Finally making sense of the situation, Javier managed, “Where on earth are you suggesting we go?”

“I told you!” bawled Lloyd excitedly. “To Heaven!”

Okay. That was it for Javier. He was about to knock Lloyd out when he saw six angels standing in a line in the corridor.

"All right, Young Master," Javier said as he finished recalling the previous events. "I can accept the fact that I was forced to come to Heaven with you. However, I have a question." Javier swiveled his head toward Lloyd. His eyes were filled with suspicion. "What on earth am I doing here?"

“Hmm?” retorted Lloyd innocently. “You?”

“Yes.” The suspicion in his eyes grew. “You told me a while ago in the corridor as you introduced me to the angels that Raphael was right about the heavens sending them to take you away and that I was to tag along.”

“Yes, I did,” Lloyd said matter-of-factly.

“That is what I’m curious about.”

“About what?” inquired Lloyd patiently.

Javier frowned. “The angels descended down to take you away.”

“That’s right.”

“So, what am I doing here with you?”

Lloyd looked Javier in the eyes as if the question couldn't be more absurd. "I'm scared to go alone."

That completely silenced Javier, who had been almost persuaded for a split second by Lloyd's outrageous gibberish due to his shameless attitude. "You are scared?" Javier blurted out, quickly gathering himself and screwing up his nose. "Is that why you brought me here? That is a bad joke."

"I'm serious. It's not a joke," replied Lloyd with a straight face.

"..."

"Come on," went on Lloyd. "This isn't a neighborhood or kingdom next to us. It's Heaven. Quite literally Heaven. Although different from Hell, this is also a place for the dead. Plus, should I also remind you that I was coerced into coming here? I didn't come here for a fun vacation. It only makes sense for me to be scared of coming here alone."

"Well, that is..." Javier's voice faltered.

"So, you have to protect me by my side."

Javier narrowed his eyes.

"That's how much I trust you, my knight."

Lloyd Frontera. Javier was astonished by the man's ability to occasionally move him with his sincerity like now. But Javier pretended he wasn't moved and tutted, "You trust me, Young Master? Please don't say something so ridiculous."

"But I'm seriously serious," pressed Lloyd.

"I say that you are rather bored."

"Oops," giggled Lloyd. "You got me."

Javier didn't respond.

Lloyd clapped his hands. “Let’s move faster, shall we? Why are you so slow? Are you a turtle?”

Suddenly, Javier felt a shaft of irritation.

“You know, you might as well answer if you’re asked a question. Let’s go, Javier the Turtle.”

“Master Lloyd,” huffed Javier gravely. “I am neither a turtle nor Javier the __”

“All right. I get it. Sir Javier Asrahan. No need to get upset over what I said. Tsk.”

Lloyd chuckled. Truly, Javier was a fun guy to tease. However, an unpleasant message appeared whenever Lloyd went too far with his teasing. Like now.

[Javier Asrahan thought that your joke crossed the line.]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has decreased by one point.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: +67]

[Even though your relationship with a major character has slightly worsened, your RP remains unchanged and will not be forfeited.]

[Current RP: 10,071]

Ha. I guess I went out too far.

Lloyd gave a wry smile. Javier’s reaction was actually understandable, given that he was dragged out of his bed to this celestial place. But as far as Lloyd was concerned, he didn’t have any other choice.

Of course. Who knows what will happen here? I really was nervous about coming alone.

It was nowhere other than Heaven. Moreover, he wasn’t here for a good reason.

I mean, even though I stand to gain a lot from this visit if it all goes according to my plan, you can never be certain that everything will go as expected. That's why I need someone to look out for me if things go wrong.

Thinking that taking Javier was only a natural decision for him, Lloyd moved on as he stole glances at the faces of the angels escorting him. They were the same angels who had come down to pick him up.

Two Thrones angels. The rest... The Dominion angels?

The Thrones angels held the same amount of power as grandmasters. Dominion angels were slightly less powerful than that. Aside from them, the angels flying about the area also exuded a menacing energy.

Most of them are those in the lower ranks of the Principalities to Angels. Comparing them to humans, they’d be somewhere between a high-level sword expert and a swordmaster. The Virtues I intermittently see are equivalent to swordmasters. This place is filled with powerful angels.

His shoulders drooped naturally, and he was glad he had brought Javier with him. It meant he could buy some time to stall and flee with him if a fight erupted, which Lloyd knew would be impossible to win.

They soon came to a large door that was about 120 feet tall and 60 feet wide and hung in the air. There was no wall or frame around it. There was merely a large white door hanging in the air. Lloyd even peered around the corner, but nothing was there.

One of the angels gestured to the door and said, “Please open the door and go in.”

“Open this one?” asked Lloyd, gulping.

“Yes, but your guard should stay here. Please go in alone. The minister should be inside.”

Lloyd figured that the angel was referring to Gabriel the Seraph. Clasping the handle, he pushed the door open. Just then... Fwoosh!

Eh?

His entire surroundings changed after a brief moment of nausea as if someone had used transportation magic on him.

Where am I?

Lloyd's gaze darted around the room, trying to calm his nauseated stomach. The entire setting had been converted into a large office. The walls and floor, as well as the bookshelf and books, were all white. The desk and chair were white as well as if the entire place had been designed by someone who was obsessed with the color white. Lloyd then noticed an immaculate angel sitting straight in his chair, gently smiling.

“Welcome. Have a seat.”

Lloyd wordlessly obeyed. After taking a seat across from the angel, he leaned forward and said, “Nice to meet you. I am Lloyd Frontera, the human from the mundane realm.”

Lloyd figured the angel must be Gabriel. Determined to make a good first impression on him, he gulped and observed the angel’s reaction.

The angel beamed. “I am aware. I have been watching over your every move. It is a pleasure to meet you. I am Gabriel, the Minister of Angels.”

“Nice to meet you,” Lloyd said as he put on a modest and humble smile. “I am infinitely honored to be in the presence of the Minister of Angels who possesses such great reputation, honor, glory, joy, and praise.”

Gabriel raised his brow at the groveling remark. “Really...?”

“Yes, minister.”

“I think you are lying,” accused Gabriel, unaffected.

“I would never lie to you.”

“I suggest you wipe the sweat off yourself before you speak.”

“Please forgive me...” Lloyd trailed off, inwardly scrapping his plan to win him over with flattery. He suppressed a bitter smile.

Gabriel put on a similar expression. “Anyway, thank you for agreeing to come here without a fight. Unlike what happened last time.”

“By that, you mean...”

“Raphael the Throne. You put up quite a fierce resistance against him while he tried to carry out his duty.”

Lloyd avoided Gabriel’s gaze.

“I am sure you are aware why I called for you here today.

“Yes, I am.”

“Then, care to tell me the reason yourself?”

“Haah...” sighed Lloyd. “I didn’t abide by the demolition order of the Jewel of Truth and interfered with Raphael’s efforts to carry out his duties as a public official of Heaven. I suppose you wanted to interrogate me about it all.”

“You are smart. I like that. You are exactly right.”

“Thank you, minister.”

“Thank you? You should be offering at least one hundred apologies instead,” said Gabriel in a reproachful tone.

Ever so carefully, Lloyd spoke in a humble tone. “On what ground should I apologize...”

“Do you not know?” Gabriel was slightly taken aback by Lloyd’s question.

Lloyd closed his mouth. Gabriel's benevolent eyes began to become stern and stringent. "What do you think of the heavens' decision, Human Lloyd Frontera? Do you see it as a tyrannical move from selfish higher-ups who are unconcerned about those in the mundane realm?"

Yes, I do, Lloyd thought to himself.

Gabriel's criticism continued. "But, human Lloyd Frontera, you see. You are off in your assessment. The present is not the only factor when we make decisions. We also take into account the numerous possibilities and risks that our decision may have on the universe in its present, past, and future." Gabriel's voice grew commanding. "Now, do you dare tell me that you are arrogant enough to believe you are above Heaven’s wisdom with your menial judgment, hopes, and willpower as a human?"

Lloyd didn’t rush into response. He remained silent, listening to what Gabriel had to say.

“That is truly an arrogant thought. I am aware that such propensity can be easily observed in smart humans, but I thought you were different. How utterly disappointing.”

Even then, Lloyd didn’t speak.

“This should be enough to enlighten you of your wrongdoing. Do speak if you have something to say,” urged Gabriel. His benevolent tone was back.

“Oh, yes, My Grace. But before that,” Lloyd said as he gently smiled, “May I bother you with a question?”

“Do ask now,” allowed Gabriel.

"Yes, thank you." Lloyd licked his lips with saliva as he noticed Gabriel's sternness in his eyes. He was well aware that he needed to tread carefully. As a result, he phrased his question with great care, as if he were testing the water, which he knew was shallow.

“Um, the thing is...” finally managed Lloyd, “Um... If ever I present a rebutting argument to what you have just said...”

“A rebutting argument?” Gabriel echoed.

“Yes,” said Lloyd as he nodded. “This is just to be certain. But if I rebut your words... Will I be hated by you and receive great misfortune in the future?”

Being an angel, the question didn’t make sense to Gabriel. “Hated? Receive great misfortune? What do you mean?”

“Oh, I mean, would you do something along the lines of kill me immediately and send me to Hell?”

"Hell? Haha." Gabriel burst out laughing at the ridiculousness of the thought. "That will never happen. Are you inquiring if you would go to Hell over giving an opposing argument? That would be completely unacceptable. That is something that can never happen."

“I-is that so?” Lloyd felt a whoosh of relief.

“Of course,” replied Gabriel benevolently. “Where you go after you pass depends on the total score of your good and bad deeds. It is impossible for an angel to deduct or add any points from your score. Regardless of an angel’s rank, they are all those who are serving Heaven, not an object of worship.”

“Oh,” observed Lloyd with glee, “Is that the same case for you, my angel?”

“Indeed.” Gabriel flashed a stringent and generous smile. He knew what he was. Angels were workers, tools that execute the will of God into the world. They could not and must not be objects of worship.

“As such, if you have any words of rebuttal, do feel free to speak up,” Gabriel urged kindly. “Whatever you bring up, I shall not hold it against you.”

“Do you really mean that?” Lloyd asked, whose tone grew a little more excited.

“Of course.”

“Mean it with all your heart?” asked Lloyd again. This time, his voice went higher in pitch.

“I do.” Gabriel nodded.

“Promise, my angel?” He gestured with his pinky finger.

“Consider it done.”

“Thank you.”

“Do not be.”

“Of course, I should be grateful,” replied Lloyd. By now, his tone was more relaxed than ever. “Okay, so since you have given me the assurance, why don’t we sit down and have a fruitful discussion on how senseless and ludicrous your teaching is regarding the demolition of the Jewel of Truth.”

“Hmm?” Gabriel stopped for a second. Just then, a thought interrupted him. Why on earth was this human licking his lips with a smile as if he were talking to a naive fool?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 331: Conditional Agreement (1)

“Hmm...?” Stopping, Gabriel thought to himself...

What is with this sudden change in his attitude?

Until a moment ago, the human was cautiously watching for Gabriel’s reactions, afraid he would say the wrong thing, slight him, and be punished. The man's effort to appease him was obvious, as was his careful and measured demeanor. However, now...

All I did was tell him the truth: every angel, regardless of their rank, is merely someone who works for the heavens. We are not, and should not be, objects of worship. That's what I told him, and now...

There was now a dramatic shift in the man’s attitude. He was no longer looking at the angel’s face, and his careful expression and demeanor had vanished.

Gabriel was completely taken aback by his abrupt change. “What...? You want to sit down and nitpick why my argument is nonsense...?”

“Yes. Please forgive me, but that’s what I would like to do,” Lloyd licked his lips before launching into his rebuttal, which he had prepared and let marinate in his head like a well-aged wine on his entire way to Heaven. “First and foremost, please allow me to ask you a question. Regarding the Jewel of Truth that your realm is taking an issue with, may I know when the building was made illegal?”

“Based on the mundane realm’s standard of time?” asked Gabriel with a frown.

“Yes.”

“That is easy. Exactly 4,640,655 days, twelve hours, twenty minutes, and sixteen seconds ago,” counted Gabriel.

Lloyd looked up, thinking. “Oh, um, then... 12,714 years, one month, and fifteen days ago?”

“Yes, something like that.”

Lloyd gave a nod. “Then, the Jewel must have been determined to be unlawful before I started its construction?”

“Indeed.”

In a thoughtful tone, Lloyd remarked, “But why didn’t I receive any notice or instruction at the time I started the construction?”

“What?” Gabriel was taken aback by Lloyd’s sharp question.

Lloyd’s knife-sharp criticism continued. “I clearly remember. No one notified or warned me in any way that the Jewel of Truth was an illegal structure when I decided to start this project. That certainly seems like an issue, doesn’t it?”

Gabriel frowned, starting to sense where Lloyd was going.

“Think about it,” Lloyd continued. “The Jewel of Truth has been outlawed by the heavens. To build that would be a very serious crime. Thus, whoever breaks the law will get into a lot of trouble for it in the future. That's what the Throne angel who came down to my fiefdom told me.”

“That is of course-”

“Oh, sure,” Lloyd interrupted without giving Gabriel a second to defend himself. “I know where you are coming from. I already heard about the potential the Jewel has to leak sensitive secrets about Heaven. Doesn’t that make the problem even worse? Why wasn’t I warned during the initial phase of the construction when the Jewel is highly illegal to build?”

Gabriel was speechless. Lloyd was the one who constructed an illegal building, so he was in the wrong here. However, he was also the one raising his voice now. What was even stranger was that Lloyd made perfect sense!

Lloyd’s voice grew more confident. “I say this is a problem. You said the Jewel was outlawed and under strict regulation. If that was the case, shouldn't you have popped up just as I was about to build it, saying, ‘You can't do that, my friend!?’”

“Young man, you see-”

“No, I’m not done yet,” insisted Lloyd. “Do you see how wronged I was? I had no idea. Nobody told me about any of this. There were no warnings or notices. So, how was I supposed to know the Jewel had been outlawed?”

Gabriel didn’t say anything.

“I’m not lying. I merely thought that it would be amazing to build such an amazing piece of architecture from the mythical ages!” Lloyd’s voice sounded like a wronged, innocent victim.

“Um, I am sorry about that. However—”

“Please,” Lloyd said dismissively, waving his hands. “Listen to me first. No one informed me that the Jewel was outlawed, so I poured all my blood, sweat, and tears into its construction. In the end, only to be informed that I was building an illegal structure and had to destroy it Otherwise, I’d be punished. What in the world is this situation?”

Gabriel readjusted himself in his seat. He did not enjoy this conversation.

“Please put yourself in my shoes. Isn’t it only natural for me to be annoyed?”

“Um, about that-”

“I would appreciate it if you don’t cut me short,” replied Lloyd curtly.

“Oh, sorry, I thought you were asking a question—”

Lloyd clapped indignantly. “Because that's how unfair the whole thing is to me. Don't you think you'd feel the same way if you went through something similar? I’m sure you’d complain too.”

This time, instead of replying, Gabriel remained silent, for he didn’t want to provoke Lloyd again.

“Answer me, please,” demanded Lloyd irritably.

“Can I... give you an answer now?” asked Gabriel carefully.

“Yes, Your Grace.”

“Whew. You are an unusually difficult person to deal with,” confessed Gabriel as he sighed.

“I’d appreciate it if you said I was assertive instead.”

Gabriel ignored the suggestion. “What are you going to do if you get on my bad side from how you're behaving right now?”

“You promised that it won’t happen,” reminded Lloyd with a smile.

“Whew...” sighed Gabriel again as he laced his hands on the desk. “I regret giving you that promise.”

“Promises are meant to be kept.”

“And that is why I am regretful.” Gabriel held back a bitter smile. He couldn't believe that this sort of person even existed. However, Gabriel understood where Lloyd was coming from. “So, you're arguing that the demolition order was issued too late. Am I correct?”

“That is exactly my point.” Lloyd gave a nod. He could tell his strategy was working. He forcefully pushed forward his point with an aggressive tone to address his current situation. He then moved on to the topic he had in mind as soon as he got the impression that his plan was working. “I have no plans to object to your decision. I am confident there’s a reasonable justification and explanation for it. So, I don't think the decision is inherently unfair. It’s just that...”

“Just what?” Gabriel echoed when Lloyd paused midway.

Lloyd locked his gaze on Gabriel's. “I’d like to stress that the issue at hand is the lack of advance notice or warning from Heaven, which only came through seconds before the Jewel’s completion. This administrative blunder brought me great harm despite the fact that I had done nothing wrong.”

“Hmm. Harm, you say,” mused Gabriel. “Can you cite a specific example to prove your point?”

“Of course.” A corner of Lloyd’s lips rolled upward. “First, the construction of the Jewel of Truth and the dam required massive amounts of capital and labor, and more than anything else, time was the greatest expense out of everything.”

“Time, you say?”

“Time,” affirmed Lloyd. He was being genuine here. Speaking truthfully, he added, “First, I would like to disclose my reason for building the Jewel of Truth. It was to stop the restoration of destiny.”

“Hmm, I see. Keep going.”

“Yes, thank you,” expressed Lloyd heartily. “I was forced to travel around various parts of the continent to collect all the key materials for the construction, from the Mermaid Kingdom in the Arctic Sea to the City of Magenta, to Tyrannus’s ice cave, and to the Great Plains of Klamath in the Northwest. I even had to take a trip to another dimension.”

“That...must have required quite a bit of effort,” empathized Gabriel.

“Not just effort,” retorted Lloyd. “The amount of time it required was ridiculous, too. That was what I spent all my time on while trying to find a way to stop the restoration of destiny.”

Originally, Lloyd’s plan was to present his case in a calm and collected manner. But as he spoke on, a wave of anger surged in him.

“And yet?!” Lloyd bawled indignantly. “After wasting my precious time going through all the trouble of traveling around the continent, I succeeded in collecting the key materials for the construction. And just as I was about to build the Jewel of Truth and discover how to stop the restoration of destiny... Bam! A Throne angel appears and tells me that I should destroy my work."

"Hmm, that is..." Gabriel broke off.

"What do you say now that you're hearing it from me? It crossed the line, yes?"

"..."

"That's my exact point. "You should have notified me when I was collecting the Jewel of Truth. But in reality, you didn't. So, as a result, I am forced to demolish the Jewel of Truth that I built to stop the restoration of destiny before accomplishing the goal."

This time again, Gabriel said nothing.

"All my money, time, and effort until now has been for nothing. Not a single thing. The opportunity cost of it all is also equally immense. My life has been ruined. And it's all thanks to you for not providing an advanced warning before ordering a demolition." Lloyd let out a heavy sigh.

Gabriel suddenly felt a prickle of guilt. "Umm... Are you saying that you want to be compensated for your investments because of the lack of notice?"

"Yes, Your Grace, that is exactly my point," Lloyd said, looking up and nodding firmly. "The matter has been keeping me up at night. My investments have been wiped out, and I'm about to face the full wrath of destiny. Where should I express my grief now? Right here. To you. Who else other than the just and merciful Minister of Angels?"

"I, of course—"

"Yes, you don't have to say it. I know who you are. You are the angel who oversees all the creatures of the mundane realm, such as me, with your endless grace and kindness. So, I beg you. Please save me just this once. Please?" Lloyd clasped his hands together.

"But save you how?"

"Please agree to the conditional demolition of the Jewel of Truth."

"Conditional... demolition?" asked Gabriel.

"Yes." Lloyd realized his time had come. In a serious and bold tone, he replied, "As I have told you a while ago, I don't object to outlawing the Jewel of Truth. I trust that there is a reasonable justification behind this decision from Heaven. As such, I give my full support to the demolition order. I plan to abide by it. That is the rule, after all."

"But so?"

"I would like to request a probational period on the demolition order, given that I already spent a great deal of time on the Jewel because there was a lack of advance notice about its illegal status."

"A probation period?" This was something Gabriel didn't expect to hear.

"Yes." Lloyd's voice softened. "I'm asking you to provide a probational period for the demolition until I can stop the restoration of destiny for good."

"Hmm," mused Gabriel, "You are asking me to prevent the work you put into the Jewel of Truth from becoming a loss for the reason you constructed the building in the first place."

"Yes." As the conversation progressed, Lloyd was relieved that Gabriel was a quick-witted man, fitting his ministerial position. Lloyd then continued with his hands clasped together as if he was praying. "Dear just and merciful minister, who works all day and night to maintain the order and betterment of the world. I beg you to ensure that this menial creature from the mundane realm is not harmed as a result of the heavenly realm's administrative blunder. Please have pity on me... And another thing..."

Gabriel lifted his brow. “One more thing?”

Lloyd nodded.

“You have another demand?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded as if that would be obvious. Adding a tablespoon of shamelessness to his desperate prayer, he asked, “I would like to request just one more condition.”

“Why is that?”

Lloyd reasoned, “The probational period is simply a way to protect the investments I have put into the Jewel so far. What I would like to request now is compensation for the damage I’ve experienced.”

Gabriel’s brows lifted higher with dismay. “Are you saying that there’s more damage than what was discussed so far?”

“Yes,” affirmed Lloyd as he gave a nod. “Emotional damage.”

Gabriel couldn’t believe this.

“I was forced to come to Heaven and speak alone with such an incredibly impressive individual like yourself, the Minister of Angels. I am merely a lowly human from the mundane world. Has it ever occurred to you how mentally traumatizing this would be for me?”

Gabriel, however, wasn’t convinced. “As far as I know, you met the King of Hell.”

“Goodness,” Lloyd said, waving his hand. “How can he possibly compare to you? You are the Minister of Angels. How could the King of Hell compare to you... Hah, that is complete nonsense.”

“...”

“And so, the damage left to my mental health was just as extensive, advantageous—I mean, unimaginable. The aftermath of the experience may force me to be bedbound for several days once I return to my world. Yes, that is how great and mighty you are.”

Gabriel suddenly felt remorseful.

Noticing the blank expression on Gabriel’s face, Lloyd asked, “Minister? Hello?”

Even if he called, Gabriel didn’t reply.

“Why are you so quiet, My Grace?” asked Lloyd one more time.

Gabriel flinched. “Oh, sorry. I was lost thinking about how I allowed a scammer like you inside my office.”

This time, Lloyd didn’t speak.

“Well,” Gabriel remarked, “I have heard your senseless groveling. It was impressive. But there is one thing I am forced to admit, and it is your claim on the damage you received.”

“Ah, yes.”

Gabriel let out a sigh. “Although I am not entirely sure about the emotional damage, it is true that a Throne angel has attacked you and caused a scene. This incident also disturbed your construction. Am I right?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head.

Gabriel then smiled, and now it was benevolent. “Good. Your argument was valid in any case. Without a doubt, our mistake has caused you harm. As a result, I made a decision. I will accept your request.”

Lloyd’s heart started to beat faster. “That means...”

“I will give you the probational period. Not only that, I will favorably consider your other request. So, tell me. What is this additional condition?”

When Gabriel agreed to his terms, Lloyd inwardly cheered in his heart as he saw Gabriel's benevolent smile. However, he made sure to keep his lips tight, telling himself that he needed to keep his calm and refrain from acting rashly. He focused his attention on the final missing piece to his plan, which Lloyd was about to finally obtain from Gabriel.

“I would like to ask for your full cooperation to attain the Tears of Summer, the second divine item of the House of Magentano.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 332: Conditional Agreement (2)

There was only one place in the world where time flowed normally. It was Frontera County, which had been able to enjoy having a sunny morning every day for the past few months thanks to that fact. Today, however, a different kind of light erupted in the fiefdom's corner.

Fwoosh! A brilliant ray of light enveloped his bedroom. However, it didn't stay for long. The moment lasted about the same time as someone taking a shot of soju or secretly reading a text message during class. When the flash of light disappeared, it left behind two people in the quiet bedroom. Lloyd and Javier.

"Haah..." Lloyd exhaled as he surveyed his surroundings. He was familiar with this room and bed. The corners of his lips jerked upward into a smirk as he realized he was in his own bedroom.

I'm safely back and successfully got what I wanted.

Lloyd's thoughts returned to the event, specifically his meeting with Gabriel, his bold suggestion, and the angel's reaction. And...

"Judging by your smile, I am guessing your conversation with the Minister went well," came Javier's voice. After being jolted out of his reverie, Lloyd quickly turned to the side. He found Javier staring at him intently. "You have appeared to be in a very good mood for a while now, Young Master. I figured your negotiations with Gabriel went well, but I was afraid to ask because we were escorted out by a few angels."

"Were you concerned that I'd get in trouble because of your question?" asked Lloyd, assuming Javier's intention.

"I did."

"Well," Lloyd grinned casually as he perched on the edge of the bed, "The talk went extremely well. I nearly got everything I desired."

“Is that so?”

“Yup. And now, we’ll head to the capital to obtain the Tears of Summer.”

“Excuse me...?” muttered Javier, taken aback.

“The Minister of Angels agreed to help.” Lloyd grinned again, more brightly this time. His mind flew back to his negotiation earlier as he conversed with Javier.

***

“I would like to ask for your full cooperation to attain the Tears of Summer, the second divine item of the House of Magentano.”

“Come again...?” Gabriel's face crumpled, and he cocked his head to the side, shooting a glare at Lloyd. He seemed to think Lloyd had gone mad after hearing his ridiculous words.

Lloyd, on the other hand, only opened his eyes wider without a hint of a smile on his face and spoke to Gabriel in an even more serious tone than before. “It is just as what I said. I need the Tears of Summer, the divine item of the House of Magentano. This is why I need the help from you and the heavens.”

“Are you asking for my cooperation to help fulfill your greed?”

“I am,” Lloyd replied, nodding in a serious and brazen manner. “You admitted it a moment ago. I was harmed while Raphael forcibly tried to carry out the demolition order from Heaven. I was almost killed after being hit in the head. Moreover, the perpetrator wasn’t a demon, a murderer, or a robber. It was an angel. Do you know what this kind of act is called in our world?”

“Could you mean attempted murder?” guessed Gabriel.

“Thank you for understanding me so well, Your Grace,” replied Lloyd, “You are right. It was an attempted murder. Otherwise, it can be seen as a work accident... As such, I believe I am not asking for too much here.”

“Your condition is to receive help in obtaining this divine item from the royal family?”

“Yes.” Lloyd gave a nod.

Gabriel sighed. “Angels do not help creatures of the mortal realm for trivial reasons.”

“This isn’t a trivial reason. It’s a form of compensation for the damage incurred while an angel carried out his job.”

“At the end of the day, you are demanding help from us just like everyone else,” rebutted Gabriel.

“I am not requesting for anything big. You would just need to give a slight nudge, a little push to my plan. That is all.”

“Push?”

“That’s all that I need.”

Gabriel considered for a second. “What kind of push?”

Okay, it’s working, Lloyd told himself. When he saw Gabriel knit his brow in curiosity, Lloyd immediately threw a question back at him.

“Um, will you please lend me your ears for a moment?”

Gabriel nodded.

Lloyd walked nearer to Gabriel and whispered, “So, the plan is... When I am in the audience with the queen... Descend... This and that... That’s all you have to do.”

When Lloyd finished, Gabriel moved back slightly.

“How does that sound?” asked Lloyd, expectant.

“How does that sound?” Gabriel replied with a straight face. “Are you asking for an angel to lie right now?”

“Oh, my. Not at all,” Lloyd hurriedly added. “No one has to lie here, Your Grace.”

“How could that be? How?” inquired Gabriel, unconvinced.

“All you have to do is agree to my request right now. With that, no one would have to lie for my plan to work. Isn't that true?”

Gabriel’s face hardened. He knew very well that Lloyd was right about this.

He is right. The angel doing the job for him would not be lying since he is simply following my orders to help the human. But... something about this feels wrong.

Could this be why the King of Hell sought after this human? Gabriel locked his gaze on Lloyd for a long moment. "Human Lloyd Frontera, do you not realize that your attempt to control Heaven’s angels will affect your karma?" he asked gravely.

“I am aware of that,” Lloyd slowly answered.

“Then, why did you still make this request?”

“I have no choice.” A bitter smile appeared on Lloyd’s face. He was serious when he said there was no other solution for the situation. This plan was also the most surefire method in any case.

The only way I can attain the Tears of Summer other than this method would be by raising a mutiny against the queen. But I don’t want that. I can’t do that. If I rashly start a battle, that would be the end of everything. It would also be a problem even if I succeed since I’ll have to say goodbye to having the lazy life of a rich retiree if I become king.

It would be more troublesome for Lloyd to become king. He needed his queen, an umbrella, a shield to protect his life as a lazy bum. As such, a mutiny wasn’t even on the table.

“I have given a lot of thought before drawing a conclusion. This is the best way for me to obtain the Tears of Summer with the least amount of casualty.”

“Hmm.”

“So, please, Your Grace. I will do good deeds to balance out the bad karma that comes out of my request,” Lloyd requested in all earnestness and sincerity.

At last, after a prolonged moment of deliberation, Gabriel gave a nod. “Haah... I see. If I’m being honest, you have done many good deeds in your world. I will make an exception this time and accept your request, considering the damages you have received.”

“Thank you...!”

I did it! Lloyd yelled inwardly, but he didn't let the triumphant feeling consume him. Instead, he quickly reached into his pocket and pulled out the item that would finally put an end to the matter before Gabriel changed his mind. Flap!

“What is that...?”

“It's a contract, my angel,” Lloyd replied, holding out two papers he had prepared ahead of time. “One is for you, and the other is for me. It contains everything I requested from you just now. Please review the contract for any errors or disagreements you would like to correct. The content of the two copies is identical. Ah, in addition, your signature goes at the bottom.”

“...”

“I think you can write the date based on Heaven’s standard of time,” added Lloyd as an afterthought.

Gabriel felt a strong desire to hit Lloyd’s head and send him down to hell with one punch. However, he quickly dismissed the thought. It would be a mistake to hand over such a talent to the King of Hell.

“You see,” managed Gabriel. “I do not have my own signature.”

“Well, you can always use a stamp.” Lloyd flashed a big grin. Soon, the two contracts were sealed with the divine golden stamp of Gabriel the Seraph.

***

“Then... Are we going to the capital now?”

“Yeah. Most likely.”

“But I have a question.” After hearing Lloyd's brief backstory, Javier frowned slightly. “How did you predict everything, Master Lloyd?” Javier asked him in a seemingly confused manner.

“Predict?” echoed Lloyd.

“The angel's reaction, I mean,” Javier explained, “I got the impression from your attitude throughout the trip and negotiation with Gabriel that you already anticipated what would happen. That is why I am curious.”

“Aha, you want to know where my confidence came from against the Minister of Angels.”

“That is right.” Javier nodded.

Lloyd brightly smiled. “How else? I did a preliminary investigation with Raphael.”

“By that, you mean...”

“To be candid, I vaguely guessed from Raphael’s behavior that the angels weren’t domineering creatures ruling over the heavens. I assumed they were the ones serving Heaven, not ruling it. So, I confirmed this for myself.”

“What did you do?” asked Javier, growing more curious.

“I simply asked if a decision from Heaven can be questioned, how likely it is for the angels to admit there’s been an administrative error, what the best way is to make them admit their mistake, and whether Gabriel will be offended if I present a counterargument. Those sorts of things."

Lloyd then shrugged. It was true. Whenever he had spare time during the final stage of the Jewel's construction, he asked Raphael to answer a few questions for him once the latter started to live in his family's guest bedroom. The majority of his questions focused on getting more information about Heaven.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. The novel also had a brief mention of Heaven. However, it was vague and didn't have much detail. That's why I needed to double-check the information since learning more about Heaven and its minister would only be beneficial for me, no matter if I fought or negotiated with them.

Lloyd regularly went to see Raphael, even when he was tired, for that reason. In the end, he was able to learn many things from his visits.

"So, I asked all my questions to Raphael in case any of them would be answered, and he was surprisingly candid about everything. He explained that angels were public servants who could make mistakes. And Gabriel, along with all the other angels, was a humble being who readily accepted criticisms about his mistakes."

Thanks to confirming these facts in advance, Lloyd was able to draw up a broad plan and strike a successful negotiation with great results. Now, it was...

Time to work!

Lloyd buckled down to focus on a bigger goal since the heavens were on his side after their successful negotiation. He walked out of the manor, looked up at the sky, and reached out his hand to deactivate his Time Freeze skill.

Now it's time to go to the capital.

[Time Freeze has been deactivated.]

Ziiing... The notification came with a strong vibration from his manaheart. The Heart of Winter in his manaheart became dramatically more frigid, just like when he last deactivated his Time Freeze skill, but this time it was worse.

Eh... Argh!

Previously, it felt like he was pressing his heart against a frozen popsicle. But this time, his heart felt like it was wrapped in an ice pack. For a split second, his heart stopped beating, severely constructing its surrounding veins and sending a shock throughout his body.

“Argh... Ha...” The world went dark for a moment as if he had passed out in an upright position. Lloyd recovered a split second before collapsing and clutched the railing beside him for support.

The side effect from absorbing the Heart of Winter is a lot worse than I thought.

Dragon Tyrannus’s warning, which was that the effect would worsen and spread like cancer throughout his body, was accurate. Lloyd’s expression grew heavy.

The issue is more serious than I expected. I was close to having a heart attack. This is only the second time I used the Time Freeze skill. What will happen on my third try?

Lloyd swelled with nervousness. But on one part, he felt relieved.

I did the right by taking heed to the countess’s advice. It was a wise choice to divert my attention toward dealing with this side effect from absorbing the Heart of Winter.

Lloyd hurriedly got ready to leave for the capital after that day, praising himself for his foresight. Like before, the preparation process was modest and straightforward. He packed some food, clothes, and gold and silver coins. Then, he went to see the count and countess to inform them of his business trip to the capital. But there was something he had been completely unaware of. It was the subtle sadness in the Frontera couple’s gaze toward him recently.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 333: To Take Advantage of a Prophecy (1)

Count Frontera couldn't exactly pinpoint when he began to suppress his growing doubts despite believing that Lloyd was his son and he loved and cared for Lloyd more than anyone else.

Since when?

There is no way of knowing, he thought. It wasn’t something he could find out even if he tried. There was nothing he could do about it.

No. It might have begun on that day.

Abruptly, his mind flashed to a memory from a few years ago. It had been a night filled with suffocating despair. The stress of his crippling debt and Lloyd's hooligan ways had caused him to sigh aloud when unexpected news arrived on his doorstep. It was about Lloyd's strange construction project that was causing confusion amongst his fiefdom’s residents. Suspicious, he sat down with Lloyd at their dinner table to inquire about an odd rumor going around about him and what he was doing in the pub’s backyard. Inwardly, the count was pleading with Lloyd to stop causing trouble and start acting his age. He even revealed his prayer to the heavens. Lloyd’s response, however, astonished him.

It was completely unexpected. I was surprised.

His eldest son had always been full of disobedience. His rebellious and warped attitude had become a part of him after some point in time. But at that moment, this same son of his was shockingly calm and composed while trying to persuade him. Lloyd explained that he had a plan in mind and asked for his trust and understanding before leaving the dinner table.

Perhaps...

He wanted to believe Lloyd’s behavior that day was the miraculous change he had been praying for. Count Frontera lifted his head up to the sky. Now that the flow of time had been unfrozen, he was able to view the night sky filled with light from the moon and stars, clouds, and shooting stars for the first time in months. And his eldest son, Lloyd, was taking a stroll beside him.

“Are you not cold?” asked Count Frontera.

"Oh, I'm good. You know, I've become a swordmaster," Lloyd grinned and said as he turned to face the count. “But, how about you? Your coat is thinner than mine."

“I am fine as well,” softly replied Count Frontera. “If I get cold, I can always steal your coat anyway. Isn’t that right?”

“Oh, that’s an idea.”

“Indeed. That’s just one perk of raising a healthy son.”

“Hahaha.” Lloyd laughed.

Lloyd's laughter prompted Count Frontera to smile back. A healthy son. Count Frontera hoped with his entire being that the Lloyd he had dinner with on that day was his son, who had finally come to his senses and turned over a new leaf. Count Frontera direly wanted Lloyd to confirm this with his own mouth.

There would be nothing better than to know I wasn’t being selfish and letting my greed blind me from the truth all along.

As Count Frontera belatedly tried to suppress the heavy sigh coming out of him, he was reminded of the floating message in the sky from the Jewel of Truth. The topic of Lloyd’s ear-cleaning habits was funny to most people, who were laughing and amazed at seeing the message. However, it broke his heart. The Lloyd he knew despised cleaning his ears and had no such unusual habit. Count Frontera sucked in his breath to suppress another sigh, and he was only able to speak after some time passed.

“So,” Count Frontera managed, “You are going to the capital tomorrow?”

“Yes, I am,” affirmed Lloyd causally, unaware of the internal chaos brewing in Count Frontera.

“I did not know Miss Bangul already made so many rebars.”

“Oh, yes. I’ve been putting some aside whenever I could. But I thought it would look strange to sell them all at once.”

“Do you mean to Her Majesty?”

“Yes, the rebars are a strategic material, after all. The imperial house may launch an investigation on me if I try selling them in bulk. It would be even more senseless to sell them abroad for the same reason. And besides, no one showed interest in buying all of the rebars at once.”

“You are right. No one did,” affirmed Count Frontera. “I contacted several buyers, but all of them refused. I would be surprised if the imperial house is interested in them.”

“I will make them buy it. It’ll be troublesome for us otherwise.” Lloyd sounded determined.

Count Frontera knew why. “You are talking about the food storage.”

Lloyd nodded. “We didn’t receive any royal assistance in the past few months while the flow of time was paused.”

The Frontera fiefdom saw a massive increase in population after it received tens of thousands of refugees fleeing from the Monster Domino phenomenon. Making things worse, he had also brought hundreds of orcs and elves over the past few months to help him build the dam and Jewel of Truth.

I’ve been depending on the Maritz Wetland and terraced rice fields to feed everyone. But we've reached our limit. Our food storage will run out soon at this rate.

As a result, the Frontera fiefdom would need quite a bit of assistance from the imperial family. But he didn't have a good reason to ask for any.

Duh. They won't even realize that the flow of time had been paused. I'd just look like I’m whining about the lack of aid that they previously sent on a regular basis.

That was why Lloyd intended to sell the rebars he had been saving in exchange for their generous assistance. This, however, was only his surface reason for visiting the capital.

My real reason for it is to acquire the Tears of Summer.

Organizing his thoughts, Lloyd gazed at the starlit sky. "Well, I'm not sure if it will work. But I suppose I have to give it a shot. Besides, since I have Draggy, it won’t be difficult for me to travel to the capital."

“Right. You have a point.”

“Yes. I also plan to meet with Julian when I get there.”

“What a great idea. Please send our regards to him.”

“Of course I will.” Lloyd suddenly remembered hearing that Julian was back in the capital with his wife after spending some time in the sultan’s kingdom following their honeymoon.

It’s the kingdom’s tradition for the son-in-law of the sultan to live in their palace for at least a year.

That was why Julian could only now return to Magenta and begin working as a palace official.

Tsk. I’m sure Miss Scheherazade has him wrapped around her finger.

The thought brought a smile to Lloyd’s face. Thinking of Julian, he added, “Don’t worry about him. I plan on kidnapping him for a day and bringing him here.”

“Now, now. You can’t do that. He finally got to start his job,” reproached Count Frontera, masking his interest.

Lloyd easily saw through him. “But don’t you miss him?”

“Well, I do, but-”

“Then, just say the word. I’ll take care of everything else,” assured Lloyd lightly.

Count Frontera zipped his mouth. While he laughed at Lloyd’s cheeky assertion, he remembered the things he couldn’t bring himself to say out loud.

Once again, a shaft of grief and confusion swept through Count Frontera as he gazed at Lloyd, his eldest son, who suddenly matured in one night and saved his entire family and fiefdom. There were days when he was so overwhelmed with gratitude that he couldn’t find any words or actions that fully expressed his feelings to Lloyd. Count Frontera felt apologetic, grateful, perplexed, and moved all at once as he stared at Lloyd. He forcefully swallowed the words rising from deep inside his heart.

I want to tell you everything, Lloyd... But I have no clue as to how I should talk to or ask you about this. I already see you as my precious son. I am grateful for you.

Count Frontera raised his gaze to the sky once more. He was at a loss for words. The sky was incredibly dark and blue, filled with light from the moon and stars, clouds, and shooting stars. He sighed as his heart filled with uncertainty and regret. Unable to distract his mind, he simply reached out and tightly grabbed Lloyd's hand. He hoped his unspoken feelings and thoughts would be conveyed to his son: Whatever you do, whatever you hide, you are my precious son that I will always be thankful for. In the cold and cozy night, they affectionately held each other’s hand.

It was a stroll between a father and son or two people who hoped that would become true someday.

***

When the next morning arrived, Lloyd and Javier hopped on Draggy and left the fiefdom. Draggy carried the wrapped rebars that Bangul adorably pooped out for them. They spent all day flying until the sun started setting west from the middle of the sky and eventually became replaced by the moon. That was when they arrived in the capital.

“All right. We’re going to the capital to have a meeting with the queen, but you’re too big to come into the palace. So, what did I tell you to do?”

Clack! Clack!

Draggy made an earnest gesture in response to Lloyd's question. Lloyd's lips curled into a contented smile. “Okay, good. You gave the correct answer. Stay here and play until we return. How should you store the rebars until then?”

Clack?

“Right. That's correct. You can’t unwrap the oiled paper and expose the rebars to humidity. Do you see that flat rock over there? It looks like the perfect place to play with rebars to kill time.”

Claaack!

“Good boy,” praised Lloyd. “You’re a good boy. Go play over there. Oh, and don’t follow any strangers, even if they offer you candy. But don’t bite or step on them, either. Got it?”

Clack! Stomp! Stomp! Draggy joyfully ran forward with the rebars in its hands. With that sight, Lloyd and Javier crossed into the capital. Although it had been a while since their last visit, the city was as busy as always. The two broke through the crowds and entered the palace. Thankfully, this proved to be a straightforward process.

“Welcome Lloyd Frontera, the meritorious retainer of the imperial family and eldest son of the Frontera family, to the palace. This way, please.”

As soon as Lloyd’s identity was confirmed, the royal guards’ attitudes toward him drastically changed. One of the palace officials hurried out to personally escort him inside upon after receiving a message.

“It is a great honor for me to escort the meritorious retainer of the imperial family. May I ask your reason for visiting the palace today?”

“Oh, I’m here to meet the queen,” replied Lloyd.

“Her Majesty, Lord Lloyd?”

“Yes, I have an urgent matter to report to her. Could it be that I stopped by the palace too late at night?” Lloyd asked, just in case.

The official motioned with his hand. “No, that's not it. It's just that Her Majesty is in a meeting with a few officials at the moment, and I'm not sure if she'll be able to see you immediately... But regardless, I'll notify her of your arrival.”

“That alone would be much appreciated. Thank you.”

For a split second, the official hovered as if he had something to say. Eventually, he managed, “Um... Please forgive me, but you do not have to speak to me so kindly. I am just a lowly palace official...”

“Not at all,” replied Lloyd, smiling gently. “I insist on it.”

“I see. Please wait here for a second. Well then,” he said before taking off.

The wait time, to Lloyd’s relief, wasn’t very long. When the official came back, his face was filled with a bright smile.

“Her Majesty has agreed to see you. Please. I will escort you to her, Lord Lloyd.”

“I appreciate it. Also, did the queen happen to have a message for me by any chance?”

The official stopped and looked at Lloyd. “Oh, there was one thing she ordered me to tell you on our way to her.”

“What was it?”

Sheepishly, the official uttered, "Lloyd Frontera, even now, you only come to visit when there’s something you want from me. What a cheeky and spiteful man you are." He cleared his throat afterward.

Okay, this isn’t going to be an easy day, Lloyd thought to himself as he followed the man into the main palace with a bitter smile. After passing through countless corridors and stairs, he arrived at the palace's largest and most magnificent room, the “Hall of the Ruler.”

The hall was massive, with an oppressive amount of space. He walked down the red carpet in the center of the floor, came to a halt near the throne, and got down on one knee. “I, Lloyd Frontera, the meritorious retainer of the imperial family, am honored to be in the audience of the rightful ruler of this land.” He announced while looking around him.

Is the meeting still ongoing?

There were a lot of people in the hall. Queen Magentano was sitting on her throne, and there were dozens of people lined up on both sides of the red carpet. Among them, Lloyd recognized a few familiar faces.

That man is the Head of the House of Peers. The rest of the people here are nobles who hold considerable power in the capital.

It wasn’t an understatement to say that almost all influential officials of the kingdom were gathered here. This put a big smile on Lloyd’s face.

Perfect.

It was his natural reaction as he thought about what he was about to do from now on. His plan would be more likely to succeed with more witnesses who possessed great influence and status. This was the ideal scenario he envisioned in his head. He waited while having these thoughts to himself.

“Lloyd Frontera, raise your head,” came Queen Magentano’s voice.

Lloyd raised his head in response to the queen's command. He then prayed desperately in his heart, remembering his deal with Gabriel and hoping to obtain the Tears of Summer with the angel's help soon.

All right, Minster. It’s your turn now. Three! Two! One!

The moment Lloyd counted to three...

Fwoosh! A brilliant ray of light suddenly filled the hall as an angel from Heaven descended down with his wings spread wide open. Lloyd's lips curled in satisfaction as the officials were overcome with fear and admiration. Everything went as planned.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 334: To Take Advantage of a Prophecy (2)

Angels. The lovely and divine souls of Heaven. Despite the widely acknowledged fact that angels promote warmth and goodness in the world, punish evil souls, and save humans, Queen Magentano did not ever believe in their existence. Not once. Never in her entire life.

Obviously. Angels? How could there be so many unfortunate mishaps, tragic accidents, sad goodbyes, and wrongful deaths in this world if angels exist?

The existence of Hell would be a hundred times more believable. This world was a horrible place. Her thoughts wandered back to her life before ascending to the throne.

She had been last in line for succession, having been born into a distant collateral family of the imperial house. But she defeated all her competitors one by one until she was crowned queen. There were all kinds of filthy fights and acts of deception that happened throughout this process. Alicia even had to get her hands dirty at times. In this period, she naturally came to believe there was no such thing as Heaven, even if Hell existed. There may be demons cursing people, but certainly no angels blessing them. In her eyes, the world was a cesspool of selfishness teeming with evil crooks and schemers. It was no different now.

Her eyes became icy as soon as the angel appeared, radiating a divine outburst of light. When the angel folded his wings, landed on the red carpet, carefully scanned the hall, and opened his mouth to speak, her hands darted to her sword. She believed that the creature couldn't be an angel, and even if he was, her sword strike would be ineffective.

Her gaze met the angel's just as she was about to act on her deathly thoughts. “Queen of the humans. You have no reason to be hostile toward me. I am not an enemy or object of worship.”

Queen Magentano stared at the angel without saying anything.

“I am here to relay the will of the heavens and nothing else.”

Queen Magentano finally removed her hand from her sword. However, it wasn’t because she was afraid of him.

Could Lloyd Frontera possibly have something to do with this so-called angel appearance?

Queen Magentano suddenly became suspicious. She had been in the middle of a meeting with her officials when Lloyd walked in and asked for an audience with her.

Since he is the imperial family’s meritorious retainer, I happily said yes. Furthermore, it’s more advantageous for me to keep him close by and stop him from getting any ideas.

The fact that Lloyd Frontera's family had become more powerful than the imperial family was kept hidden from the general public. Instead of raising a mutiny and coveting her powers, Lloyd asked for her to help him live a lazy and relaxed life as a bum. And, at Lloyd's suggestion, they quickly became political allies.

As such, she realized that it would look good on her to meet with Lloyd in front of the nobles gathered here. That was why she agreed to his request for an audience with her. In the presence of the nobles, she wanted to cement her mutually beneficial political partnership with Lloyd.

Yet, that angel emerged as soon as he appeared in front of me.

That couldn’t be a coincidence. Impossible, she thought.

Lloyd Frontera. What are you up to?

Her gaze drifted to Lloyd, who was not even looking at her. His gaze was instead fixed on the ground, his head down, and only the back of his head visible. That sight intensified her annoyance toward him, and she felt compelled to rush over and slap his chestnut-shaped head.

I am certain. It is his doing. He must have devised this entire situation like he has always been doing, racking his brain to get something out of me.

Her thoughts returned to Lloyd's actions up to this point. He was always like this, never crossing the line but carefully tiptoeing near it, displaying a masterful level of balance. And he used to get what he wanted by doing so. The most recent example of this was...

The Heart of Winter.

It was a divine item of the Magentano family. But it had become his now, though not purposefully. Nevertheless, it had become his in the end.

And yet, he shows up here to acquire something from me again as if the Heart of Winter was not enough.

Her gaze toward Lloyd sharpened. A faint, cynical smile hung on her face.

If you think I am easy prey, I may have to change my mind on you as well.

She decided to let this strange and dramatic situation play out while she figured out what Lloyd Frontera was up to. The angel spread his wings of light and walked toward Lloyd just as her eyes glowed with determination.

“Human Lloyd Frontera,” the angel said in a holy voice. “Lift up your head.”

But Lloyd didn't immediately raise his head. He couldn't do it. He needed to fix the expression on his face first.

Yes! It worked. My plan worked. So... Don’t smile. Keep a straight face.

He struggled and bit his lower lip to remove the smile from his face. But the corners of his mouth stubbornly raised upwards. His reaction was understandable, given that his plan to bring an angel into the palace had been perfectly executed.

As I expected of the minister, you are the best angel of Heaven who never lies! I knew I could trust you!

He was concerned about the possibility of Gabriel breaking his promise. However, to his relief, the latter did send an angel down to him.

Okay. Work on your face. The queen must have figured out the situation by now, but I'm sure everyone else is still clueless. I can never expose my true intentions to the officials here.

Hardening his resolve, Lloyd bit the tip of his tongue.

Ack!

The pain brought tears to his eyes, and he lost his smile. Finally, he raised his head to the angel in front of him while trying to hide his crumpled face and eyes wet from the stinging pain.

"Ded yo... Coll me?" Lloyd said brokenly.

The angel cocked his head to the side.

"Oh. My tongue... I mean, I bit my tongue out of surprise. I apologize. Please forgive my impertinence," whimpered Lloyd.

"It is... fine." The angel forcibly smiled.

Calmly, Lloyd asked, "May I ask why you have come here to look for me..."

"I am here to send you a message from Heaven."

"Excuse me?" blurted Lloyd in feigned shock, opening up his eyes theatrically.

The angel gave Lloyd a wry smile as his mind replayed the direct order he was given from Gabriel, who handed him a scroll and told him to appear where Lloyd was currently standing. The minister had explained he had signed a contract with Lloyd Frontera and needed to help the human.

Flap! The angel brought out a scroll from his inner pocket and recited its content.

“Human Lloyd Frontera,” the angel said. “You have been specially given a fateful prophecy today. You will be in possession of the ‘Tears of Summer’ from the House of Magentano.”

“Whaat?” gaped Lloyd.

“You will not be able to avoid your destiny, and it is the will of the heavens. Nothing more.”

Baaang! The scroll emitted a brilliant ray of light as soon as the angel finished, filling up the hall and illuminating Lloyd with it. Everyone in the scene became wide-eyed.

Some of the officials stared at Lloyd, unable to speak. Others covered their mouths with their hands. There were even those who forgot how to breathe at the moment. As if the angel's descension wasn't impressive enough, he made a mysterious announcement that stunned everyone. A slew of nobles, royal guards, and palace servants hushed into a grave silence.

Amid the silence, Lloyd asked with dismay, “Um, Your Grace? Please wait a minute.”

“Do speak, Human Lloyd Frontera,” permitted the angel.

Lloyd tried to look as confused as possible. “Yes, what in the world is going on? Why are you giving me a prophecy, and what does it have anything to do with the divine item-”

“It is the will of the heavens,” replied the angel on the surface. But deep down, he inwardly bawled that it was Gabriel's will, which you tasked him with. What an evil conman you are, even capable of scamming demons without a doubt. Thanks to your lie-for-me request, he locked himself in the chest of repentance. Instead of attacking Lloyd, however, the angel maintained his composure and put on an elegant act to hide his emotions with great effort.

Lloyd, on the other hand, purposefully expressed his dismay more strongly as time passed. And he prayed quietly...

Okay! Now that you've given the prophecy, it's time for you to leave now! Amen! Hallelujah! Merciful Buddha!

His fervent prayer appeared to have been answered. Or it could also be possible that the angel understood Lloyd's message through his gaze. After a quick scan of the room, the angel made a comment that effectively ended this shocking incident.

"Moreover, the people here in this realm will bear witness to the prophecy recited today. Let Heaven's will come true."

Fwoosh! Then, a divine and radiant light exploded inside the room. Everyone squeezed their eyes shut tightly from how blinding it was.

And a little while later, by the time all the officials opened their eyes, the angel was gone. They looked at each other with a look of daze from the unbelievable event that just unfolded. At last, they realized...

For the first time in the history of the Magentano Imperial Family, an angel appeared and recited a prophecy for the future. This was a historic moment.

***

"Is there anything you need to tell me?" asked Queen Magentano suggestively.

"Mhm... I don't," denied Lloyd.

"Really?" She frowned.

"No, Your Majesty."

"Truly?"

"No, Your Majesty."

Losing patience, she asked in an annoyed tone. "Is that all you can say? No, Your Majesty?"

“Not at all, Your Majesty.”

“Then, why is that your only answer?”

“Ah, um, that’s-”

“That is what?” asked Queen Magentano.

“I do not know what I should say... Please forgive me.”

“Forgive you”?

Lloyd shortly answered, “Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Hah, I would not dislike you as much as I do if you knew how to keep your mouth shut.” Queen Magentano sighed deeply and studied Lloyd, who was sitting across from her at the table. “I summoned you for one reason. I would like to ask you something.”

“What is it that you wish to ask-”

“I am sure you have an idea of what already.”

Thinking for a second, he finally said, “Yes, I do, Your Majesty.”

“Then, tell me yourself.”

“Yes, Your Majesty, I have a feeling it is about the angel that descended down earlier.”

“Precisely.” A smile flashed across her face for a second and disappeared. Her eyes suddenly grew colder. “How do you explain why an angel emerged the moment you were granted an audience with me during your abrupt visit here?”

“...”

“Could this situation really be a coincidence?”

“...”

“If not, was it something you intentionally planned?”

“Your Majesty.” Finally, Lloyd spoke.

“Speak.”

“This is unfair.”

Queen Magentano was dumbstruck. “You think this is unfair?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd sat up straight, quickly giving a scan of her office.

There are three people near the queen. Two people in front of the office door. One on the other side of the wall.

They were all a royal knight. Lloyd could tell from listening to their breathing pattern...

All three of them are high-level sword experts.

Which also meant they would be suffering from the swordmaster syndrome. Which then meant that this conversation with the queen would be audible in their ears.

That won’t do.

Lloyd inwardly shook his head. This pivotal conversation between them would mark the start of Lloyd’s collaboration with the queen to actualize his grand plan.

And so, I need to keep this a secret. No one can know about this conversation between us. That includes the royal knights.

No one could know about his secret. It didn't matter if they were the royal knights or not. Because of this, no one could hear even a word of their conversation from now on. Otherwise, the queen would be forced to reject his offer.

I'm about to strike a deal with her and acquire the Tears of Summer in return.

But if their negotiation was overheard, Queen Magentano would be thrown into a political whirlwind and regarded as a disastrous queen who struck a deal with a lowly noble to give away a divine item of the imperial family.

Anyone with malicious intentions would jump at the chance to start such a juicy scandal. I wouldn't want to get sucked into that kind of political nightmare if I were her, either. So, in that case, she would flatly reject the deal, whatever its terms are. It would be far too troublesome for her to accept.

As a result, Lloyd knew he needed to lessen the political burden this negotiation would place on her shoulders in order to pave the way for a successful negotiation. And that meant making sure the conversation stayed between the two of them.

I need to find a place for us to talk.

As soon as he reached this conclusion, Lloyd racked his brain for a solution. And, looking her in the eyes, Lloyd made a suggestion that was too sweet for the queen to refuse.

"Your Majesty," suggested Lloyd. "Do you have any desire to torture and beat me until I'm a bloody pulp?"

"What?"

Queen Magentano's eyes widened slightly, and he quickly caught the faint change in them.

As expected, it worked.

Lloyd licked his lips with a mysterious smile while thinking of an even sweeter deal he had in mind that the queen wouldn't be able to refuse.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 335: The Shortcut to Becoming a Hegemon (1)

“Your Majesty,” suggested Lloyd. “Do you have any desire to torture and beat me into a bloody pulp?”

“What...?” Slightly widened eyes. Knitted brows. Lloyd was convinced the moment he noticed these changes in her expression.

It worked.

Lloyd held back his smile. He knew that the offer he had just given the queen was too tempting for her to deny.

Of course, it is. She secretly, no, obviously hates me. I wouldn’t be surprised if she’s wanted to hit me more than once throughout all my visits to her.

That was something Lloyd had noticed for a long time. The queen's gaze toward him had a fierceness reminiscent of a wild animal at times.

Well. I was pretty unruly toward the queen quite a few times. I’ve leeched off her without bothering to hide the fact before too. Though, of course, it doesn’t mean that she lost anything because of me.

It was the exact opposite. Queen Magentano gained countless things thanks to his achievements. But that didn't stop her from spiting Lloyd, and he was aware of her feelings. It was for this reason that Lloyd devised this plan, which involved intentionally exploiting her emotions and desires toward him. He then offered her a deal that would be too attractive for her to deny.

Lloyd rattled on, “As such, Your Majesty, I, Lloyd Frontera, would like to dare raise my sword at you at the training hall.”

She was thoroughly piqued. “A duel? Against me?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Are you challenging me to a duel?” Suddenly, the corners of her lips rose.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd.

“Could you mean now?” There was excitement in her voice. “Immediately?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Why is that?”

“It’s my way of providing a more special response to your earlier question,” replied Lloyd, vaguely dodging her question. But Alicia Magentano was a ruler of a kingdom at the end of the day. She immediately deciphered the hidden meaning behind his ambiguous response.

“You are bothered by who will be able to hear your response here,” she guessed. “Am I right?”

Lloyd was impressed. “I am thankful for how well you understand me, Your Majesty.”

“Is this conversation something that can’t be overheard by others?”

“I ask Your Majesty to make that judgment after hearing me out,” replied Lloyd.

“How impertinent,” huffed Queen Magentano, giving a tap to the desk with a finger.

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Truly?”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty...”

“Tsk... You always have a response to everything.”

“I am filled with gratitu... no, I mean, please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

For an instant, she wondered if he was behaving this way on purpose to provoke her into beating the filth out of him. Her pupils constricted. “Your suggestion appears to be an invitation to beat you if I can even dare do it. Did I understand you correctly?”

“How could I-”

“You have become a swordmaster. Did you not?”

Lloyd suddenly felt exposed. “You realized... Your Majesty?”

“Of course.” Queen Magentano nodded. She noticed it as soon as Lloyd appeared before her in the hall. She was amazed and stupefied by his elevation to the status of a swordmaster.

He was only a mid-level sword expert the last time I saw him. However, he became a swordmaster within a few months of our previous meeting.

She felt a sense of curiosity and competitiveness rise in her. At the same time, she was resentful.

“Good,” she finally agreed. “I appreciate you recognizing my desire to beat you to death whether you are a swordmaster or not. It also wouldn’t be right for me to turn down your heartfelt plea as a ruler of a country.”

“Does that mean,” asked Lloyd excitedly. “You will accept my request for a duel?”

“Only if you are ready to be slashed to death by my wooden sword.”

A look of horror came over Lloyd’s face.

“Let us go.” Queen Magentano stood up, her heart racing at the prospect of releasing all her stress with this opportunity. She had been under a lot of mental strain recently from managing the kingdom. She and Lloyd left her office and went to the training hall, where she ordered all the guards and their commander to stay away from the area and all the nearby premises.

Whoosh...

There were only two of them in the training hall tonight. Queen Magentano stood directly below the moonlit sky, holding a wooden sword. She laughed after glancing at the knights who had retreated far into the distance from her. “Will this do?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd replied as he opened his mobile foldable shovel. “Even if their ears are sharp, the clanging noise from our weapons will prevent them from hearing our conversation.”

“Certainly, and I’m sure that’s what you want to happen.”

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty, for only being able to give you a response through such an inconvenient method.”

“Do not be, for you can pay for your guilt with your body instead of your mouth.

“...”

“I hope your skills won’t let me down. Now, come at me.”

Step. The energy around her changed even though all she did was slightly change the angle of her foot.

Grrrr...

Her mana rotated and reverberated with the force of a powerful, seasoned fighter, filling the air with a thick energy of hostility. Lloyd nervously swallowed. The queen wasn’t anyone to look down on, as expected. It was evident that she had no intention of going easy on him.

Her intensity is on another level from Javier’s.

With Javier, there was surprisingly less pressure on him due to their enormous difference in skill. However, because the queen was only marginally better than him, the fight felt more combative between them. Regardless, Lloyd did not let himself become intimidated.

I’m a swordmaster too, after all.

Despite their disparity in skills, he believed he could manage quite well as long as he made an effort to fight with everything he had. He would at least be able to talk while blocking her attacks.

This is the only way I can secretly make a deal with the queen away from the countless royal guards who stay by her side for 24 hours a day.

The queen’s security had been ramped up ever since the assassination attempt against her. As such, this kind of opportunity didn’t come easily.

So, I must endure her attacks and say what needs to be said. If I can pull this off, my grand plan will come true. I will really be able to get my hands on the Tears of Summer.

Lloyd made a firm decision. Exactly half a second later, his new resolve was shattered with a single strike.

Fwoosh! Lloyd saw a tsunami charging at him. That was how her aura storm looked in his eyes.

Ack!!

Lloyd’s heart sank, and he instantly lifted his shovel and blasted out mana. Boooom!

It was only a clash between a wooden sword and a shovel. However, the force produced the same sound as an exploding grenade and shoved Lloyd about six yards backward.

Ack!

He was afraid his hands would wear away from the force. The massive impact moved through the body of his shovel to his hands in an instant, numbing his senses. The problem was that this wasn't the final attack from the queen.

Slaaash! Boom!

“...!”

The wooden sword rained down on Lloyd like an unstoppable storm even before he had been fully pushed backward.

Ack! Come on! Wait! Wait a moment!

He wanted to shout at her to stop, but there was no chance for him to do so. From that moment on, he busily moved his shovel to make it out of the fight alive.

Head! Shoulders! Knee! Feet! Knee! Feet!

He blocked, dodged, evaded, resisted, defended, and bounced off the queen's attacks. In the process, he caught a glimpse of her face.

She's happily smiling! Dammit!

While Lloyd was struggling to keep from getting hit and dying, Queen Magentano was beaming like a joyful newlywed who had just bought a new house in Manhattan.

"Lloyd Frontera," she breathed out. "Did you not request a duel because you have something to tell me in secret?"

Clang! Boom! Crash!

"Argh! Umph! Ack!"

"I am sure you did not request for a duel to have me listen to your strange grunts."

Thwack! Crash! Boom!

"Argh..! Ahh! Ack!" squealed Lloyd.

"Should I go easy on you if you're having trouble answering?"

"Yes! I love you, Alicia!" Lloyd shouted.

Queen Magentano's went wide-eyed in horror.

“No, Queen Alicia, that is!”

She felt a shaft of repulsion.

“N-no, that’s not what I meant! Your Majesty! Please!” begged Lloyd, correcting himself.

“I think I just heard something eerily absurd.”

Crack! Clang! Boom! Clang! Crash!

“Aaack! Ehek! Gyack! The thing is!”

“Speak to me softly.” Her attacks relaxed a little, but they were still lethal enough to leave a serious injury if he let his guard down. Closely defending and dodging each blow, Lloyd spoke.

“Th-the, urk! The thing is the angel back there! Emph!”

Claaang! Thwack! His words were silenced by the collision and shock waves between them. As a result, Lloyd was able to continue freely speaking without worrying about the royal guards overhearing them.

“You are right. I called the angel down to the palace.”

“What?”

Crash! Her attacks suddenly grew fiercer for a moment. Managing to closely wield his shovel to parry the incoming sword against him, Lloyd responded, “To cut the story short, I am in dire need of the Tears of Summer, one of the divine items of the imperial family, Your Majesty.”

“...”

“Ack!! Gack! Ack!!”

Boom! Crash! Boom!

“Please let me explain myself, Your Majesty,” begged Lloyd. “You will not lose anything from heeding my request, either.”

“I won’t lose anything from this? Me?”

“Y-yes... Ack! Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Continue.”

Clang! Clang! Slash! The wooden sword swung forward, aiming for Lloyd's throat. A total of 112 thrusts swept the air, with seven strands of aura glinting between the sixteen brilliant shifts. Lloyd was able to block each attack with a small step back.

Clang Clang Clang!!! Amid the shock waves that burst in series with each collision, Lloyd continued his response.

“The thing is, the, ack! It’s because of the Heart of Winter I came to possess a while ago.”

“Because of the Heart of Winter?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd leaped a little to avoid another attack. “The divine item I absorbed is slowly killing me.”

“Killing you? How?”

“Its frigid energy is slowly accumulating inside my heart. Even if I try to discharge some, it is only a temporary solution. If anything, it spreads further across my body.”

“And so, you are dying?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Clang! Clang! Lloyd gave his first counterattack against the queen after blocking all of her 112 blows toward him. His move wasn't anything spectacular, a slight swinging of his shovel. However, he was able to cover a large area with his shovel with the help of a large amount of mana and a strong aura. Swoosh!

“...!”

Queen Alicia’s face hardened for the first time during their fight. Realizing that this was a duel wherein Lloyd was allowed to attack back, she held her sword up and wielded it upward. Clack!

The sword strike neatly cut through the shovel's force. The queen took advantage of that split-second of time to leap forward and slash into Lloyd's neck. But it was obstructed by his quick repositioning of his shovel. Clatter!

When the two weapons collided, Queen Magentano threw her sword into the sky, stretching her free hand, and grasped the back of Lloyd’s neck.

“...!”

Without any chance to react, Lloyd was winded by her quick knee-kick. Thwack!

“Argh!”

Lloyd’s body bent forward. A satisfied smile appeared on Queen Alicia’s face.

“Let me confirm whether you are telling the truth.” She immediately placed her other hand on Lloyd’s chest.

Swoosh! Swish! She then pushed out mana through her hand, quickly studying and inspecting Lloyd’s heart and its surrounding organs. The look in her eyes changed.

“You are telling the truth...”

“Please believe... Ack! Words fall short of my gratitude toward you, Your Majesty. Ugh. Haa...”

Lloyd stepped back as he panted heavily. The knee-kick he received made it difficult for him to breathe. But the conversation was far from over. He had to deafen his words with the shock waves, which meant the duel had to keep on. Lloyd pointed his shovel at the queen. She quickly understood and extended her hand as well. The sword that had been thrown into the sky fell right into her grasp.

Clang! This time, they both charged at each other. The sword and shovel collided with aura, knocking each other back a step.

Queen Magentano smiled fiercely, “Okay, I understand that you are telling the truth. But so what? Why should I bestow you this divine item simply because your life is in danger?”

"Of course, I know nothing is free in this world." The House of Magentano was not a charity. It didn't matter whether he was sick or not. Even if he was dying, it wasn’t enough of a justification to be bestowed the Tears of Summer. "As such, I have an offer."

“Tell me.”

“How about I outline what incredible benefit there is for you to give me the Tears of Summer, Your Majesty?”

“Incredible benefit?” She attempted to pierce his chest.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd, dodging it sideways.

Clang! Clang! Clang! Clang! The wooden sword and shovel then collided once more in series. Sweat beads that began to form on his brow splattered into the air and landed on her shirt sleeves. Lloyd's cheek was hit with the sweat droplets on her jaw. Lloyd looked her in the eyes and spoke while slowly adjusting to the style of combat between them, which involved the use of auras, something unique to swordmasters.

“If you give me the Tears of Summer... I promise to do a construction that will ensure the Magentano family’s hegemony over the kingdom for the next thousand years.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 336: The Shortcut to Becoming a Hegemon (2)

“I promise to do a construction that will ensure the Magentano family’s hegemony over the kingdom for the next thousand years.”

“Hmm?”

Wham! Their wooden sword and shovel resumed their violent clash, creating shockwaves and a ringing noise all around them. Beads of sweat scattered across the air at the same time. In the midst of the storm, Queen Magentano raised her brow and locked her gaze on Lloyd, who had his weapon raised against her own.

"Did you just promise me that this deal will have an incredible benefit for the imperial family?" she inquired.

“Yes, I did, Your Majesty.”

“You mean one that would be tantamount to the loss of the Tears of Summer,” she added as an afterthought.

“Without a doubt,” promised Lloyd. His voice dripped with confidence.

“But how strange.”

“Pardon me?” Lloyd cocked his head to the side.

Queen Alicia’s lips curled into a hostile smirk. “A deal that will guarantee the Magentano family 1,000 years of hegemony over the kingdom? It never occurred to me until today that you were so well-versed in bluffing.”

“Oh!” gasped Lloyd, “This is not a bluff—”

Slash! Just then, the movement of her sword suddenly became fiercer. Her attacks had come down at him in a series of short and rapid strikes before. But now, her blows had more force behind them as if they were trying to pierce through him. Lloyd, who was about to clear her doubt, failed to adapt to this change.

“Argh!”

Thwack! Her weighty blow was like a giant's ax bent to sever its foe. Lloyd managed to raise his shovel just in time before being struck. However, even then, the world around him went black as though he had passed out. Lloyd's stomach turned at the same time, unsurprisingly.

Argh! Ack!

He felt like his stomach had been struck with a hammer at least one hundred times. His knees buckled halfway, and his back curled awkwardly into a bow. Unfortunately, he was not given the opportunity to rest and regain his balance.

“Your head will get struck by my sword if you continue spacing out,” warned Queen Magentano.

Fwoosh! Lloyd instantly noticed the second attack coming to get him.

It’s too late for me to block her sword!

Upon this realization, Lloyd flung himself forward into the ground and did a somersault, dodging her second attack by a hair's breadth.

Boom!

Before he could finish his somersault, Lloyd heard a menacing cry as the queen’s sword hit the ground and created a hole. He broke out in a cold sweat and abruptly added, “I am not bluffing, Your Majesty.”

Queen Magentano, however, continued attacking. She swung her sword from the ground. Swooosh!

Lloyd realized in horror that her attacks would at least shatter all the ribs on his left side if he was hit. “All I would need to do is pave a trade route in the Pantara Range, Your Majesty!” he yelled, trying to move out of her attack range.

“What?” Her wooden sword came to a halt an inch before it struck Lloyd's left ribs. She tilted her head. “What nonsense are you babbling?”

“Your Majesty,” said Lloyd calmly. “It is not nonsense or a bluff. I am being completely serious right now.”

“You are?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Really?” asked Queen Magentano again.

“I am,” Lloyd spoke without any hint of uncertainty in his voice.

“Then, let us continue this bloody fight.” Queen Magentano chuckled, stealing a quick glance beyond the training hall. Her intention was crystal clear. The guards could potentially hear their conversation from where they were just beyond the walls. And so, they needed to continue clashing their weapons together to create noise.

Lloyd gave a weak smile of understanding. “W-words fall short of my gratitude toward you, Your Majesty...” He wondered if he'd be able to come out of their conversation unscathed. Nonetheless, he gripped his shovel tightly and got into action. He did not wait for her this time. He went after her first.

I’ll be cornered if I let her attack first!

The queen was stronger than him, and Lloyd knew that for certain. That didn’t change even when he used the Asrahan Core Technique against her. As such, he needed to keep attacking if he wanted to have some room to breathe in the fight like now. Lloyd clumsily swung his shovel in the air while occasionally attempting a sharp jab toward his opponent.

“Hmm?” Amusement appeared in the queen’s eyes. She effortlessly parried his jabs with her sword.

Clang! Clash! Clang! Clang! Clanggg!

Lloyd spoke first amid the racket. “First and foremost, Your Majesty, I have one thing to ask you. Are you aware of the length or area of the Pantara Range located southwest of our continent?”

“How dare you?” retorted Queen Magentano sharply. “Are you testing me?”

“Please forgive me, but yes...” replied Lloyd weakly.

“It runs about 430 miles long, and its highest point is Mountain Pantara, which has a height of 18,700 feet. The mountain stretches from the southeast to the northwest, slightly leaning in that direction. Is my answer good enough for you?”

“Excellent, Your Majesty,” commented Lloyd humbly. “But there’s one specific point you left out.”

“Oh, you mean the peculiar terrain of the mountain.”

“That is right, Your Majesty.”

“Must I mention every little detail like that?” huffed Queen Magentano.

Lloyd ventured. “It should certainly be in your knowledge.”

Feeling challenged, Queen Magentano added. “Compared to its towering height and length, the mountain range is extremely narrow. A mere few miles wide, it resembles a giant partition. The great height and narrow width of the range make it the steepest one in the world.”

“Excellent, Your Majesty,” commented Lloyd. “And so, the Pantara Range is also called the ‘The Knife Placed by God.’”

Lloyd smiled brightly even as he continued throwing jabs with his shovel toward the queen, who blocked all of his attacks. All the points they discussed were accurate. The Pantara Range was the harshest and most accursed mountain range on the continent of Lorasia. Its peak was at 18,700 feet above sea level and averaged approximately 13,700 feet in overall height. Despite its towering height, the range was only a few miles wide, making it dangerously steep and dotted with menacing cliffs. It looked like there were knives or potato chips placed upright across the entire land.

Otherwise, a folding screen would work perfectly too.

Of course, the mountain range didn’t naturally come to have this kind of terrain. It was said to be fairly ordinary before Dragon Kaisertus destroyed the land into its current form when he was wreaking havoc on the world one thousand or so years ago.

That’s what the novel said. And the dragon got destroyed by Dragon King Verkis later on.

Lloyd organized his thoughts with the origin of the mountain range. "The peculiar terrain and dangerous slope of the Pantara Range have become an obstacle for the southwestern region in terms of trade," Lloyd said, reflecting on his grand vision. “Isn't it, Your Majesty?"

“Indeed.” She nodded, for it was true. “Only a handful of hunters, adventurers, and seasoned merchants are able to cross the harsh mountain range at the risk of losing their lives.”

“You are correct. The only people capable of crossing the range are locals familiar with the land and season adventurers. This makes it impossible for large shipments to pass through.”

“Yet, you plan to pave a trade route here?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. There will be incredible benefits that follow if I succeed,” Lloyd tactfully changed his tone of voice while noisily exchanging blows with the queen. All the while, he never stopped speaking as he controlled his breath. “Please think it over, Your Majesty. Currently, it’s impossible to do trade beyond the southwest because of the Pantara Range.”

“Right,” she affirmed. “The only existing trade routes are the southeast and northwest roads that go around the range.”

“That is right. Those roads needlessly go on for hundreds of miles and only arrive at the southwest after passing through two kingdoms, resulting in exorbitant costs from customs duties and distribution fees.”

“Are you suggesting that your plan will solve all these problems?” asked Queen Magentano, interested.

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

Paving a direct path would eliminate the need for a nearly 600-mile journey around the range. It went without saying that the road, around 62 miles long, would save time and provide incredible benefits.

The new trade route would have similar economic benefits resulting from the construction of the Suez Canal or Panama Canal.

Lloyd's thoughts turned to similar examples of the situation on Earth. The Suez Canal allowed ships to travel directly between Europe and Asia without having to circumnavigate Africa's Cape of Good Hope, reducing the travel by thousands of miles. The Panama Canal on the American continent accomplished the same thing. The canal made it possible to travel directly from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic Ocean. There were countless economic benefits that came from these achievements. And this would likely be the same here too.

The southwestern kingdoms will be able to trade directly with us, creating an explosion in the distribution of various resources such as agricultural and processed goods. It would start the golden era of the commerce industry. The imperial family will also earn a profit from customs duties since they’ll be the ones managing the trade route.

The trade route was also advantageous from a military standpoint. It meant the queen could order a military procession into the southwest whenever she wanted at any time in the year.

The House of Magentano is already steadily establishing itself as a hegemon. They would reach new heights by opening this trade route. It's a comparable accomplishment to taking down five bases in Mooncraft right after the game starts, killing three barons in a row in the Summoner's Cliff, or having a newborn baby with an IQ of 200 who sleeps for eight hours straight without getting sick or crying. How cool is that?

The mere thought alone was dazzling. As such, this new trade route would promise a thousand years of hegemony over the kingdom to the House of Magentano, depending on how it was managed and used.

She won't be able to turn my offer down. Not a chance.

Lloyd was certain that this would be the case. This was a beneficial deal for the queen, even if it came at the expense of the Tears of Summer.

The divine item is being wasted inside the walls of the storage. But the trade route will be useful for hundreds of years once it is opened.

That was what Lloyd calculated. This was the most important part of his grand plan and what he spent the most time thinking over.

She should voice out her concern right about now.

Lloyd studied the queen's face while frantically moving his shovel to avoid being struck by her wooden sword. And Lloyd was correct. She gave him a frown.

"Lloyd Frontera, my loyal subject, your suggestion and offer are truly alluring. However, there are two things that I am concerned about."

"What are... Argh! What are they?"

Boom! Clang! Clang!

Their weapons emitted shock waves and fiery sparks as they clashed against each other.

“First,” she said in between the clanging noise. “The House of Peers will be divided over the matter because of the prophecy your angel announced today. Are you aware of this?”

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“Really?”

“Yes,” Lloyd said with a nod. “It was the first time an angel ever came down to the kingdom and gave a prophecy. The House of Peers will be divided into supporting and opposing factions for the prophecy.”

“That surely will be the case,” replied Queen Magentano wistfully.

“Yes, Your Majesty. The supporters of the prophecy will claim that I must be given the Tears of Summer and accuse the opponents of committing blasphemy.”

“You are right,” she agreed. “And the opposing faction will argue that bestowing the divine item to a mere servant of the imperial family like me is excessive, even with the divine prophecy. They will also accuse the supporters of the prophecy as traitors.”

“I expect them to. Is that not why you are worried about me?”

“Did you... already realize this?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd, of course, had the realization early on. “You will be placed in a difficult position because of the divided opinions of the officials with reasonable arguments on both sides. This will make it more difficult for you to choose one side.”

“That will likely be the case. Yet, you are offering to take the burden of choice over this matter off my shoulders.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” It would be correct to guess that Lloyd made the offer to make the following request to the queen. “Then, please give me a test.”

“A test?”

“Yes, I would like for you to entrust me with the road construction in the Pantara Range and make a decision depending on my success.”

“You mean the decision about whether to give you the Tears of Summer?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd in a softer voice. “Through this method, the supporters and opponents of the prophecy will accept whatever you say, as you will solely base your decision on the success of my construction.”

“And thus, it will lessen the political burden placed on me?”

“I am filled with gratitude that you understand me so well, Your Majesty.”

“Ha.” Queen Magentano chuckled. It was a clever strategy the longer she thought over his suggestion. At the same time, it demonstrated how much effort Lloyd put into devising such a scheme. “Are you saying if you succeed, the opposing faction will accept giving away one of the divine items of the imperial family as a new trade route would be just as valuable? But even if you fail, the supporters of the prophecy would accept my decision since it demonstrates that you are unworthy of receiving a divine item.”

“Precisely, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd as he clanged away the wooden sword wielded at him and thrust his weapon at her.

She will take up the offer. This is a complete win for her.

She had nothing to lose here. If Lloyd successfully completed the construction, she would obtain a golden goose for the small price of giving up the Tears of Summer. If he failed, she would not gain a new trade route but would not lose the Tears of Summer either. In both cases, there would be no loss on her side, and Lloyd displayed a transparent attitude toward the queen to further this point.

That is why I naturally revealed to her that I obtained the Heart of Winter rather than say I lost it. I figured she'd sensed that part already with her quick wit and expertise in political strategy. I decided that concealing the truth from her and making an excuse would make her lose trust in me.

That was why he openly told her about absorbing the Heart of Winter. That his life was at risk due to the side effects of having the divine item inside him.

The result of our conversation wasn't too bad.

And she naturally accepted his subtle confession, which confirmed that it was already on her mind that he had taken the Heart of Winter.

So, she will understand my intentions by now.

Lloyd was confident. But his intention must have been too plain.

Queen Magentano smirked meaningfully. "Ha. How insolent."

Thwaaack!

Right after she blocked Lloyd's shovel jab, she extended her hand and grabbed Lloyd's neck.

Thump!

She tightened her clench and strangled him. She put on a deathly smirk. "Are you trying to tempt me with an offer that I would lose nothing from?"

Lloyd coughed harshly. "Did you notice?"

"Of course." Her ghastly smirk turned wry. "But I understand enough that your offer is appealing regardless. Now, I will voice my second concern."

"Please do so, Your Majesty," Lloyd muttered.

"I will. You must have pegged me and the imperial family a fool. However, the House of Magentano has already made multiple attempts in the past to construct a trade route in the Pantara Range."

“I am well aware of that,” panted Lloyd.

“You are?” She raised her brow.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Then, you should be aware that every single one of the attempts failed.”

“Of course, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“So, how can you be so confident that your attempt will end in a success?”

“I see a way to succeed, Your Majesty.”

“A way?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Speak.” Her eyes flashed icily. It seemed to test Lloyd’s veracity.

Lloyd, on the other hand, was unfazed. “Yes, Your Majesty. I will successfully carry out the construction through...” Lloyd out a breath as if he had anticipated her reaction and question. His response was confident and unreserved like a seasoned teacher providing the solution to a question on the SAT. “Building a narrow-gauge railroad with loops and switchbacks.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 337: The Shortcut to Becoming a Hegemon (3)

The Pantara Range, located southwest of the kingdom, was an impassable natural barrier with several layers of steep cliffs. In addition to its rocky terrain, the land’s climate was harsh. Its weather was erratic, and there were frequent blizzards that came without warning.

But the land was far too valuable to be neglected. A trade route that cut through the range would bring massive benefits by saving the time it took to go around it instead. All of the former monarchs of the House of Magentano believed that this trade route would elevate the kingdom's status. As a result, they expended enormous effort to build a road through the range. A total of nine monarchs attempted the construction. But they all failed for one simple reason.

There were too many technical difficulties. With the royal developers’ civil engineering expertise, all they could even attempt to do was lay down a plank road.

Queen Magentano bit her lips tightly. Plank roads were used as a way to build a path on top of steep cliffs. The first step to build one was to dig holes in the ground for the stakes that would be placed down next. Once the stakes were inserted, planks would be laid on top of them. This process was repeated until a plank road appeared along a cliff.

But there were too many issues with the road.

She recalled the nine kings before her who attempted the construction and their reasons for failure.

A plank road could be built one way or another. However, it was impossible to maintain one. The wooden planks and stakes would begin to rot and crumble after two years of repeatedly getting soaked, freezing, and then thawing out in the range’s harsh climate.

The durability of the road quickly deteriorated in the harsh climate. Even with meticulous maintenance, it became unusable after two years. The structural limitations of the plank road itself also stymied the previous monarchs' plans.

The road was too narrow for more than one person to pass through. So, it didn’t have the capacity for a large number of people or shipments to travel at the same time even if it was built. There were also disastrous occasions when the road collapsed from being forced to carry multiple loads.

That wasn't the end of it. Once someone was on the road, it was impossible for them to change routes or turn back to where they came from. The road was too narrow, with a stone wall on one side and a cliff on the other.

Thus, the road was impossible to use as a trade route. It was a failure.

Thus, one of the previous monarchs had dared to make even bolder attempts.

The monarch attempted to widen and strengthen the road with metals. However, it failed because there was no way to transport the large and heavy construction materials while withstanding the range’s harsh climate. The plan led hundreds of laborers to die in just two months. Ultimately, the construction was eventually halted.

This was a summary of the former monarch’s past efforts. The House of Magentano had given up on building a trade route through the range after the last failure. They simply couldn’t carry out the construction with their current capabilities.

But what? Narrow gauge railroad? Loops? Switchbacks?

Queen Magentano jolted herself awake from her trance. A narrow gauge railroads. Loops. Switchbacks. All of these terms were new to her. Her expression toward Lloyd darkened, and her grip on his neck tightened. “Give me a more detailed explanation.”

Crunch!

“Weck...!” Lloyd squealed like a pig and helplessly stared at the queen. He then fumbled to point his finger at his neck, indicating that he was nearly suffocating and couldn't speak. His resistance caused her to realize her mistake and flinch, loosening her grip slightly. Instead of responding, however, Lloyd wrenched himself from the queen’s grip with one hand and shoved aside her wooden sword with his shovel.

Clang! Clang! Their auras pushed against one another, creating fire sparks and screeching noise.

“Are you asking me to describe the construction techniques I mentioned just now?” asked Lloyd amidst their fight.

“Yes, I am.”

“I am sorry, Your Majesty, but that will be difficult.”

“Difficult?” She frowned. “Do you not want to explain what loops or switchbacks are?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Queen Magentano grimaced further. “Why is that?”

“For it is my trade secret.”

Slash! Kaboom! Whack! Her sword strike became instantly fiercer. Lloyd answered, barely able to hold out against the queen’s attack. “Urgh! Ack! Eek! R-really... Please forgive me, but... But you could turn down my offer if I fully explain these techniques to you.”

“Do you possibly think I will start the construction by myself after hearing about your techniques?” asked Queen Magentano in disbelief.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Her eyes flashed with a glint of anger.

Crash! Clang! Thwack! Even though her sword strikes became more powerful, Lloyd was able to block them more effectively. Despite that, he put on a bitter smile at the same time.

I can't tell her too many details about the construction methods I planned to use. Though I doubt she'd do something as low as stealing my ideas, you never know what could happen.

He knew what their relationship was. They weren’t family or friends. They weren't comrades who looked out for each other. They were merely cooperating together as strategic partners with aligning interests.

So, even if I'm close to her, I should keep my distance. We're bound to end up in a muddy, messy fight the moment one of us gets too comfortable with the other.

They needed to establish a firm boundary and clearly outline their mutual interests and rights. This was the reason Lloyd refused to reveal his construction methods to her. It was also why he had never suggested this project to her until today.

I actually had this construction in mind before, but I had no particular reason to do it for her.

Lloyd had always known about the importance of this construction since the novel mentioned it three or four times as a long-held ambition of the House of Magentano. But Lloyd didn't bring it up or suggest it to her before because he didn't see the point of it.

Lloyd thought his course of action was obvious. After all, this was a major bargaining chip for him. He had been trying his best to avoid using it prematurely. Lloyd believed that this project would give him the upper hand in a future negotiation with the queen. That was why he finally revealed his trump card today to obtain the Tears of Summer.

Plus, this construction is feasible. I can get it done. A similar construction happened back in my world.

Lloyd suddenly recalled the narrow-gauge railroad back on Earth. It was the Darjeeling Himalayan Railway in India.

I think it was around 1870 when the United Kingdom colonized India. The British and their love for black tea. Those fanatics of black tea had the tendency to take out their wallets the moment they saw a good area to grow tea leaves wherever they went.

Coincidentally, a region known as Darjeeling piqued the interest of the British. The altitude was about 6,800 feet, and it was in the tropical plateau area, covered in thick fog all year because the warm air from the Bay of Bengal met the Himalayan mountains. The temperature difference in the day and night also created ideal conditions for growing high-quality black tea leaves.

That was why the British began to concentrate on Darjeeling, which was scarce at the time. They reasoned that establishing a black tea field and hiring thousands of laborers would yield enormous profits for them. However, they needed to build a road that would let them transport large amounts of goods and black tea leaves out of the field. But they realized the range had a rough terrain.

As a result, those tea-loving people built a railway in the mountains instead of using the existing carriage road, which took five to six days to travel one way. The goal of their construction was to create a way to safely transport bulks of goods and laborers between regular intervals of time.

The railroad was about fifty-four miles long, spiraling into the mountain. What was shocking was its extremely narrow gauge.

The “gauge” referred to the distance between two rails. South Korea adhered to the global standard interval of 4.7 feet. Countless trains, including the KTX, were built to operate on a narrow-gauge railroad of the same size. The one built by the British in Darjeeling, on the other hand, was only twenty-four inches!

Because it had to pass through the rugged and difficult mountain terrain, the scale of the construction and size of the train would increase if they tried to lay down wide tracks like a standard gauge railway. The project would also become more dangerous and difficult with it. As a result, they reduced the size of the gauge and train as much as they could without affecting the railway's ability to transport goods.

The British civil engineers then incorporated two more railway features on top of what they already had.

Thanks to these additions, they were able to install the railways across the steep terrains of the mountains without having to create almost any tunnels. The construction also took significantly less time than it would have otherwise. They were able to build an efficient and cost-effective supply transport route.

The outcome of the construction was the Darjeeling Himalayan Railway. Lloyd thought of creating a similar railway through the Pantara Range.

It's more than possible. I can get it done.

Lloyd was confident. It was all thanks to completing his research on the matter early on.

I looked through the Magentano construction records a long time ago and learned several things, such as how the main path along the mountains to set down the railway would be thirty-seven miles long and what the roughest and harshest areas of the range are.

Lloyd's research became the basis for his confidence and conviction. Not willing to reveal what he learned through his preparation process for free, Lloyd answered, "At any rate, please forgive me, but this is a trade secret that I keep to myself. As such, please make a decision, Your Majesty."

"Take it or leave it?"

"Yes, Queen Alicia," acknowledged Lloyd humbly. "For the House of Peers will call for me."

"I'm sure they will," she agreed. "Due to the prophecy from the angel."

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd was relieved that the queen was quick-witted. He didn't have to explain every little thing to her. She was able to see through his intentions, which made the conversation flow much easier. “I expect the House of Peers’ request for my appearance to arrive in three or four days,” Lloyd said brightly. “As Your Majesty stated, it will be due to the prophecy.”

“Yes. They will barrage you with various questions at the hearing. The proponents will try to prove the prophecy's legitimacy through your testimony, while those in the opposing faction will search for any flaws in your words and attitude to prove its invalidity.”

“Yes, that will be the case, Your Majesty.”

“Then,” Queen Magentano summarized. “You are saying that I should make a decision and act on it on the day of your hearing if I am to take up your offer. Is that what you mean?”

“That is exactly the case, Your Majesty.” Lloyd nodded.

“I see you are giving me some time to think.”

“I am overwhelmed that you take it that way.”

“Overwhelmed, my foot,” she huffed. “I can clearly see how you are struggling to avoid getting knocked out by one of my blows.”

Boom! Clang! Clang! Clang! It was true. Despite the fact that Lloyd was talking and explaining a lot, his body was flailing and dancing around to dodge her attacks in any way possible. She laughed at the sight.

“I see... I suppose this is enough training for today.”

Wham!

“Argh!” The blow, which felt like the icing on the cake, a finale, swept the space with incredible force. Despite his defense, Lloyd's feet slid back about ten yards. But he had a smile on his face. “Whew... Ha... Whew... Word cannot express how grateful I am to you, Your Majesty...”

“Gratitude, my foot.”

“...”

“I understand your intentions. I shall see you again on the day the House of Peers calls for you.”

“Then, as for my offer-”

“I will think about it until then,” she interrupted.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“Keep looking for that gratitude, and we shall be training again,” warned Queen Magentano.

“The time is late, so I will take my leave now, Your Majesty.”

“Suit yourself.”

Lloyd bolted after paying his respects and dashed out of the training hall before she changed her mind.

Now that she was alone in the hall, Queen Magentano weighed Lloyd's suggestion. It sounded appealing. And, without a doubt, profitable. At the same time, it was so ridiculous that it made her laugh.

What an amazing and outrageous man Lloyd is.

The more she thought about him, the more she laughed aloud. Lloyd was incredibly unpredictable. And he was even more remarkable than she had imagined.

“I did not know that he was already approaching my level...” Queen Magetano's gaze shifted to the exit of the training hall. Her wrists were trembling faintly from how sore they were, in contrast to the casual and carefree demeanor she displayed throughout her training with Lloyd.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 338: Chewing Up the House of Peers (1)

Lloyd had been relaxing for the past two days, lounging around his guest room in the palace. But he wasn't waiting for the queen's response to his grand offer, imagining a greater future for himself, nor coming up with a smarter ruse with his political insight by studying the atmosphere of the palace.

“Ouch... Argh... My back,” groaned Lloyd.

“Does it hurt here that badly?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, and the other side too. Yes. There.”

“Then why did you duel Her Majesty without any plan...” Javier kneaded Lloyd’s sore body.

“Ouch!” screamed Lloyd. “Easy! Like I wanted to do it.”

Lloyd screamed in agony on his bed. He was not exaggerating. Every part of his body ached and throbbed with excruciating pain. His joints and muscles felt like they had been separated into individual pieces and randomly jumbled together again. Lloyd remembered the person who was responsible for his hellishly sore muscles.

Ha. I thought I protected myself from all of her attacks.

He appeared to be doing it for real. Lloyd believed he put up a good fight when considering that it was a fairly long and intense duel against none other than Queen Mangentano, a formidable swordmaster. Despite her endless attacks, only a few of them directly landed on him.

There were only two direct blows, which were when she kicked my solar plexus with her knee and strangled me by the neck.

So, Lloyd was satisfied. He thought he did an amazing job fighting against Queen Magentano, who was basically a human weapon and arguably the second strongest person in the world after Javier.

But I was wrong...

It was fine even as he came back to his chamber, washed up, and slept with a satisfied glow. But the next morning, he realized that the aching muscles he received from Queen Alicia were far worse than an aching tooth or head.

It was delusional of me to think I did a good job.

As soon as his eyes opened in the morning, he felt like he'd been beaten down with a hammer. He was unable to get out of bed. Every inch of his body was in pain as if he'd been in a car accident.

Just blocking her attacks put a heavy strain on my body.

It made sense, Lloyd thought. It would be ridiculous to expect a human body to endure the monstrous vigor she manifested. In any case, Lloyd had to spend the last two days in bed or on a sofa.

“Speaking of...” Lloyd muttered, “Can you be gentle when you remove the gauze?”

“I cannot,” rejected Javier coldly.

Rip! Javier sharply refused and tugged, ripping the gauze glued to Lloyd's back. The gauze was soaked in a medicinal herb mixture used to treat muscle and joint pain. However, it would dry throughout the night and caused searing pain every time it had to be ripped off from his back. Laying on his bed, Lloyd begged for mercy as he clawed at his hair from the burning sensation.

“Aaack! Get it off in one try if you’re not going to be gentle!” squealed Lloyd in pain.

“That won’t do, either.”

This time, after his cold rejection, Javier removed the gauze as slowly as possible, ripping out hundreds of short hair strands from Lloyd’s back.

“Ack! Yack! Eek! Hey, you!” Lloyd suddenly half-rose from his bed and faced Javier.

“You were not about to curse at me, Young Master, are you?” casually asked Javier.

“Of course I was!” huffed Lloyd indignantly.

“But I will still not change my method,” defied Javier.

“Why not?!”

Javier shrugged. “The physician offered a few words of assurance to me yesterday.”

“What did the man say?!”

“That it is better to slowly rip out the medicinal herb mixture dries out and hardens the gauze.”

“Better for what?!”

Javier met Lloyd’s eyes and grinned. “Better for improving mood.”

Lloyd gaped in disbelief.

“Looking at your reaction now, Master Lloyd, I see what the physician meant. Surely, he is an amazing physician of the imperial palace.”

“Hey!” bellowed Lloyd, “Amazing, my foot. You are lying about him, aren’t you?”

“Ah, you got me.” Javier then gave a tug, slowly this time as well.

“Ouch!!!”

Lloyd fell flat on his bed in pain, and Javier guffawed in amusement. But the laughter didn’t go long.

“But Master Lloyd,” called Javier gravely.

“Yeah.”

“I have a question.”

“Not answering you.”

“...”

“Properly remove the transdermal patch... I mean gauze, and I’ll talk. What is it? What are you curious about?”

Javier said, “It is about the rumor that has been circulating around the capital for the past two days.”

“Yeah.”

“I heard the rumors say an angel descended during your meeting with the queen and delivered a prophecy. Is that true?”

“Yeah.”

“And that the prophecy was about bestowing the Tears of Summer to you?”

“Yeah.”

Javier gulped. “Then, the thing you agreed upon with the Minister of Angels back then was...”

“You are right,” affirmed Lloyd. “That was it. That was what I asked for to the Minister of Angels.”

Javier sighed.

“What? Why? What? Why are you narrowing your eyes like you have another complaint?”

“It is not that. I am simply dumbstruck,” remarked Javier.

“Dumbstruck?” Lloyd frowned.

“First, let me say that I will not nag you about something a trivial matter, like how you perverted the angels into some sort of demonic existence. Even if I do, you won’t change anyway. But what I want to say to you is-”

“What?” Lloyd urged.

“If it was your intent was to strike a deal with Gabriel to deliver a prophecy for you, you should not be just lying around like you are now.”

“Hmm. Why?”

“It is not the time for you to be lying around, as I said.” Lloyd was lying on his stomach, so Javier couldn't see his expression. But he could see this young master smirking like a devious pervert, as he always did when he had a sly scheme in mind. “The entire capital is in uproar,” he said solemnly. “As a result of you and your prophecy.”

“Why? Did a fight break out or something?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded. “The capital is divided into two opposing groups.”

Lloyd wasn’t surprised. “Let me guess. On one side, there are those who insist on following the prophecy and giving me the Tears of Summers. But on the other side, there are those who argue that thoughtlessly handing over one of the divine items of the imperial family would be a poor decision. That's all there is to it, right?”

“Did you... see that ahead as well?”

“Yeah, somewhat.” Lloyd shrugged. He scowled at the sharp pain that followed from his shoulders. “When you think about it, it's kind of obvious. The absolute prophecy from Heaven, or the divine item of the imperial family. They have to choose between the two.”

“That is exactly the point,” Javier seconded gravely.

“Looks like it has stirred the pot in the capital.”

“Of course,” affirmed Javier. “From the merchants and loaders in the markets to the farmers and patrol guards, children, and nobles, everyone is divided into two groups and voices out their concerns.”

“Hmm,” mused Lloyd playfully, “What a debate-friendly culture this capital has, I say.”

Javier narrowed his eyes. Then, he ripped another piece of gauze.

“Eek!” screamed Lloyd in pain. “Hey!”

Javier shook his head. “How can you still joke around after creating this situation?”

“Well, how can I not make jokes?”

“Get yourself out of bed instead, Master Lloyd.”

“You mean go outside?”

“Yes,” said Javier in a grave voice, “At any rate, your goal is to attain the Tears of Summer. Isn’t it?”

“Well, yeah. You heard what the Ice Dragon said, right?”

“I did. He warned you about the side effect of absorbing the Heart of Winter and that you would need the Tears of Summer, which possesses the opposing nature of the latter. I am telling you this now since the public opinion has been divided in half.”

Lloyd sat up. “Are you suggesting I go around persuading people since both sides are strongly spirited about the matter?”

“Yes.” Javier gave a nod. “At a time like this, you have to draw more people to your side to achieve your objective of obtaining the Tears of Summer.”

“Well, you’re not wrong,” chuckled Lloyd, “But go deeper, and you’d know that you’re slightly wrong, perhaps.”

“Slightly wrong?” Javier cocked his head to the side.

"The more I try to campaign for myself, the opposing side will gain the same amount of influence that I do."

“Oh...” gaped Javier, finally understanding.

“Do you see what I mean?”

“I was being small-minded,” admitted Javier. “Your proactive efforts to shift the public’s opinion to your favor would be viewed as an act of greed for the Tears of Summer.”

“Yes, yes. That’s it. And my opponents will not stay still when that happens. They might even try to pin me as a traitor, and my efforts would backfire on me instead.” Lloyd forced a wry smile. It was a possible scenario. Though, of course, it was impossible for him to be considered a traitor because of his title “Magentano Carrier.”

The opposition knows that my public image will be shattered the moment the argument pivots to whether or not I’m a traitor. That’s what they’ll go after in that case.

They would not be interested in whether he is officially punished as a traitor. All they needed to do was slap the label of a traitor on him, destroy his public image, and eventually prevent him from being bestowed the Tears of Summer. That was likely what the opposing side hoped would happen in the end.

“So,” Lloyd said, “I don’t have to go and do what they so wish me to do. And besides, I’m in quite a bit of pain. This sort of situation calls for a complete rest. Doesn’t it?”

“Then, do you have any other plan in mind?”

“Yeah,” replied Lloyd casually. “The House of Peers will summon me soon.”

“The House of Peers?”

“Oh, looks like they’ve arrived right as we speak. That was a day faster than I expected.” Lloyd grinned brightly.

Javier shot a gaze toward the door. “Do you mean the footsteps coming this way?”

“Yeah.” As soon as the nod came, someone tapped on the door. Knock knock knock.

“Excuse me,” came the voice. “Is Young Master Lloyd Frontera inside?” The voice belonged to a palace official. When he entered the room, he immediately got to business. “Please pardon me for interrupting your break. The House of Peers has sent you this, Young Lord.”

“Hmm. I see. Thanks for delivering it to me.”

The envelope bore the words “Request for Attendance.” It was exactly as Lloyd had predicted. When the palace official walked away, Lloyd laughed as he swayed the envelope.

“Did you see that?” said Lloyd. “This is it.”

“...”

“Okay.” Lloyd clapped his hands. “Time to put on some real clothes and take off. Argh. My body aches.”

Javier became curious as to what kind of thoughts ran through this man's mind. And more importantly, he wondered what kind of mindset someone must have to calculate such minute aspects of their life. Javier's gaze widened toward Lloyd.

Seoul. What kind of life did you live there?

Just then, memories of Seoul flashed through Javier's mind. The city with musty air and a bustling nightlife. Presumably fake Lloyd's hometown. Javier became fascinated by Lloyd's life there because he couldn't understand how such a place could produce such a monster. But he didn't dwell on his thoughts for long.

“I will help. Your arm. This way.”

Now was the time to assist Lloyd and help him achieve his goal of contributing to the family. Javier ushered Lloyd to get ready and eventually hopped into the carriage that the House of Peers had prepared for them. It didn't take long to arrive at the historic structure. Lloyd and Javier were led through the building until they reached the Senate Chamber, where piercing and screeching voices greeted them.

“Come on! Count Peruza! You cannot speak that way! We have yet to hear from the very individual who received the prophecy!”

“Ha!” huffed a man who seemed to be Count Peruza. “Do you imply that there is any extra reason to hear the self-defense of Lloyd Frontera? So, what are you saying? We must gladly give away the divine item of the royal house to the son of a count?!”

“Gladly give away? You are over the line! May I remind you that this is a prophecy? You saw the angel descend down to the kingdom with your own two eyes, and delivered the prophecy, Count Peruza.”

“Are you accusing me of blasphemy now?!”

“Barely worse than when you treated me like a traitor of the kingdom.”

“Oh now? You’ve crossed the line, you fool!”

“Did you just say fool?!”

The exchange of shouts between nobles. Their plush seats and elegant attire did little to keep the place quiet. The entire room resembled a rowdy bar, which was the first thing that Lloyd and Javier noticed when they entered inside. Javier crinkled his brow elegantly, in contrast to Lloyd, who grinned contentedly.

Ah. The smell of home.

The House of Peers reminded Lloyd of a construction resource management agency where tough guys grabbed each other by the collar to get the daily job before anyone else. As he went over his plan, Lloyd felt a sense of familiarity inside the room. The debate. Dispute. Quarrel. Clash. The schemes and tricks amidst it all. And the final result that would slam down on everyone. Everything, from his preparation to his plan, was perfect.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 339: Chewing Up the House of Peers (2)

Woah. This is what I’m talking about.

Lloyd smiled contentedly as he looked around the Senate Chamber of the House of Peers. He liked what he was seeing, owing to the extremely busy, clamorous atmosphere of the room. Nobles of high status were arguing amongst each other as the veins in their neck popped, rendering the entire setting devoid of elegance and dignity. There was no sense of elegance in the atmosphere, and he even felt at ease there.

It’s a relief. An excessively upscale and formal atmosphere is suffocating to be in.

Lloyd's life had been devoid of anything upscale. It was true even before his parents became mired in debt. They were just an ordinary middle-class family in South Korea, neither destitute nor wealthy. As a result, his life was a far cry from one that would be described as luxurious. He didn’t have an experience that would be described that way either. This remained true in this world.

Well, I’m only a young master of a noble family in name. In actuality, I’ve done nothing but work until now.

First, he had to pay off his family’s debt. Then, he had to save his fiefdom from one crisis after another. And now, he had to deal with the restoration of destiny and the negative side effects on his body that came from absorbing the Heart of Winter. He worked for 365 days a year without any time to rest and was still working right now.

Lloyd's eyes suddenly became wet. He cursed under his breath as he wiped his tears away with his sleeves.

“Lloyd, it’s been a long time,” came a voice when Lloyd was about to be guided to his seat.

“Eh...?” blurted Lloyd, turning toward the voice that sounded young and familiar. But he saw nothing except for a portion of the chestnut forehead and orange-colored curly hair at the bottom of his vision.

“Look down,” came the voice again, and it sounded slightly grouchy.

When Lloyd looked down, he was greeted by a welcomed presence. “Julian?”

“Ha. You’re doing this on purpose, aren’t you? You don’t have to tell me that I’m short.”

Lloyd smiled awkwardly, feeling guilty.

“If you keep doing that, I’m going to tell on you to our Minister of Home Affairs,” threatened Julian with a smile on his face.

“Minister of Home Affairs?” echoed Lloyd, thinking a second. “Wait, Scheherazade?”

“Yeah.” Julian wiggled his brows. “Anyway, are you sure you are going to be all right?”

“Um, maybe.” Lloyd chuckled. Julian hadn’t changed a bit. He still had the same baby face, bright demeanor, and intelligent look on his face and in his eyes as before.

But the shyness in him has almost disappeared.

Lloyd wondered if it had anything to do with his wife or the so-called Minister of Home Affairs while he questioned Julian, “But what brings you all the way up here?”

“Why else?" Julian asked. “I was worried for you. You were summoned here by the House of Peers. That means you'll be sandwiched between the terrors of both parties.”

“Were you afraid that I would get in trouble?” asked Lloyd, touched.

“Yeah, somewhat,” Julian admitted sheepishly, shrugging his narrow shoulders. “I'm not sure if you're aware, but the capital has been in uproar for the past two days. You have no idea how much they pestered me.”

“Did they pester you during work with questions?”

“Do you think they would only ask some questions?” Julian chuckled. “My direct supervisor opposes fulfilling the prophecy.”

Julian rattled, “He pestered me the entire day about whether I heard the news about you trying to seize a divine item of the imperial family and whether you have an ulterior motive since it is simply impossible for a lowly subject like you to covet such a holy object. Otherwise, asking how I feel about the whole thing and that I'd be a traitor if I sided with my family instead of the imperial family... Blah, blah, blah... I must have received around 180 questions from the time I arrived at work until I left.”

“Ah... I’m sorry.”

“No, don’t be,” Julian said with a wave of his hand, “It’s my fault for being your brother.”

Lloyd felt a prick in his heart.

“So, cheer up, Lloyd. Don’t get discouraged and intimidated. Don’t die either.”

Another prick.

“You can do it!”

“Tsk,” Lloyd chuckled, sensing Julian's sincerity despite his harsh words. Julian had come here for moral support in case he got in trouble, and he must have had to leave his job to get here.

Plus, since it’s noon right now, he’s supposed to be at work right now. Given that his boss is on the opposing side, I can clearly see what he had to go through to get here in the middle of his workday.

Julian would not have left his office without notice, considering his dependable character. This meant that he must have decided to leave early, risking the possibility of getting on his supervisor’s bad side.

He would have had to reveal his reason for leaving work early.

That would have annoyed his boss and left a bad impression on him. Julian would have certainly been aware of this. Nonetheless, he risked it all to come here for a quick hello and give him a little encouragement. Lloyd appreciated the effort he put in to make this visit.

“Okay, bro. I'll be right back.” Lloyd lightly tapped Julian's shoulder, and that was all that was needed. Lloyd followed the guide to his seat, which was in the center, after looking him in the eyes. He understood the meaning of this seat arrangement.

Hmm. So, I’m sandwiched between both parties.

The nobles on the left gave him a friendly gaze, while the ones on the right looked to be clearly irritated. They were plainly exuding their dissatisfaction with their entire being, whether it was through the expression on their face or the look in their eyes.

So, those on the left are the supporters of the prophecy. And those on the right are part of the opposing side.

Lloyd grinned, going over his plan and happy he could easily decipher which side was which just from the atmosphere of the room.

“May I have your attention, please,” said the House of Peers' chairman. “As you can see, Lloyd Frontera, Count Frontera's son, has graciously agreed to appear in front of us today. As the Speaker of the House of Peers, I'd like to express my heartfelt appreciation for his cooperation.” Lloyd had seen this man before, the man with a chubby belly who resembled a bulldog. He politely returned the same courtesy to him.

Following that, a few formal procedures were carried out. The first was the introduction of ten nobles from each side who would represent the entire group. They all glared at each other but didn't break out into an argument due to the separated seats. They instead waited until the hearing began. The hearing, however, turned out to be a barrage of loaded questions designed to sway the outcome in their favor.

“Nice to meet you. I am the head of the Alcante Marquess Family. Before I ask some questions, I would like to first express my gratitude to you for appearing at today’s hearing. Now, Lloyd Frontera?”

“Yes?” replied Lloyd.

“Up to this point in time, you have been involved in countless affairs, both small and big, related to the imperial family. Throughout them all, you have displayed your endless devotion toward the imperial family. Is that right?” Marquess Alcante asked gently.

“That’s right.” Lloyd nodded.

“Were there times when you felt reluctant to take action?”

Lloyd pondered. “There were many times when I felt afraid.”

“Afraid?”

“Yes.”

“May I ask for you to elaborate?” Marquess Alcante, one of the supporters of the prophecy, smiled with his eyes. Lloyd realized what he was doing.

He’s blatantly only choosing the questions that’ll make me look good.

It appeared that he had designed these questions to fulfill the prophecy.

If that’s his intention, I will happily accept it.

This nobleman was already going out of his way to portray Lloyd as the greatest man on the planet. Lloyd didn't see why he should refuse his help. “I, too, am a human. When the queen was poisoned, I was terrified, just as I was when I solved the Monster Domino phenomenon in the east and fought the Bone Dragon. There were times when I thought I was going to die. I was afraid. But...” Lloyd took a deliberate pause.

“But?” echoed Marquess Alcante.

Lloyd salivated his lips. “More than my death, I was more worried that the foundation of the imperial family would shake.”

“Wow,” the marquess exclaimed, visibly impressed, sounding like a professor who had a student give him the answer he was looking for. He then cast a thoughtful and content look at the opposing side as if to say, “See? This guy is a fantastic, loyal subject with a bright future ahead of him. Following the prophecy and bestowing him with the divine item would undoubtedly benefit the imperial family. Are you sure you won’t give it to him?”

Once the marquess finished his questions, it was time for the opposing side to interrogate him. “Please allow me to introduce myself. I am Marquess Cordova. Are you prepared to answer my questions?”

“Yes, I am.” Lloyd gave a nod as he pushed down a bitter smile from forming on his face. If the questions from the supporting side felt like a warm bath, the ones from the opposing group felt like an icy bath.

“Lloyd Frontera, you have had an incident where you lost the Heart of Winter previously, is it right?” Marquess Cordova sharply flung a question at him.

“You are right.” As expected, Lloyd knew they’d bring up this incident. He calmly answered the question.

“Do you feel responsible for it?” The marquess continued his questioning.

“Of course I do,” Lloyd replied. In all seriousness, he was resentful of the entire situation. It still made him feel guilty around the queen, and the side effect was bothering him in a variety of ways, including right now. He expressed genuine regret for what had occurred. “I am overcome with sadness to this day when I think about it. The loss of the Heart of Winter and one man on the scene. Although it goes without saying that it was never my intention, as the supervisor, my heart is bursting with massive regret and resentment. That is all I have to say.” Lloyd spoke with a solemn expression on his face and a serious voice.

“Hmm! Ehem! I see.” Marquess Cordova cleared his throat and finished the question as if taken aback by Lloyd's response.

Now that the icy questioning was completed, it was time for the warm bath of question. “I'm not sure if you're aware, but I get to this location every morning via the bridge you built for us. The Llo-Javi Suspension Bridge.”

“Oh, I see.”

“It has been extremely convenient to commute to and from work and home. I can now cross the river without fear of it collapsing during the wet spring season. The same is true today. I expect to cross the bridge when I return home tomorrow. I just wanted to express my appreciation for your contribution on behalf of the people of the capital.”

“Um...” Lloyd sheepishly gulped. “Yes.”

“As such, is it true that you first suggested building the bridge to the queen?”

“It is the truth,” emphasized Lloyd.

“I understand,” nodded Marquess Alcante, smiling. “I'm sure your suggestion came out of a concern for the people who faced hardship and experienced increased danger due to the collapsing of the Magenta Bridge. Is my assumption correct?”

“Yes,” Lloyd acknowledged with a shameless nod. That was not the case. He only built the bridge to make money. But there was absolutely no reason to reveal that right now.

This guy is blatantly painting a good picture of me, so I should graciously accept his support. Why would I reject him?

The thing was, Lloyd never asked them to make him look good in public. Everyone was doing it of their own free will, so all he had to do was accept it with grace. That encouraged him to be more shameless, and the voice of conscience accusing him of lying could only be silenced after some internal beatdowns. The same thing happened when his opposition fired sharp questions at him.

“Lloyd Frontera, I only have one question. During the Monster Domino phenomenon, why did you not actively take care of the monsters that invaded the other fiefdoms?”

“I, too, wanted to get rid of them,” Lloyd answered, his voice dripping with sadness.

“Wanted to? What do you mean?”

“I desperately wanted to. But I couldn't do it. Yes, I know,” Lloyd sighed for emphasis. “I know I couldn't because I wasn't strong or good enough, and it still haunts me. Sometimes, I wake up drenched in cold sweat after a night of tossing and turning...” Lloyd lowered his head.

“No, I am not speaking about your anguish-”

“Yes, I am aware that voicing my agony changes nothing,” Lloyd put in. “I admit that I am a criminal. I should have rushed to save the residents of the other fiefdom, even if it meant risking my life. But I couldn't do it. Nobody is to blame here. It all happened because I am pathetic and inept. So, I am filled with anguish and sadness. And, hah... I'll stop making excuses now. I apologize.”

A look of dismay came over Marquess Cordova. “No, this is not the time for you to apologize. I am just going over the incident...”

What is he doing?

The noble's intention was to press him with a sharp question in order to exaggerate an insignificant flaw of his and corner him. Then, provoke him with an aggressive question and set him off.

In that situation, anyone would blow up in anger and defend themselves. That's the reaction I intended to bring out...

That was how the opposing side planned to drag Lloyd into a messy fight. They elicit an emotional reaction out of Lloyd and start a heated argument with him, throwing all sorts of insults and baseless accusations at him. They believed that would be sufficient.

A messy fight like that brings out the worst in everyone. Once someone shows such an ugly side of themself, their reputation will begin to splinter even if it was excellent before.

That was their goal. To sully Lloyd's reputation by dragging him into a childish, muddy brawl. They believed that his tarnished reputation and image would be enough to sway public opinion in their favor. But the reality was quite different.

What is he doing now?!

But Lloyd refused to take the bait, no matter how intense and sharp the questions were, no matter how they triggered him with distorted and fabricated questions. He only agreed with them, even tearing up as he admitted his mistakes and reflected on himself!

He’s making me... look like I’m the trash here for asking these questions!

Marquess Cordova felt a rush of resentment toward Lloyd’s attitude. But there was something the count was completely unaware of. It was that the Marquess and his team's set of aggressive and twisted questions and provocations did no harm to Lloyd, who had become hardened in the so-called virtual South Korean gaming space where everyone cursed and swore at each other. They were also unaware of their bleak future devised by Lloyd's brazen eloquence and chicaneries.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 340: Chewing Up the House of Peers (3)

“Yes, I am the bad guy. I never knew that the Bone Dragon would move like that...”

“Oh, but that was the same for everyone at the Termina Garden construction-”

“However, it was also evident that I did not know...”

“So, I felt responsible. Had I foreseen the disaster ahead of time, had I gone to the prophet and learned about the incident sooner! I believe the Bone Dragon wouldn’t have jumped in the middle of the capital and caused such an awful disaster.”

“Look here, excuse me, Lord Frontera,” huffed Marquess Cordova with dismay after hearing Lloyd’s continuous repentance, “I did not mean it that way-”

“I am aware,” interrupted Lloyd. “You were asking why I put myself down as a co-developer when I only participated in the construction of the waterway and nothing else.”

“Surely-”

Lloyd raised his hand. “That is the reason why I am repenting. Even when the queen generously allowed me the honor of putting myself down as the co-developer here, I leisurely engrossed myself in the waterway construction, unaware of the impending doom.”

“I did not mean it that way-”

“Yes, indeed,” affirmed Lloyd with a nod. “I must repent. I must lament my faults and lack of accountability. As such, I'd like to express my heartfelt gratitude to Marquess Cordova for allowing me to reflect on my past mistakes.”

Count Cordova was dumbstruck. This was not what he had expected to hear. What he wanted was for Lloyd to fight back. To drag him into a messy fight and make him show the worst sides of him. He wanted to provoke an emotional reaction out of Lloyd.

So... why does he keep making guilty confessions with even tears in his eyes? Why?

Marquess Cordova, the representative of the opposing faction, stared intensely at Lloyd with dismay.

Wait, is he doing this on purpose?

Watching over him, that seemed to be the case. Suddenly, a shaft of hatred came over his heart.

Ha! A fool like you can never win against me even if you're the meritorious retainer of the imperial family!

Count Cordova regarded himself as a devoted subject and patriot. He was proud of the House of Magentano's prosperity and rejoiced as the imperial family rose to power. He hoped that this peace and prosperity would last for many years to come. That was why he didn't have a fond view of Lloyd Frontera.

Fine. I admit that you have many accomplishments. But what now? How could there be an obligation to give you the Tears of Summer, one of the imperial family's divine items? It is undeniably improper for you to receive the Tears of Summer solely because an angel randomly dropped from the heavens and delivered such a prophecy!

Marquess Cordova was not pleased. The Tears of Summer was one of the invaluable divine items of the imperial family. Despite the fact that it had never been used before, just having it in their possession made them stronger.

Swords do not need to be drawn to demonstrate their strength. The mere presence of one in a sheath can be enough to intimidate an opponent.

To Marquess Cordova, the divine item was exactly that. It was a strong deterrent, so he couldn't understand why the prophecy should prompt the bestowal of the item to a lowly subordinate and hurt the imperial house.

Lloyd Frontera. I must sully that man's reputation, whatever it takes.

Count Cordova thought he had come well-prepared. He had come up with a series of questions designed to provoke Lloyd, and he wasn't afraid to distort some facts along the way, believing that these would be enough to embarrass Lloyd and set off his temper. Reality, however, betrayed his conviction.

It isn't working. He must have deduced what our plan was. What is going on inside his head that... he can keep his calm in the face of my humiliating questions?

Marquess Cordova couldn't get his mind around it. He was a nobleman whose honor and pride were far more important than his life. Lloyd, he assumed, would be the same as a noble like himself. So, he couldn't understand him. It was only now that he realized that this young man's value system was radically different from his.

Tsk. I expected them to mock and provoke me after making me come all the way here, but no. Now that I have gone through everything, I don't think I was affected in any way.

Marquess Cordova, who was across from him. Lloyd inwardly smirked as he stared at the man. It was true. Most of the questions he barraged on Lloyd during the entire session tried to subtly distort the truth about his actions and intentions in a negative light. It seemed like an extremely vicious media tactic. However, once Lloyd listened to him speak. He didn't sense that there had been any damage inflicted at all. The reason was simple.

The compliments my teammates inside a video game threw at me had more burn to them.

The questions Count Cordova had seemed to prepare in advance to obliterate Lloyd fell flat. They were nothing but soft baby jabs, which only made him enjoy the situation. And each time the marquess accused him with sharp and aggressive questions, Lloyd didn't fight back or give excuses. Instead, he accepted everything, even going the extra mile of putting on a tearful performance to show his guilt!

“Yes,” Lloyd exclaimed, “Everything is my fault. Mea culpa. I wasn't up to the task. I should have known the queen was going to be poisoned sooner. This would have saved her from being poisoned. The same is true in Cremo. It never occurred to me that the Gigatian would scale the mountain. I had no idea, which only added to the damage. I failed to evacuate the people, and the buildings collapsed and caught fire.”

“No, that’s not the answer I’m looking for...”

“No,” Lloyd said as he wiped his eyes. “I am fully cognizant of your concerns and worries, Marquess Cordova. You might wonder how such an incompetent person like me could dare be bestowed the Tears of Summer. Yes, I have the same question. I am a severely undeserving man with infinite flaws, as you can see. I am only curious. Curious why the heavens gave me such a tribulation, no, prophecy.”

“...”

“If I could, I want to dare ask the holy angels for what great reason they have placed such a heavy responsibility on my shoulders by giving me the divine item.”

“That is what we want to ask-”

“No. I am more curious. That is the reason why my heart is filled with pain and sadness! The prophecy should have been directed at you, Marquess Cordova, who is far more excellent and devoted to the imperial family than I am!”

“Ha?” A perplexed look appeared on Marquess Cordova’s face.

“I genuinely think so, Marquess Cordova. You have spent every day of your life devoting yourself to the imperial family, day in and day out, and you plan on doing that for the remaining time you have.”

“That is, of course-”

“I certainly think so, and I believe it, too, for you are a man of outstanding character incomparably better than a mere novice with some luck like me.”

“No, this is not the time for you to say-”

“I understand that now is not the time. But I'm speaking from the bottom of my heart. Truths, a wise man once said, are sharp and pointy, and they come out no matter how you cover them. The same is true for me right now. The more I try to close my mouth, the more the truth in my heart escapes and spills out.”

Lloyd’s eyes traveled around the room. “I am well aware that Marquess Cordova, Count Montego on your side, and the man across from you all deserve to be respected. How can I not? You are true patriots who genuinely care about the royal family while maintaining honor even when no one is looking.”

“Um...”

“No, Marquess. No need to act humble. With that, I...” It was as if he had an advanced motor or turbo engine attached to his mouth. He couldn’t stop the compliments and praises that poured out of his mouth toward his opposition without a break. “I think that I do not deserve to receive the divine item.”

“Excuse me?! Lloyd Frontera!” came a booming, impatient voice. It belonged to Marquess Alcante, the representative of the advocates. There was a sense of panicked alarm in his voice. “What are you on about? You've been given a prophecy! For Pete's sake, a prophecy! What do you mean you'll give it up because you don't deserve it? Do you think this is child’s play?”

“That is obviously not the case,” said Lloyd coolly.

“So, what is it? I'd like to emphasize once more that this is not a joke. It's the will of the heavens. Are you saying this with the knowledge of what will happen if you interpret or reject the prophecy arbitrarily?”

“I...”

“I'm not interested in your excuses!” he yelled again. “When you reject the prophecy on your own accord, you never know what punishment awaits you. Is it your intention to punish the royal family in this manner? This cannot be!" roared Marquess Alcante. “I will never allow such bad luck and a curse to fall on us! How dare you dismiss the prophecy so casually!”

Lloyd sighed at length, casting his head down in dismay and not knowing what to do.

Suddenly feeling guilty, Marquess Alcante calmed himself by clearing his throat. “I apologize if I lambasted you for a split second there. But, as I previously stated, you received the prophecy, and your lack of seriousness may endanger the royal house. So, with a slight sense of pressure and responsibility, I ask you to accept the prophecy. That is the only option for the royal family.”

“Wait a minute, Marquess Alcante!” protested Marquess Cordova as soon as his remarks were made. “Why are you acting as if following the prophecy is the only option here? How could you make such a treacherous statement about giving that young man one of the divine items of the imperial family?”

“What...?” Marquess Alcante’s face flushed with anger. “Treacherous? What did you just say?”

“I am correct here!” bawled Marquess Cordova. “It’s the divine item! Even if the prophecy was made, you cannot think lightly of the divine item of the royal house!”

Count Alcante slammed his fist into the desk in front of him. “But you never know what might happen if you defy the prophecy!”

“But the imperial house will suffer a huge loss by following it!” retorted Marquess Cordova louder.

“Watch your mouth, Marquess Cordova! You are putting the royal house at risk with your blasphemy!”

“Watch your mouth, Count Alcante! You're inciting mutiny so openly now!”

“Now, you listen!” screamed Marquess Alcante, unable to control his anger anymore.

“What...?” Marquess Cordova froze a second, taken back. “You listen?”

The two nobles started to scream at each other, quickly destroying the chamber room's atmosphere. Lloyd, on the other hand, smiled but only on the inside. He lowered his rising lips and put on a troubled expression, pleading with both parties to calm down and stop this. His bright-eyed attempt to mediate the situation nearly impressed the entire audience. Except for three people.

I knew that was how this man would react.

Javier sighed at length. Julian, on the other hand...

Wow. Lloyd Frontera. Seriously. I know he’s my brother, but how can a person be so despicable?

The two realized right away that everything Lloyd was doing at the time was part of his deception and plan. The last person to see through his ruse was Queen Magentano, who entered amid the commotion.

“Queen Alicia Termina Magentano is entering! Pay your respects to Her Majesty!”

The voice of the guard commander echoed across the room, freezing everyone and forcing them to bow. There was now complete silence in the room, and when the doors opened, Queen Magentano entered, scanning the advocates, opponents, and Lloyd. Her lips curled into a faint smile.

I knew it. I knew you would do this.

Even before she entered the room, she could hear what was going on inside. She realized something as she picked up on the noises, disagreements, and quarrels.

Your lies, flattery, and trickery. I pity those fools who have been fooled by you.

Her gaze moved back and forth between the supporters and detractors. She was well aware that all of them were devoted subjects intent on following her and her imperial house. She also knew that each made sense and that they couldn't find common ground in their opposing arguments.

Lloyd Frontera. You are setting up a stage for me to put an end to this entire situation.

Her mind flashed back to two days earlier when Lloyd had asked her to decide whether to accept his proposal and present it in front of the House of Peers.

I told him I would think about it.

She gave a bitter smile. Lloyd had clearly had this situation in mind the entire time. His initial plan was to present her with an avenue of mediation to the extreme clash and division that would occur as a result of the prophecy.

Is this your gift for me? Once again, you are trying to protect my political reputation and uplift my image.

If everything went as planned, she would increase her authority by successfully mediating between the two parties, while Lloyd would earn the opportunity to acquire the Tears of Summer. Depending on Lloyd's work, the kingdom would also have the opportunity to see the trade route in the Pantara region. Everyone would benefit in the grand scheme of things. She turned to face Lloyd.

She caught a faint smile on Lloyd's face in the split second her eyes met his. She realized it now. She knew what he was thinking and why he kept looking after her even though he seemed to always behave so selfishly. And so, she began to develop a desire for Lloyd Frontera.

Somehow, I am growing excited over the possibility that you may become more important to me beyond your role as a retainer.

“I hereby order…” she solemnly declared after making a firm resolution.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 341: A Path Through a Mountain Range (1)

“I will hereby give an order.” Everyone’s attention was drawn to Queen Magentano’s solemn voice. Her gaze turned to Marquess Alcante, the supporting group’s leader. “I am aware that you are concerned about the misfortune or curse that may befall the imperial family if the prophecy is not fulfilled. Is that right?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Good. Next, Marquess Cordova. Her gaze then shifted to the leader of the opposing party this time. “I am equally aware of why you oppose following the prophecy. You must be concerned about the imperial family losing the power that comes from owning a divine item. Am I correct?”

“Yes. That is exactly it, Your Majesty,” answered Marquess Cordova.

The two representatives bowed. Her lips formed a content smile. “As I expected, my assumptions were correct. I am proud to have you all as my loyal subjects, from both the opposing and supporting sides.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” said both of the representatives.

“I am truly overjoyed,” she continued. “How could I not be when I have a group of loyal subjects as trustworthy as you all? At the same time, I struggled to sleep last night due to the heavy burden in my heart after seeing my outstanding subjects divided in half and fighting each other over this matter. However, I came to a decision as soon as I stepped in here. Lloyd Frontera.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd quickly lowered his head, concealing the smile that was about to form on his lips. His ears perked up.

“My loyal subject,” Queen Magentano continued. “The eldest son of Count Frontera. I would like to ask you a question. Are you prepared to receive the Tears of Summer, as predicted by the prophecy from Heaven? No, can you demonstrate that you are prepared?”

“Yes, Your Majesty, please grant me the chance to prove myself,” Lloyd spoke confidently. He clenched his fists.

It worked. I knew it.

It really worked. He had a feeling that his offer to her two days ago was a success.

Well, the fact that she came to the chamber room is enough proof that she accepted my offer.

He then perked up his ears, waiting with bated breath over what she would say next.

“Good, Lloyd Frontera.” Queen Magentano’s gaze focused on him. “Hence, I have a proposal for you. Given my high opinion of the countless accomplishments you’ve achieved, I sincerely hope you will make wise use of your excellence for the prosperity of the imperial house and nation. I ask you to open a large trade route across the Pantara Range, which currently acts as a wall to the southwest.”

Lloyd’s heart screamed “Yes” as soon as the declaration was made, while the nobles went wide-eyed. Her eyes lit up with a meaningful smile. “This is my test for you, Lloyd Frontera, as a means of mediating the situation. I say that if he succeeds in building a trade route across the Pantara Range, he will be given the Tears of Summer.”

Clack. Clack. Her shoes clattered as she moved closer to Lloyd, who lowered his bow further down when she approached him. Her solemn voice spoke toward his chestnut-shaped head.

“How about it, Lloyd Frontera? If you succeed, you will be given the Summer Tears. If you fail, you will not. Do you want to accept my offer?”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.” Lloyd had no reason to be hesitant. He collapsed to the ground as soon as she finished speaking like a cat anticipating a salty snack on its back.

“Good,” she said, smiling contentedly. She, too, was content. She had stayed up all night last night thinking about Lloyd’s proposal and weighing the pros and cons of accepting it.

It was too good of an offer. I was rather suspicious of it.

If it sounds too good to be true, it probably is. That was the principle she had developed over her many years in the palace. And Lloyd’s proposal was too good to be true with no risk involved in it for her. If he succeeded, she would acquire a trade route that would promise the imperial family hundreds of years of prosperity in exchange for the Tears of Summer. If he failed, she would not obtain a trade route but would keep the Tears of Summer. Ultimately, she would not even have the smallest loss either way.

No, I will benefit even before then. My political influence will strengthen from acting as a mediator over the divided nobles.

As such, the queen pondered whether she should believe Lloyd’s intentions to be pure. But what if he had an ulterior motive? She even considered the worst-case scenario to be safe. Finally, she came to a conclusion.

If he does have an ulterior motive and stages a riot against the imperial family... None of us would be able to stop him.

Any resistance on her part would simply result in the loss of her sovereignty. Should any coup break out, the best way to mitigate the damage would be to console him and treat his fiefdom as an independent kingdom. This clearly meant one thing: she could no longer make an enemy out of him. It would be playing with fire.

Did I let the fire grow too large?

She wistfully thought out of nowhere. Just then, a surefire solution for her concern suddenly came to the queen’s mind.

Should I make him a member of the imperial family?

That appeared to be the more compelling option. Despite the fact that they were political partners on good terms, their relationship was something that could change at any time based on the opportunities that were present. It could be safer to completely tie him down through marriage.

Tsk...

When her thoughts reached that point, the queen clucked her tongue. She irately wondered how she ended up in her current predicament. Lloyd's chestnut-shaped head looked even more spiteful in her eyes, and she felt a pang of regret for not beating him up properly two days ago. But those thoughts and feelings of hers vanished as quickly as they appeared. She immediately erased the conflicted look that briefly appeared on her face and studied the chamber room with her signature gaze full of arrogance and intimidation.

"Very good," she announced. "As you can all see, being a wise man, Lloyd Frontera agreed to go through my test. Now, it is your turn to speak. Is there anyone who opposes the agreement I devised?"

As expected, no one spoke up. The nobles from both sides all bowed to show their respect. However, the expressions on their faces suggested otherwise. The supporters of the prophecy had a bitter look in their eyes and clicked their tongues in disappointment.

Haah... Her Majesty is siding with the opposition in the end.

To them, the test sounded more like a complete refusal to bestow Lloyd with the Tears of Summer. They believed the agreement was only a formality. A proclamation to disregard the prophecy. Their interpretation of the situation wasn't unreasonable.

A trade route across the Pantara Range? I know Lloyd Frontera is exceptionally skilled and has an impressive record of achievements... But this is an impossible construction to begin with.

A number of former kings had attempted to open a trade route in the aforementioned range. There were nine attempts in total, and they all failed. This would be the tenth failure. Lloyd would be unable to obtain the Tears of Summer. It was never going to happen. The proponents saw this as a simple fact, and the same thought lingered in the minds of the opposing faction.

Fantastic. Her Majesty has sided with us!

Inwardly, the opposing nobles rejoiced. The condition that Lloyd would only receive the Tears of Summer if he completed such an impossible construction was the same as refusing to give the divine item to him. They all nodded, satisfied and happy.

Her Majesty is truly wise. Of course, that's how it should be. We cannot give away a divine item of the imperial family to a lowly retainer, even if it's to follow a prophecy delivered by an angel. That cannot be done, even if it's just for the sake of protecting the dignity of the imperial family. It is unacceptable, even if not doing so goes against a prophecy from Heaven.

They did, however, entertain the possibility of Lloyd accomplishing the impossible and successfully constructing a trade route. That would not be a bad outcome for them either.

Although it is unlikely.

Therefore, the opposing faction exchanged glances and quietly celebrated their victory, overjoyed that their side had won. Javier and Julian were whispering in one corner.

"Sir Asrahan," whispered Julian softly.

"Yes, Master Julian."

"About Her Majesty's declaration," he said. "That looks unfavorable to Lloyd on the facade. But that is not the case in reality, is it? Lloyd intentionally masterminded this whole situation, hasn't he?"

“He likely did,” seconded Javier.

“Yes, that should be it. That’s the kind of person my brother is.”

“Yes,” seconded Javier once again. “He is sly, cheap, meticulous, and never does anything that will come at a loss for him.”

Julian looked at Javier for a second in a daze. “He sounds impressive somehow when you say it like that...”

“In what way?”

“Well, in many ways.”

Javier was slightly taken aback that he was feeling the same way. “I agree...”

None of them knew whether that was a compliment or an insult directed at Lloyd. At the same time, one question appeared simultaneously.

I wonder what goes through that man’s mind.

It remained a mystery to them. How cunning and calculated did one have to be to be able to pull this scheme off? But there was one thing they were both certain of. The queen, who expertly reacted and danced to Lloyd’s cunning tune at every chance without fail, was equally extraordinary. In terms of business, those two were none other than soulmates. And accordingly, Queen Alicia and Lloyd were staring at each other with a mysterious smile amidst the mixture of emotions from the nobles around them. Their smiles seemed to say, “It’s a deal!”

♣

The following morning rolled around. Lloyd, who had appeared at the chamber room the previous day, immediately left the capital.

Now that things have gone well with the queen, it’s time for me to get back to work!

This went without saying for Lloyd. There was no time to take a break. Since he successfully completed his negotiation with the queen, it was time for him to put in some hard work and obtain results.

That thought makes me happy and sad at the same time...

Lloyd let out a heavy sigh. He wished he could take a break and relax like the rich and lazy bum he fantasized dreamed of being. Would his dream of becoming a wealthy bum with a secure lifestyle ever come true? Lloyd was suddenly overcome with a sense of doubt that made his shoulders sag.

I want to rest. I want to play. I want to laze around, playing video games and watching TV in the corner of my room, giggling and chuckling over nothing with a bucket of fried chicken.

Lloyd couldn't recall the last time he did any of those activities. Those resentful thoughts of his, however, were fleeting. He slapped his cheeks to wake himself up, then confirmed Draggy was currently flying in the right path, and finally raised his head.

Whoosh! A gust of cold wind stung his cheeks. Between the thick strands of hair blowing in front of his eyes, he could see the Pantara Range spread out below him.

"Haah..."

Lloyd realized once more how rough the terrain of the range was. It looked like there were knife or ax blades randomly planted everywhere in the ground. Alternatively, the land seemed to have hundreds of potato chips embedded across it. The steep and clean-cut cliffs seemed to go on forever. That was Lloyd's initial thoughts after seeing the Pantara Range.

Not only are the slopes steep, there are several parts of the land covered in ice and permafrost.

It looked so slippery that the best climbers in the world or even spider men would double-check their life insurance before stepping foot on it. That was how dangerous the range was.

Tsk. I’m a madman, too, for volunteering to make a railroad across this place.

It was so ridiculous that even Lloyd let out a chuckle at the thought himself. The feeling must have been mutual as Javier curiously threw him a question, “Master Lloyd, are you sure you can... build a railroad here?”

“Seems impossible, right?”

“Yes,” Javier said, nodding. “I’ve become familiar with your design for trains and railroads after helping you with the construction in Hell. But how you could install a railroad on a terrain like this with such deep slopes is beyond me. Even if you do, I doubt the train will be able to properly travel upward.”

“You’re right,” Lloyd agreed with a nod. It was an excellent and accurate point. It would be impossible for any train to move upward on these cliffs, even with an amazing railroad that featured loops and switchbacks. It was completely impossible. That was an undeniable fact. Lloyd understood this better than anyone else.

Of course, it won’t run. Trains run on metal rails. But if they’re slippery and sloped, accidents are bound to happen.

And that was why South Korean companies designated the maximum slope of a railroad to 35‰.

The elevation difference was limited to under 114 feet for every kilometer along a railroad. If it surpassed that, the train would have a risk of slipping.

The maximum permissible difference in elevation per kilometer was 114 feet. Anything beyond that would jeopardize the operation of a railroad. But in this case...

Looks like it’s 114 feet for every 30 feet distance, and that’s for areas with tolerably steep slopes.

The trains literally needed wings to run. Despite the obvious challenge at hand, Lloyd was unconcerned.

“I wouldn’t have suggested the offer to the queen if the job was impossible,” replied Lloyd.

“Does that mean you have a way?”

“Of course.”

“What is that?”

“Are you curious?”

“I am.” Javier gave a nod. He was genuinely interested. He was curious about the extraordinary methods and skills his young master would employ to overcome the challenges this horrifying terrain presented.

Lloyd gave a brazen smile. “I am going to break it down to pieces.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 342: A Path Through a Mountain Range (2)

“I am going to break down the range into pieces.” Lloyd’s casual response came with a puckish smile.

Javier closed his mouth. He gave Lloyd a long look before speaking. “Did you... take any sort of substance this morning...?”

“No, I am fine,” dismissed Lloyd.

“You did not suffer from a head injury?” asked Javier again.

Lloyd frowned. “I said I’m fine.”

“Serious stress?” postulated Javier once again.

“I’m fine,” insisted Lloyd.

“Or are you going through a midlife crisis?”

“Hey, I’ve got many years before that hits me.”

“If not, have you started to lose clumps of hair by chance?”

“Hey.” Lloyd stared hard at Javier.

“Yes?”

“I’m telling you. I’m fine.”

“...”

“Trust me.”

“Okay, I will trust you.”

“Really?”

“Yes,” Javier replied, his voice cynical and distant. “I should believe you since you are very confident. Yes, you did not consume any drugs in the morning, been in a car accident, been under a lot of stress, experienced a midlife crisis, or hair loss.”

“Not that...” Lloyd sighed. “Can’t you trust the very first thing I said?”

“Are you referring to the demolition of the mountain range?”

“Yeah.”

“I believe you.”

“Really?”

“I do.” Javier indicated with a nod. He meant it. “You have always been this way. You propose an outrageous plan, and it works out in real life every time. That’s why I am going to trust you now as well.”

“Because I seem nuts?”

“Yes, because you seem like a madman,” deadpanned Javier.

“A madman...?”

“It is a compliment,” defied Javier.

“A compliment? That was a compliment?”

“It was,” explained the knight. “That’s the measure I use to determine whether I can trust you or not.”

“Tsk...” Lloyd licked his bitter lips. It appeared he had failed to properly teach Javier. “I’m starting to feel that the more I act out, the more you trust me.”

“You told me the same thing before,” pointed out Javier. “That the more you act like a madman, the more I should trust you. And that is why I am doing this. You've never looked crazier than when you declared to destroy the range just a moment ago."

"Aha," remarked Lloyd. "That must mean you suddenly felt a strong urge to trust me."

"Of course."

Lloyd came to a decision. He had done a miserable job at providing guidance to Javier and had no clue what kind of impression the knight even had of him. The problem was that it was too late to change Javier's opinion of him now. "Well, I'm not saying that I'm going to demolish the whole range," Lloyd spoke, a bitter smile forming at the corners of his mouth. "After all, as you mentioned, the range is very steep. It's basically a giant cliff. So, I will shave down only a portion of it. Just a smidgeon."

"Enough to install a railway?" asked Javier dubiously.

"Correct," affirmed Lloyd. "If we recklessly shave down too much, the foundation could become unstable, so just enough for us to get the job done."

It was true. Lloyd's plan did not include demolishing the range or removing the peak because it would require too much labor, money, and time. Furthermore, destroying the entire mountain range would only benefit other people, not him.

The trade route should remain under the control of the Magentano House as long as it's operational. So a wide open road that's accessible to everyone would be less advantageous for the imperial family."

And Queen Magentano wouldn't want that to happen.

Of course, this is why I considered alternative methods. Such as boring a tunnel beneath the range, installing cable cars, or constructing a cog railway along the slopes.

But each of these options was problematic. For starters, the first option of the underground tunnel would be an extremely challenging project.

To do so, I'll have to investigate the entire foundation under the range. That will take a very long time to do. And what about the building? Even with Bangul, it will take several years before I can safely build a tunnel that stretches thousands of feet long.

The outcome of such a large construction wouldn't be worth the time, cost, and effort required for it. The project was not cost-effective, to put it simply.

And the main problem with a cable railway is with its safety.

Cable railways or cars used the same mechanism that was involved with pulling a bucket of water from a well. They worked by having a train car be pulled upward or downward with the help of a cable.

Yes, it's a simple system. And I wouldn't have to spend as much time polishing the terrain of the range. That's a clear advantage of the cable railway. However, it's also extremely dangerous and high maintenance. A single snag in the railway's cable would cause a disaster.

Lloyd's shoulders clenched in fear as he imagined the cable cars crashing to the ground as the cable holding them up snapped in half.

And the cog railway? It is impossible.

The technique was frequently used to build roller coasters in amusement parks.

The cogs tick and clack as the roller coaster slowly rises. The cogwheels underneath the roller coasters fit the other cogwheels planted in the center of the track and get pulled upward.

In some ways, it was the ideal railway for this kind of mountain range. The problems caused by the steep slopes of the terrain would be adequately mitigated by it, and the only drawbacks were the horrendous vibrations and noise it created. But neither of these two issues mattered since the road was going to be used for transportation of cargo. However, there was one major reason Lloyd did not choose this technique.

I’m not that familiar with it.

Lloyd exhaled a sigh. He was a civil engineer who had no knowledge of mechanical engineering. What cogs were used in this kind of railway, what their standard measurements were, and the principles behind pulling a car against a steep slope... Lloyd couldn’t answer any of these questions.

For that tragic reason... The cog railway is not a possibility.

That eventually left him with only one viable option, which was to destroy a section of the range. The conditions of the range were favorable enough for it, much to his relief.

I have Draggy.

Its massive physique. Its power and endurance, which far exceeded that of an ordinary dragon. On top of that, its complete devotion to Lloyd. Draggy was a perfect excavator in every sense of the word.

So! It’s time to buckle up and get my hands dirty!

Lloyd clenched his fists. There is no time for a break. Though he felt a wave of sadness and resentment for a brief moment, he jumped and got to work after pushing his thoughts away. His first task was obviously surveying.

It'll be best to check over the terrain with my own eyes rather than depend on old documents. Survey!

[Scanning will begin.]

Bzzt!

Lloyd scanned the vast expanse of land beneath Draggy’s back. There was no need to survey the entire range.

Just about 30 miles from this spot.

Lloyd sharply surveyed the Pantara Range after activating his skill. The area he surveyed had a slight tilt toward the southeast from its center.

This is the best place for a trade route. It's also close to the original passageway in the east.

There wasn't a path across the mountains, but an older route that went around the eastern range did exist. Accordingly, Lloyd was surveying an area close to this original pathway.

That's what will allow me to build the new railway near the original pathway.

The thing was any new construction ought to be close to the existing facilities. Period. That was the unchanging truth. This was the case for South Korea, for instance.

People there were willing to go to great lengths to buy a home less than three minutes away from key infrastructure such as train stations, forests, schools, and supermarkets.

Why? This ensured rising house prices and a more comfortable lifestyle. The same principle could be applied here.

Obviously. It'll be troublesome and less efficient if the new trade route sits far from the existing pathway.

Moreover, building a trade route in this part of the mountain offered two advantages.

First advantage. It sits right in the middle of Magenta, the kingdom's capital city, and Namaran, the trade city of the northeast. This means that both cities will enjoy the benefits of the trade route. Port Cremo in the northeast will also indirectly benefit from it.

The second advantage?

This part of the range looks like it'll be the easiest to work with.

This was actually the biggest factor of consideration for him. Lloyd's eyes quickly raked over around three or four peaks in the range.

They look extremely narrow at a glance, but they actually aren't. It's only their peak that's narrow. The rest of the land is quite leveled. In fact, the width of a mountain range is wider than other types of terrains.

The Pantara Range was a hellish landscape with high, elongated, and narrow features. It was disgustingly tall and long in comparison to its sickeningly narrow width, and these characteristics gave it the appearance of a slew of window screens. However, the section Lloyd was looking at right now was slightly wider than the rest.

Similar in height. Broader in width. That's suggestive of a gentle slope.

However, it wasn't positioned perfectly enough for him to build a railway on it right away.

But who cares. This is the best spot no matter how I see it.

Lloyd found a cave to nestle in after two days of meticulous surveying and analyzed the gathered data in detail while grilling wild boar over the bonfire and chomping on it with Javier. He then went on to design it.

Let's see. What should I demolish before setting down the road?

Pondering intensely, Lloyd thought about a similar construction project on earth, the Darjeeling Himalayan Railroad.

It pretty much had the same conditions as this project. The railroad from Darjeeling to New Jalpaiguri was... What... 54 miles? I think? And the maximum elevation difference was 7,414 feet.

As a consequence, the elevation difference over the 54-mile journey was 7,414 feet. Even in today's modern world, that was outrageous. Lloyd's heart swelled with hope as he realized this magnificent structure was completed in 1881.

If those tea-loving people managed to pull it off, there's no reason I can't. Plus, they only took 26 months to complete the construction. So, I can definitely do it too. Of course, the terrain is rougher here, but I have Draggy and the fantastical creatures. The Skeleton Corps is also there for me. Javier, too.

Everything was in order. All he had to do was trust them and move forward. Lloyd continued developing his idea to destroy the range. His plan proceeded smoothly, and its execution was a breeze. This was all due to his Construction Guideline ability.

Ding dong.

[Design Skill Option ④: Construction Guideline has been activated.]

[Construction Guideline - The blueprint you have designed is marked in the actual terrain in the form of the guideline. This guideline will be visible not only to the designer but also to the workers on the site, and the workers will learn in real-time whether they are faithfully adhering to the blueprint (The Construction Guideline is synced to ② Floor Plan Marking (2D.).]

After opening the design data, Lloyd applied the data he obtained from running multiple simulations to real action.

Crackle...!

Lloyd felt his mana dip slightly as glowing blue lines drew around the range. These were the marks created by the Construction Guideline.

There. The rift between the peaks that look like ice cream cones and beer bottles.

Crackle!

Lloyd drew a line parallel to the rift between the two towering peaks. Following that, various engravings appeared on the gentle slope. Lloyd implemented his plan for the range with his design skill after some big and small cuts and fillings, as he considered the strength, direction, composition, and overall balance. It was then Draggy's turn to work.

"Draggy, you know what to do, right?"

Clack!

"Hey! You do? You sure of it?"

Crack!

Draggy nodded its giant head, gesturing with his hands and feet.

Claack! Craack! Crack!

"Hmm... Yes. Dig, carve, and fill in the rift along the glowing bluish lines. You're right. And?"

Creak! Craaack! Snap!

"Don't throw away rocks and soil in random places while you dig and put them aside in their designated spot... Good. I believe there are still a few more precautions?" asked Lloyd as if there were more."

Crack! Clack! Creak!

"Good. Fold up your wings when you're moving around. Don't abruptly rock your tail or swing it around when you pivot. There you go. That's it. You remembered everything."

Clack! Crack!"

Draggy hula-danced in delight after receiving its long-awaited compliment. Lloyd was satisfied. He looked at Javier and said nonchalantly, "Now, I need you to hold down the fort here."

"Come again?" Javier retorted in annoyed shock.

“You need to hold down the fort here,” repeated Lloyd with equal nonchalance.

“Young Master...? What do you mean?” Javier cocked his head to the side.

Lloyd gave a brazen smile. “I need to visit a few places. So, you’ll have to supervise the construction site while Draggy takes down the mountain range.”

“

“Me? Supervise the site?”

“Yeah. It’s nothing difficult. You can use the construction guidelines. All you need to do is dig, carve, and fill in the area that has been outlined.”

Javier was speechless.

“Just make sure Draggy follows the guide,” added Lloyd, “If some areas aren’t properly carved down or filled in, tell him to do it again or do a bit of shoveling yourself. Got it?”

“I see...” replied Javier hesitantly. “But where are you going, Young Master?”

“Me? The capital, Namaran, and Cremo.?

“What business do you have there?”

“What else?” Lloyd’s shameless grin widened. It was as if he was going to meet up with a friend to retrieve what he had lent him or to a bank to withdraw money. “I’m going to empty the royal treasury,” he said with a shameless smile and expression.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 343: A Path Through a Mountain Range (3)

Construction sites were not merely places for digging and erecting things from the ground. With all the materials, laborers, and miscellaneous costs involved, they also set the perfect stage for extravagant spending. There was money quietly, no, outright being poured into them, and that was typical everywhere around the world.

This has always been true throughout history. There have been hundreds of countries, dynasties, kings, and nobles that became obsessed over a massive construction project. There have been more than a few times when that obsession caused financial ruin for those who didn't consider the impact it would have on their wallet.

Construction sites weren't something to be overlooked. This was especially true the larger they were.

"And we're boring a tunnel into the range. And who commissioned the job to us?" asked Lloyd rhetorically.

"Her Majesty gave you the order as a form of test," replied Javier coolly.

"Right," affirmed Lloyd. "Then, who should pay for the construction?"

"Well, of course—"

"You are right!" Lloyd clapped loudly. "She should pay. Why should I use my own money? And that's why-"

"You are draining the royal treasury," Javier interrupted.

Lloyd put on a scowl. "Hey, drain the treasury? You are being dramatic."

Javier stared at Lloyd, narrowing his eyes.

"All I am doing is billing someone who commissioned a construction project so that I can purchase the required materials for it."

Lloyd spoke in a direct tone as if his response was common sense. Yes, the House of Magentano commissioned this construction project, and he was the contracted developer.

To sum up, I'm the developer. The queen's the property owner. Moreover, she's the richest property owner across the entire continent. There's no need for a credit construction.

Credit construction was when a developer covered a portion of the costs for a construction project since not every property owner in the world had an overflowing budget to work with.

The truth is that most property owners are slightly short on money, and that's why some developers offer loans in exchange for signing a contract with them.

This made it easier to start and complete construction projects. The property owners would gather funds while a construction was in progress to pay off their remaining balance. That was the general idea of a credit construction. However, now...

There's no need for that! Why should I when she has plenty of money to burn?

With no exaggeration, there was no need for him to spend a penny. Moreover, he didn't want to for another reason.

"I have to freeze time."

He had to freeze the flow of time for this project, too, since it was expected to take a few months.

The Darjeeling Himalayan Railway took 26 months to complete. Though this railway won't take as much time, I expect it to take at least a year.

Lloyd tallied up the months. It appeared that a year was sufficient. "So, I need everything from materials to people before I freeze time since there would be no way to get them elsewhere once time freezes."

“Well, you have a point. So, your plan is to receive everything at once?”

“That’s right. Everything. All at once. I’ll be back. Meanwhile, watch over Draggy, okay?” Lloyd asked, thinking that he had no time to waste.

“You speak as if... you’re leaving me to watch your dog.”

“Well, somewhat?”

“Don’t you have any other assurances for me?”

“Assurances?” asked Lloyd with a baffled look.

Javier nodded. “Yes.”

“What assurances?” Lloyd cocked his chin. “Wait, you can’t be asking me for sweet words of assurance like, ‘be safe’, ‘don’t skip meals’, or ‘watch out for the flu’?”

“Of course not, sir. However...” Javier shook his head, replying in his cold voice. “In case you experience an unintended event.”

“Me? An unintended event?”

“Yes, like an unfortunate accident, a beheading from the queen after upsetting her, or dying from chronic pneumonia on your flight back home... Those kinds of events.”

“...”

“So,” Javier went on. “If your absence prolongs, what should I do after supervising Draggy?”

“Are you planning to cheer or something?”

“Is that what you want me to do?”

“No. Not at all. Never.” Lloyd chuckled. He knew Javier was joking as usual, but it didn’t sound like that to him.

Really, my death might be something worth celebrating. The restoration of destiny won't happen if I'm gone, after all.

Lloyd was certain of it, even though no one knew that Javier's role as the main character had been stolen by him. He laughed at the thought. "Don't say such scary words, and don't get any strange ideas either."

"Ideas?"

"Never mind, dude. "I'll be right back." Lloyd hopped on Ggoming and departed for the capital after a light tap on Javier's shoulders. Fortunately, he didn't have to meet Queen Magentano in person because she had already arranged a special budget for him.

I expected no less of the queen!

Come to think of it, she was always like this. Always a step ahead of him.

On top of that, the budget is extremely generous.

Lloyd nearly burst into tears when he saw the amount written on the check from the imperial house. It was more than enough for the construction. Because of the generous financial support, the construction gained momentum as Lloyd traveled to Namaran and Cremo, respectively. Everything went swimmingly during his visits to both places as well. When word got out that Lloyd, the city's savior, was looking for various supplies, including groceries, construction materials, and other necessities, all the merchants competed to help him. They lined up in front of him and offered to give him a special lower price. It was as if they were competing in a survival show, and Lloyd was the judge. After going through a buffet-style selection of his supplies, Lloyd completed his preparation in ten days and headed back to the range. The place changed dramatically in ten days. No, it had completely transformed.

"Haah..."

Lloyd exhaled in awe as he took in the sight around him. First, the cone-shaped and cylinder-shaped peaks around the rift that Lloyd planned to construct on were no longer there. More specifically, they had been cleanly broken down from the base, and the rift between them had also significantly changed. It was wider and easier on the eyes, with little change in altitude. Everything was going exactly as he had planned.

I know I ordered this myself, but it's impressive. Very impressive.

He felt a sense of accomplishment well up inside him. It was the exact outcome he had hoped for after experimenting with his simulation countless times.

Perfect.

This was good enough. He met all the minimum requirements to attempt the construction. However, there was one more thing he needed.

Everything has to be in place before I freeze the flow of time.

There was still a lot of work he needed to complete. Lloyd looked for Javier.

"Hey, are you sleeping?" Lloyd discovered Javier resting in front of a fire in his cave. Javier extended a plate with freshly grilled mushrooms toward him.

"Warm yourself first, Young Master," invited Javier. "I started grilling them earlier as I expected you to arrive soon."

"Are you sure I didn't catch you about to eat them all by yourself?"

"Looks like I have been caught," Javier said, playing along.

"I knew it. These aren't poisonous, by the way, right?"

"They are."

"For real?"

"No."

“Tsk.” Lloyd took the plate and ate it after carefully inspecting it. The warm and aromatic mushroom melted in his mouth. “Hey, do you have any more food you’ve squirreled away for yourself?” he asked, enjoying the remaining warmth in his mouth.

“No, Master Lloyd.”

“Good. Then, go and observe the area across the range.”

Javier sighed and looked hard at Lloyd in silence.

“Why? What? Why are you narrowing your eyes and glaring at me like that?”

“I was wondering if you are punishing me for not stashing away more food for you.”

“This isn’t a punishment.” Lloyd grinned as he chewed the mushroom. “I’m planning to fly around with Draggy in just a moment.”

“Fly around?”

“To Namaran and Cremo. I need to bring back the prepared supplies.”

“Oh.”

“That’s the reason. The whole range is going to be in an uproar while I fly around with Draggy.”

“Indeed. That should be the case. In fact, the place has been quite chaotic since a few days ago.”

“It was, right?”

“Yes. Ever since Sir Draggy demolished the two peaks of the range.”

“No surprise there.” Lloyd’s grin grew wider. It was only natural. After all, this was a massive undertaking. The two peaks had to be removed in order to widen the rift and smoothen the steep slopes. This was no ordinary foundation manicure. The terrain had been pretty much ripped apart and put back together.

“The construction affected the areas beyond the range as well, after all.” Since the railway would run in two directions, a number of places in the range had to be smoothed and flattened. “That likely caused a commotion in the kingdom across as the range was once impassable to anyone, merchants or military alike, and served as a natural blockade for them against the Magentano Kingdom.”

And boom! As if it were a sculptor, the Bone Dragon randomly appeared and began to destroy the mountains, breaking down, carving out, and filling in the rough terrains. In the eyes of those on the other side of the range, that would have looked like a disastrous, terrifying invasion.

“The military should be rushing here now since the Bone Dragon appeared out of nowhere and started destroying the area that they deemed to be secure. Well, that’s a good thing for us anyway,” explained Lloyd in a calm voice.

“Good for us?”

“The range belongs to nobody under international law. It’s an unexplored area that can be developed without anyone’s permission as long as they have the skills and capital.”

“So, you are saying that everything is fine as we are developing the land within those parameters.”

“Yeah. And it’s not like we’re harming them.”

“But they must be petrified.”

“That is why I need you to be watching out on the other side.” Lloyd pricked the last mushroom piece. “The patrollers should be approaching to assess the situation. Or the military may arrive. That’s a problem. We don’t want them to figure out what we’re up to because this site is ours.”

“Why?”

“Simple. According to international law, the first to develop becomes the owner. So, we can well expect that they’ll put up a fight once they realize we’re doing this to build the trade route because it will eventually belong to the Magentano Kingdom, and they won’t be happy for the direct route to open up. So I need you to put a stop to it.”

“Stop them from coming up here?”

“Yeah. That way they won’t notice what’s going on here. However, don’t hit or kill them until I come back with Draggy. Can you do it?”

“Yes. It is doable.”

“Good.” It was done. Javier could do it. He could shoo away dozens of patrollers so simply and easily. It would be the case even if they barged in with hundreds and thousands of armies.

Anyway, this guy is just something.

Lloyd felt strange all of a sudden. He couldn’t believe that a man like Javier was following him. How? Why? This moment, following his instructions, sharing jokes, and sitting around the bonfire with him, suddenly seemed bizarre to Lloyd.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. When I read it, he was this fictional character I found cool and could only hope to hang out.

Lloyd stared hard at Javier sitting across from him. Javier, feeling the gaze, looked back strangely. “Master Lloyd? Why are you staring at me like that?”

“Oh, your brows are slightly asymmetrical.”

“My brows?”

“Yeah.”

“So...?”

“What do you mean, so? That shows you’re human too.”

“It makes me human that my eyebrows are not proportionate?”

“Yeah. It means that you are not perfect.”

“That means you are very human.”

“Hey.”

“If I look up close, it’s hard to find anything on your face that’s proportionate. Your eyebrows, eyes, and eyelids. Your nose bridge is a little wonky. Your nostrils are also different sizes. Crud. Disproportion is your face. And your personality. Whew. Let us not go there.”

“Ha... I hope millions of soldiers come marching here while I’m gone.”

“Do you wish for me to die, Young Master?”

“Yeah.”

A gutted look flashed across Javier’s face for a second.

“I’m joking. You know that, right?” Lloyd smiled like a naughty child, worried.

“Yes. I was joking too.”

“That my entire face is disproportionate?”

“No. That you are human.”

“...”

“That was the joke.”

“...”

Dammit. Lloyd cursed inwardly, thinking he would have punched Javier if he hadn’t been grandmaster. Lloyd then laughed, hoping that Javier would not die and that their story would not end with one of them dying or disappearing. He promised he’d make that happen. The night darkened as the brightly lit bonfire burned in front of them. At the same time, in the corner of the mountains, the Elemental King of the Pantara Range, who was slowly losing control over his territory, icily glared at the two of them.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 344: The Elemental King’s Regret (1)

Elementals were created through the pure power of nature. Similar to ghosts, they were barely visible to the human eye, difficult to touch, and impossible to detect. Furthermore, they despised humans as their powers came from living in a pure environment of untouched nature. That meant they lost territory and power from the resulting damage of human contact and urban development. Just like what was happening now in the Pantara Range.

Pantalisa’s sad eyes darted to the shattered rock fragments. But they weren’t just shards of rock in his eyes. He recalled what they used to be.

“My love, it’s a shame. You had been beautiful and elegant for tens of thousands of years...”

Pantalisa remembered the day this range was raised up with the tectonic pressure from the ground, the way it soared through the sky, how it stood tall in the face of blizzards and gusts of wind for so many seasons. This piece of stone, once part of a boulder that protected one side of the range, was a quiet and dependable friend of his. However, now...

It had been obliterated. Hopelessly smashed to smithereens. The rock elemental that drew strength from it had vanished. Pantalisa had no way of knowing whether it had been extinguished or relocated. But one thing was certain. He had lost an old friend.

Step. Step. Pantalisa strode across the path, which was littered with tiny stone fragments and a plethora of marks and traces of human destruction. The tens of thousands of acres of permafrost, the snowflakes that walked over it, the high winds that carried the snowflakes, and the mossy shrubs that lovingly grew even as they trembled against it. The elementals inside everything had disappeared. He assumed they had been extinguished or fled. It made him sad to imagine them wailing over the loss of their homes and fleeing as they wiped their tears. That fact infuriated him.

His gaze advanced slowly toward a small cave on the range's flank, past the ruins of the peak. From inside, a bonfire light spilled out, reflecting two swaying human shadows. They belonged to the humans who had just arrived on the range and caused havoc.

"What am I supposed to do with them...?"

Pantalisa felt a strong desire to kill them right now. He wanted to rip their bodies apart using the wrath of nature. He couldn't, however, because he was a spiritual being with an amorphous body. It was physically impossible for him to touch humans. That unfortunate fact inflamed his rage even more.

The Pantara Range was one of the few places untouched by human presence... But now... Why?

His icy stare at the cave became even colder as he considered how to eliminate those humans and restore the land his friends had lost.

***

Five days passed. Lloyd had visited the Frontera fiefdom alone with Draggy until now. But when he returned, he flew back together with the Skeleton Soldiers. The indomitable balls of energy who never complained about hunger or fatigue from sleep deprivation.

Looking at the proud 200 skeletons, Lloyd said, "Got it? You guys are frontrunners. My question is, for what?"

Turtle Neck, the leader of Skeleton Corps, raised its hands and stepped forward before scribbling something in the snow.

[We are the most handsome group of frontrunners!]

"Wrong..." Lloyd sighed. "I explained on the flight here. Anyone remember?"

This time, Square Jaw stepped forward.

[Construction of shower facilities for workers!]

“Great,” Lloyd chirped happily, “That was close. Anything else?”

[Accommodation! Cafeteria! Exercise facilities! Arcade room!]

“Exercise facilities are unnecessary. And an arcade room? You’ve gone too far. Anyway, you all are somewhat close. As frontrunners, you are in charge of building the camps for the laborers to sleep in.”

Lloyd took a look around at the rest of the Skeleton Corps. There were no better frontrunners for the construction of the worker’s facilities despite the harsh conditions here since they did not require food or rest.

The environment is harsh, and technically speaking, there’s no infrastructure here.

With the constant terror of blizzards and freezing temperatures in the area, they needed basic amenities and lodging facilities to stay for the entirety of the construction. This would be even more true after the flow of time was stopped.

I can’t send the workers outside this area since the rest of the world will be frozen. That means I’ll have to keep them here until the construction is finished.

Lloyd considered just proceeding with the construction at first but abandoned the plan after estimating that he would go beyond the one-year limit of the Time Freeze skill with only the skeletons’ help.

The Skeleton Corps aren’t enough. I need workers with more real-world experience. That is why there needs to be facilities for those individuals can stay in for a year.

Therefore, the Skeleton Corps first arrived to build the workers’ facilities.

“So,” said Lloyd to the Skeleton Corps, “Your work here will determine the life quality, safety, and happiness of the workers here.”

Clack!

Their heads bobbed in understanding.

“And make sure not to overwork yourselves,” Lloyd added. I know you all don’t eat or need breaks. However, it’s bitterly cold here. Remember what I told you on our flight? Frozen Shoulder. You respond this time. What precaution did I give you?”

[We need to warm ourselves around the bonfire every hour, so our bones will not freeze!]

“Good, you remember it well,” Lloyd said, making Frozen Shoulder smile. “Even if you can work indefinitely, the cold climate will make ice freeze between joints. It could cause you to trip and break your bones. So, keep my words in mind. Bonfire, every hour. Remember that.”

Creak!

“All right,” said Lloyd, “Let’s go over the blueprint of the lodging house you all will build.”

Lloyd lifted the scroll of paper that contained the design for the lodging facilities and opened it up for everyone to see.

***

The construction went swimmingly. It had to be due to its ever-so simple architecture.

“Got it? From here to there. The same as how it’s marked in the blueprint. Terraced all the way along the cliff slope.” Lloyd explained the concept behind the lodging facilities to Javier.

Staring at the blueprint, Javier asked, “Are you filling up the sides with logs?”

“Yeah, like a staircase.”

“Then, the ceiling of the lower floor would serve as the front garden of the upper floor.”

“Exactly,” replied Lloyd happily. “You are quick to understand.”

“Hence, my dislike,” said Javier under his breath.”

“For what?”

“I know what you are going to do from now on. You will be traveling around after delegating this job to me, abandoning me here at this site,” grumbled Javier.

“Come on, come on. Abandon you?” Lloyd spoke in a lighthearted tone. “This is a necessary process. So, make sure you’re doing a good job of supervising your skeleton pals. And one more thing. Did I explain to you how elves’ houses should be different?”

“Yes, you did,” said Javier with a resigned look on his face. “Don’t use any form of wood, including logs.”

Lloyd nodded. “So, dig out a few caves and carve some ice for doors.”

“Haah... I understand, Master Lloyd.”

Javier and Lloyd then went back to work. Javier buckled down and concentrated on constructing the lodging accommodations with the Skeleton Corps, all the while keeping an eye out for any suspicious movements beyond the range. Lloyd, on the other hand, traveled around the kingdom with Draggy, transporting the bundles of supplies he had previously purchased in Cremo and Namaran for the Pantara Range. It felt similar to shopping for a month’s worth of groceries. Following the transfer of goods, the workers would be moved next.

“Okay! Hop on! Quickly now!”

Every time Lloyd passed through the Frontera fiefdom, there was a raucous exclamation from the laborers on Draggy’s back. The first to set out for the range were 300 orc warriors.

Whoosh! When Draggy’s wings spread wide to lift everyone to great heights at great speed, the Frontera fiefdom shrank dramatically, and everything from the manor to the wetland, terraced field, apartment complexes, and eastern range diminished to the size of a toy as the entire landscape spanned beneath them. This enthralled the orc warriors.

“O-oink! We’re flying! We’re flying! Oink!”

“Mom! I’m a flying orc now! Oink!”

“Father! I’ve floated all the way up, oink!”

“Honey! I love you, oink!”

“A couple...! Oink!”

“A traitor! Throw him outside, oink!”

Following the strong and brawny orc warriors, the White Calvary lancers arrived, followed by the elf archers. Then there was the Engineering Corps. Corgidus and dwarf blacksmiths were the last to arrive.

Lloyd was taken aback by the dwarves. When he noticed a strange figure in the crowd, he led him to a corner and asked, “Mister Solitas? What exactly are you doing here?”

“I don’t feel comfortable...” Solitas’s face flushed with an emotion Lloyd couldn’t make out.

“Eh?”

“Did you know?” Solitas spoke in a shaky voice. “The existence of the guest slumbering in the guest’s chamber?”

“Guest’s chamber? Oh, you mean—”

“Yes! The Dragon King Verkis.” Solitas’s eyes burned with indignation. “Shouldn’t you have at least told me if he was here? Why didn’t you even give me a hint?”

“So, I guess you met him...”

“I did. I did get to meet him. I also didn’t recognize him. As a result, I... Haah. Forget about it.” Solitas sighed deeply. His failure to recognize Verkis cost him dearly. He was trapped in a lizard’s body for 24 hours, which was a humiliating, embarrassing, and terrifying experience.

I have never felt so powerless before. I couldn’t do anything.

Solitas tried to break the spell. But when that proved impossible, he was forced to admit that he would be trapped in that body for an entire day, which he spent hiding in between rocks in fear of being eaten by cats or caught by naughty kids eager to grill him.

I don’t want to tell him what I had to go through.

It hurt his pride to tell him the story. Solitas thus worked hard to appear unconcerned. “Anyway, being left at the fiefdom with such a strong presence is not comfortable. In addition, I have more to learn from my teacher.”

“Yes, I’m sure it is.” Lloyd nodded, understanding where Solitas was coming from wholeheartedly.

It’d be like an employee being forced to spend the day in the same room as their company’s CEO. It must be extremely taxing. Plus, I’m sure he’ll want to continue learning from Corgidus.

Since there would be no more sludge to burn as the world would freeze soon, Lloyd concluded that it’d be all right for Solitas to be here.

“Anyway, welcome. Unpack your stuff in your room first.”

Everyone arrived and was immediately assigned to their respective rooms. The food, materials, and supplies for them were fully prepared. Everything was set for the start of the construction.

Great. Once it’s past noon tomorrow, I’ll freeze the passage of time.

Lloyd thought as he observed the sky darkening between the light snowflakes. He then went to bed, knowing that all he had to do the next day was choose the right time to freeze time and begin construction.

The next morning, however, everyone at the site was greeted with a disastrous blizzard caused by the Elemental King throughout the range. The violent and cruel snowstorm arrived with biting cold, rendering construction to be impossible. As a result, excitement stirred amongst workers.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 345: The Elemental King’s Regret (2)

“Here comes the snow... Snow... It’s falling from the sky... It’s coming down... In buckets... Dammit.”

Swooosh! A strong wind started to blow all over, and snowflakes came scattering everywhere. Each snowflake was the size of a baseball, and the wind from this blizzard appeared to be sharp enough to cut his skin. Lloyd blankly chuckled at the sight.

“Ahaha. Dammit.”

Now that all the supplies and laborers were in place, he planned to deliver a grand speech and stop the flow of time. He planned to start constructing the historic railway that would cross through the Pantara Range.

What rotten timing. Out of all days, there had to be a blizzard today.

Lloyd sighed, looking up at the sky, wondering if the blizzard couldn't have come at a worse time. But he couldn't see the sky because everything was foggy and gray from the swirling snowflakes.

Looks like construction won’t happen today.

Even with the Bone Dragon, a grandmaster, and a team of experienced workers, no construction could take place in this kind of climate. Humans couldn’t win against nature.

It’ll only harm me in the end if I waste energy by acting stubbornly.

Lloyd licked his lips in bemusement as he watched the storm. He suddenly remembered how much he despised monsoon season in South Korea.

I couldn’t earn money during those seasons.

Working paused on many construction fields when the monsoon season arrived and the weather turned bad. That meant he had fewer opportunities for pay.

The thing about this line of work is that you seem to make a lot when you just look at your daily wage. In the long run, however, with all of your forced breaks and whatnot, the total sum is surprisingly low.

As a result, he detested monsoon season. He despised rain and snow. However, his sentiment was not shared by everyone at the site.

The old men who didn't have much greed for money, or the people who waited a few days for their last paycheck to run out before working again. Those men didn't like working too hard, and actually enjoyed having occasional downtime.

Lloyd's gaze crawled from the sky to the ground toward the campsite. Workers were cheering and shouting in joy in the front yard.

"Snow! Oink!"

"How fun! Oink!"

"So tasty! Oink!"

The Orc warriors were having as much fun as wild boars in the mountains. They even stripped half-naked and joyously had a snow fight while flexing their muscles.

"Heavy snow! Awesome! That's why! We have no work! Oink!"

"Blizzard! Cold! Rubbing it against my muscles! Helps with training! Oink!"

"Large snowflakes! Chilled to the core! Eating them makes my stomach tremble! Bulking up my intestines! Oink!"

Stop it, you nutjobs...

Lloyd sighed deeply, gradually beginning to understand the project owners' anxiety every time inclement weather halted construction in South Korea.

The construction period grows longer, proportionately wasting more time and money. Haah.

Lloyd, on the other hand, had no choice. The others had a different attitude from him. And so, he decided to accept the blizzard. Meanwhile, most of the workers were ecstatic, including the White Cavalry's members, who were known for their bravery and honor.

"It feels like we came here for vacation since we have no work to do with heavy snow and can just laze around in bed all day," a lancer said.

"Yeah," agreed the other. "It snowed just like this during the war in the Panos Plains."

"Oh, that had been very exciting. The number of frostbite patients there were."

"Yeah. Compared to that, this storm is nothing but a gentle breeze. Really, a breeze."

"You are right. I went out for some fresh air, and it was warm then."

"I know, right? I wish it'd stay like this. That way we can laze around meanwhile."

"That is exactly what I mean."

Given that the White Cavalry lancers had already endured all sorts of weather conditions in their battles, this blizzard did not weaken their resolve or military spirit. The elves reacted differently to the blizzard.

"Woww! What a fresh breeze of nature!"

"The grace of nature!"

"A pleasant gift!"

The elves had always preferred to go along with nature. They accepted whatever climate that nature provided. If the wind was hot and humid, that was what it was. If it was cold, well. It was cold then. Here in this mountain range, their ability to adapt to any climate shone through.

The dwarves also adapted to the blizzard in their own unique way.

“Excuse me, Master Corgidus, are you not cold?”

“Are you?” retorted Corgidus.

“Eh? No, not at all. I can’t feel any sensation on my skin.”

“Right. Tell me, how long has it been since you have worked with me? 80 years?”

“Yes, Master.”

“That should be enough time to numb your skin,” observed Corgidus as he rubbed his cheek.

“Yes. It seems the prolonged exposure to the furnace killed my sense of touch.”

“Ahaha. Congratulations. You are now a true blacksmith.”

“It’s all thanks to your guidance.”

Just like that, the dwarves had been literally desensitized to the point that the severe blizzard had no effect on them. Instead, they welcomed the unexpected break. The human soldiers of the Engineering Corps were just like the rest of them.

“Yowza! This winter coat that just came in is super warm.”

“Isn’t it?”

“Yeah! It’s really something. Here, look. Look how densely stuffed the linings are. It’s been nicely padded.”

“I know, right? We should be thankful to Master Lloyd.”

“I couldn’t agree with you more. He bulk-ordered these warm clothes for us... I can’t help but be moved every time he takes care of us like this.”

“Yes, I agree. I can still remember what he said when he gave the coat to me.”

“What did the young master say?” The man’s eyes shone with expectation.

“‘Nothing better than a puffer in the winter!’ That’s what he said.”

“Oh, so the name of this jacket is ‘puffer’?”

“It appears to be.”

“Nothing better than puffers in the winter...”

“Hurray to the puffers...”

The soldiers were overjoyed as they wrapped themselves in the lavish liner jackets. Nobody noticed the blizzard, not even the orcs, elves, dwarves, or humans. It had no effect on them. Instead, they were simply ecstatic about the unexpected break.

This unexpected situation, on the other hand, bruised the ego of Elemental King Pantalisa to the core.

What are they...?

He couldn't get his mind around it. This blizzard had been his venomous retaliation, a serious, no-joke revenge to freeze them to death and eliminate the intruders because he couldn't physically touch them. He had used all of his strength to create this storm. But the end result was heartbreaking. It only made them happy.

Why doesn't this make anyone cold? Why aren't they writhing in agony? Why?! And why are they making snowmen all over?

Everyone laughed, oinked, and shrieked with delight as they built snowmen, fought, and played on the slides. Pantalisa shuddered in annoyance and felt terrible self-hatred at the sight. He understood why this occurred.

I have become weak.

Too many footprints of external creatures had been marked into the range. The natural appearance had been lost too much. And that was how much he lost his power.

But... I can’t back down like this.

Pantalisa was not about to give up so easily. He summoned nature's wrath with more venomous resolve as everyone had the time of their lives in their camps. Everyone, on the other hand, was unconcerned about the worsening blizzard. They simply jumped for joy at the extended break. Lloyd was the only one whose happiness had plummeted to the lowest depths.

“Dammit... Something’s off about the weather. Something’s behind it for sure,” observed Lloyd with serious distaste.

The blizzard had been pounding the entire range for six days. Lloyd shuddered at the biting wind, suspicious of its strength. It appeared to be determined to freeze everyone and halt construction.

I thought it’d go away after two or three days. But I don’t see this ending any time soon.

The blizzard was worsening in degree. Waiting out like this would...

It’d be troublesome.

There were over a thousand workers present. Every day, tons of food and goods were consumed, and it was only a matter of time before snow piled up and froze the mountain.

The clean-up and the foundation job will take a hit. And there’ll be more chances of an avalanche. Safety issues are a big thing, too.

This whole turn of events couldn’t be any more frustrating. Everything was all set for the construction. But it hadn’t been able to begin at all.

“There’s certainly a problem here. I’ll have to solve it,” resolved Lloyd.

“But how will you stop a blizzard?” asked Javier innocently.

Lloyd crinkled his nose. “I don’t know. But you see, don’t you think this blizzard is a bit strange?”

“Strange?”

“The mana. Can’t you feel it?”

“Do you mean the subtle hint of mana in the air?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd gave a nod. The biting wind did contain a trace amount of mana. It was very small, like a few spices. It was certainly undetectable to those who couldn't use the Asrahan Core Technique. “But I can sense it. Just a little bit. What do you make of that?”

“There must be an elemental in the wind.”

“Yes, indeed.”

“And that is a problem, how?” said Javier. “It is common for elementals to be seeped into nature, be it the wind or creek water.”

“Of course, it’s nothing special. Under normal circumstances.”

“But are you saying that is not the case now?”

“Of course.” Lloyd nodded. “This blizzard. I can feel the presence of the elemental that has been interfering with my construction for the past six days.”

“...”

“Who cares if it’s an elemental or whatever? They’re disrupting my work, and I can’t leave them be. I’m suffering a great loss here.”

“But, Master Lloyd, you are talking about an elemental,” reminded Javier.

“Okay, so?”

“It will not be as easy as you think to resist against them.”

“Well, you are right.” Lloyd immediately understood what Javier was saying. Since the elemental was a spiritual entity like a ghost, it couldn't be touched, hit, or grasped.

“As such, I am curious. As far as my common sense goes, humans and elementals cannot touch each other, except for the Elemental King who looks like a wild ginseng.”

“Yeah, that’s common sense. The exceptions would be, if there are any, magic spells of great magicians and auras of swordmasters.”

“However,” Javier immediately countered, “Even the magics and auras barely do any damage, even if they exert all of their strength.”

“Yeah, I know that. That’s common sense. It’s a known fact that it’s impossible to physically beat up the elemental king.”

“Yes, I am also aware of that. So, how are you going to-”

“How am I going to beat up this blizzard-causing elemental?”

“Yes.” Javier was genuinely intrigued. At the same time, he suspected Lloyd was wrong this time. He reasoned that it was better to wait for the blizzard to pass because that was the way of nature.

Lloyd gave a sly, mocking grin a split second later. “I have plans. So, let me ask you a question. Do you, by any chance, like shaved ice?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 346: A Crafty Bait (1)

“So, do you like shaved ice?”

“Young Master?” retorted Javier. His gaze seemed to ask what Lloyd was saying.

Lloyd smiled at his reaction, and he thought...

What am I saying? I mean, let’s crush that bastard elemental who’s been keeping us from construction for several days now.

Something had to be done. He would die before the blizzard stopped if he just sat back and let the elemental do whatever he pleased.

The course of nature? Wait until it calms down? Not a chance.

Lloyd might have had the option to wait if he was in any other situation. But not right now, when his construction project had been delayed before it even started. “It’s probably the elemental residing in the Pantara Range, right?” he inquired, determined. “And I’m sure his specialty is the element of ice and snow. That’s why he’s so attached to this place.”

“You are likely correct,” replied Javier. “That is, if he is causing this blizzard as you assume.”

“He’s probably the one behind it. That’s why I’m thinking about taking advantage of his attachment.”

“Use his... attachment?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.” Lloyd gave a nod. His smile gave off the impression that he was already somewhat convinced his plan would work. “I’m sure you’re aware of how sensitive elementals are to environmental harm. Everyone knows this.”

“I do,” said Javier. “I heard it was a shared trait among elementals.”

Lloyd gave a contemplative nod. “And what do you think is the case for the elementals living in this remote range?”

“They are... probably more sensitive than elementals living in other places.”

“Yes. They haven’t had much interaction with humans while living in a remote area with hardly any human presence.” Lloyd spoke with well-founded confidence.

When it comes to things like this, elementals and humans are not all that different. To give an example, suppose John relocated from a house in a bustling market to a condo close to a train station. Would the sound of the train bother him? Hardly. He might think it is quieter or not all that different from a noisy market. But what if things go the other way? What would happen if John moved from a peaceful province or suburb to a boisterous condo in the middle of the city? At first, the outside ruckus would be terrifying and hard to get used to. John may even harbor a grudge against his noisy unit.

That would be the case for most people. As a result, in both cases, the elementals in nature would go through what John did.

It shouldn’t be much different between elementals and humans. The elementals who have been living in a mountain behind a human village will already be used to the entry of humans into their territory. They’d be similar to John moving to a city after living near a bustling market.

But as for the elementals in this Pantara Range which had almost no human traffic...

They would be similar to John moving from a remote area to a city. And so, this means the elementals here aren’t used to the presence of humans. They are responding far, far more sensitively than most elementals.

The ongoing blizzard from the past few days proved his point. Lloyd was certain.

“So they’ll be easy to provoke.” Lloyd spoke confidently, believing that this was a universal phenomenon for both humans and elementals.

Javier narrowed his eyes. “Hmm. I see what you mean. You will further destroy the environment to draw out the elemental.”

“Yeah.”

Javier gave him a look.

“What? Why? What? We’ve bulldozed two peaks already. The fate of the range has already been sealed. Besides, I’m barely even touching it compared to some of the other things I’ve demolished before. I just need to take down a little bit of the land nearby.”

“What a fantastic person you are.”

Lloyd shot a question at his knight. “What was that?”

“Nothing, Young Master.”

“Nothing? I heard what you said.”

“Oh, did you?” Javier asked with feigned remorse and guilt.

“Of course,” huffed Lloyd. “You insulted me out loud. How could I miss that?”

“Congratulations then,” said Javier.

Lloyd frowned. “Congratulations? For what?”

“It seems that you have no problem with your hearing yet.”

“Of course. Everything else is well with me, too.”

“I am sure it is.”

“Well, yeah. I am a swordmaster.”

“Yet, you have never dated a girl before.”

“Ouch...” That was a direct, potent blow to Lloyd's ego. It was like someone had flown supersonic and thrown a cone of hard metal directly into his body. Suppressing the wave of resentment, Lloyd asked, “Hey, it feels like your burns are becoming more sophisticated?”

“What is a ‘burn?’” asked Javier.

“Tsk, never mind. Let’s get moving. It’ll only make the elemental happier if we stay still like now.”

Since he had a general idea of the cause behind the current situation and what to do, it was time to get moving. Lloyd put on his leather armor and winter clothes. Then, he packed two servings of lunch and a few tools, including a large hammer, pickax, and foldable shovel.

“Okay, let’s go!” hurried Lloyd.

Trailing behind, Javier had to hold back a bitter laugh as his young master marched forward in inexplicable excitement as if they were going on a picnic. As he listened to Lloyd explain his plan, the knight’s doubts only grew stronger.

“I’m going to lure him in. That’s when you’ll beat him up,” instructed Lloyd.

“Young Master?”

“I said beat him up. Don’t you know what that means?”

“I do. That is why I am asking you again. Don’t you know that physical force from a human is practically useless against an elemental?”

“Yeah, and that’s what makes it better,” reasoned Lloyd.

“Better? Please elaborate?”

“That means we can beat him to a pulp without having to worry about killing him.”

Javier gaped in disbelief.

“So, I need you to put away your conscience while you trample him into the ground.”

Javier was at a loss for words.

“What? What are you glaring at me for this time?”

“Nothing, Master Lloyd. It is simply that beating up, no, attacking the elemental seems to be an insufficient plan,” said Javier as he relaxed his eyes.

“I assume you mean, since he will not die, what good is it to lay an attack when we cannot subdue him?”

“Yes. Is there any other plan you have in mind?”

“Yes, I have one.”

That was the end of the conversation, leaving Javier with no time to hear more as Lloyd froze in his tracks. Glancing around, Javier saw that they were standing between two precipitous cliffs on a broad, even stretch of land.

“All right,” said Lloyd. “This should do it. The area is far from the camp and so dingy that it looks like no human has set foot in here for at least a couple hundred years. Wow. It’s the perfect place to execute our plan. Javier.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

“Hide over there.” Lloyd gestured toward the cluster of three or four boulders stacked on one side. They would make a good hiding thanks to the shadow they cast.

Javier moved dutifully and stood there staring at Lloyd, half-curious, half-worried that the plan would succeed. He licked his lips a moment after that, seeing what Lloyd was scheming.

“Hey!”

Lloyd’s shout boomed across the land. Then, he lifted his shovel high, charged it with aura, and started to dig, fueled by the pent-up rage from the past few days.

“Did you like disturbing my construction, you bastards?”

Boom! Crash! Crash! Boom!

The oddly shaped boulders and rocks could date back hundreds of thousands of years. All completely untouched by human hands. These pricelessly valuable stones shattered into tiny fragments. But Lloyd had no regrets about what he was doing. If anything, he was enjoying himself.

“You see this?!” bawled Lloyd, “This is the power of construction that we primates possess!”

Crash! Boom! Boom!

Lloyd began shoveling in a more rhythmic manner. He continued and launched mana blasts everywhere, boring holes into the cliffs as the breathtaking scenery quickly fell apart. The range eagles flew away in shock, flapping their wings, and even then, he laughed. At the sight, Javier experienced a wave of shame as deep as a cup of espresso.

Mad bastard...

Javier questioned how he got into this situation. How did it begin? What sequence of events brought him to assist and serve such a young master? He was worried about the future of the world, as well as about his current situation and future.

While Javier was consumed by resentment, Lloyd started to carry out his destructive plan with greater efficiency. With his surveying skill, he calculated how he could take down more of the cliff while avoiding collapsing it. Then, he used his shovel, hammer, and pickaxe based on the calculations he made. Ten minutes later. There finally came a reaction. The first sign of it came in the form of a strong snowfall.

Whoosh! It seemed the mountain range was upset with Lloyd for his unwelcome intrusion and the disturbance he caused as snow began to fall more heavily. A gust of snowy wind suddenly made everything around him hazy. It was a snowstorm.

“Yes, yes.”

It came. He was right as expected. Lloyd gave the bright smile of a store owner who had his first customer in three days. He was happy that his prediction was right.

I can just feel it. There’s a slight movement of mana in the blizzard. Only this time, it's more obvious compared to the movement of mana in the blizzard back at the construction site. This means...

The elemental was near. Lloyd turned around and glanced his eyes at Javier as soon as he realized it. “Did you feel it?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded, his eyes doing a quick scan of the place. It looked like he was trying to spot the elemental’s location using the Asrahan Core Technique.

“I’ll help you out.” Lloyd balled up his shovel, dashed over to a precipice, and rammed the shovel in. Then, he dragged his aura-charged shovel sideways and etched several deep lines into the cliff.

Like this! Like this! Scrabble!

He connected, bent, and laid down his lines into letters. And they read...

[Hello, elemental? I have a question for you. Why are you throwing your life away in this remote corner of the Pantara Range? I heard that other elementals nowadays have made a smooth transition into society and found great career opportunities for themselves. Are you really fine with being the only one wasting away here?]

Clang! Clang! Clatter! Lloyd's shovel made a more cadenced movement. He continued etching more questions into the cliff wall.

[How much is your salary? Do you get a bonus? I heard your neighboring elementals have been promoted several times. Aren't you going to get a job? When are you going to get married? And isn't it about time to get a house?]

Thwaaack! Clatter!

[I care about you. That's why I'm say saying this, so don't be offended. Listen up. If you plan on getting married, you need to have at least two babies. The birth rate has gone down a lot lately. But if you stay buried down here, you won't be able to date or get married. When I was younger...]

Slash! Clash! Slash!

Without taking a moment to rest, Lloyd scribbled furiously, recording any thought or question that occurred to him. Whether the elemental understood anything or not did not matter to him. The content was not important. It was vandalism in and of itself that mattered.

My doodles on the cliff alone are going to make him angry!

Lloyd's hands became even busier. The result of his efforts came immediately.

Swooosh! The blizzard suddenly grew so intense that it almost tripped Lloyd by its force.

Ack!

The gusts of wind nearly knocked him off the cliff. But he caught himself and persevered as he drove the shovel into the ground. He then grinned.

I got you.

The Asrahan Core Technique allowed Lloyd to locate the elemental in the middle of the blizzard.

In that case, Javier should know exactly where he's positioned. Like now.

Glancing up into the snowdrift, Lloyd made out a vague shape with the opaque silhouette of a person or a swaying blanket.

I got you, elemental bastard.

Lloyd was quite certain that the elemental would be feeling comfy even though the latter's location was spotted. No sense of crisis or anything.

I'm pretty sure he's relaxed right now since he knows it's quite impossible for us to physically hurt him. Even a swordmaster's aura would be like a slight pat against him.

Lloyd speculated that the elemental had to know that humans would never be able to touch him. If not, there would be no explanation for the blizzard and the explicit presence.

And now, it's time for you to become shaved ice.

As soon as a vicious smile bloomed on Lloyd's face...

Boom! Javier, a grandmaster who had completely surpassed the level of a swordmaster, struck the back of the elemental's head with his almighty aura.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 347: A Crafty Bait (2)

“Father! This is how you wield a club, right?”

Memories could sting sometimes. The older and more distant they were like a faded antique painting, the more effort it took to recollect them. And the pain in your heart would reflect the amount of effort you put in. It was a sharp, throbbing pain on one side of your chest that made you unconsciously let out a stifled sigh. In a state of daze, you would wake up from your sleep and realize the voice you heard a moment ago was a mere fragment of a memory inside your dream, not reality.

Count Frontera sighed. His gaze remained vacant and lifeless as he contemplated the voice he had just heard. It seemed too alive, too real. His eyes scanned his room, but he could not find his son.

It was a... dream.

He let out another sigh, fearing the lump in his throat would choke him otherwise. The count felt a developing urge to fall into an eternal slumber just so he could hear his son’s voice and lively shouts as a child in his dreams again.

Yes. That’s how he was then.

Count Frontera grinned bitterly as he remembered. Lloyd badly wanted to learn how to sword fight from his father as a child. He would beg him for a lesson every time he saw a stick, club, or anything resembling a sword with whatever he found in his hand. But Count Frontera was afraid that Lloyd would not develop a strong foundation for swordsmanship if he tried to teach him with his lacking skills. Rather, he vowed to himself that he would find a qualified teacher for his son in the future, even if that would cost him money. But he missed his timing to do so.

He lost interest after two years.

When he finally found a teacher, Lloyd became apathetic toward sword fighting. Count Frontera initially believed his son had lost interest in it. But he soon discovered the truth, long after the teacher had left.

It wasn't that Lloyd wanted to learn sword fighting. He just wanted to spend time with me.

Count Frontera felt a pang of guilt at the realization. But by that time, Lloyd had already gone astray. He was causing chaos and getting into trouble daily. The count didn't know whether puberty had just hit him hard or it was in the boy's nature.

"I'm sorry, my son..." He regretted not showing enough love to Lloyd then and not knowing that they didn't have much time left together. And now, he had become a failure of a father who could do nothing but sigh in regret as he was doing this morning. Just then...

Clack. Someone gently opened the door.

"Are you awake?"

It was his wife, Countess Frontera, who must have woken up before him and gone out for a short stroll. But her eyes were red. He smiled bitterly. "I suppose you feel the same as me."

"Yes..." The couple, thinking alike, silently sat on the edge of the bed. After staring at the wall for a while, Count Marbella said, "Our Lloyd... Where do you think he is?"

"I... I do not know." Another sigh. Count Frontera was curious. He wanted to know. "But I would like to believe that he is doing fine no matter what or where he is..."

"I feel the same. That is why I just came back from speaking with an angel."

The count quietly wrapped his arm around her shoulder. She leaned against him.

And in a soft tone, struggling hard to speak, she said, “I was curious. I felt suffocated as it was. So, I wanted to ask if Lloyd was doing well. You know, since an angel cannot lie.” She felt him tighten her hand. “But I could not dare say my question out loud. It seemed like I would be wronging the current Lloyd. I feel too indebted to that child to do so.”

“You made the right choice...” His voice cracked.

“I did, right?”

“Yes...” he said, lacking certainty.

This time, she wrapped his hand. “He will tell us when the time comes, right? The boy has a kind heart.”

“Yes... I believe he will.”

“I know it. He is a good kid.”

Her eyes grew red and teary again while his nose reddened. Clutching each other, the two decided to put their trust in Lloyd and wait for him to eventually tell the truth. They hoped for the best while trying to put on a smile.

He is a kind... dutiful... and hardworking kid...

***

I’m proud of you! My faithful knight! Hurray to Javier!

At the same hour, in the mountain range distant from the Frontera fiefdom, on the cliff spot, Lloyd gave a wide, contented smile. He couldn’t help it as he heard a clear, vivid clamor ring across the area.

Boom! The noise came from Javier’s aura, creating a crisp sound as it hit the Elemental King’s head.

“Ack..!”

Pantalasa, the Elemental King, was thrown to the ground in shock.

Wh-What in the world?

He was unable to wake up from his daze. His head was sore and throbbing. This was the first time he felt this kind of pain.

Did he just hit me? That silver-haired human?

He then jumped right back to his feet as soon he touched the ground.

No! That's impossible!

It really was impossible. That was the only rational conclusion. Ever since he was born into existence, this was what he believed to be the constant, undeniable, and unchanging truth. His belief had been proven to be correct several times in real life.

Humans can't physically touch me. Although I had fought against a swordmaster on three different occasions before now, their auras never hurt this much...

Panatalasa's mind flew back to the time he fought three other swordmasters on this very range.

The first swordmaster came about 1,200 years ago. He was a brawny warrior. I met the one after him about 980 years ago. The most recent incident was about 110 years ago. It was with a knight of a king who was trying to make a plank road over here.

Every single one of them was easily defeated with a simple method.

They all used their aura against me, but it never worked. I was basically untouchable, so their attacks didn't hurt me at all. Regardless of how hard they swung their swords, it just felt like I was being patted.

In short, a swordmaster's aura was completely ineffective against him.

I let them occasionally hit me with their auras while making them withstand harsh blizzards and breathe in unbearably cold air. It was a real success. No matter how strong the knights and warriors were, they eventually couldn't continue after their body temperature began to drop... So, why am I in so much pain right now?

A swordmaster's aura couldn't hurt him. As far as he knew, this was the highest level of skill a human could reach. As such, they didn't have the ability to physically hurt him, the Elemental King. That was the undeniable and unchanging truth of the matter.

Why?

Clang! Bam! Javier raised his aura-charged sword and began hitting both sides of Pantalasa's face in quick, multi-directional movements.

Ack! Ack!!

It hurt. It was so painful that it made him cry. This confused Patanlasa more.

What the heck? Is an aura... supposed to be this painful? Is he using dark magic or something?

But Pantalasa couldn't detect any dark energy coming from the human. That only threw him into greater confusion.

Who is this human?! Ouch! Arggh!

Just then, a thought crossed his mind. What if this man was a grandmaster, something he thought was only possible in theory?

Seriously? Really?

If that wasn't the case, his aura wouldn't be this painful. The attacks from this human were incomparable to what he had experienced before. Thwack! Thwack!

Ah!! Ouch!

The knight now began to attack his ribs and neck. It occurred to him that he might experience a sore neck for the first time since he came into existence. Every time the knight punched his ribs, his stomach tightly knotted up. He finally had a realization.

This knight is a grandmaster.

A sense of dismay and crisis. Countless emotions swirled inside him. However, the elemental did not easily give up. He remembered that the range needed his protection, even while enduring the most intense fight and pain in his life. Instead, his wrath grew stronger than ever.

How dare you?

Fwoosh! Pantalasa, enraged, began to conjure up sharp gusts of wind all around him. With that, freezing cold air swept the area while hailstones larger than a human's fist flew around in the air at 120 miles per hour.

To the human who dares to attack me, get a taste of nature's wrath!

Pantalasa was determined. He would freeze the knight solid and make an example out of him for anyone who dared to enter the range in the future.

I don't care if you're a grandmaster or not! There are no exceptions!

Fwoosh! The strong snowstorm was terrorizing. Its sweeping winds would make any form of life caught in the middle of it meet its demise. However, Javier was the exception.

Javier's eyes shone sharply, and he proceeded to his next step, which was dislocating Pantalasa's jaw.

Zip! Swoosh! Swish! He gently moved forward, taking two more steps before briefly pausing. At that moment, a fist-sized hail brushed past the tip of his nose at a speed of 168 miles per hour. He was able to detect, no, predict all the movements of the 471 pieces of hail from when they began to fly in his direction until they passed by him.

Clang! Clang! With a flash of his blade, countless fist-sized hailstones shattered into glittering fragments of ice that scattered across the air. Amidst it, Javier acted as if the violent blizzard heralding a temperature well below zero was a gentle spring breeze. He held his sword high, aiming for Pantalasa's head. Thwack!

Ouch!

Pantalasa teared up a little and felt a sense of abysmal doom.

How? How did he break through the blizzard?

Pantalasa was unable to understand what was happening. Even if he was a grandmaster, he shouldn’t have been able to neutralize the blast of snow he just summoned so easily. The chilly air alone was easily below freezing at -182 degrees Fahrenheit. Moreover, there were hundreds of hailstones flying in every direction at above 124 miles per hour within a few feet of each other. In other words, it should have been impossible to predict all of their movements.

His muscles should have frozen in the air as he was hit with deadly and unpredictable attacks from all directions. Even if his senses are above that of a swordmaster’s, he should not be able to properly fight. So, how? How did he do it?

Pantalasa felt wronged. He couldn’t process this whole situation. What he didn’t know was that the Asrahan Core Technique gave Javier the ability to track every movement of mana as if he were a high-performance radar. Furthermore, Panatalasa was unable to comprehend something else, such as how Javier managed to hit only his weak points.

Thwack! Thump! Thwack!

Ack! Eek! Ouch!

Crack! Thump! Thwack!

Ouch! Eek! Heek!

Every time Panatalsa floated away to dodge his attack, Javier came first and struck him in the crown of his head. And when he retreated back, Javier zoomed in and threw several punches to his side. Since he was composed of pure mana, he was an open book to Javier.

In short, the Asrahan Core Technique made Javier Pantalasa's natural enemy. Javier's oppression soon grew more systematic. Thrash here. And again. Only the painful spots. The same spot over and over. Any resistance invited more force. At last, gripped with hopelessness, Pantalasa came to a decision.

I-I have to run away.

This wasn't going to work. For some mysterious reason, this knight had an impressive ability to make fun of him. Any further opposition or combat could be his final demise. That was not the kind of ending he was hoping for.

Hmph!

Squeezing every ounce of strength he had, Pantalasa conjured up another blizzard and sent it toward Javier before swiveling around to flee the scene. But when he did, he faced another human he had forgotten about for a moment. Fwick! Grab!

Eh?

"Hello?" Pantalasa heard the human say as the latter dared to grab his shoulder with an aura-charged grip. He saw the man flash a brazen smile. "My name is Lloyd, and I plan on capturing you."

What? The moment Pantalasa flinched, Lloyd activated his Supercharge Skill.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 348: A Crafty Bait (3)

“Hello? My name is Lloyd, and I am about to capture you,” he grinned, observing the elemental king flinch in shock. Despite his ghostly appearance, Lloyd detected the flustered look on his face.

Well, no surprise there.

Pantalasa's worried expression made sense. After all, he would have anticipated Javier's strikes to be the same gentle pats he received from other swordmasters in the past. The king couldn’t have imagined Javier would beat him into a pulp with his aura.

It must have hurt. The pain would’ve been something he never experienced before then. I mean, it’s coming from the aura of a grandmaster.

Lloyd's prediction that Javier's aura would be effective against the elemental king was spot on. It left the elemental in complete panic. That allowed Lloyd to move closer and capture him.

A few seconds is all I need.

Grab! Lloyd put more strength into his aura-charged hands and opened the skill window, swiftly activating the optional skill of his choice before the king could wrench himself free. He recited the widely accepted statement of “you snooze, you lose” to himself. His grip on the elemental became tighter.

Ding Dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤ : Supercharge has been activated.]

[You are absorbing a large amount of mana from surroundings at random.]

From that moment on...

Hmph.

Lloyd's eyes closed on their own before he was barely able to reaffirm his decision, his consciousness quickly fading away like a patient going under anesthesia. In the next moment, an animalistic instinct awoke inside him.

Ziiing...

The three circle chords in his heart revved up, gradually increasing in intensity. At first, they moved like a gentle spring breeze before slowly creating stronger gusts of winds and transforming into a violent storm.

Ziiing!

They went rampant, preying on everything around it, including the elemental king who was stuck by his side.

Fwoosh!

Eek!

Pantalasa, the elemental king, was initially shocked into silence. His mind blanked out from the absurd situation he was in like a video game player who got cheated, a student who showed up at the incorrect test room, or a white-collar employee who got caught bad-mouthing his boss. The only thought that occupied his mind was that he was finished. Doomed. He could only gape and helplessly flail his arms as he struggled in vain to shove Lloyd away.

This human just won’t budge...!

Pantalasa couldn’t push Lloyd away. The harder he tried to push him away, the stronger the human’s grip on him became.

Fwoosh!

Ack...!

Meanwhile, Lloyd was absorbing large amounts of mana with every passing second. Of course, it was not just from Pantalasa. He sucked in everything possible within a 22-foot radius, including rocks, snow, ice, moss, and snowflakes. He didn’t miss anything and absorbed mana from all his surrounding sources until they were sucked dry. However, Pantalasa was the biggest victim of his absorption.

Argh!!!!

Elementals were made of pure mana, so they did not have a physical form. Instead, their bodies were like a container made of mana that held more mana inside it. These spiritual beings starkly contrasted against humans and zombies, whose bodies acted like a separate container for the mana they held. So, Lloyd's Supercharge could drain all the mana the elemental was made of and also held inside him, making it the most brutal skill Pantalasa could face.

How is it possible for a human to do this?!

Pantalasa could not believe that a mere human had such a violent ability to absorb mana. Once he got over his shock, he felt a sense of crisis.

I-I’ll really die at this rate!

His heart pounded even though he didn’t have one. A prickling sense of urgency stabbed the king across his entire body like thousands of needles. None of this was an exaggeration.

He is going to suck me dry of mana, but how can I stop him? I can't. I would do something if I had a physical form... I would try to endure against him if I did, but...

Unfortunately, he was made of mana, so there was no way for him to fight. He was completely powerless, and his feeling of impending doom was heightened by the fact that he had no idea when this violent absorption of mana would come to an end.

I can’t continue to stay still. It’ll really be the end of me if I do.

In the worst-case scenario, his entire existence could be erased. That wasn’t something he wanted. It was time for him to take action.

I have to run away!

If fighting back was impossible, the second-best option was to escape. He jumped into action right away.

To avoid being absorbed into the vortex of mana and free myself from him... Hmph!!!

Boom! Pantalasa consolidated his mana and mixed it with some icy air before creating an explosion. His actions resulted in a small storm between himself and Lloyd, pushing the human away. However, his attempt failed. Lloyd's grip on him seemed to loosen for a moment but quickly returned. Grab!

Eek?

Pantalasa's eyes widened as he realized Lloyd’s grasp had tightened. The man was in a trance with only one aim in mind, which was to never let go of the bastard in his grip."

H-How is this happening?!

Lloyd’s persistence against the blizzard and resolve to defeat him terrified Patalasa. He had no idea the former would have so much determination, and the situation worsened when another human joined to interrupt his escape.

Ouch!

Wham! Just then, Pantalasa felt a hard blow on the back of his head and inadvertently staggered. He instantly knew who was behind this.

It’s the silver-haired knight!

It was the silver-haired knight who had ruthlessly battered him earlier. The human was now swinging his aura-charged sword toward him.

Bam! Crash! Bam!

Pantalasa, stuck in Lloyd’s grip, was helpless against the series of strikes Javier persistently laid on the back of his head.

Ouch! Ugh! Argh!

Javier made sure each of his blows was as painful as possible and hit the same location over and over again. Pantalasa thought he was about to die from the biting pain in the back of his head while also feeling resentful of the situation at the same time.

Why? How? How is he okay when everything is losing its mana?

Pantalasa couldn’t understand. He felt cheated. But it was all because he didn’t know anything about the Asrahan Core Technique.

Why?! How is he able to move around and attack me without any issue?!

Javier was an expert in the Asrahan Core Technique, which Pantalasa was unaware of. This meant that Javier had complete control over his mana and could employ all the mana in his possession despite Lloyd's Supercharge Skill. By using the technique, not a single drop of mana was sucked out of his body. This only allowed him to move with more vigor.

Eek! Haaa! Urk!

Crash! Thwack! Clang! Pantalasa's consciousness began to wane as he was hit in the same place over and over again, heightening his sense of urgency along with it.

No... I cannot flee in this current situation. If I continue losing mana and being endlessly attacked like now... Eventually, I will lose all the mana that makes up my existence... And vanish into nothing. I will be helplessly defeated.

Chills rushed down his spine. This was the worst sense of crisis and misery he had ever felt in the range.

What should I do?

Pantalasa fell into deep thought. He drew the following conclusions. It would be the end of him if he made one wrong move from here, and he was running out of time.

In the end, this is all I can do.

Grit! Pantalasa tightly clenched the teeth he didn't have and made a decision.

I'll be killed if I stay still like now anyway... In that case, it's all or nothing.

As soon as he made a decision, the elemental king drew out all the essence of the mana that his existence was composed of. Then, he made the extracted mana condense in the most frigid air he could generate. Lastly, he fused his soul into it.

Bzzt! Instead of going for the obvious attack of setting off an explosion, Pantalasa held out the fused mass of mana with joy and launched it into the absorption path.

If you're so willing to absorb my mana... Then take this one, too!

Boom! The mass of mana entered the mana suction flow. Previously, he had been a victim of the invasion, but now he was the invader.

Let's see if the body of a mere human will be able to accept taking in all of me!

Pantalasa was 100% certain that Lloyd would blow up in a matter of seconds due to the sheer amount of mana he possessed as the elemental king of this giant mountain range.

Hmph! You must have human limitations. Even with your strength and power, you will not be able to process that much extra mana.

It was a simple principle: humans could easily drink more than one gallon of water if they drank it in small portions throughout the day. However, if they took all of it in at once, they would die due to the imbalances created throughout their body, such as in the level of sodium in their blood. They physically couldn’t handle such a large amount of water. This was Pantalasa's plan.

Human. How dare you try to absorb my mana bit by bit? You’re wrong to think that. See who outwits you?! Pantalasa couldn’t stand the human’s insolence and wanted to eat him up in pieces. This is my revenge! I’ll push an unmanageable amount of mana into you!

Fwoosh! Condensed into a mass of mana essence, Pantalas invaded Lloyd’s body into his hands and flowed through his blood vessels into his heart with the intent of destroying his manaheart. However, Pantalasa was unaware that Lloyd possessed the Heart of Winter, an existence far more powerful than his essence.

Grab!

Eh?

As soon as Pantalasa walked through Lloyd's manaheart's door, he stopped in his tracks after sensing a familiar energy. When he turned around, there was a cold air mass that was much greater in size, strength, and power than him. It smiled and grabbed him by the shoulder.

Pantalasa was taken aback once more. Lloyd was not to be messed around with. The mass of cold air he held inside his heart was the size of a polar region, whereas Pantalasa's was comparable to a mountain range.

What in the world is this?

Pantalasa felt like an elementary schooler fighting a college student, a handsome local man standing between two of the sexiest men in the world, or a used car driver dangerously racing across a highway before watching a Lamborghini speed past him until it disappeared into the distance. However, despite facing the superior version of himself, he did not despair or become intimidated. Instead, he felt a sense of comfort.

It’s cozy...

This place he invaded felt like home, but it was significantly colder than the range he had lived in his entire life. Because of this, he disarmed himself against his will and awakened the homebody inside him that had been hiding for tens of thousands of years. It was so comfortable and cozy inside Lloyd that he wanted to relax for just a few tens of thousands of years since he was already here anyway.

I mean, that amount of time for an elemental like me would be the same as what a few hours is to a human.

And just like that, Pantalasa gave into the tempting impulse to settle down and rest inside this human until he died.

Just then, a string of messages appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

Ding Dong!

[You have absorbed the Elemental King of the Pantara Range, "Pantalasa."]

[Pantalasa wishes to reside in your manaheart.]

[If you permit him to stay, you will succeed him as "The Elemental King of the Pantara Range."]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 349: Lloyd the Elemental King (1)

[You have absorbed the Elemental King of the Pantara Range, “Pantalasa.”]

[Pantalasa wishes to reside in your manaheart.]

[If you permit him to stay, you will succeed him in his position as “The Elemental King of the Pantara Range.”]

Still in a daze, Lloyd did not notice the new messages that appeared in front of him until two minutes later when he opened his eyes.

Ding dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 5: Your Supercharge time is up.]

Ziiing... His mana circle gradually slowed down its violent speed of rotation. The absorption of mana came to a stop.

Whoosh! Lloyd later opened his eyes to find snowflakes tapping his cheeks and eyes as the range's cold air filled the gaps left by the mana storm.

Lloyd scanned his surroundings right after opening his eyes. Then, he skillfully swept across the message before his eyes in deliberate motions.

The messages give me an idea of what happened while I was unconscious and what gains or skill I earned through the mana absorption.

This allowed him to get a grasp on how the situation developed, whether any favorable changes occurred around him, what he gained, and the decisions he needed to make. And the message that appeared this time...

This is beyond my expectations.

Gulp. Even though the message wasn’t long, Lloyd had to read it over three or four times as the content it contained was far more incredible than what he expected.

Pantalasa? I didn't know he was the elemental king who ruled over this range. And he what? Wants to reside in my manaheart?

Lloyd knew he was not dealing with an ordinary elemental and expected the spirit to have some influence over the range, which was why he decided to use the Supercharge to get rid of him. But it never occurred to Lloyd that the elemental king would make this kind of demand.

And he wants to settle inside my manaheart? What in the world?

Lloyd cocked his head to the side, unsure of how to interpret this unexpected request of some sort for permanent residence. However, one thing was certain.

If I grant his request, I will gain the authority he had as the elemental king of this range.

It was intriguing to think about ruling over the elementals around here as a human king. However, Lloyd didn't easily give in to these sorts of temptations.

Tsk. No matter how great something seems, it's better to confirm it myself.

It was a dog-eat-dog world. There wasn't anyone or anything that could be trusted. Even if something seemed great on the outside, an impulsive purchase would usually end in regret the vast majority of the time, particularly if it involved an unfamiliar product.

I mean, imagine there's a fruit drink that looks really high-quality and tasty. But then, you look at the ingredients and realize it's only three percent fruit juice. These kinds of incidents happen all the time. That's why I have to consider the benefits and drawbacks of becoming the elemental king.

The position of an elemental king seemed great at first glance. But who knew? It could be a trap. With that thought in mind, he examined the inside of his manaheart the way he used to check over the ingredients in the ten-dollar container of salt at the grocery store. Lloyd's manaheart responded immediately to his actions.

“Haah... It’s cold... It’s cozy...”

Through the lewd-sounding whispers faintly coming into his manaheart, Lloyd sensed a mass of mana that had condensed in the extremely frigid air. He recognized what the mass of mana was and tried to start a conversation with it.

“Hey. Are you Pantalasa, the elemental king of this mountain range?”

“Ha... It’s cool... It’s cozy...”

Lloyd frowned.

“Ha... This feels like home...”

“Hey.”

“Ha...”

“Do you want me to kick you out?”

“Ha?”

Dammit.

Lloyd's veins popped, and he complained like a landlord of a tenant who was twelve months behind on rent. “Hey! What are you doing inside? Do you want to get kicked out right now?”

The eviction warning must have worked. “Eh? Kick me out? From here?” asked Pantalasa.

“Yeah. You. Out. From there,” growled Lloyd.

“Can’t you postpone that decision for a bit?”

“Postpone it?” asked Lloyd in disbelief.

“Yes.”

“How long?”

“Until you die.”

Lloyd frowned in disbelief.

“I’m asking you for this favor because it’s just so perfectly cool, cozy, and comfortable here. I mean it. I’ve been alive since the day the Pantara Range rose from the ground, but it’s my first time experiencing this… refreshing cold.”

“It’s cold?” asked Lloyd. “Do you mean the Heart of Winter?”

“Yes. The Heart of Winter in you.” Pantalasa's voice lightly trembled, like a person experiencing culture shock or trying out an air conditioner after using a fan for their entire life. “So, I beg you, human. I won’t ask for too much time. Can’t I stay here for a little while just until you die?”

“Hmm... In that case, you won’t care if I destroy more of the mountains?”

“I do a little... But...”

“But what?”

“It dawned on me that this is a rare chance.”

“You mean a chance to experience the immensely refreshing cold of the Heart of Winter?”

“Yes, exactly,” replied Pantalasa. “Human, I have been keeping a close eye on your construction. I figure you are planning to build a road across the range.”

Lloyd nodded.

“Do you plan to construct on any other areas?”

“No,” said Lloyd. “Probably.”

“Well, then it’s fine.”

“I thought you were the elemental king of the range,” reminded Lloyd sharply.

“You already destroyed this area, and the range will still remain vastly untouched even if you expand a bit more from here.”

Lloyd was speechless.

“So, here’s my request. Permit me to stay here for a few decades.”

Finally, Lloyd realized this bastardly elemental king had abandoned his duties and responsibilities after being enticed by the Heart of Winter.

Well, humans are no better. I can’t expect perfection just because he’s an elemental king.

Regardless of their level of diligence, everyone wanted to slack off at times. Lloyd thought that the elemental king wouldn’t be any different.

Well, Pantalasa is basically the guardian of this range as his title suggests. I’m sure he would like to take a small break after working tirelessly since the formation of the range.

A few decades may seem long to humans. However, it was about the same amount of time as a few hours for Pantalasa, who had been alive for billions of years.

I guess it would be the same as leaving work early or taking the morning off for humans.

The comparison helped Lloyd understand where Pantalasa was coming from. But it didn’t mean that he’d easily grant the latter’s request right away.

“Then, let me ask you one thing,” said Lloyd.

“What is it, human?”

“What do I gain from granting your request?” asked Lloyd expectantly.

“You will have the power to reign over this range for a few decades.”

“No,” said Lloyd impatiently. “Tell me specifically what I gain from earning the title of the elemental king.”

Lloyd needed to hear the answer to this question. How could he not?

I don’t want to blindly trust his words that it’s a good thing and regret it later.

Lloyd was being serious. It was a painful lesson he had learned throughout the course of his life. Regret was an inevitable outcome if he blindly trusted other people’s words. Lloyd never wanted to follow in the footsteps of his parents, who were scammed into bankruptcy, or Count and Countess Frontera, who were previously on the verge of bankruptcy. He wanted to carefully go over everything one by one instead of being swayed with empty words of persuasion.

This is a mistake people make when people buy stocks or other investments. A group of people suddenly praise a company, and everyone rushes to buy their stocks. Then, the stock prices plummet, and they're forced to hold onto them for dear life. The same thing happened with bitmoney. There was a boom in demand for the currency at one point in time. But what happened to the people who rashly went into it?

Instead of hitting the jackpot like they expected, they were all hit with plummeting prices.

I don’t want to end up like them. The same is true now.

This was his plan: Hear the pros and cons of becoming an elemental king in detail. Pantalasa responded.

“First... It feels nice.”

“I don’t care...” said Lloyd, struck dumb. “Be more specific.”

“Be more specific, you say... Hmm... You can summon and command the elementals in this range.”

“Command? However I please?”

“Probably,” replied Pantalasa. “If the others accept you as the elemental king. You will then have absolute control over the elementals in the range. At least, within this mountain range.”

“Are you sure? I have some doubts.”

“Why do you have doubts?”

“You didn’t call for any other elementals when you fought with us. Why is that?” Lloyd asked sharply.

“I let my guard down. It never occurred to me that being hit by a human could hurt so much, and there was one who could absorb my mana so relentlessly.”

“Hmm...” mulled Lloyd.

“I mean it. I was able to easily take care of the swordmasters that I encountered before by myself. So, I assumed it’d be similar this time and didn’t think that there would be a need to disrupt their break by calling for them. But I was wrong.”

“Hmm...”

Pantalasa’s answer made sense. The next question followed.

“Great. If the upside is gaining command over the elementals in this range, what’s the downside?”

“Nothing,” replied Pantalasa confidently.

“Nothing?”

“Nothing.”

“I smell something fishy.”

“Fishy?”

“Fishy. Like you’re trying to scam me.”

“I’m not. I’m being honest right now. Just make sure not to destroy the range too badly. That’s all I ask from you.”

“Not much damage?” asked Lloyd.

“Yeah.” The elemental king continued to speak. “Once the range sees too much damage, the elementals will grumble and find another home. You let that keep happening, and you will lose support from the elementals.”

“You mean a riot would break out?”

“Yeah. A riot. That’s all you should need to watch out for.”

Hmm... Lloyd pondered for a second about the possibility of the other elementals raising a coup if he enacted too much damage on the land here. He chuckled. “I won’t lose anything. Well, I’ll hand over the position if someone throws a coup.”

“What?”

“The position wasn’t mine in the first place anyway. Why obsess over it? All I need is for the construction to end well. So I see. I’ll grant your request.”

“H-Hold on! What do you mean you can always pass over my title to someone else? What do you mean by that?”

“Oh, your request is granted. Enjoy your decades’ worth of rest.”

Ding Dong!

The moment Lloyd voiced out his consent, Pantalasa’s voice faded out, and messages appeared in front of his eyes.

[You have accepted the request of Elemental King Pantalasa.]

[You have now become the “Acting Elemental King of the Pantara Range.”]

[You can reign over the range until you die or hand over the power to some other elemental.]

[From now on, you have the unrivaled ability to summon elementals from anywhere in the range and locate their exact location.]

Whew...

Lloyd exhaled a sigh after checking the message. What Pantalasa said was true. Messages appeared in series as soon as he permitted the stay. Feeling content, he looked at the side.

“Are you okay, Young Master?” Javier asked as if he had been waiting. Lloyd noticed the cold gaze distinct to Javier.

Lloyd knew that the coldness was a mask to hide Javier’s concern for him. With a smile on his face, Lloyd said, “As you can see.”

“Then... The elemental...”

“I absorbed him. And now, I have become the elemental king of this range.”

“...”

“I’m serious,” pressed Lloyd.

“...”

“I’m serious.”

“...”

“If you doubt me, then relax your face and ask me a question.”

“It is not that I am doubting you,” replied Javier. “However...”

“However?”

“I suddenly pity the elementals who have to serve a man like you as their king,” Javier said. “The elementals will soon be sent to the construction site, where they will be treated as nothing more than construction equipment day in and day out. They will be drawn into exploitation with an overtime bonus and so on. I can see it happen as clear as day.”

Lloyd was quiet for a moment.

“Am I wrong?”

“Yeah. That’s how you’ve been treated until now.”

Javier seemed pensive.

“I’m only an evil contractor to you,” quipped Lloyd. “That’s why I’m getting started right at this moment.”

“Start what?”

“What else? To delegate chores to the elementals, I’ll have to make them respect me. Set up a clear order.”

“Order?”

“Well,” Lloyd said with a grin, his gaze running the length of the range that extended below the steep range, where he intended to put his newly acquired power to good use. “Let us give these elementals a taste of physical labor. First come, first served.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 350: Lloyd the Elemental King (2)

Assemble. It was a common term in South Korea. There would be some who associated the word with the first chapter of the physics textbook they vigorously studied as a student. However, most men would immediately think back to their days in the military. Morning roll call. Move to the cafeteria. Assemble for training and work. Evening roll call. They spent their entire day getting into assembles over and over again. Thus, the memories of their time in the military were tinged with trauma for many veterans.

But to the elementals residing in this range, the assemble order Lloyd, a human from South Korea, issued was a mysterious enigma. And so, gathered at the sixth highest peak of the range, the six high-level elementals gazed at each other with confusion in their eyes.

“Oh, rock elemental,” said the pine tree elemental. “It has been a while.”

“It’s been a while, yes, Pine Tree Elemental. Where is Heavy Snow?” asked the rock elemental.

“There.” The pine tree elemental pointed to a side. “Frost Moss. Icicle. Crevasse. Everyone’s here.”

“I guess I am the last one to arrive,” said the rock elemental with a sigh.

“Perhaps.”

“I do not know if I will be able to look the elemental king in his face.”

“It’s fine,” comforted the pine tree elemental. “This is the first time the elemental king summoned us all to one place.”

“Indeed,” said the rock elemental, feeling a little better. “This has never happened before. I wonder why he summoned us all.”

“Probably because of the humans,” said the pine tree elemental, the guardian of all needleleaf trees in the Pantara Range. “Humans recently arrived and wreaked havoc on the place.”

“Ah. That was difficult for me, too. They pushed away two peaks and widened the rift between them by force.”

“Awful, really. I presume the elemental king is furious because of it.”

“You have a point. This marks the biggest event since the range came to be.”

“Event...? More like a disaster,” corrected the pine tree elemental.

“Right. It was a disaster.”

The pine tree elemental and the rock elemental sadly nodded, sharing similar sentiments on the situation. They joined the others in waiting for the elemental king to appear. After much waiting, they were finally met with the elemental king. However, the king was not Pantalasa, the one they had been waiting for.

Grab!

“Whew...! My back, goodness. I should have chosen another location,” said the voice as a hand popped and grabbed onto the edge of the cliff from below. Soon, the face of a human soaked in sweat emerged. He climbed up the peak with great struggle, seemingly flushed red from being out of breath.

The high-level elementals clamped their mouths in surprise and dismay as a human appeared. No one knew how to react. Everyone stared blankly at the human.

But the attitude of the human, Lloyd, showed was outlandishly different from theirs. After collecting his breath with a simple “Whew!” he dusted off the snow on his clothes and straightened them before flashing a grin at the elementals. “You all kindly showed up early for assembly!”

His manner of speech was too laid back. He seemed to have expected their reaction. At that moment, the high-level elementals were in a state of shock. Was it because of the relaxed and brazed attitude of the human who suddenly appeared in front of them? No. It was because they felt the power of the elemental king from him!

Impossible!

His humanity was undeniable. No matter where they looked, he was a human with two arms and legs. However, there was no denying the power of the elemental king within him. The elementals could clearly feel it.

How's this possible? I mean, is it even possible?

All the elementals were in disbelief. This was against all common sense. It was illogical. How could there be a human elemental king? And yet, such an absurd existence was right in front of them, slowly coming toward their direction.

"What are you all doing there? Do you plan on dazing out all day after putting in the effort to assemble here?" asked Lloyd with a mischievous smile.

Lloyd's question jostled them out of trance. The first one to come to his senses was the rock elemental. "Human! What are you?!"

"What else?" Lloyd drawled. "I am the elemental king of this range. Is that not obvious?"

"No, I mean! How? Where is our elemental king?"

"Your elemental king? You mean Pantalasa?"

"Yes! Pantalasa, our ruler and guardian of the range! Where did he go to while there's a human like you emitting his power?!"

"Oh, he's on vacation," replied Lloyd casually.

"What...?" the rock elemental stopped in shock.

Lloyd’s lips curled up meaningfully. “I’m serious. He said he found a cooler place that’s cooler and cozier than here. So, he told me he wanted to take a break for a while.”

“How long...”

“For a few decades. He said he’ll return once I die.”

The rock elemental gaped in disbelief.

“Honestly, we have to give him that. I heard his story, and it’s pitiful. He has been working for millions of years without taking a single break. Isn’t that so sad? Imagine how much he would have wanted to rest. Besides, I heard a few decades is nothing for you all.”

“That’s true, but—”

“So what, you can’t accept me as the elemental king?” challenged Lloyd.

“I can't!” the rock elemental yelled in response to Lloyd's provocative question, but he was not alone. Everyone did, some even floating their bodies in the air in a threatening manner or exuding cold energy. The message was clear, and Lloyd knew what it meant.

“Tsk. That’s it? You can’t accept me as your elemental king because I’m a human.” Lloyd chuckled, having expected this to happen. He figured their reaction was only obvious.

I mean, if a company I worked for my whole life lost their president and a cat randomly appeared one day and said, “Meow! I’m your president starting today!” No one would accept the change.

Not in a million years. Lloyd thought the situation was pretty much the same right now.

And that’s why I only assembled the high-level elementals.

Getting accepted by the elementals was an obstacle that needed to be cleared before Lloyd could command the elementals within range, even though he was fortunate enough to inherit the powers of the elemental king.

Imagine how many elementals are in this range. It'd be a waste of time to call for each one of them and get their recognition. That'd be too inefficient.

As such, Lloyd decided to round up only the high-level elementals as the rest under them would follow accordingly.

The elementals are all put into a strict ranking system, which includes the elemental king, high-level, intermediate-level, and low-level. It's similar to how it is in the military, meaning you only have to properly educate the highest ranks.

After that, the remaining work would go off without a hitch. The high ranks would vent their frustrations out on those below them. Then, those individuals would then repeat the cycle to the ranks below them.

Until the lowest soldier anonymously reports to the commanders. But there's nothing to worry about that here. No one can report things anonymously.

This was Lloyd's justification for calling in only the most powerful elementals. His recently acquired rank made it simpler for him to issue the summoning order in his heart, from which it spread like text messages. With a grin on his face, he considered the purpose and meaning of the call, saying, "I know you cannot accept me as your elemental king, but I have some things to tell you as your rightful ruler. I do not work with those who do not listen to me, so I am going to give you a choice. Accept me as your king or deny me and bid your life as an elemental farewell."

Everyone fell into silence.

"Silent treatment? That's how you're responding."

Once again, everyone remained silent. They simply glowered at Lloyd in defiance.

Lloyd, on the other hand, smiled more suspiciously as though he had anticipated this and therefore arrived with a secret weapon. “First, you,” he said, pointing to the pine tree elemental that was displaying aggression due to anxiety. “Your body, that is, your home address is the biggest and oldest pine tree at the peak of the timberline in the direction of the ridge. I can see it. Yes, I am right. I will beat you up first.”

Lloyd then smiled and raised his hand, which was holding a shovel.

Kaboom! The shovel's mana blast shot high into the sky and disappeared from view after lighting a corner. Next moment...

“Ack!” the pine tree elemental lurched forward and fell, glaring at Lloyd with pain. “What have you done to my body?!”

“What do you think?” Lloyd smiled nonchalantly. “I cut a branch of your tree.”

“H-How?!”

“How else? My knight did after I sent a signal.”

The pine tree elemental gave him an agitated expression. The branch the human broke had been one he was the proudest of and especially cherished and cared for due to its exceptionally beautiful and trim appearance. However, it was cut off without hesitation by the henchmen Lloyd sent out in advance. The elemental angrily questioned how this could happen.

“This is just the start, and I can tell from your eyes that you figured that out already. This will make things easier for us,” Lloyd merely said, pulling a brazen face. “Do you want me to use your tree trunk for construction? How about letting it go for just a few decades?”

The pine tree elemental let out an appalled “Eek.” The offer was clearly a threat veiled in a proposal. Take it or perish. There were only two options. The elemental thought over it for a while. Then, Lloyd dangled a sweet offer in front of it.

“Think about it,” came Lloyd’s voice to allure the pine tree elemental. “I’m not asking for something grand. Just accept me as your king since I already have the authority for it. Accept me as I am.”

The pine tree elemental continued to think without saying anything.

“Still don’t feel like it? Because I’m a human? What are you? Xenophobes? No, right? And besides, it’s not like I’m going to order anything outrageous,” urged Lloyd.

“But you destroyed the peak-”

“That was unavoidable, and that’s why I’m asking your help here. Some help with the weather and in difficult areas during the work.”

“...”

“But I promise you that no human will ever set foot in the areas outside the construction area. I give you my word. This won’t be harmful to you. Can’t we reach an agreement?”

“...”

“Well,” said Lloyd feigned wistfulness, “If you still don’t feel like it, you can always say goodbye to your elemental life and become a construction material.”

The pine tree elemental scowled at the thought.

This time, Lloyd’s gaze moved to Elemental Icicle. “And you, Elemental Icicle. You’re relieved now because you think I won’t be able to make good use of you since you’re ice, no?”

The icicle elemental, who was closely watching over the situation, flinched.

Lloyd flashed an evil smile. “You have my promise that you won’t be safe even if you’re an icicle. What’s your future aspiration?”

“What?” The icicle elemental asked.

“Do you like beef soup? Clear soup? Or spicy soup?”

“...”

“What do you want to be? Which option would be the most rewarding death for you?”

Gulp. The icicle elemental took a deep breath, and it dawned on everyone present that the human's threats were not a lie or an exaggeration. They were real and serious. In other words, they were backed into a corner by a complete madman with no common sense. The elementals exchanged glances with one another, and after a brief debate session, they made a decision.

“Fine. We will accept you as our ruler.” They all then bowed at Lloyd. Just a few decades like this. Keep their heads low. That was the price of not being extinguished.

Lloyd smiled. “Great. You’re making the right choice. Okay, then. It’s time to sprint to celebrate this moment.”

“Eh?” Everyone said in unison.

“I said,” Lloyd said in a clear voice, “Sprint. Touch the rock over there. The first five will get a special pardon for resisting me back there. The last one to come, however... You better be prepared.”

“I don’t get what’s happening...” The elementals’ facial expressions shook.

Lloyd's face hardened into a smile. He knew that these elementals’ obedience was fleeting and superficial. Eventually, they would try to rebel and take control of Lloyd. Therefore, the time had come for him to establish a permanent order, one that would make it easier for him to manage them. “You all have attitude issues? Slack around like this, and you will end up last.”

When they finally understood the situation, the race started. That was when Lloyd truly became the elemental king of the range, with thousands of elementals submitting to him.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 351: Switchback System (1)

“It has already been nineteen years since I began ruling over thousands of elite forces... How did this happen...?”

Beyond the vast and steep Pantara Range, to the southwest of the Magentano Kingdom, lay the Benetto Kingdom. Within the palace that sat in the capital, King Benettogna heaved a long, drawn breath upon realizing that he was facing the greatest disaster of his kingdom since its founding 300 years ago.

King Benettogna enquired, “So what happened after the peaks were torn down? Has there been a change in the dragon’s movement?”

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty. We have not been able to determine that yet.”

“Hmm... Then...”

“From what we believe, there is a high possibility that the Magentano Kingdom's army will attack us through the demolished peaks.”

“Yes, they probably will.” The king nodded, his face serious. It was an accurate and logical prediction. “Since the very founding of our kingdom, the rugged terrain of the Pantara Range has served as a natural shield that protects us. However, judging from the demolished peaks, I believe that Alicia, the greedy she-devil of Magentano, intends on showing her true colors.”

“Your Majesty, our kingdom’s army is also nothing to look down on. We will block their intrusion even at the risk of our own lives.”

“Do you believe that’s possible?” asked the king.

“We have defended this land for the past 300 years, during which we vigilantly prepared against the invasion of a powerful nation. The Magentano army may be powerful, but they will inevitably become exhausted as they cross the Pantara Range," the supreme commander of the defense forces retorted with a firm gaze.

"Would that be our chance to strike?" asked the king.

"Yes, Your Majesty. No matter how mighty the army is, they won't be able to mount a proper defense against our ambush in their state of exhaustion after crossing the range."

The king nodded. "Yes. That's what I desperately hope will happen."

The commander was right. They realistically had no way of preventing the Magentano Kingdom from invading their land. Their only potential window of opportunity for success would be when the soldiers of Magentano were in a vulnerable state of exhaustion from crossing the mountain range.

"In other words, the fate of our kingdom depends on that one ambush," remarked the king ruefully.

"Please trust me, Your Majesty."

"All right. I will trust you then," replied the king. "So, please swiftly go into combat with our most nimble and powerful army of soldiers."

"I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty!"

The Benetto Kingdom was located just thirty miles from the Pantara Range as its founders believed that proximity to the mountains was the best form of protection they could have. However, the opposite was true now, and there would be immediate danger of invasion the moment the Magentano troops marched down the range. If there was any consolation, it was that the short distance from the range would allow them to promptly respond to enemy attacks.

Watching the commander disappear, the king prayed, "May our kingdom's late predecessors grant us the power to overcome this crisis..." And he fervently hoped that the operation would succeed in maintaining peace over Benetto. His heart raced with desperation and anxiety. However, his concerns were completely unnecessary. To begin with, the Magentano Kingdom had no plans for any invasion. Instead, there was only a civil engineer advancing a construction project to build a road through the range. Nevertheless, a moment later, the kingdom suddenly froze in place. Bzzt...!

It was the work of the Time Freeze skill, which had been activated thirty miles away from Benetto in the Pantara Range. The palace walls, floor, and ceiling froze, and that wasn't the end of it. The flag that swayed in the wind on the palace terrace, the drifting clouds in the sky, the countless people moving through the capital city, the flows of water, and leaves falling down to the ground stilled inside the kingdom. The flow of time froze across all surrounding areas and even the rest of the world beyond them without exception.

***

[Skill Option 5: Time Freeze has been activated.]

[You have spent 3,000 RP.]

[Current RP: 7,071]

Crackle...!

[Time has been frozen.]

[The no-freeze zone cannot be changed until the optional skill is canceled.]

[The option is deactivated in the event the user goes out of the no-freeze zone.]

[Any creature within the range of the no-freeze zone will not age for a year.]

Lloyd watched the messages appear in front of him one by one. He felt an odd sensation of a tremendous volume of icy air departing his manaheart and the Heart of Winter.

"Haah..."

Lloyd rushed into action for the following phase now that the flow of time had been frozen.

Time to work!

Lloyd immediately dispatched a team of laborers he had assembled in advance, as the construction had been delayed for days due to the snowstorm. Thus, the Pantara Range Railroad Project took off. And because Draggy did such an excellent job carving out, plowing, and flattening the ground for the railway, everyone was able to begin building the roadbed immediately.

“My dear orc warriors, I am proud of you,” said Lloyd. “I remember giving you one important piece of information before we began. Do you recall?”

“If the water doesn’t drain in the railroad, the soil in the foundation will leak, oink!”

“What did I compare it to?” asked Lloyd again.

“Muscle loss, oink!!” said an orc passionately.

“So, what should we do?”

“Waterway! Build a trackside drainage! Oink!”

Lloyd believed the drainage to be the most important part of this project.

The land is steep here. Moreover, there’s snow falling, melting, and freezing on the ground all year round.

The melted snow would seep into the ground, eventually causing soil erosion from the runoff water and creating a sinkhole or another disaster. Alternatively, the trapped water could freeze and damage the railway by causing the ground to expand and protrude upwards.

If that happens, we are screwed. That’s why building drainage is our top priority. There will be laborers cleaning the railway when it snows as well, but that won’t be enough.

He needed the remaining snow and ice to flow out into the drainage. Thus, the design for it had to be precise so that all the water would flow out in the right path and direction without damaging the roadbed. As such, he closely supervised the construction of trackside drainage as he worked on the roadbed, making sure that it was made where the upper slope met the lower tracks.

“Dig, oink!”

“Carve out, oink!”

“Stomp, oink!”

“Date, oink!”

“There’s a traitor here...Oink!”

On the other hand, the elves were responsible for stabilizing the slope.

“Okay. Sprinkle water on the slope before the water in the bucket freezes?” asked Moira, the leader of the elves.

Lloyd grinned. “Yes, that is all I need you to do. The slope is quite steep, but it’s comprised of bedrock.” It was true. The exposed bedrock in the area was all thanks to Draggy’s joyous destruction of the slope. Lloyd experimented with his virtual simulation and found that there was no risk of a collapse. However, he would need to do something about the potential weathering. “As time passes, small pebbles or larger rock fragments will break off the bedrock and roll down to the railway, possibly damaging it. If we are unlucky, the train could face a disruption while it’s running. Otherwise, there could be a derailment if something lands on top of a rail. This can all be avoided by sprinkling water on the slope’s surface, where it’ll immediately freeze into a coating of ice.”

If it wasn’t installed properly, the freeze-thaw cycle could cause the cement to lift, crack, and have all kinds of other problems. Instead of dealing with that disaster, it was much easier and more effective to freeze a layer of water on the ground.

It’s not that the ice won’t melt at all. However, whatever does will be quickly replaced by the heavy snow falling and freezing on top of it.

To keep the ice from becoming too thick, he would probably need to cut it down more frequently. However, that could wait until after his current work was complete. “I will leave you to it then. Also, please make sure to use the safety rope since it is slippery up there.”

“Don’t worry. This is no different than plain land for us.” Moira chuckled. She and the elves then proceeded to move with the agility of a circus troupe.

Swoosh! Fwip!

The steep and slippery slope was nothing to them. It was as simple as 1+1 was for a high school valedictorian, learning to dribble was for Michael Jordan, or punching bubble wrap was for Mike Tyson. The elves treaded, rushed, and leaped around to sprinkle water around the slick slope before coming back to draw more water and repeat the process. At the same time, Ggoming spewed two layers of spiderweb on top of the layer of ice they created. Seeing that the construction of the slope protection went well, Lloyd moved on to the next task, which was the railroad construction.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

Fwish!

Every day, Bangul produced rebars, which Corgidus and his team refined to fit precisely as Lloyd had designed. These pieces were then brought to the site to be installed and assembled by skeletons, lancers, and civil engineers. The railroads progressed day by day as more drains were made, gravel was laid out, timber was placed, and rails were installed. Above the site, the elves continued to sprinkle water on the bedrock to freeze its surface. All of this was made possible by Lloyd's vast and exceptional experience with numerous large-scale projects.

Duh. It’s horrible to be wasteful!

In Lloyd's mind, this was the perfect construction site: nothing was wasted, safety came first, and everyone worked happily. Just like that, three months went by, and by then, a rough outline of the railroad ascending the mountain had appeared.

“I suppose this is the loop line railway and switchback system you mentioned the last time.”

“That’s exactly right.” Lloyd grinned and looked at Javier. “Why? Is this your first time seeing something like it?”

As Javier looked down at the ground below, he moaned at the ridiculousness of Lloyd’s question and saw the result of their three months of labor beneath him. The loop railroad was the first feature that caught his eye.

It looks like a snake circling the mountain.

That was the first thing that came to mind when he looked at the railroad. It was not straight like the normal ones. Instead, it was looped, and the train went around the mountain rather than up it. The principle of the railroad was clear to Javier even if he was not an expert engineer.

And the switchback... Can a train move in a place like that?

Lloyd frowned as he examined one point in the rift, which was the steepest area with the up line. There was a zigzag railway along the slope, but it was not connected like the loop type. Instead, it was cut off on one side and connected to the other side via a crossing.

I suppose the train will move forward and backward over and over again along the railway on the slope in a zigzag mode, climbing up little by little.

Javier furrowed his brows after discovering the idea behind the switchback system. He wondered if it was safe because he wasn’t sure that the train could maneuver precisely in the zigzag railway, given how narrow it was. One tiny error and the passenger would undoubtedly fall off.

But I’m sure Master Lloyd has a plan.

He probably does have a plan. It was Lloyd after all. Thinking so, Javier assured himself.

“Good. It’s your first time. Then, watch me ride that thing.” said Lloyd.

“Excuse me...” muttered Javier, taken aback, trying to figure out if he heard correctly. Master Lloyd was going to ride that untested thing? Feeling anxious, he turned and looked at Lloyd. “That can’t be. Young Master?”

“That’s right. I’m going to test it.”

“But why should you-”

“Because it’s dangerous,” Lloyd said, smiling as if testing anything dangerous was clearly part of his job description.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 352: Switchback System (2)

“It’s dangerous. That’s why,” Lloyd grinned, thinking that was the obvious answer. “Moreover, a test run like the one we went through in Hell is a necessary step that we cannot skip. I’ve found that you have to ride a train and railway yourself to get a proper feel for it. It’s hard to determine how well made each section is, how close the final product is to what was envisioned during the construction phase, what specific improvements are needed for certain sections, and if there are any unstable areas or safety hazards without looking over everything with your own eyes and physically experiencing a ride.”

Lloyd was serious. There were things he couldn’t find out before going on a ride to see and experience them for himself. He continued, “So I have to go on a ride. I asked Corgidus in advance if he could create a development mule for the test run. I glanced at it earlier, and it looked quite phenomenal.”

“Hmm, Master Lloyd,” said Javier. “That is not what I meant to say...”

“That’s not it? What is it then?” Lloyd smiled again, cocking his head to the side.

Javier’s face grew stern. “I am aware of the need for a test drive and why someone needs to get the ride experience. But my question is why you should be the one to do it.”

“I told you a while ago. I need to directly see and feel everything for myself.”

“Can you not ask someone else to do the job?”

“Nope. I can’t.”

“But it is dangerous,” insisted Javier, pointing to the railroad built along the steep slope. “It may look all right on the outside, but no one knows what kind of dangers might appear when it’s in operation. My suggestion is to run a safety check first without anyone on before you go ahead with your plan.”

“Hmm, that won’t work.”

“Why is that?” asked Javier.

“Because of the orcs,” explained Lloyd. “Even with no other passengers, the orcs will be on the ride since the train moves from the exerted force of the lever being pressed down. It would be pretty weird for me to opt out just because it is dangerous while I have the orcs onboard. Do you want me to turn into a piece of trash?”

“Well...”

“Leave it,” said Lloyd conclusively. “I know you’re saying this out of concern, but I’ve got a plan. So you can rest assured.”

“You have safety measures in mind?” asked Javier.

“Of course.” Lloyd nodded confidently and declared with a bright smile, “You are coming with me.”

“...”

“That way, I wouldn’t feel too wronged even if the train derails and I fall off a cliff.”

“In other words, you aren’t willing to die alone.”

“That, too, obviously.”

Lloyd smiled widely and continued, “I am just kidding. You are a great asset that could help me and the orcs escape if needed. But I will have Draggy on standby near us so he can catch the train if it rolls off.”

Since the test drive came with risks, there needed to be safety measures put into place. That went without saying.

Of course. I've got to have safety measures in place.

Lloyd was genuinely afraid of the test drive, to be honest. However, he never even considered delegating the task to someone else. The responsibility was his and his alone.

As I told Javier, I have to inspect the results of the construction. But a bigger reason is the danger that comes with it.

Lloyd believed it was only appropriate that he shoulder the danger himself. He needed to take on the risks that came with testing the train as the person who designed it.

There will be countless people who ride the train once it's in operation. So, it would honestly be absurd for me not to participate in a test ride for a train I designed myself because it's dangerous.

Lloyd was disgusted with the thought of making something for other people that he wouldn't use due to safety concerns. However, he had seen this happen from time to time back in Korea.

It occurred a lot on construction sites. That was how safety measures were handled most of the time. I've rarely seen those in charge ever inspect or install the safety nets, tower cranes, and passageways that would be used by the dozens of workers on site.

Instead, they threw the jobs to their employees and some other workers, who simply glanced over them on paper, and there were even those who completely skipped those parts.

I used to curse those types of people inside my head all the time. And yet, I would be no different than them if I made someone else do the test ride in my place because it could be dangerous.

That was not what Lloyd wanted. He felt that in order to be confident about his past self, the risk was his burden to take.

“Anyway, I am going to be on the train for a few reasons. There are a lot of safety precautions in place, so there is nothing to worry about. And if we ever die together, consider it an honor,” Lloyd said, laughing once more.

“An honor? That won’t happen.”

“What? Are you going to save me if the train falls off?”

“No. I’m going to escape alone.”

“...”

“But fine. I will give you a proper farewell.”

“...”

“I could even sadly wave my hands if you want.”

“Tsk, never mind.” Lloyd then burst into laughter.

A faint smile appeared on Javier’s face, and he thought... Despite his tendency to act conceited and self-centered, Master Lloyd never handed his responsibilities to someone else during the most important moments.

Javier initially believed Lloyd to be nothing but conniving. The definition of an opportunist. However, he realized later that this was just his way of survival. That was how Lloyd learned to survive while living somewhere called Seoul. Beneath his false exterior, there was an admirable selflessness and effort to lead a life he could be proud of.

And so, I may somehow come to admire you one day.

Javier thought these were likely his true feelings for Lloyd. Although, he honestly didn’t want to admit that and had even less desire to ever make his feelings known. Thinking this, the silver-haired knight laughed and looked at the construction site on the slope next to Lloyd.

***

From that day on, Lloyd sat down to begin the test drive of the train. He focused most of his attention on the process of choosing the orc warriors who would get the test train to start moving. “I am planning to have eight volunteers in each car of the train.”

“Oink?”

The 300 orc warriors snorted in disinterest at Lloyd's words. The task seemed so dull and unappealing that they worried they would lose their muscles. They thought that using shovels and pickaxes to dig and plow the site would be a more beneficial activity. However, what Lloyd said next changed their opinions altogether.

“Anybody wants to take this opportunity to train their triceps by working as a volunteer?”

“Triceps...? Oink?” Everyone’s eyes flew open with interest, and their snort turned heated and excited.

“Oink! Does it mean that our triceps will grow larger and more beautiful, oink?” An interested orc raised his hand.

“Of course. The train will move using the muscles of those selected. Its wheels will roll forward from the force that’s exerted as the lever for the train is pushed down in a pumping motion,” Lloyd explained with the smile of a swindler.

“Push exercises! Triceps, oink!”

“Indeed, it will give your triceps a serious workout. Moreover, since half of the journey is up a steep slope, moving the train will be more difficult, requiring more strength. And that means-”

“More stimulation, oink!”

“Yes, precisely. You are going to get jacked, and since you will have to pump the lever nonstop, you will also gain better endurance.”

“Tireless muscle! Oink!”

“Yes, that’s what I’m saying. Okay, let me ask you again. Who’s up for a tricep workout?”

“Me, oink!”

“No! Me, oink!”

“I will do it, oink!”

As soon as Lloyd had finished speaking, there was a ruckus among the orc warriors. After a tirade of arm wrestling, eight winners were chosen. Then, Lloyd added two more “sand men” on top of them.

“Okay, you two are the sand men,” said Lloyd, “Take this.”

“Oink? What is this? Aren’t these sandbags, oink?”

“Yes.” Lloyd flashed a grin after handing over a large bag of sand to them. “Your job from now on is very important.”

“Important? Us? Oink?”

“Yes. You will be at the very front of the train. Do you see the chairs furnished outside?”

“Yes, I do, oink.”

“Looks like a special seat, oink!”

There were two seats fixed on the front of the train head where Lloyd pointed. “You might wonder what they are doing outside when they should be inside, but there is a reason. That is where you two would vouch for the safety of the train as you battle the harsh wind.”

“Brave the gust of biting wind, oink?”

“Responsible for the safety of the train? Us? Oink?”

“Yes. The safety of the train rests on your shoulders.” Lloyd pointed to the large sandbags in their embraces. “Throughout the ride, I want you two to sprinkle sand on the railroad.

“Sand, oink?”

“What happens if we sprinkle sand, oink?”

“That will allow the train to move more smoothly without slipping off the rail, thanks to the friction the sand creates.”

Lloyd was right about this. And his idea wasn’t entirely his. It was borrowed from the actual method in South Korea.

The train that ran the Himalayan Darjeeling Railway, which served as the model for this one, featured sand men.

This idea originated from research materials fashioned by Lloyd’s college senior, and it concerned the real sand men in the Darjeeling train, who behaved just like the rocs here. Thanks to them, the train moved through the slopes more steadily.

“So your role is very important. The safety of this train will depend on how meticulously and precisely you sprinkle sand on the railway.”

“Our role is vital, oink!”

“We are important, oink!”

“Yes. Without you two, this train won’t move. So please do a good job.”

“You can leave it to us, oink!”

“Trust us, oink!” Two orcs tapped their pecs, having learned of their job as sand men.

Finally, the test run began, and it was during this that the extraordinary value of Corgidus and his team, who built the test train, became evident.

“Start!”

“Oink! Oink!”

Clack! Clank! Clank...! With Lloyd's go signal, the orcs' triceps powerfully contracted. The four of them grabbed the lever and pressed it with overwhelming strength, pumping it down as if there was no tomorrow. The orcs' propulsion caused the one-car train to move forward, and the sand men sprayed sand at the front. The travel was slow at first as it climbed the mountain, but whenever the orcs showed signs of fatigue...

“Time for a shift change. What did I say is more important than exercise to build muscle?”

“Proper rest, oink!” The four orcs stepped back with that united shout.

Subsequently, another four orcs arrived and grabbed the lever; four orcs made up one group. As one group ran out of steam, the other stepped in. The train ascended the rift's slope just like this. Eventually, the train reached a point where the slope grew too steep for the orcs to keep pumping the lever. However, Lloyd had no concerns about it.

“And that’s why I used the switchback system to pass through these kinds of areas.”

He gave Javier a confident smile as he inspected the railway and yelled, “Stop!” to the orcs who were pumping. At the same time, they pulled the halt lever.

Clunk! Squeaak! When the train came to a stop at the dead-end section of the railway, the metallic wheel clunked as it was locked, and Javier thought...

It looks like the railway is cut off here. How will the train move around?

Javier was extremely curious, and his curiosity grew upon hearing Lloyd yell.

“Sand men! Cardio! Now!”

At that moment, the sand men leaped to their feet, enabling the train to move across the steep slopes thanks to the brilliant switchback system.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 353: Switchback System (3)

The switchback system was a technique used to run trains on rocky terrains. It was simple in theory: the train moved forward, changed tracks, and moved backward until it changed tracks again. Rinse and repeat. To put it another way, the switchback system allowed a train to travel up a slope at the lowest elevation possible through a zig-zag shape.

Well, roads can also be built similarly to the old highway in Chupungnyeong. There are also many paths going up mountain slopes in a zig-zag pattern throughout Hongcheon, Pyeongchang, and Inje County in the Province of Gangwon. This arrangement made the routes easier to drive through since the incline of the roads became gentler as the distance of travel increased.

A similar switchback system was also once used in South Korea. The stations between Heungjeon and Nahanjeong, as well as the paths in the Gyeongbu Line and Chukhang Line, were representative examples, though they were now closed.

There are plenty more in other places, too, of course. In addition to the one in Darjeeling, India, there are also similar railways in Mountain Ali, Taiwan, Peru, Germany, the United States, and many more.

Of course, the one Lloyd built here was considerable in scale. It was actually over the top.

Eight? Five? Nah. Twenty-one times!

To climb over the rift's hill, the train would need to switch directions twenty-one times.

Even though twenty-one is a lot, this is still manageable. After all, if Draggy had not removed two peaks and expanded the rift, I don’t think even 210 switchbacks would have been enough let alone twenty-one.

Lloyd had already tried to lower the number of switchbacks that would be needed as much as he could. While looking at his final design in contentment, he shouted, “Sand men, it’s time for cardio!”

At Lloyd’s yelling, the sand men dropped the bag of sand and dashed outside the train while remembering Lloyd’s warning. They then pushed the massive lever planted in the area where they ran, and a small change occurred on the track the test train had passed through. Clack! Creeak!

The railway segment changed directions. The train was cut off from the rails behind it and connected to another track in a different direction ahead of it, opening up a new path uphill. Once the two sand men completed their mission, they went back to the train and gave Lloyd a thumbs up.

“Switch completed! Oink!”

“Good.”

It was Lloyd’s turn to work now. After confirming the switch in tracks, he pulled the lever, a basic geared device that created a simple back-and-forth movement, on both sides of the train’s braking device.

Clank! Lloyd yelled, “Go!” as the reverse gear clicked into place.

The orcs then began to pump the lever, sending force toward the cogwheels and chains and propelling the train. But the wheels had changed to a different direction, owing to the operation of the reverse gear device.

Clank... Clank... Clank...! The giant train began to travel backward, and Lloyd's mouth curved into a bright smile.

Good. It’s moving well.

Suddenly, Lloyd thought back to the day he had commissioned the test mule train to Corgidus, a relatively straightforward project considering the train could be converted from a carriage. There was only one complex component in the job.

The problem was this geared device.

For the switchback system to function properly, the train needed to travel forward and backward. But Lloyd knew very little about this apparatus.

But I had faith that Corgidus could pull it off since he's a master of mechanical development. He is among the top five across the entire continent when it comes to this skill.

Lloyd was confident that Corgidus could develop a gear if he gave a precise explanation of its broader purpose. The latter exceeded his expectations threefold.

"Wahaha. Brat, all you need is to change the force direction of the drive shaft based on the lever movement. Did you think I couldn't make a simple toy like this?"

Corgidus was also responsible for the changing railway that the sand men had just maneuvered. It was thanks to him that the switchback system could function smoothly.

Clack... Clank! The train smoothly passed the switch and then moved onto the new track, slowly ascending until it arrived at the second switchback section, where it stopped.

Lloyd then shouted, "Sand men! It's time for cardio!"

The sand men then dashed up to operate the switch, which led the train to a route above it. Once the railway successfully changed directions, Lloyd shifted the leveler into forward gear.

"Chug chug!"

The train then continued at a steady speed until it reached the third switchback. This process would repeat through a total of 21 zig zags until the train slowly conquered the steep slope of the mountains, moving from one direction to another. Javier, who was watching the whole thing, clucked his tongue.

This is unbelievable...

Even though Javier had anticipated this given the design of the tracks, he was still awestruck by Lloyd's foresight now that he was actually onboard the train.

"Young Master, please tell me you did not plan this from the start," Javier said.

"What do you mean this? The switchback system?"

"Yes." Javier gave a nod. "I mean from the start, exactly as I said."

"You mean going to the heavens to bait the Minister of Angels?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes, Young Master."

"If that's the case, yes. You're right."

"..."

"It's the truth," replied Lloyd. "I planned to start this construction from then. I figured this mountain would be the easiest way to set off the Magentano House and the queen. That's why I thought there was a good possibility."

"Possibly for what?"

"Well, nothing really special. Just stuff like how my construction offer would be accepted and I would end the project in success by using the switchback system. Of course, plans do not always go as expected, so I had a plan B and C in case something went wrong."

Nothing? This was nothing? Javier was overcome with the desire to tell Lloyd outright that he was a man with a monstrous ability to make predictions and plans. The knight wondered what kind of mindset was needed to execute such large-scale plans as if it were nothing. Simply put, it only seemed possible for someone who lived a completely different life from him.

And so, Javier couldn’t help but ask, “So, once you are done with the test, you will construct the railway over the range that will descend downward. Do you also have a plan for what comes after the construction?”

“Of course. It won’t be enough to just complete the construction.”

Clank! After forcefully pushing the forward gear, Lloyd grinned widely and brazenly stated, “I’m planning to extort a few things from the Benetto Kingdom that stands just beyond the range.”

***

In the meantime, the Benetto Kingdom’s palace was motionless from top to bottom from the effect of the Time Freeze skill. The walls, floors, and ceilings, the flags waving in the breeze, the officials, the supreme commander, and the king were all frozen in place. Now, after eleven months, a change started to take place.

Crack... Crack!

The frigidity energy that had stilled time and space started to lessen until it completely vanished. The world’s temperature returned to normal, and everything started to move back to life like a video that was unpaused. The people inside the palace began to move, the supreme commander took a few steps back, the flag on the terrace fluttered, and the king let out the rest of his sigh.

“Grant us the strength to overcome this disaster,” King Benettogna fervently pleaded, clinging to the sliver of hope he was left with.

I pray the supreme commander’s plan will work.

If not, the kingdom was doomed. The Bone Dragon, which belonged to the Magentano Kingdom, had already destroyed two peaks as part of its demonstration of power. It was a clear sign that the neighboring kingdom was going to launch a devastating attack.

If we choose direct combat, my men will be massacred by Magentano forces before we even get an opportunity to fight. Siege warfare would also be a bad decision since the Bone Dragon could simply smash through the gates and walls of the palace.

Therefore, the only viable strategy was to launch a large-scale ambush when their opponents were in a state of exhaustion from hiking through the harsh mountain range. That was the only way they could succeed.

That is how we will weaken the enemy's spirit, and in the meantime, I will hasten to gather support from neighboring countries to boost my chances of protecting my land.

His goal was to lower their morale. However, there was still the Bone Dragon, a fearsome foe, for him to deal with.

We will be able to deal with the dragon if we work together. No, we must deal with it and win no matter what.

However, the first task ahead of him was to kill the spirit of the Magentano army.

Please. King Benettogna repeatedly prayed to his kingdom's past predecessors and even toward the Pantata Range, pleading for strength. I implore Pantalasa, the elemental king who assisted in the establishment of my kingdom, to punish the intruders with the harsh mountain terrain and blizzards. Please, let those vicious and inhumane monsters never set foot in this beautiful land.

Despite the loss of two peaks, the monarch opted to place his trust in the Pantara Range and its ability to act as a natural shield.

Since the range lacks any proper pathways, the Magentano bastards will pay a hefty price for looking down on nature.

This king, on the other hand, was unaware of the reality he was in. He was unaware of the events that occurred while he was in a frozen state, such as how a madman had become the elemental king of the range and expanded the rifts of the mountains before installing a sleek railway that could be easily traveled with a train. He was unaware that the railway had been completed just moments ago. The king knew nothing.

And his ignorance was understandable: all of these events had occurred while the world had come to a halt. From this king's perspective, the loss of the peaks was a recent event, similar to how a patient never feels anything during surgery and finds it over only after they open their eyes.

There was another terrifying fact that the king was completely unaware of as he prayed to his kingdom’s past monarchs and Pantalasa. At this exact moment, Lloyd, the man behind this predicament, was making his way to the Benetto Kingdom on the back of the Bone Dragon.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 354: Lie With Confidence (1)

Fwoosh! Whoosh! Draggy's massive wings flapped in the air, causing a gust of wind to sweep across the Pantara Range. Lloyd, whose hair flowed against the wind, raised his head.

"The weather is fantastic," expressed Lloyd.

Lloyd didn't remember the last time he felt the warmth of the sunlight. It felt like the cells on his face, neck, and the rest of his exposed skin were dancing in joy.

Has it been about eleven months?

There had been one problem during the last eleven months of Time Freeze skill. It was that the Pantara Range nearly blocked the entire sun.

"We haven't been able to do anything close to bathing in the sun except for the time we constructed the railway going downward, right?"

"That is right." Javier's slight smile showed that he was also enjoying the sun. "But even then, there had to be clouds in the southern sky that we did not get to enjoy the sun very well. Someone stopped time in an untimely manner, Young Master."

"Hmm, so are you saying this is my fault? That everyone became as pale as a ghost due to the lack of sunlight?"

"What a perfect summary of my words. I am glad my point was clear, Young Master."

"You have not been willing to lose a single fight with me these days," pointed Lloyd.

"That is not true."

"What is then?"

“There was never a time I lost.”

“...”

“By the way, Master Lloyd,” said Javier, changing the subject.

“Yeah.”

“Are you sure riding on top of Sir Draggy is a good idea?” Javier's small smile vanished, replaced by a worried expression. “The Benetto Kingdom will be frightened by Sir Draggy’s sudden appearance.”

“They probably will be, right?”

“Yes, they will.”

“So, your concern is that... riding Draggy into their territory without any prior consultation or announcement could spark international conflict, right?”

“This time again, your summary is spot on.” Javier looked at Lloyd, puzzled as to why Lloyd chose this mode of transportation despite knowing so well.

Lloyd brushed his hair back and chuckled. “Well, there are lots of reasons, but if I have to pick one... Because we can.”

“What do you mean, Master Lloyd?”

“They simply lack the capabilities to hurt us in the first place, and they will not be ready for Draggy either.”

“But—”

“I understand what you mean,” Lloyd said, cutting him off. “It may not be right diplomatically. It could also invite protest from the Benetto Kingdom and neighboring countries, and it could even be a rash act that builds tension and hostility against our kingdom if I act poorly.”

“Does that mean you will act decently?”

“Duh,” said Lloyd, shrugging his shoulders and gazing at the Benetto Kingdom’s capital, which was a tiny dot. “I thought of making a modest and prudent visit to that place. Just the two of us without Draggy. But I decided I didn’t want to.”

“Why, Young Master?”

“I could not be bothered. And it was a hassle.” Lloyd grinned. “Just imagine what would happen if we went without Draggy. They will do a thorough check of our status and complain that we did not notify them in advance. And demand an explanation as to why we demolished the peaks and the meaning behind it and if it was an intention of invasion and whether the queen sent us here... Total hassle.”

“But—”

“Sure, that’s the protocol, but I can’t be bothered, and it is a waste of time. I mean, we have got a good method that would eliminate all of those tedious processes,” Lloyd said as he patted Draggy.

“To summarize, Young Master, you opted for this drastic method to skip every unnecessary and tedious process and save time,” Javier said with a sneer as if he couldn’t believe Lloyd.

“Yeah.”

“But, Master Lloyd, this could harm the Magentano House and the queen —”

“Nah. It’s all right. That king’s going be happier once we’re done.”

“Young Master?”

“All thanks to Draggy.”

“I do not get what you mean...”

“Well, watch if you’re curious. We’re here. Gear up.” Lloyd smiled like a sneaky kid.

Now the once-tiny dot that was the capital of the Benetto Kingdom had expanded into the size of a shield, and Javier could hear with his grandmaster senses what was happening down there.

“I-It’s the Bone Dragon!”

“Invasion!”

“Mother!”

“Come over here! Now! Hide!”

Javier heard people screaming hysterically in different parts of the capital. Some were pointing up at the sky, while others were screaming at the top of their lungs to warn of the approaching danger. Women were running to hide, babies were crying in their mothers’ arms, guards were moving around, their armor clacking, bells were announcing the approaching danger, and objects were thumping and thudding as they fell to the ground.

As Javier felt himself transform into a villain, a sting of remorse coursed through him. He then glanced over at Lloyd, who appeared perfectly fine.

“Hmm, just perfect. Since the people escaped on their own already, it’s easier for us to land.”

Javier couldn’t believe it. Lloyd is enjoying the fact that the plaza is now empty!

Dammit, Javier thought as he tightened his fist, wishing he could hit that chestnut-shaped back of the head just once. Meanwhile, Draggy attempted to make a soft landing on the ground.

Booom!

Even though he landed as softly as possible, Draggy still produced blood-curdling noise and vibration, and five rows of flowers were flattened under its feet.

Lloyd, on the other hand, did not care in the slightest about the management's blood, sweat, and tears. He instead ran his eyes over the length of the plaza from Draggy's head before loading his mana into his voice. "Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera County, has arrived at the invitation of the House of Benetto and wishes to be granted the audience with King Benettogna."

The mana allowed his voice to travel far and wide, and it pierced into the ears of the crowd. Everyone cocked their heads.

What? He has been invited by the imperial family?

He and the Bone Dragon?

Um... Did that really happen?

I have not heard about this...

The news surprised the trembling young man, peeking lady, and shivering old man, as well as the rushing crossbow archers.

Hahaha. Look at their faces.

Lloyd grinned. What he had just said was a ruse. A blatant lie. The House of Benetto had never sent him an invitation for any kind of meet-up, but Lloyd did not hesitate to lie to their faces. Why? Simple.

This would make things easier later on.

Lloyd was certain that the king and his house would be thrilled by the end of the conversation and would eagerly volunteer to operate the range railway as a partner. He looked around the plaza.

"I tell you once again. I am here at the invitation of your rightful king. But the absence of preparation to welcome the guest prompts me to wonder if I got the date wrong. If anyone is willing, please kindly relay the message about my arrival to the king."

Lloyd's voice dripped with shamelessness as if he were spitting nothing but facts, and his demeanor was polite as well as shameless. Its effect was felt immediately.

“S-Stop!” yelled a capital defense officer leading the troops to the plaza, and 200 soldiers came to a halt, as did 180 crossbow archers, 300 spear soldiers, and the lancers who were harnessing their horses, who all received the halt order from their commanders as one thought dominated their minds.

If what that man said is true... Then it’s not an invasion!

That man Lloyd Frontera on the Bone Dragon said loud and clear that he was here invited to speak with the king and that someone should notify the king of his arrival, so there was only one conclusion based on the given information.

We don’t have to fight against the Bone Dragon!

Everyone smiled in relief. Their bodies suddenly relaxed. To be honest, they were genuinely terrified. The chances of taking down the Bone Dragon seemed extremely low despite their strong military presence. The same thing went among the officers, who valued their lives regardless of patriotism. Everyone was glad to know that the visitor was not an invader but a guest without any intention to fight. From then on...

“You! Over there!”

Each officer summoned the fastest soldier in his unit and issued the most urgent and desperate order of their lives: “Get to the palace right now and report what you have heard. Now!”

“Y-Yes!”

Soldiers rushed to the palace and shared the message with King Benettogna.

“What did you say? I invited him?”

“That is what he is claiming, Your Majesty.”

King Benettogna became confused and shut his mouth. He thought the Bone Dragon was here to burn everything down.

What is he thinking? Why is he saying that I have invited him?

He knew he had not invited that man from the Magentano Kingdom nor promised any talks, and he did not forget that the Bone Dragon had provoked his kingdom a few days ago by smashing two peaks of the Pantara Range.

Grit! King Benettona clenched his teeth, but instead of expressing his rage, he smiled naturally and said, “Ahaha. I never expected him to accept it this way.”

“Sire? Do you mean that the man and the Bone Dragon have been invited here to talk with you?”

“Indeed,” replied King Benettogna to the supreme commander, who looked baffled. “I considered how damaging it would be for us if we had a confrontation with the Magentano forces. Even if we win, the damage will be devastating.”

“You are certainly right, Your Majesty. Does that mean that you sent a letter without my knowledge to the House of Magentano to avoid a clash and any damage to our relationship?”

“I did truly. I am sorry for doing so behind your back, but I did not have another choice. In politics, there are times when it is even necessary to fool your allies.”

“I am simply overwhelmed by your wisdom, Your Majesty.”

“Haha. I am glad you see it that way.”

The king congratulated himself on his natural acting, which won over the supreme commander. The fact that he won over the commander was very important.

I must dance to Lloyd Frontera's tune and play along despite his ridiculous lie. That is how I can avoid an immediate clash.

With the Bone Dragon having just arrived in the capital, he was aware that they might not face a good outcome if they chose to reject conversation and engage in confrontation.

"Well then, let us move now. Let us hear what response the man has brought from the Magentano Kingdom," the king said as he rose, flashing the most relaxed smile he could muster. It was time to sound out Lloyd Frontera and find out why the latter barged in here with the Bone Dragon.

*I wonder what trickery he is up to now.*Unaware that this would be a day remembered throughout history in the future, King Benettogna, who was half-worried and terrified, resolvedly made his way to the plaza.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 355: Lie With Confidence (2)

It had been nineteen years since King Benettogna had ascended to the throne, and he collected a wealth of knowledge from both his loyal and groveling subjects. Therefore, he only needed a few seconds to see right through a person. His wise eyes could clearly see through a person's character and their values. He was certain that this would be true today as well.

Whew...

As he entered the plaza, King Benettogna's eyes shone with determination, eager to meet the stranger despite the supreme commander's disapproval, the latter saying it was too dangerous for him to go alone. However, King Benettogna said everything was fine.

There's nowhere safe in my kingdom since the Bone Dragon is here.

As such, he had to deal with the unwelcome visitor himself and put an end to this situation. He cast a bright gaze toward the center plaza, where he saw the Bone Dragon with an oppressive energy exuding out of him and a young man standing beside his foot.

Lloyd Frontera. I heard he is a young noble who has become the center of attention in Magentano. He is also the meritorious retainer of Queen Magentano.

Despite the natural barrier created by the Pantara Range, rumors spread like wildfire in his kingdom due to their proximity to the Magentano Kingdom's border. This was especially true when the stories were about an extraordinary figure from a potential enemy kingdom.

Rumors say he has countless heroic achievements, beginning with saving people in the east from disaster.

And the moment he laid eyes on Lloyd, he understood why there were so many rumors about him: he was extremely handsome.

Haha, so a human can be this beautiful. How could a person be so blinding? The rumors merely said that he was all right in terms of appearance, failing to elaborate on his dashing looks.

Perhaps the Magentano Kingdom had different beauty standards? King Benettogna made his way, admiring the beauty that the people in the neighboring kingdom seemed to take for granted. He opened his arms wide to make the impression on the nearby crowd that this meeting had been planned in advance.

With a bright smile, he said, “Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family. I have heard about your reputation. I am beyond happy to meet you in real life.”

The young noble that the king greeted turned around, his silver curls spinning with him, crinkled his fine brows and said, “I am honored to meet King Benettogna, the rightful lord of the land. I am Javier Asrahan, a knight.” Javier’s introduction shocked King Benettogna.

“Hmm?” He gaped in disbelief. This man was the knight, Javier Asrahan? This noble and gorgeous young man?

Hold on. Then, who is Lloyd Frontera?

The young man, who looked like an ugly potato in comparison to the knight standing next to him, bowed as that thought entered the king’s mind. He then spoke, “I am Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family, at your service. I am infinitely honored to be in your presence, Your Majesty.”

King Benettogna suddenly felt a shaft of shock and cocked his head to the side, looking at Javier and Lloyd each. That was when he finally realized he had made a mistake.

My. I made a mistake.

He could not believe it. He mistook the silver-haired knight for Lloyd because of his elegant face, and he mistook the real Lloyd for a peasant because of his potato-like face.

“Ehem. Hmm! Ehem!” The king cleared his throat.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose with remorse. “It is all right. This has happened to me many times. But thank you for accepting my abrupt request for a meeting.”

“Thank you? I doubt it.” As soon as he came close enough to lower his voice, his friendly public demeanor vanished, and a sharp look appeared on his face. “What is your plan, and what malicious scheme does your queen have in mind for you to come here?”

The king’s eyes were filled with doubt. Lloyd and the Bone Dragon were uninvited guests, and this talk wasn’t in the schedule. “Do you and your queen plan to threaten us?” There was tension in his voice since this moment marked a critical point. If the talk went well, it meant an increase in his political influence. But something else had to be done first, which was finding out the real intention behind Lloyd's outrageous arrival with the Bone Dragon.

“I am here to notify you, not threaten you,” Lloyd said without pulling any punches. The king’s brows lifted almost up to his fading hairline, so Lloyd added, “I mean what I say. And it is a notification. Not a threat.”

“Notify me? But about what?” replied the king, wondering what it could be about. Demand for surrender? Hand over the territory? His heart thumped in nervousness.

Lloyd shrugged to indicate that it wasn’t anything serious. “That a trade route has been opened.”

“A trade route?”

“Yes,” replied Lloyd.

“What trade route?”

“I am talking about the trade route that connects the Magentano Kingdom to yours.”

“There is no such a thing.” King Benettogna frowned deeply. He couldn’t wrap around what this young man was talking about.

My kingdom is surrounded by lands, and the only trade route, if there is one, must be through the Pantara Range, which is why trade with Magentano is only possible by crossing another kingdom. What is this man saying?

A road had to be paved in the Pantara Range for a trade route to be opened. However, the task was impossible, has been impossible, and will remain impossible in the future.

Perhaps, he is speaking metaphorically?

The king wondered what that could mean. His head was spinning as he tried to find an answer.

That put a smile on Lloyd’s face. “There is no other meaning to my words, Sire. A direct trade route has been paved between my kingdom and yours.”

“...”

“I am being truthful.”

“Do you mean in the Pantara Range?”

“That is exactly right,” affirmed Lloyd. “I had the Bone Dragon demolish two peaks, widened the rifts, and flattened the slopes as you may be somewhat aware. And so, we laid a railway on the range.”

“A railway?”

“Yes, a railway that allows a train to travel over the Pantara Range twice a day.”

“Railway? Train?”

“You could think of it as a metal road that moves through a series of connected carriages.”

King Benettogna stared intensely at Lloyd, who was speaking very confidently. He wondered if this young man had lost his mind and how he must react to that strange and illogical drivel. Every word that Lloyd said was met with skepticism, but not so much because of the concept behind the train and railway, which seemed plausible. It was the construction of such a road in the Pantara Range that he had a hard time believing.

“Why do you come to my kingdom and spout lies?” His voice now grew stern. “Is this you and your queen’s way of humiliating and mocking me and my family?”

“Hmm... Is that how my words sounded in your ears?” asked Lloyd.

“Indeed.”

Clench! “A metal road that allows travel across the Pantara Range? That means you were able to complete a large-scale construction in those rugged mountain terrains. Are you telling me that such a project was completed in just a matter of days?” gritted out King Benettogna.

The king’s frustration grew with each word out of Lloyd’s mouth. The entire project seemed impossible for him as he was unaware of the Time Freeze skill, which had been in effect for several months. From his perspective, the destruction of the peaks occurred a few days ago. He didn’t trust Lloyd’s words that the metal road had been built through the range and saw it as a ruse to trick him.

“I will ask you one question,” he said, engulfed by doubt and anger. “What do you hope to gain by humiliating me? Are you attempting to make an example of me and send a warning to neighboring countries?”

Lloyd understood where the king was coming from. The Magentano Kingdom was a political powerhouse, and Queen Magentano, who was also a rare sword master, led it very well. There was no civil war in the kingdom, and the land was fertile. Tens of thousands of well-trained elite forces worked directly for her, and Javier Asrahan and the Bone Dragon made them even stronger, which was a nightmare for the countries around it. Just like that, the Magentano enjoyed hegemony like never before, and it owned the capacity to wage wars and wipe out the land as it liked. This was how King Benettogna perceived the Magentano Kingdom.

“I believe this is the reason you see me and my imperial family as nothing more than a pebble on the street. To create a precedent through your carnage and undermine the confidence of the neighboring nations with your heinous accomplishments, eventually establishing an empire. Am I wrong?” His voice faltered, and the world appeared to darken. He went on to believe that there were only two possible outcomes from this situation: Either resist and perish here or submit and become a puppet king. He was not even certain that he would have a choice.

The moment the Bone Dragon landed here, the answer was set.

King Benettogna exhaled a deep sigh. And he resolved to himself. If this pawn of the Magentano bared its teeth and relayed a threat from him to its master...

I shall have to save my soldiers and people, even at the risk of my own life.

That was his duty, he thought, the duty that would make his predecessors proud.

“Hmm, um. I did expect you to act this way... But I guess my words do not really hold value to you at this moment, no?” Lloyd chuckled in embarrassment as the king solidified his misunderstood resolution.

The king’s brows lifted again.

“I am truly sorry,” Lloyd continued, “It was my mistake to think you would easily trust me. It would have been better to show you from the start, as seeing is believing.”

“What are you-”

Before being given any chance to finish his sentence, Lloyd instantly reached out for the former’s hand. Grab!

“Shh. Excuse me for a second.”

A small amount of mana then entered the king, dominating his entire body like invasive troops. His throat tightened to the point where no sound came out of it, and he became greatly dismayed. However, just as he was about to ask the supreme commander for assistance through bodily gestures, Lloyd yelled aloud, “Okay, rightful lord of this land, as per your request, I shall show you the train built in the Pantara Range!”

Lloyd then yanked the king’s arm after he finished, and the movement was so natural that it appeared as if the king was being led to hop on the Bone Dragon’s hands.

“Okay, Draggy!” called Lloyd. “Time to show the king the rift train!”

Fwish! Draggy leaped into the air, clutching Lloyd, Javier, and King Benettogna in his hands, causing the supreme commander and guard commander waiting for their king's cue to hiccup in surprise.

They began hiccupping as they gazed at the distant sky, their king fading away, and this was the first time in history that their king had been abducted.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 356: About After-Sales Service (1)

Fwoosh! King Benettogna clenched his fists to keep from wetting himself in fear as the Bone Dragon's enormous torso soared into the sky.

“Eek..!”

His only intention was to save his kingdom from the brink of disaster and have a discussion with the madman who invaded his land with the Bone Dragon. It never crossed the king’s mind that he would glide through the air on the Bone Dragon’s hand.

Ha! Eek! Ack!

Fwoosh! Whoosh! Fwang! Swoosh! As Draggy fanned his wings and sped forward, the headwind slapped against the king’s face and the rest of his body. His shoulder shrank in fear. He desperately prayed not to fall on the ground, braced his shaky legs, and struggled to uphold his remaining pride and authority as a king.

“Wh-What! What! Eek! What are you doing?!”

The monarch yelled at the top of his lungs, hoping his voice wasn’t shaking. He did not duck down or lower his body, proceeding to stand up tall with pride instead. Even at the risk of his own life, he was determined to appear strong. It was Lloyd who was taken aback by this sight.

“Ugh! Come on!” Lloyd reached out and grasped the king's shoulders, preventing him from freefalling out of the sky. “Please forgive me for kidnapping you in this manner! But there seemed to be no other way to convince you!”

“Convince me?”

“I mean the construction of the rift railroad in the Pantara Range! If you can’t believe me, I will show you!”

“Show me? Are you still stuck on that nonsense?”

“I’m trying to prove that I’m not talking nonsense! So, please! Duck down for a bit!”

“Eek!”

Lloyd’s tight hold crushed his shoulder, causing him to lower his posture The king became furious, and his beard trembled in irritation. He was about to shout at Lloyd, but it was the latter who spoke first.

“Um, do you see that over there?” Lloyd said as he pointed somewhere.

“…What?” The king missed his chance to go on a rage.

Lloyd took advantage of his confusion by quickly pointing in one direction and tempting him to turn around, “You will understand all my actions if you look over there.”

“What now?” the king observed, half-dazed and half-doubtful. His eyes followed Lloyd’s fingers until they were looking down on the Pantara Range. He let out a gasp without realizing it. The peaks and rifts that used to exist below them had been neatly trimmed down and tidied. Of course, the land was still full of steep slopes in any case. But… “Huh? What is that?”

There were zigzag lines along the mountain slopes. Upon a closer look, it appears that the lines weren’t merely markings on the ground. They were elevated roads with two metal bars running directly parallel to each other. Not only that, a large and long coach that he had never seen before was clunking its way uphill on one part of it, following the two metal bars.

“This is the railroad and train I mentioned before,” Lloyd clarified as the sides of his mouth turned upward. As expected, it was the right move to run the test mule, so it would come at the perfect time. Thinking that to himself, he glanced at the king and continued speaking, “The idea is simple. It’s to place two metal tracks at an equal distance from each other and make a train with precisely sized wheels run along them.”

“But what about the slope-”

“Well, the project utilized various techniques. But they are a trade secret, so I can’t tell you more.”

The king became gravely silent.

Meanwhile, Lloyd’s voice became more serious. “First, please forgive me for behaving in such an impertinent manner to you, the rightful ruler of the Benetto Kingdom. I only caused such trouble for fear that our conversation would draw out and the atmosphere would turn hostile. Regardless of my intentions, the reckless way I brought you here deserves reproach without a single doubt.”

“...”

“I thought it would be best to let you confirm my words with your own two eyes, even if it meant taking slightly offensive measures. It was the most effective way to avoid damaging our relationship with unnecessary misunderstandings and the resulting disputes.”

“...”

“I know this is just another excuse, but please forgive my rudeness with your boundless mercy,” Lloyd said, his voice somber and sincere.

Of course, that doesn’t change the fact that I abducted the king. I myself wondered if I went a little overboard this time.

Lloyd had hesitated. However, he ultimately chose to proceed with the method as it was obvious he would waste far too much time and energy otherwise.

For them, Draggy was demolishing the peaks just a few days ago because of the different perceptions of time caused by my skill. They obviously wouldn’t believe that I’ve built a railroad across the range.

He would have had to invest an enormous amount of effort to persuade them of the entire affair. Given how tense Draggy had made them, it seemed doubtful that anything positive would come of it. This was why Lloyd decided to just show the king. You have to see it to believe it, right?

And now, it's my turn to appease him. I was honestly a little rude.

All the blood drained from his face, the king was still as pale as a sheet. Feeling guilty for shocking him with a kidnapping, Lloyd removed his winter clothes and carefully placed them over the king's shoulders. Instead of saying anything, he remained silent and waited for the king to respond.

King Benettogna's full, white beard twitched in surprise. He didn't expect Lloyd to apologize.

Did he just apologize to me?

It was rather out of the ordinary. He had assumed that, having been captured helplessly, he would be killed in his defenseless state. Instead, he was given an earnest apology from his captor, who had the most genuine and kind look in his eyes. At the same time, he was showing him there was a railroad that crossed the Pantara Range as evidence for why he was left with no other choice.

Does that mean this fellow was telling the truth?

Of course, it could be a trick to make him lower his guard. No, that was more than likely the case. But the monarch shook his head in the end after much thought.

No. There's no need for him to use such a trick when he has the upper hand. Right now, I am nothing but a weak, old man that has been kidnapped by them. They could easily harm me if they wanted to.

Yet, Lloyd Frontera did not harm, threaten, or intimidate him in any way. He calmly showed him proof of the claim he made earlier. And now, he was politely and cautiously asking for his forgiveness with a sincere apology.

If he wanted to take my life, he wouldn't have to apologize. He could just finish me off right here. The same is true for my kingdom.

If that man’s goal had been to destroy the Benetto Kingdom, he wouldn’t need such an elaborate plan. Lloyd could simply take his life, charge into the capital, and make the Bone Dragone lead a destructive and bloody massacre. Without the king’s leadership, the kingdom’s defensive forces would have been rendered useless.

But he isn’t doing that.

At this point, King Benettogna finally lowered his suspicion to a certain extent but was still displeased about being kidnapped. With a gaze reflecting his remaining doubts, he sourly threw a question at Lloyd, “What a terrible character you possess. Let me ask you a question then. Lloyd Frontera, is this how you always are?”

“Oh, no, it is not.”

“Then?”

“I am slightly more terrible and vicious than this on average.”

“...”

“Ah, I’m sorry. That wasn’t a threat. I didn’t mean it to sound that way. Sincerely.”

That just now did sound like a threat, thought King Benettogna as he licked his bitter lips. And then he realized...

I’ve been on the losing side of this negotiation from the very start.

In any case, Lloyd had a huge advantage in this negotiation and was backed by the hegemony of the Magentano Kingdom. So the king knew he should be grateful that he wasn’t harmed and his kingdom wasn’t invaded. However, he felt like he was receiving a notice from the Magentano Kingdom rather than engaging in a negotiation with them.

“Then, let me hear it.” The king responded, his expression betraying his attempt to conceal his sorrow. The situation was a little humiliating, but he had no other choice.

“The will of my queen?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes. That seems to be the place for that.”

“Thank you for your generosity.”

“I should be the one to express gratitude. That is, to the House of Magentano for choosing not to invade us.” The king joked with a smile, though the words he said seemed sincere.

Lloyd spoke more courteously and said, “I understand. I will then convey the message from Her Majesty. Queen Alicia Termina Magentano desires to directly engage in trade and commerce with your kingdom.”

“Trade? Commerce?”

“Yes,” Lloyd said, “As you should know, the Magentano Kingdom has always wanted to pave a path toward the southwest region. However, we couldn’t seem to overcome the tough natural barrier formed by the mountains, and our attempts were thwarted.”

“Yes. The Pantara Range.”

Lloyd agreed, saying, “In light of this, my queen has specifically ordered me to build a trade route that enables safe passage over the Pantara Range.”

“Can’t it possibly be a route for invasion?”

“Sire, the fate of the railroad down there is in your hands. Whether it is for trade or invasion is entirely up to you,” explained Lloyd calmly.

“Are you implying that you just fulfilled your responsibility to open a path and that politics will determine how it’s used? That is irresponsible.”

“I’m sorry. But that’s the truth.”

“Yes, that is true. I will not deny it.”

“Thank you for your understanding.”

“Do not be.” King Benettogna clicked his tongue. The more this conversation dragged on, the more despicable and desirable he found Lloyd Frontera. From his subtle way of dodging responsibility to his brazen yet calm attitude, the king noticed it all. He was annoyed that Lloyd was his opponent on the negotiation table and wondered what it would have been like if he had him under his command.

I am envious. I never expected that a day would come when I would grow jealous of that greedy and ferocious woman, Alicia.

Lloyd, who was not hesitant to cross any lines to gain an advantage and use it to steer a negotiation, made the king jealous of her. His tactic put them both in a position where they had to play the game that he had set up. At the same time, he was also astute enough to play it safe and avoid harming his opponent as much as possible.

“You are not trying to push the political responsibility to an old man like me with your sweet talk, are you?” the king asked, sounding Lloyd out and subtly demanding to know what he would gain by agreeing to the deal. Sure, he wasn’t in a position to make demands. However, he still had to test the man’s sincerity in the latter’s suggestion for partnership. His wrinkled eyes shined with curiosity and anticipation as he waited to see if Lloyd would respond to his prodding.

Lloyd grinned broadly as if he had come prepared to provide the monarch with exactly what he was looking for. “Of course.”

“Of course?”

“Yes,” Lloyd answered as if he were a salesman skillfully satisfying every need of his customer. “After-sales service is a necessary step after a successful transaction.” This was the golden rule of business, as it allowed companies to extract the maximum amount of value from their clients. Lloyd then flashed a radiant smile filled with kindness, generosity, and his dreams of exploitation.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 357: About After-Sales Service (2)

In Korea, the service provided after a sale was known as “A/S Service.” It extended beyond the sale of automobiles, refrigerators, TVs, etc., and included financing, insurance, cafés, and neighborhood establishments. In short, it included almost all transactions.

The goal of sales is to satisfy consumers and do all in its power to entice them to purchase products. So, the purpose of after-sales service is to ensure that customers will not make purchases from competitors.

The after-sales service was the bait to keep consumers loyal to the firm. It was meant to trap them in and suck them dry. That was the basis of after-sales service. The two went together like salt and light, alpha and omega, or pasta and marinara.

That is why it’s popular for even local cafés to offer discounts like a coupon for a free drink after purchasing ten drinks or restaurants to provide complimentary candy and coffee after a meal. In a nutshell, this is also a similar kind of after-sales service.

Lloyd thought that to himself and turned to see King Benettogna’s somewhat balded forehead. He was enjoying the excitement of the ride. The king’s white beard danced in the wind, and his eyes gleamed even more brightly than his glossy, bald forehead. The king no longer trembled in worry or dread.

Well. It looks like he’s happy with the first part of my service.

They had resolved their misunderstanding over the railroad earlier, and the king’s animosity had lessened now in response to Lloyd’s sincere apologies. So Lloyd was offering this ride to him as a service.

I still have a lot to exploit out of him. It’d be a waste to stop here after clarifying a few misunderstandings and dispelling his hostility toward me.

Since they were now on good terms, Lloyd wanted to take things one step further and gain the king's favor, which is why he was offering the "Draggy Ride" service to him. Lloyd stood to lose nothing from the arrangement since he needed to bring the king back to the kingdom in any case. However, he presented the service as a gesture of sincere kindness and made sure the king thought it was something special. That was the truth behind Lloyd's service to the king. But he didn't stop there.

"Your Majesty, are you enjoying the flight experience?"

"Hahaha. It's nice, very nice. I never expected I would get this sort of experience in my final leg of life. This is my first time getting a full view of my land and people like this."

"Then, may I ask for a favor?"

"A favor?"

"It is nothing major, but I was wondering if you could directly tell your people about the trade route in the range once we return to the capital."

"Hahaha. Are you sure about it?" asked the king with a smile, which seemed to say, "You cheeky bastard."

"As you are the legitimate ruler of the Benetto Kingdom," Lloyd shrugged as though there was no other choice. "The trade route in the range will be a turning point of the future of your kingdom. It's not appropriate for an outsider like me to make such an important announcement. It is only right for you, the kingdom's legitimate ruler, to do the job."

"I see. Do you mind if I also relay the message from your queen to my people?" asked the king.

"It would be an honor." Lloyd grinned.

King Benettogna cast a meaningful gaze at Lloyd. "You are quite a cunning person."

"I will not deny that, sire."

“Truly, I appreciate your frankness with me. I also noticed you are making an effort to uphold my dignity as a king and hold me to my word. Am I right?”

“You saw right through me.”

“Yes, but I understand why you are doing this. Nothing is free in this world.”

“Regardless, you will be satisfied in the end. I am sure,” said Lloyd.

“I wish I will.” A similar wry smile appeared on both of their faces.

Lloyd clicked his tongue inwardly. Haah. The monarch here is also astute. Thinking the man was truly fit to be a king, Lloyd stole a quick glance at him.

I planned to give the king a grand entrance to the kingdom on top of Draggy and make his presence appear more powerful. Then he would be persuaded to immediately declare the opening of the Pantara Range’s trade route and the start of a partnership with the House of Magentano. That would have allowed me to service him by strengthening his dignity as the king while holding him accountable for his words. He saw through my plans.

King Benettogna’s statements to his people were bound to carry a lot of weight, forcing him to make decisions that were steadfast to his promises. If he didn’t...

His words would lose credibility, trust, and power, which could mean he loses political impact on the global stage.

After that, he would be bound by his own words and obligated to continue working with the Magentano Kingdom as a trade partner.

Well, this kind of relationship will be beneficial for both of us.

This was undoubtedly not a loss for the Benetto Kingdom. When they got close to the capital, Lloyd securely gripped the king’s shoulder and said,

“We will descend now. Please be careful of the wind.”

Whoosh! Whoosh! Draggy went into descent mode and began fluttering his wings with a loud stirring noise. As his massive body slowed and made its way downward, the view of the capital began to change from the size of a ping-pong ball, a watermelon, a road intersection, to a baseball field. At last, Draggy landed on the plaza like how Bill Gates sings in Karaoke. Micro-softly.

Boom! The tremendous roar echoed across the square, and the vases crushed at the very first landing pulverized to dust. But Lloyd did not care in the slightest for the blood, sweat, and tears that someone put into them.

“Okay. It’s time for you to speak.”

“I see,” said the king.

Lloyd helped the king stand up on Draggy’s palm and took a step back. At the same time, he gestured to Draggy. “Lift him up.”

Clack! Understanding the message, Draggy smoothly raised his hand, making it into a podium at the center of the plaza. King Benetto stood in the middle of the dragon’s palm. There was more to Lloyd’s service.

“Hey, it’s your turn now.” Lloyd gestured to Javier, who immediately understood and took a step forward before placing his hand on the king’s shoulder.

Seeing the king flinch, Javier reassured him, “If you speak, I will amplify your voice, Your Majesty.”

“Is that doable?”

“Yes, to some degree.”

It was a simple process, made easier by the Asrahan Core Technique. Nodding, Javier injected a tiny quantity of mana into the king’s body, wrapping it around his voice chord.

“Ehem.”

Ehem...! Ehem! Ehem!

The sound of him innocently clearing his throat echoed across the surroundings of the square. Even the king was surprised by the magnified sound of his cough.

“It is all right. Please continue.”

Gaining comfort and confidence from Javier’s words, the king’s eyes became calmer as he ran them across the plaza.

Everyone, even the people frightened by the re-emergence of the Bone Dragon and the troops that raced to rescue the king, gazed at the king with unease.

The king spoke as if he was comforting them. “As you can see right now, I am safe, and the Bone Dragon respects me. I assure you. You have nothing to worry about.”

About..! About.. About...

His words echoed as he calmly continued his speech. The Bone Dragon had not come here to invade them. The Magentano Kingdom was a strong ally of theirs. He also shared how the Pantara Range trade route was built in secret before anyone took notice. All information about the project was kept confidential and restricted to him and the queen of Magentano as they were both concerned about interference from outside kingdoms if there was a leak. His speech was a mix of lies and truths.

“Therefore, from this day onward, the House of Benetto and the House of Magentano will become trade partners. I do not doubt that our partnership will bring greater prosperity to both houses.”

Houses! Houses... Houses...

As soon as the people understood what King Benettogna’s self-assured declaration meant, they let out an explosive shout of admiration and went down on their knees, expressing their subordination, respect, and gratitude to their ruler proudly standing on top of the domineering Bone Dragon. The sight also caused the king's own heart to pound.

Whew.

Never in his wildest dreams did he imagine that his day would be so versatile and that he would get the opportunity to deliver a speech on Bone Dragon's hand.

I am becoming more and more jealous of the Bone Dragon. During my 19-year rule, I never once got them to obey me like this.

One Bone Dragon seemed to be more effective than a massive military display involving thousands of troops, and he was pleased with the responses of his people, as did Lloyd.

Hmm... Perfect. Just perfect.

Lloyd examined the crowd, pleased that he got his desired outcome from lending the Bone Dragon to King Benettogna.

And now, I'll squeeze him dry with the power of customer satisfaction.

Now that the king was content with Lloyd's service and bound by his own words, Lloyd wasted no time seizing this chance. He switched places with Javier and smiled like he was the salesman of the year.

Lloyd spoke in a voice dripping with integrity, honesty, and admiration, "That was excellent, sire. Your speech touched me."

The king cleared his throat. "Ehem! Hmm! Did it?"

"Yes, look at how my hands are shivering."

"Hahaha. All I did was walk on the carpet you set down."

"No, it takes real skill to make use of the carpet that's been set down."

“Hmm... I smell flattery.”

“Was I too obvious?”

“You were. I imagine you have a favor to ask?” asked King Benettogna.

“Was I that obvious, Your Majesty?”

“Do not beat around the bush. I am in the palm of your hands in any case,” the king said bitterly, knowing full well of his position. That trade route in the range could be turned into an enemy invasion route, so the decisionmaker here was the House of Magentano, particularly Lloyd Frontera, its messenger. “We should be thankful to you and the House of Magentano because you first offered your hand in friendship. I am not naive. I know that your kindness does not come for free. So, please tell me how much I owe you for today.”

The king knew. There were no free lunches in this world.

Thinking the same, Lloyd replied, “Since you ask, sire, I will give you an answer.”

Fwip!

Lloyd drew a couple of pieces of paper from his jacket. These were the contracts he had written before coming here. “The details of my requests are listed here. Please take a look,” he said.

King Benettogna was too astonished to respond, realizing what those documents were at first sight. Thanks to that, he also realized Lloyd had come with the determination to suck him dry.

Tsk.

King Benettogna opened the contracts, feeling like a honeybee trapped in a spider’s web. He was both outraged and relieved a few seconds later.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 358: TAbout After-sales Service (3)

This is... Tsk.

When King Benettogna read the pact, he impulsively clicked his tongue, and two opposing feelings surged through his heart.

Haah. What should I make of this?

“I read the contract you gave me,” he said, his gaze sharpening as he alternated between feeling comforted and wanting to curse Lloyd out.

“Thank you.”

“In summary, the Frontera Family will receive 5% of the total trade value of the commerce facilitated by the Pantara Range as a maintenance fee.”

“That is on point, sire.” Lloyd grinned.

The king’s brows crumpled. “But maintenance fee? To me, it looks like an exploitative customs tax.”

“I have nothing to say if you feel it that way. As you know, it’s just a name for the expense.”

“Are you admitting that the fee is partly a customs tax?”

“I hope you will also acknowledge that, given its location on such rough terrain, maintaining the trade route will be extremely expensive,” defended Lloyd.

“Hmm.”

“Indeed,” Lloyd confirmed. “The constant blizzards will cover the railroad in snow and freeze it. There's also the water and icicles that will come down the slope and damage the roadbed. is more, the timber and gravel on the road will need to be cared for daily. That means the labor required for the maintenance process will create an additional expense on top of the materials needed for it.”

“There is more...?”

“Of course. I built a small station at the peak as a resting area for people and shipments crossing the range. It also has a residence for the workers who will be maintaining the railroad. That facility will create more cost since it needs to be regularly serviced as well and have food, clothing, and other resources for the workers.”

“Do you mean that you will have me to pay for all of this?”

“Since I built the railroad after much toil, I would appreciate it if you considered it a fee for using the train; additionally, 5% of the total value of overall goods is comparatively nothing,” reminded Lloyd sharply.

“...”

“Am I wrong?”

“Tsk,” the king clucked his tongue. Everything Lloyd said was correct. This trade route would eventually allow him to trade directly with the Magentano Kingdom, an emerging superpower in the international order. The shipments that used to circle the range would now take this trade route instead. Moreover, that would be true for others outside the Benetto Kingdom.

There will be shipments from neighboring nations that travel through my territory before reaching the trade route on the range. I would be able to collect a considerable amount of customs tax from this.

The economic value of the trade route would be significantly larger than the tax itself. Therefore, 5% was a drop in the bucket compared to the total profit he would gain.

“How do you plan on receiving the fee?” asked King Benettogna.

“Oh, that should be written down below.”

“Hmm.”

“Over there. Slightly lower. Yes, that’s it.”

“The maintenance fee will be converted into gold coins... To be later collected every quarter?”

“Yes. It’ll be an easy task for the Bone Dragon to move around a few chests of the gold coin.”

King Benettogna made a face that said, “You came prepared.”

Lloyd nodded in understanding.

Of course. Of course, I came prepared.

It was truly an obvious statement. Considering the scale of the project, Lloyd wanted to get everything he could from it on top of the Tears of Summer.

Plus, it indeed costs money to maintain the tracks.

Lloyd planned to leave dozens of orc soldiers and a few elves, but when he estimated the costs of their food, living, and facility management materials, his heart sank.

All of it was my precious money!

Lloyd believed it would be unfair for others to benefit from the trade route that he used his own money to safely maintain and operate. So he spent the past few days calculating the cost of maintenance and how much he would need to be paid to make a good profit.

The answer was five percent. That covered the maintenance enough, and the remaining money would be used for my fiefdom.

That remaining money would serve as Lloyd’s lifetime pension and grow his nest egg.

I mean, I've got lots of money, thanks to the Dragon King Sponsorship. But you never know.

You never knew when or how your source of income would be cut. That was just the way of life. It was not uncommon for trusted banks to go bankrupt on a random day. Nothing was 100% reliable, including his sponsorship from the dragon king.

That sleepyhead dragon is surprisingly moody.

The way Lloyd saw it, Dragon King Verkis liked to act on a whim. He was a sluggard with a villainous temperament.

There's a chance that I may accidentally get on his bad side one day. I must have insurance in place.

Yes, the Dragon King's sponsorship was enormously significant, but it was unreliable money, and the rest of the various sources of income had their drawbacks.

Similarly, the queen can withdraw her support to our fiefdom at any time if I lose her favor. The other revenue I get from the Lacona Viscounty's tax and water bill is quite small.

As a result, any extra source of revenue, such as money from the Benetto Kingdom, would grow his nest egg even more.

It's perfect. Stable and abundant.

He had carefully calculated and planned for today. There was only one purpose for the kidnapping of the king and the services given to appease him afterward: to get this contract in front of the monarch.

Life is long, and money is always needed.

Repeating that motto in his head, Lloyd pointed to the bottom of the contract.

“As such, starting next quarter, all you need is to pay the amount in the contract for the next 50 years.”

“50 years...?” King Benettogna uttered in a daze.

“Yes, but the period is very short,” Lloyd responded as if it was obvious. “The trade route will last for over 500 years unless war or another natural disaster destroys it. That is how long you will continue to reap the benefits that come from it. Paying a fee for a mere 50 years is truly nothing compared to what you will get in return.”

“But if a war or natural disaster does-”

“I got that covered, too. Yes, there. Do you see it?”

King Benettogna sealed his lips. It was really there.

If a war, natural disaster... or another similar event causes the trade route to close... The maintenance fee will be temporarily suspended... Haah.

King Benettogna gave Lloyd a serious look. By this point, his dislike for the young man had vanished and been replaced by admiration for his detailed preparation.

A duration of 50 years is quite appropriate. It’s a long period but not excessively so. And given this boy’s age... Yes, he’s saying he wants to get his fair share from my kingdom just while he’s alive.

Even though Lloyd made his intentions blatantly clear, he didn’t cross any lines. He shrugged when the king stared at him intently.

I’m not sure whether to call him bold or brazen. He does what he needs to do.

Dumbstruck, a snort escaped him. The king nodded. “I see. I understand you.”

“That means...”

“I agree to your terms.”

“Thank you so much!” With that, Lloyd bowed 90 degrees and later brought out a pen and ink bottle at lightning speed.

“Haha... Now? You want me to sign the papers right now?”

“Yes, the rightful owner of Benetto Kingdom.”

“But the contract needs the king’s seal for my signature to have any effect. Why don’t we make our way to the palace?”

“Yes, I am overwhelmed with gratitude, but...” mumbled Lloyd hesitantly.

“But?”

“Being a coward, I am scared you will have a change of heart on our way to the palace.”

“Huh…?”

“How about signing the contract now and sealing it with your stamp later?”

“Tsk. You look like you are going to kidnap me again if I do not give my signature.”

“Please forgive me.”

“Ha... How brazen. You do not even deny my words.”

“Please forgive me for that, too, sire.”

“I see... Then give that to me.” He then seized the pen without hesitation and scrawled his name on the contract while looking at Lloyd. “There is something I am curious about now that I signed the contract.”

“Yes, sire.”

“Earlier, you said I would be asked to pay a maintenance fee starting next quarter. Why is that? Why not this quarter?”

“Oh, it’s a complimentary benefit.”

Once again, the king was at a loss of words. Just like that, they entered the palace and signed and put the king’s seal on the contracts. At last, Lloyd had secured his desired deal.

Great. Just perfect. I’m set for life!

Several strong emotions began to boil up in his heart. Although he still needed to stop the restoration of destiny, once that job was done, he would be set for life.

“Lloyd Frontera,” called the king. Lloyd noticed something off about that voice. “I have a question I would like to ask you.”

“Oh, yes. What is it?”

“Is there a lady you’ve promised to build a future with?”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut. He instantly understood where this was going.

Oh, it’s been a while. Father-in-law attack.

Suppressing his wry smile, Lloyd said, “Please forgive me.”

“Hmm?”

“Could you be asking... because you have a daughter of marriageable age?”

“Haha? Did you read my mind?”

“No, but I had a guess.” That wry smile could no longer be suppressed. It rose upward. And his prediction turned out to be true. The king was entertaining the possibility of an arranged marriage for his daughter with

Lloyd. The reason for it was simple. Lloyd was spitefully cunning, and he expected him to become his kingdom's most reliable ally.

I am an excellent judge of character. This man is something. He may be sly and selfish to others. But he cares an awful lot for his own people.

The king was certain about this after seeing the construction site of the railroad earlier.

The work site was thoroughly equipped with safety measures, and the workers' quarters were considerable and robust, reflecting his treatment of his men. Furthermore, if a wedding took place, my son-in-law would be the Magentano House's meritorious retainer. That would be an incredible benefit.

He had multiple daughters and sending one of them to marry Lloyd would benefit her future and his kingdom. However, there was something the king overlooked in Lloyd: the latter possessed marriage ideals of the 21st century.

Ha. Marry someone without knowing what the person looks like? And with this fancy house? I'd be a madman if I took the deal. I would live the rest of my life in misery and exhaustion. I'm not enough of a madman to want that.

No matter what, he wanted to have a love marriage and lead a cozy life with someone who was not exceedingly high in status. He would be shackling himself if he married a princess of a royal family.

"Once again, please forgive me."

"Hmm... I don't believe this will be a disadvantageous move for you," ventured King Benettogna.

"The only thing I can offer is an apology. My apologies." With his considerable amount of expertise, Lloyd knew just what to say at a time like this. "Thank you, Your Majesty. Thank you for the contract. I shall relay the message to the queen how you happily accepted." This was the perfect time for a flat denial. Making up excuses would only backfire.

“Yes, please do. And do seriously think about the marriage proposal when you have the time.”

“I do not think it will happen for a long time.” With that, Lloyd dashed out of the palace and jumped on Draggy's back, fearing the monarch would stop him and ask the question again.

“Let’s go!”

Clang! Draggy soared into the air, smashing the remaining vases in the plaza as he took off, and messages appeared in front of his eyes announcing the birth of a new title.

Ding dong.

[You have successfully completed a large international project by gathering various groups of races together, threatening and fooling a number of elementals, and appeasing the king of a foreign land.]

[To this, the different races of creatures who joined the construction, the elementals who were duped, the outsiders who were used, and the demons who observed the entire scenario would all concur with your new title.]

[A new title, “Hell’s Top Talent,” has been created.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 359: Preparations to Meet the Queen (1)

[A new title, “Hell’s Top Talent,” has been created.]

Lloyd grinned as he was about to leave the Benetto Kingdom when a message appeared in front of his eyes.

Haha.

As expected, titles tended to appear at a later time, until the impacts of a project could clearly be seen in society. They rarely appeared right after construction was completed.

I suppose this is natural because civil engineering values pragmatism. A construction should result in something that is not just pretty and grand but useful to society at the end of the day.

Lloyd believed that the Pantara Railway would have a significant impact on international trade, similar to how the Suez and Panama Canal transformed the world of cargo transportation. He carefully scanned the messages.

[Hell’s Top Talent]

[Title Level: Hero’s Legacy]

Okay, it’s time to study the railway of the past. Open your History of Modern Civil Engineering Book to page 359. Yes. That’s the famous Pantara Railway, which I’m sure every one of you knows. Student in the front row. Could you briefly walk us through how this railroad came to be? Excellent. That’s correct. The Pantara Railway, just like what the student said, is a masterpiece built by Lloyd Frontera, who received an order from the Magentano House. Hahaha. Are you all bored? It’s Lloyd Frontera again. Look at this section, and you’ll find Lloyd Frontera. Move on to the next part, and you still find him. I, too, am sick of him. Had it not been for him, we would only have one-eighth of what we will study this summer. But what else can we do? That son of a gun set the groundwork for the civil engineering of our empire. So, it would be unfair if we were the only ones to suffer, no? Let’s hit the books. Come now. Let’s study harder, create new theories, and make it harder for the students who’ll come after you all. All right, so the Pantara Railroad introduced the switchback system for the first time in the world...

[Compliment Effect: You used every means possible to finish the railroad in the Pantara Range. In this process, you tricked countless people who shuddered in shock and repulsion. The demons watching over you could not give you enough paise. As a result, countless residents of Hell and the undead have come to respect and admire you even more strongly.]

[Precaution: The affections of the demons may come at the expense of Hell’s King’s overwhelming desire to recruit you.]

[Title Region: All The Regions of the Human World and Hell]

[Active Period of Title: 1200 Years (Human world) / 750,000 Years (Hell)]

[A title’s powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, the time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 8]

[Current CP: 1,648]

Lloyd’s brows wiggled after finishing reading. It was all good and impressive.

But it feels like there’s a trap here.

Lloyd’s eyes focused on the word “Caution”.

Hell’s King’s overwhelming desire to recruit me?

Did that mean the Hell’s King would hire him after he died? Does it mean he would have to work his butt off even after death instead of resting? Something did not sit right with him.

I don’t like the idea of that.

Lloyd despised he thought of working in Hell with every fiber of his being. He was already tirelessly working every day and peace was something he couldn’t even dream about. He refused to still work after death.

Tsk. I need to look into this later.

It could backfire on him if he pushed this aside as nothing. However, there was other work he needed to take care of right now.

I need to finish the railroad construction here, return to the palace for the Tears of Summer, treat the side effect of absorbing the Heart of Winter, and then finally resolve the restoration of destiny.

He felt like a college student with a pile of assignments that couldn’t be pushed aside.

Tsk.

Feeling a surge of bitterness, Lloyd went back to the construction site for the railroad.

***

The railroad construction was finished without much problem. It was all thanks to the operation and maintenance procedures that Lloud thought of in advance.

“The train will run twice a day, morning and afternoon. But if there’s an overwhelming amount of cargo, that can be extended to a maximum of four. Don’t forget,” reminded Lloyd.

“There are dozens of cars attached to the long train. I wonder how it could get overwhelmed,” pointed out Javier.

Lloyd assured him that it would. “This railroad will carry goods from nearly everywhere across the southwest, beginning with the Benetto Kingdom and neighboring nations. Magentano Kingdom will also be sending many freights to the southwest. Why? That would save months of travel time by avoiding a round trip. Think about all the risk factors, like encounters with mountain robbers and monsters, that would be eliminated. Even if they have to wait a month to be allocated, everyone will still hurry to utilize the facility. A month of waiting and paying a storage fee would be more cost-effective than months of circling the range."

To begin with, Lloyd planned for the train to make up to six roundtrips every day. That way there wouldn't be too many shipment delays.

"And that's why it wasn't for nothing when I built large-scale warehouses on both ends of the train platform. One here in the Magentano and the other in the Benetto Kingdom."

"You foresaw that the orders and items would be piled up."

"Yeah, and that is why I built the makeshift station at the rift's summit," Lloyd explained. The said station was built when the upward tracks were completed and the downward tracks were ready for construction. "Because you never know when emergencies might occur, and people who maintain the railway should have a place to live."

"You are right."

Sure, the construction was important, but so was its maintenance. With that in mind, Lloyd stated, "About 30 orcs and ten elves will be stationed there. They will check the railroad every day and be trained to make immediate repairs when necessary. I will also place elementals with them."

Lloyd chuckled as he spoke. He had not expected to get support from the elementals on the first leg of this project. But now, thanks to them, the number of laborers that would need to reside here could be significantly reduced since their lack of physical presence allowed them to travel around the track freely.

"That sounds like labor exploitation..." remarked Javier, finding Lloyd unbelievable.

Lloyd shrugged. “Not necessarily. There are countless low-level elementals.”

“Countless?”

“I asked the high-level elementals for a number, and they said it is about 60,000. I was told they’re going to be fine as long as they properly distribute the work amongst themselves.”

“Without pay…?”

“Free, my foot.” Lloyd chuckled. “You know I don’t believe anything’s free in the world. I hate putting people to work without compensating them as much as I hate doing things for free. Their labor will be compensated.”

“What kind of compensation?”

“I’ll make sure that no human will enter the entire range except the railroad zones. I’ll ask the queen to formalize it into a law. And besides, this place rarely has any human traffic in the first place.”

That was the deal Lloyd made with the high-level elementals. But Javier slightly frowned upon hearing it.

“It appears that your negotiation skill is becoming more evil day by day.”

“Eh? Why?”

“These mountains had no human traffic to begin with. Yet, you destroyed a part of the elementals’ home only to declare that you would protect it. I am not sure if you are shameless or sly.”

“Well,” said Lloyd. “I won’t deny it. Let’s say that I’m both.”

“I would not find you so spiteful if you didn’t admit it at the very least.”

“Consider it karma.”

Lloyd ultimately grinned. It was not in his plans to become an Elemental King. But now that he was, he wanted to make the most of it and believed that protecting the remaining untouched nature was the best he could do for them.

“Everyone’s happy. The elementals are happy with the deal, and I’m happy to have a larger workforce for the railroad’s maintenance.”

Just like that, he stayed a few more days at the site, looking over the operation of the railway and maintenance system one more time, supervising the quality of travel of four trains made up of ten cars, and providing basic education to the residential repairers.

“Are we clear? A few days later, there will be more help arriving from the Imperial House of Magentano,” promised Lloyd.

“You can leave it to us, oink!” the orcs replied.

“Tell them to bring lots of meat,” said the elves with a smile.

Then, it became time to say farewell and return home. In the reversed order of their arrival, the following groups departed from the site aboard Draggy: the engineers, White Cavalry lancers, elf archers, orcs (minus 350 train propellers and sand men), and Skeleton Corps.

Once everyone was back home safe, Lloyd turned to the capital. “Time to meet the queen!” And as soon as he arrived at Magenta, he made his way to the palace and requested an audience.

“I see, sir. I will inform Her Majesty. Please wait here.”

Lloyd waited just like the Lord Great Chamberlain said. And soon, the latter returned and said, “Her Majesty has agreed to meet you. Please, this way.”

Lloyd followed him down the corridor, and his heart felt an unexpected burst of sense of reward.

Ha... Finally. Just a few steps, and I’m done.

Lloyd’s huge picture, which he had created the instant he confronted the Minister of Angels in the sky, was now about to be realized. With only a few steps remaining, he felt delighted.

And, as promised, I will get my hands on the Tears of Summer. In the meantime, there won’t be a need to return to the capital for a while since I have no favors to ask from the queen. So, I will try to stay as far away from here as possible.

Lloyd didn’t want to get too close to the queen. Sure, she was being generous with her assistance and making things convenient for Lloyd. But he didn’t want to grow too close to her.

Never. Never.

He didn’t want it. Getting closer to the queen was the same as becoming a neighbor with a boss at work.

Sure, a huge wage is nice, but if it means giving up boundaries, that is uncomfortable. Why would I do that? My honeypot is already full, and I have got a strategy to keep it that way. I only need to stop destiny.

Lloyd made a mental note to distance himself from the queen after attaining the Tears of Summer. Just then, he noticed that he was being led to a different path.

What’s going on?

He looked around and was passing through the convoluted staircases and corridors. He was familiar with them but in a bad way.

This leads to the training center...

This wasn’t the way to her office. It was the way to the training hall that sat in the annex. Realizing that something was off at that moment, Lloyd asked, “Excuse me?”

“Yes, Young Lord. Is there something you wish to know?”

“I do. Why are we heading to the training hall?”

“Oh, I was about to tell you what Her Majesty has asked you to prepare.”

“Prepare?” Lloyd asked again, gulping involuntarily.

The Lord Great Chamberlain put on a meaningful smile. “Her Majesty issued a special order to have you come with a solid shovel, sturdy training clothes, and strong resolution.”

What the heck? Am I going to have a sparring session with her? But I just asked her for an audience. Why? Why is she trying to make me her punching bag?

Lloyd felt sick to his stomach after making sense of the situation. When he entered the training hall, he discovered something very unexpected.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 360: Preparations to Meet the Queen (2)

“Ack! Argh!! Hargh...”

Clank! Lloyd wiped his sweaty face with his palm instead of picking up his metal shovel, which fell to the floor.

“Whoa...”

Lloyd felt his legs weaken and let his body fall to the ground. Even then, he was still short of breath. The fact made him feel a sense of resentment as deep and intense as a cup of espresso.

How is she standing there like nothing happened when I’m about to pass out from exhaustion?

Lloyd lifted his resentful gaze and saw the queen proudly standing tall in front of him. She was completely fine. There was no sign of struggle in her breaths and not a single strand of her hair was out of place.

“Are you tired already, Lloyd Frontera?”

“Argh... ‘Already’ is really an unfair word for you to say right now, Your Majesty,” gasped Lloyd.

“Harsh? Why so?”

“It has been... about an hour since I began training with you, Your Majesty. Yet, you say I’m already tired...”

“How is an hour of sparring a big deal?” Queen Magentano cocked her head to the side as if she couldn’t comprehend why Lloyd was uttering the time. “Isn’t this the proper way for a sparring session?”

“...”

“It is typical during a war to clash weapons, run around, then grapple on the ground for at least an hour. So this is obviously how training should be done in order to prepare for one. Do you disagree?”

Lloyd wanted to protest that no one would be able to clash weapons, run, and grapple for an hour in a duel with a swordmaster who was using clubs as her weapon.

Goodness. I only came to report the completion of the Pantara Railroad to her.

Lloyd’s mind flew back to one hour ago as he berated his current situation, wherein he turned into her punching bag. When he arrived at the training hall, he was surprisingly met with Queen Magentano holding two clubs.

It was a scary sight. The smile on her face toward him was especially scary. She was smiling like a girl opening up a gift from her first love. Otherwise, she was gazing at him like he was a punching bag that was shipped via express delivery. The clubs in both of her hands made this seem even more true. And from then?

After that, she didn’t say anything much.

All she did was raise her clubs in an elegant manner and tell Lloyd to loosen his body. There was plenty of time for them to talk. He didn’t want to even think about what came afterward.

Fast forward to now, where I’m being beaten to a pulp.

The two clubs, which turned out to be two metal swords with smoothened edges, were a nightmare for Lloyd. Queen Magentano freely used them as though she was testing a new skill and piece of technology on Lloyd. Sure, the movement of her left sword was a little more awkward than the right, but overall, it was hard to avoid them.

Lloyd, on the other hand, didn't put up much of a fight. He was like a cricket in the face of a storm, and the difference in strength between them could be explained by the number of years they spent as swordmasters. Then, there was the matter of how they attained that level. Lloyd was aided by the Asrahan Core Technique and Supercharge skill, as well as an increase in manaheart volume. Queen Magentano attained her strength through incredible talent and hard work. That produced an unbridgeable divide in their comprehension of bodily motions, mana, and sword functioning, and anticipated responses to each step, and it was this that robbed Lloyd of all energy within an hour.

“Ha... But Your Majesty,” said Lloyd as he wiped his perspiring face again. “May I reveal the purpose of my visit?”

“I know that already.” She chuckled and looked at her meaningfully. “To report the completion of the Pantara Range.”

“Did you know about it?” asked Lloyd, still panting.

“That is obvious.” She chuckled again, massaging her left arm. “It would be impossible for me not to know after your terrible fuss against the Benetto Kingdom.”

“...”

“Well, the report tells me that you did your job without any issues, so I shall not reproach you. I heard of you pulled quite a few tricks. You even succeeded in appeasing that old king.”

“I am filled with gratitude that you understand me so well, Your Majesty.”

“It would be harder for me not to. You can’t possibly think I don’t have eyes and ears outside the capital.”

“Well-”

“They are also in your fiefdom.” Her gaze flashed wonder for a second. “Which told me that you have the skill to manipulate time.”

“...”

“There is nothing to worry about,” Queen Magentano promised, “Because if I was jealous or on guard against you, I would have already hurt you earlier in our training session.”

“W-words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty.”

“Really?”

“...”

“I see. I understand. I understand how you hope I will trust you that you are not after some avaricious goal. I understand.”

As she kept speaking, messages appeared just then.

Ding dong.

[Queen Magentano is putting up her guard due to your overly excellent skills.]

[The title <Magentano Carry> is activated.]

[Queen Magentano still has absolute trust in you. As such, despite her guard, she will not be hostile or hold suspicions against you.]

Her eyes softened as the messages appeared. “As such, I have already taken action that prohibits your people from revealing your powers to the outside world and executes anyone who violates it. Furthermore...” She paused and smiled meaningfully. “If anyone attempts to come between me and you with your time-control power, they, too, shall be executed.”

“W-Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty.” Lloyd hung his head down. He did feel grateful toward her for real this time.

I actually was going to inform her of that.

He expected such a story to be exposed quickly because he had stopped time once when constructing the Jewel of Truth.

I knew that stories of my strange power would eventually reach her anyway.

But it happened earlier than he expected. Lloyd figured that she was more interested in him than he thought.

Whew. So glad that I have the title.

Lloyd exhaled a sigh of relief, knowing that he could have been charged with treason if he had not had the title. She would not have left him alone since, despite her compassion, she was at the pinnacle of power and did not want any subject to threaten that, which was why Lloyd exhaled a sigh of relief.

“But Your Majesty,” said Lloyd as he looked around, “Us talking here...”

“It is all right. If you are worried about the possibility of those who might listen to us due to their swordmaster syndrome, you can rest assured.”

“Then...”

“Yes, I sent everyone away as soon as you requested the audience. There are only weaker guards here now, so our conversation will not reach their ears.”

“I am truly relieved. And as for your promise-”

“The Tears of Summer?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“I knew it. You are always like this.”

“Your Majesty?” asked Lloyd.

“You only ever look for me when you need something.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.” Lloyd looked away.

“Forgive you?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Really?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Look me in the eye and say that again.”

“Please do not kill me, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk. You and your shamelessness.”

“Forgive me once again, Your Majesty.”

“If you are so sorry, then I might break my promise.”

“Your Majesty?” asked Lloyd.

“An idea dawned on me.”

“What is it...?” mumbled Lloyd, who looked worried.

“Since you only come to me when you need something from me, I had a thought about delaying the bestowal of the item for as long as possible. That way you will visit me until I am sick of you.”

“...”

“That is a satisfying thought. What do you think?” asked Queen Magentano.

“Ah, um, that’s-”

“What? Do you think I am sly?”

“...”

“Or are you pondering how you will beg?” asked Queen Magentano sharply.

“Please consider the position I am in, Your Majesty!” Lloyd fell to the ground.

A smile, which was as pure as gold, appeared on her face. “Good. I will do what you so desperately wish.”

Swoosh.

“Now that you have gotten enough rest, it is time for round two.” She then raised her sword with a bright smile.

A look of utter despair came over Lloyd’s face.

***

Lloyd remained bedridden for a few more days due to the rigorous training session. This time, too, he experienced serious muscle pain, but his perseverance had not been in vain.

Fortunately, Queen Magentano kept her word. She turned public sentiment in the country in her favor by making a domestic and international declaration about the completion of the trade route across the Pantara Range and commending Lloyd's work. No noble in the realm dared to oppose her. Everyone just followed the queen since they had agreed to the deal at the previous hearing presided over by the House of Peers. Those in support of bestowing the divine item to Lloyd rejoiced while the opposing side accepted their defeat. Everything went swimmingly.

A few days later, a bestowal ceremony was held, which could not have been more extravagant. Every noble in the kingdom came, including prominent figures from the provinces. The ceremony was grander than most small palatial events, and its size made Lloyd nervous. However, he was not nervous because he would see prominent figures attending the event, be bestowed a divine item, or attract everyone's attention.

This is a huge event. Up to now, something has always happened in every event regardless of size.

That was the state of his luck. It might have been because of some bizarre rule in this world, but whenever there was a celebration for anything, calamity struck.

Once at Cremo. And again here in the palace during the construction of the suspension bridge and the garden. Draggy once went bonkers. With today's event being bigger than ever before, anything can happen at any moment. So, please, never, ever let your guard down.

Lloyd was on pins and needles throughout the ceremony, jumping even at the fall of a napkin, but nothing happened this time. No accident broke out even when the event ended, and the only remarkable event that came close to disaster was getting so nervous and shouting, "I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Alicia!" when he received the chest containing the Tears of Summer.

Ha... It's a relief that I was able to quickly correct myself. Otherwise... Whew.

If he had sullied the queen's name in that way, history would remember him as the man who desecrated her name and got executed.

But it's fine since I got what I needed.

As he left the palace after the ceremony, Lloyd and Javier went to a secluded location outside the capital and went into the quiet woods to wait for the night to set in. At midnight, when the full moon was in full swing, Lloyd was ready to take the final action that would complete his grand plan.

"Are you ready?" asked Lloyd, his voice charged with excitement.

"Yes."

"Here we go."

"I understand, Young Master."

When Lloyd opened the container containing the Tears of Summer, an inexplicable heat flooded over him.

Fwoosh! Just then, Lloyd's Supercharge skill activated, absorbing every bit of heat possible to offset the grueling side effect of the Heart of Winter. As heat seeped into his manaheart, it alarmed Pantalasa, the Elemental King enjoying a rare break inside.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 361: Vacation Extension (1)

For nearly every office worker in society, vacation time was a source of comfort and what made living worthwhile. It was a magical period of rejuvenation, and that was not only true for South Koreans. Even here, it was also a priceless and exquisite delight for Pantalasa, the elemental king, who was happily enjoying his time off in Lloyd's manaheart.

Lying on his stomach in a corner of the manaheart, he was sprawled on a sunbed made of frigid mana. With a glass of snow juice with ice by his side, he enjoyed the freezing temperature of the pool. Pantalasa thought, "Ahh, how nice. This is what I am talking about. I had no idea that life could be this enjoyable. Ehem. Yes, yes." He could not be any happier. It felt like he was experiencing the happiest period of time in his life.

I can't believe I didn't experience this kind of joy in life until now.

He looked back on his life from the conception of the Pantara Range to the present day. Throughout his tens of millions of years in existence, Pantalasa didn't have a single moment of peace. His life was filled with constant worrying about the potential harm and environmental changes that could befall the range. He never once shied away from his duty and responsibilities.

I've never been able to rest like this before.

At first, he felt awkward about taking a break from his vacation and lounging around in Lloyd Frontera's manaheart. He questioned whether this was the correct course of action. However, now...

My dear Lloyd! Please live a long life! Please!

There was only one way for him to extend this lovely vacation of his. Lloyd needed to live a long life. Only then would he be able to enjoy the beautiful ice crystal, the Heart of Winter, for longer.

“I lay my eyes on the Heart of Winter each time, and... It looks awesome each time.”

Pantalasa rolled over and shifted his eyes above him, staring at the ice crystal reflecting in the manaheart’s sky. With awe in his eyes, he beheld the Heart of Winter. The latter returned the former’s sentiments by showering him with an even colder gust of air.

“Yes, this is what I’m talking about...” He swiveled around on the sunbed, enjoying the frigid air from the Heart of Winter. He secretly wished for this leisurely time of happiness to last as long as possible while drifting off to sleep.

Bzzt! Suddenly, he was roused from his slumber by a small, faint noise that came from the manaheart’s sky. It was an unsettling sound that he had never heard before here.

“Hmm?” He slightly opened his eyes, wondering what the noise could be. It sounded like something had cracked. He was about to go back to slumber, thinking that he had misheard, when...

Crash! A hole appeared in the manaheart’s sky. Then, an enormous amount of heat started to come down from it!

“Ack!!” He leaped to his feet in terror as a wave of searing heat crashed down onto the icy water.

Fwoosh.... He was suddenly attacked by a devastating shockwave along with a wave of steam as cold and hot air collided together.

“Eek!”

He flung his body by reflex and got down to the ground, propping up the sunbed to protect himself.

Sizzle... As he saw the sunbed made with the mana of icy air melt like ice cream in the summer sun.

“...”

This was serious. This was a nightmare. This was a disaster!

“Argh! Eek! What’s going on?”

Sensing danger, Pantalasa gathered the frigid energy in his body and summoned a blizzard with all his might.

Fwoosh! The glass of snow juice that he was leisurely sipping on and his happy vacation plans were blown away by the blizzard. He let out a few icy tears at this sight all the while trying to shield himself from the scorching heat.

“Ack! Argh!!!”

He felt extremely wronged by this sudden calamity and felt even more so as he thought about it. What in the world was going on now? All he did was enjoy the first vacation of his life. How did he deserve to get into this kind of awful disaster? Pantalasa became more upset the more he thought about it.

“Ack...!” He cried out in anger as he jumped around to avoid stepping on the heat. “Lloyd Fronteraaaa!”

♣

Ding Dong!

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Your Supercharge time is up.]

As the dinging noise pierced into his ears, there were messages simultaneously appearing in front of his eyes.

Ziiing... With the Supercharge skill coming to an end and his mana circle’s fierce rotations subsiding, Lloyd slowly opened his eyes. He looked down at the inside of the chest he was clutching.

It’s done.

The chest was empty. Upon realizing that the sunny marble had vanished, further messages began to appear before his eyes.

[You have absorbed the Tears of Summer, a divine item that possesses its own consciousness.]

[The Tears of Summer has an immense amount of influence over your manaheart.]

[The frigid air that accumulated in your manaheart as a side effect of absorbing the Heart of Winter is disappearing.]

This was the message Lloyd had been waiting for so long. His confrontation with the angel, mind games with the queen and the House of Peers, and railroad construction in the rough mountain range had all been for him to hear these words. And now, it was finally done. He could feel the success of his work throughout his entire body.

Haah...

In the recesses of his heart, a strange sensation started to bloom from one side of his chest. It initially felt like a small candle was lit inside him, but the warm sensation quickly intensified, becoming more like a torch to a bonfire until it burned like a furnace. The feeling spread like wildfire and engulfed his manaheart.

This reminds me of those rotating devices in salons that emit heat on your hair after it's treated for a perm.

In the same way that the sun and a hot pack thaw your icy fingers, Lloyd could feel the Tears of Summer that he had just consumed with Javier beginning to impact his manaheart. Heat blanketed his chest, heart, and manaheart like someone had held his hand or gave him a hand warmer in the middle of winter at an active construction site.

The cold air is disappearing.

The cold air, which had been accumulating inside him like cancer every time he used the Heart of Winter, began to dissipate. He felt refreshed as if he was chugging a bowl of hot soup on a winter's night. Eventually, he was met with a series of even more welcoming messages.

Ding dong.

[The frigid air of the Heart of Winter that had been lingering in your manaheart is now gone.]

[The power of season laden in the Tears of Summer seeped into your manaheart. This experience is having a strong effect on your manaheart skill.]

[A new manaheart skill option has been opened.]

[Manaheart Skill Option ⑦: Momentary Precognition]

What?

Lloyd squinted his eyes.

Momentary Precognition?

Lloyd was not surprised about gaining a new skill. He had anticipated it when he absorbed the Heart of Winter the last time.

I earned the Time Freeze skill with the Heart of Winter. And now... Momentary Precognition? Is it some sort of foresight ability?

He began to carefully read the skill description.

[Skill Option ⑦: Momentary Precognition - The power of the Tears of Summer in your manaheart can accelerate the time axis recognized by your soul. If this happens, you can take a sneak peek of what will happen.]

[Additional Information (1): The limit of your prediction is contingent on the size and volume of your manaheart and mana. Currently, you can see up to five seconds into the future.]

[Additional Information (2): Each time you activate the skill, the Tears of Summer will emit a massive amount of heat. The heat will accumulate in your body immediately, and your body temperature will increase by 1℃.]

[Additional Information (3): Overuse of the skill may dramatically increase your body temperature and negatively affect your health and life.]

[Additional Information (4): If you set the skill to activate automatically in times of danger, you will automatically see the future in situations that jeopardize your safety and life.] I

[Would you like to configure it to run automatically?]

[YES / NO]

Okay...

After finishing the message, Lloyd clenched his hand. The skill he earned was better than he had expected it to be.

I can see five seconds into the future? This is amazing.

Some might think it was nothing, but to Lloyd, it was something. He thought he hit the jackpot, in fact.

This can be used in countless different ways. It could help me avoid dying in a dangerous situation.

The fact was that Lloyd had accomplished practically everything. His family was secure, and his future was brighter than the sun. The only assignment remaining was destiny, and once that was completed, his entire life would be paradise.

But still, you never know what kind of misfortune might happen to you.

Even if he was the swordmaster, history was littered with swordmasters who died at the hands of bad luck and misfortune. Lloyd was no exception. So, this type of safe skill was a good one to have.

The more, the better.

Lloyd chose “YES” because he believed that safety was the most important factor.

[Skill Option ⑦: You have set the skill to automatically activate in times of danger.]

Great.

Lloyd then turned to the side, satisfied to have solved the Heart of Winter situation and acquired a handy skill.

“Is it done, sir?” Javier asked as if he had been waiting for Lloyd to be done. His eyes were glowing.

“Yeah,” Lloyd replied with glee.

“Did it go well?”

“What do you think?”

“I can tell from that distinct smile of yours that you are satisfied enough.”

“My smile?”

“Yes?” replied Javier in a cold and sharp way. “There is a certain smile you put on when your plans go smoothly. However, it looks like you are oblivious to it.”

“Yeah? How do I smile?” asked Lloyd with anticipation.

“It makes me want to distance myself from you the moment I see it.”

“...”

“But it is all right,” comforted Javier. “No need to get depressed.”

“Why do you say that?”

“Well, you do not have many people you are close to in the first place.”

“Hey.”

“Yes?”

“That’s harsh. You may not know it, but I’ve got a lot of people in my social circle.”

“Oh, you do?” Javier asked.

“Of course.”

“Then tell me, Young Master.”

“Huh?”

“I mean, name the people in your social circle.”

“...”

“They cannot be your parents and brother, can they?”

“...”

“Or was I the first person you thought of?”

“...”

“I feel sorry for you. Tsk, tsk.”

“Hey,” called Lloyd seriously.

“Yes?”

“Thank you.”

“Come again?”

“How about you just accept my gratitude, and we can call it even...”

“Hmph.”

Lloyd trembled briefly as it appeared Javier had become a master at pulverizing one’s ego. Despite the latter’s talent for throwing truth bombs, he felt appreciative.

I wouldn’t have dared to absorb the Tears of Summer without him.

The same thing happened when he absorbed the Heart of Winter. At first, he thought he accomplished it all by himself, but after some reflection, he realized that was not the case.

It was only after I absorbed it that I learned about its terrifying force.

That is when he understood there was no way he could have absorbed it on his own. He concluded that Javier’s help must have been used to make it happen.

And I was right.

That was why Lloyd immediately sought Javier for assistance in absorbing the Tears of Summer, and the latter was happy to oblige.

He really is incredible.

Lloyd felt reassured by Javier’s presence as he gazed at him. He could not have gotten this far without the knight. Therefore, he did not want to lose Javier and hoped they would keep bickering with each other for eternity.

“Hey! Lloyd Frontera!”

Lloyd was quietly making a wish to himself when an enraged voice from Pantalasa emerged from the corner of his manaheart.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 362: Vacation Extension (2)

“Hey, Lloyd Frontera!”

Lloyd knitted his brows in response to the loud, angry shout. He immediately recognized where it was coming from.

“You surprised me. What’s going on? I thought you were taking a vacation.” Lloyd asked Pantalasa inside his manaheart.

“Vacation, my ass! I almost died!” snapped Pantalasa right away.

“Eh? Why?”

“Are you seriously asking because you don’t know?”

Lloyd wondered why Pantalasa was so offended. He soon found out why.

“What was that heat pouring into your manaheart? It almost melted me away into nothing!”

“Eh?”

“Eh, my foot! Explain yourself!” bawled Pantalasa.

“Um, I’m not trying to make excuses. I honestly didn’t know about this. Sorry,” Lloyd admitted right away, having forgotten about the elemental in his manaheart. “I already made plans to absorb the Tears of Summer a while ago and have merely been working towards my final goal until now. Today just happened to be the day for it. But I never gave you a warning beforehand. That was my fault. I’m so sorry.”

Lloyd knew it was pathetic to become defensive and give out a string of excuses when he did something wrong. Keeping this in mind, he fully admitted his mistake.

“And what about you? Are you all right?”

“All right?” Pantalasa’s voice was still gruff, but Lloyd could see it had softened. “I nearly died. That was the most brutal heat I’ve ever experienced.”

“Still, it looks like you lived.”

“Are you mocking me?”

“I’m saying that I’m glad that you’re alive.”

“You are mocking me.”

“Well, there’s not much I can say to convince you otherwise.”

Lloyd shrugged, getting a vague sense of what his elemental friend experienced.

“It was exactly as if someone poured a bucket of hot water on you while you were happily cooling off in front of the AC, right?”

“I don’t know what an AC is, but you’re right about a bucketful of water. So, I want to make a complaint. This wasn’t a part of our promise.”

“Eh? Hold it right there. We never made a promise like that,” clarified Lloyd.

“What?” Pantalasa stopped.

“I’m telling you the truth. You asked me if you could stay in my manaheart, and I agreed. In that process, did I ever promise you that my manaheart or the environment inside it would stay the same? I don’t remember doing so.”

Pantalasa didn’t say anything.

“I’m sorry that I didn’t inform you about this earlier, but it’s not a violation of any promise. It’s morally wrong, but legally? Not so much.”

“Ha! You are unbelievable...” Pantalasa’s voice started to sound angry again.

Lloyd, on the other hand, did not care one bit. He said he was sorry and saw no reason to go any further and compensate him for what happened.

“Then, what do you want? You can lash out at me and protest all you want. However, the inside of my manaheart isn’t going to become cold again like before since I’ve already absorbed the Tears of Summer. So, choose for yourself.”

“Choose what?”

“Stay in my manaheart or go back to the Pantara Range.”

“...”

“I’ll give up my position as the elemental king and return it to you if that’s what you want,” said Lloyd frankly. This was the best he could do. “From my perspective, you’ll simply be going back to where you belong, and everything will go back to its original state. Of course, I’ll lose the elementals I planned to use for the maintenance of the railroad. However, that’s something I’ll accept as the price I’m paying for the harm I caused you. How does that sound?”

“...”

Lloyd’s straightforward and honest offer came as a surprise to Pantalasa, who remained silent for a second after hearing those words. Then, he composed himself and reflected on what he wanted. After a moment of contemplation, the answer easily came to him.

“I don’t want to,” said Pantalasa.

“What? You don’t want to?”

“That’s right. I don’t want to go back.”

“To the Pantara Range? Why’s that?” Lloyd cocked his head because he could not wrap his brain around it. He believed Pantalasa would be glad to accept the offer, but he was mistaken.

Pantalasa was firm.“If you are asking me why... It’d be a waste to end my vacation here.”

“Haha?”

“I haven’t even had the chance to properly enjoy my break after billions of years of work. Yet, I have to go back right this moment to the Pantara Range and resume my role as the elemental king? That feels a bit unfair.”

Lloyd grasped Pantalasa’s point immediately. “I understand what you are saying. Well, to a certain extent. It would be similar to if an employee was summoned back to their company due to an emergency on their first day of vacation. Anyone would get upset in that situation. Even if it was a monk or priest, they would probably lose their temper and start yelling.”

“I don’t know what you mean by a monk or priest, but yes. Somewhat. I don’t want to end my rare vacation here and go back.”

“Do you plan to continue staying in my manaheart then?” asked Lloyd.

“No.”

“What?”

“It’s gotten too hot there to stay. But I don’t want to end my vacation right now and go back to the Pantara Range. I don’t like either option.”

“What do you want then?” asked Lloyd with annoyance.

“Show me a place that is as cold as how it used to be inside your manaheart,” Pantalasa replied in an instant.

“Hm? If I do, are you planning to enjoy the rest of your vacation there?”

“Exactly. By chance, is there any place you have in mind?”

“Hmm...” Lloyd pondered as Pantalasa’s suggestion didn’t sound so bad. “Let’s see...”

Lloyd racked his brain and thought about a place Pantalasa would enjoy staying in. Of course, he quickly found the answer. It would be the coldest place in the world and somewhere that he had visited before. A place that would benefit from just the mere presence of Pantalasa.

“If you love the cold so much... How about going to the North Pole?”

“North Pole?” Lloyd’s question made Pantalasa’s heart pound.

♣

His suggestion of the North Pole had beautiful outcomes. It pleased not only Lloyd and Pantalasa but the mermaids in the area as well. It was a win-win situation for everyone.

“I’ve never known that such a beautiful place existed!”

Pantalasa had not stepped a foot anywhere outside the Pantara Range for the past tens of millions of years until now. The only exception to this was inside Lloyd’s manaheart. And so, he was shocked and goggle-eyed as soon as he arrived at the North Pole. The sea was covered in sheets of ice. There were glaciers floated around wherever he laid his eyes. Moreover, the biting winds were so cold they nearly pierced through his skin. Everything was perfect except for one thing.

What’s that? Something strange is hanging in the sky.

Panatalasa. who had been endlessly praising the North Pole ever since he came out of Lloyd’s manaheart, pointed to the sky. There was a large, blazing chasm where he gestured. It was the Hell Gate, which served as a bridge to the other realm. Pantalasa’s gaze sharpened at the sight of the Hell Gate.

“This place is fantastic. I like everything about it except for that. What’s that ugly thing doing in this beautiful place? Why is there a grotesque hole emitting fiery heat into this wonderfully cold air?”

It appeared that Pantalasa was not fond of the Hell Gate. He moved before Lloyd could even get in a word, using all of his strength to create an icy storm and force it into the gate against the intense heat. As if he were an AC countering a heater, the former king challenged his opponent to a fight. Unexpectedly, Pantalasa won, and his strategy involved fixing an icy storm directly in front of the gate to neutralize the heat coming out of it. This method turned out to be sufficient to lower the temperature from the heat.

The heat from the Hell Gate had been raising the temperature of the planet for a while now. However, the problem had been resolved at long last. The merpeople cheered out in delight. Lloyd felt a sense of relief watching them.

“You look like you have removed a bothersome weight off your shoulders,” observed Javier coolly.

“Well, you’re not completely wrong,” admitted Lloyd.

Whoosh... Lloyd shrugged his shoulders on top of Draggy’s hand as he left the North Pole waters. He flashed a wide grin at Javier, who was narrowing his eyes at him, and asked, “Still, everyone’s happy in the end, right?”

It was a win-win scenario. Lloyd had killed three birds with one stone: Pantalasa was allowed to continue his vacation, the merpeople fixed the global warming conundrum, and Lloyd solved the problem that troubled him. He practically performed a miracle.

“Now, it’s time to go to the capital and say hi,” announced Lloyd.

“To whom?” asked Javier.

“To the queen.” It was time, Lloyd thought. He already obtained the Summers of Tears. To be honest, he had no business with the queen.

From now on, I’ve to find out how I can stop the restoration of destiny.

That was what occupied his thoughts as he traveled to the capital, requested an audience with the queen, and walked to the queen’s office. Of course, he would not be able to find a solution in such a short moment. However, he still put a lot of effort into finding another answer to the dilemma of choosing between his life and Javier's.

But it doesn't matter.

Time was on his side, at least according to the previous Ending Spoiler, and he had about two years before destiny kicked into high gear. Until then, he only needed to think harder, study harder, and work harder. He could find the solution within two years. Lloyd believed that there was an answer somewhere that didn't require sacrificing himself or Javier. With it, he direly hoped he could live a normal and leisurely life.

I want that to be the case.

His life had been filled with nothing but struggle. That was why he wanted to live a normal life. He wanted a leisurely life with no tragedies or worries about tomorrow. Lloyd wanted to experience a new era of his life that he could look back at without any regrets.

I'll make it happen.

Lloyd cautiously hoped to himself, but he also strengthened his will to work hard for two more years to make his goal a reality at any cost. He reassured himself that he could achieve it and was capable of doing so. Then, he entered the queen's office to bid her farewell as well as explain he was returning to his fiefdom and would not return to the capital for a bit.

"I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera County, am honored to be in the audience of the rightful owner of this land," Lloyd announced once he was in. His plan was to tell her that he needed to return to his fiefdom because his business in the capital was finished. Then, the young lord prepared his next words, making sure they sounded polite and gentle so as not to offend the queen.

But as the queen turned to face him, when he saw the slight grin on her face. His thoughts turned blank.

Hold on.

As Queen Alicia turned around to him, her left arm made an awkward movement in that short period of time. It almost seemed paralyzed or unresponsive from the anesthetic. She attempted to hide the fact from Lloyd. However, he saw the brief motion of her arm, and something sprang into his brain.

Left arm paralysis.

The Ending Spoiler. The paralysis of Queen Alicia's left arm. When the thought entered Lloyd's mind, he realized instinctively that he was mistaken about having more than enough time and that the moment had already arrived for him to make a decision.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 363: Fourth Ending Spoiler (1)

Left arm paralysis.

Lloyd's thoughts rushed back to the images he saw from the Ending Spoiler. He had seen how this narrative would end if nothing changed from here and gathered countless clues from the foresight. Queen Magentano was one of the people in it.

Her left arm is supposed to get cut off in the novel, but my intervention allowed her to remain unharmed. But the restoration of destiny interfered and made my efforts useless. Eventually, her arm became paralyzed and lost its function.

A chill ran up his spine. The unusual movement of her arm remained stuck in his mind. Lloyd couldn't forget what he saw. He felt a suffocating sense of unease.

But why? Why now?

It was incomprehensible. He should have a good two more years before the restoration of destiny began, according to the Ending Spoiler.

Is it happening earlier?

He thought that could be the case but also felt resistant to the possibility.

Let's get a confirmation first.

Lloyd steadied his heart. He could not make a big deal out of it yet, so he had to identify the issue as calmly and objectively as possible. With that, he fixed the expression on his face after losing control over it for a moment and calmly bowed to the queen.

"Ha. You are always like this," Queen Magentano remarked.

"Your Majesty?"

“It is extremely mysterious how every single one of your visits has such perfect timing.”

“F-forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Forgive you?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“For what?”

“...”

“Tsk, I was simply muttering. I thought I could take a short break before lunch after finishing my morning business earlier than usual, but you intruded.”

“...”

“However, I understand you. You must have a matter of grave, vital, and pressing reason to interrupt my precious and pleasurable break, yes?”

“...”

“Why are you not answering?”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty, um,” Lloyd said hesitantly and awkwardly, begging secretly that she would not summon him to a duel. He added, “I asked an audience with Your Majesty because...”

“What is it?”

“I was worried about you.”

A look of surprise came over her. “Me? You? Worried?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd gravely.

“Really?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“I do not think so,” denied Queen Magentano.

“I am being genuine, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm... Did you do something wrong behind my back?”

“Certainly not, Your Majesty.”

“Murder, robbery, arson, fraud, embezzlement, etc...”

“Certainly not, Your Majesty,” pressed Lloyd again.

“Do you need more money from me?”

“That is not the case, Your Majesty.”

“Your denial only convinces me that I am right.” By now, she was almost convinced that was the case.

“Please trust me, Your Majesty.”

“How could I trust you?” A faint smile hung on the queen’s face. “You have never come to visit unless you had a matter of business to discuss with me. Was there ever an exception to this? Hmm, not even once.”

“However, do you not recall how I carried you on my back and-”

“Ran?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“And how much that cost me.”

“Surely, your well-being, happiness, and longevity of life cannot be given a monetary value,” assured Lloyd.

“Are you suggesting that I must trust you since you protected my well-being, happiness, and longevity of life?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd dropped his head down again and hastily sneaked a peek at her. She seemed joyful, but it was difficult to assess her left arm since it was not moving. Eventually, Lloyd decided to pull no punches. “The thing is, Your Majesty, if I may be honest, I am concerned about your left arm.”

Her face froze for a second.

“I noticed this during our recent training session,” Lloyd remarked. “Forgive me for bringing it up, but I noticed the awkward movements of your left arm. Although it was not very noticeable, there was something off.”

“...”

“As such, I have been considering for the past few days if your left arm was okay and what I could do to help.”

“Hmm... How interesting.” Queen Magentano chuckled and gave a response that seemed to say that there was no need for any fuss. “I sprained.”

“Excuse me?”

“I overtrained myself to the point where I sprained my shoulder and elbow after realizing I could soar to a higher caliber. It must have been greed.” Her voice was cool and calm.

“But the way your left arm moved-”

“Lloyd Frontera.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Do I look different today?”

“Your Majesty?”

“I am asking if you notice anything different in me today.”

Lloyd winced with curiosity. He had intended to inquire more about the unusual motion of her left arm since it was clearly not caused by a sprain. He wanted to dig deeper and find out more about it, but she wasn’t allowing it by throwing an off-topic question.

What’s she doing?

He wasn’t sure how to answer her. It was as if she suddenly became his girlfriend, who wanted to find out if he’d notice anything different in her.

I should just throw any answer and ask her about her left arm again.

In order to take the lead in the discussion, he realized he had to answer her. He clenched his eyes tightly, much as he did when he was a kid trying to distinguish between two identical drawings. “Um...” He then found it quickly.

“Did you not find it yet?” she hurried.

“No, Your Majesty! I found it.”

“What is it?”

“Um, forgive me for saying this to you... But you look ten years younger than usual.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd said seriously, and he could figure out why she was so young.

She’s not wearing any makeup. None.

It was Lloyd’s first time ever to look at her without any makeup.

“I should appear to be younger than usual. Of course, yes. After all, I go through various procedures to make myself look older.” She then sat on the couch, crossed her knees, and rubbed her left arm. Lloyd didn’t understand what she meant when she chuckled. “It may be unknown to you, but I was a daughter of a collateral line far from the main bloodline of the royal family.”

Lloyd was aware of that, but he was in the dark as to why she was bringing it up. Unfortunately, he was not given the opportunity to respond to her inquiry.

“Clearly, I fell far behind the line of succession. There were too many competitors, and I was much younger than them. A misstep would have sent me plunging off the edge. That was the life I led during my late adolescence. However, there was one advantage I had over my rivals.” Her monologue continued. “Great swordsmanship? No. It was something else entirely. Growing up in a remote province, I was one of only a handful of people who knew my name, and I made the most of that weapon.”

“Then, wait-”

“I lied about my age. Although I had defeated all my rivals for the throne, even something as trivial as my youthfulness could be used against me. So, I pretended I was 30 at the coronation ceremony when I was only 21 years old.”

“Oh.”

“The same thing happened afterward. I had to demonstrate the kind of authority that befit my throne lest anyone should accuse me of being unfit for my position because my crown did not compel obedience from the others.”

Lloyd tightly sealed his lips. He could tell the meaning behind her smile.

Okay, that’s why she’s been caking her face with makeup to look older. Her actual age is... She’s older than me but not too much.

Nonetheless, she was still older than Lloyd.

“Only a chosen few are granted access to this secret. Among them are the Great Lord Chamberlain, Sir Kyle, who betrayed me, and now you.”

“Why are you telling this secret, Your Majesty?” asked Lloyd innocently.

When she crossed her other leg, she asked, “Do you not know what I am doing?” She then said, “Secrets can be both my weakness and my weapon.” She stood tall and looked at him with the gaze of a queen.

Lloyd took in her words, thinking.

“Does that answer your question?”

Lloyd gulped. “Yes, Your Majesty.”

“I see. I appreciate you for understanding me.”

With a deep bow, Lloyd said, “I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.” At this point, he understood what she meant.

In other words, she’s requesting me to keep quiet about the condition of her left arm.

That suggested there was something wrong with her left arm, and it was not just a sprain from overtraining.

She, too, recognizes that this is not a simple injury. She knows something is wrong with her left arm, even if she is not sure what it is, and that it’s becoming worse.

Lloyd reasoned that if anyone could feel the abnormality in her left arm, it was the queen herself. She was a swordmaster, so she must be sensitive to changes in her bodily condition. It would be strange if she didn’t feel the paralyzing feeling on her arm.

But she’s requesting me to ignore her arm since it would become her weakness the minute it’s made public. That’s why she’s not even seeking basic treatment for it.

At this rate, Lloyd had to accept it.

Something's wrong with her arm. And that means...

Destiny was on the move, and while he had no understanding of why it was occurring two years faster, it was. And if that is the case...

I have to come up with a plan.

Lloyd's heart started to palpitate rapidly, and the world around him became so black and blurry that he could not recall how he bid farewell to the queen. Before he knew it, he was outside the palace, on his way home, with only one idea in his mind.

I must use and check with the Ending Spoiler.

The only way to be certain was to use the Ending Spoiler to see how the present situation was changed and concluded.

Please.

He turned to his lodging, direly hoping that no one connected to him would suffer an untimely death. He bided his time until nightfall, when the bugs began to cry and the moon began to shine. At last, Lloyd tucked Javier into bed with a lullaby and entered the sitting room. He then opened the skill window.

[Skill Name: Ending Spoiler]

[Skill Feature: Absolute Authority]

[Required CP: 160 (Fourth)]

[You can take a peek at the portion of the ending scene that will unfold in this story by spending some of the CP. It could be a happy or sad ending.]

The familiar skill windows cascaded in front of his eyes. He took a deep breath.

Let's do it.

Lloyd selected the activate button at the bottom of the skill window.

[Skill Name: Would you like to use the Ending Spoiler?]

[Required RP: 160 (Fourth)]

[Current CP: 1,648]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes.

Ding dong.

[Skill Name: Ending Spoiler has been activated.]

[You have used 160 CP.]

[Current CP: 1,488]

The skill activation message popped up in front of him.

Crackle...! The flow of time around him gradually slowed until it finally stopped. The air in the sitting room and the drifting clouds visible through the windows... Everything came to a standstill, and the space in front of Lloyd flickered. Bzzt!

A new, round passage opened.

Whew.

Lloyd was always rattled during these moments. That was especially the case this time. He felt much more apprehensive than excited.

I have to gather as many clues as possible.

He was determined to gather as much information as possible in order to understand the reason why the events in the ending spoiler were happening earlier and what would happen from now until the future he was shown. With a strong resolve, he advanced toward the gateway and entered it. Then, a brilliant flash of light blinded his eyes.

Fwoosh! His vision turned dark as if he had squinted his eyes. As his blurry vision became clear, he could slowly see pieces of his surroundings. Lloyd's eyes soon snapped open in shock.

What in the world is this?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 364: Fourth Ending Spoiler (2)

Bzzt! Lloyd strode into a bluish portal in one of the sitting rooms of the Magentano Palace, and then he disappeared. The world, which had halted for a second, then resumed its course. The clouds in the sky and the air in the sitting room started to move. The same was true for Javier's breathing and closed eyes as he pretended to sleep. Everything quietly began shifting, rising, and sparkling.

"..."

Javier softly arose from his dim bedroom and looked toward the direction of the sitting room. He could sense Lloyd's presence from there, but when he walked inside...

He is not here.

Javier searched the area but could not find Lloyd. However, he could hear his young master's gentle breathing and even swallowing his spit. Suddenly, he remembered a similar incident from when they were working on the massive waterways. He went to Lloyd's bedroom to get a report, but even though he sensed Lloyd's presence, the actual man could not be found. Javier checked behind the curtains, under the bed, and under the desk. Yet, even with his careful inspection, Lloyd was nowhere to be found.

"..."

Javier wondered how many secrets this fake Lloyd held to himself and what the latter was up to.

"He had a troubled expression on his face earlier."

Lloyd was fine when he left for the palace to say goodbye. However, his expression was completely different by the time he returned. Although it was not obvious, Javier was able to tell there was a change. The knight could detect even the smallest shift in his depraved young master's facial expression after all the years they spent by each other's side.

He was rattled and shaking. Tense.

At the same time, his young master looked determined and seemed to be hiding his nerves when singing the lullaby. Javier wanted to know what was making Lloyd so nervous, afraid, and anxious… And if he could be of any assistance.

That was why I did something I normally wouldn't.

Javier pretended to sleep, which was easy with his talents as a grandmaster. He tricked Lloyd by shutting his eyes tight until he detected a movement from him.

It is strange. I opened my eyes as soon as I felt his flow of mana. He disappeared during that split second.

Where had Master Lloyd gone? Was he all right? How could his presence be felt but not seen? And why was he groaning in pain like someone who had been hurt?

It is like he is having a nightmare.

With a sigh, Javier contemplated in the dark room, wondering whether he should wait for Lloyd or return to his pretend sleep and how he was going to help. It seemed the latter was in a predicament that he could not discuss with others. The night deepened as he thought over these worries.

♣

As the sun started to set in the world of the Ending Spoiler, Lloyd tried to squint his eyes to avoid the bright sunlight but failed to do so. His eyelids wouldn't move as he wanted them to. The trivial incident made him remember something.

Oh, right. I can't move my body right now.

It was always like this with the Ending Spoiler. He would see his future through the dying body of his future self and had no physical control over himself.

Tsk.

Despite the intensely bright light, Lloyd made an effort to investigate his surroundings.

“Master Lloyd, I am here,” said a familiar voice. It belonged to Javier.

Lloyd then felt something silky over his shoulder. Clothes, perhaps? Lloyd could not move and felt drained. His stomach also churned with severe nausea as if he was having a dreadful hangover.

I am on my death bed, after all.

This was the fourth ending spoiler, so even though Lloyd was watching his last moments play out in front of him, he was able to maintain his composure. This was the moment for careful observation rather than sentimentality, and every conversation and piece of information needed to be gathered. With that in mind, he observed what was happening and then heard a rustling noise next to him, which he assumed was Javier taking a seat.

“Javier.” Lloyd felt his own mouth speak.

Javier replied at once. “Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“I have something to say.”

“Please tell me.”

“It might take up quite a bit of your time.”

“That is fine.” Javier’s voice, however, shook. Even though it was firm, there was a slight tremble at the end of his words.

“This Ending Spoiler is horrible, isn’t it?” Future Lloyd chuckled.

“Master Lloyd?”

“Just keep listening. I don’t have much time left to explain.”

“...”

“It began right after the construction for the Pantara Railroad was finished. You probably sensed that there was a problem with the queen’s left arm. Your suspicion was correct. Don’t forget this.”

Even though his speech was strained, Lloyd persisted in speaking as clearly as possible. His words seemed to be directed toward Javier and also like a monologue at the same time.

Wait a minute. Is he talking to me?

It appeared that way, and Lloyd tried to concentrate on what his future self was saying. “Her left arm will grow worse. It will happen more quickly than expected. I wish it was a simple case of paralysis. But it was worse in this version of the phenomenon. In just two months, her arm started to decay as if it was infected with some sort of disease.”

What? Her arm would decay? Lloyd tensed at his gruesome words.

His future self continued, “So, she decided to cut it off since it wasn’t getting better with any kind of treatment and leaving it alone could endanger her life. She clenched her teeth and cut it off by herself. Do you see where I’m going with this? You’re right. The Knight of Blood and Iron. The assassination attempt. The outcome of the events was far too similar to what happened there.”

What in the world...

Lloyd was taken aback since the future appeared to be worse than what he saw with the first version of the restoration of destiny.

And... it’s closer to the original version of the Knight of Blood and Iron.

Lloyd’s breathing slowed. He began listening to his future self’s story with more focus.

Future Lloyd paused for a moment. Then he said, “After that, it’s pretty similar. Her temper changes. The amputation must have been a great shock for her. Well, I suppose that would be the same for anyone and especially the case for the queen since she's a swordmaster. The loss of an arm was probably more devastating for her than most people. Anyway... She soon became suspicious of the people around her. I think she believed that her arm became paralyzed because someone was contaminating her food with small doses of poison. This led her to execute every servant in the palace. And as if that was not enough, she also executed every royal magician with them as well. Do you know why?"

Lloyd had no clue. But he had his guesses.

"You guessed it," said Future Lloyd. "She had doubts. She suspected that her arm was cursed rather than poisoned. And that is how every royal magician was sentenced to death. The House of Peers protested because most of their children worked in such jobs. Yes, that was the start of the civil war."

Lloyd imagined the events as he listened to the story. The queen had cast suspicion on everyone and then launched a bloody purse, just like in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

Then, a civil war broke out.

It appeared as though the same event had transpired in the future as the civil war had devastated half the land, burned down innumerable villages and farmland, and destroyed more than half of nobles.

"It was a huge war between two factions in support or opposition of the queen. You might be wondering which side our family chose. Of course, we sided with her. I made the decision after careful consideration and knew which team the goddess of victory would side with."

Lloyd thought that was much like him. He would have done the same thing.

"Of course, I didn't take part because I didn't want a pointless war. Let us say I was on the neutral side. Thankfully, she did not ask much of me. She must have been discreet. But she did something else that made things worse between us."

He wondered what she did. The answer made his blood run cold.

“Around the time the civil war ended, she waged war with another nation to control the atmosphere in the kingdom and solidify the nobles, and she invaded the southwest. The Benetto Kingdom.”

He couldn’t believe it. Chills ran down his spine.

“The trade route became an invasion route, and the kingdom fell in less than ten days, which is when I voiced my opposition. The route was not meant for invasion, but the price of my opposition was more costly than I thought. The title of Magentano Carry, meaning the one holding up the Magentano family.”

The title was withdrawn?

Magentano Carry was the first title Lloyd ever earned, granting him unconditional support and trust from the queen. He didn’t need to hear more to know the events that followed after that title was withdrawn during her tyrannous reign.

“I’m assuming you must have sensed it by now. Yeah, the doubts began to focus on me, and the wall that protected her from seeing past my family’s strength and power crumbled.” Future Lloyd chuckled. “I was marked as a traitor, and the entire kingdom became my enemy. So what did I do? I fought back. There was no room for negotiation in the first place. And that resulted in a second civil war. Guess who came out on top?”

Lloyd knew who won. “You should know. Yes, we won. We subdued the palace 15 days ago,” revealed Future Lloyd.

“...”

“And I planned to stop this whole nonsense afterward. But she had other plans for herself. She ended her own life.”

“...”

“That was one development to the story, so I just watched how things would play out, how that ugly reality would continue its messy and dirty path, and that is when I learned that a person’s life can be destroyed at lightning speed. Yesterday, I buried Count and Countess Frontera.”

What could have happened? Lloyd wondered.

“While I was out fighting in the war, a noble in support of the queen sent someone over. They approached the count and countess while pretending to be on my side and had an urgent message to deliver. Then... the two were attacked before they even realized what was happening.”

“...”

“Of course they had guards. I’m not so thoughtless as to leave my fiefdom unguarded, but that noble was a nomadic sword master traveling from one kingdom to the next.”

“...”

“In any case, my entire body feels weak from all the bottles of drinks I had last night. My heart is tortured by how I was not able to tell them the truth and that I love them. My guilt is eating me alive. So, I went on a drinking binge for the first time in a while. That was when it came to me.” Future Lloyd chuckled, and it allowed Lloyd to see why he was seeing this scene through the Ending Spoiler. “That’s right. I’m sure you, Lloyd Frontera, know of the Ending Spoiler. My past self. You’ve realized this already, right? This is my message to you.”

Yes, this was Lloyd’s dying message, done in anticipation that his past self would utilize the Ending Spoiler, but something was off here.

I’m just smashed and feeling a little under the weather. How’s this my dying moment?

The future Lloyd seemed agitated and disheartened due to the hangover. But not near death.

Then, why is he acting like he's going to die... It couldn't possibly be...

"Correct. The Ending Spoiler shows the final moment of my life. And death can come in many ways," Future Lloyd grinned in that instant.

It couldn't be, Lloyd thought to himself. But his fear was proven correct.

Future Lloyd turned his head for the first time and spoke to Javier. "Now, Javier."

"Do we really have to do this...?" mumbled Javier, who was visibly distressed.

"Yes. This is the only way to save me, my parents, and the queen."

"But-"

"Trust me."

Lloyd could see from Javier's expression that the two had a lengthy debate about this and that he had stubbornly argued again and again with the knight for him to follow his plan. Javier nodded, tearing up. "Yes... Young Master."

Javier stood up, blocking the sun with his back, his features shadowed and his blade the only object gleaming in the sunlight.

Swish. Javier raised his sword. The end of the sword's blade was trembling. "Is this the only option we have left?" He asked again, seemingly confirming Lloyd's answer for the last time, or perhaps, unable to let go of his lingering hope.

"Yes."

"..."

Javier bit his lips.

Future Lloyd smiled bitterly, and as an afterthought, “Oh, after some thinking, I concluded that someone hastened the speed of the restoration of destiny. And that is...”

Lloyd watched the blood spurt in the air as Javier’s sword solemnly fell down and sliced through his body. He also heard the last words his future self said as his consciousness faded.

“Hell’s King...”

Everything went dark.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 365: Karma (1)

“Hell’s King...”

Those were Lloyd’s last words, and they reflected his desperate desire to share what he had gone through.

Fwoosh! Lloyd’s vision went blank, and he felt as if his entire body was floating in the air before his eyes popped open.

“...”

Lloyd squirmed and looked around as the sound of crickets crying beneath the moonlit sky washed over him. The sitting room was peaceful, and the curtain he had seen earlier was dancing to the breeze coming in through the partially open window.

The Ending Spoiler is over.

Noticing how hard he was breathing, Lloyd relaxed on the sofa, loosened his body, and went over everything he saw and heard in the Ending Spoiler.

It was a direct message from my future self.

Lloyd instantly felt satisfied with himself for not losing his rationality even when all hell broke loose and the restoration of destiny came sooner than expected. His future self left a message with a clear overview of his experience. Then, he commanded Javier to slash him with a sword. It was his intention to die.

He needed to die at that exact moment for me to get the words he said right before then through the ending spoiler. It was a calculated act.

What a determined man he was, Lloyd reflected, but now was not the time to praise himself. Now was the moment to reflect on the wealth of information he had gathered from his future self.

Hell's King is the one who accelerated the restoration of destiny?

Lloyd couldn't know exactly why the king would do that. But he had a rough guess.

If it's the King of Hell, it's simple to deduce his reasoning. I must have tampered with the flow of time from how often I used my Time Freeze skill.

The Time Freeze skill was a trick Lloyd gladly took advantage of, especially when he was working on large-scale constructions. He also used it to delay the start of the restoration of destiny as well.

But the Hell's King wasn't happy about that.

It seemed plausible since it was undeniably true that freezing time to postpone the restoration of destiny was technically cheating. Lloyd figured that Hell's King wouldn't let that slide, given the latter's strait-laced character.

My future self must have glossed over the reason Hell's King accelerated the whole affair as he knew I would be able to figure that out on my own. I'm certain of it. I would have done the same thing. Besides, he likely didn't have enough time to explain every little detail.

Based on his experiences, the Ending Spoiler only showed a few minutes of the future. So, he would need to focus on a few key points and take out anything that was self-explanatory or unnecessary to deliver as much information as possible in that short time frame.

That's why I was told only about what happened to the queen, the count, and the countess.

As Lloyd continued to think, the situation started to piece itself together.

I suppose this new, accelerated version of the phenomenon is the second restoration of destiny. This time, the trigger was the amputation of the queen's left arm. The trigger for the first version of the restoration of destiny was the horse accident with Count Frontera.

In the initial version, the whole situation began after Count Frontera fell from his horse. That set off a series of terrible mishaps involving the death or crippling of many people in The Knight of Blood and Iron. However, in the second version...

It began with her left arm. I have to stop it, then.

After she lost her left arm, the queen would turn into a tyrant and wage war against his family. In the process, the count and countess would be killed.

If the story proceeds as it is, Julian, Scheherazade, the sultan, Orc Arosh, the two loan sharks, and I will all experience some sort of misfortune aligned with the new version of the phenomenon.

But if he could protect the queen's left arm? If she didn't lose her left arm?

She won't become a tyrant and start a civil war.

The story would develop differently. The count and countess wouldn't lose their lives. Of course, Lloyd knew the restoration of destiny wouldn't be put to a stop even then.

That's obvious. Dragon King Verkis warned me about it last time. No matter how many events I prevent, there will be more accidents and tragedies that come about in new ways. That is why my future self didn't choose to inform me about anything else.

Lloyd was able to understand the intent of his future self, who had delivered him a message through his will. First and foremost, the queen's left arm had to be safeguarded since it was the trigger for the second restoration of destiny. Afterward, a third version of the phenomenon would appear, and he would need to find the new trigger.

So, you're saying that's why it would be useless to inform me about anything else.

That was Lloyd's final conclusion. First, he would need to prevent the queen's left arm from becoming paralyzed and start decaying.

But there's something else I have to take care of before then.

Lloyd got up and moved to the bedroom adjacent to the sitting room. He then woke Javier up.

"Wakey-wakey."

"..."

"I'm relieved to see one try was enough to wake you up."

"I am a light sleeper. What is going on, Young Master?" replied Javier in confusion.

"Isn't it obvious? I woke you up because we have somewhere to go," said Lloyd.

"Where?"

"To Hell."

Javier turned and lay back to bed.

"Hey, why are you lying down again?"

"I would like for you to just be thankful that I am calmly returning to bed without a fight, Master Lloyd."

"Wow. Were you planning to hit me?"

"That is an obvious question."

"Tsk. Get up anyway."

"Why are we going to Hell again?"

"There's something I need to confirm."

"..."

Javier had a glow in his eyes. He wasn't asleep in the first place. He was rather listening from his bed from the time Lloyd vanished until the latter returned to mull over the situation in the sitting room. As a result, he felt compelled to ask Lloyd what was going on and what was bothering him so much.

Are you finally planning to share your concerns with me?

Javier asked himself as he rose and looked at Lloyd. His wish must have come true. The words he had been waiting to hear came out of Lloyd's mouth.

"To be honest, I do have a concern."

"..."

"The restoration of destiny will likely begin much earlier than expected and manifest in a different way as well."

"Are you sure?"

"Yeah. I'm sure." Lloyd nodded and proceeded to explain everything about the new turn of events, skipping the parts that involved his real identity and the Javier-or-Lloyd dilemma.

"If what you said is true... Her Majesty's left arm will start to decay, and the count and countess will be in danger."

"Yeah. Somewhat."

"When and where did you find out about this?" asked Javier.

"While I met with the queen earlier, something was odd about the movement in her left arm. So, I questioned her, and she indirectly admitted that it was paralyzed."

"And as for-"

“How did I predict the events that follow?” interrupted Lloyd. “I saw everything in a dream. It felt like some sort of premonition.” Lloyd changed the Ending Spoiler into a dream, the same way he did when he first explained the phenomenon to Count and Countess Frontera. To his relief, Javier remained silent instead of casting doubts, so Lloyd went on, “Of course, I’m not acting solely based on a silly dream. But what I saw was too real. It has made me nervous. I need to confirm it myself.”

“With Hell’s King?”

“Yes,” said Lloyd. “If my dream is right, the Hell’s King is responsible for why the restoration of destiny is happening earlier than anticipated. He has a problem with how I freezed the flow of time.”

“You wish to confirm the matter by confronting the most likely suspect.”

“That’s the plan.” Lloyd nodded. The thing was, he could have consulted the Jewel of Truth. But in this case, he wanted to confront Hell’s King.

I want to see with my own eyes what he wants from this. And if I can... I should negotiate.

He wanted to meet the king directly and see his chances of delaying the destiny restoration phenomenon.

“Anyhow, we need to move fast. Get out of bed. There isn’t even time for you to wash your face.”

Lloyd remembered what his future self said. The queen’s left arm was already decaying two months after it became paralyzed. As such, he didn’t have time to hesitate or waste too much on meeting with the King of Hell. Ten minutes later, they were ready to leave.

“Let’s go!” After urging Draggy to fly as fast as possible, they reached the North Pole in a matter of hours. Upon spotting the entrance to Hell, Lloyd exclaimed, “Throw us in, Draggy!”

Boom! Both of them broke through the blast of snow that covered the gate, and when they persevered and reached Hell, a fierce heat surged toward them.

“Whoa!”

Lloyd immediately searched his inner pocket and brought Ggoming out, who was already on standby.

“Hey, it’s your turn now.”

Lloyd held out the red sunflower seed. Ggoming ate it and became huge in an instant. He fluttered his giant wings and carried Lloyd and Javier, freefalling into the pit of ash.

“Ggoming! To Hell Castle!”

“Ggoming!” exclaimed Ggoming.

It had been a long time since Lloyd last breathed the musty air of Hell. They flew for a seemingly endless amount of time through the hazy heat and landed on the ground when the castle finally came into view. Upon landing, a large group of demons greeted Lloyd, making him feel like a celebrity at an airport. However, he was too busy to say hello to everyone.

“Run!”

Lloyd and Javier forcefully made their way through the cheering demons to King of Hell’s office. They stood in front of the massive desk in the room, where Hell’s King looked to be no different than when they last met him.

Scribble! Scribble! Scribble! The king’s throne was as plain as an office chair. His massive desk didn’t have a single decoration on it but was completely buried under paper. And surrounded by the paper piles, there was someone who looked like they were on the verge of death from being overworked. It was the King of Hell. He briefly glanced at Lloyd and proceeded to ignore him. The only thing he was focused on was the paper piles surrounding him. While writing his signature down one after another at a rapid pace, he muttered a complaint.

“Can’t you see that I’m swamped right now? Tell me what you want. Make it quick,” grumbled the king as he signed off the papers.

Lloyd felt glad that the king was busy and willing to jump into business straight away. He said, “It has been a while, the ruler of karma and overlord of 19 purgatories. I, Lloyd Frontera, would like to dare ask you a question.”

“Ask what?”

“Did you accelerate the arrival of the restoration of destiny?”

“Yes, I did.”

Scribble! Hell’s King carelessly answered the query with a faint and uninterested nod as he continued to sign off papers at rapid speed, and Lloyd bit his lips at the sight, plainly upset by the lack of seriousness in a situation that may ruin his own life.

“May I ask why you did that?” asked Lloyd, suppressing his emotions.

“I certainly can,” Hell’s King said, his attention now fixated on Lloyd. “It is a very simple reason,” he added, flashing a huge smile as if he was looking at a pot of gold. “I want you, Suho Kim. You are the perfect talent for Hell.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 366: Karma (2)

“Suho Kim. I want you. You are the perfect talent for Hell.”

Swick! With a broad smile, the King of Hell flicked his finger. A wave of mana surrounded Javier, who was standing next to Lloyd.

Flinch! Lloyd noticed Javier’s shoulders faintly tremble and wondered if he had been attacked. Javier, however, shook his head and whispered in a low voice, “I have not been attacked, Young Master. But I cannot hear anything. It appears that he somehow blocked my hearing.”

Just when Lloyd was about to ask the king why, the latter let out a low snort and said, “You should thank me, Suho Kim. The secrets you have been hiding will be brought up several times throughout our discussion from now on.”

“Is that why you blocked his hearing?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, but it will only be for a short while.”

“How gracious of you,” huffed Lloyd.

“You are being quite short with me.”

“I don’t like to speak more than I have to at work.”

“The same is true for me, Suho,” the king of Hell replied mildly. “You are the most incredible talent that I have ever seen. By this, I mean you have all the necessary skills to manage Hell. That is why I decided to provide an excellent position for you here.”

Lloyd frowned. “Are you thinking of slaving me around in Hell?”

“Yes, I am.”

“So, that is why you made the restoration of destiny begin earlier?”

“That is also right.”

Lloyd shot him a glare.

“There is no need for that. This place is much better fitting for you to show off your skills. I’m giving you an opportunity to expand your horizon.”

Lloyd frowned again. “I never wanted that.”

“But I do,” replied Hell’s King instantly. “I want you to showcase your skills in Hell. I want to see you do great work on my behalf. That way I can-”

“Sit back and relax. Am I wrong?”

“No, you are correct,” the king said with a smile, not denying any of it. “The fact is, I am exhausted. However, it has been impossible for me to escape my fate as the King of Hell. That had always been the case and I didn’t think anything would change in the future. Right when I was about to give up, you showed up. The ideal candidate to take over my position: someone with the perfect balance of intelligence, righteousness, and greed.”

“To put it short, someone you can make use of.”

“Correct. I needed someone who could be entrusted with the affairs of Hell. I didn’t think that kind of talent could even exist despite my hopes.”

Lloyd clenched his fists and pursed his lips. It was now clear to him what intentions the king had and why he wanted to recruit him so badly.

His opinion of me is far too high. He wants to keep his title as the King of Hell while pushing all of his work onto me.

Lloyd was dumbfounded by the king’s words.

Does he think I worked my ass off all these years just to become his little puppet?

Lloyd immediately felt an impulse to confront the King of Hell, but realized it was not the right time. There was still plenty of room for negotiation before that needed to happen. So he suppressed it and replied, “Haah... I fully understand what you are saying. I am flattered by your high opinion of me. But I have a question.”

“A question?”

“Yes,” said Lloyd. “I am curious why you’re doing it now of all times.”

“Are you asking why I hastened the restoration of destiny?” asked the king.

“Yes. You could have just waited a few more decades to make use of me since I will inevitably die of old age. I can’t wrap my head around why you’re going so far to ruin my life and that of everyone around me.”

He truly wanted to know. That was the only way he could attempt a negotiation and have any possibility of hope to improve the situation. He waited for a response from the King.

“Now is my only chance,” said the King of Hell.

“Excuse me?”

“I mean tying you, Suho Kim, down to Hell.”

Lloyd didn’t follow.

“Suho Kim,” continued the king. “You have tricked and taken advantage of a fair number of people, putting them in awfully miserable positions at times. I would be surprised if you were not self-aware of this. Am I wrong?”

“That’s either because they harmed me first, or I had no other choice-”

“That is an excuse. You have plenty of them. You had a crumbling family to save. You had a life to build. You needed to protect what was yours. There is always an explanation for every act of evil. Amongst them, some are valid and some are not.”

“...”

“Your actions are the same, Suho. You had valid reasons for your bad deeds. However, they could have been avoided without a doubt, which is why you have accumulated bad karma.” Hell’s King’s eyes shone as he spoke. “Yes, bad karma. You have earned plenty of it now, enough for me to tie you down to Hell. However, once you start living a plush life full of peace and leisure, the situation will change.”

“Change? Could you mean-”

“That is right. As expected, you catch on quickly. I can tell that you are a good-natured man, Suho. You have merely been forced by unfortunate circumstances to take advantage of your surroundings for survival. But once you find peace in life, you will spend the rest of your remaining time taking care of everyone around you. Then, you will gradually earn good karma.”

“That’s what you feared would happen?”

“I was worried.”

“...”

“With your extended life from the sponsorship of Dragon King Verkis and naturally good character, all the bad karma you have accumulated will be erased, by which point I will not be able to make you stay in Hell.”

“In other words,” sighed Lloyd, “You made the restoration of destiny begin earlier so that I would not have time to earn good karma.”

“That’s right.”

“Ha.” A chuckle escaped Lloyd. The whole situation seemed ridiculous. Feeling obstinate, he asked, “Did you really believe I would die once the restoration of destiny began? Unfortunately, I don’t think I will.”

“Hmm, why is that?”

“What if I stubbornly choose to continue living even after everyone around me dies?”

“Ha! Do you really think I have not considered that possibility?” Hell’s King leaned forward. The eyes behind his rimless glasses were emotionless. “Suho Kim, there is no chance you will survive amidst the restoration of destiny. Why? This world does not want that to happen. It regards the man beside you, Javier, as its rightful protagonist.”

“...”

“As a result, you will face endless waves of hardship. Even if you manage to overcome them, you will only be met with greater ordeals.”

“...”

“These waves will only get worse as they come in. That is just how this phenomenon works. The more you overcome, the greater the next challenge will be. And so, it will mercilessly haunt you.”

“...”

“Are you then still confident that you will be able to stand strong until the end?”

“...”

Lloyd was unable to respond to this and had no ideas to counter the king, but he persisted nonetheless, saying, “Of course, I am not confident. But...”

“But?”

“I’d like for you to clarify one thing. If I promise to work for Hell in the future... Could you put a stop to the restoration of destiny?” Lloyd asked, pinning all his hopes on this question. He desperately wondered if he could save the Count, Countess, Julian, Scheherazade, and everyone else around him by promising, no, signing a contract to diligently work in Hell after death, in exchange for stopping the restoration of destiny.

Hell’s King clicked his tongue. “I did make the right judgment about your character. You are a good man at heart. But unfortunately, that is not possible.”

“Even... if I promise you?”

“No.” Hell’s King gravely shook his head, saying, “No, the restoration of destiny cannot be stopped once it has begun regardless of anyone’s opinion, including mine. The phenomenon can think and act for itself. It will not stop until it meets its goals.

“It reminds me of a computer program,” said Lloyd.

“Yes. It’s similar to a computer program of your world.”

“...”

“It must be clear to you by now. It’s out of my control,” said Hell’s King with finality in his voice.

“I see.” It was not a lie. The fact was painfully clear to him. The matter was beyond the King of Hell’s control.

If the restoration of destiny is a computer program... then the King of Hell is the programmer.

That was it. There was currently a program that couldn’t be paused once it began running. The programmer behind it, the King of Hell, claimed he had no control over it. Consequently, even if Lloyd killed the programmer, it would not affect the autonomous program.

In order to stop it... I need to either turn off its power source or break the machine itself.

Lloyd felt frustrated as he pondered a solution. As lost as he was, one thing was clear. He looked up and said, “There is no point in continuing this conversation then. It will only be a waste of our time.”

“It is. The restoration of destiny will continue progressing even if you attack or kill me, bluntly speaking.”

“I knew it...”

That confirmed his thoughts. A conversation or confrontation between them was pointless. Obviously, a negotiation wasn’t possible either. It was never an option to begin with.

Tsk, I was hoping I could ask to delay the restoration of destiny.

Lloyd pressed his lips. The reason he came all the way down to Hell was to negotiate with the king and ultimately request him to delay the restoration of destiny. He hoped this would earn him a bit more time. However, it turned out that there was no way to slow or stop the phenomenon once it began. What was he going to do from here?

I should end our conversation now.

“I see,” replied Lloyd immediately. “I will take my leave now.”

“Hmm. You are giving up too quickly.”

“I decided it would be better to take action instead of wasting time on this sort of conversation.”

“Are you saying you won’t give up?” asked the king in surprise.

“I should try my best to survive like I have until now.”

“It won’t be easy this time,” added Hell’s King.

“There wasn’t a single time it was easy.”

“Well, then. I wish you good luck.”

Swick! Hell’s King smiled mysteriously and flicked his finger. The same force of mana from earlier spread into the air and wrapped around Javier.

“Haah...” Javier let out a sigh.

Had his hearing returned?

The knight turned his head toward Lloyd and nodded, as though assuring Lloyd that he was all right.

“Good, that’s a relief.” Lloyd nodded his head. He then left the castle after bidding a proper farewell, clenching his teeth as he did.

Dammit. That worthless King of Hell!

The more Lloyd pondered the matter, the more infuriated he became. He knew that the King of Hell had thought highly of him and wanted to employ him. However, it had never occurred to him that the latter would go as far as to use the restoration of destiny to get what he wanted.

What’s worse is that he is justified in his actions. After all, I changed the fate of countless lives, starting from Count and Countess Frontera, as well as Javier.

The people who should have died lived, changing the list of names on the King of Hell’s registry. This gave the king a sufficient excuse to use the restoration of destiny as a way to rectify the situation.

What should I do now?

Lloyd sighed deeply as he glanced at the gloomy sky of Hell. His future seemed grim despite his confident declaration back in the castle.

What do I do?

He closed his eyes. Despite the dark future ahead of him, he tried to gather his emotions and not let himself become overwhelmed with despair.

Right. My life has never been easy.

After some introspection, he realized that was really the case. Back in South Korea, he had seen his parents commit suicide and afterward continued living as a poor college student. There were at least a hundred times when he could have given up. He was hardly treated as a human being and resided at the bottom of society. That did not change when he arrived in this world. He had faced many obstacles and life-threatening moments up to this point. As he looked back on his experiences, he slowly started to gain courage.

All right. Let's face this head-on like I've done with everything else until now. If I fail? Well. I will just die then.

He felt more at ease having that kind of mindset to begin with. His scattered mind started to come together again. From that point on, he deliberated over what he could do and the paths he could take. Lloyd considered every variable and what changes they would bring. All the separate pieces came together like a puzzle. Everything unfolded like a crumpled piece of paper. The bleak future ahead of him became brighter. At last, he saw a glimmer of hope.

That's it.

Lloyd lifted his gaze to the sky. His eyes brightly gleamed like someone who saw the light at the end of their tunnel.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 367: How to Redo an Underdrawing (1)

That's it.

Lloyd saw a faint ray of hope. It wasn't anything significant. However, it was enough to overcome his current situation.

I shouldn't try to solve everything right away, especially with important matters like this.

One thing at a time, as if he was untangling a ball of yarn.

The first thing I need to do is take care of the trigger for the second version of the restoration of destiny.

This was something that had been on his mind. Once he took care of the trigger and stopped the restoration of destiny...

Then, the third and fourth versions of the phenomenon will likely begin one after another.

But Lloyd didn't care. Each version of the restoration of destiny would come with a trigger that sparked its beginning.

I just need to stop the event that acts as the trigger.

That way, he'd be able to put a stop before the situation took a serious turn and took everyone's lives.

I know it's not a permanent solution. But it will buy me more time. That is good enough.

He needed to stop the trigger and the restoration destiny with it. If he had to, he would use his Time Freeze skill to buy more time and figure out the answer to the dilemma of choosing his or Javier's life. The more he thought about it, the more confident he felt.

It's doable. I also have a way to stop her paralysis.

Lloyd gave a small smile and looked at Javier, who was sitting alongside him on Ggoming, before asking, “How about we teach the Asrahan Core Technique to the queen?”

“Come again?” Javier retorted in mild disbelief.

Lloyd chuckled. “I’m thinking of teaching her the Asrahan Core Technique. But since we created the technique together, I wanted to hear your opinion first.”

“Teach her the Asrahan Core Technique?” Javier chuckled as if the suggestion wasn’t making any sense. “Master Lloyd, you do know how tedious and difficult it is for a knight to master a mana utilization technique, right?”

“Of course.”

“If you’re asking me while fully knowing that, it means your conversation with the King of Hell did not go well.”

“Thanks for catching on quickly.”

“Is that what you finally came up with? Teaching her the Asrahan Core Technique?”

“Um, maybe.”

“Anyhow, I have a question.”

“What is it?” Lloyd looked at Javier.

“What did you talk about with the king?”

“Are you interested?”

“A little bit,” Javier confessed. Lloyd noticed how sincere his eyes were.

I can tell he’s not just curious. He genuinely wants to help.

Lloyd pondered if it was for his family, himself, or both. Lloyd smiled. “The King of Hell and I...” Lloyd then repeated their conversation to Javier, keeping just two aspects of it hidden: his real name, Suho Kim, and the truth about the restoration of destiny.

I can never tell Javier that this world is fictional, everything’s happening because I took away his role as the original protagonist, and the only way to completely get out of this situation would be for one of us to die...

Lloyd could not tell him. Was it because he feared Javier would hurt him? No, it was the opposite. If he found out, Javier would immediately commit suicide to rescue Lloyd and his family. That could never happen. Their world was inside The Knight of Blood and Iron for crying out loud. But more than anything else, he would miss the reliable presence of this knight who always stood by his side to protect him. But even without these practical reasons...

I don’t want that.

Javier had already become his best friend. There was no one else he would be able to trust as much as him even if they always bickered with each other. Lloyd refused to lose him before he could even find another solution. That was why he revealed the discussion with the King of Hell, including the latter’s decision to make the restoration of destiny begin earlier, how it was now unstoppable, and how the triggers for the phenomenon needed to be dealt with. He didn’t hide anything besides the cause of the phenomenon.

“That is how you came up with the idea of using the Asrahan Core Technique as a way the treat the queen’s left arm,” observed Javier after hearing the whole story.

“You’re right,” agreed Lloyd.

“Hmm.”

“What? Do you not like it?” asked Lloyd.

“No, I am concerned. You should know that she has no chance of properly learning the Asrahan Core Technique.”

“Yeah, I know,” said Lloyd as he nodded, feeling the hot air in the sky. He knew it well. Of course. “The Asrahan Core Technique is a specialized skill for mana absorption, circulation, and discharge. That means she will have to relearn all of her skills. Her mana circulation system and mana circle will need to be restructured.”

It was true. The process of learning the the technique was developing the foundation of a mana circulation system. It was the same for Lloyd when he first started learning it.

It was easy for me since I was a complete novice at the time without a manaheart. If I were a painting, I would be a blank piece of white paper.

That made the job a lot easier, and he was able to learn the technique without much struggle. But Javier had a difficult time as he was a high-level sword expert.

The process was a lot harder for him than me since he had to unlearn everything and start from scratch. It was comparable to trying to change the underdrawing of a nearly finished painting. Honestly, it was at an impossible level of difficulty.

But Javier did it. There was no grand secret behind his success.

He’s a genius swordsman that will be remembered in history. Tsk.

This was the reason people were afraid of geniuses. The knight could perform feats that would be impossible for anyone else as if they were nothing. When it came to swordsmanship and its related subjects, Javier was a genius or perhaps a monster.

But the queen is different. Without a doubt, she’s an excellent swordswoman. But she’s not quite as brilliant as Javier.

Moreover, Queen Alicia had already become a swordmaster a long time ago. To give an analogy, she was akin to a perfectly finished painting that had been put into a frame. For her to learn the Asrahan Core Technique, it would be no different than having to redo her entire underdrawing while not damaging the finished painting within the borders of her frame.

The chance of success would be one in a million, close to impossible. Her circumstances made it far more difficult for her to learn the technique than Javier, and she was considerably less talented than him.

“I suppose you have a plan in mind, given that you will continue moving forward despite being aware of this,” said Javier.

“Somewhat,” Lloyd said, pleased that Javier could understand him without any lengthy explanation. It must have been the time the two spent together. “Your guess is correct. It will be a tedious process, but one that’s worth trying.”

“I see.” Javier nodded. “Let us do it your way, Young Master.”

“Really? Are you sure you won’t be upset?”

“Yeah, I am fine.” Javier turned and faintly smiled at Lloyd. “In the first place, we both made it together, so it is not just mine to begin with. You have joint rights to it, Master Lloyd. And...”

“And?”

“I know that you are not suggesting this for your personal gain.”

“Hmm.”

“I know that you are doing it for the lord, your family, and everyone else that’s involved. I know that you are acting this way, knowing you will sometimes appear selfish and be criticized as sly or manipulative.

“Hmm...”

“I will trust you, Master Lloyd. Please act on your plan if you have something in mind. I will help you to the best of my abilities.”

“Hmm...”

“Master Lloyd...?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.”

“Why are you giving me that strange look?”

“Oh, I was just wondering how you can manage to be this cheesy.”

“...”

“Be honest. You aren’t Javier, right? The Javier that I know would never compliment me so openly. He thoroughly enjoys chewing me up and spitting me out. At the very least, he isn’t someone who would suck up to me.”

“...”

“If not, did you secretly invest in stocks? Or did you buy betcoins and lose money on it?

“I do not know about the stocks, betcoin, or whatever it was. But...”

“But what?”

“I never expected to regret what I said so soon.”

“Right?”

“Yes, truly.”

“See? There was no need for the toe-curling words.”

Javier’s brows furrowed after his first defeat in a long time.

A mischievous smile appeared on Lloyd’s mouth. “Anyway, I know that you’re willing to help, so I’ll carry out my plan. Although, I’m strictly doing this for personal gain and not the greater good.”

“Is that so...?”

“Uh-huh. Of course.” Lloyd nodded. “Think about it. No one in this world is happy about sacrificing their life for someone else. I’m not a saint. I’m just doing this to live a peaceful life of absolute leisure.”

He was only half-serious about it. He was not anyone great like a police officer, firefighter, or another brave citizen who willingly risked their lives for others. He was just a normal person who wanted to become rich and have a long, normal life in good health. An ordinary man whose goal was to live a luxurious and hearty life. Although he didn’t want to cause harm to anyone, he didn’t want to save countless people, bravely sacrifice himself, pledge himself to the greater good, or act like he was a hero in any other way. The thought of it made his toes curl and sent a chill down his spine.

That’s not the kind of person I am. Honestly, it makes me feel guilty to embellish myself that way.

Lloyd shook off his chills. “So, it’s decided. We’re going to teach her the Asrahan Core Technique.”

Fwoosh! Lloyd then encouraged Ggoming to fly faster, and when they arrived at the Hell gate connected to the North Pole, they entered and felt the biting coldness. There, they hopped on Draggy’s back. “To the south!”

The flight path changed to the south, across the North Pole sea, enormous range, woodlands, farmland, and cities, until they arrived at the capital, when Lloyd immediately entered the palace and demanded an audience with the queen.

“Hmm... It appears we meet quite frequently these days.”

“Hahaha, don’t we?”

Lloyd was greeted with a grin from Lord Chamberlain as if he were the man's regular customer for business. His request for an audience was quickly granted, and he was taken to the queen's office.

"I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera County, am honored to be in the audience of the rightful owner of this land."

Queen Magentano, who was reviewing the report in her office, chuckled and replied, "You are here again, Lloyd Frontera."

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"I wonder what you want from me this time." Her voice sounded reproachful and seemed to demand Lloyd to get straight to the point about whatever it was that he wanted.

Lloyd smiled bitterly and revealed, "Yes, Your Majesty. But this time, I came for a matter about you, not me."

"For me?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"Interesting. Go on."

"I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty. I have found a way to treat your left arm."

"My left arm?" Her face froze.

Lloyd nodded nonchalantly. "Yes, Your Majesty. But..."

"But what?"

"There is one tedious element with the treatment I found, which you have to shoulder."

"What could that tedious thing be?"

“Do I have your permission to tell you?”

“Tell me.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd lowered his head again. Their conversation from here on out was what really mattered. The surefire way for Queen Magentano to overcome the impossible and perfect the Asrahan Core Technique. “Please forgive me for what I am about to say, but you will have to be stuck with me for every minute of the next two months.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 368: How to Redo an Underdrawing (2)

“Please forgive me for what I am about to say, but you have to be stuck with me for every minute of the next two months.”

Lloyd’s sharp and straightforward response silenced Queen Magentano. For a brief moment, she considered hitting his head with an ink bottle or dislocating his jaw with her bare hands. However, she quickly simmered down.

This is the kind of person he is. A madman who spouts nonsense without a second thought.

That was how it had always been until now. His ideas seemed like insanity at first glance, but they frequently turned out to be genius in the long run. It was a mischievous quirk that was unique to Lloyd.

“Ha. Seriously...” A chuckle escaped her. “You are saying I have to spend the entirety of the next two months with you?”

“Yes, that is true, Your Majesty.”

“If I do, you say my left arm will heal.” Her voice dripped with doubt.

“That will likely be the case, Your Majesty.”

“Likely?” She frowned. “You are not sure yet.”

“The matter at hand is not something I can dare make any promises about, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“That sounds like you’re saying it’s nothing more than a possibility.”

“Even so, we should grasp at whatever possibility within our reach,” Lloyd said, his voice growing serious in response to her question. Possibility. Yes, they had to grasp onto it. At the very least, their attempt would allow them to confirm if it was an illusion or something more. It was especially important to make an effort during times like now when there was not a single other option in sight.

From what I observed in the Ending Spoiler, the queen tried all sorts of different things when she realized her left arm was paralyzed and starting to decay. However, it all failed.

Lloyd had to step in as the palace and the queen herself were unable to find a remedy for her condition. In a way, he was the only possible hope they had.

I have to convince her.

He knew failure to persuade her would lead to the loss of her arm and fall from grace. Keeping this in mind, he carefully chose his words as he started to speak again.

“I am sure you remember the time when I was frantically absorbing mana.”

“Hmm. Of course, I remember. I do not often go through such a horrific experience.”

“...”

“Relax. It is all in the past, and you saved me in the end. Anyhow, am I right to suppose this must have something to do with your suggestion?” asked Queen Magentano gently.

“Absolutely, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“Are you possibly planning to absorb my mana like that time?”

“It is the opposite, Your Majesty.” Lloyd found it easy to talk to Alicia as the latter was always quick to catch on just like now. She swiftly understood his intentions without the need for long, flowery explanations. Lloyd politely lowered his head. “As a matter of fact, the mana utilization method I used then is called the Asrahan Core Technique.”

“The Asrahan Core Technique?” repeated the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty. As you can tell from its name, the technique was created by Sir Javier Asrahan, and I gave him a little help with perfecting it at the end.”

“Hmm. Interesting. A technique that led to the birth of a grandmaster and swordmaster.” Her eyes lit up the moment Lloyd began to talk about the technique. She was truly born to be a swordswoman.

Suppressing the smile on his lips, he said, “Yes, Your Majesty. That technique is what allowed me and Sir Asrahan to become who we are today.”

“What is so special about it?”

“It specializes in the absorption, processing, circulation, and discharging of mana.”

“Just like when you were absorbing my mana before?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd sensed that he had attracted her attention. Now, it was time to get straight to the main point. “That made me dare have the thought of teaching the Asrahan Core Technique to you.”

“You want to teach me that technique?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Do you think it will cure my left arm?” she asked, genuinely curious.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Good. Their conversation was flowing fairly nicely, Lloyd thought. “For the next two months, I will stay by your side every minute of every day. We’ll tie one of our hands together so I may continuously circulate my mana in your left arm.”

“Then?”

“Your symptoms will improve as mana begins to circulate in your arm again.”

“Are you certain?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“What comes next?” she asked.

“I will also teach you the Asrahan Core Technique.”

“That sounds like it’ll be difficult for me to learn.”

“I understand what you are saying, Your Majesty. You surely perfected your mana circulation system while becoming a swordmaster a long time ago. I know that it is nearly impossible to relearn such a foundational technique.”

“If that’s true, how can I learn the technique?” asked Queen Magentano.

“Through our bound hands, you will certainly be able to do so by having your body memorize the pathway of mana that I guide through it,” explained Lloyd.

“To put it another way, you will lay down the basic foundation for me to learn, but the rest is up to me.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty,” Lloyd hung his head down. At the same time, he sensed something.

All right. I won her over.

Lloyd could feel that the queen was willing to take up the offer but slightly hesitant. Sometime later, she asked with a troubled face, “I see what you are proposing. It is extremely appealing. However, there is one thing bothering me.”

“If I may dare speak, could you be concerned about how the people around you may react, Your Majesty?”

“Indeed,” she said, a sad smile on her face. “As you know, I do not have a lover. That’s why people may… misunderstand our relationship if I spend two months stuck together day and night with a man, a subject of mine and a public official at that, whom I have not even promised a future with.”

“You are certainly right, Your Majesty.” Lloyd accepted the queen’s point. It was actually something Lloyd was worried about beforehand and undoubtedly needed to go over.

This would create a scandal for even an ordinary young noble lady. So, it goes without saying for Queen Alicia who’s the queen of the kingdom as her title suggests. She is probably completely against getting swept into such a scandal and becoming the subject of gossip.

It wouldn’t be a small scandal. It would directly affect the dignity of the queen herself. Lloyd, however, had a plan in mind. “Your Majesty, there is nothing to worry about.”

“It sounds like you have a plan in mind.”

“Absolutely, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“Tell me.”

“I do not doubt your excellent leadership, charisma, and governance. Furthermore, I have unwavering faith in your incredible political leadership and persuasion abilities. This is my source of hope and the plan I have in mind, Your Majesty,” Lloyd said as he bowed his head down.

“Tsk.” She clicked her tongue and muttered. “In summary, you are handing over the problem to me so that I can deal with it.”

“I am filled with gratitu... no, I mean, please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Are you truly sorry?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Haah. I might as well hammer a nail through your tongue...”

“Your Majesty?” gasped Lloyd.

“No, I was talking to myself.”

Lloyd did hear everything she said but chose not to respond, knowing that she would embrace his proposal and take care of any potential scandal on her own.

At last, she nodded. “I see.”

“That means...”

“I see how sly, irritating, and vile you are.”

“...”

“Besides that, I see your suggestion is not entirely bad, even if it comes with a bit of a scandal. I will also not deny that your help may be the one I need most at the moment.”

“So...” asked Lloyd again.

“I will accept your offer.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.” It was done. Lloyd felt relieved, so he bowed. “I shall now begin preparing for-”

“Prepare?” she asked sharply.

“Your Majesty?” Lloyd lifted his head in surprise and saw the mysterious smile on her face.

“We could start right away. Is there a need for a particularly grand preparation?”

“Uhm, that is because-”

“You said it yourself,” she said. “This is a good treatment method for my left arm. And so, there is no need for any additional preparation which could lead to a delay. Am I wrong?”

“...”

Lloyd wanted to deny her words and say he needed some time to prepare. However, he couldn’t. She cocked her head to the side. “Is there a separate process that you have not told me about?”

“That is not true, but-”

“But what?”

“I am not mentally prepared...”

She gave him a stern look.

“Never mind, Your Majesty. I shall get right to it. Immediately.”

“Good,” she finally said with a smile. Lloyd broke out in a cold sweat at her eagerness. The situation was moving far faster than he had anticipated.

I thought she would be more embarrassed, resistant, or hesitant. So, I expected the queen to need a lot of coaxing to agree with my plan.

But what happened was the exact opposite of that. The queen was extremely eager to start treatment right away. In fact, she was urging him to move faster.

She gets a 10/10 in proactiveness. Wow.

Lloyd understood her proactive attitude after imagining how stressed she must have been about her left arm all alone without anyone to share her concerns with.

“Yes, Your Majesty. We can start right away,” said Lloyd.

“All right. Then, what should I do now?”

“First, we must bind our hands together like I have mentioned earlier.”

“My left hand and your right hand?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd swiftly examined the workplace for the leather strap used to bind paper bundles and said, “I will transfer mana into you through my bound hand.”

“Are you going to circulate the mana in my left arm?” guessed Queen Magentano.

“Yes, Your Majesty. At the same time, I will closely observe and analyze the circulatory pathway of mana that has already been finalized by you.”

She observed, “And based on your findings, you will find where the foundation for the Asrahan Core Technique can be established.”

“You are certainly right, Your Majesty.”

“It’s a similar process to surveying or developing a design, which are your specialties.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“I see. Begin immediately.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. May I...” Lloyd approached the queen, who extended her left hand in a slightly awkward manner. He could not tell if it was due to her paralysis or because she was feeling hesitant. He tried not to mind and extended his right hand. However, he flinched as their fingers touched before moving on to grab her entire hand, which was surprisingly warm.

“Why are you hesitating?” She blurted before clasping their hands tightly. “Tie it quickly.”

“Understood, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd then attempted to tie their hands, but doing so with his left hand proved so difficult that his mind went blank. This necessitated the assistance of the queen’s right hand, and they were barely able to create a secure knot.

“I cannot believe how difficult this is. We should avoid untying ourselves unless it’s absolutely necessary,” she stated.

“I agree with you...” Lloyd was still dazed when he realized their hands were securely clasped together, his hand slightly numb. “I don’t have much blood circulating in my hand.”

“Is that uncomfortable for you?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty. However-”

“However what?”

“I was afraid that you might find it so.”

“I am fine. We must untie ourselves when we wash ourselves, use the bathroom, or change clothes anyway.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Then what is the problem?”

“Nothing at all, Your Majesty. I will start the treatment right away,” he said, his cheeks burning up because this method proved to be a million times more embarrassing than he had anticipated, and he was ready to act to alleviate the awkwardness when...

“Wait,” she said, pulling her left hand and interfering with the flow of mana going through it. Lloyd lifted his head to see what it was now and saw her smiling. “Before that, I just remembered a matter of grave importance that you must attend to tonight.”

“Your Majesty?”

“This way.” She jerked her left arm even harder, gaining entire control of Lloyd, who was flopped down on the office chair later.

“Your Majesty?”

“Shh...” She then sat on the chair beside it, dragged it forward, and leaned forward, bringing her face closer to Lloyd, who felt her breath for a split second and wondered if he needed to move back. Something was then inserted into his hand – a pen.

“Your Majesty?” Lloyd mumbled.

She stared at him with an intense gaze. “What is wrong? This can’t be your first time using a pen.”

“That is, of course-”

“Then, do as I say,” ordered Queen Magentano.

The amused smile on her face piqued Lloyd’s interest, and he found his heart racing as he watched her smile.

Have you lost your mind? Are you nuts? Get it together.

Lloyd fought hard to stay strong and locked to his goals, which were to date an ordinary girl and live a happy life with children. He struggled to not envision marrying the queen, going on a honeymoon, the number of children they would have, and so on...

“Okay, these are documents that require your signature, and that is mine,” Queen Magentano said.

Lloyd was jostled out of his trance with her piercing voice. He immediately woke up. “Your Majesty?” He then looked at her, who was directing her gaze on the pile of documents on the desk.

“Sign it,” she said.

“Your Majesty?”

“I said, sign it.”

This bundle of documents? An ominous feeling gripped Lloyd. His hunch turned out to be right.

Her playful smile grew wider. “Since you and I must stay together for a long period of time, I believe this will be very convenient. You will not say it is difficult just because you are signing it with your left hand, will you? My signature is very plain, as you can see.”

“Ah, um-”

“Sign everything.”

“All of these documents?” gasped Lloyd.

“Of course.”

“...”

“Do not even think about going to sleep before you finish.”

“...”

Lloyd inwardly begged to be spared from the chore, but it was futile. The night was long, and the documents were numerous. He signed them with his shaky left hand while the queen watched him with a glow of satisfaction that he could not tell was from making him do her work or seeing him struggle through it. In any case, the night was really far too long.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 369: For Better or Worse (1)

A new morning arrived. Lloyd opened his bloodshot eyes.

“...”

His back ached, and his shoulders hurt. There was tension in his thigh, and his right hand felt numb. Well, he should have expected the pain.

I slept in this position on my stomach the whole night. Argh.

He could not lie down on the bed since his hand was tied to the queen’s, and lying down meant lying next to her on the same bed.

If I dared did that... it would only be right for me to be executed.

He was eventually forced to place a chair alongside the bed, with his legs and lower torso on the chair and his upper torso and right arm stretched on the bed, much like how he used to lie down in school. Naturally, he could not get much sleep.

I barely got any sleep.

He sighed again because sleeping in this posture was impossible, and to make matters worse, he had to keep injecting his own mana into her left arm as promised, which proved to be more difficult.

It’s a tough job to push my mana in her because Alicia’s manaheart is bigger than mine.

Mana, like water and air, flowed from areas of high pressure to areas of low pressure, and because her manaheart was larger than his, the pressure was higher and stronger, which meant Lloyd had to be careful how he injected mana into her left arm. Otherwise, the flow of mana reversed each time he lost concentration, and her mana traveled into his system.

I can’t let that happen. I have to continue giving her my mana. The mana needs to continuously circulate in the queen’s left arm even if it’s by force.

In other words, it was similar to a blood donation in that he had to supply as much mana as possible. So, Lloyd could not lose his focus and had to stay up the entire night to concentrate on the task, which explained his sleep deprivation.

“Did you not get a good night’s sleep either, Your Majesty?”

“Of course not,” she said, still laying on the bed, her head inclined toward his side, her eyes bloodshot like his, as if she had not gotten any sleep either. “I could not sleep because of you,” she muttered.

“Your Majesty?”

“Your body ran hot sometimes, only for it to turn cold, prickly, then uselessly soft.”

“Oh... um.”

“I meant my left arm,” she clarified. “My arm felt strange as it kept receiving your mana.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Forgive me, my foot,” she huffed.

“...”

“And how you moaned in pain all night! I considered asking if giving me mana was that exhausting of a job but decided against it since doing so might place more burden on you.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“Gratitude, my foot.”

“...”

“How was your sleep?” she asked.

“That is...”

“You can be honest.”

“It was extremely uncomfortable, Your Majesty.”

“I knew it. You should have told me.”

“How could I-”

“Ask to lie on the same bed?” she interrupted first.

“...”

“I guess I am right. You should have asked,” she said with a chuckle.

Contrary to her nonchalance, Lloyd’s heart beat fast. “But Your Majesty, it is indecent-”

“Is it not indecent that you spent the night with me in the same bedroom already?”

“...”

“You have committed a grave crime of treason by spending last night alone with me, the queen. Did you not expect this when you proposed it to me?”

“I did,” confessed Lloyd.

“You did?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Then, why do you look so shy?”

“Ehem, I am in your presence in closed quarters.”

“You must have been embarrassed,” she said, finally understanding Lloyd.

“No, Your Majesty!”

“You must have been shy then.”

“Not at all, Your Majesty!”

“Really?”

“Of course, Your Majesty!” Lloyd argued firmly.

“Why do you dare to raise your voice in my presence then?”

“Ack...”

“Ha, I understand. I know how you feel. Seeing how you are denying my words so desperately, I can tell what you are thinking.”

“Your Majesty!”

“I will have the Lord Great Chamberlain prepare a makeshift bed for you, which will be placed beside mine, and you will feel less pressured because we will not be sharing a single bed.”

“W-Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk. How you only say that when you want something,” she mumbled as she turned to his side. Unlike her usual appearance, her hair was in a naturally disheveled state, her eyes toward him sparkled under the morning sunlight, and she was dressed comfortably.

“Um,” hurriedly uttered Lloyd. “I have to change my clothes now. I need to untie our hands, Your Majesty.”

“You should. The Lord Great Chamberlain will pass out if he ever finds us like this.”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd, “I believe the least we could do to prevent him from passing out is wearing our daily clothes.”

“I agree with you.”

When Lloyd loosened the rope, he discovered marks around his wrist. As he massaged his wrist, the queen walked across the enormous bedroom, and he soon heard the rustling noise of her changing clothing. “But I have a question for you.”

“Yes, Your Majesty?”

“Why you?” she asked.

“Your Majesty?”

“Why did you bind yourself with me instead of using Javier Asrahan? The question came to me last night when I was thinking to myself instead of sleeping. You said the Asrahan Core Technique was created by Sir Javier Asrahan, so I figured he must be far more adept in its use.”

“Yes, that is the case, Your Majesty.” Lloyd was quick to admit.

“He should be. Plus, he is a grandmaster.”

“You are certainly right, Your Majesty.”

“Then, why you?”

“Hmm, that is...” Lloyd stopped short of revealing the honest answer, which was that Javier was too gorgeous for this, but he disregarded it and said with a logical and sensible answer, “As Your Majesty knows, he is a genius in swordsmanship.”

“I am aware of that. He is not just any genius.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. I believe he is someone who will be remembered throughout history. That is the reason.”

“Is it because he is too much of a genius? Or because he cannot understand the perspective of an ordinary person?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd replied, nodding and speaking toward the partition where she was standing. “To him, the Asrahan Core Technique is as simple as breathing, which means he will not easily understand the challenges you and I will face. He will only wonder why we cannot do something so easy.”

“Ha. You are right. His perspective must be different from ours to begin with.”

“Truly yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd replied. Javier was the genius among the geniuses. It was only natural that he would not understand why she was having so much difficulty. To him, the entire job would be as simple and ordinary as drinking and eating. Any challenge she faced would be a mystery in his eyes.

“As such, I have been entrusted with this grave duty in place of Javier Asrahan.”

“Hmm.”

“Moreover, I judged that it is more advantageous for me to take the job as I devised the plan and would be allowed to judge the situation, given how significant the success is in this job.”

“Hmm...”

“Moreover, please forgive me for saying this, but I am more immune to the scandals that may arise,” explained Lloyd further.

“Hmm...”

“Your Majesty?”

“What?” she snapped.

“Why do you only ‘Hmm’ instead of saying more?”

“Nothing. I just happen to find your excuses to be pathetic.”

“Your Majesty?”

“Would it not be enough to say, ‘I just wanted to’?”

“Your Majesty...?”

“Answer me or we will spend the entire day training.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. I wanted to take this job. I wanted to be beside you more than he did. I am serious.”

“Tsk. Is that how much you hate our training?”

“...”

“Anyway, I understand how genuine your concern is for me. Come here then.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd walked to her side.

Now dressed in her usual clothes, she held out her hand. “Tie us now.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Tying their hands together proved to be extremely difficult once again. Right when he finished, the sound of a bell came from outside of the bedroom.

Cling. Cling. Two ringing noises came from outside the bedroom. “Your Majesty, the rightful owner of this kingdom, I am here to greet you in the morning.”

“Get in,” naturally answered Queen Magentano.

Lloyd imagined her giving the same reply every day. The bedroom door opened to let in the Lord Great Chamberlain and a group of maids to tidy her up for the day. But everyone froze.

“Your Majesty...?”

Lloyd noticed the shiver in the man’s lips and how the latter’s face gradually grew paler with each passing second.

“Y-Your Majesty!” The old man’s eyes moved in utter dismay. One glance at the queen. And the other one at Lloyd. He did it once again. One glance at the queen. And a glare at Lloyd.

“Ehem. Hmm!” Lloyd cleared his throat to act as natural as possible.

But Queen Magentano was utterly composed. “Why are you surprised?”

“Your... Majesty...” The great servant stuttered. “It is...”

“Are you surprised to find Lloyd Frontera with me so early in the morning?”

“That is...”

“Or are you shocked by the possibility that I seemed to have spent the night with him?”

“Th-That’s...”

“It is all right. Your guesses are right,” affirmed Queen Magentano.

“Y-Your Majesty!”

“Tsk,” she said. “Nothing that you are imagining happened. We are doing this for a good reason.”

Her reaction was even more unexpected than Lloyd had anticipated. She acted as though the entire matter were trivial and unimportant. “What is the big deal? Would you dare try to meddle in choosing my future spouse if we are what you think we are?”

“That is not true, but-”

“Yes, I know,” she said softly. “You must be concerned about the reputation and honor of the imperial family. Rest assured that this is nothing of the sort that requires your concern.” She chuckled. “Do you see how our hands are tied? We are doing a special joint training together to pave a new path of swordsmanship.”

“I see that your hands are tied, Your Majesty,” replied Lord Great Chamberlain.

“That is the proof. As such, continue your daily business like you always have.”

“I am at your service, Your Majesty... Then... How do you wish to arrange the clothes and breakfast?”

“As you can see, I have finished dressing myself. I will come down for my meal. Oh, but I need help with my makeup.”

“At your service, Your Majesty.” The Lord Great Chamberlain hung his head, breaking out in a cold sweat. He seemed half-dazed by the unexpected scene.

Ha... I showed him something unsightly there.

Lloyd felt apologetic as he watched the old man hurry out.

“Oh, and one more thing.” Her voice stopped him short. “Tell the House of Peers that I will visit them soon.”

“Your Majesty?” The Lord Great Chamberlain’s eyes widened at the unexpected order.

She smiled at him. “Why are you surprised? Did you really think that we would just sneak around inside the palace like this?”

“Yes, Your Majesty, of course-”

“This is a part of our training, and I have no plans to hide it from anyone else,” she gravely announced.

“...”

“Just as you reacted, the House of Peers will seriously consider this training method between myself and Lloyd Frontera. As such, I shall pay them a visit and put an end to any of their suspicions in advance.” Her demeanor could not be more confident. It appeared to Lloyd that she was about to split open the head of anyone who opposed their relationship.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 370: For Better or Worse (2)

“Um... Your Majesty...”

“Tell me,” said Queen Magentano.

“Please forgive me for saying this, but it looks like everyone is in deep shock.”

“They should be.” The corners of her lips rose.

Lloyd sighed and took in his surroundings. He noted the heavy silence in the conference room of the House of Peers. Despite that, the space was quite crowded with people, and it was difficult to spot any open seats. Everyone was packed inside like they were college students gathered in a classroom for a lecture from a popular professor.

Tsk. I always see the same sight every time I come. That is, the sight of everyone in a shocked state of silence.

Lloyd put on a wry smile as he could clearly relate to their expressions of complete bewilderment.

It’s understandable. Everyone would have assumed this was just another visit from the queen to discuss something with them.

They would have likely expected it to be a normal day. Her visit would have been nothing particularly special until she emerged with her hand tied to one of Lloyd’s.

I hope no one is going to frame me as a traitor who deserves to be killed.

Of course, no one would do that since they would likely be raising issues with the queen, not him. And his prediction was proven right a few seconds later.

“Y-your Majesty! What is this?” Duke Toscano, the first one to come to his senses, stuttered, breaking the heavy silence amongst the shocked nobles in the room.

She then replied, “I understand that all of you are terrified to find me and Lloyd Frontera like this. But there is nothing to be surprised.” In a more confident voice, she added, “I am informing you right now that we will spend the next two months tied together by our hands. However, this is nothing romantic and only a part of our training to pave a new path of sword mastery.”

After exchanging glances with the others, Duke Toscano finally said, “But Your Majesty,” as he wiped the perspiration from his face with a handkerchief. “Please forgive me for saying this, but the long-standing tradition and law of the kingdom dictate that an unmarried queen must follow proper formalities and procedures when choosing a partner-”

“Duke Toscano,” she growled as her eyes grew serious. “I did clearly mention that this is not an act of romance, did I not?”

“Oh...” Duke Toscano sealed his lips.

“Do you not trust my words?”

“That is certainly not the case, Your Majesty.”

She then observed the room. Her mouth eventually curved into a smile. “Did I go too far against common sense?” She, too, could understand the dismay on their faces. After all, she and Lloyd Frontera were not married. To anyone with common sense, the declaration to spend the next two months holding hands would be ill-received and interpreted as a behavior between a couple. Feeling the need to stress that this was just training, she emphasized, “I see what your concern is. Even if I say it is training, it will not be received the same way in the outside world. This is something you are worried about, correct?”

Duke Toscano was glad that she understood. “Your Majesty is truly wise. That is what we are worried about.”

“Are you also worried about the diminishing dignity and status of my royal house outside the country?” she asked again.

“Truly yes, Your Majesty,” replied Duke Toscano as he hung his head down. The other nobles looked like this concern was universal in this room.

But she simply chuckled. “Let them do so.”

“Your Majesty...?” Duke Toscano winced in surprise.

“Their worthless opinions do not matter to me because I believe that improving my sword skills is the only practical power to save my royal house. I could care less about how people outside my kingdom perceive me because they cannot interfere with my kingdom’s affairs.” She spoke in an adamant voice.

“But Your Majesty...” Duke Toscano stopped short before finishing.

“Do tell.”

“Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty. I fully understand your will. I have no inkling of doubt as well that your betterment will strengthen the prowess of this kingdom. But Lloyd Frontera is...”

“What about him?” she asked.

Duke Toscano stole a glance at Lloyd before speaking. “It is undeniable that he is a very talented man. However, when compared to your exceptional skills...”

“What?”

“I dare say... he cannot help you with your swordsmanship training at his skill level...”

“You are worried about the fact that this sword level is not at the level to help me, yes?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” the duke said, lowering his head further. The others lightly nodded as if they shared his sentiment. There was no doubt that she was training; that much was clear. But that Lloyd Frontera was assisting her in her training? They thought he was too weak to help her.

She chuckled as she scanned everyone and grinned contentedly. “Oh, I guess the news has not reached you yet. I tell you now. Lloyd Frontera has become a swordmaster.” She smiled as if the accomplishment were hers.

There was another ripple of shock in the room. Everyone fell into silence.

Lloyd Frontera has become a swordmaster?

Their stupefied gazes traveled to Lloyd.

How?

The whole situation defied basic reason. Swordmasters were extremely uncommon, and throughout history, aristocrats and knight families made every effort to raise their offsprings to be swordmasters. However, their success rate was pitifully low and their efforts never proportionately translated to that level of mastery.

A whole family could prosper with wealth and fame just by nurturing one swordmaster... That is how powerful and rare of an existence they are.

Swordmasters were so important that the mere presence of one deterred invasions from other nations, and the presence of several even outshined the strength of a regional military.

Lloyd Frontera has become a swordmaster?

It was shocking news as no one had ever heard a rumor or hearsay about Lloyd’s swordsmanship before. They could not believe it, even though the announcement had come from the queen.

“Lloyd Frontera,” called Queen Magentano as if she read their minds. “Prove yourself.”

“Your words are my command.” Lloyd then awkwardly took the sword that she handed to him.

Just then.

Fwoooosh! A brilliant ray of light appeared and wrapped around the sword like a torch on fire, and Queen Magentano spoke to put the matter to rest once and for all. “This has to be proof of Lloyd Frontera’s mastery in sword fighting and the veracity of my words. Does anyone still wish to voice out their opposition?”

Of course, there was no one. Since Lloyd Frontera was now confirmed to be a sword master, it would be the same as insulting the queen’s authority if they tried to dispute and argue against her. Everyone lowered their heads in quiet, and the corners of her lips showed on her face.

“I am delighted to be acknowledged by all of you. I deeply appreciate that you are on board with me.”

Her words felt like a gavel hitting the board to give a verdict to a matter in their ears, and this declaration was non-negotiable. Just like that, along with the announcement of yet another sword master in the Magentano Kingdom, the contentious and ebullient training between Queen Magentano and Lloyd began.

♣

“Your Majesty,” said Lloyd, “Take a deep breath.”

“Like this?” Hmph!

“Excellent, Your Majesty,” commented Lloyd humbly as he concentrated.

Ziiing! His right hand thrust the amplified mana from the manaheart into her left hand as one mana circle spun.

Great. I see it.

This allowed Lloyd to see and feel the mana circulation flow in her left arm.

It’s worse than I thought.

Lloyd swallowed dryly. Her left arm was in a more serious condition than he expected upon examination.

The mana isn’t circulating from below her shoulder.

While the rest of the circulatory system, including lymph flow and blood flow, was within normal limits, the mana’s circulation path was either obstructed or clogged, and Lloyd had no idea what was causing this, but he could foretell the consequences.

Once the mana supply is cut, the arm will start to die. That will lead it to paralyze and decay.

With a sense of relief that he was familiar with the Asrahan Core Technique, he infused her arm with additional mana and set about clearing the obstructions.

“Ouch.” She pulled her arm a little as if the process stung.

Lloyd’s gaze turned worrisome. “Please do not move, Your Majesty.”

“How about talking like this?” she asked.

“That is fine, Your Majesty.”

“Why is that?”

“Because the key here is that you do not move your left arm.”

“So, smacking your head with my right arm is not a problem?”

“That seems to be a grave problem, Your Majesty.”

“Why is that? Did you not say that I can move any part of my body other than my left arm?”

“That will hurt my feelings, Your Majesty.”

“...”

“Hahaha...” Lloyd laughed awkwardly.

“...”

“Please do not kill me.”

“It is enough that you are self-aware of your wrongdoing. Tell me, is this supposed to hurt?” asked Queen Magentano.

“Does it hurt a lot?” asked Lloyd worriedly.

“Hmph, I would say it stings rather than hurts. It feels like a hot nail is being drilled into my bones.”

“That sounds easily worse than a sting,” observed Lloyd.

“My patience and strength do not permit me to fuss over such a sensation like this.”

“Hmm... How about this, Your Majesty?” Lloyd then gave her some more mana.

“Ack!” she screamed in agony, but her humiliation was clear: her cheeks turned scarlet and her eyes gleamed with a threatening menace. “You must want to die.”

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty,” Lloyd said politely, but he was hesitant to back down so quickly since this was his only opportunity to annoy the queen of a kingdom lawfully.

“Ouch!” She winced again.

‘“This is all a part of treatment, so please forgive this lowly servant with your endless generosity and virtue. I shall then be overwhelmed with gratitude and obey you even more than before.”

“Ouch!!”

Lloyd pumped more mana into her arm with a wide grin. Each time he did, her frown deepened. However, his triumph was fleeting and limited to the daytime he spent treating her. The tables turned at night, and the queen emerged victorious.

“Sign them.”

“...”

The night was long. They untied their hands for a moment to bathe and change into pajamas. From that moment, a hellish mountain of paperwork was waiting to be signed by Lloyd. With his right hand tied to the queen, he was forced to awkwardly write with his trembling, left hand.

“By the way, Your Majesty?” called Lloyd.

“Yes?”

“Come to think of it, there is something strange,” expressed Lloyd.

“What is it that you find it strange?”

“Why do you take pleasure in teasing me?” asked Lloyd politely.

“You are curious about that?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm. That is a very simple question.”

“Could you please enlighten me?” asked Lloyd.

“That is no problem. I find you truly annoying.”

“Your Majesty?” Lloyd looked at her, clearly surprised to hear her.

“Even right now. I feel spiteful seeing those round eyes of yours. I am nearly overcome with the desire to hit the back of your chestnut-shaped head.”

Shocked, Lloyd looked away.

“And when you look away in surprise just like now, I wish to challenge you to a duel.”

“...”

“Now that I am seeing you focus on the paperwork, clearly regretting your choice to ask, I suddenly want to harass you until morning and deprive you of sleep.”

“...”

“Are you bored of signing papers? I can see that your hand is not moving fast.”

“...!”

Scribble! The night turned to morning as Lloyd’s fingers worked at the speed of light. But when the sun went down again, he was compelled to sign the bundle of documents once more. In an instant, two months went by, and finally, they started to see the results of their training.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 371: Bearing Fruit (1)

“Holy.”

“Speak,” said the queen.

“Moly.”

“I just asked about my condition.”

“Guacamole.”

“...”

“Oh, forgive me, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd, quickly brushing off the confusion from his face.

It was the end of the second month of training, and the queen’s sharp stare at Lloyd caused him to lift his head and respond.

“Your conditions have improved beyond my expectations.”

“They have?” Replied Queen Magentano.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

The queen nodded. It was true. Lloyd had performed a thorough inspection on the flow of mana within her body as month two finished, and the result was stunning.

“Your accomplishments are far greater than I had anticipated, Your Majesty.”

“Are they?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. Most of the key routes through which Asrahan Core Technique could operate have been established already.”

“Go on,” said the queen.

“There is no need to take the trivial steps that I have had in my mind, anymore.”

“Really?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

This was true as well. When Lloyd had first suggested the two-month training, he was hoping to at least mitigate the paralysis on the queen’s left arm.

Because that was the most I could expect given the situation. She was already an accomplished swordmaster, and learning a new core technique was virtually impossible.

However, it seemed Lloyd’s expectations were completely off.

Major routes through which the Asrahan Core Technique could operate have settled nicely. While the smaller ones still require training, this is astounding. Glimpse of hope? My butt. It’s an entire flood of it!

Lloyd had estimated the queen’s success rate of learning this technique to be less than 10 percent before the training. With the recent accomplishment, however, it was now more like 50 percent.

“Have discomforts on your left arm drastically decreased as of late whenever I injected mana into it?” asked Lloyd, examining the queen’s arm more meticulously.

“They have. I barely feel them anymore.”

“I am inclined to think the physical resistance within your body has subsided, as the routes settled.”

“Hmm. It must be thanks to my natural knack.”

“I am inclined to think it’s thanks to my wonderful talent.”

“Most definitely because of my extraordinary endurance and affinity.”

“My selfless, diligent efforts must be finally paying off.”

“I am astounded by my superior ability to master one thing after another.”

“I am compelled to give a big round of applause to my sacrificial endeavor.”

“So you’re going to keep talking back.”

“Your grace knows no bounds... Please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk. You and your requests for forgiveness in situations like these.”

“Forgive me, but there still is a huge obstacle to overcome, Your Majesty.”

“By a huge obstacle,” said the queen, frowning one eyebrow. “Do you mean the formation of the mana circle you had mentioned a few days ago?”

“Precisely, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd proceeded to explain.

“You have successfully established the framework required for the operation of the Asrahan Core Technique, Your Majesty. However, you still lack the core component in the mana circle.”

“Mana circle...”

“Yes, Your Majesty. That is absolutely necessary for you to operate the technique on your own.”

“Which makes sense. I am still in need of your help because I do not have that,” Queen Magentano nodded.

The lack of the mana circle in her body called for Lloyd’s assistance in operating the Asrahan Core Technique. As soon as the rope binding the hands of the queen and Lloyd was untied, her left arm would feel the discomfort associated with paralysis due to the dissipation of mana.

“So, the formation of the mana circle to consistently provide mana to my left arm through the Asrahan Core Technique on my own would finally seal this dreadful training. Correct?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. Your wisdom knows no bounds.”

“So it is correct?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm.”

“...”

“Hmm.”

“May I ask why you’re staring at me like that, Your Majesty...?”

“So you found the two months you spent with me dreadful.”

“That isn’t...”

“You just said yes to my question. Did you not?”

“...”

“That this dreadful training could finally come to an end?”

“...”

“What a terrible queen I am, for having failed to realize how dreadful and boring it is to stay in training for two whole months.”

“...”

“Isn’t that right?”

Please don’t kill me.

Lloyd trembled like a leaf against the wind, shortly before he overworked his cerebral cortex to come up with a response.

“Ahem. Anyhow, it is true that you must overcome the obstacle of forming a mana circle, to continue curing your left arm through the Asrahan Core Technique.”

“Okay, and?”

“And thanks to the two months of wonderful and joyous training with you, Your Majesty, the results are much better than expected. Since the structure of the mana flow to enable the technique has been nearly established, we should be able to skip the tedious steps and jump right into the last phase.”

“Ha. Is that so?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. I will help with the formation of your mana circle with a quick charge.”

“Okay... a quick charge?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. Do you recall when I absorbed a great amount of your mana in the past?”

“...”

“I will perform something like that again.”

“Tsk.”

“Your Majesty?”

“Go on,” said the queen, after frowning subtly.

She did remember the incident during which she had lost a tremendous amount of mana to Lloyd, as her life was threatened.

Although it shouldn't be as annoying since I haven't been poisoned or anything.

But she certainly did not enjoy the experience. Lloyd continued to elaborate as she reminisced.

"Truth be told, your biggest problem lies in that you are too advanced as a warrior."

"Too advanced?"

"Yes, Your Majesty. To draw an analogy, you're like a completed piece of art."

"And?"

"What would happen, then, if I were to absorb a fair amount of your mana?"

"Hmm. That would create an emptiness of mana here and there, albeit partially."

"That's correct, Your Majesty. The painting on the completed artwork would be removed partially, revealing what's underneath temporarily."

"That is accurate, Your Majesty."

Lloyd put a genuine smile on his face, impressed by the queen's wit yet again.

I tell her about one piece of the puzzle, and she grasps the entire picture.

Lloyd thought she didn't become a swordmaster for nothing and continued.

"I believe now is the best time to summon Sir Javier Asrahan here."

"Sir Javier Asrahan?"

“Yes, Your Majesty. He will stay by our side and make sure we are both safe.”

“Okay. Call him immediately.”

With verbal approval from the queen, Javier, who had been waiting in the room of honored guests, was summoned straight away. The knight’s eyes were a bit red for some reason, however.

“Why are your eyes like that?” Lloyd asked.”

“...”

Javier did not reply. Instead, he gave Lloyd a rather cold stare through those red eyes. Lloyd squinted at the sight and added.

“Come on, it’s been a while since we last met. Don’t be like that.”

“...”

“Please don’t tell me you’re too overjoyed to see me.”

“...”

“Or you’re trying your hardest to hold your tears in.”

“...”

“Tsk. Your feelings were hurt.”

“No.”

“Got you. You responded to that right away.”

“Not at all.”

“Ha. You are clearly upset because I made you stay in the honored guest room for two whole months.”

“...”

“And your insomnia kicked back in because I wasn’t there to sing lullabies each night.”

“My eyes are red because I read until late last night.”

“I didn’t say anything about your eyes though.”

“...”

“You’re so bad at lying sometimes. Let’s get to work anyway. You know why you’re here, right?”

“Yeah. You explained before.”

“Good. You must take a good look at me and Her Majesty.”

“Understood,” Javier nodded, reassuring Lloyd.

Thank goodness I have him with us. I don’t remember anything whenever I use Quick Charge.

He would completely lose himself and fail to realize what would transpire around him, and this could potentially put the queen in danger.

That’s why I need to watch over us.

Javier was the only one who was capable of such a task because he knew the Asrahan Core Technique. Even within the range of the quick charge, the knight was able to disturb the flow of mana, mitigate the animosity, and avoid losing his own. He could also examine and monitor the amount and property of the mana exchanged between Lloyd and the queen, as well as the trend of mana being created and recovered within Her Majesty’s body. This meant that in the event the queen would be in danger, he could inject his mana onto her and secure her safety. Because Javier could perform all of these, he was a security guard required for this specific quick charge session.

“Let’s go.”

They headed down to the royal training arena for the queen, who strictly commanded others not to approach them. After the three of them stopped in the center, Lloyd untied the rope binding them together and sat on the ground facing her.

“Are you ready, Your Majesty?”

“Yeah,” said the queen, nodding with determination in her eyes.

“The partial voids of mana will occur during the process of absorption. Please remember to perform the Asrahan Core Technique onto those voids.”

“I will.”

They made eye contact and understood the preparations were complete. Without further ado, Lloyd opened the status window and activated this ability.

Ding.

[Asrahan Core Technique Option 5: Quick Charge is activated.]

[A large amount of mana will be absorbed from a random target near you.]

That’s when the strange transformation began. Lloyd’s three-way circle began to move like the predator stepping out of its lair, sniffing around to look for suitable prey to satiate the hunger. After finding the victim, the circle opened its vicious mouth and bit without hesitation.

Zing! The mana circle began to absorb mana from all targets in the vicinity in an instant, including Queen Magentano.

Mm...!

The queen inadvertently took an empty breath as soon as the quick charge began. She couldn’t breathe properly. Her vision blurred and she felt pain all over her body, as though she had just fallen from a tree, shortly before sensing an exodus of mana.

Mm... Hmph!

It’s been a while since she last felt this. The queen bit her lips amid the massive headache and opened her eyes widely to remain conscious and focused. She desperately recalled Lloyd’s instructions and performed them.

Partial voids of mana... that will occur during the process... of losing a large amount of mana...

It felt as if she was losing a large sum of blood in an instant, before becoming an empty shell to be shattered in the end. She examined her inner self in agony and deliberately stopped the flow of mana that had constantly been active ever since she became a swordmaster. She then endeavored to identify the void of mana that was supposed to be present. She began to feel it slowly but surely.

There.

It was temporary. In less than one second, a tiny space the size of a pea was spotted. Queen Magentano reacted immediately.

I must hurry.

She rushed her mana and established the foundation of the Asrahan Core Technique, shortly before the void was filled. As soon as the technique did what it was supposed to, another void appeared in a different spot. The queen did not lose track of it and extended the technique onto the new void. One spot in one second became two spots, and then five spots. As the absorption process continued, the speed at which these spots appeared grew at an exponential rate as if a fierce thunderstorm rattled the roof with raindrops. It was a session of immense tension and ferocity. She kept fighting to spot the voids, performed the Core Technique, endured the pain, and held herself together. She hung on and finally succeeded.

“...Urgh!”

Cough! Queen Magentano coughed out a handful of blood, but it did not hurt at all. Rather, it felt great as though fish bones that had been stuck in her throat for a long time were just removed. She felt this great freshness in her heart the moment coughed the blood out, and that was when a two-way seed had formed around her mana heart.

Zing. The seed began to circulate slowly but surely. It rotated, compressed itself, grew bigger, and became denser. It then formed a small, yet gigantic, circular ring, unleashing the light to commemorate its birth.

Zing! A two-way mana circle was formed around the queen's heart just like that. Queen Alicia Termina Magentano, the extremely powerful swordmaster, had finally achieved a double-circle status.

Around the same time, a courier from Namaran was rushing towards the royal capital of Magenta, carrying an urgent message.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 372: Bearing Fruit (2)

Zing!

The flow of mana circulated through the two-way circle and expanded its output, letting out a fierce rattling noise. Queen Magentano opened her eyes at the feeling of the mana flood pounding her body.

She could feel that the clotted mana flow had reopened. It had been reconstructed and reconnected. Mana traveled throughout the body without restraint, passing through the shoulders, palms, and fingers, before returning to the heart, forming a circle.

Zing!

It continued to rotate and regenerate. It spun, expanded, and overflowed. It was literally pounding the queen's body in between her breaths. It was a whole new degree of prowess that she embraced for the first time since she became a swordmaster.

What the...

Queen Magentano was flabbergasted by what was transpiring within her. Everything about her mana flow was changing; the complex, maze-like old routes were being combined and fused to form wider and simpler pathways to connect vital parts of the body.

So this is what the Asrahan Core Technique does.

It was even more astounding to feel it firsthand. She was in awe of the core technique that had produced a grandmaster and a swordmaster. It stirred up ambition within her heart.

If I could raise an army of knights capable of using this technique...

Queen Magentano was positive that her kingdom wouldn't only become the most dominant domain in the entire continent, but conquer the lands and put her banners throughout the world. While it was a fascinating idea, she quickly refuted it and shook her head.

No.

The queen convinced herself that it was a stupid dream, for two reasons. First was the trust she had shared thus far with Lloyd Frontera.

This man went through all this trouble just to cure my paralysis. I can't take advantage of this act of good faith by sharing this technique with others.

She knew she was going to lose more: Lloyd and Javier's loyalty.

Secondly, it won't be beneficial in the long run.

Should she pass down the teachings of the Asrahan Core Technique to knights and soldiers under her command, there was not a shred of a doubt that the Magentano Dynasty would be so dominant in the years to come. However, it wasn't going to last long.

The secrets of this technique will be leaked to other kingdoms, and every individual who could wield a sword would emulate this technique across the entire continent sooner or later.

The relative advantage of having this technique would fade. It was best not to share this with anyone else. It was better to appreciate Lloyd and Javier's trust to pass down this technique to her and embrace it by herself.

"...Phew."

Queen Magentano let out a deep breath after coming to the conclusion. Each time she did, waste energy from her old flow was excreted, purifying the mana flowing through the circle in the process. The paralysis on her left arm, which had caused so much discomfort, quickly faded away.

It's fully healed.

The queen clenched and released her left fist multiple times and lifted her head to glance at Lloyd with confidence. The man was continuing to perform the quick charge.

Whoosh!

She saw an immense amount of mana being absorbed by Lloyd. The sand on the training ground was drying up and leaves flying by crumbled into dust. Yet, Queen Magentano wasn't in any agony despite being physically within the range of quick charge. She wasn't losing mana at all.

So this is what happens if I embrace mana leaving my body, instead of resisting it.

The queen grasped the concept of the circle. She stared at Lloyd again and put a smile on her face, enjoying and appreciating all he was doing for her until the quick charge finally ended.

Ding.

[Asrahan Core Technique Option 5: Quick Charge duration has expired.]

Zing...

The fierce session of mana absorption came to an end, and the mana circle wasn't going wild anymore. Lloyd slowly opened his eyes and looked into the space, searching for the new pop-up message.

[You have fully cured the terminal illness of Queen Magentano through selfless care and efforts over two months.]

[Queen Magentano's left arm was destined to disappear for good due to the predestined flow of fate governed by cause and effect. However, you successfully reinstated mana to her left arm through adequate response, marvelous endeavor, and selfless service.]

[Queen Alicia Termina Magentano was deeply moved by your heroics and began praising you in her own way.]

[You have unlocked a new title.]

Huh?

Having failed to anticipate this, Lloyd quickly rolled his eyes.

[New title <Savior of Magentano> has been unlocked.]

[Savior of Magentano]

[Title Level: Personal Praise]

[You have always looked for me only when you were in need, and I thought it was going to be the same this time around. However, I am overjoyed to admit that I was wrong. You stayed by my side day and night never crossed the line, and provided selfless services, finally delivering me. You cheap, annoying, and absurd Frontera boy continue to be in my thoughts for some reason. I know not what I am supposed to do about your acts of good faith. Your kind heart. I know not how I can repay you.]

[Compliment Effect: As the lifesaver of Queen Magentano, you have her absolute trust. Your opinion and advice will be fully backed and supported by the queen without condition, and those that antagonize you or attempt to harm you will be declared enemies of the kingdom regardless of status and identity.]

[Title Region: Wherever Alicia Termina Magentano is]

[Active Period of Title: As long as Queen Magentano is alive]

...Holy.

Lloyd inadvertently blinked his eyes multiple times to check the message. Two things were clear.

Her left arm was completely cured. She successfully learned the Asrahan Core Technique.

It was as the message stated; the queen’s terminal illness had been cured. There also was another thing Lloyd instinctively realized.

“Why are you staring into blank space like that?”

“...”

“Are you alright?”

“Your Majesty.”

Lloyd quickly took a step back and spoke in a courtly manner.

“Allow me to congratulate you on successful mastery of the Asrahan Core Technique and your left arm’s full recovery.”

“Congratulate? I almost died because of you.”

“...”

“I jest. I do not deserve to be congratulated. Rather, I feel indebted to you.”

“Your grace knows no bounds.”

“Really?”

“...”

“I know the exact line you say every time you have nothing else to say. It’s about time you stop using the same line, but I suppose you’re going to ask for forgiveness following my response anyway.”

“...”

“Am I wrong?”

“Uhm, well...”

Lloyd put an awkward smile on his face instead, for an obvious reason.

Whoa. Why is she looking at me so gracefully like that?

The look Queen Magentano gave Lloyd was sweeter than before. It used to be that of composure and charisma, but now it was full of trust and friendliness, like pizza full of cheese.

The new compliment effect is... absolutely amazing.

Winning endless trust and faith from the queen, as well as absolute support and grace, could already be felt with the gaze.

I don't know if I feel comfortable about it, but I suppose it doesn't hurt.

Lloyd concluded that it wouldn't hurt to have this kind of support from the queen and shrugged his shoulders.

What am I thinking? It's an absolute win. The ruler of the kingdom that is on its way to dominance across the continent backing me up like that? I can pick out a certain individual as an enemy, and she would send her most trusted knights to apprehend that person immediately.

That wasn't going to be the only benefit.

I can even ask for more financial support.

This was what Lloyd was truly after. He didn't care much about absolute faith or sending knights to help him out. In fact, the best benefactor was someone who could financially support him all the way.

Anyone who has more money and could spare some for me is my king and queen. I love you, my queen.

Lloyd organized his thoughts quickly and bowed respectfully, showing the top of his head in the process.

"I don't know what to say about your unending grace as a humble servant. But to tell you the truth, I only made proper preparations and laid the foundation. It is you, Your Majesty, that took advantage of this opportunity and successfully mastered it."

"Hmm. So you even mean to make it my achievement."

“I am nothing but a faithful subject, so whatever I accomplish is your accomplishment, Your Majesty.”

“Ha. You’ve always been good with your lips.”

“All thanks to you, Your Majesty.”

“Do you honey your tongue up before you’re granted an audience with me, each time?”

“Huh? N-no, Your Majesty.”

“Then?”

“I naturally feel compelled to speak in this manner each time I am granted an audience with you, Your Majesty.”

“Ha.”

Queen Magentano inadvertently chuckled, while Lloyd continued to think.

Whew. It worked out in the end. Her left arm was cured. And now...

Lloyd wondered when the enforced fate phenomenon was going to take place again, and which event was going to trigger it. While he still had no idea, there was a way to find out.

Should I look at the ending spoiler later in the evening? Or I can go back to the Frontera estate and use the Jewel of Truth.

Both were decent methods. What was important for Lloyd at the moment was to prevent the incidents that could trigger the restoration of that tragic destiny each time in the future.

I wonder just how many times I could manage to do this.

Lloyd had to find a more comprehensive way to solve this problem once and for all in the meantime. He strengthened his resolve by continuing to remind him of what he knew until he saw a white banner flying in one corner of the training arena.

Huh?

Lloyd was reminded of that particular banner. He had traveled to and from the royal palace, and into the training arena multiple times to know the significance of it.

Wait. That's the banner to notify an emergency.

The white banner was supposed to be raised when the queen was training rigorously and thus difficult to approach. It was to alert the queen that there was an urgent message to be brought to her attention.

"What is it?"

The queen had seen the banner as well and waved. A royal guard rushed to her presence immediately.

"Your Majesty. I bring an urgent message by the courier from Namaran."

"Urgent message?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"Where is this courier?"

"He is waiting for the audience with you in the audience chamber, Your Majesty."

"I see. Hmm. Actually, I think it'd be better to hear this urgent news in my study instead of the audience chamber, which is usually full of eyes and ears. Bring the courier into my study."

"As you command, Your Majesty."

After the royal guard was dismissed, the queen looked at Lloyd again.

“Lloyd Frontera.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Her eyes were devoid of mischief suddenly, as she made a proposition.

“Will you come with me?”

“It is a great honor to be given a chance to accompany you, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd thought this was actually not a bad idea to see the courier from Namaran bringing urgent news, out of all places.

Something must have happened in Namaran for the courier to have brought an urgent message. What could it be?

Lloyd wondered what could have transpired, and why it had to be now. The timing felt suspicious, as though someone was handing over another problem to solve after another. It was like the next duty to take care of shortly after the previous one, and a new case after closing one.

A huge event took place in Namaran in the original novel, the Knight of Blood and Iron, too.

He recalled Namaran’s Wall in the original story. The entire city of Namaran was surrounded by a magical barrier by the dark mages, until Javier managed, albeit barely, to take care of this. The royal lady of Namaran had perished during this incident.

But I prevented it. I saved the lady and constructed four-way protective structures for the city. All dark mages should have been eliminated back then because the queen personally led the knights to do so.

But something felt amiss for some reason as if something unanticipated was about to happen.

Should the enforced fate phenomenon kick off, something would surely happen in Namaran since it was the scene of a terrible event in the original story.

In other words, there was a high chance that Namaran could be the place to trigger the tragic restoration of destiny.

I must be on my guard. I'd better get as much information from the courier as possible.

Lloyd strengthened his resolve constantly as he walked beside the queen into her study. The courier from Namaran who had been waiting quickly paid respect to the queen and handed over the scroll containing the urgent message.

"Hmm."

Lloyd noticed that Queen Magentano's eyes sparkled as she read the scroll, and wondered what message was written there. She tilted her head in an unsure manner and glanced at Lloyd, making his curiosity even greater.

"Lloyd Frontera."

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"It looks like your presence is required in Namaran, immediately."

"Huh?"

The queen gave the scroll to Lloyd, who took it and read it right away. The content was rather disturbing.

Are you freaking kidding me?!

Lloyd gritted his teeth inadvertently.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 373: Crushing Obstacles (1)

“Bibeong!”

A refreshing roar welcomed a new day along with the sunrise over the eastern mountain range on the Frontera Estate. The sunlight shone brightly upon the count’s mansion, gracing the interior through the windows of the guest chambers. There was one particular room, however, where the sunlight failed to penetrate through the windows, due to the blackout curtains that were hung over with the intent to completely shut off any source of light. Behind the curtains was Dragon King Verkis, attempting to cast communication magic throughout the morning.

“Come on...! Answer!”

Beep. Beep. Beep.

“Ugh...”

Beep. Beep. Beep.

“Come on...”

Beep. Beep. Beep.

“Tsk. Failed again.”

Verkis was disappointed to embrace the situation. He could tell that there was nothing wrong with the casting formula from the flow of mana; the communication spell was working properly. However, the actual connection was not being established again. There was only one explanation.

She’s deliberately ignoring my calls again.

It appeared that his wife was more upset than he had anticipated, causing him to lose patience and feel insecure.

This isn’t good. What do I do? Should I go back and ask for forgiveness?

It has been some time since he left the Sea Dragon Cave and came to the Frontera Estate, which meant that his wife's journey was about to be over soon.

Please don't tell me she's going to ignore my calls until she gets back. That's not good, because that means she'll be upset when she arrives. What am I supposed to do? I don't want to be on the receiving end of her wrath firsthand. It doesn't feel great to be given anything but hard pieces of bread for each meal.

The more he thought about it, the bigger the problem seemed. It would be a disaster to see his wife, whom he hadn't seen for a while, come back with a callous sneer on her face. That was why Verkis attempted to establish a connection for one last time, unlike any other morning.

"Please... pick up!"

Beep. Beep. Beep.

"I am so sorry! So just answer!"

Beep. Beep. Beep.

"I'm getting up early every morning to try these calls to make up for it. You know how much of a good job I've been doing, right? So please just answer!"

Beep. Beep. Click.

"Yes, my love?"

"If you just answer the call this one, I'll do the dishes for the rest of..."

"Rest of our lives?"

"...Huh?"

"My husband?"

“...”

Verkis remained silent momentarily until he quickly grasped the situation. The connection had finally been established.

“A-are you alright?”

“I am as good as ever, my love.”

“Please don’t tell me you got hurt, starved, got bitten by a mosquito, ran your pinky toe across the frame of the door, threw a tantrum because you ate something wrong, bled while trying to remove acne, cried because you missed me, or anything.”

“Not at all, my love. There is no need for you to worry about me.”

“Really? That’s good to know.”

Phew.

Verkis breathed a sigh of relief. But a question that figuratively smashed a heavily dense morning star right on his chest followed immediately.

“But my love? Did you just say you were going to do the dishes for the rest of our lives?”

“Huh? No. You heard it wrong.”

“Huh?”

“I was only telling you to hustle.”

“Hmm...”

“I’m serious.”

“Hmm...”

“For real.”

“But I heard your statement in a loud and clear voice with my own two ears.”

Verkis refused to respond, as his clever wife continued to bombard his ears with a scary tone.

“Although I haven’t had a proper education, I still remember the saying by wise men from the past to this day. Have you ever heard of the phrase a man of his words by any chance?”

“Well... I guess?”

“Excellent, as expected of you. A man of his words never goes back on what he speaks, because he values his words more than gold. A real man must not, as such, take back what he lets out from his lips.”

“I do know what it means.”

“Do you remember?”

“Of course I do. You used the same logic and made some poor bastard carry around a flower on his head for the rest of his life.”

“Yes. That was Sir Michael.”

“Yeah. The founder of the Magentano Dynasty. I do remember.”

“Of course you do. I had faith in you.”

“Faith? What do you mean?”

“I can’t wait to reunite with you and see you take care of the dishes for the rest of our lives, as soon as I return.”

Verkis felt as though he was just sentenced to death, but it was too late to turn it around. Instead, he shook off the teardrops that naturally formed around his eyes and asked again.

“When are you going to return, then?”

“Well, I answered your call because I wanted to speak to you about this.”

“Did something happen?”

“No...”

“Then?”

“My mother is absolutely in love with the journey.”

“Huh?”

“Not just my mother. Lady Flores and Iris are also enjoying it so much.”

“Wait. So the old hag, Flores, and our daughter are all having so much fun.”

“That is correct. I was going to ask if it would be alright for us to travel for another year before returning.”

“Hmm.”

“My love?”

“...Tsk. I do miss you tons, but I suppose I have no choice.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“I have no choice. I can’t decline if all of you are enjoying it so much. But under one condition,” said Verkis, in a more solemn voice than ever. “I’ll let you travel for another year if you forget about doing dishes.”

“But a man of his words...”

“...”

“...Never goes back on what he says.”

“H-how about skipping wake-up calls for the next year then?”

“...”

“This too?”

“Hmm. Okay.”

“Really?”

“Really.”

“For real?”

“For real.”

The permission to sleep in each morning was finally given by his queen, his wife, his everything.

“I actually saw you struggle but manage to get up each morning to make such calls. Although you did sleep in a few days, the efforts you made to keep the promise really touched my heart.”

“...Uhm. Okay.”

“Yeah. So I decided not to say anything even if you sleep in each morning for the next year.”

“R-really?”

“Yeah. Besides, you allowed me to travel for another year too anyway.”

“...O-okay! Thank you! I love you!”

“Me too. Please don’t let me stop you from resting.”

The communication magic ended with that. Verkis immediately threw his body on the bed as the effect of the spell subsided. He had acted as though he was against the idea of his wife being away for another year, but it was quite the contrary in reality.

“Ahahaha! Gahahahaha!”

Verkis rolled on the bed like a child having so much fun, out of pure joy. It was as though any husband whose wife and kids were away on a trip just got a call from the wife saying they’ll be spending another week before returning. Verkis put on a genuine smile on his face and began to think about what he was going to do for the next year, like the husband contemplating whether to order pizza or Chinese food as soon as hanging up on the call.

Alright!

Verkis organized his pillows and bed sheets, before putting on the comfy blanket to start dreaming. But his joyful anticipation didn’t last long.

Knock-knock!

The knocking noise was clearer than ever, followed by an untimely clear voice reporting in.

“Your Majesty. It’s Raphael of Thrones, reporting for duty. Have you awakened?”

“...”

“I just came back from jogging alongside the citizens of the estate this morning, and I had to stop by to report because it felt so refreshing. May I invite you?”

“...”

“Or we can play this game called chess. I learned how to play from the count last evening. The games humans invented are quite fun.”

“...”

“Or we can work on the field alongside farmers. The act of caring for the crop, harvesting it, and putting it on the table to share with neighbors actually seems like an enjoyable thing to do.”

“...”

“Your Majesty?”

Knock-knock!

“...”

Verkis contemplated whether or not to grind the Angel of Thrones or Thorns down into molecules or make him dissipate into thin air with the help of the archangel. He was overtaken by the feeling of annoyance that was as strong as a cup of espresso with extra shots. As a matter of fact, this wasn’t the first time he did this.

He’s way too active and friendly with people, damn it.

Raphael had adapted to the life in this estate a little too well for Verkis’s taste. Just like his title suggested, he possessed an angelic character and always showed kindness to others. He was full of curiosity, yet had gentle nature; it was natural for him to make friends here and there instead of enemies. He was a born extrovert.

Ugh, it’s not like I can kill him either!

While there was not a shred of a doubt Verkis could get rid of Raphael—effortlessly, too—that was going to create a huge tension between him and the archangel. Verkis did not want that.

Because he’s as good as me.

He recalled an incident during which the confrontation with the archangel led to a physical altercation. They had relocated to a better spot to engage in an all-out battle, causing the routes of two neutron stars and combining them to create a black hole, which ultimately led to the supernova that unleashed extreme gravitational waves.

He took that hit head-on and stood still like nothing happened.

Verkis had never seen anyone that could withstand something like that, aside from himself. He was genuinely astounded by the archangel and wondered if the king of hell was also like this.

I don't want trouble with guys like them. It's annoying.

But the knocking sound and the waking voice of the angel rattled his ears constantly. Verkis tried his best to ignore it. He plugged his ears and turned around, thinking what he had to do. He couldn't bear it anymore. He couldn't sleep anymore. Verkis determined it would be better to go to a solitary place, erect magical barriers, and go to sleep for one whole year. While getting up from the bed at the moment felt like a lot of work, it was going to be better than this. The dragon king barely managed to get up from the bed.

I'd better get going.

***

"I should head to Namaran straight away," said Lloyd, as he folded the scroll containing the urgent message.

"It looks like your presence is required, doesn't it?" Queen Magentano replied, making eye contact with her subject.

"Yes, Your Majesty," Lloyd replied with a bitter smile on his face. "If this message is true, that is."

Lloyd's smile became even bitterer as he recalled what was written in the scroll, which did not contain much.

The slope in Namaran is slowly crumbling down...? This indicates that the construction project I led there before is somehow being compromised due to the mysterious mana explosions.

That was what the scroll brought by the courier contained. Lloyd frowned inadvertently.

This doesn't feel good. It hasn't even been long after I led the project there. Even if they were to slack on maintenance, it wouldn't start crumbling down already.

The city of Namaran, which was situated on top of the cliff, faced great danger as the slope on one side had shown signs of crumbling down. Lloyd had led a project to install huge piles and anchors on the entire slope to stabilize that. The idea that it was beginning to fall apart already was unacceptable. It was realistically impossible.

I don't do half-assed jobs when I work on a construction project. And the latter part of the message is what worries me more. Mysterious mana explosions?

He wondered if these were new phenomena that hinted at the enforced fate phenomenon, or what could trigger it. In fact, he strongly suspected it.

There is a chance.

Now that he thought about it, Namaran was a place in which a huge incident called Namaran's Wall had taken place in the original novel. Lloyd had prevented it, thwarted the evil plans of the dark mages, and slain the hell knight that was being summoned. He even successfully saved the young lady of the estate, who was destined to die during the incident but survived and succeeded the Count of Namaran.

In that aspect, Namaran is perhaps one of the places that greatly altered the flow of the original story. There is a chance that a new form of restoration of destiny could be triggered there.

Lloyd came to the conclusion quickly and bowed to the queen.

"Please allow me to take my leave, Your Majesty."

"Are you leaving already?"

"It looks like it's imminent, Your Majesty."

"Understood. Hurry."

To Lloyd’s relief, the queen did not hold him back. Instead, it appeared that the queen read Lloyd’s facial expression and got a rough idea, although she wouldn’t imagine the details involving the enforced fate phenomenon in her wildest dreams. However, she let out a terrible joke to bid Lloyd a temporary farewell, having noticed his desire to be on the move immediately.

“Don’t die. It’s a command.”

“Of course, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd left the royal palace immediately afterward and hopped on the back of Draggy, who was on standby outside. Draggy stomped on the ground.

“To Namaran!”

Lloyd headed southward and flew in supersonic speed, past mountains, waterways, and vast fields, as well as villages, fortresses, and plains. The city atop the cliff, that he was so familiar with, was finally in sight. Lloyd led Draggy to land below the slopes and walked up on his own feet.

I must examine it with my own two eyes.

Exchanging pleasantries with the Lady of Namaran could wait. Checking if the mysterious phenomenon in this place was related to the predestined event was of more importance. Lloyd quickly climbed the slope and arrived at the scene at which he had installed slope-stabilizing piles and anchors before. He noticed a few compression plates that had been holding anchors down were broken, and a few slope-stabilizing piles were 1/3 of the way removed.

What the hell?!

Lloyd was flabbergasted. Broken compression plates and removed piles, which had been installed deep underground. It was as if a giant of immense strength had come over and thrown a tantrum there. He couldn’t think of any other cause.

But there has to be one since there were mysterious mana explosions as well. I should look into that.

Lloyd retained his composure and continued his examination. He allowed his mana circle to work.

Zing... The circle moved slightly and began to absorb the mana residing in the place little by little. Lloyd embraced the property of the mana absorbed and analyzed it as if he were using a metal detector to detect mines. He went throughout the entire slope to discover the clues leading to the mana explosion. It didn't take him long to find them, thanks to the Asrahan Core Technique.

Why is there mana on the piles...?

Lloyd began to feel mana from the stabilizing piles that were removed one-third of the way from the ground. He examined the property of the mana and realized something right away.

This mana feels familiar.

It wasn't strange at all. He had felt this before, here in this place, when he was getting rid of dark mages. That was the nature of the mana that was emanating from the pile.

Dark Mage. Noctanium. The dark gem. The tool was pre-installed to erect Namaran's Wall in the past. This mana is from that jewel.

A couple of words popped up in Lloyd's head, helping him deduce what was going on.

Somebody is trying to use these things I installed as tools to erect Namaran's Wall... again.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 374: Crushing Obstacles (2)

“So, somebody is attempting to erect Namaran’s Wall again, using the structures I had installed as tools.”

Lloyd frowned inadvertently at the realization.

This is definitely the enforced fate phenomenon.

He got the idea, but it was too early to jump to a conclusion. Lloyd decided to continue examining while he was at it.

I should begin with measurements.

[Scanning will now begin.]

Bzzt! The measurement skill was activated, with the underground scanning option toggled on, allowing Lloyd to see the structure of the basement to five meters beneath the ground.

Tsk. The stabilization pipe is broken in the middle.

He noticed the fracture in the fourth meter from the ground. It seemed weird, however.

It’s like a popped piece of gimbap.

It was as if someone put too much meat in the burrito and tried to roll it together anyway, and the tortilla ripped in the middle. The stabilization pile was popped on the outer side, revealing the interior. Lloyd immediately knew why.

Somebody force-extended a huge amount of mana into the pile in a short period. The pile failed to withstand the pressure and broke.

Lloyd processed one potential event at a time and drew a big picture. Someone had force-extended mana into the stabilization pile, pressure rose to cause a fracture on the side, the upper part protruded from the ground due to the push, the anchors were affected by the impact and the vibration, the plates broke, and the slope crumbled down as a result.

Other areas like this must be the same.

Lloyd suspected this but walked a little bit to confirm his theory, carefully inspecting other stabilization piles and anchors. He was spot on.

I sense the presence of mana only on the broken piles.

The stabilization piles protruding above ground like acne popped halfway above the skin were emanating a rather ominous mana. The fact that it was so subtle made it virtually impossible for anyone who did not practice the Asrahan Core Technique to detect this.

I don't know who did this, but not too shabby.

Lloyd identified the positions of all piles broken due to the extension of mana and connected them like dots on the paper. It drew a certain picture.

A magical seal.

Lloyd was convinced now. Somebody had done this intentionally.

They're trying to re-raise Namaran's Wall. Did a dark mage survive the hunt?

Javier, who had been silently staying next to Lloyd thus far, spoke up as Lloyd seemed to be immersed in thoughts.

"Master Lloyd," said Javier. "Is it as expected?"

"As expected?" Lloyd replied. "What is?"

Lloyd took a glance at Javier, who retained his characteristic composure and chuckled.

"I felt the presence of mana in the broken pile, too."

“It is as you say,” agreed Lloyd. “Do you remember the dark mages from before?”

“Do you think some survived?” Javier asked.

“We’ll find out soon enough.”

“Okay. It’s a relief, though.”

“Relief?” Lloyd wondered. “What do you mean by that?”

“To find out that the slope crumbling down in the urgent message wasn’t because you did a terrible job on the project.”

“Tsk. Do you honestly think I’ll do a poor job on any of my construction projects?”

“Nobody knows what will happen in the future,” Javier shrugged his shoulders, continuing to chuckle. “You’re a snobby person to deal with, and you could have easily designed it to start crumbling down ten years later to demand a large sum of money for maintenance.”

“Stop. My pride won’t let that happen.”

“Really?”

“Really,” Lloyd snorted.

It was true. It was civil engineering that was involved, which would construct public structures that millions of people would end up using. Designing it to break apart naturally over time deliberately was out of the question, even if he despised the company that outsourced the job to him.

“I didn’t spend so much time studying this to do a half-assed job.”

“You studied?”

“I told you before. I learned this knowledge in a dream.”

“I do remember that.”

“Good. I also remember something,” Lloyd added mischievously.

“What do you remember?”

“Lady Ella.”

“...”

Javier’s chuckle immediately subsided. Instead, Lloyd was smiling.

“I had completely forgotten about it because I was too busy with the newest events. But coming back to this place refreshed my nostalgic memories.”

“...”

“Do you remember how hundreds of male laborers lined up each morning to get soup from you?”

“...”

“All of their eyes were sparkling, too. They were like, ah, Lady Ella of the stunningly cold, yet beautiful stare!”

“...That’s a memory not worth keeping.”

“So you do remember.”

“No. First time hearing that,” Javier denied. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Are you flustered by any chance?”

“...”

“Wait. You just clenched your fist.”

“Sigh.”

Javier let out a huge sigh and chuckled. Lloyd responded with a smile of his own.

“Anyhow. You remember what transpired back then, right? I think somebody is trying to replicate that tragic event.”

“Is this another form of enforced restoration of fate?”

“Yeah. Hmm. I suppose I can call it a new act in a play.”

“Are you saying—“

“Namaran’s Wall will be erected at this rate, if we don’t do anything about it.”

Lloyd was absolutely positive. The broken piles emanating mana were forming a magical seal from a bird’s eye view. He didn’t know who was behind it, but that someone was trying to amplify magic using these, like the dark jewel noctanium he had discovered here in the past.

“What do you intend to do now, Master Lloyd?”

“Hmm,” Lloyd shrugged his shoulders. “What comes to my mind is to remove all broken piles completely and shatter them to dissipate the residing mana. That may deliver a devastating blow to the heinous criminal trying to erect Namaran’s Wall again.”

“Then we should report this to Namaran straight away- -“

“Not yet.”

“Huh?”

Javier’s eyebrows twitched, while Lloyd’s lips lifted.

“Touching the tall grass without warning may scare the snake hiding within.”

Lloyd recalled the old saying about the importance of patience, teaching that rushing things would ruin it in the end. He instinctively knew this was a fitting situation.

“Think about it. If we remove the piles and get rid of the mana, would that wrap things up?”

“Hmm. I don’t think so.”

“Why not?”

“Because the person behind this scheme will certainly come up with another plan.”

“Most likely,” nodded Lloyd, fully agreeing with Javier. “What if that person saw us remove the piles and the mana embedded within? He would definitely realize his plans have been thwarted. Can we remove the piles discreetly? No. We need to enlist the help of Ppodong, Bangul, and the entirety of Skeleton Corps and work on it for a whole day to remove one pile.”

“It looks like it. It will take a lot of time, and there’s no way people wouldn’t know about it.”

“Right. And if he discovers that his plan has been thwarted...”

“If I were him, I would go into hiding and come up with a more discreet plan.”

“Precisely. That would make it more difficult to apprehend him or respond in time.”

Lloyd’s idea was to apprehend the culprit before he had time to flee. Dragging this on instead was only going to make him play the game by the enemy’s rules, potentially making the problem much worse.

“You must have an alternate plan in your mind, then.”

“Of course I do,” Lloyd shrugged his shoulders, before putting on another mischievous smile on his face. “But I’m not going to tell you right now.”

“...”

“Come on. You’re giving me that look again.”

“...”

“Tsk. You’ll find out in due time, so don’t let your feelings get hurt.”

“My feelings weren’t hurt.”

“Really?”

“Yes, because I am a man of a huge heart, unlike Master Lloyd.”

“Hey! What do you mean by that?”

“Are you asking that because you honestly don’t know, or are you asking anyway?”

“Of course I know. I am a man of a heart that is as wide as the sea.”

“Ha.”

“...”

“Okay. I will think of you as a man of a huge heart like me, then.”

“I’m not sure if I’m supposed to be happy about that.”

“You’re not.”

“...”

“Shall we head to the mansion of the Countess of Namaran?”

“Yeah. That’s the next step.”

Lloyd carried a bitter smile on his face as he turned around. Javier followed with a thought in his mind.

Such a liar.

Javier stared through his cold, composed eyes at the back of Lloyd's head. The grandmaster instinctively knew.

But he's a trustworthy person. He's always been this way. He acts like a cheap scoundrel on the outside but puts in a tremendous effort for his father and his house. Although... he's still hiding a lot.

Javier recalled the conversation he just had with Lloyd about the enforced fate, Namaran's Wall that was on its way to be re-erected, and coming up with ways to thwart that evil plan. Those were all believable. However, Javier had doubts about one thing.

You learned about construction and engineering in your dreams? Give me a break.

Javier put a bitter smile on his face inadvertently, having been convinced now. Lloyd's claim that he got knowledge about construction and engineering in his dreams was a blatant lie.

You probably learned it in Seoul.

He recalled the city in a completely different realm, that he had visited with Lloyd before. Everything there was amazing and mysterious. Lights were still shining even during the night, and the tall buildings were out of this world.

The roads were so level and perfectly smooth despite its size. The tall buildings that reached the clouds in the sky were home to hundreds and thousands of people. It reminded me of apartment complexes back in the estate, but much larger.

That wasn't all. The underground was even more stunning. Throughout his stay in that futuristic settlement, Javier used his superhuman senses to hear the sounds coming from beneath. Water was flowing through a pathway that was artificially created, suggesting that there was a complexly well-made pipeline of sewage.

And there was an even bigger pathway underneath, through which a carriage of a sort traveled very frequently, too.

The size of the tunnel was unfathomable, and a carriage was traveling, carrying thousands of passengers. So many citizens were benefiting from these public and private structures in one way or another, as though it was just a part of their everyday lives. Lloyd had definitely studied construction in a place like that.

But how did he end up here, and replace the real Master Lloyd?

That was a question that he couldn't possibly find the answers to. However, he had a rough idea.

Perhaps the enforced restoration of fate is somehow related to the fake Lloyd's secrets.

Perhaps that was the case. That most likely was the case. Javier was getting the feeling that it was the case. He wasn't suspecting it. He was almost sure.

He didn't know what to do. He did not know how to react to this, to help the fake Lloyd. Javier followed his master to the inner city with these thoughts in his mind.

The two men arrived at the countess's mansion and were granted an audience with the Young Lady of Namaran. In fact, Countess Siluria Namaran was now the official ruler of the city, having inherited the title. Having met her for the first time in a long time, Lloyd exchanged greetings with her and heard the detailed report about the mana explosions and slope crumbling down. But Lloyd only listened and did not say a single word about his findings on his way here, as though he had just arrived in the city and hadn't performed any inspections. After the meeting, he put down his belongings in the honored guest rooms, stirring Javier's curiosity.

“Are you by any chance suspecting Countess of Namaran?”

“Not at all,” replied Lloyd, shaking his head. He knew the countess was the last person he would suspect as the mastermind behind this whole incident.

Because she died in the original story, as a result of Namaran’s Wall. She was supposed to be the victim, and will most likely meet the same fate should we fail to put a stop to this scheme.

Lloyd had an idea as to how he was going to investigate this case already.

“We’ve been through a lot today, so let’s take a quick break. Aren’t you tired?”

“Of course I’m not—“

“We’re going to get extremely busy starting tomorrow. Can we go to sleep already?”

Javier put on a straight face and stared at Lloyd. His master was at it again, trying to make him go to sleep.

For what? Is he trying to leave his presence and disappear like last time?

Javier contemplated momentarily but decided to play along.

“Okay. Sing me the lullaby then.”

“Just open your ears already, because I’ve been ready.”

Lloyd began reciting the contents of his major textbook again, in the same, boring tone as that of the professor that led the sessions. Combined with complex knowledge and terminology, Javier’s eyelids began to fall slowly but surely. He was sound asleep in a few moments.

There.

Having confirmed it, Lloyd slowly got up and went inside the dressing room to change his clothes. He then activated the ending spoiler there, summoning a blue portal in the corner. He took a good look at the new ending that was created, entailing what would transpire after the queen's left arm was cured. Lloyd left and let out a deep breath, with a satisfactory smile on his face.

"...I see. So this is what's going on."

He had just seen a new ending to this life and got an idea to put a stop to this tragedy. In fact, he drew a bigger picture than that.

Lloyd stepped out of his room immediately and went to meet with the Countess of Namaran, with the huge picture still in his mind. He did not hesitate to explain the best method to the countess.

"I know it may sound strange and even ridiculous, but we must evacuate every single citizen of Namaran from the city. Not a single soul is to remain."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 375: Crushing Obstacles (3)

“I know it may sound strange and even ridiculous, but we must evacuate every single citizen of Namaran from the city. Not a single soul is to remain.”

“Pardon...?”

The current Countess of Namaran, who used to be the young lady of this city, paused wrapping up her duties for the day in her study and frowned.

“What do you mean by that?”

She was genuinely confused. She had just exchanged her greetings with Lloyd in the afternoon and expressed how glad she was about seeing him for the first time in a long time, as well as concerns about the signs of collapsing the cliff was showing. It had only been a few hours since then.

“Have you already identified the cause of the collapse?”

But the Lloyd she knew certainly was capable of coming to the conclusion this quickly. After all, he was the one who saved the city from dark mages and the hell’s knight. He had displayed unprecedented wits and composure to deliver Namaran unexpectedly, against all odds. And the new countess was right.

“Yes, I have.”

“Then there must be a reason why you want to evacuate all citizens of the city.”

“That is correct.”

“Would you be able to tell me?”

“Of course. Namaran’s Wall will be re-raised.”

“...What?” Countess of Namaran was visibly distraught as Lloyd continued.

“The incident will take place exactly at midnight of the sixth day from today. The stabilization piles installed underground will be moved through dark magic, forming a magical seal of a sort. A wall of magical energy will shroud the city again, and all lives within the barrier will perish.”

“That’s...”

“And the hell’s knight will awaken again, but in complete form this time.”

“...”

“The city will be destroyed, as well as other settlements in the vicinity due to the activity of the hell’s knight. That is what I am suspecting.”

“Did you obtain a prophecy by any chance?”

“No,” said Lloyd with a smile on his face. “I just happened to acquire a few key clues while I was investigating the scenes. I made deductions based on those, and came to this conclusion.”

That was a blatant lie; Lloyd had read the ending spoiler, according to which he had met a tragic fate.

I was murdered in cold blood by the hell’s knight.

Lloyd was away from Javier unfortunately in that moment, when he ran across the hell’s knight in its full powers. As a result of the clash in which Lloyd put up a decent fight, he came up short against the creature that was mightier than swordmasters. The hell’s knight ascending to Namaran was an elite boss with a name and the commander of the first division in hell’s army. There was no way Lloyd could overcome this beast. He fought valiantly, sang, and tried to buy time until Javier came to his rescue, but all to no avail. His body was ripped apart to pieces, and he met his tragic demise. He tried to stand his ground and lifted his shovel to counterattack, when his heart was pierced by the blade. That was roughly the ending he had seen through the spoiler this time.

Tsk. And it hurt like crap.

Lloyd inadvertently trembled like a leaf, having been reminded of the excruciating pain he felt as the blade found his heart. That was the problem with the ending spoiler; it was so real, that Lloyd felt every single feeling of the ending, including the pain.

“Anyhow,” continued Lloyd, brushing off the unnecessary thoughts. “All of us will be swept away by a tragic catastrophe if we don’t do anything.”

“What are the chances of that happening?”

“I would say a hundred percent.”

The Countess of Namaran bit her lips tightly. After Lloyd gave her some time to process this, she spoke again.

“Okay, I trust your words, because you’re the one that saved my father, and everyone in this city. But there is something I would like to ask.”

“I am listening.”

“Is evacuating all citizens the only way to respond to the tragedy?”

“I’m afraid it is.”

“Why? If it is indeed going to happen six days from today, I think that’s enough time to make other preparations.”

“Are you feeling uncomfortable about fleeing from the problem?”

“To tell you the truth, yes,” nodded the young countess. “It isn’t easy to make a city-wide announcement and force all citizens to evacuate immediately. The city is their home, and it would make me and the rest of the citizens feel like we haven’t tried enough to solve the issue.”

“I understand how you feel, but there is nothing for you to worry about.”

“Please elaborate.”

“Evacuating doesn’t necessarily mean running away.”

“Then you have another purpose.”

“Yes. We’re laying a trap.”

“...Trap?”

Countess of Namaran frowned, as the smile on Lloyd’s face became even more apparent.

“That’s right. We might as well get rid of the source of the problem, while we’re at it.”

“You want to lay a trap to exterminate the enemies.”

“Exactly.”

“Can you please enlighten me with the details?”

“Of course I can.”

Lloyd put a huge smile on his face, appreciating the countess’s trust. All that was left to do was explain the plan in detail, to win her support in all this. He approached the countess with confidence.

“Please allow me. This is something no one should eavesdrop on.”

“I’m all ears.”

“Okay, so the plan is... blah, blah... everyone will be safe... blah, blah... in the city hall... blah, blah...”

The young countess’s eyes became wider as Lloyd’s whispers continued. The next morning, the plan for all citizens to evacuate the city was announced.

***

“Leave our homes and jobs and get out of the city all of a sudden? Just like that?”

“But they’re going to have tents for us to stay, Dad.”

“Tsk, are we supposed to be thankful for tents? What about our work?”

“It looks like that will have to be suspended. But they’ll be providing food.”

“Food? Okay, I’m bursting into tears because I’m so grateful. We will at least have food. Ha.”

“But Dad.”

“What?”

“The countess also stated this in the announcement.”

“What.”

“That this is the only way to keep everyone safe.”

“Safe?”

“Yeah.”

“From what?”

“From the slope that was showing signs of collapsing as of late. She said the entire city is to be emptied so that the inspection of the soil can be conducted.”

“Inspection of the soil?”

“Yeah.”

“And who’s going to do that?”

“Lord Lloyd Frontera.”

“What?!”

It was at the home of an ordinary family during breakfast. A single father of one daughter paused upon hearing this and asked his child again, in a cautious manner.

“Did you just say Lord Lloyd Frontera?”

“Yeah.”

The daughter nodded confidently, and the father’s grumbling attitude quickly subsided.

“I see. Hahahaha. So Lord Lloyd Frontera is going to do that for us?”

“Yeah. That’s what the announcement said.”

“Ahahaha. You should have told me that first. I wouldn’t have gotten upset.”

The single father burst out in laughter, quickly feeling embarrassed about his complaints against the order to evacuate.

“Then we must follow the order faithfully. When are we expected to leave?”

“It said the tents will be ready within five days.”

“Alright, then should we get started on packing after breakfast?”

“Okay, Dad.”

The single father picked up the bread to resume eating, and the daughter followed with a smile. Similar conversations took place all across Namaran, from old stables and shops getting ready to open for business, to the bedrooms of newlyweds and the barracks of guards. Every citizen of the estate was confused about the order to evacuate, with some asking genuine questions until they heard that Lloyd Frontera was involved. As soon as they found out Lloyd was going to conduct an inspection, they accepted it without question. It was obvious; that most citizens of Namaran considered themselves to be deeply indebted to Lloyd Frontera. This man was a trustworthy individual. They all waited to be assigned to their tents, aside from a few who were skeptical about this order. They were mostly vassals in service of the countess.

“Lady Namaran, I don’t know what to say about this... but this is a bit strange.”

“What is?”

Countess of Namaran stopped eating and put down on fork, staring at the administrator, who had rushed to the countess’s mansion early in the morning to express his concerns.

“The order for all citizens that you had announced this morning. I was genuinely confused about it.”

“What do you mean?”

“I am skeptical about the inspection of the soil that Young Lord Lloyd Frontera is going to perform,” said the administrator, in an increasingly composed manner of speech. “I am aware of the problem that mysterious mana explosions and the collapsing ground have been posing as of late, and that we must come up with an action plan. Inspecting the soil underneath the city makes sense, too. However, does it require evacuating all citizens and emptying the city...?”

“You find that strange.”

“I do, Lady Namaran,” replied the administrator, nodding honestly. The Countess of Namaran chuckled and responded.

“I understand how you feel. Of course it is strange. I’m sure anyone would. However, we will all be in big trouble if we don’t follow the suggestions of Lloyd Frontera.”

“Huh? Are you saying that the inspection is just an excuse...?”

“I’m so relieved to have an administrator who’s quick-witted.”

“...”

“I can’t tell you everything at the moment, but the ground collapsing is just the sign of a much greater issue that’s hidden. Lord Lloyd Frontera identified the real problem, and suggested the evacuation to get rid of the source.”

“Then...”

“I have placed my trust in that man. And that’s why I need you.”

“I’m at your service.”

“Please go convince other vassals of the realm that now isn’t the time to argue, but to combine our efforts to solve this issue together. Understood?”

“...Of course. As you wish.”

The administrator came to ask questions but left persuaded. Half a day later, other subjects of the countess agreed with their lord and pledged their support. The order to evacuate the citizens picked up speed, and a huge camp outside of the city under the cliff was created. In five days, all tents were built and assigned to the citizens of the city, allowing them to relocate temporarily, including most of the cattle. The entire city was pretty much empty.

In the meantime, Lloyd filled the empty city with tens of thousands of insects and worms. He had thoroughly searched all forests in the vicinity as Countess of Namaran led the citizens out of the streets, capturing the likes of moths, grasshoppers, worms, and beetles with the help of Ggoming, the bird and natural bug hunter, and Javier, who had superhuman senses. Lloyd gathered an especially additional amount of detestable mosquitoes, before releasing them into the city. He then waited an entire day in the empty settlement. Having spent a quiet noon and ruddy afternoon, a moonlit sky of the night welcomed him. The stars were up in the northern skies towards midnight, during which a strange, unstable sign of a huge change showed.

Bzzzt... The stabilization piles installed in the cliff supporting the city unleashed nefarious light, forming a dark purple wall of magical energy that swirled ominously.

Whooooooosh! The nightmarish wall that stood with the intent to devour even the moon and the stars marked the beginning of the second Namaran's Wall incident.

***

Rustle! The pouch moved violently. The opening was still sealed, so the beetles could only twitch around on the inside. Namaran's Wall emanated a strange vibe and absorbed the life energy of these insects, which struggled to resist amidst shrieking noises of agony. Other pouches were just the same. Thousands of grasshoppers, worms, and moths all fluttered their limbs and antennae, before losing their lives to the devastating wall. This life energy was all absorbed by Namaran's Wall, which refined it all and gathered it in a single place: the city hall of Namaran. The memorial stone in the center of the huge hall shook.

Crumble! The life forces came together, powered the ominous, evil energy at work, and broke the memorial stone that commemorated the end of the first Namaran's Wall incident.

Crush! A transcendent something opened its eyes from within the stone. It was the hell's knight, which had tasted defeat in this very place. It was the commander of the first corp of the freakish hell's army, Sir Giolexius, who had been beaten by Javier and Lloyd.

A black skeletal figure resurrected and came back from the realm between hell and eternal doom. He certainly looked different from his incomplete self before; his limbs were all intact, and a fearsome-looking armor covering his dark bones that glossed like obsidian let out the roars of the pure-evil grim reaper. The greatsword that ruled over the demons of the underworld unleashed scary clinking noises against air molecules.

"...My fight is not over yet."

Crush! Crush! Sir Giolexius lifted his head, breaking the memorial stone apart and glaring through baleful eyes that shone beneath the helm as he stepped forward. His eyes were full of grudges and disappointment from the previous fight. The commander of the first corp of hell's army was infuriated by the battle in which he was defeated and perished.

"It shall be different this time around, swordmaster Javier Asrahan and deceitful Lloyd Frontera. If you think you can stop me again, you're wrong."

Crush! He stretched out his hand, completely breaking the memorial stone. The evil commander placed his hand blessed with hellish, murderous powers on the floor of the city hall, which subsequently cracked apart like soil struck by drought.

"I have regained my complete form today. Swordmaster? I don't care. Challenge me.'

Kwoosh! Crush! He slowly lifted his upper body amidst the hell's flames that sparked near him. The fearsome atmosphere that would surely put pressure on any living creature spread around in the vicinity, as Sir Giolexius shouted out with his heart.

"Only a grandmaster, that does not exist in this world, can defeat me in this form! Javier Asrahan, come and face me so we may finish this once and for all!"

The hell's knight's confident statement did not go unheard. All of a sudden, a massively composed voice spoke out in a familiarly annoying manner from the knight's back.

"First time facing a grandmaster?"

"...What?"

Sir Giolexius was genuinely confused by the reply. He quickly turned around and saw what was coming at him, but it was too late when he realized it. Grandmaster Javier’s nuclear slash was charging towards him with the intent to slice the entire galaxy in half.

Kwooosh!!

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 376: Hell’s Knight’s Hell (1)

Kwooooosh! The slash fell with the intent to slice the entire galaxy in half. There was no creation that could stop this attack or avoid it. The hell’s knight was literally screwed. That’s what Sir Giolexius thought as he saw Javier’s blade approach. However, being a commander in the hell’s army and an honorable knight, he attempted to launch a counteroffensive instead of fleeing.

“Hraah!”

Kwoosh! Sir Giolexius’s greatsword was shrouded in dark mist that could instantly send the poor victim’s soul and body to hell upon contact.

Kwoosh! It ignited like fire near the handle and extended to the blade, until the entire sword was covered in dark energy.

Thump! And then Javier’s slash smashed against Sir Giolexius’s head.

“Urgh.”

The hell’s knight’s head fell backwards as his entire ribcage, from number one to seven, all twitched violently as though they were part of the package. Sir Giolexius mumbled in the agonizing pain in a frustrated manner.

“My... dark powers...”

But Javier responded to murmuring words with another, even firmer slashing of his sword.

Clink! Thwoosh! Slash! Rib number three was pierced, his left pelvis was slashed, and right femur broke.

“Ugh... Ack!”

Sir Giolexius inadvertently let out a cry of pain. He couldn’t respond at all; it was supersonic speed that was on a whole new level, not to mention the power of the slash. Each time he sustained the hit, it felt as if the affected body part had disappeared for good, although the hell's knight hadn't lost anything physically yet despite the excruciating pain. Instead, his armor was being deformed. It took Sir Giolexius two more thumps on his body to realize why his body wasn't breaking down or being sliced.

"Wait a minute... Your sword... is sheathed..."

The eyes of the first corp commander of hell's army shook violently, shortly before the sheath of Javier's sword flew again, whacking Sir Giolexius in the head.

Thump!

"Agh!"

The strike with a blunt object didn't only rattle his skull, but also left a humiliating frustration in his mind.

"How dare you keep your sword sheathed against me...!"

His ribcage twitched. He was a mighty hell's knight, and the first corps commander of the hell's army. There shouldn't have been anyone on earth that could withstand him. Not even swordmasters that humans took pride in could give him a challenge in battle. There was no one, aside from grandmasters that only existed in theory, that could stop him.

Ever since he was defeated in the previous battle, he constantly strengthened his resolve to exact revenge. He constantly prayed to the destiny to put him back on the battlefield against the humans that did this to him, in his complete form so he could restore dignity to his name, throughout the time a tiny fragment of his soul barely managed to linger around in the underworld. He patiently endured the humiliation and waited for the right time. And it had finally come. The destined fate had been altered by human intervention, and the gigantic flow was trying to restore it back to normalcy, resurrecting the hell's knight in this very place again. Sir Giolexius was overjoyed. He was determined to find Javier Asrahan and challenge him to a fair duel, in which he was going to claim victory to regain his honor.

But the reality couldn’t be worse. The firm resolve he had harbored in his heart was breaking apart with each painful strike on his body.

“Ack! No...! Argh! No way...!”

Swoosh! Thump! Sir Giolexius’s skull turned 180 degrees with this smash, sending a tooth flying in the other direction. The hell’s knight saw in the heat of the moment and confirmed that it was indeed the sheath of the sword that smacked his face just now, destroying what was left of his pride as the knight from hell.

“Not an aura. Not a relic sword. At least draw your sword... Urgh!”

Swoosh! Thump! But the unsheathed sword of the grandmaster was so painful each time it struck. The hell’s knight found this absolutely frustrating. He couldn’t comprehend.

“But... how...?”

He couldn’t understand how Javier Asrahan had made so much progress while he was gone, when the human knight could barely keep up with the hell’s knight in his incomplete form. Sir Giolexius clearly had the edge over him despite missing an arm and a leg.

“I’ve ascended in my complete form. How?!”

Whoosh! Bam! The sheath flew at lightning speed and thumped the hell’s knight’s chest this time. Sir Giolexius was about to burst into tears, not because it hurt, but because he couldn’t accept the reality. He realized Javier had improved that much. Javier had exceeded his expectations and gained beyond the imaginable boundary of might. The hell’s knight thought how he could get out of this tight spot and ultimately regain his honor.

I must accept things as they are.

Bite! Sir Giolexius bit his lips and tightened the grip on his greatsword, resisting the ferocious attack by raising the dark aura around him. After taking a few hits, it was painfully obvious that Javier was far stronger than the hell's knight in his complete form. Perhaps he had really made the impossible breakthrough to become a grandmaster. He began to look at things in a different perspective.

Wait. This is a sacred and honorable battle against a mighty grandmaster, then!

His eyes lit up. There could not have been another hell's knight that faced a grandmaster. Sir Giolexius became ecstatic by the thought that he was the first one to walk this arduous path.

"Fine by me, grandmaster!"

Whoosh! Whoosh! He swung his greatsword shrouded in dark powers, encouraging himself and becoming spirited once again. The outcome of the battle did not matter to him anymore. The hell's knight was absolutely exhilarated by the fact that he was facing someone that would go down in history itself. Losing after going all out against a legendary adversary like Javier Asrahan was going to be an epic, honorable way to die. Having regained the passion, Sir Giolexius let out an even braver shout towards Javier.

"Hell's knight Giolexius, the commander of the first corp of hell's army, would like to challenge you to an epic duel—"

Bang! The sheath flew again and whacked Giolexius's mouth while he was still speaking, crushing his front teeth and sending them flying everywhere. Sir Giolexius himself was pushed back like a plastic bag against the gust and crushed into the wall of the city hall.

"Urgh!"

The hell's knight ceased to feel anything after it felt as though all of his joints were dislocated and put back in their original positions barely. But Sir

Giolexius endeavored to get up despite the lack of energy, lifting his head to glance at Javier.

“J-Javier Asrahan.”

Step. Step.

“So you do not intend to engage me in an honorable battle.”

Step. Step.

“Then stop dishonoring me and kill me right away. Draw your sword!”

Step. Step.

“What are you waiting for? Why do you appear reluctant to take my life? You must know how I feel, as a knight yourself! Slit my throat, unless you will engage me in a glorious battle!”

Sir Giolexius mustered all the energy that was left in him and let out a shout, causing Javier to stop.

Javier subtly frowned and loosened his grip slightly on his sword. He turned his gaze at Lloyd, who was watching with a smile on his face as a spectator.

Master Lloyd.

He signaled with his eyes.

Can I just end the fight already?

That was Javier’s true wish. Killing the hell’s knight in an instant was a walk in the park, and he believed it was the right thing to do.

But why would he want me to keep beating him until he loses all of his fighting spirit, without killing him...?

That was what Lloyd had instructed Javier prior to the battle. He was not to kill the hell’s knight, but to apprehend him alive. Not only that. Lloyd had emphasized the importance of making the enemy lose the will to resist by beating the crap out of him, over and over.

I don't get it. Does he want something specific from the hell's knight?

But Javier glanced at Lloyd, silently asking for permission to grant the poor hell's knight a quick death, like a proper knight.

No, Lloyd firmly shook his head and denied the request. It was as if chivalry wasn't supposed to be alive, and Javier had to listen to Lloyd. Javier frowned and asked again in the same manner.

Is this really necessary?

Of course it is.

Lloyd shrugged his shoulders. As a matter of fact, this was absolutely necessary in Lloyd's perspective as he wanted to beat some information out of the hell's knight.

Killing him would be so easy for Javier. All he has to do is release a few slashes, and he'll dice him up like stew meat in an instant.

Lloyd wondered how many hell's knights it would take to stand against Javier. It would take at least thirty. Lloyd then proceeded to the next thought, putting the current one aside.

I'm only doing this because I saw the most recently updated ending spoiler.

He recalled what he saw in the newest ending spoiler, in which Lloyd faced the hell's knight alone while Javier was away. The battle against the hell's knight was lonely and arduous, and even hopeless as Lloyd had lost his life. But that wasn't why he had ordered Javier to whoop the hell's knight's butt. It was because of what he said before Lloyd lost his life in the ending spoiler.

"You finally meet your demise, Lloyd Frontera. But you should actually be grateful instead, because you're going to miss out on the real catastrophe that will strike your estate in the future thanks to me."

It was devastating. Lloyd had mustered whatever energy he could scrape to barely manage to ask what he meant by that, only to see the look of pity in the hell's knight's eyes alongside the response.

"The great king of hell has laid out a perfect plan that a maggot like you could never comprehend, let alone put a stop to."

And that was it. Lloyd's heart was pierced by the greatsword in the ending spoiler, preventing him from finding out more.

I must take advantage of this opportunity to hear more.

He felt iffy about just slaying the potential informant. In fact, Lloyd felt insecure.

The king of hell must be scheming something up right now, so as to bring destruction to my estate. I can't let that catastrophe strike.

Lloyd had taken a peek at his last moments through the ending spoiler, and it didn't take a rocket scientist to come to this conclusion. Lloyd couldn't accept the predetermined fate, and had come up with the plan to allow Namaran's Wall to be re-erected, evacuate the citizens, and to wait for the hell's knight to come back with just Javier by his side. His efforts were about to pay off, as the chance to interrogate his enemy was right around the corner.

I can't let this chance go. The grand plan by the king of hell is at least closely related to the enforced fate phenomenon and can even possibly present another opportunity to crush that damn phenomenon once and for all.

Although nothing was clear as of yet, Lloyd saw a glimpse of hope in this situation like a single ray of light shining through a tiny hole into the deep underground cave. That was why Lloyd took a step forward and approached the hell's knight on the ground, crouching down to make eye contact with him.

"It's been a while."

“...”

Sir Giolexius balefully glared at Lloyd, with hostility lingering in his eyes. Javier tightened his grip on the sword, preparing to crush his skull in time just in case the hell’s knight managed to get up and strike Lloyd, as his master put a fake smile on his face and continued.

“It looks like you wish not to speak with me.”

“...”

“Hmm. That’s a shame.”

“...”

“But you just asked Javier to grant you a quick, honorable death. Right?”

“...”

“I’m afraid I’m the one that can decide that.”

“...”

“You’re not going to die even if you want to, if you keep your mouth shut like that.”

“Kill me right now.”

“I refuse.”

“...”

Sir Giolexius grinded his teeth balefully as Lloyd’s smile deepened.

“There is a surefire way to get your wish granted. Just answer my questions.”

“Questions?”

“The king of hell. He’s up to something, isn’t he?”

“...”

“Tell me all you know.”

“...”

“So you won’t talk.”

“I don’t know anything.”

“Really?”

“That’s right.”

“Tsk. What a bummer. I suppose you think there is honor in lying.”

“All I want is honorable battle and death. Sharing my king’s secrets with enemies isn’t what a true knight does.”

Sir Giolexius’s eyes glowed ominously. He had just declared that he wouldn’t betray his lord as a knight chasing after honor, despite being from a realm full of trickery and dishonesty. However, the hell’s knight had failed to take into account Lloyd’s persistent and sketchy character.

“Really? Okay, then.”

Lloyd shrugged his shoulders at the solemn response by Sir Giolexius. The estate developer’s gaze soon turned into a rather nefarious one, however.

“I guess I’ll have to torture you until you spill the beans, then.”

“...What?”

“Let’s start with your sense of hearing.”

“What are you—”

“I’m sure you remember the singing lessons by Maestro Lloyd Frontera.”

Lloyd put a big smile on his face and held his shovel up like a microphone. Sir Giolexius’s face turned pale, as he obviously remembered what had happened in the past.

“W-wait!”

“Ahem. Mm. Ah. Ah. Testing the microphone. One and two and three and four.”

“H-hold on!”

The hell’s knight’s voice became desperate, but Lloyd did not care. He turned to Javier and mischievously rebuked him.

“Javier. What do you think you’re doing?”

“Huh?”

“Drop the beat box.”

“…”

That was how Lloyd’s merciless, ruthless, and inhumane torture session to draw out information from the hell’s knight began.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 377: Hell’s Knight’s Hell (2)

Namaran, the city atop the cliff, was in absolute silence a little after midnight. Dark purple barrier of strange magical energy lit underneath the moonlight that shone ominously upon the streets, as an even more peculiar song, if it could be called that, broke the quietness of the night from the empty city hall in the center of the town with the intent to send the eardrums of anyone that heard it to the afterlife.

“Twinkle! Twinkle! Little! Star! How I! Wonder! What you are! Up above the world so high! Like a diamond in the sky!”

“Ugh...!”

“Twinkle! Twinkle! Little! Star!”

“D-don’t wonder...!”

“How I! Wonder! What you aaaaare!”

Lloyd’s outcry of a song filled the city hall. His voice was particularly strong and loud despite the lack of any musical knack, absolutely molesting the hell’s knight’s ears. Sir Giolexius, the commander of the first corp of hell’s army, struggled deeply with each word that came out of Lloyd’s mouth. He vented.

“Stop!”

“No.”

“Do you honestly think I will give in and speak?”

“Oh, I think you will.”

“...”

“Most definitely.”

“That will never happen.”

“We’ll see what happens. Ahem.”

The hell’s knight twitched his jaws in frustration as Lloyd cleared his throat, shortly before tilting his face sideways in an annoying manner.

“So you have no intention of telling me what the king of hell is scheming to accomplish as of yet. Is that correct?”

“I won’t!”

“I am so relieved to hear my dearest fan wants to keep listening to my songs.”

“Th-that’s...”

“Thank you so much. Shall I, then?”

“H-hold on!” Sir Giolexius shouted desperately, but the plea did not sway Lloyd’s heard a single inch in any direction whatsoever.

“Check this out. Five little monkeys jumping on the bed! One fell down and bumped his head!”

“...Urgh...!” Sir Giolexius shook his skull violently, but he couldn’t put up a resistance at all as Javier had begun to add beat into the terrifying nursery rhyme.

Bam! Bam! Badum-tss. Thump! Thump! The sheath of the grandmaster’s sword fell straight down, shrouded in rhythmic aura, on the hell’s knight’s head like percussion enriching any music.

“Argh! Therp! Ouch!”

The shock from the impact was immense, as Lloyd’s torturous song continued to rattle the hell’s knight’s ear drums.

“Mama called the doctor and the doctor said! No more monkeys jumping on the bed!”

“S-stop!”

“Stop?”

“Y-yes! Just stop it already...!”

“Then are you going to tell me what the king of hell is up to now?”

“Like I told you before, I am a knight bound by honor not to share the secret plans of my lord and liege!”

“Then keep listening to my songs.”

“What?!”

“Next song.”

“H-hold on!”

Sir Giolexius hurriedly stretched out his hands, only to be whacked in the arm by Javier’s strike.

Bam!

“Urgh!”

Knee to the jaws fell like an entire avalanche sweeping through his face. Sir Giolexius barely managed to stay awake and lifted his body from the ground with two hands, followed by deep regrets.

“Row, row, row your boat, gently down the stream! Merrily, merrily, merrily, merrily, life is but a dream!”

Bang! Bang! Bang! Javier smacked the crap out of the hell’s knight skull, along with the beat of Lloyd’s horrid performance.

“Row, row, row your boat, gently up the creek! If you see a little mouse, don’t forget to squeak!”

“Urgh...”

It felt as if he was rowing his boat across the River Styx each time Lloyd let out another word out of his mouth. Sir Giolexius desperately wished to lose his consciousness, dropping the hellish glow on his down like teardrops down his cheeks. But Lloyd’s massively destructive performance continued, this time with a gently abysmal choice of song with the intent to comfort the little poor soul from hell, accompanied by off-pitch notes.

“You better watch out! You better not cry! You better not pout! I’m telling you why! Why! Santa Claus is coming! To town!”

“...”

The hell’s knight would rather cry out in agony right now, but couldn’t due to the sheath of Grandmaster Javier rattling his skull rhythmically to enrich the distasteful performance.

“He’s making a list, and checking it twice!”

Bam! Bam! Badumt-ss. Thump! Thump!

“Gonna find out! Who’s naughty or nice!”

Badum-tss.

“Urgh! Argh! Ack!”

The fierce beating of the skull genuinely made Sir Giolexius wonder who this Santa Claus was, but he knew one thing for sure: who was naughty. There was one individual clearly naughtier and more evil than the king of hell.

“Ugh... Stop! Enough!” Sir Giolexius cried out, failing to endure the physical and aural violence manhandling him simultaneously. His entire body shivered.

Perhaps the cry for help was heard by the god, as Lloyd finally stopped his concert that was as horrendous and filthy as the buzzing sound of flies over rotting food in the trash can.

“Enough? For real?”

“Huff... Huff... Thank you...”

“Too early to say that,” Lloyd replied with a halfway smile, asking the hell’s knight in a cold voice. “So, are you finally ready to tell me what I want to hear?”

“Th-that’s...”

“Go on.”

“I am a knight. I can’t...”

“Wrong answer.”

“H-hold on!”

“Ahem. One, two, one, two, three, go!”

“Stop!”

“What.”

“N-no. Please don’t sing...”

“You want me to stop singing.”

“...Right,” Sir Giolexius nodded and replied in a resentful voice. “The worst song I thought I had ever heard was sung by the choir of angels, until I heard your performance today.”

“Thank you so much. You flatter me.”

“You can physically torture me in any other way you desire. I’ll endure it silently. So Please just stop singing.”

“No.”

“But it’s massively agonizing! Not just my ears, but it feels like my entire honor and pride as a knight are being overlooked upon! I don’t know if you know this or not, but I am a knight from hell, who has sworn an oath to live or die by blood and fire of the battlefield!”

“Okay, so what?”

“But your song... is literally crushing all that down! It’s as if you don’t acknowledge me as a proud knight! It’s massively humiliating.”

“But you didn’t find it humiliating to serve a liege that didn’t do anything for you in exchange for your blind loyalty?”

“What?” Sir Giolexius paused. Lloyd put a bigger smile on his face.

“Think about it. The king of hell isn’t a great liege.”

“What the hell are you talking about?”

“Your lord and liege? But what did he do to earn your loyalty? Did he offer you any benefits?”

“Benefits...?”

“Those are your rights at a workplace, as a professional that gets paid to work.”

“What are you trying to get at...?”

Sir Giolexius’s eyes shook as Lloyd Frontera spoke of confusing things that did not make sense to him at all. But the estate developer did not care; he continued to elaborate in an eloquent manner.

“I will tell you what I’m trying to get at. Have you ever gone home immediately after your shift was supposed to be over?”

“Shift...?”

“Yeah. Have you ever?”

“There is no such thing as a shift for a knight. I am sworn to protect my liege day and night. I don’t even have a home to return to.”

“You don’t have a home?!”

“Of course not. Those things are meaningless for a hell’s knight.”

“Tsk, tsk. You are a really poor soul,” said Lloyd, with a look of genuine compassion in his eyes. But before the hell’s knight could reply, he added a pitiful, yet empathetic statement to shake him further. “What about insurance?”

“...What?”

“Insurance. Dental, medical, liability and stuff. What if you get hurt while you’re working and require medical attention? Who takes care of that?”

“Of course—”

There was none. The hell’s knight had never heard of anything like that in hell. Sir Giolexius became speechless at the realization nothing like that was ever discussed or assured, as Lloyd sharply continued to point out the flaws of the system he was in.

“There’s none, right? What happens, then, if you return to hell after getting battered like this? Do you not get any monetary compensation for the risks you undertook? Seriously?”

“That’s—”

“That’s terrible. The king of hell is a terrible man.”

“Don’t you dare insult—”

“Just look. How can I not, when he’s not fulfilling his duty as anyone’s liege?”

“...”

“Think about it. Let me at least hear you get to go on vacation from time to time.”

“...”

“No way.”

“...”

“Are you being serious? No vacations, either?”

“N-no.”

“Holy moly. That’s just outrageous. What about paid leave? Sick leave?”

“Wh-what are even those?”

“You’ve never even heard about those.”

“N-no.”

“Oh. My. Goodness. Tsk, tsk.”

Lloyd let out a sigh and shook his head in disbelief, causing Sir Giolexius to feel a bit cheated for some reason. He thought he may have been a little naïve in the way he took care of himself in the workplace. It felt as though he could have been deprived of benefits that were rightfully his. And Lloyd was quick to notice the change of looks on the hell’s knight’s face like a witty guy he was. He continued to entice the hell’s knight with sugar-coated words.

“That’s just wrong. He did you wrong.”

“I...”

“I know how you feel. You feel cheated. You’re disappointed. After all the trouble you went through to carry out the missions you were given, too. The feeling that you were just being used and abused like an expendable tool. But let me tell you what.”

“Wh-what?”

“Your feelings are not wrong.”

“...”

“Every human... even if you’re not one, has some kind of rights even if you work for someone else. Even if you receive a fat paycheck every month, you still have the right to receive the benefits that are supposed to be given.”

“P-paycheck?”

“Hold up.”

“...”

“You’re not even getting paid?”

“Th-the knight from hell does not fight for money, but for honor—”

“Screw your honor. There’s no such thing as dignity or pride without actual monetary means to back them up.”

“...”

“What. The. Hell. Even if you love putting in extra efforts to make your organization grow, you must take at least minimum wage! From what you told me, you work all day and all night without taking a break, meals or lodging benefits, vacation, insurance, or pay! The king of hell absolutely cheated you!”

“D-don’t you dare say stuff like that against my liege!”

“Yeah, yeah. I know he’s your liege, and I know he brainwashed you to believe that he has the right to exploit you because he’s the king.”

“...”

“Really? You call someone like that your liege? What do you think, Javier?” Lloyd took a glance at Javier, who immediately understood what he was trying to get at and replied.

“That’s the worst kind of liege any honorable knight could have.”

“You think so, too?”

“Yeah. I am a knight in your service as well, but I get my pay and benefits from you, my lord.”

“Of course you do, because those are your rights as someone that works for anyone.”

“I agree with you.”

“...”

Lloyd and Javier passed around the basketball like prime Golden State Warriors looking for the open man to shoot, causing Sir Giolexius to anxiously pout. He had never doubted that it was his duty to offer his king and liege blind loyalty and selfless efforts. He wanted to refute Lloyd’s claims undermining his honor and pride that he had worked so hard to build, for the lack of monetary compensation or benefits. But he couldn’t. His heart still demanded absolute faith in the king of hell, but a small fragment of rationality in him was whispering to his ears.

I...

The hell’s knight had been mistreated, but still gave his one hundred percent to serve the king of hell, who had been, in fact, using his loyalty to his advantage.

“I...”

As soon as Sir Giolexius came to this realization, his entire body twitched in both mental and physical agony. He bled from his mouth as he struggled to reply.

“Perhaps there is a little bit of truth in what you say.”

“Tsk, Tsk. I know how difficult it is to acknowledge this, but you’ve done well.”

“N-no... Perhaps I’ve known this somewhere deep inside my heart for a long time.”

“It’s okay. You’ve been through a lot, being mistreated and exploited.”

“Ugh... Why did I...?”

“Tsk, tsk. Stop crying, dude. You didn’t do anything wrong.”

“B-but I...”

“It’s really okay. Think about it. How is it even your fault? All you did was try to offer your everything to make things better for your employer. There’s nothing wrong with doing your absolute best in a given situation. It’s his fault to have taken advantage of your good heart and exploited you.”

“D-do you think so?”

“Absolutely.”

It was that moment Lloyd knew the hell’s knight had been swayed to his cause. He was definitely ready to open up his heart and share the little secrets he had been reluctant to share. After winning him over completely, the information about the king of hell was going to be finally given. Lloyd clenched his fist with confidence at the sign of success, maintaining the compassionate look on his face and nodding empathetically at the troubled hell’s knight. He added in a soft, gentle voice.

“Be proud of yourself. Lift up your chin, because you are a good and honorable man. You do not deserve to work for a scoundrel like him.”

“Th-then...”

“You want to know what you need to do now, then. You have no idea what you’re supposed to do now.”

“...”

“Perhaps I can tell you. Do you want to hear?”

Sir Giolexius nodded with a heavy heart. It was time for Lloyd to seal the deal with a final move.

“It’s simple. Let’s write up a contract.”

Flap! Lloyd took out a contract that he had drafted in advance from his inner pocket, addressing the shift hours, meal and lodging, benefits including vacation and insurance, and monetary compensation in detail. It was a real, official work contract.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 378: Hell’s Knight’s Hell (3)

“It’s simple. Let’s write up a contract.”

Flap!

“...What?”

Sir Giolexius confusedly stared at the document Lloyd took out. The hell’s knight couldn’t help but think this wasn’t a normal piece of paper.

“Contract...?”

“Yeah. Your employment contract.”

Flap! Lloyd took out another employment contract from his inner pocket and placed it next to the one he previously did, right on the floor between himself and the hell’s knight.

“These two are actually identical. One copy is for me and the other for you to keep, in order to prevent one party from changing the already established terms and conditions behind the other party’s back.”

“What is even an employment contract...?”

“You mean you don’t know?”

“I do have an idea. Does this mean I will be in your service after signing this?”

“Yeah.”

“...”

“Do you not like the idea?”

Sir Giolexius remained silent, causing Lloyd to shake his head.

“Tsk, tsk. Don’t you wish to work while being compensated properly? I thought you were upset because you were being mistreated the whole time.”

“Th-that’s true.”

“Allow me to rectify your situation.”

Tap. Tap. Lloyd tapped the employment contract on the floor with his palm twice, while looking straight into the hell’s knight’s face.

“I won’t say much to persuade you. Just read the content of this document, and sign it if you like it.”

“And if I don’t like it?”

“Then tell me which part you are not very comfortable with, so we can compromise and come to an agreement in that particular area prior to signing the contract. Both parties must be satisfied.”

“...”

Sir Giolexius was speechless. He was astounded by the fact that the terms and conditions could be revised and that he could point out areas he didn’t like. The hell’s knight then proceeded to read the contract draft and skimmed through.

“Dude, read it in detail. Don’t just skim through and sign it without understanding everything on the contract, because I hate guys that complain later about the terms and conditions after signing it,” Lloyd grumbled.

“Uh, o-okay,” Sir Giolexius replied and began to thoroughly read through the draft. It was even more astounding to see it in detail.

What...? I’ll be given a private room to stay...? And I can request a new place if I don’t like it?

Sir Giolexius was visibly shaken. There was no such thing as a tent, let alone a private room in hell. He had spent each night there by digging up a hole to lie down where lava wasn’t flowing at best.

What about the compensation?

The salary was suggested in human currency, which the hell's knight had no idea about, but it was supposedly three times that of a regular knight according to Lloyd, with the promise of incentives in the event of excellent performance that contribute to the prosperity of the estate. Furthermore, participation in certain projects within the estate could earn him extra pay for overtime and inclement weather conditions.

This is... so meticulous. And he's willing to pay for all medical expenses should I get injured while working?

These were only some of the benefits guaranteed in the contract, not to mention the actual work hours, after which the knight could go home and do whatever he wished to do. And that wasn't all.

"What's this?" Sir Giolexius pointed at another clause stated on the draft and began focusing on it. "I don't think I understand this part. The contract can be renewed every five years...? What does this mean?"

"Oh, that," Lloyd replied with a huge smile on his face, explaining the obvious. "It is as it says. The contract you sign today will be effective for five years."

"And what happens after that?"

"The contract is renewed."

"Why the hassle?"

"Because changes could be made to the contract."

"Are terms and conditions going to get worse?"

"That depends on how you do, but those normally get better for the employee. And if you don't like the new terms and conditions, you can always decline to sign."

"Really...?"

“Yeah,” Lloyd nodded. In fact, the draft Lloyd showed the hell’s knight wasn’t for a permanent position.

I can’t offer him a permanent position just yet. I’m only trying to win over his heart in order to hear what the king of hell is scheming behind everyone’s back.

Lloyd didn’t have too much information about the knight’s personality, lifestyle, or tendency to cause trouble when working with others in the estate yet. He was reluctant to offer something more substantial.

“Think of the first five years as a time to get to know each other better. You may or may not like working for me. Don’t you think so?”

“Hmm. I think you make a fair point.”

“See?”

“Yeah.”

Sir Giolexius nodded his skull. He now understood what the contract length was referring to after Lloyd’s thorough explanation. It was actually touching for him, because nobody has ever treated him this well.

And here I thought all I can offer was to fight, kill, and die as I am ordered around without receiving anything in exchange.

The hell’s knight had thought that was how everyone lived, but it turned out that wasn't the case. He realized he certainly did not have to do that, and that he could be rewarded for his efforts and time. He was supposed to, in fact. He had been cheated. As soon as he came to that realization, the hell’s knight made a decision.

“Fine,” said Sir Giolexius, nodding his skull again. “I will sign the contract.”

The hell’s knight took the pose he was so comfortable with, by kneeling on one knee to swear fealty. But Lloyd stopped him with a confused look on his face.

“What the hell are you doing?”

“Huh?”

“You use the pen to put your signature on the document to seal the contract, not prostrate.”

“Signature?”

“Yeah. I explained to you before. You sign the contract.”

Lloyd put another smile on his face and took out his pen, which the hell knight stared at blankly. He took the pen and gripped on it rather awkwardly.

“Wh-where do I put that?”

“Do you see the empty space on the bottom?”

“Yeah.”

“There.”

“How...?”

“Write down your name.”

“Like this?”

“Well done. Sign on this copy the same way.”

“Hmm. It’s not easy, because I haven’t written anything in a while.”

“It’s okay, you’re doing great. Are you done? Then lay one copy halfway over the other so as to slightly overlap them, and put your name on it once again. Just like that. Good.”

Scribble! Hell’s knight Sir Giolexius completed putting his signatures on the documents under Lloyd’s encouragement.

“Great. I will keep this copy, and you hold on to that one. Huh? Wait. I didn’t know your name was this long.”

“Giolexius. Is it too difficult for you to pronounce?”

“Hmm. I think it would be great if you had a nickname that was shorter.”

“I do have one, but it sounds too terrifying and fearsome, befitting my character. Even the demons in hell were afraid to call me this.”

“What is it?”

“Lexi.”

“...”

Lloyd genuinely wondered if the demons in the underworld found this nickname too cringeworthy to even bring up. And the hell’s knight Sir Giolexius knelt down on one knee and stretched out his hands before Lloyd could even respond in the meantime, holding one of Lloyd’s hands and slowly leading it towards his helm.

“Since I signed the contract, I shall serve you as my master from today,” said Lexi, despite the fact that the contract was set to expire five years later. Lexi had decided to serve Lloyd as his lord and liege until the contract was over. Even though the form was different, it wasn’t too far from the swearing fealty to the king. He strengthened his resolve internally, to offer loyalty and faith for the next five years.

A new message popped up.

Ding Dong!

[Approval Rating Unlocked]

[Hell’s Knight Sir Giolexius, Commander of the 1st Corp of Hell’s Army, was deeply touched by the employment contract.]

[Hell’s Knight Sir Giolexius was genuinely astounded by the fair and reasonable working conditions and employment terms that he had never experienced before, and strengthened his resolve to serve you faithfully.]

[Hell’s Knight Sir Giolexius is now in your service.]

[You are now able to increase Approval Rating with Hell’s Knight Sir Giolexius and obtain RP.]

[You have earned 50 RP as a bonus for unlocking a new character Approval Rating.]

[Current RP: 7,121]

[Hell’s Knight Sir Giolexius’s Approval Rating of you increased by 77.]

[Current Approval Rating with Hell’s Knight Sir Giolexius: +37]

[You have earned 847 RP thanks to a huge increase in the Approval Rating.]

[Current RP: 7,968]

Holy.

Bombarded with messages that popped up in front of his eyes, Lloyd nearly lost his composure and burst out in laughter. He couldn’t believe that the approval rating with the hell’s knight was unlocked, and he could gain RP by increasing it.

I can’t believe I can now become friends with the hell’s knight.

He was dumbfounded but felt great, as he was taking steps to reach his ultimate goal for the day.

Since he swore fealty to me, he won’t lie to me about the king of hell and what he’s up to. But I should set things straight before moving on.

Lloyd looked down at hell's knight Sir Giolexius, who was still prostrating like a faithful knight in service of the king. He was going to even lick his boots at this rate.

Ugh. This is so uncomfortable.

Lloyd shook off the awkward atmosphere and spoke.

"Hello? Sir Lexi?"

"I am at your service, my lord and liege."

"You're making me feel uncomfortable."

"I beg your pardon?" said Sir Giolexius, looking up to Lloyd in awe.

"It's too early for you to offer your blind loyalty yet," said Lloyd with a bitter smile on his face. "We're not there yet. You're not a permanent employee right now."

"Huh?"

"Start offering me your loyalty after you get a permanent position. Understood?"

"Permanent position...?"

"Yeah. Let's do our best for the next five years to make the next contract a permanent one. Okay?"

"As you wish, my lord," said Sir Giolexius, bowing down before Lloyd with the hopes that the next contract could be a permanent one. It was like a single ray of light shining down on him in darkness. It was strange and unfamiliar, but certainly heartwarming and encouraging.

"There is something I must speak of, my lord," added the hell's knight.

"What is it?" Lloyd replied.

“It’s about what you asked before.”

“Okay, please go into detail.”

“I will, my lord,” Sir Giolexius bowed, putting a satisfactory smile on Lloyd’s face. But the estate developer’s heart pouted at the same time; he felt anxious and concerned.

Just what the hell is he planning to accomplish?

The schemes by the king of hell were particularly difficult to predict, and that gave Lloyd a massive disadvantage in making appropriate preparations. Perhaps Sir Giolexius understood his new lord’s feelings, as he carefully and cautiously opened his lips.

“In order to explain in detail, I must refresh your memory about a certain event. Do you by any chance remember the sorcerer by the name of Lupellan?”

“Huh?” Lloyd was stunned.

Lupellan? Who was that?

Lloyd swam through the sea of his memory for a time and barely managed to remember someone by that name.

“Isn’t that the name of an evil sorcerer I slew back in the eastern mountains?”

Lloyd took a quick glance at Javier, who just remembered the incident that transpired way earlier. Lloyd continued.

“I got rid of that guy with the help of Javier before. I think that was when I created ice storehouses for the orc villages. A few of my guys in the engineering corps were kidnapped by that mage, so I attacked his base, killed that bastard, and saved my guys. But what about him, though? Is he related to what’s going to happen in any way?”

“That is correct, my lord,” nodded Sir Giolexius, before he proceeded to ask another question in a more solemn voice. “Do you also remember someone by the name of Neumann?”

“I definitely do,” Lloyd replied right away, without trying to remember this time. “He was a traitor that worked together with fraudsters. He got caught red-handed by me when he was selling off information about our estate.”

Sir Neumann, the traitor, was the senior knight in Lord of Frontera’s estate when he was still a baron. He commanded a group of knights including Javier, before being exposed.

“He lost to me and got squashed by Ppodong, before getting exiled from the estate covered in injuries. What about him, though?”

Lloyd frowned in confusion. Something wasn’t right. Something was amiss. Both Lupellan and Sir Neumann were people that were long lost in his memories. They were minor villains that caused trouble not long after he found himself in the body of Lloyd Frontera. They were defeated in the end and since then completely removed from the picture.

Why were they even mentioned just now, though? I don’t think they were related in any way.

Something was definitely up. Sir Giolexius opened his lips again as Lloyd was lost in thoughts.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 379: How to Go Against Destiny (1)

“Lord Lloyd,” said Giolexius, slowly and cautiously confirming Lloyd’s suspicions. “They have been intertwined together without your knowledge, due to the flow of causality.”

“Intertwined...?”

“Yes, my lord,” the hells’ knight continued. “First, when you and Sir Javier slew Lupellan, you probably believed he had died for good. In reality, however, he had only lost his physical body and his soul traveled around in this realm.”

“Like an apparition with a grudge.”

“Yes, my lord. It must be because his desire to continue existing was far greater than anyone could imagine.”

“...”

Lloyd became speechless. He thought about the incident in which he killed the evil sorcerer and dark mage Lupellan, and admitted that the villain certainly exhibited such character. His reaction wasn’t that of someone that just didn’t want to die, but that of someone that had to survive at all costs in order to bring back his dead wife and children. His work on dark magic wasn’t completed. It was that kind of desperation.

Tsk. And sacrificing other innocent people just to bring back your dead family is okay? Give me a break.

Lloyd was disgusted by the hypocrisy of the man that supposedly was that immensely desperate to keep living.

So selfish and inconsiderate. His dead wife and children can’t come back to life if he dies? That’s not even a special excuse that only he has. Millions of fathers across the world are trying their best to put food on the table and take care of their wives and children. They strengthen their resolve every time they wake up and go to work because they feel responsible for their family.

Lloyd snorted as Sir Giolexius continued.

“Anyhow, he used that desperation to drive him and became an apparition, instead of going to the underworld. That itself wasn’t too big of a deal, as apparitions are not that rare.”

“Then?”

“The problem was that he was an apparition with great knowledge about dark magic.”

“Hmm... Wait.”

“Are you getting a rough idea?”

“Yeah. Perhaps he found a suitable tool of an individual.”

“That is exactly where I was going, my lord,” Sir Giolexius nodded. “Lupellan’s apparition traveled around in this world and thought of ways to come back to life. Since he had the desperation and the knowledge, all he needed was a good tool. And he found just that.”

“...Please don’t tell me that’s Sir Neumann.”

“I’m afraid it is.”

“How did that happen?”

“It was all a huge coincidence, unless they were somehow predestined to meet. Anyhow, Sir Neumann had become a living corpse after sustaining grave injuries all over his body and being exiled. The physical disability to have difficulty even to lift his spoon to eat, along with the mental trauma from the event, drove him completely mad. He barely maintained himself, only to reiterate the same thing, that he will kill Lloyd Frontera one day, over and over. That he’d rather die if it can’t be done. That’s when Lupellan’s soul ran into this man.”

“...”

Lloyd bitterly bit his lips. It was a terrible coincidence, or a tragic flow of fate. He was particularly agitated by the fact that both Lupellan and Neumann harbored immense grudge against him.

“It was the meeting between the soul of the dark mage that lost his body, and the exiled knight that lost his soul,” Sir Giolexius continued. “It didn’t take them long to realize that their grudges were towards the same person.”

“So they became one.”

“To be precise, Lupellan destroyed Neumann’s soul and took over his body.”

“Tsk. I suppose that’s what an evil sorcerer would do.”

“What he did afterwards was also befitting.”

“What did he do?”

“He did not exhibit any signs hinting he had taken over Neumann’s body. He continued acting like a madman and receiving care from his family, while making one preparation at a time in order to bestow strength to his messed up body.”

“Wait. Hold up.”

“Did you get another rough idea as to what happened next?”

“Yeah, but it’s a terrible one. Did he by any chance use Sir Neumann’s family as sacrifices...?”

“I regret to tell you he did.”

“...”

Lloyd became speechless again, as Sir Giolexius went on.

“On the first night on which the old moon was up in the sky after he gained a new body, Lupellan performed a dark magic ritual that he had prepared discreetly over time. He summoned the demon of gluttony from hell and offered Neumann’s family as sacrifices. The demon of gluttony enjoyed the meal and offered a little bit of health to Lupellan in return, just enough so as to enable him to walk again, albeit with a limp.”

One horrific deed after another was revealed, as the evil plan lying beneath showed itself.

“Since he could move on his own, he started modifying his physical body little by little based on all he knew about dark magic. Then he finally reached the peak of physical modification through dark magic; he became a lich.”

“Tsk.”

Lloyd shook his head. He knew very well what a lich was, as this creature was mentioned in the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron as well.

Lich is an evil sorcerer that became an undead by abandoning humanity and vitality himself. It’s an undead archmage, so to speak. Its body will keep coming back to life despite being slain numerous times, with an endless supply of mana.

A lich was as powerful an adversary as a hell’s knight. Lloyd couldn’t believe an evil sorcerer he had slain became a massively annoying enemy to deal with, and began harboring this question.

“Hold on a second. I can’t help but think you mentioned this because this is somehow related to what the king of hell is planning. Correct?”

“That’s right, my lord,” said Sir Giolexius, with sparkling eyes. “Lupellan did not forget his ultimate goal even after becoming a lich. It is to exact revenge on you, my lord.”

“What happened to resurrecting his wife and children?”

“He lost a good chunk of humanity as he became a lich. I suspect his desperate desire to bring them back to life disappeared along with it.”

“And he was only left with the grudge against me.”

“Yes, my lord. And he chose to go with the surest way to get his wish.”

“And what would that be?”

“He expended all of his mana to get an audience with the king of hell, and asked him to open the hell’s gate to send reinforcements.”

“Hell’s gate? Reinforcements?”

“Yes, my lord. The hell’s gate is to open on Frontera Estate, unleashing an army of hell’s soldiers to sweep it.”

“...”

It sent chills down Lloyd’s spine and shut him up. Lloyd finally grasped the gravity of the situation.

Dark mage Lupellan. He really laid this out carefully.

Lloyd could guess that the lich had performed surveillance over the estate discreetly, coming to a conclusion.

He probably thought he could still lose despite having become a lich. Which isn’t difficult to imagine because of Javier. Even if Javier accompanies me outside of the estate, the dragon Solitas is there, and the angel Raphael recently settled in the estate, not to mention the dragon king Verkis in the guest chamber.

A single lich couldn’t dare attack the estate alone. That was probably why he asked the king of hell for reinforcements.

“And what did the king of hell say? He accepted the request?”

“Yes, my lord. There was no reason for him not to,” said Sir Giolexius promptly. “As you are already aware, the king of hell wishes you dead so he could keep you by his side. But you somehow manage to overcome one life-threatening situation after another, and that’s probably been getting on his nerves.”

“And a certain lich from this realm requested an audience and asked for reinforcements.”

“Exactly, my lord. That gave the king of hell a great cause to deploy his forces above ground.”

“I see. That would make it look like he’s only answering the request by the lich to send an army, instead of attacking without a just cause. Jeez.”

Lloyd took a deep breath, having finally realized what was going on and how the dark sorcerer he had gotten rid of way long in the past was related to the king of hell.

Come to think of it, it could be an event that could trigger the enforced fate phenomenon. It’s a new form of it.

He was reminded of the applicable arc within the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron, in which evil mage Lupellan was supposed to appear towards the latter part of the story. He was a hideous individual that sacrificed thousands of innocent lives through nefariously powerful dark magic and through sheer will on bringing back the dead. He would go on to destroy a few cities and settlements, causing massacres everywhere he went.

But here, he got caught by me and Javier before he could work on anything.

He had died in this world way earlier in comparison to the novel, and did not have a chance to wreak havoc. Lloyd had thought he did a good job by getting rid of a potential threat before it could grow, and he had taken pride in the fact he saved innocent lives from pre-determined massacres.

In reality, all such actions had caused the destiny as per the original story to go wayward, eventually causing the enforced restoration of fate to affect Lupellan's fate as well.

Dark mage Lupellan, who had lost his life way before he was supposed to, was brought back to life by a mysterious flow of fate. The lich that returned was about to cause massacres Lloyd had prevented from happening.

He was an adept dark sorcerer in the story, but is now a lich. He was supposed to wreak havoc elsewhere, but is about to raze the Frontera Estate. The army of ghouls and zombies he had raised in the novel has been replaced by the army from hell.

Although the details were different, bigger events were just as the original story offered. In terms of horridness and the scale of the tragedy, it was even more catastrophic.

And what would happen after the Frontera Estate is razed down to ashes and everyone there dies? That would yield a result very close to the one the enforced fate phenomenon intends to bring about.

Lloyd was convinced now. The incomplete reset by the enforced fate phenomenon had been wanting Count of Frontera and his wife to suffer death all along, as well as those of Julian, Scheherazade, the Sultan and the Young Lady of Namaran, all of whom were supposed to die in the original novel.

Attacking the Frontera Estate could accomplish all of that in one act, returning the fate and history of those that were saved by my intervention to where they're supposed to be.

Lloyd felt more chills down his spine at the thought of it. He couldn't help but think that this forced restoration of destiny was more persistent and meticulous than he had anticipated. He was reminded of what the king of hell had recently told him.

He said the enforced fate phenomenon will come at me at an even greater force, the more I try to resist it, like a crashing of waves that consecutively gets more powerful, eventually bringing an unstoppable tsunami.

He recalled the look on the king of hell's face, showing absolute confidence in Lloyd's eventual demise despite the endeavors to stop the approaching fate.

Bite. Lloyd grinded his teeth bitterly.

But if you honestly thought I was going to give up here, you're absolutely wrong.

Lloyd was determined not to. He couldn't surrender. Not here.

Not after all I've done to survive!

In fact, he had literally climbed from the very bottom, enduring the stay in a tiny room full of mold and bugs in South Korea, the status of a country nobleman with an immense amount of debt, and an abundance of dust from endless constructions. He had made contributions to the royal court of the kingdom, which were finally recognized by the queen. Lloyd and his family's future was about to be secured for the rest of his life very soon. The life of a bum with status, power, and wealth, which he had dreamt of achieving for a very long time, was right around the corner.

This is basically the last obstacle.

Lloyd could live in absolute luxury as long as he could take care of this problem for good. But this particular matter seemed like an insurmountable wall. Even if he were to overcome it, there always could be another one waiting for him. Because he couldn't even imagine how much worse the next one was going to be, Lloyd came to this conclusion.

I must finish this once and for all.

He was determined to put an end to it regardless of what it took, this time.

It's already getting out of hand. The attack on the Frontera Estate itself is huge, but I should be able to stop it somehow if I scrape together the resources to focus on it. However, I have zero confidence against the next one that attempts to restore destiny. That's why I must put a stop to it this time.

The wheel of fate that continuously and persistently chased after Lloyd Frontera, as well as the greed displayed by the king of hell, had to be destroyed. Lloyd suspected he couldn't keep fending it off one at a time. The greatest estate developer thought of what he could predict, carefully laid out what he was capable of, took many different options into account, looked for hopes here and there, and continued devising tactics and strategies to overcome the hardship. After a series of calculations and weighing of situations, he finally came to this conclusion.

"Ha," Lloyd let out a chuckle and took a glance at Javier and Sir Giolexius. "It's going to be a walk in the park."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 380: How to Go Against Destiny (2)

“It’s going to be a walk in the park.”

Lloyd put a smile on his face, convincing himself to think this way. In fact, it didn’t take him long to come up with a solution anyways. But the estate developer noticed the looks from Javier and Sir Giolexius, and opened one eye wider than the other in response.

“What. Why are you two staring at me like that?” Lloyd grumbled.

“I was wondering what kind of outrageous scheme you have in your mind this time, and I was also genuinely concerned,” said Javier immediately, as though the silver-haired knight was waiting for Lloyd to say something. “But it looks like we’re in dire need of a plan, no matter how outrageous it may sound. I really had no idea the evil sorcerer we got rid of would turn out to be the cause of this much nuisance.”

“That’s what I’m saying. I really didn’t expect him to request the support of the king of hell.”

“So, let’s hear the easy method.”

“You’ll find out soon enough,” said Lloyd with a mysterious smile. “You’ll realize it back in our estate, after we wrap things up here. Alright, Gio... I mean, Lexi.”

“Yes, my lord,” the hell’s knight replied to his new liege immediately.

“Let’s start with getting rid of this wall. I’ve been enduring the aura it’s emanating with the help of the Asrahan Core Technique, but it’s still a little disturbing. You can remove this, right?”

“Of course, my lord.”

“Then do it.”

“As you command,” Sir Giolexius nodded.

Whoosh. The wall disappeared in an instant, like the fire on the gas burner ran out of fuel, and the cell phone screen turned off due to insufficient battery. The wall of magical energy that shrouded the entire city was gone, just like that, without requiring a complex incantation, evil ritual, or a special performance.

“Dude,” Lloyd tilted his head in confusion.

“I am at your service, my lord.”

“That’s it?”

“It’s a rather simple process, my lord.”

“Really?”

“Yes, my lord, because it’s more like turning off the wall instead of destroying it.”

“Then why didn’t you turn it off before?”

“Because you hadn’t asked, my lord.”

“Really.”

“I’m speaking the truth, my lord.”

“Are you sure you didn’t keep it on because having it on was more convenient for you?”

“...”

“I should have expected a hell’s knight, who’s best friends with Satan, to be a pathological liar!”

“I-I’m not lying, my lord!” Sir Giolexius vehemently denied.

“Are you serious?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“Then can you re-raise that magical wall any time you want?”

“No, my lord. It takes thorough preparations to actually erect it.”

“That’s a relief,” said Lloyd, gesturing at Javier and Sir Giolexius. “Let’s get going, then. We have a lot of work to do.”

He left the city hall with the two, and out of the city towards the temporary camp, in which citizens were outside of their tents despite the time of the night. Regardless of their status and wealth, pretty much everyone was murmuring and clamoring about what could have transpired.

To be fair, they just saw Namaran’s Wall being erected and disappearing in a short period of time.

Lloyd suspected the citizens found it strange and mesmerizing, yet mysterious and terrifying. The estate developer passed through the crowd unnoticed, thanks to the hooded robes all three of them were dressed in, and went into the countess’s tent.

“You’ve returned safely,” said Countess of Namaran, rising from her seat immediately to greet them, before flinching at the sight of the hell’s knight.

“It’s okay,” intervened Lloyd immediately, noticing the look on her face. “Our hell’s knight doesn’t bite... I mean, he won’t cause any trouble.”

“Won't cause any trouble?”

“Yes, my lady. He just signed an employment contract and agreed to work for me for the next five years.”

“...”

“You don’t have to stare at me like that, ahem. Anyhow, we got it taken care of. You saw the wall rise and disappear, correct?”

“I surely did. Please tell me none of you are hurt.”

“We are not, thanks to your prayers,” Lloyd replied with a huge smile on his face. “The wall is permanently taken care of, and nothing like this will occur again. It’s safe to allow the citizens to return to their homes. And I must get back to my estate immediately.”

“To Frontera Estate? Right now?”

“Yes, my lady. Forgive me for being unable to tell you the details,” said Lloyd with a bitter smile.

“Since you’re keen on returning without repairing the stabilization piles that support the cliff,” said Countess of Namaran, having read Lloyd’s intentions. “Something must have happened there that requires your immediate attention.”

“It’s going to very soon. But I would like to make this promise.”

“What kind of promise?”

“I will come back and make repairs to the structures after the issue back in my estate is resolved.”

“For free?”

“No way.”

“I should have expected.”

“That’s how things work in the world, after all.”

Lloyd smilingly assured the countess by telling her there are a few stabilization piles and anchors that were undamaged and solid, and that they wouldn’t collapse unless the cliff side sustains additional big damages. He was sorry to have to leave like this, but the city should be safe for the time being, and he was going to come back before anything else happened. He promised and gave her his word, shortly before departing from the camp to hop on the back of Draggy, who began dancing happily upon seeing the hell's knight like a retriever wagging its tails at the sight of its owner.

"What the hell...?" Lloyd asked Sir Giolexius, who responded by shrugging his shoulders.

"It seems particularly happy to see me."

"You? Why? Do you know each other?"

"No."

"Then why?"

"Mm... I think it's telling us that he's no longer the newest member of the skeleton corp..."

"Aha."

Sir Lexi was the newest member of the corp, meaning his seniors were going to pick on him. Lloyd barely managed to contain himself from bursting out in laughter from the thought of the hell's knight running errands, as Javier asked him a question.

"Master Lloyd. There is something I'm concerned about."

"What is it?"

"Are we not going to apprehend the culprit behind Namaran's Wall this time?"

"Oh, that," replied Lloyd with a grin, noticing the look of curiosity in Javier's eyes. "There's no need. As a matter of fact, there is no culprit."

"Huh?"

"There is nobody behind this phenomenon."

“Then... why were the stabilization piles embedded with some kind of mana...?”

“Enforced fate phenomenon.”

“...”

Javier was speechless. Lloyd turned around to elaborate.

“The mana that had dissipated in the past came back together due to the enforced restoration of fate, to the spot I discovered the jewel of noctanium during the first wall.”

“Are you saying that mana accumulated in the stabilization pile that was installed near that very spot?”

“Exactly,” Lloyd nodded at Javier’s perfect summary. It was the information he had received through the ending spoiler, in which he was brutally murdered by the hell’s knight. “Mana won’t gather there again, nor will the wall re-rise, because he is alive.”

Lloyd pointed at the hell’s knight Sir Giolexius, who nodded in response.

“That’s correct. The wall’s purpose is to awaken and summon me. As long as I’m alive, it won’t happen again.”

“You heard him,” Lloyd shrugged his shoulders.

“I see. That makes sense,” Javier nodded slowly.

“Of course it does.”

That really was the case. The enforced fate phenomenon, in fact, would force certain events that were prevented to re-occur in a similar way in the same spot. But with the hell’s knight still alive, despite the new employment contract and all; that didn’t particularly alter the predestined fate.

Namaran's Wall's purpose is to gather enough mana in order to summon hell's knight Giolexius. The wall completely served its purpose, since he is still alive.

Lloyd suspected the wall wouldn't re-rise, as long as Giolexius worked for him. That was going to keep Namaran safe.

That's why I didn't kill him.

Keeping him alive and making him serve Lloyd instead was the ultimate goal the estate developer had in his mind.

Whew. Mission accomplished.

Lloyd breathed a deep sigh of relief. He wasn't confident he could get things done like this again. He was scared and afraid on one side, but optimistic on the other.

"First things first. Let's go back to the estate."

Whoosh! Draggy stomped on the ground and soared into the sky, taking Lloyd and others on its back away from Namaran. They flew all night and saw the sunrise, as they traveled through the morning mist of the mountain range and arrived in the estate. Lloyd immediately went to the mansion as soon as they landed, but not to see his parents.

"Hello? Are you there?"

Knock, knock. Lloyd knocked on the door of the guest rather softly, putting his ear on the door to see if he could hear anything. He couldn't.

He must be asleep.

But he couldn't even hear the sound of breathing, despite possessing the enhanced hearing ability of the swordmaster.

Dragon king Verkis. I knew he was the biggest bum in the world.

Lloyd wondered how deep one's sleep had to be, to make absolutely no noise. He suspected Verkis had reached a transcendental state in sleeping, as he cautiously turned the doorknob. The door wasn't locked, to his relief.

Good.

Lloyd slowly and silently pushed the door a little with the intent to head inside carefully, and gently wake the dragon king Verkis up. He was going to try his best not to agitate him, making offers he couldn't possibly refuse, so as to persuade him to fight for the estate.

If that works, the invasion by the hell's army is nothing to worry about. As powerful as they are, they're no match for the dragon king.

The dragon king could perhaps even give the king of hell a run for his money in a duel, based on the might he had displayed. Lloyd was hopeful, convinced, and desperate. He took a peek into the room with those thoughts in his heart, however, only to be flustered.

Huh?

He wasn't there. Verkis was nowhere to be seen in the entire guest chamber.

What? Did he use magic or something?

Lloyd wondered if the dragon king had cast the invisibility spell to conceal himself, in order to get even better sleep. The estate developer quickly operated all three circles with the help of the Asrahan Core Technique, thoroughly searching the flow of mana in the vicinity. It was no use.

He isn't here.

He couldn't detect a single breath, or a single streak of mana by Verkis. It was absolutely unexpected and frustrating.

Dragon king Verkis is the laziest bum I know. He can't have left his bed and gone elsewhere. This doesn't make any sense.

This was something Lloyd had never anticipated, unless there was a trigger. But Lloyd looked around and discovered a certain item that could hint at the possibility: a small note on the end table.

“...”

Lloyd picked up the note, which contained only a few words: Gone. Don’t. Kill.

“...”

Lloyd had initially thought this was some kind of a code that needed to be deciphered. However, it wasn’t.

Gone. Don’t. Kill. Could it mean I’m gone, don’t look for me, or I’ll kill you?

It appeared Verkis was too lazy to write down complete sentences, and that was convincing enough for Lloyd to believe it.

Okay, this is definitely left by Verkis. He left, and he’s threatening to kill me if I find him and bother him.

Lloyd let out a bitter chuckle at the realization.

Tsk. I could easily resolve this issue with the help of Verkis.

But this seemed out of the picture as of now. Knowing the dragon king, Lloyd thought he couldn’t depend on him.

He doesn’t listen to others, and is moody. The only person he ever listens to is his wife. He’s a selfish prick and acts on impulse. If someone like him went through the trouble to leave a note...

Lloyd couldn’t help but think that it was a strong expression of his will. Defying his will in a situation like this did not seem to be a good idea.

I’m going to die for real.

Dragon king sponsorship or not, Lloyd was going to infuriate him and be killed in an instant. He suspected he could die by the hands of the dragon king before facing the king of hell. Having calculated that much, Lloyd grinned bitterly and accepted it.

Alright, the dragon king's help is out of the picture.

Lloyd had just lost his biggest trump card, and that gave him a massive headache. But he wasn't going to give up just yet.

"Master Lloyd. What do we do now?"

"Hmm. I suppose we'll have to go with plan B."

"Plan B?"

"Yeah," Lloyd nodded at Javier and asked the frowning knight in an assuring manner. "Have you ever showered in two billion liters of holy water?"

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 381: Touch the Angel's Heart (1)

"Have you ever showered in two billion tons of holy water?"

Flinch! The hell's knight Sir Giolexius shuddered at Lloyd's casual mentioning of "two billion liters of holy water," while Javier frowned his picturesquely beautiful eyebrows instead.

"Holy water?" Javier asked.

"Do you not know what it is?"

"I do, obviously."

"Of course."

"Yeah," Javier nodded, proceeding to explain the obvious. "I heard it's a sacred liquid produced through desperate prayers of high-ranking priests, and that it's extremely effective on the likes of apparitions, evil spirits, demons, and other undeads."

"You're right. It's indeed extremely effective."

Lloyd nodded. As a matter of fact, the holy water could permanently destroy ordinary ghouls and zombies with a single drop or two, and even weaken a powerful demon to the level of a common human by splashing the liquid.

"The hell's knight would also sustain huge damage from the holy water. I suspect he wouldn't be able to put up a decent fight for a while."

"Probably. A regular swordmaster should be able to give him a challenge."

"That's where I'm going with this."

Lloyd chuckled satisfactorily, but Javier wasn't too convinced.

"But that scenario sounds way too plausible. It's unrealistic."

“Unrealistic?”

“Yeah.”

“Do you think it’s farfetched?”

“A little bit.”

“Why?”

“Because you said two billion liters.”

“I certainly did.”

“That’s exactly why,” said Javier, frowning his gorgeous eyebrows again to elaborate with a sharp tongue. “Is it even possible to gather that much holy water? As far as I know, it takes an extremely devoted high-ranking priest’s continuous effort, involving non-stop fasting and prayer, for 100 days to fill a small ink bottle with the holy water.”

“That’s true. You’re absolutely correct.”

“Two billion liters is just outrageous.”

“But it isn’t.”

“How so?”

“Because I’m going to get my hands on the holy water extract, not the finished product itself,” Lloyd’s smile became more prominent as he continued explaining to Javier. “Raphael, the angel of thrones.”

“...Ah,” paused Javier, causing Lloyd’s smile to get even greater.

“Do you finally get it?”

“Are you planning to obtain the angel’s tears?”

“Obviously,” Lloyd nodded confidently, as that was certainly possible and would give him a fine advantage. “You know what the angel’s tears are capable of, correct?”

“Yeah. I had heard about it from a passing pilgrim that happened to stop by the village I grew up in, when I was little.”

“That’s when you heard it?”

“Yeah. I heard the angel’s tears are key ingredients in producing the holy water.”

“Precisely. One drop of angel’s tear is enough to fill a good number of bottles.”

“But two billion liters is still too... farfetched.”

“How?”

“Because one drop of angel’s tear is enough to make about one liter of holy water, from what I had heard when I was a child. Am I mistaken?”

Javier tilted his head in confusion. Lloyd’s claim to produce two billion liters of holy water, and the confidence with which the estate developer made such statements, made absolutely no sense to the grandmaster.

“You learned it right. To get into more details, one milliliter of angel’s teardrop mixed with one liter of pure water equals one liter of holy water.”

Lloyd grinned mysteriously. It was true. Holy water was produced at the ratio of one part angel’s teardrop to one thousand parts pure water.

The ratio is a bit different, but it’s like mixing bleach with water.

It wasn’t too far from making a solution of bleach and water before starting to mop the floors. Creating the holy water the same way from angelic teardrops and water in a specific ratio was going to produce a fine solution to get rid of zombies, ghouls, apparitions, demons, etc. like germs and mold in between the tiles.

“Except, that ratio only applies with the teardrop of tier-9 angels, which are the lowest in rank,” added Lloyd.

“Wait a minute. Does that mean the teardrop of higher ranking angels is...?”

“Exactly,” Lloyd nodded, as he proceeded to explain with a subtle look of superiority on his face. “The effectiveness of the teardrop increases by ten times with each rank.”

“That means...”

“Right. 1 milliliter of a tier-8 angel’s tears is enough to produce 10 liters of holy water, and that of a tier-7 angel, 100 liters. It’s simple math. How many liters of holy water, then could 1 milliliter of tears from a tier-3 angel of thrones?”

“...”

“Come on, it’s simple math.”

“...”

“Are you seriously still counting?”

“No. I was done with the math a while ago. It’s just that...”

“I’m listening.”

“It’s still one million liters.”

“Well done,” said Lloyd, with the look of a tutor giving the tutee some math lessons. “You’re right. Theoretically, one milliliter of tears from the angel of thrones is enough to produce one million liters of holy water.”

“...”

“Ten milliliters would become ten million liters of holy water, 100 milliliters 100 million, and one liter one billion.”

“...”

“Basically, two liters of tears from the angel of thrones is all we need.”

“...”

“Dude.”

“...”

“Why aren’t you saying anything?”

“Well,” Javier finally broke the silence, frowning further. “I was concerned before because of how unrealistic the plan sounded in the beginning.”

“And?”

“But now, I’m genuinely concerned about Raphael.”

“Why?”

“Because you would certainly and easily extract two liters of tears from anybody, let alone from an angel.”

“You’re making me look like a ruthless cutthroat exploiting people around me.”

“...”

“Is that what you were really thinking?”

Javier silently but genuinely nodded. Lloyd snorted at the inability to refute the idea and tried to change the subject quickly.

“Anyhow, that’s the plan. Two liters of tears from the angel of thrones. How does that sound?”

That could produce two billion liters of holy water, which was enough to make the entire hell’s corp enjoy a wave pool in a water park, let alone shower them.

I've also taken into account how to gather that much pure water to go with it, manufacture the holy water, and spray it at the enemies.

It was all-inclusive in the alternate plan. Lloyd went over the plan once again, as Javier shrugged his shoulders on the side.

"If it's theoretically possible, it's certainly worth a try."

"See? What do you think, Lexi?"

"...I'm afraid."

"Huh? What is?"

Hell's knight Sir Giolexius appeared intimidated, unlike Javier.

"Two billion liters of holy water? It's sending chills down my spine just to hear it. You don't plan to splash me with that, do you?"

"Of course not. But let me ask you something. What would happen if you were to get submerged under the holy water?"

"It is similar to what you have said before. I would become as fragile as a swordmaster."

"For how long?"

"I think I would need at least an hour for me to be freed from the lingering effect of the holy water and regain my strength."

"Hmm. Perfect."

"But I'm afraid there is one problem, my lord."

"Problem?"

“The plan you just explained to Sir Javier is excellent. You carefully devised the method to produce the holy water, and would certainly end up with an abundance of it should it succeed. However, wouldn’t your method require the help of a high-ranking angel...?”

“You’re right.”

“That’s what concerns me, my lord. You are a human, and I can’t see how you can possibly enlist the help of a heavenly being.”

“Aha. You’re afraid I may have trouble causing the angel to descend from heaven because I’m not a high-ranking priest or anything.”

“That’s correct, my lord. But it is a task you must accomplish for your plan to work,” Sir Giolexius replied with a serious glow in his eyes.

“Task. That won’t be a problem,” said Lloyd, placing his hand over his chin.

“Huh?”

“I’m a master of accomplishing tasks I am given.”

Lloyd smilingly grinned. In fact, Lloyd had never failed an assigned task when he was in school. Regardless of how difficult the assignment was, or how tired he was, he had always completed all tasks he was given.

I worked my butt off during the deferment period to earn tuition. I wasn’t going to lose a single point from my GPA from the lack of effort.

Suho couldn’t afford to get complacent. He had to get things done desperately. Lloyd was reminded of that time of endless endeavor and smiled.

“I think that task has been completed.”

“Huh?”

The hell’s knight couldn’t understand what Lloyd meant by it. The estate developer noticed the look on his face and pointed behind Sir Giolexius with his chin.

“Look behind you. I think he’s overheard our conversation. It may be an unexpected encounter for you, but there he is.”

“...What?”

The hell’s knight was astonished by the presence of someone he had least expected from behind him and shook his entire body.

“A-angel of thrones!”

Angel of Thrones Raphael responded to the hell’s knight’s shout of surprise. However, the reply wasn’t that nerve-wracking tension or blatant hostility by any means. The angel of thrones and the hell’s knight greeted each other by shaking hands.

“Oh? Commander of hell’s first corp! It’s great to see you!”

“Likewise. How long has it been? Is it our first meeting since the Divine-Demon War?”

“I think so. How is your mother doing?”

“She passed away 3,761 years ago.”

“Oh, no. I’m so sorry.”

“But she died of old age. She didn’t particularly have a tough time.”

“I see. I was so occupied with work that I couldn’t even come by. My deepest condolences.”

“No need. We are both bound by duties, which we must prioritize.”

“True enough. That’s why we had to cross blades with each other during the war.”

“We did, although I was starting to have an advantage.”

“Was that so? Because I remember I was slightly on the better side.”

“Tsk, tsk. Angels these days. You have terrible memories.”

“Hahaha, not as bad as you, commander.”

“Oh? We can always settle it in a duel here.”

“Not now. I’m only a guest in this estate.”

“What?”

“I only happened to run across you because I was spending some time here. Isn’t that right?”

Raphael put a smile on his face and turned to Lloyd, who responded with a bitter smile of his own instead of a certain thought in his mind.

I knew it. It’s exactly as The Knight of Blood and Iron said. Good thing I decided to bring the hell’s knight to my estate.

Lloyd was reminded of the relationship between citizens of the heavenly realm and those of the underworld, as per the original novel.

The divine realm and the underworld don’t necessarily oppose one another, although there have been a few altercations between them such as the Divine-Demon War. But that was an extremely special case.

In reality, they weren’t enemies. They were more like different divisions of a large corporation.

They manage different realms under the same god, like administrators and managers of different departments in a big company.

To put it simply, the heavenly realm was like the administrative department that took care of the day-to-day operation of the world, including but not limited to addressing customer and client complaints in the form of prayers, the underworld was a special department that specialized in post-business duties in the form of punishment and reincarnation of the soul after the death of the physical body.

They have trouble with one another because of the discrepancy in their work, not because they harbor personal grudges against each other, just like how different departments of the company prioritize different goals.

Because this was the case, some angels and hell's knights were actually great friends despite the divisions they were in, against the common misconception.

This is also why I can't expect the heavenly realm's help in the invasion by the hell's army. They don't particularly oppose each other, and the heavenly realm may not care, or even actually want the predestined fate to be restored.

That was why Lloyd did not request reinforcements from the heavenly realm, despite having failed to procure dragon king Verkis's help. He knew it wasn't going to be meaningless.

"Anyhow, since you seem to know each other already, I suppose I don't need to introduce Lexi to you."

"Lexi? Are you referring to the nickname of the first corp commander?"

"Yeah. He agreed to work with me under a contract for five years."

"I see," Raphael replied with a flustered look in his eyes, shortly before turning into that of compassion towards Sir Giolexius. It was full of pity towards the hell's knight for having signed a contract with someone like Lloyd. "First corp commander. Have you by any chance... heard the song?"

"Wait. Have you...?"

The two looked at each other pitifully and compassionately, causing Lloyd to stare at them uncomfortably.

“Forget the songs. But it’s good to see you here because there was something I needed to ask.”

“Ask? Me?”

“Yeah.”

“Well, let’s hear it.”

The angel of thrones was no stranger to Lloyd’s evil genius; he cautiously asked Lloyd what he had in his mind. Lloyd, however, did not care one bit about Raphael’s stance and proceeded with the plan anyway.

“If, by any chance, I were to pluck out your armpit hair while listening to my beautiful, heart-touching songs again, would that cause you to shed tears at all?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 382: Touch the Angel's Heart (2)

"If, by any chance, I were to pluck out your armpit hair while listening to my beautiful, heart-touching songs again, would that cause you to shed tears at all?"

Raphael became speechless at the shamelessly outrageous question asked by Lloyd. The Angel of Thrones took a moment of silence to reply.

"My apologies. I don't have any armpit hair."

"Hmm."

"I'm serious," the angel insisted.

"What about other parts of the body?"

"I might."

"Whew. That's a relief."

The angel was flustered by Lloyd's response as he hadn't given him permission at all but tried to contain his feelings and replied.

"No. I don't think that would work."

"Why not?"

"Because I wouldn't shed tears that way."

"Hmm. Are you making a statement about your endurance?"

"No," said the Angel of Thrones, shaking his head. "I do not shed tears from the physical pain. It has nothing to do with my patience. All angels are like that."

"Hmm..."

“I’m telling the truth.”

“Hmm...”

“I am being honest.”

“Hmm...”

“I’m not lying. Look at the flaming halo. It’s still burning well.”

“Hmm...”

Lloyd began staring at the Angel of Thrones scrupulously as if he was trying to pick out the freshest fish at the seafood stall. The look of persistence suggested he was attempting to figure out if the angel was indeed being truthful.

What is up with him...?

The Angel of Thrones genuinely wondered. The tears of angels were highly valuable, and those of a high-ranking angel such as himself were even more priceless.

Lloyd Frontera loves money, perhaps even excessively. Is he trying to...?

The angel wondered if Lloyd was planning to sell his tears by any chance. Raphael’s face turned solemn at such thoughts as he asked.

“Are you in need of my tears?”

“Yeah. That’s why I’m asking.”

“Why do you need them?”

“So that we may all survive together.”

“...What?”

The Angel of Thrones was astonished by the unexpected answer that emphasized surviving together. Lloyd added.

“I’ll be brief and to the point. A certain undead sorcerer, who has now become a lich, requested the king of hell to open the hell’s gate in this estate to deploy the hell’s army here. The king of hell accepted the plea, and evil soldiers would storm this place very soon. All of us will die and this estate will be razed to ashes. Not a single soul will live.”

“Are you serious?” Raphael responded with a troubled look on his face.

“It’s true,” Sir Giolexius intervened and replied in Lloyd’s stead.

Raphael did not know what to say to this. Sir Giolexius was the commander of the first corp of hell’s army until only a few moments ago, so there was not a shred of a doubt that it really was the case.

“Then, were you trying to secure my tears to fend them off?”

“That is precisely it,” Lloyd replied with a nod.

“I would love to help out if that’s the case,” said the Angel of Thrones, frustratingly biting his lips. “But there still is a problem.”

“Problem?”

“I am unable to shed tears willingly,” continued Raphael. “I cannot shed tears even if I want to unless I am genuinely touched in my heart. As a matter of fact, all angels were created that way to prevent the abuse of our valuable tears.”

“Hmm. That’s why I was suggesting to pluck your armpit hair, to make it real.”

“If I can indeed shed tears from the physical pain of plucking my hair, and those tears could save the innocent and kind citizens of the estate, I would voluntarily pluck them all to protect the people. Unfortunately, however, that method won’t work. We angels do not cry from physical pain.”

“Is that so?”

“It is so. We must be genuinely moved in response to something touching. That’s the only way angels would shed tears.”

Raphael adamantly nodded, causing Lloyd to frowningly massage the back of his neck.

“That makes it a bit... challenging.”

“I agree. I would love to shed tears left and right, knowing they’re going to be used for the right cause.”

“Hmm. I think our best bet here is to try different methods, then.”

“I’m sorry?”

“This happened years ago in the distant past. There lived two brothers, one of which was wealthy and the other poor.”

“Huh...?” The Angel of Thrones frowned with one eyebrow as Lloyd continued in a serious tone.

“The younger brother was penniless because he had failed to live according to a constructive financial plan. He had more children than his salary could afford, and he would spend the hard-earned money unwisely without taking care of his family first, failing to save anything up.”

“Hmm, go on.”

“On the other hand, the older brother had amassed a great wealth. He was diligent, hard-working, and made smart investments by carefully studying risks and returns. And one day, the younger brother found a terribly injured swallow on the street by chance. Something moved him and he took the poor bird to his home, tended to its wounds, and let it go. The swallow returned with a seed of a sort, which the younger brother sowed. It grew into some kind of a plant, bearing a huge fruit that looked like a melon. When he opened the melon, it was actually full of valuables and treasure!”

“Interesting. What happened next?”

“The older brother was astounded by the single investment that yielded so much profit and turned his brother’s life upside down. He found himself an injured swallow... blah, blah... and opened the melon... blah, blah... but unfortunately lost all of his wealth.”

“Tsk, tsk. What a tragedy. What next?”

“The older brother, who was a competent and diligent entrepreneur, lost all of his wealth in an instant. The younger brother, who had spent his life without a well-laid-out plan, became rich instead. The older brother began living in the younger brother’s basement because he couldn’t afford rent. Later on, the younger brother gave half of his wealth to his older brother.”

“That’s actually a kind thing to do. What a beautiful story.”

“No, it’s actually a tragedy,” Lloyd interrupted the angel, immediately before Raphael lifted his hands to clap. “The older brother, who had worked hard all his life according to a solid business plan, lost all of his wealth due to one poor investment that enticed him with the promise of even greater riches. His younger brother gave him half of what he possessed later on, but that couldn’t have been for free.”

“Th-then...?”

“The younger brother probably made the older brother his personal asset manager or something, overworking and abusing him for the rest of their lives in return. Tsk, tsk. Poor older brother probably worked his butt off trying to make ends meet despite the terrible spending habit of the younger brother, and died without a chance to go on vacation.”

“...”

“What a tragic tale.”

Lloyd had drops of tears in his eyes, but the Angel of Thrones could only stare in silence. Lloyd noticed the look and added.

“I suppose no tragic tales are going to genuinely touch your heart. We’ll have to resort to a different method.”

“What method?”

“Are you ticklish on the bottom of your feet by any chance?” Lloyd took a glance at the angel’s feet.

“What do you plan to do with my feet?” The angel asked in a slightly uncomfortable voice.

“I mean to tickle you over there. Perhaps you would shed a little bit of tears if I continued tickling you despite your plea to make it stop.”

“Hmm. I don’t know if that’s going to work.”

“Let’s give it a try.”

Lloyd tried all sorts of methods he could think of, starting with this one, to make the Angel of Thrones shed tears. The tickling of his feet with a feather failed to make him cry. Lloyd found a pile of hot chili peppers in the kitchen storage, and brought a shovel-full of them and fed them to Angel of Thrones, but that also failed. He even sang a song with gorgeous melody to the angel’s ears while asking Javier to hold him down, but Raphael did not shed a single drop of tear.

It did not matter how hard Lloyd tickled him, how much spicy food he fed him, or how many times he raided the angel’s eardrums with terrible singing. The Angel of Thrones was definitely uncomfortable and agonized, but he did not shed tears. Lloyd was frustrated.

Tsk. This is bad.

Lloyd was in desperate need of the angel’s teardrops, because the battle against the hell’s army was going to be much more arduous without them. But he hadn’t anticipated the acquisition to be this difficult. The estate developer let out a deep sigh and spoke.

“Whoa. You really don’t shed tears.”

“I am so sorry. It really isn’t something I can control.”

“No need to apologize. But I won’t lie, I was hoping to make you cry like a cookie.”

“Huh? Why would the cookie cry?”

“Well,” Lloyd casually replied, with the intent to lighten the mood with a terrible joke. “Because his father was a wafer so long.”

“Because his father was a wafer... Oh! Away for so long?! Ha.”

“Huh?”

“Ha, ha. His father was a wafer... away for... I get it. Ahahaha.”

The Angel of Thrones placed his hands over the mouth to stop himself from bursting out in laughter. Lloyd noticed his shoulders violently twitch and his face and ears turn red.

What?!

The estate developer was certainly astounded by the unexpected response. This gave him an idea.

Please don’t tell me you’re terribly weak against dad jokes.

But Lloyd had nothing to lose, so he decided to give it a try anyways. He cleared his throat and turned towards the Angel of Thrones, who was struggling to hold his laughter in.

“I want you to cause a crisis today.”

“C-cause a c-crisis? What do you mean?”

“Because that would turn you into a woman that cries a lot. Cry-sis.”

“C-cry-sis! Ahahahaha! Oh, my goodness! Ahahahahaha!”

The Angel of Thrones held his abdomen as he started rolling on the ground. Lloyd genuinely questioned his common senses.

“...”

But all was well that ended well. His efforts were paying off.

Good, he’s genuinely laughing his butt off!

Lloyd sharply examined the eyes of the angel, who was struggling to hold it in. He saw a single drop of tear in his eyes.

Alright! Here comes another one!

It was a perfect opportunity to seal the win with another move. Lloyd threw in another one from his dad joke arsenal.

“You know, I went to the downtown the other day and saw a fat psychic. He introduced himself as a four-chin teller.”

“...Ahahahahahahahaha!!”

“And did you hear about the terrible fire at the shoe store? Many soles were lost.”

“...Ahahaha!!”

“What do you call a fish with no eyes? Fsh.”

“Ahahahaha, holy! Ahahahaha!”

“I got another joke about the roof... But it’s way over your head.”

“Ahahaha, please...! Stop!”

The Angel of Thrones was rolling around on the floor. Lloyd quickly gestured to Javier, who promptly responded by grabbing the cup on the table inside the guest room. The grandmaster knight carefully approached the angel, who was still struggling to breathe from all the laughter and wiped his eyes. There was a teardrop on Javier's finger.

Quickly! Gather them in the cup!

Lloyd rolled his eyes to hint at what Javier needed to do. The grandmaster immediately gathered the tears in the cup as Lloyd continued spewing out terrible dad jokes, causing the angel to lose it completely. Raphael's abdomen and cheek muscles were straining from it, as he had a hard time breathing. And Javier continued taking every single drop of the tears the angel shed in a cup, without wasting any while giving Lloyd dirty looks for the horrendous jokes. Lloyd fully agreed with Javier on this one.

Gosh. I hate this too.

Lloyd breathed a heavy sigh at himself, for knowing so many dad jokes in the first place, and because he had to bombard the angel to get what he needed. It was embarrassing to the point where he wanted to run to his bedroom and hide under the blanket from the shame. It reminded him of a time when he was in college.

One of the professors used to throw in terrible dad jokes all the time during lectures.

Lloyd despised the professor's effort to appear humorous and had only chuckled bitterly. Perhaps that was why he felt guilty towards that particular instructor.

I am so sorry, professor. I didn't expect the dad jokes, out of all the things you taught me in class, to come in handy in a situation like this. Ugh.

He was grateful and shameful at the same time. However, Lloyd wasn't one to give up on his goals just because he had to endure some cringeworthy circumstances. He was determined to take one for the team, to ultimately accomplish his objectives. And the poetry of dad jokes somehow touched the angel's heart, filling a third of the cup in the process.

Nice. I think this is about a tenth of a liter.

The golden tears splashed inside the cup, as the Angel of Thrones nearly fainted on the floor from the laughter. Lloyd put up a huge smile on his face.

If I do this every day for about 20 days or so, I should be able to get enough tears for my plan to work.

Two whole liters of Raphael's tears could be used as ingredients to produce 2 billion liters of holy water.

"Alright, it looks like we got our work cut out for us," Lloyd glanced at Javier.

The grandmaster's face, however, was distressed from the bombardment of terrible dad jokes. Lloyd also noticed that the hell's knight had plugged his ears to avoid hearing anything. Lloyd put up an evil grin and added.

"Do you not like the idea?"

"No. I hate it," Javier replied, twitching his body like he had just seen something disgusting. But there was an element of sharpness in what he said afterward. "But since you're collecting tears this way."

"I'm listening."

"I have concerns about actually turning this into the holy water, even if we do succeed in gathering two whole liters like this."

"What concerns?"

"We need two billion liters of pure water on top of that. Where are you going to procure that much water? And how do you plan to spray these to the hell's army during battle?"

Javier addressed his honest concerns without being sarcastic. Procuring and managing two billion liters of pure water was especially what worried him.

"Oh, that."

But Lloyd responded so casually like he already laid out a careful plan, step by step in detail, as he had always done. And Lloyd's solution that followed appalled Javier.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 383: Honest Thoughts (1)

“Lake Kapua. We’ll produce holy water there.”

“Huh?” Javier frowned at the mention of Lake Kapua in Lloyd’s response to his concerns about where to procure 2 billion liters of pure water and how to apply the holy water to the demonic army. “Are you saying Lake Kapua holds that much water?”

“Approximately. I think there’s about 1.9 to two billion liters,” Lloyd shrugged his shoulders.

Lake Kapua, sitting in the middle of the mountain range east of the Frontera Estate, was a huge lake that was created artificially due to the dam-building activity by Bibeong. Its size was astounding.

It’s humongous in terms of width and depth, almost as big as the largest reservoir in South Korea, although Lake Kapua is a bit shallower. But it definitely holds enough water to produce two billion liters of holy water.

According to Lloyd’s calculations, the full volume of water Lake Kapua held was about two billion tons. He suspected he could get approximately two billion liters of freshwater by creating sections near the intake station in the western part of the lake, which was perfect for creating the desired amount of holy water.

“To tell you the truth, I went with two billion liters of holy water in the first place considering the volume of water Lake Kapua held.”

“Oh, really?”

“Yeah.”

“But I do have another concern.”

“Shoot it.”

“You’re not planning to turn the lake into holy water, are you?”

“I am.”

“...”

“Not the entirety of the lake, perhaps. But a whole section of it for sure.”

“...”

“We wouldn’t need to worry about storage that way.”

“But what about the water that gets supplied to the waterworks and dyeworks in Lacona Barony?”

“That wouldn’t matter. Releasing a little bit into the waterworks won’t affect the total volume of two billion liters at all.”

“That’s not what I’m worried about. I was concerned about the citizens having to use holy water in their everyday lives instead.”

“Holy water from waterworks. That actually sounds amazing.”

“...”

“Citizens will get healthier by drinking it, and the dye color will become more vibrant and gorgeous. But I am kinda curious.”

“About what?”

“If you drink the holy water and pee... is that a holy pee?”

“...”

“I’m sorry.”

“So you do know that was lame.”

“Yeah. Anyways,” said Lloyd with a smile of huge confidence, as if he had everything planned out carefully, and all preparations were set in place. “We will convert a good chunk of the reservoir into holy water, and I have already thought of the way to effectively apply that to the enemies, although we got some work to do to make that possible. But you may rest assured.”

“Understood.”

“...Huh?”

“Huh?” Javier replied with the same response.

“Are you alright...?”

“I am. What’s wrong?”

“That was an unexpected response,” Lloyd tilted his head in confusion. “Understood? That’s not the kind of response I expected from you. You would have talked back with thousands of other questions.”

“...”

“Please don’t tell me you’re someone else in Javier’s body.”

“I am Javier.”

“Then why...?”

“Are you dissatisfied with my agreement?”

“No. I just find it unfamiliar.”

“You’ll have to get used to it,” Javier replied with a chuckle.

He meant it. Javier had decided to trust whatever Lloyd was going to say from here on. But the grandmaster did not express his honest thoughts to his master and pretended otherwise.

“Agreeing with you from time to time will loosen you up, and that’s when I’ll strike with the sharpest questions to catch you off guard.”

“Seriously?”

“Seriously.”

“Ugh. You devil.”

“You’re one to speak.”

“If I do it, it’s okay. But not you.”

“That’s not fair. You mustn’t be so shameless about speaking such nonsense.”

“What’s there to life?” Lloyd asked with a bitter chuckle. “If I don’t have anything of substance, I should at least display composure outwardly.”

Lloyd hadn’t thought much about this statement when he spoke it, but realized it actually was an accurate representation of how he had lived his life. The estate developer quickly attempted to retract the smile before it got even bitterer.

“Anyhow. We have our work cut out for us, but not today. I need to do my part as a good person today.”

“What do you mean by that?”

“I need to see my parents and tell them I came back.”

But the smile got bitter nonetheless. It felt as though Count Frontera and his wife were his real parents. Lloyd shook his head violently to brush this thought aside.

What the hell am I thinking? I’m actually a scoundrel that took over the body of their real son. In a way, I have committed a grave sin against them. I must not take this for granted and act like I deserve this.

Lloyd wondered if he had grown to love them as his real family, but suppressed this feeling that he felt he did not deserve. Even if the count and the countess were to embrace him as their own, Lloyd convinced himself that he shouldn't expect any kind of familial love from them, until he was accepted by them despite having explained the truth about the real Lloyd. He constantly reminded himself of this as he approached where the count and the countess were, and said his greetings.

"I am back."

"...Huh?"

The two had been exchanging words over a finely brewed cup of tea after a meal when the count and the countess both got up immediately from their seats and rushed to Lloyd with a look of pleasant surprise on their faces.

"You're back."

They held Lloyd by his hands and took a good look all over his body from head to toe, before proceeding to make eye contact with him with the warm look that suggested so many different things, all of which Lloyd felt in his heart.

They had been concerned about what trouble Lloyd was going through, his health, if he was eating properly on time, and ultimately, if he was alright. The lack of actual words perhaps made it even more empathetic, inadvertently making Lloyd drop his guard despite the constant reminder he had been telling himself on his way. Lloyd replied with a huge smile like he would have done against his real parents.

"Yeah. I'm back."

No other words were necessary, as the count and the countess welcomed Lloyd back with open arms. They proudly tapped him on his shoulders and felt his calloused hands, as they just smiled silently, yet telling him that he had done enough already.

The count and the countess thought to themselves, that even though the Lloyd in front of them wasn't their real son, and they didn't know why and how this all happened, the man in their presence was virtually no different from their own now. He was a good and hard-working kid, and he was going to tell them everything in due time. They were determined not to treat him differently from their real children and thereby hurt him in the process. That was the last thing they wanted. With this virtuous intent, they greeted Lloyd with a genuine smile and warmth, displaying parental concerns throughout the encounter. That was why Lloyd had no idea what the count and the countess were thinking and still believed they did not know about his secrets. He appreciated them, yet harbored guilt on one side. This made him strengthen his resolve once more to protect them like his real parents from any harm or hardships that came their way.

That night, when everyone had gone to sleep, Lloyd used the ending spoiler once again to see how the battle against the hell's army was going to go.

***

"...Huff. Huff. Huff."

He ran. He stomped on the ground and jumped over dead bodies to continue, running out of breath on his way.

"Huff, huff! The hell's army... will invade... 90 days later!"

Slash! One demon fell from the strike. He jumped over the freshly deceased corpse and stretched out his shovel shrouded in the swordmaster's aura, clashing against a greatsword.

Clink! The greatsword stopped the shovel from advancing further, as deadly glows stared at him from behind the weapon. A hell's knight parried the shovel effortlessly and pushed it aside.

Krakakaka! The shovel slid down the blade as the greatsword moved masterfully to threaten the man, who ducked quickly to barely dodge the attack.

Kwoosh! The gust from its swing swept through the man’s hair, sending chills down his spine. But he did not have time to think about that, as another presence full of hostility was rushing towards him from his back.

“...Urgh! The size of the enemy’s army... is about...”

He jumped up from a crouched position like a spring and took a step sideways, swinging his shovel.

Clank!

He had barely managed to block the greatsword attack that came from behind. But it was more like a baseball being hit by a bat.

“...Ack!”

The man lost balance and rolled on the ground. He had let go of the shovel from the loss of strength in his hands, but he quickly lifted his chin without trying to figure out what was going on.

The other hell’s knight that had struck him from behind was now standing right in front of him, glaring at him through eyes that burned like fire. The man’s heart began to heat up as if a piece of steel that had just been through the furnace was applied.

Kwoosh. The sound wasn’t particularly loud. In fact, it was so subtle that it almost made him chuckle. He couldn’t believe such a puny sound came from the puncturing of a human body.

Pierce. Pierce.

It hurt. The stabbing and slashing came from all directions. The dark blades pierced through flesh and blood with the intent to end a life.

The man felt excruciating pain each time an organ was punctured and twitched violently. But he couldn’t scream in agony. Instead, he could only let out a feeble sound similar to a deflating balloon. His vision blurred as the reddened sky swirled. The man wondered if tears were obstructing his view. But they seemed rather dark for teardrops.

“...Ugh. Agh...”

The man wanted to speak. He had to say something. But he was quickly losing himself. He felt his soul drift away as a profuse amount of blood left his body, amidst the spooky cries and surreal pain keeping him in absolute fear. But the voices of the hell’s knights that slashed and pierced him were so clear despite all that.

“You who will become a new vassal of our liege.”

“We welcome you, Lloyd Frontera.”

“And congratulate you.”

“Suho Kim. You will now be working with us.”

“Ugh... Agh...”

The man desperately wished to refute the statement, but he couldn’t speak. His vision continued to blur even further, and he could only see the bluish glow in the eyes of the hell’s knight that approached him with the intent to swallow him alive. The nefarious light was about to gouge his eyes out before taking him into the abyss. It got closer. It drove him mad. It was killing him. It was destroying him.

“...Aaaaaack!”

Lloyd got up from the bed, shaking in fear. His toes have rolled up from the tension, as he held tightly onto the blanket over his body covered in cold sweat. He then took a glance at his chest, still breathing hard.

“Huff... Huff... Huh?”

There was nothing. There was no greatsword, no punctured organs, or blood. It indicated one thing.

“Th-that was all a dream...? Ha. Haha.”

But he still felt the chills down his spine, and his pillow was soaked in tears. Lloyd let out a huge sigh of relief only after confirming he was still alone in his dark, quiet bedroom.

“Haha. Holy. What kind of nightmare...”

It was a fearsome dream and a chillingly realistic one too. It had to feel that way.

“To dream about what I saw in the ending spoiler... Phew.”

The nightmare that had just wakened Lloyd up was, in fact, what he checked through the ending spoiler before he went to sleep. He trembled violently again at the thought.

Gosh. And I had trouble falling asleep because I was so troubled by it.

It involved the most tragic way of death he had ever seen. Lloyd had shuddered just at the thought of how realistic the dream was, and couldn’t go back to sleep. His heart was too deeply in trouble, despite knowing in his head that he had to get as much rest as he could to start working on preparations to save the estate from the invading army. He had constantly reminded himself that sleeping for the time being was the best thing to do given the situation, and finally fell asleep albeit barely.

Tsk, tsk. And I only slept for a good thirty minutes at best.

Lloyd took a peek out the window and concluded based on the darkness of the night. He picked up a cup of water he had placed on the end table, and chugged it down to satiate his thirst. He was wide awake.

Jeez. I don’t think I can go back to sleep tonight.

Since it appeared that way, Lloyd decided to review what he saw in the ending spoiler before he went to bed.

I was surrounded by hell’s knight when I died. Let’s see... I think there were about five hell’s knights attacking me.

Lloyd happened to take a glance at the estate, that had become a battlefield on which hell's knights were wreaking havoc. The legion of White Cavalry was being overpowered while the dragon Solitas and Draggy were struggling to hold their own. Even Javier, the grandmaster, was having a rough time against more than ten hell's knights focusing on taking him down. Lloyd was confident he counted more than 200 hell's knights in the process.

200 at least. I can't help but suspect the actual number is greater.

He wondered what happened to the two billion liters of holy water, and if he failed to utilize it in the predetermined future.

Or it could still not be enough. That is most likely. The method I am thinking of currently is probably not sufficient enough to weaken the hell's army adequately. I need to think this over and come up with a better plan. The only consolation is that they'll be invading 90 days later. I must devise a better tactic, find more reinforcements, and do whatever it takes to stop them. It will be tough, but I think I can change the ending. I will. I must.

Lloyd began taking more things into account as he filled the cup with water and drank twice more. But his hands shook the entire time, causing him to struggle. The shaking extended into his eyes, indicating he was clearly in shock.

"Damn it. What the hell."

Lloyd found it mysterious as to why he was still shivering and sweating like a terrified child. He kept reminding himself that it was only a dream and that there was no reason for him to shudder like this. But he couldn't. He did not understand why.

"I don't want to die..."

Without realizing it, he began to shed tears. Lloyd cried out silently in fear. He was scared, and he did not want to die. He did not want others to get involved in this mess because of him. The responsibility he had to bear was so great, that Lloyd sobbed quietly for some time all alone in his private bedroom.

Lloyd had no idea, due to the overflowing emotions he felt, that Javier was standing outside in the hallway the entire night without a word. The grandmaster was unable to open the door and was just strengthening his resolve all by himself.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 384: Honest Thoughts (2)

It hurt. Every time that man put up a blatantly false front and tried to bear the burdens all alone, it shook and broke Javier's heart.

Fake Lloyd. Why would you...

Javier let out a subtle sigh and leaned on the wall out in the hallway, silently staring at the tightly closed door to the bedroom across which he could hear small sounds of sobbing. It was that of fake Lloyd Frontera shedding tears without making noises. The usual, shameless composure of the man was gone as he cried like a completely different person. He was only showing his true self when no one else was around him.

He really said he didn't want to die.

Javier inadvertently clenched his fist as he was reminded of Lloyd's statement in agony. He didn't understand why, but it was infuriating for some reason.

Why would you want to bear the burdens all by yourself? Just why?

Javier genuinely wondered. He wasn't the true son of House Frontera. He was only wearing the shell of Lloyd. He had all the excuses to take a step back to avoid certain crises, but he instead always faced the difficulties head-on with more responsibility than the real Lloyd ever showed. He risked his own life each time to solve the issue and would shed tears privately.

Why can't you just tell me that you're having a tough time? Why can't you admit that you're afraid?

But Javier knew Lloyd wouldn't. He wasn't like that. He would always put up a front and act like he was the most poised person in the world.

Come to think of it, he's always shown it. Back in the ant cave, Cremo, Namaran, and against the bone dragon in the Great Garden of Termina.

He’s always looked for a way out. There was a time when I thought even that was a deliberate act to calm his nerves down before carrying out his plans, but...

Javier concluded that Lloyd had always been genuinely afraid. He did not want to risk his life. Yet, that man still took responsibility and showed resilience in tough situations to overcome problems.

What an idiot.

Javier’s clenching became tighter as he strengthened his resolve on one side to protect his idiotic friend, regardless of the adversity that came their way. The grandmaster was determined to keep his pretentious, cowardly buddy safe.

So stop being a crybaby about your own death. You’re not going to die, and I’m going to ensure it. Even if it really comes our way, I will die in your place instead. I am willing to.

Javier breathed a small sigh again, as the fraudster’s subtle crying noise still reached his ears. The grandmaster’s heart broke as he heard the sound that leaked out through Lloyd’s palms or the blanket, whichever he was covering his face with.

Jeez.

It was a long night. Javier wished for the darkness to go away as he lifted his chin and stared at the ceiling. The night was perhaps too long.

***

Javier’s wish came true, as the natural flow of time got rid of the darkness and caused the sunlight to fill the skies with brightness and warmth. The look on Lloyd’s face as he opened the door to his bedroom was also much brighter.

“What the—”

It was, until he saw Javier in the hallway and frowned. He glared across the hall and saw Javier leaning against the other side with his arms crossed and a mysterious look on his face. He was enduring the slightly dirty look Lloyd gave him, responding with a familiar yet strange composure.

“What are you doing here, so early in the morning?” Lloyd suppressed his instinct that suggested things were about to get awkward and asked.

“Phew,” Javier sighed in response.

“What? What’s that for? It’s too early in the morning for anything to have happened.”

“I was just having trouble falling asleep.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.”

“Since when were you here?”

“I only just got here.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd internally breathed a sigh of relief at Javier’s nonchalant response. But the question that followed caused his heart to drop.

“Master Lloyd. What were you doing last night?”

“Huh?”

“Something is weird.”

“What is?” Lloyd asked back, cautiously wondering what Javier was talking about.

Please don’t tell me he heard my cry last night.

But Lloyd was confident he did a good job covering his mouth with his hands and face with his blanket. He was so sure he did a perfect job and didn’t allow a single sound to escape his bedroom. His heart pouted really fast as he waited for Javier’s response, which was extremely poised as usual as it rattled Lloyd’s eardrums.

“Your eyes seem a bit swollen, Master Lloyd.”

“What?”

“I’m serious. Your eyelids are much bigger than usual,” continued Javier, tilting his face to one side as if he knew something. “Did you cry... by any chance?”

Lloyd faced the biggest obstacle in his life yet. He wondered if Javier heard his cries and contemplated numerous times in a short span, only to put up another act as usual.

“Ha. What the hell are you talking about?”

“I’m only asking this because you look like it. Please don’t tell me you had a scary nightmare and cried out a river.”

“What? I’m not a kid.”

“Hmm. Really?”

“Yeah. Really. Stop asking the obvious.”

“Hmm.”

“What.”

“Something’s telling me you’re pretending.”

“Look at this guy. You’re so full of prejudice about ordinary folks with a heart. I’m not like that, mortal.”

“Really?”

“Really.”

“Tsk. And here I thought you were full of worries.”

“That, I am full of,” Lloyd replied to Javier’s sharp remark rather effortlessly, avoiding the uncomfortable area. “Who wouldn’t be, when the hell’s army is supposed to invade the estate soon?”

“You have a point.”

“Of course I do. I always do, as the epitome of hard-working individuals that do their best day and night to bring about the best possible result.”

“Hmm. I don’t think you’re using the correct words.”

“I am always correct.”

“But are you?”

“Enough bantering. Let’s get to work.”

Lloyd let out a chuckle and quickly changed the subject. He wanted to. It was true that he saw the most terrifying ending spoiler and had a nightmare about it last night, and that he had been disheartened albeit temporarily. But he did not want to show it.

I don’t want to hold anyone back.

It was his life, and he had to take care of his problems. Lloyd knew he could get some help here and there along the way, but it all came down to his decision-making in the end. He had learned this truth the hard way during his days in the tiniest rental rooms in South Korea back in the day, perhaps too early for his age.

Especially when I participated in the bioequivalence clinical trial.

He had met people with similar looks on their faces as he, as blood was drawn regularly from them during the trial. He sat among them like a lab mouse, and that was when he realized everyone there had volunteered for this opportunity to take care of themselves because no one else was going to.

And nothing has changed.

The hell's army was about to invade, and nobody else was going to stop it for him. Lloyd knew he could get some help, but it ultimately came down to his ability to end this once and for all. It was his responsibility.

And it should be. The enforced restoration of fate all began because of me. I am the one that caused all this.

Lloyd had tried his best to lead a better life and a prosperous one at that. He caused many changes that deviated from the predestined fate in the process; the estate that was bound to be ruined thrived, and the lives of those that were supposed to be screwed over changed for the better. Lloyd endeavored to bring positive changes and made multiple accomplishments. It felt great. It felt rewarding.

But he had forgotten that with every action came a responsibility. Each of his accomplishments placed a burden over his shoulders, piling up like a mountain in the end.

All this is mine to bear.

Lloyd couldn't ask someone else to bear these. He wouldn't. He strengthened his resolve once again, suppressed the feelings deep within his heart, and chuckled.

"I think I'm going to start by using the Jewel of Truth."

"What precisely would you be looking for?"

"Information about the hell's army. I want to know exactly how many soldiers we'll be facing."

Lloyd hadn’t had a chance to confirm this yet. He had discovered the estimated time of the invasion, but the size of the army wasn’t mentioned, or he had failed to identify it because of how dire the situation was within the ending spoiler.

I will have to use the jewel to uncover that bit.

He couldn’t use the ending spoiler again, as he was sure his focus would be on the same things as it was the day before. Besides, he was running low on CP; he had spent it like a financially irresponsible person recently. With the determination to save up what he can, Lloyd took Javier on a walk away from the mansion past the villages and the apartment complex on the well-paved road, towards the dam reservoir on the outskirts of the estate. That’s where Lloyd had hidden the Jewel of Truth.

Hmm. The dam seems to be well-maintained.

Lloyd habitually inspected the conditions of the dam and its vicinity. There wasn’t anything out of the ordinary.

“Alright, you stay here. I’ll be back.”

Lloyd instructed Javier to wait for him and took a huge breath, before diving into the reservoir. The sunlight shone through the surface of the water, as the estate developer saw a structure about 200 feet beneath, in the shape of a pyramid; it was the tomb of a high-ranking personnel. It was the Jewel of Truth itself.

Lloyd stood on top of the jewel, at which the key ingredient kiaora he had procured from Seoul was placed on the altar.

Good. The Jewel of Truth is just fine, and nobody seems to have used it in the meantime.

The water residue on the ingredient was even throughout, indicating no one had placed his or her hand there while he was absent from the estate.

To be fair, nobody can in this state.

This structure was located 200 feet below the water's surface, making it impossible for ordinary humans to use it even if they knew about it. Holding one's breath for an elongated period of time while enduring the water pressure required superhuman resilience.

Even sword experts at the peak of their powers would find it challenging. Without the Asrahan Core Technique, I would say one has to be a swordmaster at least, to be able to do this barely.

Lloyd was spot on.

The elves in my estate aren't greedy or ambitious, and they tend to resort to natural methods if they need to uncover a truth. Orcs don't care about the truth, as they think spending too much time on theoretical things is a waste of time and energy, and they would rather work out their muscles in that time.

Dragon Solitas was too prideful to rely on the Jewel of Truth, instead of taking matters into its own hands. Lloyd was right when he had suspected no one in the entire estate would see the need to use this item, aside from himself.

Alright, time to ask what I came here to find out.

Lloyd placed his two hands on the altar and operated his mana heart, letting the mana circle run.

Zing! The activated mana flowed into the altar and awakened the jewel from a deep slumber, shaking the structure in the process. Light fell from the sky and shone beneath the water's surface, as the mythical tomb opened its eyes and spoke out in a solemn voice that resounded in Lloyd's head amid water bubbles and bright rays.

[You, who wish to obtain a truthful answer from the Jewel of Truth. You must reveal a secret about yourself, that only you are aware of, to this world in exchange for the truth you seek.]

It was a process he had gone through before. Lloyd already knew what he was going to say.

I will reveal my truth. In fact, I secretly love and cherish all of the citizens and those that provide labor in my estate, from the bottom of my heart.

Lloyd made this confession in the usual shameless manner. It was a bit embarrassing, but it was true. That was why he had chosen to leverage this fact about him.

This would be the least damaging one out of all the secrets I harbor. Unless the citizens and laborers actually are aware of how much I love them.

Lloyd was concerned. After all, he had made astounding contributions to the estate and displayed nothing but kindness and compassion. There was a chance that a good number of people in the estate, from young to old, actually knew how much Lloyd cared about them.

Tsk, I have no one else to blame but myself. Perhaps I was being too great of a man. But I do have an alternate answer, in case this doesn't work.

Lloyd expected and waited for the jewel's negative response, preparing to give a different answer right away. The jewel finally replied.

[You have willingly shared a secret that only you had been aware of, as the price to acquire the truth you seek.]

...What?

Lloyd flinched, as the text made of light popped up on the flat side of the altar on top of the structure.

Flash! The texts glowed, as they rose through the waters past the surface, and onto the sky. They were hung over the morning sky for everyone in the vicinity to see, in bolded, enlarged fonts.

[The Jewel of Truth has spoken. Lloyd Frontera actually genuinely loves and cares for all citizens of the Frontera estate, especially those who provide the labor on worksites, from the bottom of his heart. The Jewel of Truth only speaks the truth.]

Lloyd was absolutely flabbergasted as he silently stared at the clear texts floating in the sky. He should have been happy that his answer satisfied the conditions of using the jewel in one try, but he felt rather annoyed for some reason.

Really? No one actually knew how much I cared about them?!

Lloyd couldn't believe it. He was absolutely confident that he had shown empathy and compassion to everyone. Although he certainly displayed his blatant greed for wealth and assigned some tough tasks to the laborers from time to time, he never failed to pay them incentives on top of regular wages on time.

Isn't paying them well without withholding the wage once a perfect way of showing how much I care about them?

Lloyd just couldn't understand what was going on, and this made him sadder. But he was a resilient person. Despite the harsh truth hitting him hard, he was still keen on taking the necessary steps to get to his ultimate goal.

Ugh. Forget it. I need to hear the answer anyway.

He focused on his hands placed on the altar again and asked the question he desired to get the answer to.

I wish to know the exact size of the hell's army that is going to invade this place 90 days later.

As soon as he asked that question, his mana heart responded to something without Lloyd's intervention.

Zing! A small fraction of his mana was absorbed by the altar before it was amplified by the structure and shot out toward the surface of the water. Lloyd felt a great wave 200 feet above him, against the water enclosed by the dam. The shockwave traveled back in the form of water pressure and hit the estate developer in the head, causing the answer he was seeking to resonate within.

[The hell’s army will invade the Frontera Estate...]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 385: Honest Thoughts (3)

[The hell’s army will invade the Frontera Estate with 500 hell’s knights.]

What?

Lloyd flinched and nearly inadvertently let out a huge breath under water. This was that preposterous.

500 hell’s knights? Five hundred guys just like Sir Giolexius?

Sir Giolexius was more powerful than a swordmaster, requiring at least three to withstand him. The queen of the domain, who had exceeded ordinary masters by now, would have a tough time against a hell’s knight in one on one combat. Hell’s knights were terrifying enemies.

Five hundred of them...

That was greater than the number of all swordmasters officially registered in the continent of Lorasia throughout its history.

Lloyd felt chills down the spine, but the Jewel of Truth wasn’t done speaking.

[500 hell’s knight will invade the Frontera Estate at the head of the army, leading 1,500 high-ranking demons and 5,000 lesser demons behind them, followed by...]

There’s more?!

[...The lich housing the spirit of the king of hell, as the commander in chief.]

The spirit?!

Lloyd gulped anxiously and asked the jewel, which responded promptly.

[The spirit of the king of hell is the source of pure evil, and the physical body housing it in this realm is referred to as the avatar.]

...So, the king of demon will incarnate himself in the lich's body and lead the hell's army himself.

[Precisely.]

Lloyd was lost for words. He could feel the gravity of the situation all over his body.

The king of hell really is going all out.

He was ascending to this realm in the body of the avatar in the lich, leading the army himself to obliterate the Frontera Estate. But this made Lloyd curious.

But is that even possible? I thought the king of hell did not engage in battles directly with anyone else. Isn't he supposed to only exact punishment on souls based on the laws of the underworld?

[You are correct.]

Then why would he ascend himself? I know he's not showing up in his real body but in that of the lich, but isn't that against the hell's laws?

[It isn't, I'm afraid.]

Elaborate.

[Because this is what the dark sorcerer-turned-lich Lupellan asked the king of hell requested.]

...For the king of hell to incarnate himself in the lich's body and ascend?!

[That is correct. Lupellan desired your demise and the downfall of your estate. He was willing to even offer his own soul to higher beings just to cause you sufferings.]

[Lupellan made this proposition to the king of hell, who accepted it and thus was given the right to terrorize the earthly realm without violating the rules established in the underworld.]

That makes sense, because the king of hell did not take the initiative. He is only moving as per the request made by a creature of the earthly realm. Although the results are the same, the difference in the cause and motive made his move absolutely within the lawful boundaries.

Lloyd finally comprehended what was going on, after placing himself in the king of hell's shoes.

Come to think of it, that bastard was desperate to kill me. He was probably getting impatient because I kept surviving barely somehow.

That was when an unexpected creature from the earthly realm asked the king of demon to incarnate himself within the creature's body to kill Lloyd Frontera.

There's no reason for him not to accept this request. What an opportunity it was for him to take matters into his own hands.

The acceptance was a no-brainer.

And it was definitely a rare one, too. The king of hell is an outrageously powerful being, and his soul cannot be housed within just any physical shell.

Fortunately for the king of the underworld, Lupellan was a lich: an absolutely abysmal, undead sorcerer that was as mighty, if not stronger, as the hell's knight. It was perhaps a perfect body to act as the king of hell's avatar.

I wouldn't have turned it down if I was the king of hell. A lich is raised once every few millennia. The undead sorcerer that happens to have the same goal? I would take full advantage of it.

It probably felt like the opportunity of a lifetime for the king of hell. Lloyd could imagine the demon liege rushing to accept this request like someone that took a peek into the future and saw the lottery winning combination running to the convenience store.

Damn it.

A little bit of deduction showed Lloyd the big picture. He asked the jewel again.

Is there more?

[No. That's the size of the hell's army.]

With that, the Jewel of Truth became silent as though its job was done. Lloyd clenched his fist and swam up to the surface, and took a deep breath that he desperately desired.

"Whoa."

He slowly swam to the edge of the reservoir through the remaining waves, organizing his thoughts on the way.

I think I finally understand why the ending spoiler this time was so terrible like that.

Lloyd was reminded of the ending spoiler he had seen the night before. It was the most terrifying and tragic one out of all he had viewed. It was the most brutal, most gruesome, and most devastating. And on one side, the estate developer was curious.

The hell's army is supposed to invade 90 days later, which is enough time for me to prepare 2 billion liters of holy water. But I was still defeated helplessly.

This made him wonder just how great of an army that was coming. The jewel's answer clarified it for him.

This makes sense.

Thousands of demons, following five hundred hell’s knights, all led by the king of hell in the lich’s body as the avatar.

Ugh. How the hell am I supposed to win?!

Lloyd was overwhelmed by the massive difference in the military forces of two sides as he swam to the ground. It made him feel pathetic about himself for thinking of preparing two billion liters of holy water to fend the enemies off.

Can I really do this...?

Lloyd was distraught.

Or I should just end my own life.

The estate developer wondered if his death would cause all of this to cease, eventually sparing the people of the estate. As long as he was no more, the enforced fate would not be restored. That was going to keep everyone else safe. But Lloyd soon realized how stupid this idea was right away.

No. That won’t work.

Taking his own life wasn’t going to be a solution. Rather, it was going to make matters worse.

Let’s think rationally. Lupellan sacrificed his own soul to make this request to the king of hell. The king of hell was asked to incarnate himself in the lich’s body as the avatar, ultimately to kill Lloyd Frontera and to destroy the Frontera Estate.

That was what the Jewel of Truth had revealed. The estate was precisely mentioned.

My death isn’t going to stop the invasion at this point. I’ve read in the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron, about the conditions for the ascension or descension of mythical creatures like the king of hell or the archangel. A transcendent being that incarnates himself in the body of an avatar is obligated to carry out his part of the bargain in accordance with the contract.

Failure to do so would result in the complete destruction of his original self, according to the book.

In other words, the king of hell is obligated to kill me, annihilate everyone in the Frontera Estate, and raze it to ashes.

The king of hell was going to suffer demise himself, should he fail to do so. This gave him a good reason to do his absolute best.

That explains why he's bringing 500 hell's knights. That's almost the entire hell's army.

It sent chills down Lloyd's spine again. A transcendent being like the king of hell was waging an all-out war against Lloyd, to kill him and destroy everything within the Frontera Estate. It was immensely overwhelming, making it tough for Lloyd to even breathe normally. He stopped in the middle of the lake and chuckled at the outrageousness of the situation.

"Ha. Haha."

Javier would have asked if Lloyd had completely lost it out of fear. In reality, however, it was quite the contrary. He saw a glimpse of hope.

So it's a winner-takes-all situation.

The loser of this battle was going to lose everything, including his own life. Lloyd had felt overwhelmed by the massive difference in the forces that seemed insurmountable, but now was seeing the risks that the king of hell took by ascending to this realm in the body of an avatar. The king of hell had leveraged everything he had in this war as well.

He would fail to honor the terms and conditions of the avatar contract if he can't kill me and destroy my estate, and his soul would be permanently destroyed as a result.

There was no such thing as a being that transcended even the terms and conditions of the contract. Even mythical creatures had to keep them, or suffer demise. Knowing this, Lloyd finally started seeing a ray of hope within his heart.

Alright, I can do this. I just need to make thorough preparations.

Lloyd clenched his fist and remembered the words of Sun Tzu, who once said knowing the enemy would bring victory. Since he knew the king of hell was going to invade 90 days later and the size of the opposition army, Lloyd just had to prepare accordingly, although it was definitely going to be arduous.

But I don't care. Even if I puke out my internal organs in the process, I will do it a hundred, and a thousand times.

That was the way he had lived his life up to this point. He had hustled his way into whom he was today. Lloyd wasn't going to give up here. It would be a waste of energy and efforts if he surrendered now.

Just one more obstacle.

Lloyd strengthened his resolve to hang on and triumph over it once more. He continued to take different resources into account, even after he got onto the ground and as Javier handed over the towel.

"Master Lloyd? Please don't tell me the confession that popped up in the sky is real. I can't imagine you genuinely caring for the citizens and laborers of the estate from the bottom of your heart."

Even as Javier mischievously joked around about the embarrassing truth, Lloyd remained silent and was completely lost in thoughts. In fact, he didn't even take the towel from Javier's hand and walked past him, with his eyes set on the ground and sometimes on the sky, taking into consideration all possible scenarios he could imagine in his head and mumbling like a madman, until he eventually arrived in the lord's mansion through the outskirts of the estate, the apartment complex, and a few villages, dripping water down from his wet hair and clothes.

“Lloyd? I was actually going to send for you... huh?” Count Frontera flinched and paused as Lloyd walked into the study, clearly alarmed by the look. “What in the world did you do this early in the morning?”

He was most likely astonished by how soaked his son was. The count rose from his seat with a handkerchief in his hand, and approached Lloyd to wipe the reservoir water off his face and hair. He constantly checked Lloyd from head to toe to see if there was anything wrong.

“Are you alright? What happened? You’re going to catch a cold at this rate. Have a seat here.”

He dragged him to the seat and put a blanket over Lloyd’s shoulders. The count seemed startled by the sight as he hurriedly tried to comfort his son. Perhaps this was why Lloyd inadvertently put a benevolent smile on his face as he responded.

“I’m fine.”

“You obviously aren’t. Did you trip and fall in the river or something?”

“No,” Lloyd replied.

“Then?” The count asked.

“You saw the texts that floated in the sky before, right? That was spoken by the Jewel of Truth.”

“Oh...” Count Frontera paused for a moment and asked again. “So you jumped into the lake to use the Jewel of Truth, then.”

“Yeah.”

“Why haven’t you wiped the water off your body?”

“I had a few thoughts to consider. In fact, there’s something I must speak to you about.”

“To me?”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd slowly nodded, still simulating countless scenarios in his head. The king of hell was going to invade with a force so large and fearsome, that it was going to wreak absolute havoc in the estate. Lloyd thought of ways to avoid defeat, what kind of preparations he had to make in order to make it possible, whose help he had to enlist, the resources and supplies to bring into the estate, and in which order. He thought about it all, summarized it into a single sentence, and spoke to the count.

“I need you to write a few missives, and give me an approval on something.”

“Missives and approval from me?”

“Yeah.”

“Please elaborate. I need to know what you’re up to so early in the morning.”

The count became serious as well. He knew better than anyone else that the man standing in front of him, who has taken over the body of his own son, wasn’t someone to mention something like this for naught. There always was a reason and a clear purpose for which he did something, and the Frontera Estate, along with the count and the countess, could only survive thanks to his ideas. The count was keen on doing as he says this time around again, as he cautiously waited for Lloyd’s response.

“A few missives requesting reinforcements, to the royal court of the Kingdom of Magentano, the sultanate in the east, estates of Cremo and of Namaran, the orc village alliance, the elven alliance, the mermaid kingdom in the North Sea, the tribe of Centauri in the Great Plains, et cetera.”

“What...?” The count responded in astonishment. But what followed was even more shocking.

“One more,” said Lloyd in a nonchalant, yet solemn manner. “I need your approval on breaking the dam on Lake Kapua, in the eastern mountain range.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 386: Using Faith as a Weapon (1)

“I need your approval on breaking the dam on Lake Kapua, in the eastern mountain range.”

Lloyd’s tone was casual and nonchalant, but the content of his statement was enough to shock Count Frontera.

“Do you even know what you’re saying...?”

Breaking the dam meant releasing the water held in the reservoir down the mountain, like in a heavy flood. And beneath the mountain was something he cherished so much.

“I am aware that our estate will be affected. Fields developed over time, mines, waterworks and sewage, paved roads, homes, and the apartment complex are all in the potential flood zone. I’m going to do my best to minimize the damage.”

The count gulped silently. He couldn’t think of how to respond to Lloyd due to his absurd, unexpected request. However, he still managed to regain composure relatively easily, thanks to a trick he had picked up over recent years dealing with the estate developer.

He had always been this way.

Lloyd would occasionally, or even frequently, make propositions that were preposterous and unprecedented. Some of his ideas made progressives of the era look conservative. However, after taking so many factors into account, the count realized that Lloyd had made such suggestions based on solid rationale and purposes.

He must be looking way ahead.

The count was convinced that Lloyd wasn’t the type of man to throw in outrageous ideas without a good reason. He calmed himself down and asked in a poised manner.

“You are requesting to break the damn in Lake Kapua despite knowing what kind of disaster it could bring to our estate. I’d like to hear you elaborate.”

“You want to hear the reasoning, evidence, and the ultimate goal.”

“Yes,” replied the count, forcing himself to put up a smile on his face.

“I’ll start with the reasoning,” said Lloyd, wiping his wet hair with the blanket over his shoulders, hesitating and sighing once before continuing as if he was contemplating whether or not to share the grave news. “The hell’s army is going to invade our estate ninety days later.”

“Huh?” The count flinched.

“When Dragon King Verkis left our estate some time ago,” Lloyd continued explaining. “He left a magical message only to be seen by me. It said an army will ascend from the underworld and invade our estate.”

It was obviously all a lie. Lloyd was simply using the dragon king’s name in vain. But it did not really matter.

It’s not like it will cause any inconveniences for the dragon king, and he wouldn’t give a damn about it either. And it makes it much easier to move on to the next question.

Hell’s army invading the human realm was an unprecedented and therefore unforeseen event. If the count asked Lloyd how he found out about it, he could be placed in a tight spot.

I don’t have the gift of foresight or anything. And I can’t tell him I saw it through the ending spoiler.

The dragon king’s name was the only credible name he could use in vain in this situation. And it worked.

“Dragon King Verkis did?”

Count Frontera was astonished. He appeared more open to hearing what Lloyd was about to say next. The estate developer nodded and added.

“Yeah. He said he had some urgent business to take care of, and that he was sorry for being unable to help with this. I am inclined to think it’s all because I am on good terms with the dragon king, but he did tell me when they were going to attack, and the detailed size of the enemy army.”

“Holy...”

“I couldn’t believe it at first either, even though I heard it from the dragon king himself. It was that absurd an idea. So I got a second person to confirm it.”

“Who...?”

“Sir Giolexius.”

“Oh,” nodded the count, knowing whom Lloyd was referring to. “Are you talking about the hell’s knight you introduced to me yesterday?”

Count Frontera had been shocked by the presence of a spooky knight that emanated nefarious energy, accompanying Lloyd as the newest member of the Skeleton Corp.

“So the hell’s knight confirmed it for you?”

“Yeah,” Lloyd replied promptly. “I asked him if what the dragon king said was true, and he said it was, before proceeding to tell me more.”

“More?”

“Yeah. He explained the cause of all this.”

That was when Lloyd began telling the count what he had heard from Sir Giolexius after the hell’s knight signed the employment contract with him in Namaran. The count was visibly pale.

“Sir Neumann’s body... housing the soul of that evil necromancer...? He became a lich and made a request to the king of hell...?”

“Yeah. It’s all too convenient for these events to be coincidental, so I had to find a way to verify these statements.”

“How so?”

“Through the Jewel of Truth.”

The count seemed to comprehend. Lloyd put a subtle smile on his face as he pointed at how he currently looked with his eyes.

“That’s why I’m soaked like a sponge. I asked the jewel if what the dragon king and the hell’s knight revealed to me was true.”

“And they were.”

“Unfortunately, yes.”

“Alright, about the hell’s army that’s going to invade 90 days later, then.”

“What about them?”

“How big is it?”

“500 hell’s knights, leading 6,500 high-ranking and lesser demons. They will all be led by the king of hell, incarnated in the body of the lich.”

Count Frontera nearly fainted on the spot. He would have, had it not been for Lloyd’s timely intervention to hold him by his shoulders and shake him.

“Are you alright, father?”

“Huh...? Oh. Yeah. I’m so sorry.”

“It’s okay. I felt the same way when I first heard the news.”

“Whew. Alright, so releasing the waters from the dam is your idea to counter that?”

“Yeah. I have other detailed plans to go along with it, but that’s the main part.”

“Do you think... that would suffice?”

“I’m worried about that too. That’s why I plan to convert all of the freshwater there into holy water.”

“...”

“That will be two billion liters of holy water. I think it’ll be effective to a certain extent.”

“...”

The count nearly fainted again, but somehow barely managed to retain his sanity. He took a deep breath and nodded.

“Okay. I understand.”

He knew Lloyd had no intention of giving up just yet, even against 500 hell’s knights and thousands of demons, all under the command of the king of hell himself. The count saw the unshaken smile on Lloyd’s face and felt a bit ashamed.

I would have thought of fleeing first.

While Count Frontera would have fortified the estate against a sizeable enemy, the invading hell’s army supposedly was too much. In fact, each of 500 hell’s knights was powerful enough to be recorded in history individually because of its awful might.

500 of them, too, led by the king of hell incarnated in the lich’s body. I can’t imagine anyone expecting to fight back head-on.

But Lloyd was. The estate developer wasn’t showing any signs of fleeing from the insurmountable calamity. The count thought he understood why.

It’s because of the citizens. He loves and cares for his family and the people of the estate.

The count was touched. The current Lloyd wasn’t his real son and was an outsider who had no reason to help with the matters of this estate by providing for the citizens here, in reality. But that very stranger was exhibiting tremendous willpower to keep everyone safe here. The count knew Lloyd was probably scared too but overcame the fear with sheer will to protect the estate alone. That was what moved him. That was what astounded him. Except the count was wrong; Lloyd’s thoughts were elsewhere.

I will never give up on my cash cow.

For him, everything in the estate had been designed and built for him to enjoy the fruit of. The lands and the people within were all toiling under the sun day and night to bring in steady income for him, so that he could live in luxury without doing the physical labor. Maintaining this structure was vital for him to continue this way of life. Lloyd asked the count again, still harboring the dream of becoming a rich bum in his heart.

“Then you would...”

“I will do as you say.”

“R-really?”

“Is anything wrong?”

“I thought you’d suggest evacuating the citizens to a safer location at least once.”

“I’ve thought of that,” the count replied with a smile on his face.

It was true. Hell’s knights led by the king of hell incarnate were most definitely preposterous, even with the help of two billion liters of holy water. The count was afraid for his life, and rightly so. But the look of determination of Lloyd's face to keep fighting against all odds put him to shame.

"But that will be our last resort. Let's do as you say first and make preparations as you see fit."

"I have your gratitude."

"No need."

"May I ask you to write the missives as well, then?"

"The missives requesting for reinforcements to the royal court and other estates?"

"Yeah. I will bring the drafts for you to revise later on."

"That will help. But I am still a little concerned."

"What is it?"

The count frowned as he continued.

"If the hell's army truly invades, our estate will most likely turn into the battlefield."

"Yes, it will."

"That's what worries me. The citizens may get swept by the invading army and lose their lives. That's something I can't live with even if we survive the battle."

The count was genuinely concerned. Even if they were well-prepared against the hell's army, the battle in the estate was surely going to affect the innocent, hard-working folks of this estate. Keeping them safe against the catastrophe seemed like an impossible task.

"That's why I must ask if you have thought of a plan to protect them."

Count Frontera asked with a visibly distraught look on his face. But Lloyd responded with a bright smile to reassure him.

“Of course I have. That’s why I need to be on the move.”

“Move? Where?”

“I must meet with the owner of the place to which I will evacuate our citizens.”

“What?”

The count was dumbfounded, but Lloyd did not get into details. Instead, he put up a rather bittersweet smile and added.

“I will tell you the details after I come to an agreement of the owner, which it most likely will. I’ll be back with the news as well as the drafts for you to revise. You don’t have to worry too much.”

Lloyd left the study and out of the mansion immediately, heading towards the village in the center past the marketplace that was bustling with activities and obviously thriving. He then arrived in front of the smith’s workshop, at which the owner of the refuge resided.

“How goes your attempt to be less terrible of a craftsman?”

“...”

In the corner of the workshop was a man, a red dragon in fact, heavily focused on crafting something with glass. He stared into the glass sphere and chuckled.

“What do you think?”

Solitas, the red dragon, held a beautifully glowing glass ball in his hand. But Lloyd could already see its blemishes even from a glance.

“Uh... I think that ball is a bit lopsided.”

“...What?”

“It looks more like a potato on one side.”

“Huh?”

“That wasn’t intended, was it?”

“Ugh...”

“So you haven’t become less terrible.”

Solitas glared at Lloyd balefully for pointing it out. But the estate developer did not mind the dirty look.

“But it’s okay. You’ve definitely improved compared to the beginning. Keep working on your skills and you’ll be fine in a few years.”

“D-do you think so?”

“Of course I do. Since you’re working with glass already, I think you can even start producing some relic artifacts soon.”

“Really?”

“Yeah. And I’m sure you’re going to find a gorgeous lady to court shortly, too.”

“Haha, nothing will make me happier.”

Solitas was delighted, and genuinely. Due to the law that Dragon King Verkis had made, dragons were now prohibited from raiding other races including humans, and thus had to produce their own artifacts and valuables to add to their hoard. Without them, they couldn’t feed their hatchlings properly. The problem was, Solitas had absolutely no skill whatsoever when it came to craftsmanship. The red dragon couldn't bring treasure into his lair, and without the hoard, he couldn’t find himself a girlfriend, let alone a suitable wife. It was truly devastating for him to realize that he was going to die single until he met this human Lloyd.

Thanks to him, I became an assistant to the master dwarf smith, learning the trade under him. Although it's taking me a lot longer than others to work on delicate things, I am a dragon blessed with a long lifespan. A few years of learning is like the blink of an eye for me.

Solitas only had to endure a few more years to learn the trade, and he was going to be an attractive bride for any groom. That hopeful thought brought an honest smile to the red dragon.

I wonder where my future wife is, and what she's doing right now. Ah...

His heart began to pout like a man in love already. That was when Lloyd intervened to seal the deal.

"That's what I was going to get to. Have you ever heard of something called a blind date?"

"...A what?"

"It's a meeting arrangement between two people that haven't met before, but with the intent to see if things could go romantically. I think I can set you up with someone if you could do me a favor."

Lloyd's gentle voice sounded like honey and butter. The idea of going on a blind date with a mysterious lady that Solitas had always dreamed of began to cause his dragon heart to beat like a drum.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 387: Using Faith as a Weapon (2)

Blind date was a magical term that touched the hearts of every single person seeking a romantic partner. It was like a battlefield of opportunity for some, tragic defeat for some, and glory and blessing for others. It certainly made the heart of Solitas, the red dragon, beat fast despite being quite new to this word. The dragon was genuinely delighted from his heart.

He said he's going to set me up with someone. I suppose that's what the term blind date means. Is that similar to a marriage arrangement as humans call it?

Solitas got a little anxious from the excitement.

"Really?"

"Most likely."

"Does that mean I can get married and start a family too, once you set me up with someone?"

"That depends on you, Lord Solitas."

"I see. So your responsibility only stretches to the actual arrangement itself."

"Precisely."

"Alright, who is it then?"

"Do you mean who's going to come in the blind date?"

"Yeah."

"I can't tell you that."

"Why not?"

“Because I haven’t even explained what kind of favor I needed.”

Solitas realized he was rushing a bit, and took a step back.

“Ahem, ahem. Okay, what is it you wish from me?”

“It may be difficult or easy depending on how you see things.”

“Wait. You’re not going to ask me to incinerate the excretions of creatures that live here again, are you?”

“No way. Do I look like someone who will make such a nasty inquiry?”

Solitas thought Lloyd definitely did, but kept quiet anyways as the estate developer continued in a shamelessly composed manner.

“The hell’s army is actually going to invade this place about three months later.”

“What?”

“It’ll probably be a huge one too, and this estate will most definitely suffer.”

“Do you want me to join the battle?”

“No.”

“Then?”

“I wish to evacuate the citizens of Frontera Estate and Lacona Barony to your lair for a few days while the estate is under attack.”

“...What?” The dragon frowned uncomfortably. “That many humans... to my lair...?”

“Yes, milord. I think ten to fifteen days should suffice.”

“I didn’t even approve.”

“I think you will, though.”

“Why would I be willing to do that for lowly humans?”

“Not for the humans. I was hoping you’d accept for the blind date.”

“But how dare you even mention my lair in the deal! Did you take me for a fool, and honestly expect me to let those filthy creatures into my home?!”

“I will make everyone take a good bath prior to the relocation.”

“No. I can’t imagine what they would do to my lair.”

“Eat, and sleep, at max.”

“My lair isn’t an inn.”

“But you’ll get to experience the wonderfully joyous blind date.”

“Don’t even think you could degrade my lair by offering something like that.”

“It will be an exhilarating blind date.”

“That’s the same as degrading me.”

“It will be a thrilling blind date.”

“If you intend to argue with me, then I oblige.”

“An immensely romantic blind date.”

“How dare you...”

“A tremendously heart-warming blind date.”

“...F-fine.”

“Oh, yeah.”

Lloyd chuckled with a mischievously evil grin on his face as Solitas's face turned red from the embarrassment and excitement simultaneously. For the red dragon, this was an offer he couldn't resist.

Phew. A blind date...? I really didn't see this coming. What clothes do I wear that day? Or should I go in my original form instead? I'll have to wipe my horns and scales to make them look good. Wax them and put them through light fire, then apply cold water and wipe it off with a soft towel. Oh, and I can even coat my scales with glass after the fire and water treatment. Yeah, I think that will do.

The blind date hadn't even been arranged, but the red dragon was already planning ahead. Despite not knowing whom he was going to meet, Solitas began daydreaming as if they had gone on dates more than a hundred times. He wondered how to draft the marriage certificate, contemplated on the shape of the ring to be exchanged, and decided going to the beach was the best option for the honeymoon. He was basically laying out the plans for a wonderful family life from A to Z.

"Then you accept my offer, right?"

Flap! The flapping noise of a piece of paper could be heard amidst the gentle voice of Lloyd.

When Solitas snapped out of daydreaming, he was holding a document in his hand.

"What's this?"

"A short-term rental agreement."

"Short term... what?"

"Yeah. It basically says you're going to allow citizens of Frontera and Lacona to stay in your lair for up to fifteen days."

"What kind of bull--"

"Blind date."

“Do I sign on the bottom?”

“Yeah, thank you.”

Lloyd put up a genuine smile of satisfaction only after the deal was sealed with the signature.

Good. I got the safety of the citizens secured.

He was finally able to breathe a sigh of relief, as Solitas’s lair was quite a distance away from the estate and certainly large enough to house everyone, not to mention the decent level of fortification that could be expected from any dragon’s lair. There was not a shred of a doubt the people were going to be protected there. They weren’t going to be swept away by the battle in the estate.

Thank goodness.

Lloyd was relieved, but there still remained a problem.

“Alright, when will you be setting me up with a blind date then?”

“I will, after the more imminent issue is taken care of.”

“You mean the invasion?”

“Yeah.”

“What the hell have you been doing, that you’re being attacked by the hell’s army?”

“That’s what I’d like to know.”

“Anyhow, your death means I won’t get to meet with the lady.”

“Most likely.”

“Don’t die then.”

“Thank you for your blessings.”

“One more thing.”

“I’m listening.”

“About the woman you were going to set me up with,” said the red dragon, in an excited voice. “Can you give me a hint, like how she looks like and stuff?”

“...Uh, not really.”

“Why not?”

“Because the element of mystery is what makes the blind date all the more exciting.”

“D-do you think so?”

“Of course it does.”

It didn’t. Sharing a bit of information about the partner prior to the blind date was the norm, but Lloyd actually couldn’t this time.

Because I don’t know yet either!

In reality, Lloyd had just brought up what he thought was going to work best on persuading the red dragon and mentioned it without making any preparations. But he couldn’t think of a better solution.

Dealing with the invading army is more imminent a problem. I need to save the people of my estate.

The urgent issue at hand was too great for him to think of details in the evacuation plan.

I’ll have to look for a fine single female dragon who is interested after the battle. God, I hope I can find one.

While Lloyd thought it was sort of irresponsible of him, he did not have a choice. But he maintained composure on the outside and graced his appearance with a trustworthy and confident smile.

“Anyhow, the citizens will relocate about 85 days from today. I will tell them to gather in one place, so please cast a mass teleport spell on them.”

“All of them at once?”

“Is that going to be difficult?”

“My dragon heart is going to be depleted of energy.”

“Is it not possible then?”

“No. That is not what I said.”

“Okay. Then I will leave them in your capable hands.”

“Fine. Just don’t forget to set me up with a gorgeous lady.”

“Of course.”

The contract to relocate the citizens was sealed between Lloyd and Solitas. With this issue resolved, the estate developer could now move on to the next.

Alright, I got the safety of people secured. Now I need to lay the foundation for the usage of holy water.

In fact, Lloyd had already thought of a way to utilize the two billion liters of holy water to be made from the tears of the angel of thrones. He climbed the eastern mountains immediately and went to Lake Kapua, at the sandy shore of which Bibeong was enjoying a nice sunbath.

“Ah, good to see you. I was actually looking for you.”

“...Bibeong?”

Bibeong opened one of his eyes while still lying on its belly, as though it had just woken up from a nap. Lloyd began explaining what was going to happen, from the invasion of the army to the two billion liters of holy water and what needed to be done in order to use it.

“...So I was hoping to break the dam, and I thought your approval was absolutely necessary.”

The creation of this reservoir, in fact, was Bibeong’s doing. It had built a dam like any beaver would in this area, and due to the sheer size of this structure, it had formed a huge lake that rivaled any big artificial lake within South Korea. In a way, Bibeong was the rightful owner of this property.

“Would that be okay...?”

Lloyd asked this question with an element of concern. Bibeong wasn’t really loyal to him; it had only agreed to provide labor as necessary to get on the good side of Bangul. There was a chance that this creature could decline Lloyd’s request, thwarting this plan before it could even begin. Lloyd wondered if he had to leverage Bangul’s presence again to seal the deal.

“Bibeong!”

Bibeong’s response, however, was unexpected.

“R-really? You will let me?”

“Bibeong! Bibeong!”

“Of course you approve, because the estate is in danger?”

“Bibeong!” Bibeong nodded robustly again and added. “Bibeong! Bibeong! Bibeong! Bibeong!”

Bibeong explained that it wasn’t because of Bangul this time, but because it trusted Lloyd and what he had done thus far. The creature was willing to place his faith in the estate developer and asked Lloyd to build the dam together after the problem was taken care of.

“...Thank you,” said Lloyd, as that was the only thing he could.

After the approval was given, Lloyd could freely and lightheartedly measure the dimensions of the lake and the dam. He scanned all terrains from the dam to the estate and analyzed the geography in depth in order to minimize the damage to the estate even after the flood of two billion liters of holy water.

It’s going to be a massive flood. I must ensure the damages to the villages and facilities are minimized, while sweeping through the hell’s army with the water.

It was virtually impossible to prevent any sort of damage, but he still couldn’t allow the lands to get devastated along with the hell’s army just to claim victory.

I can’t allow a huge disaster like the one in Vajont Dam in Italy. That’s the last thing I want.

He had toiled under the sun and endeavored restlessly to develop this estate. The lands and facilities were all wonderfully improved over time. He did not want to lose them.

I must build a pathway through which the two billion waters of holy water could travel, and with the least amount of waste possible. And I can’t afford to spend too much time building this.

It wasn’t going to be an easy task by any means. In fact, it was perhaps the most arduous challenge he faced yet.

But I can do this. I have the measurement skill as well as the engineering skill. I can trust the visual simulation feature. It’s definitely possible. I mustn’t give up. I must hustle harder.

Lloyd focused on getting accurate measurements of many different areas throughout the day, causing his eyes to turn red from fatigue. He would still restlessly walk and sometimes travel on Ggoming's back, in order to cover as wide a range as possible and with as much detail as he could. He left no stone unturned and gathered the necessary data. He then devised a detailed plan and a rough draft of the structure.

It's basically a special form of river embankment.

Lloyd used all of his knowledge about his particular structure he could think of, from the main and secondary levee to be installed in the pathway for two billion liters of holy water and the cross levee to hold the pathway in place, to the open levee to control the amount of flood and the overflow levee to mitigate the accidental derailing of the flood. He thought of many different structures and took combined ideas to come up with the best construction plan, while simultaneously preparing for the next task: informing the citizens of the estate about the invasion of the hell's army.

I can't keep this secret forever.

With just ninety days of time remaining, he was going to need every help he could get. In order to enlist the help of the citizens, Lloyd had to share the news with everyone.

And in order to evacuate them. I can't expect them to just relocate out of the blue.

Lloyd knew the people were going to panic if they weren't notified of what was going on in advance, causing way more variables to come into play. He did not want that.

It's better to inform them now, so as to minimize the confusion.

People were going to be flustered and even devastated for sure, and some citizens were definitely going to depart. It was going to be a scary moment. Some might even permanently abandon their homes to seek refuge elsewhere, like in the event of an apocalypse. But Lloyd was willing to risk that.

It's not like I can ask them to remain here when their lives are literally on the line. I can't force them to follow my plan all the way and evacuate to the lair of Solitas. It's their choice.

Even if some citizens would turn their backs on Lloyd, and even if that number was going to exceed his expectations, the estate developer continued to convince himself not to get disappointed or disheartened. He kept strengthening his resolve when a notification rang within his head suddenly.

Ding-dong!

"Huh?"

An expected message popped up on a window in front of his eyes.

[Citizens of Frontera Estate are appalled.]

[Due to the statement of Angel Raphael, who cannot lie, the citizens found out about the invasion of the hell's army.]

[However, no one in the estate is willing to flee and move to a different area.]

[Instead, they are genuinely grateful to you for having made preparations to evacuate them first, and pledged their support for your plan.]

[Every citizen of the estate is strengthening his or her resolve in unity, to help and support Master Lloyd for everything he had done for them. They will never let you bear the burden all alone.]

What in the world...

Messages continued to pop up in front of his eyes, like spam internet browser tabs. Lloyd's eyes widened from the unexpected shock. This was when he realized small miracles that he had never taken into account were taking place, slowly but surely.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 388: Using Faith as a Weapon (3)

Two hours ago, when Lloyd was still conversing with Bibeong near Lake Kapua in the middle of the eastern mountain range, Raphael the angel was showing his characteristic kindness to the citizens of Frontera Estate beneath the hills.

Rub! Pinch!

“Alright. One more.”

Raphael’s hands were busy carrying the bucket full of cow milk to the side while handing over the empty one to the cowherd, who was just as occupied.

Rub! Pinch! The steaming cow milk began filling the empty bucket again, bringing a satisfactory smile to the herd’s face.

“You really didn’t have to,” said the cowherd graciously. “I hope I’m not causing an inconvenience, lord angel.”

“Please don’t say that. I’m helping because I can, and I know you hurt your back last month,” replied the angel of thrones with a benevolent smile. “Carrying heavy buckets full of milk is going to aggravate your injury. That may lead to chronic back pain since you tend to get hurt in the same area.”

“Common folks like us get hurt and injured all the time.”

“Please don’t degrade yourself. You must love yourself and cherish your own body.”

“Hahaha, I understand. Thank you so much. How can I repay you?”

“Hmm. If you’re going to invite me to a meal, I wouldn’t decline.”

“Awesome, because the potatoes I dug up recently are really nice and big.”

“Potatoes. That sounds wonderful.”

Raphael's smile became more apparent, making the labor under the sun all the more enjoyable. The breeze was just adequate, and the sunlight was appropriately warm. The occasional shade cast by clouds in the sky made this a delightful day in the village.

The blemishes in the human realm are what make this world a beautiful place, Raphael thought.

It wasn't always perfect. Rainclouds would sometimes fill the skies, causing unexpected, heavy rains to fall shortly before the sun would shine again. It was definitely different from the heavenly realm, in which everything was always flawless and perfect.

Same with potatoes. Some are ugly in appearance, some taste bad, some are poorly maintained, while others have sprouts. But that's what makes perfect potatoes valuable and astounding.

Raphael carried the buckets full of cow milk and headed to the cowherd's home, genuinely appreciating this world a little more.

"By the way," said the cowherd all of a sudden as they walked. "I don't know if I'm asking the right person, but have you heard the news about Master Lloyd?"

Raphael turned his head and noticed the cowherd was staring at him.

"Lloyd Frontera?"

"Yes, lord angel."

"Hmm. That is a peculiar question. You and I both know he recently returned to the estate."

"That, I am aware of. It's just that I found something... strange."

"Strange?" The angel asked.

"He supposedly loves and cares about all citizens of the estate from the bottom of his heart," replied the cowherd with an awkward facial expression.

“Oh. You’re talking about the message that was shared through the Jewel of Truth.”

“Yeah.”

“Was it that surprising?”

“Haha, I suppose so,” said the cowherd with another awkward chuckle. “I always knew how much Young Master Lloyd cared about the estate since he despises being in the deficit. But to find out he truly cares for people like us... I really did not see that coming.”

“Why, though?”

“Because there is no need for him to,” said the cowherd immediately to the angel’s question. “People like us were born to work hard, pay taxes, and get conscripted to fight in battles in times of war. That is our duty in life. We are nothing more than cattle, if not worse, in the eyes of noblemen and women. We are mere numbers that enrich their estate by providing labor and other services as necessary, and easily replaceable.”

“But Lloyd Frontera was different.”

“Yes. Count and Young Master Frontera were all different. Young Master Lloyd actually used to be rather... mean in the past, but he changed suddenly one day. He began treating us like humans and even stepped up to keep us safe in times of crisis. We thought he was just taking care of his assets so he could gain something from us later on, but we were honestly grateful to serve a nobleman who was still miles better than others.”

“Haha. So none of you knew how he genuinely felt about you.”

“Yes. We really had no idea that he truly cared.”

“You must have been delighted to find out.”

“No,” the cowherd shook his head adamantly, staring at the angel. “Quite the contrary. We actually are worried.”

“Worried?”

“Because it feels like Young Master Lloyd keeps pushing himself to take care of things all alone.”

“Lloyd Frontera is...?”

“Yes. I actually saw this morning, too.”

“What did you see?”

“He was riding on the back of Sir Ggoming, and was headed towards the eastern mountains alone,” said the cowherd, pointing at the hills. “The look on his face wasn’t that of someone going on a picnic. He is most definitely planning to bear heavy responsibilities all by himself, as he has done time and again. That is what we common folks are unhappy and concerned about, as much as we’re curious. Do you know what Young Master Lloyd is up to these days, by any chance?”

“Uh, well...” Raphael hesitated and was reminded of the fact that he was a being that could not possibly lie. In fact, he would immediately give it away if he was being deceptive. “...I do.”

The fiery halo behind him was going to go out as soon as he spoke a lie, and the cowherd was going to notice it right away. The angel of thrones reluctantly nodded, causing the cowherd to open his eyes widely.

“I knew it. So Master Lloyd is making some sort of preparations again, without telling us?”

“Uh... Yes.”

Raphael’s head dropped. He knew he definitely played the cowherd’s game and lost it. He hadn’t expected the cowherd to elaborate on his guess and just ask for the angel’s confirmation, completely disabling him from giving partially truthful answers.

“I will not tell you full details, because that’s Lloyd Frontera’s job,” said the angel, letting out a bitter chuckle. “But to sum it up, demonic creatures are set to invade this estate.”

“...What?!”

The cowherd came to a complete stop, as well as other cattlemen who were following them from the side. They all turned their faces to the angel and checked the fiery halo, which was still burning like a torch. The angel of thrones knew he was in a tight spot.

“Lloyd Frontera is doing his best in order to fend off the attack and protect everyone in the state. Preparations are being made, the first of which was to evacuate every citizen of the estate to a safe place.”

“Finding a way to evacuate us is the first thing he did?”

“Yeah.”

It was true. The angel of thrones had coincidentally seen Lloyd and Solitas conversing about something, which was overheard albeit little.

“Lloyd Frontera has already prepared a haven to keep all of you safe. He seemed absolutely relieved. I suppose he had been really worried.”

“...”

The cowherd became speechless, as did the other cattlemen. After a brief moment of silence, the cowherd spoke again, this time towards his brothers.

“I think we have to do something to help.”

“I agree, big brother.”

“Likewise.”

“Me, too.”

Other cattle-herding brothers nodded with a look of seriousness on their faces, putting down the buckets full of milk from their hands. The angel of thrones became a bit anxious at the sight.

Gosh, I hope I haven't made things worse.

Raphael wondered if he was supposed to wait until Lloyd revealed all this at the right time. He worried whether or not his rash responses would cause Lloyd some harm, and ultimately get in the way of his plan. The intense pressure and the looks on the faces of the cattle-herding brothers made the angel extremely uncomfortable, causing him to attempt to rectify the situation.

"Please don't act rashly, all of you. The first thing Lloyd Frontera ever did was to make a preparation to evacuate the citizens and laborers, so don't be so terrified. Remain calm, and follow Lloyd's plan to—"

"We're not terrified, lord angel."

"Huh?"

"And we have no intention of acting rashly, either."

"I-is that so?"

"Yes," all of the cattle-herding brothers nodded simultaneously.

"I'm actually upset at Young Master Lloyd for this," said the oldest brother. "He's been trying to bear the burdens all by himself again, finding a safe haven for us. Do we get in the way that much?"

"Well..."

"Why couldn't he just tell us straight away and ask for our help? Did he really think we were going to abandon the estate and run away? I'd be so disappointed if he thought of us that way. Don't you think, brothers?"

The oldest cowherd turned his head and looked at other cattlemen, who nodded and agreed immediately.

“I agree, big brother. I appreciate Young Master Lloyd’s kindness and all, but this is not cool.”

“That’s right. If he really thought we were going to abandon him just because of the terrifying news, he’s mistaken.”

“Definitely. Why couldn’t he just ask us for help?”

“Youngest is right. I don’t think we can sit idly by.”

The oldest brother glanced at the youngest and spoke again.

“Youngest. You’re the quickest on feet among us. Why don’t you run to the village and spread this news?”

“To whom? Everyone I meet?”

“Yeah. I’m sure every citizen will react the same way.”

“Okay. I’ll be back.”

The youngest cattleman was down the road towards the village even before the angel of thrones had a chance to intervene. The youngest reached the village center and began shouting out something, causing the villagers to murmur and head to other neighborhoods to share what they had heard. The news spread like wildfire, eventually reaching everyone in the Frontera Estate.

Most people of the estate responded in a similar way. They were upset because Lloyd hadn’t asked them for help instead of trying to take care of the problem all by himself. They were complaining because they weren’t given a chance to protect the lands they loved and cared for as well. Workers put down the eggs from the chicken’s nest, stopped picking weed from the field and dusted off the dirt, placed on the ground the axe and the saw they were using to cut down trees in the woods, and took off the blacksmith aprons. They gathered near the lord’s mansion by the time Lloyd descended from the mountain.

“What the...”

And he was astonished. The estate developer had been taking measurements in various areas of the eastern mountain until only a moment ago when he saw unexpected messages pop up like spam in front of his eyes. He rode on Ggoming's back and quickly got down to the estate, only to see a huge crowd of people as if there was a revolt or something.

"Young Master Lloyd! Is it true the hell's army is going to invade?"

"Why didn't you tell us?"

"Did you really think we would abandon our homes and run away if you did?"

"We're so disappointed, Master Lloyd!"

"Why can't we ever help you for once?"

"Why do you always try to take care of things all by yourself? You're making us uncomfortable!"

"We don't want to be mere obstacles that get in your way!"

All citizens burst out and threw in one complaint after another, immediately upon seeing Lloyd. They clenched their fists, raised their voices, and shouted out that they could contribute to the welfare of the estate. They demanded him to stop bearing the burdens all alone.

"Wow..."

Lloyd was flabbergasted by the unexpected surprise. But he managed to retain his composure, albeit barely, and turned his head towards the angel of thrones, who was standing on one side with an uncomfortable smile on his face.

Did you tell them this...? Lloyd asked through his eyes.

I'm so sorry. This isn't what I intended, the angel replied awkwardly. Lloyd could tell what had transpired right away.

So, the Angel of Thrones spilled the beans about the invasion of hell's army because he couldn't tell any lies.

But the response from the public wasn't what he had anticipated. It wasn't unpleasant by any means.

I was actually contemplating how I could deliver this message without making them terrified. I really thought the majority of them would panic.

He had expected the citizens to lose hope in fear and chaos and confusion to ensue. He had thought some people would abandon the estate permanently because they had no faith in the evacuation plan. The fear could easily spread among them like a plague, Lloyd had genuinely believed.

But what's this...?

Lloyd took a good look at the crowd. Nearly all citizens of the estate from farmers, cattlemen, caretakers, lumberjacks, and smiths, to pub owners and maidservants of the lord's mansion, were there like soldiers laying siege to a fortification, grumbling and complaining about something he had never anticipated.

They want to help with the difficulties. They don't want to be seen as obstacles that get in the way.

They wanted to overcome problems together. They wanted to suffer together. They wanted to be a part of it all. That was what the citizens were asking in unity.

Why the heck would you want to suffer together? Is this some kind of a new, popular activity?

Lloyd was absolutely flustered. He actually couldn't comprehend.

Why, when this isn't going to benefit them at all?

Lloyd asked these questions despite having seen the answer from the pop-up messages.

It's probably related to the achievements and titles I have acquired thus far.

Lloyd suspected the accomplishments he had made thus far had all contributed to this and created synergy, causing the citizens to behave in a way he couldn't comprehend.

But I suppose I am truly grateful for it.

Lloyd inadvertently chuckled. He had actually been concerned about citizens fleeing before he could evacuate them, unwilling to cooperate with his plan, and causing difficulties in the plan. With this, however, Lloyd could rest assured.

Honestly, this works for me.

Lloyd took a good look at the citizens that demanded to stand together in a crisis like this and burned with the passion to make them work overtime like retail workers in the holiday season.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 389: Calm Before the Storm (1)

Honestly, this works for me.

Lloyd took a good glance at the citizens with sparkly eyes, as the people demanded to be a part of the problem-solving crew and expressed their complaints against Lloyd for trying to fix everything alone in unity, near the entrance to the lord's mansion. It was an absolutely unexpected turn of events, helping Lloyd think of new ideas he could incorporate into the strategy.

Alright. Let's do this.

Flap!

Lloyd made Ggoming land atop a huge boulder and stood on the back of the creature so everyone could see him. He then proceeded to deliver a speech.

"Ahem. Everyone, please calm down. I heard all of your demands and complaints. But do you realize that the hell's army is going to invade soon?"

"Yes!"

"Of course we do!"

The citizens responded robustly. Lloyd waited until the noise subsided and asked again.

"Do you realize what kind of terrifying creatures they are?"

"Yes!"

"Of course we do!"

The citizens shouted even louder, causing Lloyd to chuckle.

"Whoa. I understand. I gratefully accept."

Lloyd did not try to appear modest or honorable by denying their help even once, because he needed all the help he could get at the moment. In fact, the construction to utilize two billion liters of holy water required a decently large workforce.

“Very well. Please calm down. I understand why you were all upset at me. I will never try to take care of things all by myself in situations like this again. Does this work?”

Everyone nodded, and Lloyd continued.

“Thank you so much, all. Now, please allow me to explain everything in detail. I was planning to deliver the speech after some preparations had been made, but here we are. It is true. The hell’s army will invade our beloved estate about 90 days later, consisting of 500 hell’s knights, thousands of demons, and the king of hell in lich’s body.”

Silence ensued, shortly before small murmuring voices of insecurity were exchanged. Lloyd was still impressed by the lack of blatant fear and continued.

“That is why I made the plan to evacuate everyone. All of you will relocate to the lair of a dragon 85 days later.”

The murmur became louder as Lloyd added.

“Meaning, we have 85 days left to prepare for the invasion. We’re going to use that time wisely to lay the foundation to protect our homes and jobs.”

Lloyd spoke each word clearly and loudly, making eye contact with as many people as he could.

“The construction will begin soon. We will have to dig up some ground, build levees, construct waterways, and lay several traps on the suspected enemy travel route. And we need a lot of laborers for that. I need your help. Are you ready for touch physical labor?”

“You bet we are!” The citizens replied right away.

“It isn’t going to be easy. In fact, it will be really tough,” continued Lloyd. “But the toiling under the sun this time will be to protect your own homes and lives, not to protect the count, me, or the estate. Are you willing to put in the effort?”

“Yeah!”

The answer was even louder this time. Lloyd used the opportunity to add even more ridiculous job descriptions.

“Good. You’d better be ready, because the construction will be always happening, on three different shifts, without a day off. You’ll have to work overtime and night shifts frequently. Should we run out of time, we’ll turn that into two different shifts with overloaded work hours. And with that, I would like to make a promise.”

Lloyd took another good glance at the citizens, who were teeming with the passion to do whatever it took to protect their homes. The estate developer reassured them from the bottom of his heart.

“I will not treat your efforts as voluntary work. Please fill out the clock-in and clock-out times as you come to work and leave. Put your name on the list when you’re working overtime and night shifts. You won’t be compensated properly without doing so. Understood? Nothing is free in this world, and that principle applies to your labor as well. Your sweats from hard work are not free by any means.”

Lloyd was serious about this. He had no intention of exploiting the citizens by taking advantage of their goodwill.

They may be burning with passion right now, but they will start losing morale a few days into hard work on site. After weeks of overtime, they won’t be so enthusiastic anymore.

Lloyd composedly calculated the risks and made the prediction based on his wisdom and experience.

That's in human nature. We believe we can do anything when we're so fired up, but once things get a bit difficult, we look for ways to get out of the tight spot.

Lloyd saw the enthusiasm as momentary, despite the passion and excitement the citizens displayed. The willingness to provide voluntary labor and thus contribute to the welfare of the estate was going to wane soon after toiling on site to fatigue without getting much rest. Lloyd knew this side of human nature extremely well.

I must establish these rules right now.

Even though Lloyd was the lord's son and the citizens were commoners of this estate, and even though the relationship between the lord and the people in this particular place was built on trust unlike ordinary fiefdoms, Lloyd still believed both parties needed each other based on business needs. Depending solely on the goodwill of the other party was going to bite him back later on, he believed.

"I will relay the details about the teams, work schedule, daily wage, and overtime pay to each village shortly. Please thoroughly read them when you get the notice. And do not ever forget that your labor is not free. You must receive appropriate compensation for the services you provide. I will make sure you do. So, let's do our absolute best to overcome this crisis and become wealthy all together!"

"...Hooray...?!"

The citizens were dumbfounded but inadvertently rejoiced along with Lloyd's shout anyways. They had felt their passion and enthusiasm subside a little at the mention of wage for the labor, but soon came back to their senses upon hearing proper compensation for their work."

My son is studying abroad in Cremo. I wanted to send him to the royal academia, which will definitely cost a lot more money.

I've been concerned about the cost of medication for my mother.

I want to buy a home.

I was hoping to go to a fancy place for our honeymoon.

If we can get paid handsomely for the regular and overtime shifts...

Young Master Lloyd is very meticulous and precise when it comes to money.

I heard the guys at the engineering corp never failed to get paid on time.

If we do our best this time...

I can't wait to make some money!

Money! Money!

Lloyd noticed the sparkles in the eyes of the people, as the noise near the lord's mansion became even louder. The difference was that while the previous shouts had been based on their raw passion and enthusiasm, they were now inspired by capitalistic needs.

"Yeaaaaaaah!!"

And Lloyd added fuel to this fire.

"Who wants to be rich?!"

"Meeeeeeee!!"

The concern he had about how to share the news of the invasion had been taken care of, just like that. With the promise of cooperation by the citizens, Lloyd did not hesitate to work on the details.

Now's the time to do the work, before the passion dies down.

Lloyd knew that momentum and morale were key factors in getting something done and that they often drew out unexpectedly huge performances from those who were involved. He believed that this was such an instance, and endeavored even more diligently than usual. He reminded himself of the days in which he went to class in the morning and worked later in the evening seven days a week. He remembered the blood he spilled from working too hard. Lloyd worked on measurements and designing during the sun, and forming teams and work schedules for laborers after sunset.

After five days of time, he was finally ready to start the project.

Holy... I'm about to die.

Lloyd felt overwhelming dizziness in his head, with the completed construction plan in front of him. He hadn't gotten a minute of sleep for the past five days, operating the Asrahan Core Technique to endure the physical limits.

Because I have no time to waste. I need to get this project done in 80 days, considering when I need to evacuate the citizens. While freezing time could come in handy, it definitely seemed feasible to get everything completed in 80 days even without the use of RP. Except there is no room for any mistake whatsoever.

One mistake could cause the two billion liters of water to sweep through the villages and facilities, or even cause the waters to go to absolute waste without inflicting damage to the hell's army. That was the last thing he wanted, so Lloyd perfected his plan while keeping the simulation feature on the entire time. Thanks to these efforts, Lloyd's stamina was as low as that of someone who had just run three marathons in a row.

But the real work begins now!

Lloyd wondered if he was going to die of fatigue well before the hell's army invaded the estate, but brushed these concerns aside and commenced the construction project. Digging up the foundation for the waterway from Lake Kapua to the outskirts of the estate, through which the two billion liters of holy water was going to travel, went smoothly thanks to huge contributions by Bibeong and Draggy.

"Bibeong! Bibeong!"

Shriek! Growl!

A rare summoned creature and bone dragon, both of which boasted of couple hundred feet of statures, were especially great at large-scale digging albeit lacking a bit of precision. Large trees and boulders were removed each time Bibeong dug out a chunk of the soil with his claws, and a few feet of trenches were made each time Draggy went to work. After the two colossal beasts did the initial work, the team of laborers got to work.

“Team One! Get to work!”

“Alright!”

A team of laborers consisting of citizens would begin working on site, perfecting the rough pathway to be under the plan. They got rid of the dirt on the side and kept the vicinity tidy, while the engineering corps built levees using the removed dirt.

I cannot control the flow of water entirely just by digging up the ground.

Because the path between the lake and the estate was not in a straight line, Lloyd had to incorporate the natural terrain of the mountains as much as he could in order to minimize the actual work by laborers. The levees on the outer edge of the corners were absolutely necessary to keep the water from overflowing and thus getting wasted.

Every individual of the estate endeavored in unity. Javier’s beautiful face was covered in dirt. Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Ggoming moved around restlessly to do things that were too difficult for humanoid laborers. Orc warriors flexed their muscles as they carried heavy items. Elves offer prayers to the removed trees and shrubs to calm the spirits down. Hell’s knight Sir Giolexius and the skeletal corp cracked their joints as they provided labor. Angel Raphael picked up the pickaxe and the shovel from time to time, in between sessions during which he shed tears of laughter from Lloyd’s dad jokes.

The absolutely rewarding project of destroying nature continued. The shape of the moon changed as days passed, leaves turned green after a month, and the new season came after two months into the project. The construction was completed exactly on the 79th day after it kicked off, as the cries of cicadas filled the mountains.

Whoa...

Lloyd wiped the sweat off his forehead and took a deep breath, before lifting his chin to stare at the end of the deep and wide waterway.

Ha. It looks more like a humongous valley.

Lloyd inadvertently let out a bittersweet chuckle at the splendor of the structure that was definitely too vast to be called a mere waterway. It was so grand that strangers would see it and believe this terrain was natural. The width of the opening, in fact, was greater than an ordinary football field.

Except I minimized its width as much as I could. That much water cannot travel through a pathway that's any narrower than this. I can't afford to waste any of that, because that's going to cause chaos.

The abundance of water could even destroy the pathway here and there, increasing the amount of loss significantly. Controlling water would virtually be impossible as per the simulations he ran.

But we did a good job. It isn't just big. The finishing is perfect, too.

Almost everything was ready save two.

"Master Lloyd," said Javier with a frown, as Lloyd was getting ready to actually evacuate the citizens. "What happened to reinforcements?"

"Reinforcements?"

"Yeah," Javier continued with a look of doubt in his eyes. "You sent out missives requesting reinforcements from here and there."

"I did."

In fact, Lloyd had requested aid from Queen Magentano, Cremo, Namaran, the Sultanate, orc, and elf tribes, the mermaid kingdom, and the Centauri tribe in the Great Plains. He had pretty much sent out missives to every faction that he could enlist the help of.

“That’s why I’m concerned. It’s been almost three months since we requested for aid, but nobody has responded, let alone come.”

“They have their reasons.”

“Reasons?”

“Of course they do. Please don’t tell me they haven’t responded because I am that much hated by them.”

“...”

“Dude.”

“My apologies.”

“Ugh, forget it. Anyhow, it’s a problem if they come too early.”

“What do you mean?”

“Food.”

“Huh?” Replied Javier with a confused look.

“Think about it. Let’s say Her Majesty dispatched a few thousand soldiers. None of those guys would be skinny or fragile. They would be healthy, and eat a lot of food. Imagine how much food we would waste per day.”

“...”

“Not to mention the orcs, mermaids, and centauri. Think of the expenses that we would incur by trying to keep them moralized with proper meals.”

“...”

“So I specifically requested on the bottom of the missives to time their arrivals to two months after receiving the missives.”

“I see.”

“Speaking of the devil.”

“Wait. So that noise is...”

“Most likely.”

Lloyd shrugged his shoulders as he looked up in the sky. Javier lifted his head too and beheld the small silhouettes that made whooshing sounds through the air, shortly before crash landing in the front yard of the lord’s mansion.

Thwoosh! Thump! Crush!

Muscular creatures with sharp dorsal fins landed on the ground like projectiles from a trebuchet, creating a dust storm in the vicinity from the impact on the ground. By the time it subsided, somebody spoke up.

“Whew. Lloyd Frontera. Is it true that we could meet creatures that are as strong as us here?” The mermaid queen showed a characteristically baleful, yet gracious smile through the dust in the air.

That was the first group of reinforcements that Lloyd had been waiting for.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 390: Calm Before the Storm (2)

“Whew. Lloyd Frontera. Is it true that we could meet creatures that are as strong as us here?”

The fearsome grin that showed amidst the dust storm reminded Lloyd how much of a killer smile the mermaid queen possessed; it was literally terrifying.

Look at all those muscles. Even her cheeks are so big.

Lloyd inadvertently flinched at the thought of intense exercise that would have made even the cheek muscles bulge out. But on the outside, he maintained a welcoming smile nonetheless.

“Haha. Ha. Thank you so much for agreeing to help us.”

“No need. I kind of wanted to see if the Jewel of Truth had been constructed to perfection, anyways.”

“I see.”

“That’s why I brought my best warriors with me.”

The mermaid queen glanced behind her quickly, pointing at the front yard of the lord’s mansion. It was like a bodybuilding contest, full of half-fish warriors that seemed powerful. And that wasn’t all; more warriors fell from the sky even as Lloyd stared at flexing muscles. Some fell on the front yard, some in the backyard, and others in the entrance to the property. It was like a trebuchet bombardment.

“Uh, well, I didn’t expect these many warriors to help me out.”

“Quite the contrary. I hand-picked only a thousand.”

“I see... But how did you... come all the way here?”

“You saw it. We jumped.”

“Jumped...?”

“Yeah,” replied the mermaid queen, with an even deadlier smile on her muscular face. “We are a people that swim through the oceans and seas, from the depths to crashing waves during tornadoes, with powerful kicks alone. We take pride in our raw strength to push and stomp on things with our tailfin. We found the lack of water pressure a bit strange in the beginning when we got out, but soon realized stomping on the ground made it much easier for us to move a longer distance each time.”

“O-oh. That’s amazing.”

“It is indeed. A refreshingly new experience, it was. Ascending by about a thousand feet in the air with one stomp on the ground made me feel so good.”

“Wh-what about landing?”

“You saw it with your eyes,” said the mermaid queen, shrugging her broad shoulders. “We land with our upper body because it’s more convenient that way. We apply an immense amount of pressure on our upper body muscles from the wrist and forearms to the biceps, triceps, shoulders, back, and abs. It was a whole-body workout because we would go back to our lower body to jump up again.”

“So you basically exercised your way here.”

“Of course we did. We got out of the water on the nearest beach around here and passed by a few human settlements. The villagers were fortunately extremely kind. They rushed to our aid when we asked in which direction the Frontera Estate was.”

“...The roughest criminals would become nice and kind in your mighty, muscular presence.”

“Huh? What do you mean?”

“N-never mind. I am truly grateful that you came. Everyone, please come this way so I can show you to your rooms.”

Lloyd barely managed to contain his bitter chuckle, as he could see what kind of events would have transpired as the mermaids and men found their way to Frontera Estate. The fear innocent villagers would have felt was obvious.

I would have seen the doctor after this from the shock if I was one of them. Whew.

Lloyd guided one thousand mermaid warriors to the honeybee apartment complex, shortly before escorting the mermaid queen and introduced her to Count Frontera. To the estate developer’s relief, the count did not faint upon the sight.

Other reinforcements followed. Next to show up was the orc tribe alliance.

Shriek! “Frontera Estate is a brother of Sand and Steel Tribe! Sand and Steel Tribe is a member of the orc alliance! Brother of a member is out brother! Help we, our friend!” Shriek!

“Help we, our friend!” Shriek!

“Help we, our brother!” Shriek!

“Help we, our girlfriend!” Shriek!

“...There’s a spy among us!” Shriek!

Thirty thousand orc warriors rushed to the estate, flexing their muscles as they filled the wide, paved road. Grand chieftain Krash of the orc alliance visited the mansion on behalf of all orcs, and Arosh was excited to see him.

“Uncle Krash!” Shriek!

“My nephew!” Shriek!

Bam! The high-five between two muscular and strong orcs made a sound so explosive that people thought someone was playing the drums. But nothing out of the ordinary took place as the grand chieftain was straightforward and genuinely polite, despite the rough nature. However, flares sparked between the two as soon as the grand chieftain saw the mermaid queen.

Her back muscles are no joke. Shriek!

Look at the sheer size of the torso. He definitely has amazing core muscles.

They exchanged looks that suggested how eager they were to face one another in completion of strengths like arm-wrestling or dead-lifting should they have an opportunity.

Other reinforcements included 300 elf archers from the Everglow Woods, and they were extremely quiet and subtle as they arrived unlike the previous two. Next were 500 sprinters from the centauri tribe in the Great Plains, followed by one battalion of artillerymen from the Cremo Estate, two companies of mountain pikemen from the Namaran Estate, a company of high-tier Mamluk cavalry deployed by the Sultan from the east, and lastly, 10,000 royal soldiers under the direct command of Queen Alicia Termina Magentano from the west.

“...Huh?”

Lloyd rubbed his eyes in disbelief at the sight of an unexpected individual at the head of the royal army.

What the... Why is Her Majesty here...?

It was absolutely unexpected and astonishing, and the queen perhaps read Lloyd’s thoughts; she was giving a blatant look of contempt to Lloyd.

“It’s been a while, Lloyd Frontera.”

“I, Lloyd Frontera, the servant of the rightful ruler of these lands, am honored to see you again, Your Majesty.”

“Really?”

“I am truly awe-struck.”

“Hmm. You seem rather perplexed instead.”

“Not at all, Your Majesty.”

“And you’d dare to speak a blatant lie now?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty. I would never.”

“Then why did you look so surprised the moment you saw me?”

“Out of my audacious concerns and worries about you, Your Majesty.”

“Concerns and worries? About me? From you?”

“That is correct,” said Lloyd with buttery lips, surprising the queen in return. “As I have stated in the missive to humbly request reinforcements, the invasion by the hell’s army isn’t going to be an easy battle.”

“I suppose so. It will most likely be a gruesome one.”

“That is why I was worried and concerned.”

“No way.”

“Yes way, Your Majesty.”

“How dare you worry about my safety.”

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk, tsk,” said the queen, empathetically staring at the estate developer. “Worries and concerns by someone that cannot even hold his own in a sparring match against me. I don’t know what I’m supposed to make of that.”

“Please consider this to have stemmed from my unending loyalty towards my only liege, Your Majesty.”

“Loyalty? Is that really it?”

“Huh?”

“Hmm.”

Gulp. Lloyd made eye contact with the queen and saw the element of dissatisfaction in her eyes. He began to sweat uncomfortably.

Why are you looking at me like the predator trying to hunt down the prey...?

It sent unexpected chills down his spine, but the estate developer quickly shook the fear off and added.

“It will be an unprecedentedly tough battle. Should any harm befall you, Your Majesty, I’m just afraid of the repercussions that would follow--“

“You’re afraid of the consequences and the responsibilities you’d have to bear.”

“I am, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd was being honest. Even as he was requesting aid from the royal court, he really did not wish to see the queen lead the army herself to show up here.

I’ll be toast if something terrible happens to the queen. I don’t want that.

Of course, the queen was a mighty warrior herself, and far superior in might to Lloyd. But the enemy army consisted of 500 hell’s knights, each of whom was more powerful than the swordmaster queen herself. Despite Lloyd’s concerns about her safety, however, the queen seemed to think differently.

“Lloyd Frontera. This estate is a part of the territories I rightfully own.”

“That is true, and I am aware, Your Majesty.”

“Are you telling me to sit back and watch from the side, when my territory is being invaded?”

“...”

“If you honestly thought I would have, I am truly disappointed.”

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“That sounds like a more genuine apology.”

“It is, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd internally felt awkward as he bowed. He understood that he couldn’t oppose the queen’s wish if she wanted to partake in the battle.

It’s not like I could tell her to return to the royal capital without her army. I’ll just have to make sure she doesn’t get hurt.

While her presence was definitely going to help in terms of slaying enemies, Lloyd had to ensure her safety during battle. As Lloyd tried to incorporate this factor into his strategy, he heard the footsteps of two people running towards the scene. It was Count and Countess Frontera, rushing to greet Her Majesty at the head of the royal army.

“Marbella Frontera, wife of Arcos Frontera, at your service, Your Majesty.”

They had obviously sprinted here immediately upon hearing the news, evidenced by the urgency in their movement as they prostrated without trying to fix their unkempt hair or outfit, not to mention the unexpected surprise and tension from the shock.

Come to think of it, it’s their first time seeing the queen.

Lloyd realized how astonished they must have been by the visit of the queen, who graciously greeted them with a satisfactory smile on her face.

“It’s a pleasure to finally meet you two. I’ve heard so many good things about you from your son, Lloyd Frontera.”

“...Huh?”

“He was so proud of you two for being the best lords and parents in the entire world.”

“Oh...”

“And I think he had a reason to be, now that I see you with my own eyes. That is why I consider this meeting to be a delightful one.”

“Y-you have our sincerest gratitude, Your Majesty!”

The count and the countess appeared genuinely touched as they prostrated again to pay respect to their liege. The queen’s smile became more apparent, as she took a quick glance at Lloyd.

Wait. That’s the look of someone asking me if she did a good job.

Lloyd gulped nervously, contemplating whether he was supposed to nod in agreement. But the look in the queen’s sparkly eyes was so inviting, that Lloyd couldn’t help but acknowledge it anxiously. It seemed that Queen Magentano was truly delighted by the good first impression she gave and received in this encounter. Lloyd subtly nodded, making the queen even more satisfied.

It somehow felt like that awkward moment when a man would introduce his girlfriend to his parents for the first time. Lloyd was convinced that he wasn’t just having outrageous thoughts.

This is bad. Really bad.

Terrible feelings struck his gut. Lloyd’s lifelong wish was to find a rather ordinary woman to fall in love with, before getting married and having kids with her to lead an unremarkable family life. This was the extent of the luxury he had always dreamed of, not the frantic romance with the mightiest queen in the entire continent.

I can see and feel it. I can sense it. This isn’t good.

Lloyd could see himself in the queen's pockets, like a scaredy cat in the presence of a ferocious lioness. But the queen and Lloyd's parents were engaging in pleasant conversations despite what Lloyd was feeling. They appeared genuinely delighted; Lloyd wondered if he had ever seen that side of the queen, and the smile on her face somehow made the intense heat of the mid-summer day feel absolutely refreshing...

...Snap out of it, dude!

Lloyd shook his head fiercely, suppressing the strange feeling that was trying to overtake him. He convinced himself that this wasn't the time to embrace anything mellow, as the huge obstacle was literally right around the corner. He cooled himself down with such thoughts and made the final preparation before the battle kicked off; it was to evacuate the citizens of Frontera Estate and Lacona Barony. Thanks to the cooperative dragon Solitas's help, all regular citizens were mass-teleported into his lair.

Five more days passed, and the sun rose to embark on the morning of the fateful day. Lloyd stepped outside and embraced the sunlight, heading towards the Jewel of Truth located in the northern part of the estate but making it seem like a normal hike. The purpose was clear.

Let's verify what outcome all the efforts I made thus far would bring about.

He wanted to see if the preparations were adequate if he was going to survive, or if there was something else he needed to do. He had wished to confirm it again prior to the battle, but couldn't use the ending spoiler.

I don't have enough CP.

Lloyd had resorted to ending spoilers several times leading up to this point to prepare for the grand fight and was actually running low. He thought he had accumulated enough, but failed to spend it wisely out of anxiety.

But I still have the Jewel of Truth. I must not lose focus.

Lloyd dived into the water, brushing unnecessary thoughts aside. He placed his hands on the altar, activated the mana heart, and operated the circle to trigger the glow more than 200 feet underwater.

Zing! The Jewel of Truth approached Lloyd's consciousness, through every sense he possessed.

[You, who wish to obtain a truthful answer from the Jewel of Truth. You must reveal a secret about yourself, that only you are aware of, to this world in exchange for the truth you seek.]

The voice and the process were as expected. Lloyd already knew what response he was going to give.

The truth about me that I'm going to reveal this time is...

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 391: Calm Before the Storm (3)

“You’re here. Have a seat, you don’t want the food to get cold.”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd sat on the chair and dragged his seat towards the table, on which a meal more humble than usual welcomed him. The countess herself prepared the meal for the first time in a while, as all maidservants evacuated the estate. Lloyd’s parents smiled all the way as their son glanced back at them slightly uncomfortably. He appreciated them, but certainly thought he did not deserve to be on the receiving end of such care and affection; Lloyd felt the need to change the subject.]

“What about Her Majesty?”

“Her Majesty will have a meal separately.”

“Separately?”

“She showed us kindness by allowing the three of us to spend some time together, since this is the last dinner before a grand battle.”

“Oh...”

Lloyd realized it was indeed his last supper before the epic fight, as Count Frontera added.

“She also said she did not want to see her trusted vassal and his family suffer from digestion problems. That’s why I wanted to ask if Her Majesty has... well... a peculiar habit during meals?”

“Not at all.”

“Really?”

“Her mealtime etiquette is as elegant and excellent as you could expect. Her manner of speech may appear tenacious at times, but it’s actually fitting considering her authority. She actually listens to her vassals and tries to understand how they feel.”

“I see. So Her Majesty was being genuinely kind.”

“Most likely. Her Majesty is like that.”

“What do you mean?”

“She appears tough on the surface, but is actually very sweet.”

“I see. That’s what I find even stranger.”

“Huh?” Lloyd responded confusedly as the count continued.

“According to others that have had an audience with Her Majesty or spent time by her side, the queen is fair and just, yet ruthless and cold. That’s what I heard from many different people.”

“Uh, well...”

“I take it that you got to see the side that others weren’t able to?”

“I suppose so...?”

Lloyd was flustered by the unanticipated flow of the conversation. Even the looks his parents gave him throughout made him feel uncomfortable.

“The time you spent by her side must have been very meaningful.”

“Uh, well, I guess...”

“We heard about it, too.”

“Heard?”

“That you spent two months with Her Majesty alone--

“Thank you for the meal!”

Lloyd quickly started eating from the fear that he'd have digestive problems anyway even without the presence of the queen. But the smile on his parents' faces did not depart.

"It's really okay. We are ready to accept anything."

"...Huh?"

"Although it's far from the ordinary relationship we were expecting you to be in, sometimes things like this happen."

"...What?"

"I suppose you wouldn't be a victim of domestic abuse, since you're a swordmaster yourself, right?"

Lloyd realized things weren't really going well for him. He genuinely regretted having decided to spend two months with the queen, despite having stopped an unfortunate tragedy that was predestined to follow, by curing her arm. Lloyd thought he had overcome an obstacle, but it appeared he had run into another.

Ugh, I hate this kind of misunderstanding.

Lloyd did not comprehend why people would resort to making such assumptions based on only a few hints they saw. For him, it was just two months together with the queen to cure her illness. It was overwhelming. It was uncomfortable. He had to change the subject immediately to get out of the tight spot.

"But aren't you... afraid...?"

"Afraid? Of what?" The count replied.

"Tonight."

The smile on the count's face slightly subsided as Lloyd continued.

“I was actually surprised not to see you among the citizens evacuating the estate. This place might be razed to ashes by the sunrise tomorrow morning. It will be dangerous.”

That was Lloyd’s honest thought. In fact, he had been astonished to see them outside of the teleportation seal, letting out chuckles before returning to the mansion as though their presences were required here.

“It isn’t too late now. I can reach out to the dragon if you want to flee to his lair.”

“Hmm.”

“The citizens over there would love you two to be there with them since they need a leader to rely on in a crisis like this.”

Lloyd shared his thoughts with the count, who responded by lifting his head slowly.

“I beg to differ, Lloyd.”

“Huh?”

“Think about it. What title do I hold in this estate?”

“You’re the lord of--“

“Right. I am the lord of this estate.”

“But...”

“I understand how you feel, and that’s enough for us. As the lord of this estate and holder of the authority to govern this land as per Her Majesty’s command, I am bound by oath to protect the citizens and their homes. I cannot evacuate the property just because everyone is doing the same in the face of a disaster,” said the count, in a more serious voice than ever. “Especially in the absence of the citizens. Somebody must be here to keep their homes safe so they have a place to return after the battle. That is my duty and responsibility as a nobleman and the lord of the estate, even if it is inefficient.”

“But father--“

“I know what you’re trying to say, Lloyd. To tell you the truth, your mother and I are scared too. But we still decided to remain and fulfill our duties despite all that. I hope you can respect that.”

“...Yeah.”

Lloyd had no choice but to agree this time after seeing the resolute stance his parents displayed, even though he still had thousands of counterarguments to make. Lloyd could only make them promise him one thing.

“Just make sure to lock up the master bedroom tightly tonight.”

“I was hoping to partake in the battle.”

“No.”

“But I had my sword and armor polished for this occasion.”

“No.”

“You’re being adamant.”

“Because I have to be,” Lloyd insisted.

He had to be. Mayhem was going to break out in a few hours of time, and losing his parents was the last thing he wanted. Perhaps that was why he got a sudden impulse to reveal everything.

Is this the right time to tell them?

The real Lloyd Frontera, who had been an absolute failure of a man, was no more. He wondered if this would be the last chance to share what fate their real son went through, and what caused all of this to happen.

It probably is.

The hell's gate was about to open. According to the answer by the Jewel of Truth before, what he had to do was clear.

I should.

He had made this promise with Lloyd. He had strengthened his resolve plenty of times. He had to break the news even if it would cause them to grieve and despise him. It was now or never.

"Actually, there's something I need to tell you."

Lloyd took a deep breath. His heart pounded extremely fast and his hands trembled like a leaf.

"I am..."

But before he could finish, Count Frontera interrupted him.

"Hold on, Lloyd."

"...Huh?"

"I think I know what you're trying to say, but can it wait until the battle is over?"

"Huh?!"

"It's just a bit... awkward to hear it from your own lips. Your mother and I know better than anyone else just how much you love and care for us. I just feel like it's a red flag suggesting a tragic ending if you tell us that now. So... please say it after we both survive tonight."

"Well, uh, I..."

"Please, Lloyd. I'm asking you a favor."

"..."

Lloyd became speechless at the benevolent glance by the count and the countess. He simply nodded because he was in no circumstance to bring it up now.

“I understand.”

“Thank you.”

The two smiled in relief. Lloyd wondered if that was how they were giving their son an excuse to hold off on carrying out an uncomfortable duty and focus on the imminent battle instead.

“...Okay. Just make sure you stay safe.”

After the meal was over, he stepped out of the mansion and embraced the red sky in the dusk of an early summer. He walked and tried to shake off the lingering fear and other complex emotions until someone interrupted him.

“I’m not sure what to make of the secret that you actually enjoyed causing strife between two parties behind the scenes at Summoner’s Rift.”

A familiar voice graced Lloyd’s ears before a certain someone joined him on the stroll so naturally and nonchalantly, like a veteran driver changing lanes without breaking a sweat. Lloyd took a glance and noticed Javier walking side by side with him, shrugging his shoulders.

“I’m still confused by the secret that was revealed when you used the Jewel of Truth a moment ago.”

“There’s nothing else to it.”

“I’m not confused by the fact that you enjoyed causing strife between people. I get that.”

“Then?”

“What is this Summoner’s Valley?”

“A living hell, in which people cry out for help, bash on trolls, and swear at each other’s mothers.”

“...And you’ve been to a place like that discreetly?”

“Yeah.”

It was true. In fact, Suho used to skip classes and go to the internet cafe to visit this place without telling his parents. Nothing he said in that statement was false.

“But aren’t you afraid?” Lloyd asked, changing the subject.

“Afraid of what?”

“You know. Of later.”

“The hell’s army?”

“Yeah,” replied Lloyd with a nod. “Because I actually am scared.”

“So am I.”

“I knew it.”

“Yeah.”

“That’s the only reason I’m saying this,” said Lloyd. It was a strange day as the estate developer felt the need to share things he wouldn’t have under normal circumstances. Perhaps it was because of what he had seen through the Jewel of Truth. “Thank you for everything you’ve done.”

But today was the only day he had a chance to, and the only day in which people wouldn’t give him dirty looks for it.

“I couldn’t have gotten this far or accomplished anything without you. Even though you were sometimes... I mean always grumbling and complaining, I never disliked that side of you once.”

Javier silently listened as Lloyd continued.

“I appreciate it. I’m asking for your help yet again tonight, but just make sure you don’t stretch yourself and get hurt.”

That was Lloyd’s honest thought. He hadn’t had a chance to share this with Javier, and felt like he would never have an opportunity after the battle. Lloyd took time to share his true feelings with the grandmaster that stood by his side since he first came to this world because he was going to regret it if he didn’t. But the reply was absolutely unexpected.

“Hmm. I heard people do things that are out of character when death is imminent.”

“...”

“This must be a terrible sign to see the touchy side of you that you wouldn’t otherwise show.”

“...Dude.”

“I’m listening.”

“Can’t you feel my honest intentions?”

“No.”

“...”

“But I felt something else,” added Javier with a smirk on his face.

“What.”

“Vigilance within me, warning me against an unpleasant surprise.”

“What?”

“I think my experience is telling me to beware of the intent to exploit me with sugar-coated words again.”

“What am I, a scumbag boss?”

“...”

“Please don’t tell me you really thought I was.”

“Something like that.”

“...”

“I have something to say, too, Master Lloyd.”

“What.”

“I wanted to express my gratitude, too.”

“I won’t fall for it.”

“That’s just how I feel.”

“I’m not buying it.”

“I don’t think Frontera Estate and the citizens here would be as prosperous and well off without you. I truly appreciate everything you’ve done, and admire you for not boasting about your accomplishments once.”

“Stop messing with me.”

“So I made the decision to serve you more faithfully as a knight in your service, if we get to see the sun tomorrow morning.”

“Stop. You don’t have to raise a red flag on a day like this.”

“What do you mean by red flag?”

“You wouldn’t get it. Ugh, do I have to perform a ritual to get rid of the evil spirit now?”

“...”

“Let’s head back. It’s time.”

“As you wish.”

Time to reminisce about the past was over, and Lloyd took Javier and headed back to the estate. It really was time.

They’re supposed to invade at midnight.

The hell’s gate was about to open, and hundreds of hell’s knights followed by thousands of demons, not to mention the king of hell, were going to flood in. Physical preparations had been made, and they needed to be mentally ready.

***

A few hours passed, and the sky was no longer red. Darkness hovered over the estate as the constellation of the prisoner lit the night sky. The defenders of the estate silently waited for midnight in their positions assigned by Lloyd. Some were hiding behind the shrubs, and some stood on the roof of the apartment complex, all awaiting the moment nervously. The tension and feelings of insecurity before the battle were apparent, but no one panicked because they had made thorough preparations according to the plan by Lloyd Frontera, who was known for his meticulousness. There was not a shred of doubt in their heads that the battle would go as expected as proven time and again.

The full moon lit up the night sky, and there was a sudden change in the atmosphere.

Bzzzzzzzt. Red flashes of lightning fell from the night sky, making thunderous roars and ominous flapping noises. The moon turned red, and the hell’s gate opened.

Bzzt! The nefarious ring spewed out the intense heat from hell about 300 feet above the ground, shortly before creatures that were even more forbidding showed themselves in the midst of darkness, glaring through their glowing eyes. The first unit of hell’s knights was here.

Clink! Clink! The plate armors clashed, as the hell's knights rode the hell's steeds and began breathing the air in the human realm. They all harbored the ill will to bring chaos and despair to this place as they jumped down from the gate and jumped down to the ground one by one. Each member of the Frontera Alliance saw the frightening sight and clenched his or her fist in confidence.

It worked!

The first hell's knight dove straight into the pool of holy water instead of the ground as it had expected. The holy water pool party, which no hell's knight even imagined in its wildest dreams had only just begun.

Splash!

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 392: Battle of Holy Water (1)

“Death to Lloyd Frontera!”

“Destruction to Frontera Estate!”

“Demise to Suho Kim!”

The hell’s knights let out battle cries robustly in the fiery hell on the other side of the hell’s gate, while riding on the back of hell’s steeds that were more ferocious than ogres. They were overrun with the excitement of showering themselves in the blood of humans and creatures in the humanly realm. It was likewise for the commander, Sir Kalidus of the Second Corp of hell’s army.

Today is the day we welcome a new commander-in-chief.

He recalled the plan by his liege, king of hell, to bring the human Suho Kim in under his wings to have him work as commander in chief overseeing the day-to-day operation of the entire underworld. He had initially dared to oppose the idea in the beginning, as he couldn’t imagine serving a human as a higher-ranking officer.

But so be it.

If that was what his liege, the supreme ruler of the underworld, wished, he could only accept the decision graciously as he was only a sword to be swung in the hands of his master.

Shring. Clink!

Hell’s knight Sir Kalidus drew both of his darkened swords crafted with demon bones and released sinister energy in the dead of night. He strengthened his resolve to take the enemy’s life himself, if he was going to serve a human as a higher-ranking officer. He was determined to behead the human with his own sword and place his head on the pike. That was going to be his way of welcoming the new commander-in-chief. With this resolute mindset embedded in his bones, Sir Kalidus followed the steps of the first unit of hell's knights and into the portal of hell's gate.

Whoosh!

The air immediately changed as soon as he passed through the portal. The refreshingly disturbing scent of the fiery hell was no more, and the detestably clear air surrounded him.

Tsk, tsk. What a horrid place.

Sir Kalidus jumped down from hell's gate, allowing the gravity of a strange realm to pull him down to the ground approximately 300 feet down. He took a quick glance at the surroundings as he fell.

I don't see anybody, as expected. They must be clueless.

That had to be, since all this was planned in the underworld; there was no way mere humans in this terrible realm could have found out about it.

Although our liege hasn't had a chance to monitor what was going on in the human realm because he had to incarnate himself in the lich's body.

But that wasn't going to cause any change and all humans in this estate were going to die tonight.

"By my hands!"

Sir Kalidus landed on the ground with a heinous shout, or so he thought. He fell straight into the deep, cold water awaiting him.

Splash!

"What?!"

Caught off guard by the unexpected presence of water underneath, Sir Kalidus expressed his displeasure.

Ugh. The hell's gate must have opened above the river or something.

It appeared that way, but it did not matter to the hell's knight because all he had to do was swim out of the river. Hell's knights weren't going to drown anyway.

It's inconvenient, but whatever.

Sizzle!

That was when extreme heat overwhelmed his body, simultaneously as he shivered from the mysterious sensation that felt as if he had just been struck by lightning or crushed by a huge boulder. The excruciating pain mercilessly tortured him.

"Ugh... Argh!"

Sir Kalidus inadvertently twitched in agony as each of his bones felt extreme discomfort. Sir Kalidus finally realized he hadn't fallen into an ordinary body of water.

I-is this holy water?!

Sizzle!

Holy water wreaked absolute havoc on Sir Kalidus's body, giving him a painful seizure. It wasn't an unremarkable holy water either; it was a high-grade one, made from the tears of the high-ranking angel of thrones. Other hell's knights had fallen and fell in the pool of holy water and suffered the same agony as they struggled like fish out of water.

And the number of victims grew exponentially. Sir Kalidus barely managed to contain the pain and shouted out.

"There's a pool of holy water right here! Aaaaack!"

The cry filled the skies and reached the hell's gate, warning the hell's knight that was just passing through the portal. He barely stopped and checked the ground saw the holy water, and passed the message onto his comrades-in-arms.

“There’s a pond of holy water beneath the gate, so jump across when you leave the gate!”

The hell’s knights began to perform long jumps as they left through the portal, drawing a high arch in the air before landing. However, another pool of holy water awaited them there as well.

Splash! Splash!

“Aaaahhhh!”

Hell’s knights cried out in pain and agony as they were showered with holy water. That wasn’t the end of the torture, however, as a melody even more terrifying and peculiar than the holy water itself banged their eardrums while the hell’s knights suffered.

“Row! Row! Row your boat! Gently down the stream!”

“...Urgh.”

“Merrily! Merrily! Merrily! Merrily! Life is but a dream!”

Splash! Splash!

The abysmal melody felt like a genuine attempt at a song by a naturally horrid singer, and that was what made it worse for the listeners of the jam. Strange off-beat recitations accompanied by egregious vibration.

“Row! Row! Row your boat! Gently down the stream! Merrily! Merrily! Merrily! Merrily! Life is but a dream! Da-dun!”

Splash!

Hell’s knights helplessly continued to jump into the pool of holy water like lemmings jumping off the cliff, realizing something in the process.

“It’s Suho Kim!”

“That bastard must be near!”

“He has to be here somewhere!”

The eyes of hell’s knights glowed as they suffered immense torment inside the holy water. They finally strengthened their resolve to get up.

“Our target... must be near.”

“I will kill him myself!”

The first target to be eliminated during this war was Suho Kim, who was presumably in the vicinity. Each of the hell’s knights burned with the passion to make the greatest contribution to tonight’s inevitable victory by beheading the detestable human being, before being acknowledged as the legendary hell’s knight honored by the king of hell himself, to cause the entire underworld to bow before it. They weren’t willing to share the glory with their comrades-in-arms.

“Ugh...!”

Commander Sir Kalidus of the Second Corps of hell’s army stopped struggling and fell to the bottom of the water, stomped on the ground, and rapidly resurfaced. He finally got himself out of the water and rolled on the soil.

“Huff, huff... Ugh...”

The pain from bathing in holy water was only temporary.

I will not give in!

Only his outer bones had been soaked, and the hell’s knight was convinced he could endure the pain and still put up a fight.

“Aaaaargh!!”

Sir Kalidus let out a sharp cry as he leaned on the two swords he had placed on the ground, looking around viciously with the intent to spot the human that was singing a horrid song somewhere in the vicinity.

“Suho Kim!”

A part of his armor turned into the hell’s steed as soon as he shouted. Sir Kalidus got on the horse and charged toward Lloyd, followed by other hell’s knights that had managed to escape the body of holy water, with strong animosity against the man who was going to offer the most valuable spoil of war. Lloyd saw the fearsome knights fiercely charging towards him and grinned satisfactorily.

“Perfect.”

He successfully drew their attention, just as he had planned and expected.

“Isn’t that right, Your Majesty?”

“...”

“Your Majesty?”

Queen Alicia finally removed her fingers that had been plugging her ears only after confirming Lloyd had stopped singing.

“...Are you done singing?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“What a relief. I was seriously contemplating if I had to get rid of my eardrums entirely.”

“...”

“Are we to move according to the tactic now?” The queen asked.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

The start was certainly good. Lloyd had the workers construct a few large-scale pools of holy water underneath the spot where the hell’s gate was going to open, with the intent to deliver some damage to the first unit of hell’s knights. It had gone according to plan.

And it definitely made them upset.

Hell's knights were too strong to drown in holy water, nor would they sustain severe injuries. The only way to effectively wear them down was to break their bones first.

So the holy water soaks their bone marrows and cartilage as well.

Otherwise, hell's knights had to be bathed within for an hour or two in order for human fighters to slay them.

But I can't do that with just pools of holy water.

These ponds weren't intended to drown them, but to give them a taste of it. Lloyd knew he had to lure them into a more carefully laid trap.

"Alright, we gotta run now. Okay?"

"Ppodong!"

Ppodong robustly lifted its thumb up in response. Lloyd gently petted the beast in the back of its neck.

"Good. You'll run as much as you want today."

Lloyd then turned his head towards the queen and spoke again.

"Your Majesty?"

"I am ready. Begin."

The queen, who was riding on the cushiony back of Ppodong alongside Lloyd, had already drawn her sword and been letting out a fearsome vibe. She was basically making a statement that she was prepared for battle, with her entire body. Lloyd saw that and lightly slapped the back of Ppodong's neck.

"Let's go, Ppodong!"

“Ppodong!”

The colossal hamster’s plump feet stomped on the ground, as the beast accelerated like a missile.

Whoooooosh! Its zero-back was certainly within three seconds. Lloyd saw the scenery appear blurry in an instant, as the wind slammed him in his forehead, cheeks, and then his entire body. But Lloyd encouraged Ppodong even further.

“Faster! Quicker!”

Hell’s knights on the back of hell’s steeds were chasing after him at full speed, with the vicious-looking one wielding two swords glaring at Lloyd in the front.

“Your Majesty!” Lloyd shouted out, and Queen Alicia moved towards Ppodong’s plump buttocks.

Zing.

As soon as the queen pointed her sword towards the back, her weapon was shrouded in the vividly blue aura that stretched nearly twenty feet in length.

“Hraah!”

Queen Alicia swung her sword horizontally with a shout, causing the twenty-foot aura to slash across the trail. Commander Sir Kalidus of the Second Corp of hell’s army leading the other demonic knights saw the attack and responded.

Boom! Thump! Thwoosh!

Sir Kalidus used both of his swords to block the aura attack by the queen. The impact from the clashes sent out forceful shockwaves to the surroundings, causing Sir Kalidus’s steed to stagger while Ppodong sped up from the momentum. Queen Alicia retained her stance like a superhuman creature, astounding Lloyd in the process.

Holy. The queen actually managed it.

It was a head-on clash against a mighty hell's knight while standing on the cushiony, unstable surface in Ppodong's plump butt cheeks. She did not even lose balance, let alone get pushed back or sustain damage, indicating one thing.

She's improved since she mastered the Asrahan Core Technique. Sure, the hell's knight probably is in a weakened state because of the holy water, but she's almost equally as strong.

The queen had certainly surpassed the swordmaster level. Although she wasn't a grandmaster yet, Lloyd suspected she was somewhere in between.

Amazing.

It was reassuring, but concerning at the same time. Lloyd shouted out with both thoughts in his mind.

"Your Majesty! We are almost there, so please do not overstretch yourself!"

He was genuinely worried that she might lose her composure in the heat of the moment and more actively engage the enemy.

"Ha! Says a weakling!" The queen responded ferociously.

"..."

"Think about it! How can I ever leave you alone among the enemies when you're so weak?! I am doing you a favor by stepping into the danger with you! Don't you dare worry about me!"

"Th-that's—"

"I am worried myself, because I'm not sure if it's okay to put my trust in a weakling such as yourself!"

"Weakling? But I'm a swordmaster myself, Your Majesty!"

“Except you’re a feeble, fragile little boy that can’t defeat a hell’s knight alone.”

“...”

“So shut up and be protected.”

“...”

“Answer.”

“I-I am honored...?!”

Lloyd questioned if the inability to defeat a hell’s knight in one-on-one combat made a man fragile because Javier was the only man in the entire world that wasn’t feeble by that logic.

Ugh. Hmph.

Lloyd internally grumbled and encouraged Ppodong to run faster. As soon as they got away from the central village, he looked up towards Ggoming and signaled.

Ggoming! Now! Go to Javier and deliver the message you’re supposed to!

Ggoming flew in circle once, before speeding towards the eastern mountain range. Lloyd maintained the speed towards the south, past another village and Frona River that was showing its bottom, towards Maritz Farmlands. Ppodong’s began to breathe hard.

“Ppodong... Ppodong... Huff. Huff.”

The gigantic hamster slowed down as its legs started to give up on the beast. On the other hand, the hell’s knights were still chasing after Lloyd even more tenaciously. Sir Kalidus, who had been fending off Queen Alicia’s attacks all along the ride, was burning with the greatest passion.

“How much longer do you think you can keep running away?!”

Dash!

The commander had gotten so close to Ppodong's butt. Kalidus swung his two swords toward the hamster's hind legs, but Queen Alicia unleashed her aura attacks to parry off the swing. Sir Kalidus did not rush things, however. Instead, he composedly put pressure on his prey and gradually increased the fierceness of the attack.

"Suho Kim! You've been acting so smart and clever all this time, yet you made a terrible mistake today!" Sir Kalidus shouted out with a smirk on its face.

"Mistake? What are you talking about?" Lloyd responded immediately, triggering an even more condescending reply from the hell's knight.

"Did you honestly believe you could lose us like this? And you ran away to an open field instead of going into narrower places! You've dug your own grave with this idiotic move!"

Sir Kalidus was convinced that Lloyd had screwed up by fleeing towards open plains, at which the steeds carrying the 500 hell's knights on their back were the most destructive. It was a suicide mission from the start, and Suho had made it worse. The hell's knight was disappointed and even felt pity.

"If you truly wish to make this your graveyard, stop running and get on the ground so you can die honorably as a knight! I will kill you with my own hands!"

Sir Kalidus made a proposition for the enemy to die an honorable death instead of being slashed in the back. It was out of genuine respect, but Lloyd replied with a snort.

"What? Ha. Why should I?"

"What?"

“I wasn’t running away, nor do I have the intention to make this place my grave.”

“What are you talking about?”

“I only ran here so I can obliterate you.”

“...What?”

Sir Kalidus was confused, but he took a clean look at Lloyd’s face.

He’s... grinning.

It was certain. That bastard was beaming ever so brightly, with the most satisfactory smile on his face ever. The facial expression was definitely not that of someone who was determined to embrace his death.

“Hell, yeah. It’s as if I’ve cornered a huge cockroach with a bottle of loaded Raid in my hand. Best feeling ever.”

Lloyd felt smug as he mumbled in a condescending manner.

Rumble.

And that was when a heavy rumbling of the ground accompanied by two billion liters of something began rattling the entire mountain range, inching closer by the minute.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 393: Battle of Holy Water (2)

Rumble. The entire eastern mountain range quaked, from deep valleys and high summits to slopes and paths. Cliffs fell apart, ponds and puddles overflowed, and creeks flooded. It roared out two billion liters of noise as the Frona River nearly exploded.

Kwooooooosh!!

The Frona River flowed down from the eastern mountains and enriched the southern soil of the Frontera Estate in a clockwise pattern, providing necessary freshwater to the citizens. But it was crying out like a fierce predator about to devour the poor prey right now. It crushed and pushed the debris in the way aside, before reaching the northern part of the Maritz Farmlands at the speed of 100 miles per hour, carrying with it the crashing wave with a height of over 400 feet.

Kwoooosh!!

Commander Sir Kalidus of the Second Corp of hell's army was shaken by the sight. He had seen his share of violence in the underworld, but nothing was quite abysmal like the catastrophe that came at him.

"Wh-what kind of--"

The storm from the fierce currents reached him first even before the crashing waves did.

Kwoooosh!

Sir Kalidus faltered, as did his war steed, giving Ppodong a chance to distance itself from its chaser momentarily. That little bit of distance and time created a perfect opportunity for Lloyd to move on to the next part of the plan.

"Ggoming!" Shouted the estate developer.

“Ggoming!” Responded a creature in white silhouette, showing itself through the storm and descending rapidly.

“Ppodong,” Lloyd quickly moved around as Ggoming flew down. “Eat this.”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong took the blue sunflower seed as Lloyd stretched out the other hand backward.

“My queen, please take my hand!”

“What did you just say?”

“We don’t have enough time, so just take my hand please!”

Poof! Lloyd grabbed hold of Her Majesty’s hand urgently and picked up Ppodong, who had minimized again. Ggoming’s talons stretched out to Lloyd and the queen in the air at that moment.

“Ggoming!”

Clutch! The flying beast successfully grabbed Lloyd by his shoulders.

“Up! Up!”

“Ggoming! Ggoming!”

Ggoming flapped its wings robustly, away from the frightening 400-feet-tall wave that ferociously and destructively crashed towards the farmlands with the intent to devour everything in its wake.

Kwooooooosh!!

The top of the wave touched Lloyd’s feet, nearly sweeping the queen away with the current. Appalled, Lloyd urgently pulled her out from the water. His shoulders were massively sore.

“Ugh... Huff! Huff!”

Lloyd clasped onto her so as not to let go of her again as he looked down.

Everything was being swept away, from the hell’s knight that was fiercely chasing after them and the knights under his command to a third of the Maritz Farmlands Lloyd and the citizens worked so hard on. It was like a colony of ants being washed away by a rainstorm.

Of course. That’s two billion liters of water for you.

Lloyd recalled the incident at Vajont Dam in Italy. The landslide allegedly caused twice as much damage as that inflicted by the atomic bomb dropped in Hiroshima.

The size of the landslide was a little over 230 million square meters. And the flood I’m seeing is carrying two billion liters of water. Holy.

Lloyd was in so much awe that he couldn’t even do the math at the moment.

I just hope it doesn’t flow towards the estate.

That was the last thing he wanted, as he anxiously prayed and monitored the flow of the currents. In fact, he had designed the gigantic waterway to control the direction of the flow without overflowing.

And the northern part of the Maritz Farmlands was the perfect destination. It borders the Frona River and used to be swampland, ideal for controlling the crashing waters, not to mention no one resides in this area because it consists of fields.

Repairing the damages in this area was going to be way less challenging as compared to residences.

I think it’s going as planned.

Lloyd internally shouted out in excitement as he got on Ggoming and gently tapped the queen in the back, who was still coughing intensely from the incident. The immense flood that began from Lake Kapua was being controlled just as he had intended, sweeping only through a third of the Maritz Farmland and touching nothing else.

The hell's knights were being destroyed by the crashing waves that carried an extraordinary type of water. Lloyd looked down towards the scene of the catastrophe and shouted out.

"How did you like the fierce current of the holy water?!"

A massively muscular upper body appeared from the torrential currents all of a sudden. The mightiest aquatic creature was not being swept away by the disastrous flood and was even swimming against the flow. It was the mermaid queen.

"I think this is awesome! Even though the water is a bit murky, it feels more exhilarating than riding the waves in the ocean during a thunderstorm! And the water tastes amazing!"

"Of course it does! That's holy water!"

"Great! Thanks for an opportunity like this! I appreciate it!"

"Glad to hear," shouted out Lloyd robustly. "Hope you keep enjoying it!"

The mermaid queen dove back underwater after hearing the reply and glanced at five hundred hell's knights, helplessly waving around their limbs against the overwhelming currents of holy water. Those who were hit directly by the crashing waves had broken their bones, and even those who hid themselves behind ditches had sustained significant injuries. They were all writhing in pain, being swept away here and there. Valiant mermaids and mermen actively and robustly swam through the water and appeared one by one.

"My faithful warriors!" The mermaid queen shouted out solemnly and majestically, grabbing the warriors' attention. "Answer me. What do I despise the most?"

"Water pollution, and doing nothing about it!"

“Then what do you think we must do at the moment?”

“We must get rid of the filthy contaminants!”

“Precise what are those?”

“Those bastards!” The mermaid and merman warriors ferociously glared at the hell’s knights.

“Well, then. Attack!!” Commanded the queen.

“Hraaaaaaah!”

Mermaids and mermen flexed their muscles as they charged underwater towards the hell’s knights. Aquatic creatures with monstrous strength and agility underwater jumped on the evil soldiers that were flapping around like plastic bags out in the ocean.

“Urgh...!”

From Sir Kalidus of the Second Corps to the hell’s knights under his command, none of them could withstand this attack. The impact from the flood of holy water was overwhelming on its own, having soaked the bone marrows of the knights after fracturing them, but unexpected enemies were rubbing salt in the wounds.

Stomp!

A colossal foot covered in red scales stomped on Sir Kalidus, whose bones were all fractured and weakened. The damage was too tremendous for the knight to withstand. After stepping on Sir Kalidus, the young dragon Solitas rubbed his heel against the bottom of the river.

Crush!

Sir Kalidus was no more, as his body was shredded to pieces and swept away by the currents.

“One down,” said Solitas with a smirk on his face, putting his thumbs up towards Lloyd with a hopeful expectation in his mind.

It’ll go well since I decided to help out. And if he survives... I’ll get to go on a blind date!

The red dragon was burning with the passion to triumph over the enemies, as he continued to stomp on other hell’s knights. Mermaid and merman warriors endeavored to hunt down the foes, pulling those who were trying to escape back into the water. They surrounded each knight in groups and ganged up on it shamelessly.

Hell’s knights did not remain so helpless, despite the weakened state they were in. Being superior to even swordmasters, they resisted the attack even though they were soaked in holy water. But they still couldn’t flee from the crashing currents of holy water. Lloyd monitored from above and clenched his fist.

Good. The first part is a complete success.

His strategy had worked. Lloyd was convinced this battle would be remembered as the Great Battle of Holy Water and go down in history.

“We were able to stop the hell’s knights from charging further, Your Majesty. I think we should move on to the next part of the plan.”

“...Whew. Good. That’s a relief.”

“Are you alright, Your Majesty?”

“I am,” said the queen majestically and elegantly, as she shook the excess water off her hair and condescendingly glared at Lloyd. “But I must ask. What did you call me before?”

“Huh?”

“Before the wave crashed down on me, as you stretched your hand out.”

“...Uh, well, please forgive me,” said Lloyd apologetically.

“I’m listening,” insisted the queen.

“But I do not remember.”

“...”

“The situation was so dire.”

“...”

“I speak the truth, Your Majesty.”

“Really?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Ha. You’re as shameless as usual.”

“Your grace knows no bounds, Your Majesty.”

“You must return the favor then.”

“Huh?”

“I fully acknowledge that you saved my life just now. I intend to duly reward you for your act of bravery.”

“By reward--“

“I will actively look for a suitable spouse for you to court after all this is over.”

“...Pardon?”

“Because you’re an extremely shameless individual, no ordinary woman would be able to deal with your character. She’d either have to be headstrong, or skilled in swordsmanship. That is why I’m thinking of holding a contest of swords for single women.”

“Y-your Majesty?”

“Speak.”

“D-do you intend to make the winner of the contest my... bride... by any chance?”

“Of course I am. And I was thinking of participating as a contestant myself.”

“I-I beg your pardon?!”

“Is something wrong?”

“N-no. It’s just that if you were to partake in the contest, Your Majesty, you’d--“

“Win.”

“...”

“I’d better work hard on honing my skills.”

“...”

Lloyd became speechless, even though he desperately wanted to call it an absolute abuse of power, tyranny, and dictatorship.

But I’m kind of excited and glad... except what kind of marriage proposal is this threatening...?!

But Lloyd couldn’t bring it out in words, as his queen had already taken him by his hand.

“...”

It was rough, yet warm. He could feel every heartbeat that was clearly pounding faster than usual.

Ugh. There goes my dream of ordinary living.

Lloyd quickly wiped off the tear that was about to fall from his eyes at the thought of the frightening romance. But this wasn't the time to joke around, as the battle had only just begun.

"Please allow me to take us back to the hell's gate so we can carry out the next part of the strategy."

"You have my permission."

Lloyd turned Ggoming around and went back towards the north, at which the hell's gate had opened. The area was crowded by the time, not because of the demons that flooded out from the portal, however.

"Her Majesty is back!"

"Hooray!! Long live the queen!"

Ten thousand royal soldiers shouted out as their well-polished armors, helms, shields, and halberds glowed under the moonlight. Next to them were rather disorganized, yet clearly battle-ready musclemen.

"Destroy we, today!" Shriek!

"Crush we, today!" Shriek!

"Fight we, today!" Shriek!

"Date we, today!" Shriek!

"...There's a spy among us!" Shriek!

Thirty thousand orc warriors flexed their muscles as they shouted out like wild beasts. Elf sharpshooters were calmly readying their arrows while riding on the backs of 500 centauri, next to another 500 White Cavaliers eager to outperform their rival riders. Behind them were 1,200 Mamluk cavalry, 700 pikemen from Namaran, and 36 artillery units from Cremo, all awaiting the moment to launch their attacks. Last but not least, a large silhouette flew this way from the eastern mountain range. It was that of the bone dragon Draggy, carrying Javier on its back and Bibeong in its arms.

Perfect. Everyone is here.

Javier, Bibeong, and the bone dragon had broken the dam at the impeccable timing, contributing greatly to the success of the holy water flood. It was thanks to them defenders of Frontera were able to rout the hell's knights.

"Your Majesty."

Lloyd glanced at Queen Alicia, signaling her to give the speech before leading them into battle.

"No. It is you that devised this strategy carefully," replied the queen, shaking her head. "It is fitting for you to act as the commander. Give the speech."

"Your grace knows no bounds, Your Majesty."

Lloyd accepted his queen's request graciously and stood firmly on Ggoming's back, speaking out to the alliance of more than 40,000 soldiers.

"This is Lloyd Frontera speaking. I won't be long. Thanks to everyone's efforts to conceal themselves as per the plan, we were able to hold the hell's knights down. Their main attacking forces are being curbed, and it is our turn to counterstrike."

Simply focusing on defense against a mighty adversary wasn't going to suffice. Besides, Lloyd wasn't the type of person to only be on the receiving end of things. That was why he lured the advancing units, crushed them, and held them down in a spot. It was his turn to fight back.

"Are you ready to invade the underworld?!"

Lloyd shouted out energetically, powered by his mana. 43,500 soldiers of the alliance responded in an even greater battle cry. The Battle of Holy Water was successful. It was time to use the momentum against the enemies and attack their base in hell.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 394: Underworld Conquest (1)

Approximately 6,500 demons giggled in sinister excitement in front of the gate connecting to the human realm, in the extremely gut-wrenching world full of smoke and fine dust. It was the underworld.

“Ha. I can’t believe I’m actually invading the human realm. This is going to be fun.”

“I wouldn’t call it an invasion, idiot. We’re basically the cleaning crew.”

“What?”

“Am I wrong? The hell’s knights will wreak havoc in the human realm and destroy everything. We’re only going to wrap things up after them.”

“That still counts as an invasion.”

“Believe what you will, but the Frontera Estate, was it? That place is probably razed to ashes by now already. There won’t be a chicken left for us to kill on the other side of the gate.”

“Ugh.”

“So relax and keep your hopes low.”

“Still.”

“Still what?”

“It’s my first time there. I just want to have fun.”

“Well, if you put it that way, I kind of agree.”

“See?”

“Haha.”

These were some of the best demons in the entire hell, each of them matching advanced sword experts in the human realm in might.

“But how much longer do we have to stay on standby for? The enemy estate is going to be incinerated by the time we get there.”

“I don’t know. We can’t move until our lord king of hell opens his eyes.”

“True. But when is His Evil Majesty going to awaken?”

“Soon, probably.”

“Are you sure?”

“Positive,” said one of the demons with confidence. “I heard it takes about 100 or 200 days in a human’s time for his soul to settle in the lich’s body.”

“And that’s today?”

“Most likely.”

“Wow. I’m still amazed by how His Evil Majesty still took care of the day-to-day operation of the underworld despite falling into the slumber.”

“That’s why he’s our king and liege. Although he wasn’t able to monitor the human realm in the meantime because of that.”

“True.”

The two demons nodded in agreement. The king of hell indeed was astounding in that aspect, and they had not a shred of a doubt that today’s invasion was going to be an absolute success. They believed it wouldn’t even fall to the king of hell, in fact, because the Frontera Estate should already have been razed to ashes by now regardless of how well-prepared they were, and how much of a resistance they put up. Five hundred hell’s knights was just too overwhelming.

500 hell’s knights... I don’t think humans can stand against them even if they formed an alliance of the entirety of their forces.

The demons hoped for their king to open his eyes and give the command for them to cross the portal, so they could destroy everything they come in contact with in the human realm, covering themselves in red blood to have a good time.

“...Huh?”

A demon made a strange noise all of a sudden, shortly before pointing at the hell’s gate in astonishment.

“Somebody is coming!”

All 6,500 demons lifted their heads up in surprise, as the visit from the human realm was certainly an unanticipated turn of events. They hoped one of the hell’s knights was returning from the other side temporarily to give them commands, as hell’s knights were high-ranking knights of the hell’s military and could thus lead them into battle. Demons desperately waited for a fearsome and majestic hell’s knight to show itself and give the speech, stating the Frontera Estate was almost finished, but they still left some humans alone so the demons could have some fun, and that they had permission to wreak havoc against the poor humans.

Please... Please!

Demons prayed in unity from their thirst for blood. They craved atrocity and murder. Soon enough, someone came out from the portal and gave his speech.

“Hello, all.”

But it was that detestable human Lloyd. He glanced at the horde of demons and put a huge smile on his face.

“We’ve met before.”

The demons were astonished by the sight. The man riding a huge bird and flying around in circles was clearly someone most of them remembered.

Isn’t that Lloyd Frontera?

He's the guy who exploited us during the construction of the hell's railroad!

Ugh, I still remember all those overtime and day shifts.

My mother told me not to hang out with him because he was clearly more evil than demons.

But why is he here?

It was perplexing, as 500 hell's knights had definitely invaded the Frontera Estate. He wasn't supposed to show up unhurt on the other side of the hell's gate. It did not make sense.

"A-are you here to surrender?!" Shouted one of the demons in a flustered voice.

"Surrender?" Lloyd's smile turned peculiar as he responded. "Not at all. I'm here to attack."

"What?!"

"Draggy!" Lloyd shouted out instead of replying to the demons.

Creak! Creak! Creak! The bones creaked as colossal skeletal structures appeared through the gate. Several hundreds of these things floated in the air, shortly before assembling to return to their original state. The demons had seen this creature before.

"B-bone dragon!"

The bone dragon that had shown up when Lloyd took care of the magma giant was making an appearance again in the red sky of the underworld. It held the hell's gate with its two arms and placed its head right beneath the gate to serve as the bridge for thousands of vile creatures of the human realm that rushed out of the portal.

"Weird, the air here!" Shriek!

"Hurts, my nose and throat!" Shriek!

“Hurts, my eyes because of your face!” Shriek!

“Still invade, we!” Shriek!

“Still conquer, we!” Shriek!

“Still fight, we!” Shriek!

“Invade! Conquer! Fight!” Shriek!

Orcish warriors, whose size was certainly not inferior to that of demons, flooded out through the hell’s gate. They stepped on Draggy’s head, ran down its bony spine, and rushed to the ground of the underworld. That was when demons finally realized what was going on.

“S-stop them!”

“Get rid of the bone dragon first!”

“Aaack!”

Demons let out their creepy battle cries and charged towards the bone dragon Draggy. Getting rid of this colossal creature was their biggest priority, as creatures of the human realm were descending through this from the portal. They unleashed fiery breaths from their mouths. The hell’s fire from 6,000 blazed towards one leg of Draggy, engulfing the hind limb with grudging fire.

Creak! Creak!

And Draggy loved it. The bone dragon actually enjoyed the heat massage on its leg every time it came to the underworld, and took a quick glance at the demons to signal them to attack the other leg as well. The demons’ understanding of the peril they were in drastically became sharper.

“Break that thing apart!”

Shring! Clink! The demons stretched out their hands, causing their arm bones to extend and protrude through their palms. They then took the shape of grim weapons of each individual's choice, not to mention the horrifying facial expressions.

"Graaaah!"

Strong demons charged, but they couldn't attack Draggy. Their marching had been stopped by brave orc warriors.

"Big, they, like us!" Shriek!

"Muscle, they, like us!" Shriek!

"Fight, I want!" Shriek!

"Date, I want!" Shriek!

"...There's a spy among us!" Shriek!

Orc warriors shouted out in response to the battle cry of the demons, each holding a battle axe, hammer, and steel mace.

Boooooooooom!

They charged and clashed with one another. Muscles flexed, tusks shone, and fists were clenched. They bit and pulled and stomped. But the orcs were pushed back.

"Strong, they are!" Shriek!

"Hit me, that guy!" Shriek!

"In there, hang!" Shriek!

The orc warriors stood their ground despite the adversities, however, as in amphibious warfare. They did their best to make way for other soldiers of the alliance to cross the portal and descend on Draggy's spine, joining forces with the orcs.

30,000 orcs all charged recklessly, as 10,000 Royal Magentano soldiers marched in a precise formation, accompanied by 500 centauri sprinters carrying elf sharpshooters and 500 White Cavalry on the left wing, and 1,200 Mamluk cavalry on the right. 36 artillerymen from Cremo escorted by 700 pikemen from Namaran followed from behind, eventually pushing the demons back.

“Argh! Ack! H-hold on!”

But there was no such thing as a time-out in war. The alliance forces continued to mercilessly rout their enemies, putting pressure on the demons with headstrong orcs and well-organized royal soldiers, while the fleet-footed centauri, White Cavalry, elf sharpshooters, and Mamluk cavalry ran around and caught them from behind quickly.

6,500 demons were surrounded, just like that. Artilleries from Cremo were fired, and demons got knocked out from the projectiles here and there. Some demons went wild in fury, but only to be held by the flexing muscles of orc warriors in the vicinity. Some demons tried to flee, but were hunted down by the arrows of elf sharpshooters. The tide of the battle had certainly turned. Lloyd clenched his fist as he watched from above.

Good. Perfect.

It was a complete victory. In fact, he had anticipated this much.

Because we invaded after incapacitating the hell’s knights.

Each of the hell’s knights was mightier than a swordmaster. The ascension of one of these frightening creatures was enough to obliterate a single nation, but there were 500 of them. It was indeed horrifying just to consider what kind of havoc they could have wreaked.

Me, Javier, and my queen. There are only three swordmasters even in the Kingdom of Magentano, which is definitely the lordly dominion in the entire continent. Other kingdoms? One or two at max.

Swordmasters were that hard to come by, but 500 warriors more powerful than that rare commodity had invaded. But Lloyd had successfully incapacitated them with a young dragon and 1,000 mermaid warriors.

I was able to minimize the damage to the estate thanks to that.

Focusing on defense alone was going to devastate the lands. In fact, Lake Kapua had already been damaged due to the execution of the holy flood, not to mention peripheral losses.

The waterworks are all gone, the bridge got swept away, and Maritz Farmland lost a third of its land to flood. I gotta repay all of that and drain the water out... Ugh.

Lloyd barely managed to contain his tears from falling, thinking about the monetary deficit. He had to strengthen his resolve again.

I'm not going to be in the deficit!

He remembered how much effort he had put into constructing the waterworks, bridge, and Maritz Farmlands. Lloyd shouted out to the alliance forces with anger from his heart.

"Remember to focus on capturing the demons alive!"

Lloyd was determined to apprehend all of them as prisoners of war, before sentencing them to ruthless labor without pay. But that couldn't happen without accomplishing one feat.

The king of hell. He's the biggest obstacle.

Lloyd knew he had to capture the lord of the underworld alive in order to put a stop to this madness. He strengthened his resolve once again and took a glance at Sir Giolexius, riding on his hell's steed next to him.

"Sir Lexi. Does it feel strange to be here like this?"

"What do you mean?"

“You know. Whether you feel like a traitor or not.”

“Not at all, my liege. Please don’t worry.”

“Really?”

“Yes, my lord,” replied Sir Giolexius, nodding his heavy head. “You are my liege now, although it is only a five-year employment contract.”

“Then can you perform your duty to navigate us through the underworld?”

“As you wish, my lord.”

“Good. Let’s do this. You perform well today, and the next employment contract will be for a permanent position.”

“Understood.”

Sir Giolexius’s ribcage vibrated in excitement at the term permanent position. For the past three months, he had experienced workplace benefits in the Frontera Estate, for the first time in his life.

It felt strange in the beginning to have a cozy place of my own and enjoy the rest there after the established work schedule. Even humans weren’t afraid of me. Sir Draggy and senior members of the skeletal corp were actually very kind.

He had even gotten paid on time. This was the first form of kindness and benefit he had been the receiving end of, as a hell’s knight.

And if it’s possible... that’s how I want to live the rest of my life until my bones become dust.

Sir Giolexius knew he had to enter into a permanent employment contract in that case. He was determined to, and he was convinced he could. He strengthened his resolve and clenched his fist, reminding himself of the duty he was assigned today: navigating.

“I can sense the energy of the king of hell from there,” the hell’s knight pointed to the north.

“That way? How far?” Lloyd asked with sparkly eyes.

“Quite a distance, but we can get there in ten minutes if we hop on Sir Draggy’s back and fly in full speed.”

“That should do. Did you all hear him?”

Lloyd turned around and glanced at the mightiest warriors of the alliance army. Javier was ready. Lloyd’s queen was eager to enter into battle, Raphael’s halo was burning more fiercely than ever, orc warrior Arosh was flexing his muscles, Elf archer Moira was calmly inspecting her bow and arrows, and colossal creatures Draggy and Bibeong boasted of their sheer size. Because they hadn’t engaged the demons in the battle, they were all teeming with energy. Lloyd glanced at this group of mighty fine warriors who were ready to give their everything against a single enemy and asked them.

“Are you ready to hunt down the king of hell?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 395: Underworld Conquest (2)

“Are you ready to hunt down the king of hell?”

Lloyd’s bold question was heard loud and clearly by those that followed. They lifted their heads and glanced at the estate developer, with similar thoughts in their minds.

He is indeed one of a kind.

Raphael, the angel of thrones, gulped nervously as he recalled what this human had performed throughout the day.

Can anyone else in this world do this well against the hell’s army? Has anyone?

There hadn’t been a single soul in the entire world and the heavenly realm.

The heavenly realm engaged the underworld in massive warfare about five times, excluding minor altercations. And it was an immensely huge one each time.

It was mostly a stalemate, with neither side being able to take decisive advantage. Their battles would influence the human realm as well.

A great extinction took place every time there was a war because the ecosystem in the human realm was affected. But Lloyd Frontera’s war is different.

The estate developer was leading others in clean warfare, completely preventing such byproducts. He dominated the opponents without heading into a deadlock or being pushed back once.

This is a completely one-sided victory that even the heavenly realm has never achieved.

Raphael was astounded by how an ordinary human had made this accomplishment. It was jaw-dropping. Hell's knight Sir Giolexius standing next to Raphael thought likewise.

Thank goodness I got a new job.

Sir Giolexius clenched his fist behind everyone's back. He had had his concerns before this battle. Despite having disowned the king of hell, this frightening creature was still his former liege, and going up against him was certainly uncomfortable. Sir Giolexius even had worried about Lloyd's defeat. However, his new employer was literally dominating hell's army through genius tactics, causing the hell's knight to feel more loyal towards the new organization he worked for. It was likewise for each of the other comrades-in-arms.

Shriek! What a lucky day! I get to train my muscles more properly! Shriek!

Orc Arosh sniffed like a pig, excited by the grand battle.

There's literally no vegetation here. I suppose it is what hell would look like. Maybe I can plant some seeds here after the war and see how that goes.

Elf Moira strengthened her resolve internally to conquer this wretched place. The plan to attack the king of hell had to work.

"Alright, let's get going then! Hop on!" Lloyd shouted.

Draggy crouched down to allow everyone to get on its back while holding Bibeong in its arms. With robust flapping of its skeletal wings, Draggy's flight kicked off at explosive speed.

Kwoosh!

"That way!"

Lloyd pointed in the direction told by Sir Giolexius, and Draggy soared through hell's sky. The fierce wind hit the warrior's faces like a tsunami as Lloyd did the math in his head.

Ten minutes until we face the king of hell. Whew. I hope we're not too late.

Lloyd suspected the king of hell had nearly completely incarnated himself in the lich's body by now, expecting to open his eyes in the new body soon.

Come on. If we could get there before he actually does, our job would become much easier.

That would be the best possible scenario and the greatest achievement by far.

That's like hitting the lottery ten times in a row after letting the machine pick the numbers automatically.

Or perhaps even greater. But Lloyd felt a strong glare from his side and turned his head.

"...Why are you staring at me like that?"

"Because I have my doubts," said Javier with his characteristic stare, as his silver hair flew against the wind. "Do you really think we can defeat the king of hell with just us?"

"That's what worries you?"

"Yeah," nodded Javier adamantly. "Even if he's incarnating himself into a different body, he's still the king of hell. Without a special plan, this fight is a suicide mission."

"So it is."

"..."

"What. Why."

"I take it that you have devised a strange tactic again then?"

"What do you mean a strange tactic?"

“You were always like that. Even today,” said Javier, with a subtle chuckle on his lips. “But I’m glad we’re actually battling away from our home. I can’t imagine what kind of damages our estate would have suffered if we fought there.”

“True. And the king of hell will probably be furious that we brought the battle to the underworld.”

“Yeah. Because he actually took time and effort to incarnate himself in the lich’s body to invade the human realm.”

“But we came here instead before he even stepped a foot up there.”

“...Ha.”

Javier failed to contain his laughter and chuckled out loud. Lloyd responded with a satisfactory smile of his own.

“So just trust in your big bro, because I know what I’m doing.”

“If you insist.”

“I do insist. One more thing. Don’t overstretch yourself.”

“It looks like I will have to today, though.”

“No. We’ll fail if you do.”

“What do you mean?”

“You’ll find out soon enough.”

“...Hold up.”

“What now.”

“You saw the result of this battle through the Jewel of Truth, then.”

“Something like that.”

“Did you see our victory?”

“...”

Lloyd looked back and saw the lingering cold stare from Javier’s eyes. He did not know how to respond, because giving him the honest answer was going to make him vehemently oppose the tactic. Lloyd had to make a decision.

“Yeah. Our side is going to win.”

Lloyd gave a half-true answer. Javier finally seemed relieved to hear the reply, and Lloyd thought that was enough. Today’s victory was going to happen, regardless of what it takes, anyway.

“Get ready. We’re almost there.”

Lloyd barely managed to contain his emotions from bursting out. This wasn’t the time to get sentimental, as there was a huge and last obstacle to overcome just yet.

“Listen carefully to what I tell you, and do exactly as I say. Okay?”

Lloyd strengthened his resolve and shared the detailed plan with Javier, as he looked at a certain point across the horizon.

***

“They’re here.”

Inhale.

This was where the last terminal of the Hell Express was constructed. This was where countless souls entered through the gate of rebirth. The king of hell couldn’t vacate this place even in his slumber while he was incarnating himself in a new body, in order to avoid the shutdown of the underworld’s operation. The mighty creature opened his eyes in the middle of the huge platform. He actually saw everything despite the closed eyes, yet hadn’t moved an inch. Instead, he sat still and watched the events unfold like a spectator. It was fun, exciting, and absolutely satisfying to find out he was right.

“I knew I was right about the talent Lloyd Frontera... I mean, Suho Kim possessed. He will turn out to be the best subject I’ve ever had.”

Vibrate.

The statement resonated deeply within the king of hell’s head, as Bibeong landed at the end of the platform followed by Draggy. The king of hell’s grin became even more apparent.

“Welcome, Suho Kim.”

“Welcome my ass. Don’t grin like that, because you now look like the entire haunted house with the lich’s face.”

Lloyd replied with mockery instead. But the king of hell’s grim smile through the lich’s desolate face became stronger.

“Good. That’s what I wanted to hear. That’ll make crushing you and making you serve me even more worthwhile.”

“...”

“I realized that you were going to keep declining my request if I didn’t get involved myself. But because I couldn’t harm you in my original body due to the rules, I found myself a new body to house my soul. How do you like it?”

Stretch! The king of hell stretched out his two hands, and that was enough to exert a tremendous amount of pressure in the air. But even that was only a glimpse of the lich’s endless supply of violent mana, empowered by the superior and transcendent powers the king of hell possessed. The hot, steamy air of the underworld instantly became cold, causing everyone to flinch inadvertently. Queen Alicia frowningly raised her spirits, Raphael let his fiery halo burn even more ferociously, Sir Giolexius shook his bony structure, the orc Arosh let out a deep breath, and the elf Moira inadvertently drew her arrow. But Lloyd was undisturbed.

“Whoa. Just look at this high-performance air conditioner.”

“...”

“Can you do it again? This is actually very refreshing. I think you even got rid of all the volcanic ashes and fine dust with it.”

“...”

“You don’t have to if you don’t want to.”

“...Ahem. Suho Kim.”

“I’m listening.”

“It’s still not too late.”

“What.”

“Kneel and bow before me. Beg for your life and ask for the merciful power of the underworld so you may serve me in death. This is not that difficult.”

“But it is.”

“No. It’s actually extremely easy. All you have to do is change your mind and ask me for this favor. You’ll be given the power that no other vassals that serve me have been granted. You’ll be set permanently.”

“Like, a high position in the underworld?”

“Yeah. You’ll be the most powerful person, only second to me, in the entire underworld. A man must have that much ambition to lead a meaningful life.”

“Meaningful life... I think I get it.”

“Ha. Finally.”

“Yeah,” nodded Lloyd, as he glared at the king of hell and tilted his head to one side. “That’s exploitation of labor.”

“...What?”

“Is there honey in the underworld?”

“Honey?”

“Yeah. Honey that is so sweet, that it retains its amazing taste even when dissolved in water.”

“...No.”

“That’s where the problem comes from,” said Lloyd with a blatant look of disappointment. “Think about it. There’s no honey here, or anything fun to do. And it’s not like the nature is amazing. Volcanoes erupt frequently, lava flows, and the average temperature is far higher than tropical rainforests. The presence of volcanic ashes makes it impossible to live without a mask.”

“...”

“And you’re telling me I can have so much power to rule over this wretched place? Let’s be real. This is a scam offer.”

Lloyd’s voice gradually became louder, as if he just realized that he had been enticed to buy a buy-one-get-one-free item at a more expensive price than buying two items separately. He pointed out the sugar-coated offer, in reality, is nothing but an invitation to servitude without proper compensation. He was getting slightly worked up.

“Give me a break. Listen. If you want to recruit someone to work for you, at least establish a plausible workplace environment. But take a look here. There are no public facilities, no infrastructure, no schools here. Are you seriously asking me to work in a place where the real estate property is absolutely unlikely to go up in value in the next one million years? What good is there to exercise my authority in a dreadful place like this?”

“But Suho Kim.”

“I’ve heard enough. You’re offering nothing substantial save for the sugar-coated words of honor. And you expect me to accept the position where I’ll be exploited to provide labor for the rest of my life? Do you take me for a fool or something? Is this all you are?”

“Suho Kim!”

“Yeah.”

“Think again. I advise you to stop looking at it from the narrow-minded human perspective.”

“Why?”

“You will go down in history as a legendary and mythical figure in the human world.”

“And?”

“Isn’t that amazing?”

“Amazing? But there’s no honey here.”

“...”

“If you don’t like my answer, let’s at least see the draft of the employment contract you prepared.”

“Employment... what?”

“I knew it,” replied Lloyd with a sneer. “You didn’t prepare anything.”

“There is no need for documentation between us.”

“Of course there is.”

“I am the king of hell. I am the ruler of the eternal purgatory and the being that oversees death and rebirth. Why would I need to draft a stinking contract to have you serve under me?”

“...Ha.”

Lloyd bitterly chuckled at the king of hell’s question. The estate developer’s stare became colder and his voice more cynical as he added.

“I knew it. All terrible employers always give this kind of evasively angry response when asked about the employment contract.”

“What?”

“Do you honestly think the title king of hell or ruler of purgatory offers any bit of credibility? Unexpected events and accidents are bound to happen during one’s tenure. How do you plan to take care of those unforeseen cases without the written contract?”

“The hell is--“

“Hell, hell, hell. I’ve heard enough about your hell. Malicious mployers that try to exploit desperate workers always say the same thing. They emphasize the relationship between them and the workers is like a familial one so there is no need to get upset about the lack of written guidelines, and stuff. Family, my ass. It’s more like slavery.”

“...”

“People like you bend the rules and skip the contract part, only to cheat off your employees by holding off on their wages later on. There is no extra pay for overtime or doing things that are outside of the job description. There is no vacation. Yet you demand the workers to show up before work hours and leave way after five. Each time an employee complains about it, you sugarcoat your acts of exploitation with phrases like you’ve learned about the passion, you’ve gotten experience, and that’s way more valuable than the wage that’s being withheld at the moment, and that you should thank me instead. That kind of bullcrap.”

“What are you--“

“Am I wrong? You so proudly mentioned the highest position second only to the king in the underworld, powers that I’d be given, and my name going down in history as the legendary and mythical figure in the human world. That’s no different from those empty promises that are not substantial at all. I won’t be gaining a dime through all that. You’ll be the sole beneficiary of the fruit of my labor. What difference is there between you and those atrocious bastards that will enjoy luxury while their employees struggle to put food on the table with minimum wage?”

“Suho Kim.”

“Don’t call me like that. You don’t even have anything good in your land.”

“Suho Kim!” Shouted the king of hell in genuine fury at Lloyd’s sharp words. He was so infuriated that he had failed to suspect the blade being drawn behind him, while Lloyd was grabbing his attention with his tongue.

Shring.

“...!”

Before the king of hell could rise from his seat, grandmaster Javier’s all-out thrusting of his sword pierced through the deathly ruler’s chest.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 396: Last Resort (1)

Pierce! A bluish aura protruded from the king of hell's chest.

"Ha," the king of hell paused and glanced at the blade that had pierced his chest.

Kwoosh! And it did not stop there.

Aura was divided into multiple strands and turned into a storm in an instant, cutting through and splitting everything, from the demon's chest to the actual space. The lich's withered-up body in which the king of hell had incarnated was shredded apart to pieces, spreading dry dust everywhere instead of blood. Limbs were detached and fell to the ground, as did the head on the butchered torso.

It worked!

Lloyd clenched his fist, seeing Javier's surprise attack land on his adversary. He had verbally abused the king of hell and hurled insults as best as he could for this moment, concealing the grandmaster's presence.

Even if you're the king of hell, you can't really do anything without the body.

Lloyd suspected it would at least have delivered significant damage. But the orc Arosh sniffed and stated the tabooed phrase.

"We got him." Shriek!

"...Dude."

"What's wrong?" Shriek!

"Don't say that. You're going to jinx--"

"You'd be disheartened to know that the surprise attack was to no avail."

It was the king of hell's voice, as Lloyd tried to hush Arosh. The estate developer flinched and glanced at the bodily debris from the attack, and noticed the head was staring straight at his face without losing signs of life in its eyes. It even moved its jaw robustly and added.

"I knew you were trying to grab my attention with such sharp words. I was waiting to see what kind of surprise you'd have prepared for me, but it's extremely disappointing."

Fwoosh.

The shredded body of the king of hell was shrouded by dark, opaque dust, reconstructing a dark silhouette of a whole lich again. The shape became apparent as the dismembered body parts floated in the air and assembled again.

"Javier!"

The grandmaster did not hesitate as soon as he heard the shout. Javier's sword flashed intensely as he slashed through the space in all directions. However, it still fell short of the king of hell. Different parts of the lich's body had maneuvered in different ways as though they were independent entities to avoid the attack.

"Everyone!" Shouted out Lloyd, as he tightened the grip on his shovel.

The queen extended her aura into her sword, hell's knight Sir Giolexius's armor transformed into his trusted steed, Raphael held the hammer of judgment in his hands, orc Arosh swung his battleaxe and charged, and elf Moira drew her bow. Draggy and Bibeong lifted their forearms to help.

Kwoosh!

The forearm attacks of two colossal beasts, weighing 4,000 tons in total, fell on the lich's body and crushed it into the pit 15 feet deep and 200 feet wide, created on the platform from the attack. But even that wasn't enough.

Fwoosh.

“Bibeong?”

A single strand of dark dust found itself out through the exerting fingers of Bibeong and formed a shape in the air again, reconstructing the king of hell’s body.

“So this is the type of futile resistance you had planned all along.”

The king of hell stretched out the wand on his right hand after the body became whole again.

“I suppose it’s my turn to pay back.”

The skull at the tip of the wand unleashed an ominous glow.

Ding-dong!

A red message popped up in front of Lloyd suddenly.

[Warning: Danger!]

[Skill Option 7: Urgent Foresight is activated.]

[Your body temperature increases by 2°F due to the effect of the relic Eye of the Summer.]

Whoosh!

Lloyd’s mana heart began operating itself without Lloyd’s realization, as the relic Eye of the Summer heated his body up, shortly before roughly showing him 5 seconds into the future.

“...Everyone!”

Lloyd attempted to shout out and warn the others of what he saw, but it was too late. Before he could finish, something flashed above his head and charged towards him, not giving him a moment of peace, followed by detonations beneath his feet as if he had stepped on landmines or was running through a field being bombarded. A huge explosion swept through the place, engulfing it with a storm of dark purplish flames.

Lloyd had barely managed to respond in time and jumped to the side, avoiding losing his leg. However, the scope of the enemy's attack was too vast.

"Ack!"

Lloyd flew more than 50 feet aback, seeing the sky and the ground exchange their positions several times in the process. He couldn't even dream of landing properly from the physical damage and the dizziness it involved. The estate developer urgently covered his head with his arms. That was a good decision.

Tumble. Thud! Thump! Roll! Thud!

He fell on the ground and rolled several times, only to be stopped by a boulder.

"...Huff, huff. Ugh."

Lloyd questioned if he was a disassembled Lego set from the pain. He touched his own body, trying to see if his limbs were still intact and his torso whole. He then picked up the shovel again and lifted his head, seeing another message in the air.

Ding-dong!

[Warning: The effectiveness of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle is reduced by 20%.]

What...?!

Lloyd was in disbelief as he read the continuous warning messages.

[You have sustained damage both physically and spiritually.]

[Should you take similar hits like this 2 more times, you will lose 60% of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle capacity and enter into a state of severe disarray.]

[Should you take similar hits like this 3 more times, you will lose 80% of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle capacity and enter into a state of displacement from the disconnection between your physical body and the soul.]

[Should you take similar hits like this 4 more times, you will lose 100% of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle capacity and die permanently.]

What kind of...

It was outrageous, but Lloyd knew not to undermine the warnings. In fact, he felt the reduced effectiveness of the mana heart and the circle firsthand.

Zing...

"...Ugh." Cough!

Lloyd felt the tension around his chest. It was as if his mana circle had just become rusty; it indicated one thing.

I don't know if that's a physical or a magic attack... but it definitely affects the soul and the mana of the target. A few hits will definitely kill me.

But the king of hell was pointing his wand towards Lloyd again when he identified the nature of the strike. Another intense flash fell from the sky.

Damn it!

He hadn't even gotten up from the ground, let alone regained energy. Lloyd quickly attempted to rise, or even crawl out of the area if he could, seeing a series of messages in red font in front of him.

[Warning: Danger!]

His body temperature rose without his consent again, showing him five minutes into the future.

“Hold tightly onto me.”

“Huh?”

That was when a hand of salvation held Lloyd by his shoulders and pulled him out of the path. Momentarily after they jumped, something fell from the sky and the ground exploded once again.

Kwoosh!

“...Javier?” It took some time for Lloyd to realize who had come to his rescue.

“Are you alright?”

“Not at all,” replied Lloyd, shaking his head vehemently before shouting out to his allies. “Everyone, be careful! That attack seems to affect your soul and the body at the same time! A few hits or even scratches by it can take your life!”

Everyone nodded at the estate developer. Queen Alicia grinned ferociously as she did.

I don’t think anyone can take more than a few hits anyway.

Her palms became sweaty from fear and thrill. While these two emotions contradicted one another, she harbored both and raised her fighting spirit. Her blade unleashed fearsome noises as she charged forth.

Kwoosh!

I shall strike before the enemy has time to respond with magic!

The queen found herself at a distance of ten feet from the adversary, which was just perfect for her to slay her foe with the enlarged aura slash.

Whoooosh!

Queen Alicia immediately swung her sword horizontally, unleashing the fiftten-feet-tall aura blade to slash through the space. But this ferocious attack was negated so effortlessly, by a nonchalant swing of the king of hell's hand.

Tap!

It was an ordinary movement. The king of hell causally tilted his head like he had just stopped a child's punch. Queen Alicia was appalled.

It didn't work at all?!

That was an understatement. In fact, the king of hell hadn't even budged. She even noticed the palm, which had been cut halfway from the attack, was regenerating in real-time.

Urgh...!

But the queen did not panic. She had retracted her sword the moment the attack was stopped and was turning clockwise in a skillful manner to avoid the wand attack by the king of hell. The attack fortunately missed the target as the queen shouted out.

"Lord Angel of Thrones!"

Swoosh!

The hammer of judgment fell on the lich as soon as the queen spoke. The angel of thrones descended from the sky like lightning.

"Hraah!"

Bolstered by the ring of flames behind his back, the angel of thrones exerted all of his divine angelic strength into this attack and swung his hammer vertically with the intent to crush the king of hell.

Thwoosh!

The king of hell's skull was smashed down, shortly before three arrows fired by Moira pierced the crumbling forehead. Or Arosh charged forth and swung his battleaxe against the lich's legs, causing him to stagger.

Draggy subsequently swung its massive tail.

Whoosh! Thump!

The king of hell's body floated in the air from the impact, and Bibeong quickly spiked it down like a volleyball. Sir Giolexius was waiting on the ground.

"Hi-yah!"

Pierce!

Sir Giolexius's greatsword pierced the king of hell in the chest. But Javier did not give his enemy time to respond and unleashed a slash attack immediately.

Thwoosh!

And it literally destroyed the lich's skull. However, the headless king of hell lifted his wand once and summoned another flash above everyone's head, followed by a huge explosion.

Booooooom!

Everyone except Javier flew backward from the impact. Queen Alicia, Raphael the angel, hell's knight Sir Giolexius, orc Arosh, elf Moira, Draggy, and Bibeong were all unable to avoid the attack; they were swept by the deadly detonation and rolled on the ground. Lloyd, who was watching from a distance away as he tried to regain his focus, saw the whole thing unfold.

Is that like a meteorite smash? That's like orbital bombardment.

It wasn't a small object falling from the sky like a shooting star. Even though Lloyd was a swordmaster, he couldn't even see what was bombarding the ground. He only saw a quick glimpse of the object before flashes nearly blinded him.

It was way too fast.

He imagined the intercontinental ballistic missiles that fell from the geostationary orbit. He had read that the speed of this missile exceeded Mach 25 upon entering the Earth's atmosphere. The bombardment certainly reminded him of that.

That's five miles per second.

It sent chills down Lloyd's spine. The king of hell was glaring at the estate developer again after recovering from all those attacks.

None of our attacks are working. He recovered from all that, and even from Javier's slash like it was nothing.

Lloyd suspected it was because the king of hell had incarnated himself in the body of a lich, which was virtually immortal. Combined with the power of the ruler of the underworld, the enemy was nearly invincible.

He won't die. We can't. He can summon meteorites at the speed of 5 miles per second without casting time, which can kill us in an instant. Even getting swept indirectly by the explosion will get us eventually.

Lloyd wondered how he could overcome this, or if there even was a way. Even though he had already asked the Jewel of Truth and saw the outcome of today's battle, it was way more devastating to witness it firsthand. All hopes were fading away, as Javier continued to charge towards the king of hell all by himself.

Would Javier be able to do it?

Lloyd genuinely hoped. Maybe, just maybe, the grandmaster could defeat the king of hell. But that hope was crushed shortly.

Flash! Kaboom!!

A series of flashes fell on Javier, who barely managed to respond in time. But even he wasn't able to get away from the scope of the bombardment entirely; he flew several yards before landing, faltering throughout the process. He had most definitely sustained some damage.

That means...

Lloyd's heart began pounding, as he was reminded of the answer the Jewel of Truth had given him.

I suppose I knew that was the only way. Nothing else was going to work, and I should have resorted to this method from the get-go.

But he did not want to. He despised the idea. Even though Lloyd knew the Jewel of Truth would only speak the truth, the last answer it gave was absolutely ridiculous. That was why the estate developer tried to come up with other ways to defeat the king of hell, but they all seemed ineffective. It was hopeless.

The more I think about it...

There was no other way. Holding onto false hope was going to put his allies in greater peril.

Realizing this, Lloyd bit his lips tightly with the intent to execute the plan suggested by the Jewel of Truth. Lloyd coldly stared at his adversary after having decided to turn to the last resort, to ultimately smile at the end of the final battle.

I'm so sorry, Javier.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 397: Last Resort (2)

I’m so sorry, Javier.

Bite! Lloyd bit his lips tightly and strengthened his resolve, barely managing to lift his body.

Ugh.

Simply standing up on his two legs from the ground gave the estate developer excruciating pain in all of his joints and muscle cells, as though he had just rolled down the stairs at least three stories tall.

But this is the only way. I should have resorted to this method from the start.

Lloyd regretted the false hope he had despite having seen the future through the Jewel of Truth, for causing his allies to sustain major to minor injuries.

“Everyone...”

He stepped forward and saw another meteorite bombardment along with the flash. The ground exploded, sending Arosh flying unconsciously in the air. Elf Moira also got swept away by the explosion and let go of her bow, and the queen rolled on the ground before losing consciousness while trying to avoid the attack. Raphael’s shield broke, and Sir Giolexius’s body was destroyed from the waist down. Draggy had lost both of its wings while protecting Bibeong, who was too huge and thus vulnerable. The gigantic beaver also got knocked out in the process.

Everyone...

Lloyd was truly sorry. He had hoped for an ending in which everyone could laugh together, but it seemed that it was unlikely. There was no other way now.

“Your Demonic Majesty!” Lloyd took a deep breath and shouted, causing the king of hell to pause and glance at him. “I think we can still talk this over!”

“Talk?”

“Yeah!”

“What’s there to talk about?”

The king of hell tilted his head, still glaring at Lloyd through freakish eyes. It wasn’t a friendly look by any means.

Obviously.

After all, Lloyd had grabbed his attention with words, while asking Javier to unleash a surprise attack before. The estate developer tried to appear truly apologetic about the incident that gave rise to the distrust.

“It looks like I was mistaken!”

“Mistaken?”

“Yeah! I think I realize it now!”

Lloyd shouted out and took another step forward, reducing the distance between him and the king of hell slowly but surely as he continued to work his lips.

“Remember the employment contract I mentioned before? Would you be so kind as to draft one?”

“Employment contract? What difference does a piece of paper make?”

“A whole lot,” replied Lloyd. He was being truthful. “First of all, that would make me genuinely grateful and passionate about the service I provide.”

“Genuinely grateful and passionate... But I don’t see the point.”

“Huh?”

“Because I can just kill you.”

“But forcing me to do something would make me do half-assed jobs.”

“It doesn’t matter.”

“Why not?”

“Because I can boss around any citizen of the underworld, regardless of that creature’s will. I can assume control over your mind and your soul and make you provide labor wholeheartedly.”

“...”

“And that’s probably the easiest for me. Why would I draft an employment contract for someone I can order around like a faithful slave with a simple gesture of my hands?”

“Holy...”

Lloyd realized the king of hell wasn’t an easy foe to persuade; he was intent on just killing Lloyd. The estate developer slightly regretted having agitated him with sharp words before and put on the most benevolent smile he could and added.

“But please reconsider and think from a different perspective, Your Evil Majesty.”

“What’s there to think about?”

“Think of what kind of difference someone like me would make if I genuinely provided the services from the bottom of my heart.”

“Hmm.”

“There surely will be a difference between the work by a soulless slave and that by someone truly motivated to do his absolute best. Don’t you think?”

“Hmm.”

“That’s why I ask you to draft me the employment contract.”

“And you would swear fealty to me?”

“Well...”

“I’m listening.”

“That depends on the terms and conditions.”

“How dare you try to negotiate the terms with me!”

“But that’s the purpose of the employment contract, milord.”

Lloyd’s smile became even kinder as he continued moving towards the adversary, enduring the dirty looks with the back of his head. Angel of Thrones Raphael and Sir Giolexius, both of whom were most definitely incapacitated, were staring at him in disbelief.

Please don’t tell me you’re going to betray us.

Lloyd kept the bitter laughter from leaking out. He was truly sorry and felt bad for having to resort to this method, after the faith his comrades had displayed by accompanying him here.

I am truly sorry, everyone.

The estate developer held the bitterness inside and maintained the business-like smile on the surface, sucking up to the king of hell like a salesperson meeting with his richest client.

“That’s why I ask. I’m sure we can come to an agreement on terms and conditions to both parties’ satisfaction, as long as we discuss it and make compromises here and there. And that would motivate me to provide the best service I can possibly offer anyone. Oh, and please take a look at this.”

Lloyd reached out to his inner pocket and took out a few pieces of documents, which he had prepared just in case.

“What’s this?”

“These are sample employment contracts in case you’d like to refer to them.”

“Sample to refer to?”

“Yeah.”

Lloyd quickly handed the documents over, giving the king of hell no time to think about it. The freakish lord inadvertently took the documents and tried to unfold the folded documents, but he couldn’t.

Thwoosh!

Lloyd’s shovel had smacked the king of hell on the side of his face, caving in a part of the skull. King of hell faltered to the side as Lloyd shouted out furiously.

“Sample for reference my ass! This is what it entails!”

Thump! Bang! Thwoosh!

The shovel danced along to the gruesome melody of violence. The sample documents flew in the air, but there was nothing written on them; they were all blank. Lloyd’s eyes lit up.

Good. It’s going as planned.

Lloyd tightened his grip on the shovel, knowing he couldn’t give the king of hell a moment. He had to continue attacking his adversary when he had a chance. Knowing this, he swung his shovel in various directions to smack the enemy’s legs, waist, head, calf, and waist again.

Thump! Kabam! Bang! Whack! Slam!

Lloyd smashed the foe’s head with his shovel, whacked him with the handle, slashed him with his aura, and swept him with the mana blast. But that wasn’t the entirety of Lloyd’s attacks.

These won’t work anyway.

The king of hell had withstood the flurry of attacks by all of Lloyd’s comrades and even came back from Javier’s slash that had shredded him apart to pieces. The estate developer knew.

My attacks won’t even itch.

He knew it was ineffective but still carried on because it was a necessary step leading to the next. He strengthened his resolve and continued more intensely, keeping one eye on the king of hell’s wand as well as the colossal sickle that the enemy had drawn. And the wand moved.

Now!

Ding-dong!

[Warning: Danger!]

[Skill Option 7: Urgent Foresight is activated.]

[Your body temperature increases by 2°F due to the effect of the relic Eye of the Summer.]

Whoosh!

Lloyd’s mana heart automatically extended the mana without Lloyd’s intent as the relic Eye of the Summer’s effect was triggered. His body became hot and he saw five seconds into the future.

This way!

Lloyd shot out the mana blast towards his feet as soon as he saw the foresight.

Blast!

The beam of mana forced Lloyd’s body upward from the impact, shortly before the flash in the sky followed by the meteorite bombardment.

Kaboom!

Meteorite was the size of a baseball, but the speed of Mach 25 was devastating enough to rattle the ground amidst screeching noises and shockwaves. Lloyd had lifted his body in the air but still wasn't able to avoid it entirely.

"Urgh...!"

His body flew up even higher from the explosion despite the attempt to get out of the scope.

[Warning: The effectiveness of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle is reduced by 40%.]

Argh...!

Lloyd wondered if the piece of meat being pounded by the hammer would feel this way as red warning messages continued to pop up.

[You have sustained damage both physically and spiritually.]

[Should you take similar hits like this 1 more time, you will lose 60% of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle capacity and enter into a state of severe disarray.]

[Should you take similar hits like this 2 more times...]

Ugh.

Lloyd couldn't tell if he was nauseous because he was being flown back or because he had sustained a significant blow. He felt his mana heart and circle swirl around rapidly, but couldn't even land on the ground as the king of hell had charged forth even before Lloyd's inadvertent, deadly flight could end.

Ding-dong!

[Warning: Danger!]

[Skill Option 7: Urgent Foresight is activated.]

[Your body temperature increases by 2°F due to the effect of the relic Eye of the Summer.]

Whoosh!

It became even hotter. Lloyd saw five seconds into the future again amid severe migraines, as it suggested the horizontal swing of the colossal sickle beheading the estate developer. Lloyd quickly turned his body in time.

Sping!

Ouch!

The sickle scraped his ear. Lloyd felt severe heat in the affected area as he saw the drops of blood in the air, slightly obstructing his view of the new red warning message.

[Warning: The effectiveness of your Mana Heart and Mana Circle is reduced by 60%.]

[You have sustained damage both physically and spiritually.]

[You enter a state of severe disarray.]

Urgh...!

Lloyd fell to the ground without a chance to respond. He couldn’t breathe normally, not from the physical pain but from the extreme fear that overwhelmed his body and soul. It was as if he had just been thrown into the endless pit of the abyss, and as if he was all alone in the dark galaxy without a single star in sight.

Huff. Huff. Gasp!

He couldn’t breathe properly. The breath became uncontrollably fast, subtle, then fast again. It didn’t even reach his lungs and lingered around his lips. It grew faster before the oxygen was depleted and the light surrounding him faded away. He was all alone. He was out of breath. He was desperate.

Please.

And he couldn’t breathe. The air surrounding him was like invisible walls closing in on him from all directions. They approached with intense pressure and were going to squish him and laugh out loud like the king of hell.

Ugh... Huh!

It was painful. The sliced ear and the profuse bleeding, the tough breath, and the overwhelming terror that dominated him were all so excruciatingly agonizing. Lloyd crawled on the ground like a caterpillar as the king of hell approached, holding a wand in one hand and a sickle in the other. Lloyd momentarily wondered with which weapon the enemy was going to kill him. The estate developer fought off the fear combined with curiosity and tried his absolute best to continue breathing, mustering his energy to speak again.

“...Huff. Huh. Huff. Ugh. Is that... it? Huff... Pathetic... You suck... Meteorite... so small... Huff. Ugh...”

It was still all going according to the plan. Lloyd knew he had to just keep provoking him this way, enduring the immense fear, fright, despair, and torment. His perseverance was going to pay off soon. Lloyd had faith and strengthened his resolve once again. He endeavored to breathe and talk, trying to agitate the king of hell.

“...Huff. Ugh. Huff. I know... you’re a sissy... Huff. You can’t... huff, huff... unleash a bigger one... huff... because... you’re scared... you’d get swept away too... huff, huff. Coward.”

Lloyd spoke what came to his mind. He had suspected that the king of hell only unleashed small meteorites several times instead of summoning multiple huge ones to slay everyone at once.

He probably did that because, although he's invincible against our attacks, he's actually vulnerable against his own.

Lloyd was about to lose himself from it all but barely managed to keep himself together and took a glance at the king of hell's face.

Nailed it.

He was spot on. The withered-up facial expression was most certainly that of someone whose secrets had just been exposed. Lloyd knew for sure the moment he saw it.

Good.

The outcome foretold by the Jewel of Truth was right around the corner. The grand finale of this massive battle was approaching. The moment of triumphant smile was certainly coming. It was scary, frightening, and improbable, yet enjoyable. Lloyd stared at the king of hell in the eyes as the lich lifted his sickle. He thought of how to respond to the attack in his head and acted on it immediately.

With my back.

Lloyd had to take the hit with his back. He had to turn around now.

Please.

Lloyd mustered the remainder of his energy, but still couldn't move. Simply getting up and facing down again was an impossible task at the moment. He struggled, as the sickle fell on his head.

Whoosh!

Freakish noise took over as the animosity filled the air.

Please...!

There was just one more thing Lloyd had to do. He couldn't die like this. Not after all this.

Ugh... Argh!

But he had failed. Lloyd closed his eyes, realizing all of his efforts were in vain now.

Clink! Slash!

Sudden clinking noises of metal followed by a peculiar sound graced Lloyd's ears. Warm liquid was splattered on Lloyd's face. The noise hadn't come from his body, nor did the blood. Lloyd opened his eyes and saw the unbelievable.

"...Javier?"

Javier had rushed to his side and was standing in front of Lloyd with his shoulder pierced by the sickle. He slightly turned his head and smiled.

"I am so sorry, Master Lloyd."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 398: Last Resort (3)

It hurt.

Javier inadvertently chuckled at the phrase that praised selfless behaviors.

What an outrageous bullcrap.

He could only laugh bitterly, after actually having moved his body to protect someone else and shed blood in his place.

It just hurts. A lot.

The grandmaster felt excruciating pain on his left shoulder as if it was being burned and pounded by a hammer at the same time. Lloyd was staring at his knight in surprise. The estate developer was clearly trying to say something, but couldn't. His mouth remained open for a while.

"I am so sorry, Master Lloyd."

Pierce! The tip of the sickle that had protruded forward from behind was pulled back, filling the hole in Javier's body with blood. The grandmaster bled profusely from the wound, and his left side was covered in blood. However, he couldn't go down here. He refused to kneel.

"...Why?"

The fake Lloyd barely managed to ask this question, causing Javier to chuckle yet again.

"I tried to parry it off with my blade attack but failed. I was only able to slightly mitigate the force. Otherwise, you would have sustained the injury."

Blood gushed forth, but he couldn't stop.

"This works for me. Master Lloyd, please get yourself to safety."

"Hold on--"

Javier tightened his grip on the sword and turned around, swinging the blade empowered by the remainder of his aura and his weight. It was significantly weaker than usual, but that did not matter.

Just once.

As long as he could deliver some kind of damage to the king of hell, there was hope for Javier; Lloyd could perhaps survive.

Clink!

But the attack was stopped. Javier felt the shock from the impact on his left shoulder, gushing forth blood once again. But the grip on his sword tightened.

“Hmph!”

Krakakakaka!

Javier put his everything in his attacks as he thrust, slashed, slammed, and struck. He sliced, parried, and whacked.

Krakakakaka!

Flares sparked and flew everywhere as Javier felt the pain in his left shoulder with each attack. He nearly fainted and was overwhelmed with fear. It was as if he was sustaining grave damage both physically and mentally.

But the grip on his sword tightened. Javier swung his weapon again with the determination to die if he had to here. He wasn’t going to back away, as long as that could keep that fraudster safe. That was enough for Javier. The grandmaster attacked even more fiercely and ferociously, with the intent to continue until he would breathe his last. He didn’t care if his body was going to break down to dust from all this. He continued to attack, strike, and defend.

Krakakaka! Clink! Clank!

His body was rattled. Agonizing pain shook him. He experienced near-fainting moments more often, as his vision blurred and returned several times. The world disappeared and came back. These went on for a while until Javier felt light on his feet all of a sudden.

Zing!

Even without realization, Javier had opened a new, fourth circle surrounding his heart through the series of moments that required extreme focus and reaching his limit.

Kwoosh!

The flow of aura was like that of a fierce current now, as it shrouded Javier's body. He was able to push off the sickle attack by the adversary for the first time.

Clink!

"Huh?"

The king of hell's eyes subtly shook. But it wasn't over. The change that began in Javier's heart spread out to his entire body.

He was breaking through every barrier that stood, from physicality, mentality, and to willpower. He broke through internally and externally.

Zing!

The fifth circle let out a peculiar noise as it was formed. All of Javier's 60 trillion mana hearts resonated with the cry by the pentacircle, shrouding even the ground on which the grandmaster was standing.

Ha. That won't make a difference, the king of hell chuckled.

But the sixth circle was born with a flash as if Javier's body was responding to the sneer.

Zing!

All of his bodily cells were now active, as the sixty trillion mana hearts embedded within the cells cried out. Mana was amplified as it passed through the hexacircle. Aura traveled through a total of 2,799,360,000,000,000,000—billion millions of passageways—and all met in the heart, shaking all cells, nerves, and arteries in the process. Javier then rushed forth, sprinted, broke through, and charged.

Bam!

The king of hell was shaken from the attack despite having parried off the slash. The evil ruler's face turned red from bellicose excitement.

"Astounding... Urgh!"

Slash!

King of hell's leg was gone with a single attack, but he wasn't a fan of being on the receiving end of effective strikes.

Whoosh!

He extended his sickle and swung it against Javier's throat again, while simultaneously waving his wand in the air. But Javier was not there. With a single step, the grandmaster had caught the king of hell from behind; he was faster than the wind and stealthier than a ghost.

"What?"

The king of hell felt terrorizing animosity and responded immediately.

Flash!

Another meteorite fell from the sky amidst the flash.

But Javier's sword had viciously scraped off the entire space. His blade clashed with the meteorite that was traveling at the speed of Mach 25 and released hundreds of thousands of aura strands explosively.

Kwooooooosh!

The physical impact from the clash, the massive shockwave that was about to be unleashed, and the overwhelming radiant heat that was ready to engulf the entire vicinity were all swept away by the aura strands without affecting the ground and the surroundings at all. Javier did not sustain any damage either; instead, he used the force to empower his own attack.

Ping.

There was no outrageous noise. The grandmaster smoothly maneuvered and slid between spaces like a skilled predator. He swung his sword between the air molecules.

“Oh?”

It took a moment of flinching by the king of hell.

Krakakaka!

The fiendish ruler’s left body was shredded apart into pieces, not to mention the wand. King of hell barely managed to counterattack with his sickle.

Whoosh! Swoosh!

The ten-foot-long sickle spun around gloriously, sweeping through everything in the vicinity from all directions.

Krakakakakaka!

Javier’s ruthless slashes clashed against the nefarious sickle hundreds of times in the air. The king of hell regenerated his left side in the meantime and attempted another attack.

Sping!

The mana in the area became distorted and turned into hell’s fire. The heat nearly rivaling the surface temperature of the sun engulfed Javier, but he did not panic; instead, he retracted his sword momentarily and mustered up the energy before unleashing it horizontally.

Slice!

Air and space had been cut through. The flare was trapped in the absolute void that was created in the blink of an eye. This blatant defiance of physics appalled the king of hell.

“What...?”

But he did not have a chance to sate his curiosity. Javier did not give him time.

Krakaka!

Javier’s longsword stopped immediately in front of the king of hell. He had barely stopped it. But the evil ruler of the underworld was flabbergasted nonetheless.

How can a human be this powerful?!

The king of hell knew how skilled Javier was as a swordsman, but that was as far as he had given the grandmaster credit for. He was still human and he could never overcome the physical limitations imposed on the inferior creature. This was verified time and again. Or so he thought.

He’s on a whole new level now.

It sent chills down the king of hell’s spine. The freakish ruler would have avoided facing this man in battle in his own body because he would be governed by the law of death.

I would have been in danger.

Even the dictator of the treacherous underworld had to risk his own life to engage Javier in this state in battle. However, the king of hell was in a different body at the moment.

Thank goodness I incarnated myself in the lich’s body.

The king of hell chuckled in relief, for the lich's body was immortal. He was invincible. He was invulnerable.

Javier Asrahan. It doesn't matter what you do now. You may be able to cut me down, shred me apart, or even crush me to pieces. But nothing you do will kill me. This is a battle you cannot possibly win.

Even if he was to break apart, be crushed, and slashed over and over again, he was immortal. He could regenerate any damage effortlessly in an instant. On the other hand, Javier Asrahan was still human. Despite the fierceness of his attacks, he was still going to come short. That made the king of hell genuinely relieved.

The evil dictator did not panic one bit despite being slashed, shredded, and pierced by Javier's ferocious attacks. Instead, he enjoyed the sight of his adversary's endeavor. The grandmaster's tremendous effort to come up victorious was rather fun. He watched as a spectator. He was the more skilled and taller basketball player against a shorter novice on the court. It was a form of mockery. The king of hell regenerated each time he took damage, and sustained hits all over again. He would cast powerful offensive spells here and there to make the process more interesting for his foe, encouraging him to try harder. The king of hell was virtually staring down at his opponent like he was an ant trying to overcome a human all by itself. The demonic tyrant summoned meteorites, created flares, blasted out gravitational spheres, and cast curse spells.

But Javier persevered through all the hardships and fought even more valiantly. He was a sturdy toy and was never going to break despite the adversities. He showed immense willpower and put a smile on the king of hell's face.

Except it couldn't last forever.

I... shed too much blood.

Javier's breath became visibly rough as he continued to engage the enemy in an epic, transcendent battle. His stamina was being depleted slowly but surely. Even if he was a grandmaster with six circles, the grave injury on his shoulder and a tremendous amount of blood loss weren’t easy to overcome. In fact, it was a miracle he had put up this much of a fight thus far.

Gush!

Javier bled from his left shoulder once again, as he readied himself to launch another strike. He turned pale and his movement slowed down. But the grandmaster did not stop.

Not yet.

It wasn’t over. Lloyd was still unconscious. He had to buy him more time so his unruly master could get up and run away. That was his duty as the knight.

Please.

Javier desperately wished for extra strength so he could continue standing his ground. He strengthened his resolve once again, but to no avail; the physical limits imposed on his body were merciless. The more he ran and amplified mana through the mana heart and the more he hustled with his body, his heart pounded faster, discharging more blood out from the wound.

Javier’s face became extremely pale. Even his lips were white. But the grandmaster did not stop.

Please.

He took a step forward and lifted his sword. He approached the king of hell. He drew the line in the air and swung his sword. But his movement was unfortunately way too slow and fragile.

Tap.

There was no aura on the blade. The feeble swing of the sword tapped against the king of hell’s shoulder.

“Is this all you got?”

It was the smile of blatant mockery. Javier did not verbally reply. Instead, he lifted his sword up again instinctively like when he was first learning how to fight with a sword, as he treaded between the conscious and the unconscious realm. He slowly moved his sword, but the swing could not be completed.

Bam!

The king of hell had kicked Javier in the stomach.

The grandmaster couldn’t even scream in pain. He flew back and rolled on the ground covered in blood.

“...Ugh. Huff, huff.”

He had to get up, but his body wasn’t listening to him. He crawled on the ground and placed his sword on the floor. He exerted whatever strength he could muster into his legs, but the ominous shadow was cast over him before he could. Javier lifted his chin and stared at his adversary.

“You’ve fought valiantly. I will let you serve me as the commander of hell’s knights in your death.”

The king of hell was holding the sickle in his hand. It fell on Javier’s neck diagonally. It was an attack he could neither avoid nor block. It was over. He had failed. His endeavor despite the adversity was going to end here.

As soon as Javier realized this, he internally reiterated this phrase as if these were his last words.

Master Lloyd. Please be safe.

He was truly sorry he couldn’t protect his master until the end. The cold steel fell on his neck, slicing through the air mercilessly. But a dark silhouette stood before him and obstructed his view.

Pierce!

“...!!”

Javier did not have a chance to stop this. Warm liquid was spattered on his face. This sound hadn’t come from the grandmaster, nor did the blood.

“...Master Lloyd?” He instinctively murmured.

Lloyd was standing in front of him with his chest pierced, yet with a nonchalant smile on his face.

“Stop crying, you crybaby.”

“What kind of...”

“This is all part of the plant. So stop crying.”

“But...”

“This can actually work thanks to you now.”

“Master Lloyd?”

Javier was confused. He couldn’t comprehend why Lloyd was smiling and babbling on about success when things were obviously terrible. But he did not get a chance, as Lloyd lost light in his eyes rapidly. There was no more sign of life from the mischievous smile on the face of his lord. The young master he had sworn to serve breathed his last as his head dropped. He had died.

“...No way.”

This wasn’t supposed to happen. Javier was in disbelief. He refused to believe what he saw. This was not the ending he had desired. He desperately cried out.

“Master Lloyd!”

He wished to get up on his feet so he could stretch out his hands to the deceased. He wanted to shake his body to wake him up from the slumber if possible. But it wasn’t. He couldn’t get up. He couldn’t stretch out his hands. He couldn’t hold him and wake him up. There was nothing he could do.

Clink!

The king of hell let go of his sickle, which fell on the ground with Lloyd’s corpse on it like a skewer. The demonic ruler then stood up with a satisfactory smile on his face from the accomplishment of his ultimate goal. The grim shadow still stood as he looked down on Javier like a condescending tyrant, suggesting it was his turn next.

“I’ll skewer you with this,” said the king of hell, lifting his wand again. He grinned sinisterly as he pulled the weapon and pointed it at Javier.

But another surprise awaited them.

“I think I’ve made a discovery. Let me guess, you can’t recover from the damage inflicted by your own weapon, right?”

The sudden question from behind the king of hell grabbed their attention. Before the king of hell could respond, hands stretched from the rear and grappled on the neck and body of the king of hell. He then pulled and clasped onto him.

Pierce!

And the blade of the sickle pierced the king of hell in the chest. Lloyd showed his version of the grim smile from the evil ruler’s back.

“Finally. I was waiting for this moment.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 399: Farewell (1)

It did not hurt.

Lloyd inadvertently chuckled at the phrase that praised selfless behaviors.

What an outrageous bullcrap.

Lloyd maintained a nonchalant smile on his face. He genuinely thought glorifying sacrifice was absolutely absurd, after having done it himself once; he had died in someone else's place and come back to life.

Because it's really nothing.

Lloyd rubbed his chest which had been pierced by the sickle. It actually did not hurt at all. He had been overrun with fear when the king of hell swung his weapon to skewer him, but the estate developer felt nothing after coming back to life, not because of the adrenaline. It was as if he had taken pain-killing opioids for breakfast, lunch, and dinner.

Javier stared at Lloyd in absolute surprise, speechlessly. It appeared that the grandmaster was trying to think of what to say, but couldn't. Lloyd looked at the dropped jaw of his buddy and chuckled even harder.

"Surprise, ahahaha."

Pull!

Lloyd exerted more strength into his arms and pulled the king of hell closer, using the blade of the sickle protruding from his chest to carve into the evil ruler's back. It pierced the enemy in the stomach and found its way out to the front, causing the king of hell to shake from the pain. Dark demonic energy left the enemy's body, but he wasn't going to fall or kneel on the ground. Lloyd wasn't going to allow it.

"How...?"

King of hell barely managed to ask the question, putting a more apparent smile of satisfaction on Lloyd's face.

"I have the dragon king endorsement membership. One of its benefits is resurrection, and it worked."

"Th-then...!"

"Yeah. This is what I've been planning from the get-go."

More demonic energy left the demon king's body, but Lloyd grappled onto him even harder with the intent to make the enemy struggle like a bug skewered by a spike.

"Urgh...!!"

"It hurts, right? I knew it, because I read about it in The Knight of Iron and Blood before."

"The knight of... what?"

"You know about it. It explained the only way to deal damage to a lich."

"No way."

"Yes, way. The lich can only be damaged by its own weapon. Anything else, it could recover from thanks to its invincibility and immortality. So the only way is to take the lich's weapon and use it against the undead sorcerer."

"But how...? That's impossible!"

"It is impossible under normal circumstances because anyone that holds the lich's weapon in hand sustains incurable damage and loses sanity."

"But you.."

"I didn't."

Lloyd glanced down at the sickle that skewered both Lloyd and the king of hell. It was gruesome to look at it, but that made his smile even greater.

“Because I didn’t grab it with my hands.”

“Urgh...!”

“Don’t you dare try to push me away.”

The king of hell struggled and twitched violently, but Lloyd tightened the grasp on the enemy’s neck and ribcage. The king of hell lifted his arm to elbow Lloyd in the face.

Bam!

It was a clean hit and should have crushed Lloyd’s face. But it did not hurt at all.

“It itches.”

It didn’t even. Lloyd actually felt nothing from the strike.

Bang! Bang! Bang!

More elbow strikes fell on his face, but Lloyd chuckled again.

“Holy. The resurrection endorsed by the dragon king is amazing.”

It was indeed astounding and marvelous. Lloyd had been doubtful even though he had heard this answer from the Jewel of Truth due to how unbelievable this idea was, but it was real to have experienced it firsthand.

I can’t believe it really was speaking the truth.

Lloyd was reminded of the question he had asked the Jewel of Truth before the battle began. The artifact gave him the answer to how to defeat the king of hell, and it was precisely this.

It said the resurrection benefit from the dragon king endorsement wasn't just bringing one's life back. It's supposed to grant the resurrected absolute invulnerability and healing magic regardless of the situation, for five minutes.

Lloyd thought it made sense because the individual who resurrected through this benefit while submerged underwater would certainly drown again without any form of protection.

Drown to death, come back to life, only to drown again. That's not fair.

It was likewise for someone who died from a fire. Without protective or healing magic, one was bound to suffer again immediately.

I would suffocate from smoke right away unless I die before that from severe burns.

The five minutes of absolute protection and healing magic was the time given to the individual to get out of the tight spot. Lloyd was enjoying its benefits to the fullest.

"Urgh! Argh!"

Pow! Pow! Pow!

The king of hell wildly moved its body like a beast that had walked into a bear trap. He smacked Lloyd in the face with his elbow and the back of his own head, but Lloyd did not feel any pain thanks to the invulnerability he had been granted.

Nothing will work.

The estate developer pulled him even harder. The king of hell finally seemed to realize that his efforts were going to be meaningless.

"Urgh..."

The evil ruler grabbed the sickle that protruded from his abdomen. Lloyd realized the attempt to break the blade off, but even this move had been anticipated.

False Swing!

Lloyd internally shouted out as he glanced at the king of hell’s attempt, prompting a pop-up message in front of his eyes.

Ding-dong!

[Mana Heart Skill Option 6: Attack Design is activated.]

[Loading False Swing data from Slot 1.]

[It will cost 250 RP to activate this option.]

[Remaining RP: 7,718]

“...What?”

The king of hell’s hands that was attempting to break the blade apart came to an abrupt pause as another message popped up.

[Target of your Attack Design is resisting.]

[He is trying to negate the movement preset by Attack Design through the amazing willpower of the mythical creature.]

[Duration of Attack Design will be reduced to 10%.]

[However, it will not matter because the duration of False Swing movement data is 0.2 seconds.]

[False Swing data from Slot 1 has been implemented in reality.]

As soon as the last message showed up, the king of hell’s hands moved forward smoothly like a skater on ice. The sharp sickle glowed.

Slash!

“Urgh!”

Four fingers except the thumb from the right hand and the thumb from the left were severed. And those fingers weren’t going to regenerate this time.

“Suho Kim! You little...!”

The king of hell shouted out in fury. Lloyd chuckled as he complimented himself for having waited for the right moment to use this attack design instead of resorting to it when he was being dominated. He grappled onto the king of hell even tighter, stirring up even more anger.

“How dare you!”

Thwoosh! Kaboom!

A nasty shockwave from dark magic was unleashed from the demon’s body, which could literally shred Lloyd apart to pieces under normal circumstances. Thanks to the effect of invulnerability, however, Lloyd was unscathed.

“How long do you think you can hold on like this for?!”

Lloyd agreed. In fact, he only had four more remaining minutes until the invulnerability effect expired. The estate developer knew he had to wrap things up before that happened.

“That’s why we’ll be walking together.”

He pulled the king of hell and walked backward, slowly but surely. The two men skewered by the same sickle moved together.

Ding-dong.

[Skill Option 3: Power Saving Mode is activated.]

[You are able to maintain the effect of the Asrahan Core Technique, albeit slightly, even when you’re absolutely fatigued.]

[Mana Amplification Rate: 25%]

Zing...

The threeway circle that barely operated provided bonus strength to the estate developer, allowing him to drag the king of hell with it. The enemy tried to resist, but perhaps he had lost too much energy from the sickle attack.

“Hmph! Do you honestly believe you can defeat me like this?!”

“Yeah. I think I can.”

“What makes you think that way?!” The king of hell shouted louder.

“Nothing in particular,” replied Lloyd with a chuckle. He had no reason to tell his enemy that, nor was he obligated; he did not want to ruin the plan now.

Lloyd continued dragging his adversary towards the intended destination consistently. It was the end of the huge platform, and the king of hell seemed to finally realize what the estate developer was trying to accomplish.

“S-Suho Kim?!”

It was the first time the king of hell ever showed this blatant frustration in his eyes.

“No way!” The evil ruler resisted and tried to turn his head.

“Yes way,” said Lloyd quickly, exerting more strength on his right arm that was holding the foe’s neck. “Just shut up and come with me.”

“H-hold on a second, Suho Kim!” The king of hell resisted even harder.

Shockwaves of dark magic were unleashed and more meteorites fell from the sky to explode the area. But Lloyd had three whole minutes before the effects of invulnerability expired. That was enough to drag the king of hell to the intended destination and to leave his last words to Javier.

“Right, Javier?” He lifted his head and looked at Javier, who was trying his best to crawl his way here. He was staring at Lloyd like he wanted to stop him, but it seemed that his strength was failing him. Javier was desperate, but couldn’t due to the lack of energy. This put a smile on Lloyd’s face.

“I know, I know. I hate to do this too. I really despised this method, so I tried to see if I could beat this enemy in other ways.”

But all else had failed. Lloyd knew he should have resorted to this from the start. He regretted having taken his allies all the way here to make them suffer.

“But this is the only way. Nothing else will work.”

Javier’s lips trembled. Lloyd noticed that the grandmaster was calling out to him. He could see, hear, and feel his buddy’s heart. But there was no turning back.

“This is the right thing to do. The more I try to hold on, persevere, and fight through it all, the more sufferings that seem to fall on the people around me. I can’t bear that.”

Lloyd chuckled bitterly. In truth, he wanted to enjoy the fruits of his labor in the Frontera Estate and spend more time with his friends and allies, whom he had come to rely on. He wanted to lead an ordinary and unremarkable life with them. But Lloyd had realized even that was too much to hope for. It was greed.

“I wanted to deny it as much as I could at first. Who wouldn’t? I want to live luxuriously like anybody else. But the more I thought about it, the more I realized that even if I overcame the most imminent problem, the enforced fate phenomenon would occur again and... I don’t think I can keep doing this forever.”

Even if he were to slay the king of hell here and resolve this problem, another restoration of enforced destiny would take place, putting everyone in danger all over again. It was going to be a greater and more severe catastrophe because the previous one fell short.

“I really can’t. I’m scared now. I don’t think I can do this anymore. All this is happening because of me. I can’t put the count and the countess, you, or everyone else in peril just to make my dreams come true.”

Lloyd dragged the king of hell harder and continued walking.

“So this is really it. If I have to really choose between you and me for this to end once and for all, I choose to banish myself from this world. After all, you really belong to this realm whereas I don’t. I came from elsewhere. I am an outsider. This all happened because of my stubbornness and unwillingness to cease to exist.”

Lloyd’s eyes became red, even without him realizing it. But he still maintained the smile on his face to put his friend's mind a bit at ease. It was to make him feel a little less guilty.

“That’s why I must tell you this. Please tell my queen that I was genuinely delighted by her proposal. I was so grateful. That I am so sorry for leaving like this. And I really enjoyed my journey with you. This has been the best part of my life, away from the moldy and smelly, tiny room I spent most of my time in. I really, really had a lot of fun.”

Lloyd couldn’t tell if it was him or Javier who was shedding tears. His vision was blurry.

“Thank you so much for spending time with me. I really don’t regret it one bit, because this has been a great ride. You, and everyone else will remember me. I won’t ask you to think about me every given opportunity, but as long as you do every now and again, I’ll still be alive in your memories.”

Lloyd wanted to live in their memories, and that was going to be enough. He was willing to finally give up on the false hope and preposterous dreams. He was fortunate enough to spend a few years with some of the best people he'd ever met.

The greatest estate developer pulled the king of hell with even more strength, dragging him to the end of the platform. The king of hell resisted and shouted, but Lloyd couldn't make sense of what he said. It was too late.

The portal to rebirth swirled behind him. And the greatest estate developer jumped into it, holding his arch-nemesis.

"Goodbye."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 400: Farewell (2)

Hi. This is Lloyd... I mean, Suho Kim. You're probably wondering what I'm talking about, but this is the truth. In fact, I should have revealed this a long time ago.

The hands of Count Frontera shook as he picked up the letter containing a message left in familiar handwriting. It was that of a man who gave his hundred and ten percent before leaving the estate for good.

If, by any chance, you wouldn't get to read this message, then it would mean my alternative plan has worked and I have returned home. However, if you're reading this message, I wouldn't be there. There is no exception to anyone behind the gate of rebirth, including the king of hell.

The countess dropped her head as the count hugged her by her shoulders. Their eyes shook constantly as they continued.

I should have told you this before, but I lacked the courage. That is why I reveal this truth to you right now through a letter. I was a coward. I am so sorry. I mean it.

The count let out a huge sigh at the last sentence. He thought Lloyd did not have a reason to apologize. If there was someone that had to feel sorry, it was they. Count Frontera felt no words could express his gratitude towards Lloyd properly.

"Honey."

The countess glanced at the count, who nodded in response before reading the letter again.

My real name is Suho Kim, born and raised in Seoul. I lived in a tiny room just enough to lie down in that city. I honestly have no idea how and why I became Lloyd Frontera. I just... woke up in his body one day.

The count continued onto the next page.

I was flustered and perplexed in the beginning. So I lied. I pretended to be your real son Lloyd Frontera. I blamed the fate for being so cruelly mischievous with this move, and thought it really wasn't my fault. Well, that's what I told myself each day. This lie built up until I ran into the real Lloyd.

The count and the countess were visibly shaken.

He had become an apparition and was wandering around in the underworld after losing his body over to me. That was when I realized that nothing would change the fact he suffered because of me, even if it was unintended and accidental. It hurt, but I tried to appear nonchalant on the surface. I did not want to be disgusted by my own hypocrisy.

The hands shook as Suho's confession continued.

So I did everything in my power to help him. Thankfully, he entered through the portal of rebirth. I have no idea what he was reincarnated into, or to which parents; I am so sorry I don't have more information. But he did ask me this: to take care of you two and tell you what became of him. Perhaps this is why I'm writing this letter immediately before the final battle begins.

And it went on.

I won't try to cover it up. I am so sorry for hiding behind written words instead of telling you this in person like a coward. But there should be a set of huge plans stored in my bedroom closet. Those are construction plans to be put to use after the battle is over, from the dam at Lake Kapua, waterworks and sewage by the mountain range, and drainage at Maritz Farmlands. I also added how to construct stabilization piles and anchors to be installed on the slopes of Namaran, as well as how and where to place them.

Lloyd had thought about the work to be done on the estate until the very end, even in the writing that could well become his last words.

But everything will be alright even in my absence, because our engineering corp is so skilled now. Perhaps I made the last message unnecessarily long and wasted your time. I apologize once again. Please explain well to Julian and Javier, as well as Her Majesty. Please take good care of Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, Bibeong, and Ggoming. They're all good kids. Farewell, my... father and mother. Thank you for everything.

The count shed tears silently as the countess covered her face in her husband's clothes. Javier bit his lips tightly in frustration.

"That's all I found in Master Lloyd's bedroom."

"I see."

"..."

"Sir Javier Asrahan," said the count.

"Yes, my lord."

"You've been with him the entire time, wherever he went."

"I did, my lord."

"Then... did you sort of have an idea about it as well?"

"...Please forgive me, my lord."

"No need. You probably had faith that he would eventually tell us in person. Isn't that right?"

Javier had, and that was why it broke his heart even more. The grandmaster had never imagined in his wildest dreams Lloyd would resort to such a method—sacrificing himself to drag the enemy into the gate of rebirth. Javier regretted and blamed himself for having failed to anticipate Lloyd's plan. Had he had just a little more strength, he would have been able to stop Lloyd. Javier would have jumped to the other side of the portal with the king of hell in his master's stead.

But he couldn't. Despite having sworn to protect the fake Lloyd regardless of the adversities plenty of times, he relied on Lloyd's selfless act instead.

He couldn’t save him. He could only watch his last moments with his eyes.

Javier still did not say anything because he figured the count and the countess must have been devastated even more than he. Displaying sadness in front of them was like a pretense by an incompetent knight who had failed to protect someone he was sworn to. So he told himself not to shed tears. He strengthened his resolve not to be shaken by this.

I do not deserve to.

He was going to endure the pain. The agony he was going to suffer was a way to pay for the sins he had committed.

“If you’ll excuse me, my lord, I’ll be on standby.”

“Yeah. You may leave.”

Javier quickly ran away from the count and countess’s presence before a flood of tears burst out, and heard the wailing cries of the countess and the consoling, yet shaky voice of the count behind closed doors. The count told his wife that Lloyd had been a good kid, and he was like a gift from the heavens. He assured his wife that they had to remember him the way he was, and that was the only way to repay him for all the good things he had done. The grandmaster walked away through the hallway with a heavy heart.

He let out a deep sigh. Javier thought the refreshing air of the night sky would put him a bit more at ease, but it didn’t. Wherever he went and whatever he looked at, including the starry sky, his heart was still broken. The grandmaster continued to sigh and walk until he reached a certain grave that was freshly made. He glanced at the new gravestone that was still not covered in moss and only then realized where he had come from.

“You’re here, Sir Javier Asrahan.”

“...Your Majesty.”

Queen Alicia was standing in front of the grave with a bitter smile on her face.

“No need to pay pointless respect in a situation like this. Not here anyways. This area does not belong to me but to this fool.”

She stared at the gravestone on which the phrase Javier never wished to see was etched: Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Count Frontera and faithful vassal and key contributor to the Magentano Dynasty, sleeps here.

It was strange. It was peculiar. It was even surreal. Javier felt like this gravestone was all a lie. Perhaps it was because he wanted to deny the harsh reality.

“What of your injuries?”

“I am recovering, thanks to your grace.”

“Good.”

“Your grace knows—“

“Enough.”

Javier wondered if the queen was crying. It seemed that way, as Her Majesty was looking down on the ground with shaky shoulders and clenched fists. It was perhaps due to the words Javier was about to speak, which reminded her of the man who had always reiterated phrases like “Your grace knows no bounds,” and “Please forgive me” with a nonchalant smile on his face.

“I’ll be on standby by the knight’s quarter.”

Javier did not want to interrupt the queen’s moment with his master. He quickly got away from the grave like he was a runaway, and walked restlessly without a particular destination. He harbored the emptiness in his heart and just went on, just like that day when he had done just this with Lloyd. He remembered when Lloyd had asked him about Javier’s father and what kind of man he was. Except he was alone this time, causing him to chuckle bitterly.

“Ha.”

This was why Javier disliked the night; it wetted his face. The grandmaster blamed the night mist as he recalled the moments he regretted. He missed him.

Master Lloyd...

Javier wondered what had happened to the man he failed to protect after jumping into the portal of rebirth. He became curious about what kind of life he was given as a result. He wanted to know if Lloyd managed to find a new life that was mediocre, unremarkable, and happy with just enough wealth not to worry about things. The grandmaster desperately wished this as he walked, until he stopped somewhere and jumped into the water.

His shoulder covered in bandages hurt excruciatingly, but he did not care. He dove deeper and deeper to the very bottom of the lake, at which the Jewel of Truth stood. He then placed his hand on the altar, just like how the fake Lloyd had done some time ago.

[You, who wish to obtain a truthful answer from the Jewel of Truth. You must reveal a secret about yourself, that only you are aware of, to this world in exchange for the truth you seek.]

The voice resounded in his head as expected, and the knight did not hesitate to give his answer.

I never, ever thought once about the life with Master Lloyd, and even right now.

And the response was immediate.

[You have willingly shared a secret that only you had been aware of, as the price to acquire the truth you seek.]

The surface of the lake glowed as the night sky became bright. Javier asked again.

What happened to Suho Kim's soul after entering through the gate of rebirth?

Javier wanted to know. He wanted to hear a good response. After a brief moment of waiting that felt like an eternity, the Jewel finally answered.

[Suho Kim's soul did not find a new body despite having jumped into the portal of rebirth.]

What?

Javier flinched inadvertently as the jewel continued.

[Instead of being reincarnated into a new body, he went back into the original body of Suho Kim, staying at Room 301 of the tiny complex in Seoul of the different dimension from which he hailed.]

What...?

It was absolutely astonishing and unprecedented.

Then what of his memories about this place? Us?"

Javier quickly asked, and was able to hear a response.

[He retailed full memory of what transpired here in the estate and dearly misses all of you. It is possible to bring him back to this realm if you can travel across the dimensions.]

Javier's heart pounded in excitement from the pleasant surprise. It was an unexpected answer.

Let me ask one more...but I will reveal something first. I am actually ecstatic, thinking about Suho Kim and what became of him.

The Jewel of Truth spoke again.

[You have willingly shared a secret that only you had been aware of, as the price to acquire the truth you seek.]

The water’s surface and the sky above it glowed brightly again. Javier wasted no time.

Where is the dragon king Verkis?

Javier knew he could travel across dimensions. With his help, bringing Suho Kim, the fake Lloyd, back to this realm was a possibility. They could return to their normal lives without worrying about anything anymore.

Please...

The grandmaster’s desperate plea did not go unheard, as the jewel responded.

[Dragon king Verkis has taken over the lair of another dragon Atrox, which is located in the topmost peak of the Cuantara Mountains, and is taking a nap in that dark pit.]

Cuantara Mountains wasn’t too far away, fortunately. Javier immediately swam up to the surface upon hearing the answer and headed straight into the lord’s mansion, slamming open the doors to the other Lloyd’s bedroom.

“Sir Ggoming, and everyone else.”

“Ggoming?”

“Ppodong?”

“Bangul?”

“Hamang?”

Sir Ppodong, Sir Bangul, Sir Hamang, and Sir Ggoming, all of whom had been depressed by the disappearance of their master, turned around and glanced at Javier.

“I found a way to resurrect... I mean, bring Master Lloyd back to this place. Please come with me.”

“Ppodong?”

“Bangul?”

“Hamang?”

“Ggoming?”

“We don’t have a lot of time,” said Javier, hurrying the beasts while taking out the red sunflower seed to feed Sir Ggoming before hopping onto the enlarged creature with the rest. “We must head south. Now!”

“G-Ggoming!”

Ggoming did not comprehend what was going on, but Javier pushed it forward anyway. The winged summoned flew towards the south, away from the estate to the Cuantara Mountains, past other ranges, plains, and rivers. In a few hours, they saw the entrance to the dragon lair in the highest peak of the mountain range just like the Jewel of Truth had revealed.

Javier took the rest into the pit. It was as expected of the dragon’s lair, full of deadly traps. But the grandmaster did not care; he valiantly fought through and broke everything by force, even running across a black dragon, presumed to be the original owner of this lair, knocked unconscious by an external blunt force. After passing through a series of otherwise perilous situations, Javier finally found what he came looking for.

The old manticore, which had been lying down like a faithful dog waiting for his owner to wake up, turned around and saw the grandmaster. Javier then noticed the dragon king Verkis sound asleep next to the loyal beast.

“Please excuse me, good manticore,” said Javier, approaching the dragon king.

“Grr?”

“This has to do with ensuring the safe return of Lloyd Frontera, whom the dragon king has been sponsoring.”

“Grr? Grr!”

Perhaps the old manticore had read Javier’s desperate mind, as the beast willingly stepped aside. Javier walked closer to the dragon king and spoke.

“Great Dragon King Verkis. Please wake up.”

“...Zzz.”

“Please. Just one moment of your time is enough.”

“...Zzz.”

“There is something I must discuss.”

“...Zzz.”

“...”

Javier knew it wasn’t going to work. He reached out his hand and shook the dragon king by his shoulders.

“It’s an important matter about the individual that you have been sponsoring.”

Javier shook the dragon king lightly at first but had to exert more and more strength eventually and gradually. But the dragon king did not budge an inch, despite all the shaking, and even shouting into his ears. Javier realized that he wasn’t going to wake up through normal means.

“...”

There was only one way he could think of: cause an even more intense pressure than by shaking him or shouting in his ears, to make sure he woke up.

Zing!

Javier activated his six-way circle and unsheathed his sword, with the intent to slice the dragon king’s head.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 401: Glorious and Gratifying (1)

Strange noise resounded within my head on the other side of the gate of rebirth. The king of hell was surely making it worse by grumbling so much.

Ugh. I'm tired.

I frowningly rolled over on my bed in fatigue. I was exhausted, and rightly so; I had led the alliance soldiers in battle, drowning a corp of hell's knights before facing the king of hell in an epic fight in which he gave everything. It was almost the result of karma striking back, as I had dragged the evil ruler of the underworld into the portal of rebirth with me.

But I succeeded in the end.

It was absolutely the last resort I had in my mind and the only method that worked according to the Jewel of Truth. I barely managed to even pull it off, but it worked. I had a genuinely satisfactory smile on my face from the feeling of achievement, but it did not last long.

"...Moving onto today's forecast."

An unfamiliar voice characterized by eloquence spoke out.

I must be dreaming.

I suspected it came from the dream and rolled to the other side. However, that peculiar voice continued to speak.

"Dressing in warm clothes is definitely recommended, as the Siberian High of early winter has carried some cold air from the north. The temperature in Seoul fell to fifteen degrees this morning--"

Huh...?

I wasn't dreaming. The voice was surely coming from next to me.

But how?

I realized something hadn’t gone according to the plan. I clearly passed the gate of rebirth and was supposed to go through an after-death process like choosing from a selection of new lives to lead. But I was hearing the news report on today’s weather.

I opened my eyes in curiosity and froze to the spot immediately.

“...The presence of strong wind will make it feel even colder and the temperature will drop to an annual low during the weekend.”

The television was the only thing that emanated light in a dark room. I could see the serious look on the face of someone dressed in an outfit that was as clean and neat as her manner of speech.

“News...?” I mumbled inadvertently.

The reporters sharing the weather forecast through the news channel would look like that. She elegantly smiled as she added, as if she had just heard me and was responding.

“Snow flurries may fall in the northern Gangwon Province in the mountainside, with high waves out in the sea.”

It felt as though an avalanche was falling in my heart.

“What the hell’s going on?” I complained without even realizing it.

“...from weather forecast for today. Thank you.”

I closed my lips as the old, barely working television let out delightful music to mark the ending of the news. It certainly looked familiar. It made me feel nauseous. I was shaking my two hands in frustration when I recognized the television I had in the tiny room back in Seoul. I was in that very place again.

What the...?

I wondered why I was back in this place. It drove me out of my mind; I looked around restlessly like an unstable person, failing to look at a single spot as I got reminded of the familiar odor of mold and saw the yellowed walls and soggy bed sheets and blanket.

An old cell phone with a cracked screen lay next to my pillow. I was in disbelief and denial as I turned on the cell phone and checked today's date. I tossed the device on the bed as soon as I verified it and went straight outside.

"Ugh..." Blergh.

I felt extremely nauseous. I had to go to the public bathroom and empty my stomach. I then noticed my own face in the mirror.

My face was yellowed from the lack of proper nutrition, not to mention the bags underneath my eyes from chronic fatigue. My lips were dry and my hair was unkempt. I was tearing up.

I was asking myself who I was, why I was here, and why today's date indicated it was the morning after the day in which I had found myself in Lloyd's body.

This can't be. Can it?

Tears dripped down my cheeks against my will. I couldn't comprehend all this, because I had clearly jumped into the gate of rebirth, carrying the king of hell in my arms. I was supposed to be given a new life and opportunity. I was appalled by the realization that I had returned to the life in the tiny room, which I dreaded the most, and the morning after the day I left this wretched place as I found myself in the body of Lloyd Frontera, no less.

Come on. This is unfair.

I was sad and upset. I didn't know what I was so furious about, but I was.

Crush!

I inadvertently threw a punch at my own face in the reflection, cracking the mirror and leaving a scar on my own fist. But it did not hurt. I was too frustrated to feel the physical pain.

“Ha. Haha. Ha.”

There was nothing else I could do except laugh bitterly. I was way too devastated. It was too overwhelming.

***

I did not know how I spent my morning. I couldn’t process all this, save for the fact that I had definitely returned to the body of Suho Kim.

I picked up my cell phone as I lay down powerlessly and noticed three missed calls that came in the morning. I didn’t have to check to know who had called.

They were probably wondering if I wasn’t coming to work.

I then recalled the incident that transpired several years ago, and the construction site I used to work at until immediately before I found myself in Lloyd Frontera’s body. But that happened just yesterday in this timeline. I genuinely wondered if all that had just been an extremely long and realistic dream: from endeavoring to make it happen and toiling under the sun, to enjoying spending time with others and overcoming all those hardships in the Frontera Estate, the royal capital of Magenta, and in the continent of Lorasia.

Javier... and my queen.

I also remembered the count and the countess, as well as Julian, not to mention Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, Bibeong, and Ggoming. The faces of everyone with whom I came into contact while I spent time in the body of Lloyd Frontera came up in my head, as well as the memories of such. That was what made it even more devastating and agonizing.

I was overwhelmed with fear, but there was something I wanted to check. So I turned on the novel app on my phone and looked at the list of series I had read. I found The Knight of Blood and Iron and tapped it open, wondering if my life as Lloyd Frontera had been reflected in the story to change its contents. I hoped to see the traces of my endless efforts and the delightful yet arduous events I had experienced. I was scared but excited.

But that excitement turned to disappointment and fear of misery in no time.

There was none. I couldn't find a single trace of myself and what I had done in any part of the story. Lloyd Frontera died in the beginning, as well as the count and the countess. Javier left the estate and began his long journey to become the knight of blood and iron. The entire series was still about the epic story of this man. It was as if all I had done as Lloyd never transpired, or it was all just a dream.

No. No way.

I couldn't accept it. I put on the old parka jacket and left the tiny room and got on the subway, still in denial. Perhaps some were bothered by the presence of a man who seemed out of it, but I did not care. There was only one thing that I had in my mind.

Namsan.

I wondered if there would be traces of what I did there. There had to be.

Because I was there with Javier before.

Lloyd had gone there to find the last remaining key material required for the construction of Jewel of Truth. I recalled revisiting Seoul and hiking in Namsan, after being transported here through dragon king Verkis's dimensional drift spell. A part of the fence on which couples left locks to pray their love would last forever, was the material I was looking for. I had taken it back to the other realm.

There must be a trace. A new fence must have been installed to replace the missing one.

There had to be a part that was newer than others, with visibly less rust or blemishes.

That's all I gotta find.

Then I was going to know for sure I really visited this place with Javier, and that it wasn't a dream. That was the evidence that I had really experienced what I did.

Please.

Even if I couldn't go back to the Frontera Estate, I desperately wished for the events to have been real. Nothing was going to devastate me more than to find out that it was all just a dream.

Please.

I hiked in Namsan with desperation, passing by a crowd of people as I panted and panted. I finally got to Namsan Tower and checked out the fence, praying to find what I came looking for. But it wasn't there.

"...Huh?"

There was no such thing as an unrusted, or new fence. Each of the fences was just as old as the one next to it, still carrying the locks left by couples throughout the years. All I could see was the smiles on the faces of people as they giggled romantically.

There was no trace of my visit along with Javier. No evidence could prove that my memories from the past few years were real.

"...So it never happened."

There was no such thing from the start. It was all a dream: a realistically grand one, that made deceived me into believing it had been real. It was so sweet and gratifying that I had mistakenly thought it was true. That was it.

"Ha. Haha..."

I could only laugh bitterly in defeat. I walked powerlessly down the hill and passed through another crowd of happy people. Couples, friends, and family were giggling together in joy as I walked down the stairs all alone. I didn't know where I was going. I only walked restlessly and wandered, with the glimpse of hope I couldn't let go of, that Javier would start bantering with me. That the queen would smile at me and ask for a spar. I stopped walking and placed my hands in the inner pocket of my old parka jacket, but there was no Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, Bibeong, or Ggoming. I couldn't feel the presence of the skeleton corp or Draggy. I did not have the mana heart or the circle.

"Ha..."

The sudden, empty laughter by someone wandering like a madman was perhaps a strange sight for others. They gave me dirty stares, but it did not matter. I continued enduring the sharp, cold breeze that made me cough throughout the afternoon until I returned to my tiny room in the evening. My stupid, obnoxious stomach growled, without realizing it wasn't its place to butt in. That was when I realized this.

I didn't eat anything today.

I haven't drunk any water, either. I was starving. I checked my pockets and found two thousand won and spent 1,500 won to buy myself a roll of gimbap from the eatery on the first floor of the building. I was on my way up to the small room when a familiar, yet not very encouraging voice called out to me.

"Room 301."

The superintendent of the building was out in the hallway.

"Why did you break the mirror in the bathroom this morning? Others told me it was your doing," asked the superintendent with a frown on their face.

I did not reply. I only stared at the super blankly, until I was met with a sighing response.

"What the hell is up with you? Enough is enough. Isn't it about time you realized you can't cause inconveniences for others like this?"

"I'm sorry."

“Sorry isn’t going to cut it. You don’t live here alone. You should have reported right away if you broke the mirror. And when are you going to pay your rent for this month? It’s been past due for days. And you still had the money to buy yourself a meal?”

The superintendent tapped my bag of food twice and continued.

“While we’re at it, I know that bowls of rice and kimchi are complimentary with the rent here, but don’t you think you’re abusing our kindness when you’re not even paying your rent? How long do you plan to keep using the same excuse that you didn’t get paid on time?”

“...I’m so sorry.”

“You should be. Pay your rent, and I’m also going to bill you for the mirror repair cost. Have I made myself clear?”

“Yeah.”

I quickly moved away from the superintendent’s dirty look and got into my tiny room, which I could fill easily just by lying down on the floor. The moldy wallpapers welcomed me back in, as I let out a heavy sigh.

“Ha.”

I wasn’t even mad. I thought about arguing back, but I did not feel like it. I could only laugh bitterly like this and sigh. I took off the old parka jacket and sat on the bed, convincing myself that it was not a big deal. But I couldn’t. I didn’t understand why.

Gosh.

It was devastating. I couldn’t accept the fact that all this had just been an extremely realistic dream. It was so upsetting to acknowledge it. Everything I’d worked so hard for came crumbling down in an instant, and I didn’t have the desire or the strength to go on anymore. The fact that I had returned to the hopeless life of Suho Kim withering away in a tiny room full of mold slapped me across the face. It hurt. I was shedding tears without realizing it.

Knock. Knock.

Someone knocked on the door. I wondered if the super came back to bicker at me about the mirror again.

What this time?

I quickly wiped the tears off my face and tried to act nonchalant as best as I could. I strengthened my resolve not to show my weak side over and over again, as I slowly opened the door.

“...Huh?”

And he was there. The man that I missed so much, because of the realization I could never get to see him again, was standing right outside the door. He was looking straight at me through teary eyes, with a hint of joy on his face.

“...I missed you so much, Master Lloyd,” said Javier with a huge, tearful smile.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 402: Glorious and Gratifying (2)

“I really wanted to see you in those.”

“Did you really?”

“Yeah, however.”

“However?”

“You look even more terrible than I imagined.”

“Hey. What do you mean terrible?”

Javier’s cruel analysis of the state I was in irritated me. I questioned on what basis he would make such a claim, but the grandmaster’s response was even colder. He walked to the corner of the groom’s room and picked up the full body mirror and carried it this way. And I looked at the reflection of myself dressed in the white tuxedo with a bright smile on my face.

“See? I look just fine,” I fixed my posture in front of the mirror and looked back pompously. But Javier’s response was not positive.

“Whew. You certainly would have looked a lot better in your previous body.”

“...”

“And a lot more proportional.”

“...Dude.”

“And a lot less disturbing to look at.”

“Hey.”

“Yeah.”

“Let’s be real. Don’t I honestly look better than when I was in my previous body?”

“No. Never.”

“You’re just refusing to admit it. If you examine the features carefully--“

“I see the resemblances here and there, but you’ve definitely gotten uglier in detail,” said Javier in the coldest fashion yet with a serious look on his face. “To compare, your previous face was like a potato.”

“And what about now?”

“An identified object that resembles a potato.”

“You’re fired.”

“Seriously?”

“Of course.”

“For real?”

“Yeah.”

“Do you mean it?”

“Why do you keep asking the same question?”

“Jeez. I know I should never have brought you back from that tiny room of yours.”

“I chose to come back, dude.”

“...”

“Because you desperately begged for me to return, explaining how it was impossible to go on without me. The estate would be in shambles, the skeletal corp wouldn’t listen, and things would just be in horrific shape.

Master Lloyd, please come back and rectify things again! was what you said. Wasn't it?"

"Did somebody smack you hard in the back of the head?"

"No."

"Strange. You don't seem to have a fever either."

"I'm perfectly fine."

"Perhaps the anxiety and nervousness about the marriage has messed your rationale and memories up."

"I'm not that anxious or nervous."

"Except you've been sweating profusely for some time."

I became speechless because Javier was actually spot on. I plopped on the chair in the waiting room, letting out a sigh.

"Ugh. I really did not expect to be married off to Her Majesty without a chance to process anything, within two weeks after I returned."

I was being honest this time. I recalled the incident that transpired two weeks ago when I was crying all by myself behind closed doors while trying to munch on the only meal I had for the entire day, drowning slowly but surely in the bottomless lake of despair and hopelessness. That was when Javier appeared and stretched out his hand of salvation. He took me back to the Frontera Estate.

I did have my share of concerns about returning, however. It was the phenomenon of enforced destiny being restored. I was genuinely afraid of the curse that might haunt me again, but it did not take me long to shake these worries off.

Because Lloyd Frontera's body has gone through the gate of rebirth and is no more. Because I'm here as Suho Kim.

The tragic fate did not enforce itself on me again. The dreadful curse had been lifted finally.

Although I no longer have the mana heart or the circle since I am in my original body.

But I still had the RP, CP, title, and measurement and engineering skills with me, not to mention greater respect and love shown by everyone.

The first people that rushed to greet me back to the estate were...

“How goes the preparation, my son?”

“...Huh?”

The voice awoke me from the moment of reminiscing. When I looked, the count and the countess were inside the waiting room.

“Father?”

“Yeah. Your father is here. What were you daydreaming about?”

“Oh, it’s nothing.”

I felt the heat on my face from embarrassment, realizing I had just called the count “Father” inadvertently.

Ugh. This is awkward.

Immediately upon my return back to the estate two weeks ago, the count and the countess had given me the warmest hug ever. I’ve decided to call them my father and mother since then. They had told me that even though they discovered everything and found out that I wasn’t Lloyd, they did not care and were grateful that I helped the real Lloyd’s soul pass through the gate of rebirth. They appreciated all I had done for the estate and had already accepted me as their own child a while ago. They told me that while embracing my wet cheeks and drooping shoulders.

“I suppose I’m a little bit nervous because this all happened really fast before I had a chance to sit and process everything in my head.”

“But rest assured,” said the countess, my mother, as she tapped me on my shoulders and glanced at my father. “I felt the same way on the day of my wedding with this man. I was so nervous and out of it. Weren’t you as well?”

“Haha, was I? I think I was calm and poised if I remember correctly.”

“But you dropped the ring while you were putting it on my finger.”

“Oh. That.”

“And you almost put it on my toe instead because you were so nervous.”

Father was defeated, just like that. Mother put a smile on her face and spoke to me again.

“Anyway. You should feel a bit more at ease. Her Majesty is so gracious towards you.”

“That’s true. But I really did not expect her to hold the sword-fighting contest as she had said.”

Honestly speaking, it was a terrifying contest. The first thing my queen said the moment we reunited with one another two weeks ago was appalling and frightening enough.

You are terribly fragile, now that I think about it. How can you call yourself a man, if you get bullied and pushed around by the king of hell like that, before dying without much resistance?

That was what she stated, looking straight into my eyes.

This won’t do. The more I think about it, the more I realize I can’t leave a feeble man like you all alone. It’s about time I did something to find you a spouse that could protect you for the rest of your life, she had added.

I will thus hold a contest of might, in which all female citizens of my kingdom could participate. The mightiest female warrior in the kingdom staying by your side to keep you safe—that would put my mind at ease, so she had continued.

Of course I will compete myself as a contestant. And I will do my absolute best, she had reassured.

And the outcome was so obvious. It was so blatantly one-sided throughout the tournament. My queen defeated all challengers that came her way and declared the moment she seized the trophy, dragging me towards her. She proclaimed that no one who harms this man would be forgiven: that her blade of ire would execute the perpetrator immediately.

That was just yesterday.

"...Ugh. And the wedding, just the next day."

My queen was indeed a woman of zero patience. But I couldn't dare stop her from proceeding with it, because I feared I could actually be kidnapped and taken away to the royal capital.

"Her Majesty clearly favors you. You must accept her kindness with gratitude."

"Very well. It's not like I'm dissatisfied about it, anyways."

"Do you mean it?"

"Yeah, if I'm completely honest."

I smiled at my father. And it was true. The people I thought about the most were Javier and my queen, throughout the day on which I returned to the tiny, moldy room in Seoul and withered away in despair. Javier was like a brother to me, with whom I spent the most time, and I hadn't had a chance to share my true feelings for my queen.

I felt extremely sorry. I regretted. I had been drenched in sorrow.

That was why I was genuinely happy for today despite the nervousness and anxiety. The second phase of my life was going to be side-by-side with someone who could face a hell's knight and come up victorious, but I was truly excited. The blessings of the people I knew added to the joy.

Shriek! "My friend Lloyd is different! His eyes, nose, and mouth became weirdly handsome!" Shriek!

The entrance to the groom's waiting room became crowded. I noticed the orc Arosh waving at me with his canine teeth shining so brightly, and the elf chief Moira next to him delivering the polite greetings.

"Congratulations. I was a bit surprised by your new outward appearance, but you are who you are."

"...Well, thanks."

"Don't pay too much attention to your looks, because what really matters is the inside."

"Uh, okay."

"Besides, you are now blessed with a spouse that truly cares about your character instead of your looks."

I wanted to burst out in anger at the elf for speaking the harsh truth while sugarcoating it as words of encouragement, but I could only inadvertently shed tears.

"You look so funny in that outfit, big bro," said the familiar voice in a mischievous tone.

Julian was trying his absolute best to hold his laughter in. Next to him was Lady Scheherazade, who was clearly nearing her due. And that wasn't the end of the parade by visitors.

"...Mermaid?"

"Whoa. Look at all those muscles."

“Her abs are... perfect.”

The mermaid queen showed up amidst the praises of everyone in the vicinity, as well as the centauri chieftain grabbing people’s attention with his wild full-body tattoo and the clacking noises of the horseshoes. Angel of Thrones Raphael’s fiery ring blazed even more intensely, as the hell’s knight Sir Giolexius and the skeleton corp made creaking noises of their bones.

But not all visitors were here to congratulate me. Someone was making a challenging demand right on the spot.

“Alright, when are you going to set me up with a blind date as you promised?”

Solitas had found his way into the waiting room, passing through the crowd of visitors. The young red dragon was clearly agitated by the lack of fulfillment as he asked.

“You promised to set me up with a beautiful female dragon after the battle. Why are you getting married before me, when you were supposed to introduce someone to me first?”

“Ahahaha...”

I could only sweat nervously. I knew not what to say because I had actually lied about the blind date. It was a card I played out of desperation because the situation was extremely dire. I had been thinking of looking for someone after the grand battle against the king of hell.

“I really had no idea I was going to get married so quickly like this.”

“Having had no idea isn’t going to suffice.”

Solitas grumbled and I felt the sorrow of someone that stayed single for a thousand years in my bones. I was only saved by the intervention of an unlikely savior.

“Excuse me. Are you the human Lloyd Frontera, set to marry another human Alicia Termina Magentano?”

“...Huh?”

A young woman had silently approached me and asked me a peculiar question with a smile on her face.

“Are you the human Lloyd Frontera... I mean Suho Kim?”

“I am. Who might you be...?”

“Me?”

“Yeah.”

I couldn’t tell. I had never seen a young woman with wavy, pink hair that seemed to have just become an adult. The answer was even more unexpected.

“I came here because my brother sent me.”

“Your brother?”

“Dragon king Verkis.”

“Oh,” I got up from my chair immediately and prostrated to show respect. “Uhm... How should I address you, my lady?”

“Ggo... never mind. Call me Flores.”

“It’s a pleasure. But what brings you all the way here, by the way?”

“What else would I be here for? I’m here to congratulate you on your marriage. My brother supports you, so he was supposed to be here but... that lazy bum is taking a nap again. No wonder my sister-in-law always nags at him. So I came in his stead.”

“I-I see.”

“Here. A gift for you.”

“Huh?”

“Take it.”

Flores, the younger sister of dragon king Verkis, snapped her fingers at me.

“Long life without any illnesses.”

“...Huh?”

“You defeated the former king of hell, and the underworld voted in a new, more diligent, and competent ruler. So you kinda deserve a good reward for your deeds. Goodbye, then.”

Flores, the dragon king’s sister, chuckled and left for the garden outside of the waiting room. I caught a glimpse of five beasts that seemed to have accompanied her.

“Grr... Grrr!”

“Creak. Creak!”

“Cawww!!”

“Dadadak. Dadak.”

“Badumtss. Badumtss.”

Old manticore, living armor with a soul, gargoyle, flaming salamander, and a huge ice golem were engaged in a conversation with my summons.

“Ppodong! Ppodong!”

“Bangul! Bangul!”

“Hamang! Hamang!”

“Bibeong! Bibeong!”

“Ggoming! Ggoming!”

“Grr. Creak. Caw! Dadak! Badumtss!”

“Ppodong! Bangul! Hamang! Bibeong! Ggoming!”

“G! C! C! D! B!”

“P! B! H! B! G!”

The strange conversation between five monstrous beasts and special summons covered the entire wedding hall with noise, in the midst of which Flores disappeared without a trace.

“...Forget about the blind date,” said the red dragon Solitas, who had just been harassing me with the demand.

“Huh?”

“Issue settled,” said he, chasing after Flores with a blank look on his face.

I couldn’t believe how unfortunate the red dragon was, because he clearly seemed to have fallen for the younger sister of the dragon king.

...I wouldn’t go after that woman if I were you.

I could see a series of proper beatings by the dragon king, but that thought soon subsided. I had to care about my own safety.

“Why do you tremble like a leaf?”

“...Your Majesty?”

The only non-visitor in this establishment today was standing right in front of me, wearing a white bride’s dress with a mysterious smile on her face.

“Hmm. I think I get it. The marriage with me must have been so exciting and ecstatic for you.”

“O-of course it is. Except...”

“Except?”

“Aren’t we supposed to not see each other before the actual wedding ceremony?”

“We’re not?”

“Uh, yes, actually--“

“Because of the superstition that forbids the groom from seeing the bride in the wedding dress before the ceremony?”

“...”

“I knew it.”

“Your Majesty.”

“It’s really okay,” said my queen with a consoling smile on her face. “No superstition would get in the way today, because I decided so. Anyone that speaks of such nonsense today will be incarcerated.”

“...”

That is obviously an abuse of power, I thought to myself. But I did not have a chance to hint that it was kind of a tyrannous move.

“I gave it a lot of thought overnight.”

“Huh?”

“As to where we’re going to go for our honeymoon.”

“Well...”

“We should head south. I heard there was a gorgeous beach with beautiful sunshine in the region of Canaria.”

“I see.”

I actually loved the idea of spending some time in the warmth of the beach. My queen continued in an excited voice.

“I heard there’s a prestigious training arena by the beach. Many renowned warriors and knights supposedly spent time honing their skills there.”

“...Huh?”

“Training you there would make it a perfect honeymoon.”

“...Pardon?”

“You’ve lost both your mana heart and mana circle.”

“I did, but--“

“Then you gotta get them back.”

“Your Majesty?”

“I’m listening.”

“Why can’t you just protect me--“

“No.”

“Why not?”

“Because I can’t wait to cross blades with you in sparring matches.”

“...”

“I am overjoyed just at the thought of spending time wisely during our honeymoon. We’ll swing blades while enjoying the picturesque scenery of the beach and the sea, and you will struggle. It’s going to be absolutely beautiful.”

“Uh... So are you suggesting an endless session of sparring matches during the honeymoon?”

“Yeah.”

“...”

“For the entire day, from sunrise to sunset. Actually, even at night.”

“...”

“Is something wrong?”

“...”

Everything was wrong. There wasn’t anything right about the itinerary. But I couldn’t dare bring it up, because of the genuine smile on her face. I could only put up futile resistances.

“Uhm... but if you go too tough on me like that...”

“?”

“I might die, my queen.”

“It’s okay, because I will protect you.”

“...Ugh.”

I smiled but was crying on the inside. But my queen continued regardless.

“Anyhow. The time is drawing near, so I will be off to make some final preparations. Lloyd Frontera... I mean, Suho Kim.”

“...I’m at your service.”

“I ordered a nice, warm drink for you to calm your nerves with. Take a sip and be at ease. Understood?”

“As you wish, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm. You’re still calling me that.”

“...Huh?”

“You were addressing me differently before.”

“Well, there are too many people around us.”

“Then when we’re alone?”

“Yeah.”

“Good,” said she, as she stroked my cheeks and signaled with her eyes to meet again in a few moments. It did not take long for Javier to bring something on a plate.

“Master Lloyd. Your Majesty has sent you a drink.”

“...Yeah.”

I could see the steam from the cup of tea that was gently placed on the table. I chuckled without even realizing it. I couldn’t hold it in. I prayed and hoped to enjoy this much warmth and happiness for the rest of my life. I genuinely wished for everyone around me to be full of this much joy. I was confident that I could make it happen.

“Don’t you think?”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about, but congratulations nonetheless.”

“...Thanks.”

Javier had an unusually big smile on his face. I nodded towards my best man and picked up the cup of tea and took a warm, honeyed sip.

“It’s so sweet,” I inadvertently smiled out of genuine joy.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Side Story 1: Sir Javier Asrahan's Wish

"Haven't I made myself clear when I told you to bring that thing?!"

Crack!

The candlestick flew towards the elk antler trophy hung on the wall of the tavern. That wretched, hopeless punk and drunkard began throwing another tantrum as always. I was hoping to avoid it for once, but there it was.

How long do you plan to keep wasting away like that?

I breathed a heavy sigh. This was why I clearly told the punk not to drink alcohol today. I even explained how it was my wish to spend one day in peace.

To no avail.

To be fair, it was my fault for letting Lloyd Frontera step inside the tavern in the first place. I should not have trusted him when he said he was only going to get some dinner without any alcoholic beverage. It was only two hours ago when he argued like a stubborn child, saying I am only a personal bodyguard and should not prohibit him from eating.

I should have.

But I couldn't. That was my mistake.

Or perhaps accepting this order in the first place was a mistake.

I recalled when my liege Baron Frontera summoned me a few days ago. He had said he wanted me to escort his eldest son, with a worrisome look on his face. I had simply nodded and accepted since Baron Frontera was my lord and master, whom I was going to serve for the rest of my life. Because I admired and respected him as a person. However, his eldest son Lloyd Frontera was the complete opposite.

I don’t understand why he’s wasting his life away instead of trying to emulate his father.

Shot glass flew to my face this time while I was lost in thoughts. Of course, Lloyd Frontera had thrown it.

“Take a shot!”

It was extremely easy to catch the flying tankard. I could see and feel everything, including the flow of air, even with my eyes closed. The Swordmaster Syndrome, which amplified all sensations throughout my body, was bothering me twenty-four-seven already.

“Sir Javier Asrahan... Please...”

The master of the tavern looked at me desperately. His establishment was in a state of chaos with tables knocked over, chairs broken, and bottles and plates cracked. They were all Lloyd Frontera’s doing. And the punk was continuing to abuse his power by wrecking everything in sight.

I decided to finish the escorting duty for the day. I had to cross the line. I walked over to Lloyd Frontera and grabbed the drunkard who was about to break another bottle of mead by his hand.

“Master Lloyd. I think this is enough.”

“...What?”

“You’ve drunk a lot and caused enough of a scene.”

“Ha.”

“Master Lloyd.”

To be completely honest, I had the desire to smack him across the face. This drunkard was staring at me with without focus in his eyes, and faltering like someone that couldn’t even walk straight, not to mention the smell of alcohol each time he opened his lips. It was detestable and pitiful at the same time.

“Master Lloyd. You mustn’t do this. You must realize what kind of position you’re in and the responsibility,” I said, suppressing such thoughts in my head.

“Position? Responsibility?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“Ha. Give me a break,” replied Lloyd Frontera, as he stared at me through lightless eyes and tapped my chin with his finger. “Who do you think you are, huh?”

“...”

“You’re a bodyguard. Act like it.”

“Master Lloyd.”

“How dare you.”

“...”

“Dude. Don’t you think I have it rough?”

“...”

“Because I do. Why the hell did I have to be born to a countryside nobleman? Huh? I can’t go anywhere and act like one because I’m so freaking embarrassed. Don’t you think?”

“Not at all.”

“What?”

“You’re obviously taking it all for granted.”

“Ha. You little...”

Slap!

My face turned red from the slap. Of course I saw Lloyd Frontera's flying hand, but I did not dodge because it wouldn't even hurt. But perhaps my nonchalant response caused the pathetic man to flinch a little.

"...Well."

Lloyd Frontera behaved as if he hadn't expected me to get slapped in my face. But it didn't last long.

"Ugh. You're ruining the fun."

Gulp. Gulp. Gulp.

Lloyd Frontera chugged down the bottle of strong alcohol next to him. I could see that it was a brand with high alcohol content. I anxiously examined Lloyd Frontera's reaction and breathing pattern. And I waited. It finally paid off.

"...Ugh... Damn it... This is unfair. Ugh. I... hiccup! have so many... things... ugh... I want to do... but my house... is so impoverished. Hiccup! Ugh..."

Lloyd Frontera was visibly nearing his limit. His eyes completely lost focus, and he couldn't even move his body properly.

Finally.

That drunkard was severely drunk. He wasn't going to remember anything that transpired starting right now. I signaled to the master of the tavern.

You didn't see anything. Understood?

The master of the tavern, who was holding his prized, broken elk antler trophy in his arms, nodded. With the owner's approval, I began the work.

"Master Lloyd."

"...Huh?" He instinctively turned his head towards me. And I threw a punch to his stomach.

“Urgh!”

Lloyd Frontera’s body shook from the impact.

“Ugh. Agh.”

He held onto me with his arms for a short while, before drooping down to the floor, unconscious. The peaceful silence that ensued in the tavern was so refreshing.

Perhaps I should have resorted to this earlier.

Except I couldn’t bear the consequences of my actions, should this failure of a man remember the incident. That was why I waited until he nearly passed out, and that was why I only punched him in the stomach. This way, he wasn’t going to remember what I did to him tomorrow. The pain in his stomach was going to be covered up by the hangover. I picked the knocked-out man up on my shoulders and turned toward the master of the tavern as though he was a comrade-in-arms on the battlefield.

“Are you alright?”

“Whew. Not really.”

“...”

“First, my mother falls ill, and now this.”

The master of the tavern was about to burst into tears, and I could understand why. This establishment was one of very few decent businesses in the small countryside village. It was where hunters from other regions would stop by during the hunting season, and use it as a base so they could acquire some fur and hide from the eastern mountains. Lloyd Frontera had wrecked the business, and that was obviously a huge blow for the master of the tavern who was expecting to greet seasonal visitors.

“I... will speak to the baron about what happened today,” I apologetically replied.

“About the compensation...?”

“Yeah.”

“But the rumors I’ve been hearing suggest that even the baron has been struggling financially...”

“I will speak to him anyway. I don’t know if it would work, but...”

“Whew. I really appreciate your kindness, sir knight.”

“I appreciate your patience. Please accept my apologies for what happened today.”

I couldn’t dare look the master of the tavern in the eyes. I quickly scurried off with Lloyd Frontera on my shoulder. It was already past midnight, and the misty night sky welcomed me.

“Whew...”

I inadvertently breathed a heavy sigh. To be completely honest, I was lost.

I wonder what’s going to become of House Frontera.

I really had no idea. I couldn’t understand why and how the eldest son of the good baron was such a hopeless punk, and if he was going to succeed the baron. I didn’t want to accept it.

I wish Master Julian was the eldest.

Master Julian was hard-working, wise, kind, and had the potential to make an excellent lord of the estate.

But it is only a pipe dream.

I shook my head in disappointment. Master Julian couldn’t become the next baron, because he was the second son. He couldn’t inherit the estate. That was why he had gone to study abroad in the royal academia.

That leaves this drunkard as the only person who could inherit the house and the estate.

Things were absolutely hopeless. I couldn't fathom how much further this estate would decline and the downfall of this house, to which I had sworn fealty, when that day would come.

"Whew."

I breathed another heavy sigh, as I glared at the stars in the sky.

...Huh?

That was when I saw a shooting star that flashed intensely for a brief moment and disappeared. I was reminded of a sudden phrase I had heard in the past.

Wait. If I make a wish to the shooting star, it's supposed to come true.

It was a childish superstition. I knew it was only a myth. But I was driven by an unknown desire to count on that dumb saying, most likely because I did not see a way out of this tight spot. I gave myself a leeway from facing the harsh reality and glared at the sky, waiting for another shooting star.

Flash.

And it did. I quickly iterated my wish.

My wish is for the man I'm carrying...

Swoosh.

The shooting star is always too short for anyone to complete the wish. I couldn't finish my sentence either.

...to come to his senses and start behaving like a proper young lord.

The latter part of my wish was nothing more than a mumble, as the shooting star had already disappeared. I chuckled bitterly without realizing all this.

“What the hell am I thinking.”

I found myself ridiculous. I had just made a wish to the falling star, while carrying a hopeless drunkard on my shoulder at night. And I couldn’t even do it properly.

I should get back.

I picked up a little bit of speed, holding the pathetic feeling inside. Lloyd Frontera continued to mumble like the clueless punk he was.

“Ugh... I’m so sick and tired... of working every day... I hate... my tiny room...”

I couldn’t make sense of what the drunkard was saying.

“Tsk.”

I could never bring myself to have a good opinion about this man. I hurried and headed inside the mansion, before tossing Master Lloyd on the bed. I then sat down on one of the chairs in his room to spend the night. Of course, I couldn’t fall asleep because of the Swordmaster Syndrome.

“...”

The sound of the breeze against the window frames, the flapping of owl’s wings from the woods, the heartbeat, and every single sound that existed at the moment rattled my ears without giving me a moment of peace. The worst of them all was the sleep-talking noise of the drunkard, Lloyd Frontera.

“Manager...? I really need to get paid today. You can’t hold it off any longer.”

“...”

“But you clearly promised last week you were going to.”

“...”

“I’m going to get evicted if I don’t get paid today. I’m already so behind on my rent.”

“...”

“Please, manager! How is this a good thing, when I’m struggling to pay rent? I’m being serious!”

“...”

The strange murmuring by the drunkard was so clear, and it woke me up immediately. And I was just about to fall asleep, albeit lightly.

What the...

I wondered what kind of dream he was having for this hopeless punk to desperately plea with someone. But it continued even as I looked at him with curiosity.

“I’m so sorry, father and mother.”

“...”

“If only I had gone home early that day. If only I hadn’t taken that job.”

“...”

“Javier Asrahan...”

“Huh?”

“He was so cool when he took care of the Wall of Namaran. Ehehehehe.”

“...”

I couldn’t make sense of anything the drunkard said. It appeared that he was having ridiculous dreams due to the effects of alcohol. And I realized this.

Whew. There goes my chance to fall asleep, again.

It was all because of the Swordmaster Syndrome. I wondered just when I was going to overcome this, so I could get some much-needed sleep. I was getting sick and tired of getting a few minutes every now and again. I leaned on the back of the chair hopelessly and looked at the ceiling in the midst of darkness. Lloyd Frontera's strange sleep talk continued.

"I just... want an ordinary life. I hate this... I don't want this anymore... Living day to day sucks..."

"..."

"I want it easy. I want to live in the land flowing with milk and honey... Maybe I should go to the convenience store to get some honeyed water... But that's probably just sugar in reality... And it's expensive too... Screw that... I could get something to eat with that money... Ugh..."

"..."

"Honey..."

"..."

I plugged my ears with my fingers, but still couldn't stop the drunkard from murmuring. That was how I spent my night waiting for the morning to come, enduring Lloyd Frontera's meaningless murmuring throughout.

"Javier Asrahan... what a Chad."

"..."

I wondered if he was just talking crap about me. I couldn't tell anything, save for one.

That's still miles better than his usual sleep-talk.

Even the tone in which he spoke as he mumbled was more diplomatic than usual. That was enough for me. Although I had clearly failed to iterate my wish in whole to the shooting star, I decided to take this as a form of wish granted. That made me feel slightly better.

“Good night.”

I placed the blanket, which Lloyd Frontera had kicked away, over him in the hopes that he may be a slightly better person by the time the sun rose in the morning. I just wanted him to make the slightest progress towards being a decent human being come the sunshine. I knew it was a preposterous thought, but I needed the hope to go by.

And the miracle really did happen. Lloyd Frontera had become a new person.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Side Story 2: Your Workaholic Majesty (1)

“Your Majesty. So about the two months of staying together.”

“Yeah.”

“I am actually confused as to what this is.”

“This?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd was inside Queen Alicia’s study. He nodded as he stood in front of her desk, on which was a piece of document that particularly grabbed his attention. The queen lifted her eyebrow and nonchalantly responded.

“That’s the table showing my schedule for the day.”

“I am aware of that, Your Majesty.”

“What’s the problem, then?”

“I was wondering why there was not a single blank space in the schedule.”

“Because that’s how the chamberlain drafted it.”

“That isn’t my question, Your Majesty.”

“Then?”

“I was wondering why your schedule is so tight and does not allow you to take a single break in between, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm. That’s an unexpected question,” replied Queen Alicia, casually shrugging her shoulders as if she was stating the obvious. “Because I have that much work to do. That’s nothing out of the ordinary.”

“Then...”

“I do this on a daily basis.”

“Every single day, Your Majesty?”

“Yeah.”

“For the entire day?”

“Yeah.”

“What about holidays...?”

“What is a holiday?”

“...Ugh.”

Lloyd inadvertently teared up a little from the saddening morning conversation with the queen. He was getting the feeling that the two-month training while living together was going to be a disaster.

Crap. This is really bad.

Lloyd realized what situation he’d gotten himself into, and quickly summarized it.

I must remain calm. No need to panic just yet. Alright, so I need to figure out precisely what it is I need to do. I must stop the enforced restoration of fate and the event that could trigger it. My queen’s left arm is the trigger this time. She’s going to eventually lose her arm due to the unidentifiable paralysis, and become a tyrant in the end.

Lloyd had proposed two months of living and training together to prevent that.

I need to pass down the Asrahan Core Technique to her. As long as she masters it, her left arm is going to be cured and fate would not force itself.

The estate developer had to spend time and effort to persuade the queen, and the two-month training could barely begin. He was even able to overcome the anticipated opposition.

I proved that I was a swordmaster in front of nobles yesterday, and was acknowledged as a worthy sparring partner for the queen, who officially declared the two-month live-in training.

All that transpired yesterday, Lloyd had not had a shred of a doubt this plan was going to work until last night, thinking all he now needed to do was focus on the training. He had confidently incorporated his own ideas into the training curriculum.

Why is her schedule like this...? She's doing different things literally every ten minutes, from granting audience and taking reports to attending meetings, greeting guests, and throwing parties, only to repeat the same thing all over again. And this is supposed to be the daily schedule and not a monthly one?

The schedule was that tight. It was as if a college student was taking courses from morning to evening without taking a break, and then moving on to night classes too. Lloyd could only chuckle bitterly in disbelief.

"Your Majesty. Are you sure this is your schedule for the day...?"

"It is. I already told you."

My queen was serious. Had she been an ordinary citizen instead of a swordmaster, this was the schedule that could have caused her to die from overworking. And she was doing this daily.

This is bad. Really bad.

But that wasn't because he had to accompany her to every location, with his wrist tied to hers.

This won't do. The Asrahan Core Technique will not work if she spends every day like this.

It was just as Lloyd thought. The schedule was way too full. Even if the estate developer was going to accompany her everywhere and engrave the mana route in the meantime, the queen had to take time to focus on feeling, accepting, and embracing it. That was the objective. However, the tight schedule was going to defeat the purpose at this rate.

No. This really won't do.

Lloyd concluded and spoke to the queen again.

"Uhm... Your Majesty?"

"Speak."

"I don't think this would work."

"Why not?"

"Your schedule is way too tight."

"Even if you were to tag along and work on engraving the route the entire time?"

"I'm afraid so, Your Majesty."

This was why Lloyd enjoyed conversing with the queen; she would immediately identify what the problem is, even before the estate developer explained in detail, with her wits and wisdom. And Queen Alicia had done just that.

"Hmm. I think I understand the basis of your argument, Lloyd Frontera."

"Your grace knows no bounds, Your Majesty."

"...Except I haven't told you of my decision yet."

"Please forgive me, Your Majesty."

"Tsk."

"..."

“But I understand what it is you’re claiming. You’re trying to point out that the live-in training to cure my left arm must be prioritized over anything else. Correct?”

“That is correct, Your Majesty.”

“But I don’t think that would do.”

“...Huh?”

Lloyd was astonished by the response, as the queen spoke with a rough smile on her face.

“Even if the condition of my arm is of importance, this schedule was put together for the betterment of all citizens of the kingdom.”

The queen tapped on the schedule on the desk with her finger as she emphasized.

“The nobles and vassals that have shown fealty to the royal court, the residents of the royal capital, and every citizen that is born and raised within my territory are affected by what I do. Don’t you think?”

“However...”

“No. I will not hear of any counterarguments from you this time. The harder I work and the more tired I get, the more prosperous my kingdom and my people will become.”

“However...”

“Tsk. That is the weight of the responsibility on my shoulders and that of the crown on my head. Yet you ask me to postpone these. Do you think I can just accept that?”

“Your Majesty, just...”

“Just what?”

“Just two months. Can you delegate some of the work to competent vassals in your court?”

“No.”

“...”

“Not a chance.”

“...”

Lloyd couldn’t believe how adamant the queen was. It was frustrating to realize this.

God. I didn’t know she was a workaholic.

And a severe one at that. The queen wasn’t doing this for her success, renown, or wealth. She was actually on a mission to engage in selfless behaviors for the greater good of the community she was a part of. She was the most diligent and hard-working type of person.

Ugh. This is really bad.

Lloyd was getting the strong, unfortunate feeling that no persuasion attempt was going to succeed at this rate. But the queen continued to demand with a stern look on her face.

“Lloyd Frontera. Continue thinking and researching.”

“Huh?”

“Find ways to pass down the Asrahan Core Technique without interruption even while I carry out my duties.”

“...”

It was like asking the marathoner to play a flute while running, or asking a bungee jumper to eat a bowl of chicken noodle soup without spilling any.

This is beyond ridiculous.

Lloyd was stuck in a rut. He knew he needed something to rectify the situation. But the desperation he felt was unnoticed by the queen.

“Let’s get moving. Follow me.”

The queen got up and left the study, dragging Lloyd by the wrist. The immensely demanding daily schedule had just begun.

***

The day went by without a chance to catch my breath, and the night finally came.

“...Huff. Huff. Huff.”

“Are you alright?”

“...Huff. Huff. Huff.”

“Definitely not.”

“P-please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd panted like a dog. He was out of breath, and his stamina had completely depleted. He even felt nauseous.

“U-ugh.”

He plopped on the chair in the bedroom. It was a massively demanding and overwhelming day.

I had to accompany her to five meetings, as well as several audiences and greetings that I gave up on counting, not to mention two parties and several reports that came in. To top it off, an urgent meeting was summoned in the end.

All that had transpired in just one day. But a bigger surprise was still awaiting him.

“Tsk. You’re such a fragile individual. Don’t tell me you’re fatigued by this. It wasn’t even that busy.”

“...”

“And I do this daily.”

“...”

Lloyd drooped down. His entire body was melting. But the worries just kept getting greater and greater, as he glanced at the pile of documents on one side of the queen’s desk.

“Your Majesty.”

“Speak.”

“About those documents...”

“Good. You’ve done this before.”

“...Please spare me.”

“But I am not going to kill you.”

“But...”

“All you have to do is to put the seal on each of the documents.”

“Does it have to be me...?”

“That would please me.”

Lloyd thought the queen’s way of having fun was definitely evil. The estate developer desperately wished to shout it out, but the bright smile on the queen’s face caused this thought to subside.

“I will wash up and be back. Do change in the meantime.”

“...Yes, Your Majesty.”

The rope tying the two wrists together would be untied only a few times during the day, and this was one of those moments. Now was Lloyd’s chance to wash up and change into comfortable clothes. The estate developer quickly changed into clothes that the royal court had prepared for him and thought to himself.

This isn’t going to do.

Lloyd was serious. He wasn’t able to get much work done as far as passing down the technique was concerned, while simultaneously escorting the queen to the egregious schedule. Each time he tried to stretch the flow of mana onto her left arm, the busy schedule broke his concentration, as well as that of the queen, who was certainly at the heart of each event she was a part of.

This is defeating the purpose of live-in training.

Lloyd had to come up with a solution, and the only way he could think of was to somehow reduce the amount of work on the schedule. Lloyd finished changing and washed his face using the water in the golden washbasin that the maids had brought, touching every single thought and idea that came to his mind. He took those, placed them in his brain, and blended them. Numerous tactics, strategies, and schemes came together to shed light on the best possible solution. Lloyd quickly sifted out the improbable ideas and the ones that could cause the queen to slit his throat. He finally was left with the plan that could earn him a few smacks in the head, but still wouldn’t take his life.

Good. This should do.

Lloyd had only just decided, when the queen came back into the bedroom dressed in pajamas. Lloyd had never seen the queen like this. She was wearing pink, silk nightwear that kind of looked familiar.

Wait. That looks just like the one I’m wearing.

Lloyd was appalled to realize that his blue, silk nightwear was a part of the set with the one the queen was dressed in.

No. No. No. This can’t be a couple’s item.

Lloyd suspected the maids had made a serious administrative error in bringing this set of clothes. It was unfathomable to dress in matching outfits with the queen. He was afraid that he may be indicted for the contempt of the royal court. It was nerve-wracking. Lloyd had no choice but to anxiously glance at the queen.

“What’s wrong?” The queen asked.

“N-nothing, Your Majesty.”

“Is my nightwear strange?”

“N-no, Your Majesty.”

“But yours definitely is.”

“...Huh?”

“I would call it bizarre, actually. You seem puny and pathetic in those clothes. I really didn’t expect someone to look that terrible in those.”

Lloyd became speechless at the sudden, unexpected insult that came his way. He continued to move his fingers anxiously as the queen added.

“I should order the nightwear for honored guests of the royal court to be changed. I hadn’t paid much attention to it because I looked good in them. Tsk.”

Lloyd felt a little bit more at ease upon finding out the nightwear was specifically chosen for honored guests of the kingdom.

Phew. So the queen was just using one of those without giving it much thought.

In other words, it was by no means a couple's item. But Lloyd was relieved, yet a bit disappointed at the same time.

What the hell am I thinking?

He quickly shook off the strange thought and went back to the idea he had been conjuring.

Ugh. I don't see another way.

Lloyd had to reduce the amount of work the queen was doing daily, and the only way was to turn her into a lesser of a workaholic. The estate developer contained his desperate thoughts and spoke to the queen.

"Your Majesty."

"Speak."

"Your grace knows no bounds. There is something... I wanted to propose before putting seals on these documents."

"A proposal?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"What is it?"

"To be completely honest, I am actually extremely tired."

"And?"

"But it's not like I can go against your wish and fail to carry out the task."

"Okay?"

"So, it would be really nice if I could shake the fatigue off."

“Shake the fatigue off.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“A sparring match would be perfect, then.”

“N-no, Your Majesty.”

“Then?”

“I was wondering if we could place a bet for fun, Your Majesty.”

“A bet?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Then the winner of the bet would be getting some kind of a reward.”

“Precisely, Your Majesty.”

“You have my attention.”

“Your grace knows no bounds, Your Majesty.”

“What do you want for your reward for winning the bet, and what do you intend to do to shake off the fatigue?” Asked the queen with a subtle smile on her face.

Things looked positive. This was an opportunity. Lloyd promptly began explaining as though he was reeling in a prized fish from the river.

“Have you ever heard of the game of In Other’s Shoes, Your Majesty?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Side Story 3: Your Workaholic Majesty (2)

“Have you ever heard of the game of In Other’s Shoes, Your Majesty?”

Lloyd’s clear voice resounded off the wall of the bedroom, causing Queen Alicia to frown.

“In Other’s Shoes?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm. I can’t say I have.”

“I see.”

“What does the game In Other’s Shoes entail, that it will remove all fatigue from you?”

“It is a type of role-playing, Your Majesty.”

“Role-playing.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. To be precise, it is switching the roles between participants of the game.”

“Then...”

“Yes, Your Majesty. It is just as you predict.”

“So you’d dare suggest switching roles with me. What a preposterous thought.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd kept his eyes closed as he replied. Had this been an ordinary relationship between the liege and the vassal, it wouldn’t be strange for Lloyd to head to the execution block immediately. It was contempt of the royal court, and could even be seen as treachery. He wouldn’t have a chance to defend himself. However, Lloyd was confident.

Because I have the title Grace of Magentano, thought Lloyd as he recalled the title he had. Because I saved my queen’s life once, I get absolute trust from her, and the opinion or advice I give mostly is accepted. She wouldn’t ever suspect me of insurrection or treachery. This can work.

Lloyd thought while he could sustain a few punches to his throat, he wasn’t going to be executed for treason. That confidence paid off, as the familiar message popped up in front of him soon.

Ding-dong!

[Your desire has triggered a certain title you possess.]

[Title <Grace of Magentano> begins to influence Queen Alicia.]

“Phew... I can’t believe it.”

As soon as that message popped up, the queen put up an empty chuckle on her face. She then proceeded to criticize my audacity in an ironically gentle tone.

“Lloyd Frontera. What should I say? I’ve never seen anyone like you.”

“Y-your Majesty?”

“I mean it,” said the queen as she stared at me, with a look on her face that suggested she wanted to smack me in the head. “Switching roles with me. Who in his or her right mind would dare propose something like that? You may be the bravest man I’ve ever seen in my life.”

“Y-your grace knows no bounds.”

“It’s not a compliment.”

“P-please forgive me!”

“It’s not a threat, either.”

“Th-then?”

“You have piqued my curiosity. I accept your bet.”

“R-really, Your Majesty?”

“Do you think I would speak of anything without meaning it?”

“Of course not,” said Lloyd quickly, before the queen changed her mind. He had to take advantage of the momentum. “Then what reward would you demand for winning the bet, Your Majesty?”

“A nighttime duel against you.”

“...”

“A sparring match that is more fierce and competitive than ever.”

“...”

“We will start while it’s still dark, and battle against one another until the sunrise in the duel that feels like a real fight.”

“...”

Lloyd was absolutely determined to win this bet no matter what now. In fact, he was already shaking from his legs at the thought of the dreadful reward.

“You wish to switch roles for the reward, while I want a sparring match. What kind of bet are we going to place?”

“I have something in my mind.”

“Speak.”

“Rock-paper-scissors.”

“Hmm. Simple enough.”

“Your grace knows no bounds.”

Lloyd prostrated. Fortunately for him, the game of rock-paper-scissors was common in this universe as well.

“Just one round determines the winner.”

“I accept,” said the queen, as she rolled up the sleeve of her nightwear.

“Are you ready, Your Majesty?” Lloyd took a deep breath and asked.

“I am.”

“Then, rock, paper...”

“Scissors says...”

The two contestants of the bet shouted out simultaneously.

“Shoot!”

Whoosh!

The two extended their respective hands, focusing on that of the opponent the entire time.

Hmm. So you’re going to play... scissors, Lloyd Frontera.

Queen Alicia’s eyes glittered with spark. Being one of the greatest swordmasters in the entire continent, she used her amazing dynamic visual acuity to examine the movement of joints, muscles, and tendons within Lloyd’s hand in the blink of an eye. She was also agile enough to switch her hand in that short period.

I shall switch to rock, then.

The queen quickly clenched her fist, but saw another movement in Lloyd’s hand. He was now clearly trying to open the rest of the fingers.

As expected.

Although Lloyd was inferior to the queen in terms of might, he was still a swordmaster too. Having realized that her vassal had decent dynamic visual acuity, Queen Alicia gave it another twist.

Whish!

As soon as Queen Alicia opened her index and middle finger, Lloyd saw the movement and internally shouted.

Urgent Foresight!

Ding-dong!

[Skill Option 7: Urgent Foresight is activated.]

[Your body temperature increases by 2°F due to the effect of the relic Eye of the Summer.]

Whirr!

Lloyd’s mana heart was quickly operated thanks to the relic Eye of the Summer. Lloyd saw five seconds into the future and changed his hand according to what the future entailed, from paper to rock, and from rock to scissors.

Swoosh! Swoosh!

In the blink of an eye, Lloyd added so many fake movements of the fingers to confuse the queen. The two contestants finally played their respective hands.

“Mm...”

The queen inadvertently let out a strange noise through her beautiful lips, as Lloyd stared at her with pride in his eyes.

“You have played paper, and I’ve played scissors, Your Majesty.”

“Y-yeah.”

“So I win the bet, Your Majesty.”

“...You do.”

The queen seemed unhappy, but Lloyd couldn’t tell if it was because she lost the bet, or because she couldn’t engage him in the midnight sparring match. Lloyd nonchalantly shrugged his shoulders, while breathing a sigh of relief.

Thank goodness. Phew.

It was the first time Lloyd used this relic that allowed him to see five seconds into the future. He had always wondered about the extent of this item, but it was phenomenal.

It’s more than amazing.

Thanks to the effect of the relic, he was able to see through each hand the queen had in her mind. He had lured the queen with a decoy hand, and this tactic worked perfectly and brought him victory.

I could have used the Attack Design option, but that’s kinda obvious.

Forcing the queen to play a hand against her will was another option, but she was the mightiest swordmaster. There was a chance she could identify the strangeness in the air as she was forced to move in a certain way. That was why Lloyd had resorted to Urgent Foresight instead.

“Shall we begin playing In Other’s Shoes immediately, then?”

“Very well. Until when?” The queen asked.

“If you would, please take a look at the constellation up in the sky,” said Lloyd, pointing out the window.

“The constellation of Phenomenon?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd added. “The constellation of Phenomenon only shows itself for fifteen minutes along the horizon around midnight during this season. And since that is up...”

“You wish to play In Other’s Shoes for fifteen minutes until it disappears.”

“That is correct, Your Majesty. It begins now.”

“Huh?”

Lloyd’s attitude and behavior completely flipped 180 degrees, before Queen Alicia could process her defeat.

“Alicia Termina Magentano.”

“...What?”

“What? Do you not understand what is going on?”

“...”

“What are we doing? We are playing the sacred game of In Other’s Shoes.”

“...”

“How come you aren’t paying me proper respect that you’re required to by law?”

“...Uh, well...”

“Well?”

“Please... forgive me.”

Queen Alicia’s face turned red. She had never even imagined in her wildest dreams she would do something like this. In fact, even when Lloyd had made this proposal, she thought it was a mischievous joke.

Ugh.

But there she was, prostrating before Lloyd Frontera to pay him respect.

Thank goodness I ordered the royal guards to stay as far away from the bedroom as possible.

The queen had given this command because she thought two swordmasters wouldn’t need any bodyguards, and for privacy reasons as well. She was glad to have done so because things could have gotten out of control had the royal guards overheard this conversation. Lloyd’s demonstration of the merciless manner of speech continued.

“Ahem. Forgive you for what?”

“Well...”

“I’m listening.”

“I am not sure,” said the queen. She genuinely knew not why she was replying to Lloyd like this, nor why and how it came to this. It was perplexing and puzzling to put it lightly.

But Lloyd Frontera had a hugely satisfactory smile on his face, as though he was enjoying every second of fifteen minutes.

“Tsk. Not knowing it isn’t going to suffice.”

“...”

“Alicia Termina Magentano.”

“Speak... I mean, I am at your service.”

“Do you enjoy working that much?”

“Huh?”

“I asked if you loved work that much.”

“...Right,” said Queen Alicia, containing the eagerness to slap Lloyd across the face. “I do.”

“You do. How much?”

“Very much.”

“More so than you love yourself?”

“...Huh?”

Confused by the question, Queen Alicia lifted her chin and looked Lloyd in the eyes, realizing he was actually serious.

That look.

It was strange. First, he had proposed the game of In Other’s Shoes, then he began displaying his audacity to act as the king talking to his subject and now was asking a peculiar question with a look of seriousness on his face.

“...”

Queen Alicia couldn’t make sense of the feeling that she was getting and answered honestly.

“Of course, I love the work more than myself--“

“That’s not good.”

“Huh?”

“Because I don’t feel the same way.”

“...”

“I like you more than the work itself.”

“...Huh?”

“Running the kingdom is obviously of huge importance, but it’s still not worthy compared to you as an individual. Oh, and please don’t get me wrong. I’m talking about your presence, position, and role within the kingdom when I say they’re far more valuable.”

“...”

“You are the queen of the kingdom, and I do understand the responsibility and duty the ruler has. However, all that is based on the premise that you retain your health.”

“Well...”

“What if you continue overworking yourself and lose your arm? What if your health declines? What if that prohibits you from continuing to work diligently?”

“...”

“Wouldn’t that make you an irresponsible ruler of the kingdom?”

“...”

“It is. Your constant refusal to listen to my request to take some off your plate so we could focus on our training, in reality, is an act of neglecting your duty to keep yourself healthy so you can rule over the kingdom wisely.”

“Uhm...”

“Speak.”

“Was this the reason you suggested In Other’s Shoes?”

“Of course it was,” said Lloyd nonchalantly, appalling Queen Alicia in the process. “Why else would I have suggested this? Would you have listened to me otherwise?”

“But...”

“I pleaded with you this morning, but you did not listen at all. You simply told me to find an alternative way to make it work, because your daily duties were of more importance.”

“...”

“So I had to resort to playing In Other’s Shoes. That was the only way to make you listen to me. You are more important than the work you must do on a daily basis. Your presence is way more crucial. Your health is far more urgent. You weren’t going to listen, however.”

“...”

“That’s why I tell you this. Please, please follow my advice and let your competent vassals in the court take care of the duties for just two months, and focus on your health for once.”

“But two months of my absence would...”

“It would give rise to certain problems, without a doubt. I am aware of that. However, it would stop at that, and that could certainly be rectified once this is all over. On the other hand, should you lose your left arm to paralysis, it’ll all be over. Your arm will cross the point of no return. Would you be happy with that?”

“...”

“Because I wouldn’t.”

“...”

“Nothing would sadden me more, as a matter of fact.”

“...”

Queen Alicia felt strange. The look in Lloyd’s eyes was earnest, and that was what made it even more perplexing.

“Hmm. I understand how you were genuinely feeling,” replied the queen, with an earnestness of her own.

“...What?”

“I think I get what you’re trying to say, Lloyd Frontera. Now, you may look out the window.”

“Huh?”

Lloyd turned around and noticed that the constellation of Phenomenon was no longer up in the sky. The queen’s satisfactory voice graced his ears immediately.

“In Other’s Shoes is over.”

Already?!

Lloyd couldn’t believe how short the fifteen-minute period was when he still had a lot to say to her. It made him feel anxious.

I wonder if she really understood what I meant.

Lloyd had shared his honest feelings about all this, using the game as an excuse. But there was no guarantee the receiver would have understood it the way he meant it.

Please...

He desperately hoped the queen would understand, and postpone her governmental duties to focus on the training for the next two months. He slightly glanced at the queen with anticipation, waiting for her response.

“Fine, Lloyd Frontera.”

“Huh?”

“I want you to lie down on the floor, face down.”

“Huh??”

“Place your hands on the floor, face down. Did you not hear me?”

“Huh?!”

“...”

“As you wish, Your Majesty.”

He quickly got down on the ground face-down, hearing the footsteps of approaching disaster. The queen sat on Lloyd’s back.

Plop!

“...Urgh?”

“Are you having difficulty enduring my weight?”

“N-not at all, Your Majesty.”

Of course he didn’t because Lloyd was a swordmaster himself. It wasn’t physically demanding on his body to hold the queen on his back while standing on four limbs, facing down. But the element of mischievous joy in the queen’s voice became greater and greater.

“I understand how you feel. I must say I appreciate the thought.”

“Your grace knows... no bounds.”

“Really? Then begin doing push-ups.”

“Huh?”

“I would like to suggest a bet as well.”

“A bet...?”

“It was you who said you care more about me than my duties and responsibilities. So I wanted to verify the integrity of your words.”

“...”

“I want to see if you can do push-ups to prove that you can withstand the weight of someone you care about.”

“H-how many?”

“Until the sunrise.”

“...Huh?”

“Continuously, until the morning.”

“...”

“Do you object?”

“W-well...”

“Speak.”

“If I succeed in doing push-ups non-stop until sunrise with you on my back, is there going to be a reward, Your Majesty?”

“Of course there is.”

“What would that be?”

“I would consider listening to and following your advice with an open heart for the next two months.”

“During the live-in training?”

“Yeah.”

“...”

“But you still haven’t begun.”

“...One million and one! One million and two!”

“Tsk. Start from the beginning.”

“...One! Two!”

Lloyd began doing wholehearted push-ups, which he didn’t even know when it was going to end. Shreds of doubt also filled up his head in the meantime.

Wait. I think verifying my integrity is all an excuse.

Lloyd was convinced that the queen was simply paying back for the insolence he had displayed during the game In Other’s Shoes. But it wasn’t like he could object.

Ugh...!

Lloyd’s eyes turned red as he continued pushing his body up and down throughout the night until the sun rose. He felt soreness all over his chest, shoulders, and arms while enduring the weight on his back. The estate developer, of course, internally grumbled the entire time.

Ugh. Huff. I don’t know... who it’s going to be... but whoever marries her in the future... Well, buddy... good luck, because you’re going to need it.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Side Story 4: Eight Years Later (1)

Poor Master Lloyd, thought the silver-haired knight Javier, satisfactorily chuckling to himself. He's going to be the weakest link in the family at this rate.

He wasn't wrong. The scoundrel of a lord he served, whose body had been taken over by Suho Kim from another dimension, was once a swordmaster. That was Duke Lloyd Frontera, prince consort of the kingdom. He had even once led the attack on the underworld, eventually losing his physical body in the final battle against the king of hell before returning to the original body of Suho Kim in Seoul, Republic of Korea. He lost the mana heart and circle he had worked so hard to obtain, in the process.

I thought he was going to get them back easily, but...

Javier had expected his master to pick them back up without a problem, but he was wrong.

I had no idea how stagnant his progress would be.

In fact, those who had once made immense accomplishments found it easy to climb back to the top after years of hiatus relatively easily. However, the Lloyd who had returned in Suho Kim's body was different.

It's as if he had stolen everyone else's incompetence and kept it for himself.

Regardless of how rigorous he trained under the instruction of Queen Alicia, Lloyd had failed to make any significant progress. It's been eight years since his return, but he was still a low-grade sword expert.

I remember he said he'd saved some RP for the moment when he would suffer from the Swordmaster Syndrome.

Javier wondered what RP even stood for. Lloyd was still the same mysterious guy as he always had been.

“Unco Javia!”

A bubbly voice full of sincere delight graced his ears and woke him up from reminiscing. Javier lifted his head extremely slightly to greet the small girl who had already approached him.

“Unco Javia! I just did whoosh-whoosh! Did you see?”

“I certainly did. That was amazing, Your Royal Highness,” replied Javier, as he carefully and gently stroked the child’s hair with his rough hand, causing her to put a huge, satisfactory smile on her face.

“Ehehe! He said amazing!”

The child ran back the way she came like a golden retriever on the loose and began playing with the wooden training sword by the arena with the clear excitement still lingering on her face. Her movement was impressive, to say the least. In fact, it was astounding for a six-year-old girl, who was just about to turn seven in a few days of time. She was already on the verge of making the breakthrough into a low-tier sword expert.

Such an amazing talent.

Charlotte Frontera Magentano, the royal princess, most definitely took after her mother. She was already showing immense talent in sword-fighting. Javier, the swordsmanship instructor of the princess, suspected she would surpass her own father in three years at this rate.

Thank goodness she didn’t take after Master Lloyd.

She did exhibit certain sides from time to time that made Javier wonder if she had gotten it from her father Lloyd, though. Right now was such a moment.

“But unco.”

“I’m listening, Your Highness.”

“You promised. You have to keep your promise.”

Charlotte had finished her sword-play and asked Javier again. The grandmaster confusedly asked.

“Promise? I’m not sure I follow.”

“You said you were going to give me a present if I did whoosh-whoosh.”

“...Please don’t tell me...”

“You did.”

“No, no. I’m not denying the fact I made the promise.”

“Then?”

“I just couldn’t believe that you still remember the promise, Your Highness.”

“I did!” Charlotte robustly nodded her small head. “You showed me this when I was three. You said if I do this whoosh-whoosh, you were going to give me a present.”

“...”

“And I just did whoosh-whoosh.”

“...”

“But you tried to get away with just amazing.”

“...”

Javier wondered if the royal princess had asked for the compliment in order to see if he still remembered the promise he had made a long time ago.

“...”

It sent minor chills down his spine. Every time she showed this side of herself, Javier saw Lloyd in her. In fact, she did not care one bit about the things that did not concern her but was extremely meticulous and persistent when it was related to her gain. She did not wish to compromise one bit, down to every penny. She was the little Lloyd back when Javier tagged along to the adventures he had gone on.

Whew.

Princess Charlotte had gotten the incredible physical talent from her highly prolific swordmaster mother, and the wits from the world's cheapest father. Javier wondered just how deadly she was going to grow into, yet suppressed the feeling with a smile on the surface. He then crouched down to make eye contact with the princess and beamed the way he would never in front of anyone else.

"Please forgive me, Your Royal Highness. I really did not expect you to still remember the promise."

"It's okay, Unco Javia. It's not your fault."

"What do you mean?"

"Papa said nobody remembers the promise to give something without a written contract."

"..."

"So the person that is receiving something has to remember it."

"..."

"He said I have to think about everything I need to receive before the bedtime story every night."

"H-he did?"

"Yeah!"

"...Alright. I will give you a present as I promised."

“Really?!”

“Of course. What kind of present do you want, Your Royal Highness?”

Javier responded with a genuine smile, expecting some kind of a cute answer from the smart and talented trainee. He was ready to give candy, a new dress or shoes, or even a new training sword.

Anything.

Javier was determined to get her anything in his power.

“Special summon.”

“Huh?”

“I want a summoned creature,” said Charlotte, in a clear and eloquent manner. “Unco Ppodo is chubby, cushiony, and soft. Aunt Bangul is gentle and kind. Unco Hama is funny. Unco Bibo is fat and I like playing on his belly. Unco Ggomi is fun to ride on. But they only listen to Papa.”

“So you want your own special summon?”

“Yeah! I want a creature of my own!”

“Your Royal Highness.”

“Yeah.”

“Please forgive me. That isn’t something I can do.”

“Why not?”

“Because I don’t know how and where to get a special summon,” replied Javier, with a genuinely sorry smile on his face. He cautiously added so as to avoid disappointing the child. “Sir Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Ggoming were all summoned by the duke, with the exception of Sir Bibeong who was most likely summoned by somebody else in the past. Unfortunately, I don’t know how to summon creatures like that.”

“...Aww...”

“Please forgive me. Hmm. What if we were to try this instead?”

“Huh?”

Light returned to the eyes of the child that was about to be disappointed. Javier responded with a smile on his face.

“It will be your seventh birthday, three days later.”

“And?”

“Why don’t you ask the duke for it for your birthday present?”

“Papa? For a summoned creature?”

“Yeah. I’m sure he’ll be happy too, and he definitely knows how.”

Javier was pretty positive Lloyd would go so far as to summon a special creature for his daughter as her birthday gift, although he may draft an agreement with his daughter who was going to turn seven in a few days.

Master Lloyd would never give anything away for free, especially a summoned creature, even if it was for his daughter’s birthday.

Javier suspected Lloyd would demand something like a 20% cut in allowance, or a kiss on his cheeks on a daily basis.

He definitely would.

But the little kid standing in front of him was no pushover in negotiations like this. She was the daughter of one-and-only, world’s cheapest Lloyd. Javier had expected amazing business dealing skills to be put on display, and he was spot on.

“Papa!”

An hour passed, and Lloyd visited the training arena just when the session was about to be over. Princess Charlotte giggled and ran straight to her father’s arms.

“I did whoosh-whoosh today!”

“Haha. Really?”

“Yeah! But Unco Javia didn’t give me a present!”

“Hahaha. Really?”

“Yeah! But Unco Javia said you’re going to give me a present instead!”

“Ahahaha... Really.”

Glare! Lloyd immediately gave Javier a dirty look, but the grandmaster only nonchalantly shrugged his shoulders as he watched the tension rise between the father and the daughter.

“Papa. It’s gonna be my birthday soon.”

“Yeah, it is.”

“Birthday present.”

“What kind?”

“Special summon.”

“But that’s going to be really expensive.”

“How much?”

“More expensive than him,” replied Lloyd, pointing his finger at Javier. The grandmaster was clearly annoyed, but Lloyd continued casually. “Just kidding. But those things cost a lot. Is that going to be alright?”

“It’s okay. How much?”

“Hmm. Six hundred kisses on Daddy’s cheek?”

“Can I pay in installments?”

“No. Only a one-time payment would suffice.”

“That’s gonna be bad. My lips are gonna pop.”

“Uh-oh. That’s not good. Then do you want an installment?”

“Yeah!”

“As long as possible?”

“Yeah!”

“Then I will make it a six-hundred-day installment. You give me one kiss on Daddy’s cheek per day.”

“Okay!”

“But you know installments come with interests, right?”

“How much?”

“Hmm. I will be lenient on you. 10 percent interest, so that will be 60 extra kisses.”

“...That’s too much.”

“You don’t have to take the offer if you don’t like it.”

“Uh, I don’t…don’t like it.”

“Then?”

“Your beard hurts if you don’t shave, papa.”

“So you want Daddy to shave every single day?”

“Yeah.”

“Haha. Okay, then it is decided.”

“Decided!”

“Okay, what do we need to do once something is decided?”

“Contract!”

“Good. That’s my daughter.”

Javier chuckled at the sight of father and daughter nonchalantly drafting and signing a contract in the spot, as he approached the duke.

“Master Lloyd. Are you sure about this?”

“Well, I guess it’ll be alright if she likes the creature that I summon.”

“I’m sure. If you would allow, I would like to wrap up today’s lesson.”

“Right. I will see you later.”

“Be safe.”

Lloyd left the training arena as Javier and Charlotte waved, and clenched his fist in excitement.

...Nice.

He had just won 660 kisses on his cheek from his daughter. That was two years’ worth of supply.

And it was getting tougher to get kisses from her as of late. Thank goodness.

Lloyd lightheartedly headed back, with one of his biggest concerns taken care of, with the intent to draw out the summon while he was at it since there was time.

And since even I don’t know what kind of special creature would be summoned. Should I do the premium draw, with cute-looking as one of the requirements? I should, since I have more than enough RP anyway.

Lloyd still had RP with him even after returning to Seoul after the battle against the king of hell eight years ago. Because he couldn’t really expend them, he had accumulated 27,595 RP by now.

I saved this up so I could instantly make the breakthrough to swordmaster after reaching the high-tier sword expert level. But I don’t think I could make it that far at this rate.

He had saved this up just in case, but there was no reason for him to pick up his shovel or sword in battles anymore. The lack of strife and life-threatening events prevented him from making progress, but it didn’t really matter.

My wife keeps me safe anyway.

The queen was the strongest swordmaster in the entire continent, second only to Javier. Since there was no particular reason to be stingy here, Lloyd decided to expend the RP and summon an awesome creature to satiate his daughter’s desire. He went into the cozy living chamber reserved for himself and the queen alone and took a deep breath before summoning the system window.

[Premium Random Draw]

[Drastically increase the likelihood of drawing the special creature the summoner wishes to summon, by spending a little more RP than usual.]

[Conditional Random Draw (2) = 1,200 RP]

[Current RP: 27,595]

[Would you like to perform a Conditional Random Draw?]

[YES / NO]

Yes, obviously.

Lloyd quickly selected YES, only to be met with an unexpected surprise.

Ding-dong!

[Your Random Draw attempt failed.]

What?

It was absolutely astonishing.

[A special summon is meant to be accompanied by you, and you alone. However, you have just attempted to summon a creature with the intent to transfer the ownership to someone else, defeating the fundamental purpose of this random draw. Therefore, your attempt has failed.]

What.

Lloyd was flabbergasted as he asked the system.

Ugh, but I'm trying to summon a creature to keep my daughter company. I can't even do that?

[No.]

The system replied adamantly.

Ugh.

Lloyd had no choice here. He couldn't override what the system had decided not to allow. No wit or clever tactic would suffice here, and Lloyd knew this from experience.

I must accept it. What a bummer.

It seemed that he had rejoiced about the deal to get a good amount of kisses from his daughter for nothing. He had to terminate the contract.

Tsk. I don't know how I'm going to explain this to her without hurting her feelings. And I wonder what she's going to demand as compensation for the breach.

Lloyd picked up some speed, as he thought the sooner he informed the other party, the less his daughter was going to be disappointed. To his relief, Javier and his daughter were still at the training arena, trying to wrap up today's session. Lloyd put on an honest, apologetic face and approached Charlotte.

"Uhm. My daughter?"

"Yes, Papa!"

"I am so sorry to tell you this, but about the contract."

"Huh?"

"I don't think it will be possible."

"What?"

"The special summon said it can't come by your birthday."

"Whaaaaat?"

"It can only come way later."

"..."

The young girl clearly became sulky, and Lloyd was flustered.

"So... I'm afraid I'm going to have to get you something else for your birthday. But Daddy will get you something way cuter and nicer."

"..."

The girl's eyes became teary. This was a state of emergency for Lloyd.

“Uh, Charlotte? Well, daddy will...”

Lloyd had to try his best to calm his daughter down for the entire evening. He was clearly having a tough time and had to endure the uneasy feeling. And he was still unable to.

Ugh. I guess I’ll have to try again tomorrow.

Lloyd strengthened his resolve to successfully calm his daughter down the next morning before he went to bed next to his wife. He was willing to take her on a picnic to the outskirts of the royal capital in a nice carriage.

He had no idea that his six-year-old girl was starting to make use of the innate ability she was born with, even without realizing, that very moment.

Ding-dong!

[Random Draw]

[You may summon a special creature by spending RP.]

[The special summon will offer the summoner unconditional loyalty alongside various special abilities and services.]

[1 Draw = 50 RP]

Charlotte Frontera Magentano, the little royal princess who had woken up from her sleep to use the toilet, began seeing the system message windows in front of her as though it was fated.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Side Story 5: Eight Years Later (2)

“Huh...?”

The six-year-old royal princess Charlotte Frontera Magentano confusedly stared into the air, still half-asleep. At the receiving end of her gaze was the system message window.

“Random... Creature... Summon...?”

She had never seen this before. But ever since she was just a baby, she would see strange texts and hear unexpected voices telling her she had won someone’s favor and some RP as rewards. The royal princess hadn’t paid much attention to this, because the world was full of other interesting things to engage in, and because others were probably going through the same thing. In her mind, this was completely normal.

“...Creature?”

But it felt different this time. Charlotte quickly woke up from the slumber and examined the message again, as though she had forgotten about using the toilet.

[Would you like to perform a Conditional Random Draw?]

[YES / NO]

The child selected yes without even realizing it. She couldn’t care less about anything else such as how much RP she had accumulated thus far, and how much it cost to perform the random draw. Nothing else mattered to her at the moment save the result that followed.

Ding-dong!

[Performing Random Special Creature Draw.]

The royal princess spent 500 RP. A small something transpired five steps in front of the little girl, on the floor of the bedroom.

Flash...

Pale light graced the luxurious rug, and it soon formed complex shapes to turn into a magical seal emanating mysterious glitters.

Wh-whoa...

Charlotte’s small jaw dropped from the phenomenon. She knew not what was going on, but her little heart was beating fast with excitement.

Bzzt! The magical seal sparked, and something ascended from the floor. It flew towards the princess straight into her arms.

“Roo-roo!”

“...Whoa!”

Small, round butt, relatively large hind legs, smaller forelegs and paws, chubby tail, huge pupils, and round face, not to mention an adorable pouch by the belly. It was clear.

“A baby kangaroo?”

“Roo-roo!”

“Really? That’s what you are?”

“Roo-roo! Roo-roo!”

“You’re happy to be summoned for the first time?”

“Roo-roo!”

“I’m so glad to meet you as well!”

The small, cute baby kangaroo looked up at the princess from her arms. Charlotte quickly fell in love with the special creature and was overjoyed at the feeling of accomplishment. She had successfully summoned a creature of her own just like Papa had. This was her first special creature friend.

“Hehehehe. Hahahaha.”

Charlotte jumped for joy in the spot with the baby kangaroo Roong still in her arms, who responded with a smile of its own. The royal princess glanced at Roong again and asked.

“Uhm.”

“Roo-roo?”

“What about your mommy?”

“Roo-roo!”

“You don’t have a mommy?”

“Roo-roo!”

“Don’t you miss her?”

“Roo-roo!”

“I’m your mommy and family now?”

“Roo!”

Roong nodded robustly, before taking something out of the pouch.

“Roo-roo!”

“...Huh?”

Roong was holding a small piece of paper folded multiple times.

“Is this for me?” The royal princess asked.

“Roo-roo!”

“You want me to open it?”

“Roo!”

“...Okay.”

Charlotte took the paper and unfolded it. Fortunately for her, early education in the royal capital had made her literate at a young age.

“Hmm. So this is the instruction on how to utilize you, Roong?”

“Roo-roo!” Replied Roong with glitters in its eyes. Charlotte quickly read the instructions.

[Roong Instruction Manual]

[Roong is an adorable kangaroo that needs your love and care.]

[Roong will remain absolutely loyal to the summoner. A special creature summoned this way is a life companion and family; please do NOT ever abandon the summon.]

[Roong can change its size by consuming the two types of sunflower seeds that are complimentary to the manual.]

[Red Sunflower Seed: It will turn Roong into a giant state. Giant form duration: 12 hours]

[Blue Sunflower Seed: It will shrink Roong back to its original size if consumed before the 12-hour duration expires. Roong will return to normal without consuming the seed after 12 hours pass, but will enter a state of fatigue and growth will be unavailable for the next 24 hours.]

[It costs 1 RP to purchase a set of 2-color Sunflower Seeds.]

[Roong offers a variety of skills while in giant mode.]

[Roong’s Skills]

[Big Jump (Lv. 1)]

[Power Hug (Lv. 1)]

[Drop Kick (Lv. 1)]

[Recovery Pouch (Lv. 1)]

Whoa...

Charlotte was genuinely astounded. She still didn’t understand what skills meant, but it certainly looked so cool.

What about this?

The child opened the small pack that came with the manual, in which were ten red and ten blue sunflower seeds. The color and shapes of the seeds were so fascinating, that she inadvertently grabbed some.

“Nom. Ugh. Ptoo.”

But it did not taste great. Charlotte wiped her lips and stared at Roong.

“Roong.”

“Roo-roo?”

“Do you really become big if you eat this?”

“Roo-roo!”

“Really? How big?”

“Roo-roo!”

“That big?!”

“Roo!”

Roong proudly stretched out its small arms.

“Whoa.”

Charlotte wondered just how big was that big.

As big as Unco Ppodo?

Full of curiosity and anticipation, the little princess picked up a red sunflower seed.

“Roong. Can you eat it?”

“Roo-roo!”

“You want me to step back?”

“Roo-roo!”

“How many steps?”

“Roo-roo!”

“All the way there?”

“Roo!”

Charlotte quickly scurried off to the spot Roong pointed at, after handing over the sunflower seed to the small beast. She then watched ecstatically from the side, as the kangaroo consumed the red seed.

“Roo!” Nom.

And... the result was phenomenal. Roong now stood nearly fourty feet tall.

Wh-whoa!

The floor crumbled from the weight of the enlarged creature, and the bedroom broke apart upon contact with the expanded butt. The head and shoulders of the summon also broke through the ceiling, and the furniture and fixtures in the process.

Crumble! Rumble! Crush!

The prestigious table passed down to all royal princesses of the kingdom shattered, not to mention the rocking chair, a cushiony sofa that served as the trampoline, the containers holding drawing and painting tools, silver candlesticks, and chandeliers. The bedroom of the royal princess had turned into an absolute shipwreck, but Charlotte hadn't sustained any injuries thanks to Roong's timely intervention with her enlarged hands.

"Whoa! Amazing!"

Charlotte's eyes sparkled with excitement. She was now holding a blue sunflower seed in her hand.

"This, too, then!"

"Roo-roo!"

The fourty-foot tall, muscular kangaroo opened its mouth, and Charlotte threw the seed into it.

"Roo-roo!" Nom.

And the result was instant.

Poof!

Roong was a small, baby kangaroo again, as if it hadn't turned into a giant. Charlotte became ecstatic. She couldn't care less about the wrecked furniture in her bedroom.

"Let's do it again!"

She took out the red seed again.

“Roo!” Nom.

Crush!

The kangaroo instantly grew to fourty feet again, breaking other heritage items within the bedroom. Guards on duty outside of the royal princess’s chamber were flabbergasted by the mysterious event. They had been, ever since the first growth.

“Y-your Highness! Are you alright?!”

“Your Highness!”

“Urgh! The door won’t budge!”

“Push harder!”

The broken bed and other fixtures had blocked the entrance to the chamber, causing the guards to panic outside.

“Break it!”

Thwoosh! Crush!

Each of the elite guards on duty was at least an intermediate sword expert. The door broke down along with the fixture blocking the path thanks to their endeavor, turning Charlotte pale in the process.

“...I think I’m in trouble.”

The little child finally saw the catastrophic aftermath of what she had done.

“Roong. What should I do? I’m gonna be in trouble.”

“Roo-roo?”

“C-can you take me and run away?”

“Roo-roo!”

Roong nodded robustly in response. In fact, the enlarged beast thought it was a walk in the park.

“Roo-roo!”

The kangaroo stretched out its enlarged hand and picked up the child cautiously, before placing the princess in its cushiony, comfortable pouch. Charlotte felt warmth and coziness from within, as she saw the system message window pop up again.

Ding-dong.

[You have entered Roong’s pouch in giant mode.]

[Conditions for Roong’s skill Recovery Pouch have been met.]

[Skill will activate immediately.]

[Recovery Pouch]

[You will recover from fatigue and most injuries with 20 times more efficiency while you stay within the pouch of Roong. It also offers unusual comfort of sleep, even to those that suffer from Swordmaster Syndrome.]

Stomp! Roong stomped on the floor while Charlotte was busy reading the message. The forty-foot, colossal, and muscular kangaroo then jumped forward and crushed the wall, leaping across in the air from a five-story height. The royal guards on duty by the royal garden saw something they could bring up again and again while having a drink with their friends.

Thump!

The landing was massive and shocking. But the beast stomped on the ground again, before it stopped shaking.

Stomp!

“Wh-what the hell is that?”

“Her Royal Highness has been abducted!”

“What?! Stop the beast!”

“S-stop what? Urgh!”

The gorgeous, well-maintained royal garden was no more, as the fourty-foot tall kangaroo wreaked absolute havoc, uprooting trees and boulders from the ground and leaving royal soldiers panicking in its wake. The huge commotion reached the ears of Lloyd and Queen Alicia, who had been enjoying their beauty sleep on the bed next to each other, and woke them up.

“What’s going on?” Asked Queen Alicia, looking out through the window.

“Uhm... That looks like a special summon,” replied Lloyd, who was just as confused.

“Special summon? Like Sir Ppodong and Sir Bangul?”

“Yeah.”

“How do you know?”

“Because that gigantic kangaroo just shouted out Roo-roo. And I can understand it.”

“What did it say?”

“Well...”

“Speak.”

“It said... I love playing with my new master! I love my master Charlotte!”

“...”

“So, basically...”

“That kangaroo was summoned by our child,” the queen intervened.

“Looks like it.”

“Are you hearing things?”

“No.”

“Did you drink without my knowledge?”

“No.”

“...Well, but our child isn’t in danger.”

“Except the royal guards probably are.”

“...”

Lloyd and Alicia breathed a deep sigh at the same time as they looked out at the garden full of uprooted trees and boulders, through which the colossal kangaroo was frolicking joyfully. They then saw the face of their daughter inside the pouch of the creature, as well as those of royal guards who clearly seemed flabbergasted. Something had to be done. The wife and husband quickly made eye contact and changed into everyday clothes.

“Hang onto me, since time is of the essence.”

“Okay,” Lloyd followed immediately, as Queen Alicia carried Lloyd like the knight in shining armor carrying the princess and jumped out the window.

Step. Dash!

Having landed softly like a cat, Alicia did not hesitate to dash towards the gigantic kangaroo. Lloyd shouted out while hanging tightly onto her arms.

“Hey! Kangaroo! Stop it!”

“Roo-roo...?”

Roong paused for the first time at the voice of a human that sounded rather familiar and friendly. It was the first time it heard a voice like this aside from its master Charlotte.

“Papa...?”

“Yeah. Papa and mama.”

“Ugh,” said Charlotte, before completely placing her head inside the pouch.

“Daughter! Time to stop playing! You must go to sleep!” Lloyd shouted out more desperately.

“...”

“I won’t get mad! I promise!”

“...Promise?” Charlotte took a peek out again and looked down on the ground. Mama and Papa were staring at her, but not with the intent to scold her.

“Of course! I promise!” Lloyd shouted again.

“Really?”

“Really!”

“But you’re gonna say that wasn’t what you meant.”

“I promise as well,” said Queen Alicia.

“Really?” Charlotte’s response was finally bright. She looked at Roong and spoke.

“Roong!”

“Roo-roo?”

“These are my parents!”

“Roo-roo!”

“Time to eat this!”

Charlotte took out the blue sunflower seed and fed it to Roong, who became small in an instant. Lloyd quickly reacted and captured the falling child with his arms.

“There. I got you.”

“Tee-hee.”

“Tee-hee? This isn’t funny, my princess.”

“...But you promised you won’t get mad.”

“Well, I certainly did,” replied Lloyd, before turning his gaze to his wife. “Tsk.”

Alicia shook her head, and there was nothing else Lloyd could do except ask Charlotte what he wanted to know.

“Are you alright? Did you get injured?”

“No. I’m fine.”

“Did you get hurt?”

“No.”

“Okay, then how did you summon Roong?”

“Random draw!”

“...What?!”

Lloyd was astonished by his daughter’s response. He had thought he was the only one that was able to perform such a task.

“You did... a random draw?”

“Yeah!”

“Did you by any chance... see strange texts in the air?”

“I did!”

The response that followed confirmed Lloyd’s suspicions.

“I have RP too!”

“You have RP...?”

“Yeah! I had RP since I was a baby!”

“How much?”

“53!”

“Haha. Hahaha.”

Lloyd burst out laughing. It was surprising and cute. But he was yet to be done.

“And some circles after 53.”

“Circles?! Zero, you mean?”

“Yeah!”

“How many?”

Lloyd was flabbergasted. He finally realized that the child had seen the system message ever since her birth, and saved RP as she grew.

But she didn't show any signs, not because she deliberately tried to hide it, but because she thought seeing the system message and collecting RP was a natural thing that everyone probably did. It was so natural, just like water and air in the atmosphere. She probably didn't find this strange at all.

Perhaps she grew up thinking that everyone around her was constantly being harassed by such messages, Lloyd thought.

But zeros after 53...? The estate developer wondered just how much RP his daughter had. Maybe 530... or even 5,300.

Even that was an immense amount, as he had about 7,000 RP when he was battling the king of hell, and had gathered a little more than 20,000 RP in the past eight years.

Adorable.

Lloyd was delighted to know that the child he dearly cherished had inherited this strange skill and ability. It was cute that his only daughter had gathered what little RP she could like treasure. But yet another shocking information awaited him, as Charlotte folded and unfolded her small fingers.

"Uhm... One. Two. Three. Four. Four circles!"

"...Four?!"

"Yeah!"

"Hold on a sec. So you have... 530,000 RP?!"

"Yeah!"

"..."

Lloyd felt like he was struck by an extraterrestrial being from the galaxy. It was as if he was bragging about winning five dollars in front of someone who had won the jackpot.

“W-well, I see. Listen.”

“Yeah.”

“Daddy will teach you how to best use RP. Okay?”

“Okay!”

“Shall we go back and get some sleep?”

“But I don’t have a bed. My bedroom broke.”

“It’s okay,” replied Lloyd with a satisfactory smile, as he picked up his daughter and gently tapped his wife on her shoulders. “You can come and sleep with mommy and daddy.”

It was time for the three of them to share the bed, and it was going to stay that way for some time. Lloyd turned around, looked at everyone, and spoke with a huge smile on his face.

“Right?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Side Story 6: Epilogue

Flap!

The king of hell flapped his wings fiercely as he flew around in the space.

Whoosh.

It was vast and mostly empty. The king lifted his chin and examined the movement patterns of every moving thing in the vicinity, before descending.

Whoosh!

Six legs were folded as the wings zapped. The former ruler of the underworld viciously and ruthlessly landed near his target.

Thud!

The king of hell satisfactorily licked his lips as he looked pompously around like the force of nature he was.

Feeble things around him grabbed his attention. The king of hell violently swept through the small crumb of chips... or so he thought. A fly swatter flew his way.

Wham!

The swatter slammed against the desk, and the king of hell barely managed to escape doom and flew away in time. He flapped his wings even more viciously to continue traveling, as colossal humans conversed with one another.

“Oh, no. It got away. You’re terrible, girl.”

“Ugh, it’s not like I can use the spray in the hospital.”

“Just give me the swatter.”

“Oh, yeah? Let’s see how you do it then.”

“Watch and learn, haha.”

The two nurses by the neatly maintained desk lightly bantered, and the king of hell instinctively knew it was dangerous here. He needed to get away. The fly’s flapping of wings became even more diligent as he quickly traveled across the hallway of the hospital as the voice of the news reporter spoke through an old-school television in one of the rooms.

“Bringing news from Lillehammer Winter Olympics. I’m sure everyone still remembers the outstretched leg of the skater who won the Republic of Korea the first gold medal in the Winter Olympics history. The same skater, Kihun Kim, has delivered another scintillating run to win gold in men’s short-track skating for 1,000 meters. Connecting to a live reporter at the scene.”

Buzz.

The sound from the television declined as the king of hell viciously flapped his wings and moved away from it. The fly continued traveling and headed inside the elevator, from which he barely escaped after ascending and descending a few floors. He then fiercely flew in the hallway of a different floor of the hospital, until a certain man clapped with pinpoint accuracy.

Slap! Pop!

The king of hell, who had ruled over the underworld tyrannously and mercilessly, was reborn into the body of a fly in a whole new dimension. And he just ended his new life.

“Eww. Why is there a stinking fly in the hospital?”

The man in his mid-thirties wiped his hand with the handkerchief, not realizing what accomplishment he had just made by slaying the supreme being that used to manage the underworld across the dimensions. He had no idea that the nonchalant clapping of his hands just crushed this force of nature to death. The man continued walking down the hallway until he saw an old man sitting on the bench and greeted him.

“You really don’t have to. I don’t want you to go through the trouble.”

“No, it’s okay. How can I leave, when my grandson is struggling to survive?”

“But you should still get some rest. You haven’t rested for some time.”

“Tsk. I can’t bring myself to.”

“I’m sure it’s going to be alright. He’s a bit underweight, but the doctor said he’s breathing fine. He should be able to get out of that thing after a day or two.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.”

The man and the old father-in-law stared through the transparent glass and watched the incubator inside the room. A boy was resting in one of them. It was the villainous and impish, original Lloyd Frontera that had just been reborn into the body of the infant.

They speak with an interesting accent, not to mention how loudly he talks. Hmm. I suppose I am his son.

He was just born in the morning and couldn’t even open his eyes to see anything yet. He could still hear the conversation from outside of the room, especially because the man and the old father-in-law spoke loudly and clearly.

They sure talk a lot.

The bum Lloyd instantly realized they were his new family. He grumbled because he had wished to be reborn as a whale out in the ocean. He wondered what kind of world he was in, as he recalled what he had just experienced at the gate of rebirth.

The gate felt so strange.

He had finally gotten some peace for the first time since his death, after bidding farewell to the fake Lloyd, Suho Kim, who had stolen his original body on the platform at the end of the underworld. Real Lloyd was able to step through the portal of rebirth thanks to fake Lloyd's kindness and help.

Ha. I'm not sure if I'm supposed to be grateful or mad at him.

He chuckled out of confusion. While he resented the fact that the fake Lloyd had stolen his body and thus caused him to wander restlessly between the underworld and the human realm like an apparition, he was grateful for the help the fraudster provided after the coincidental encounter in the underworld.

Thank you, Suho.

The bum Lloyd internally expressed his gratitude and strengthened his resolve to lead a new life, remembering the kindness Suho had shown him in the underworld to help him pass through the gate of rebirth. He also regretted how he led his previous life.

Father, mother, and Julian.

It was heartbreaking to think about his family. Although there were things he particularly did not like about them, he could only think of all the mischief and trouble he had caused as the eldest son of the house. He regretted having yelled out in anger to his father. He regretted having failed to listen to his mother. He regretted having failed to treat his younger brother Julian with more love.

And Javier Asrahan.

He also recalled the dirty look his bodyguard gave him.

Right. You must have found me so despicable.

He acknowledged that it was a fair assessment of his character. Lloyd realized that he had nothing to complain about, even if the scorn was from his own parents or brother Julian. There was no room for any excuses to come into play. He was trashy and unworthy. He was a bum. He had only caused inconveniences for others.

I am so sorry, everyone.

The bum Lloyd shed tears out of regret. He repented, but it was too late. So he decided to work hard and be benevolent in the second lease in life. He wanted to lead the life that Suho Kim had, helping others instead of causing trouble. He strengthened his resolve and reiterated this to himself. He was determined not to forget this new attitude and mindset, which were going to fade away soon due to the law of rebirth.

I clearly heard what to expect after being reborn. I would retain a part of my memory from the previous life pertaining to the intellectual ability of my new body, but even that should fade away fairly quickly.

He heard he would forget all memories from his past life, the moment he heard his name for the first time. The bum Lloyd desperately tried to engrave this mindset and attitude within himself before it was too late.

The conversation between his new father and maternal grandfather could be heard from outside the room.

“By the way. Have you thought of a name for the kid?”

“Huh?”

“So you don’t, yet,” said the old man.

“Well, I do have something in my mind,” replied the father awkwardly.

“I see. But you should still hear an old man out.”

“I’m listening.”

“I actually consulted a renowned shaman and got a really good name that would bring him good fortune.”

“From... a shaman?”

“Yeah. Looking at the kid’s birth hour, day, and year, he suggested a perfect name.”

“What is it?”

“Palbong. Palbong Kim.”

“...”

“Well? Do you like it?”

The man remained silent. The bum Lloyd was in a state of emergency.

Tell him no! What kind of name is that?!

Lloyd knew not what were trendy, cool names in this universe, but the name the old man just suggested sent chills down his spine for some reason.

No. I don’t know why, but no. That’s not the name. Come on, dad! Decline it! Who names his child Palbong?!

Lloyd genuinely began cheering for his father like a sports team. To his relief, the support seemed to have reached him.

“Well, uhm...” said the man in an uneasy tone.”

“What is it?”

“Can you please reconsider?”

“Why? Do you not like Palbong?”

“Uh, well... I really appreciate how you went out of your way to get a recommendation and all, but Palbong is just... not fit.”

“Why? Because it sounds too old-school? That’s nothing to worry about. A boy’s name should be old-school and conventional!”

“But still...”

“Hahaha, but I paid 200 dollars for this name.”

“...”

“He’s going to lead a good life, without any trouble with this name.”

The man became speechless again, causing the bum Lloyd to internally shout out more desperately.

Old man? Gramps? Are you out of your mind? Was that name blessed by priests or something? Why would you play around with somebody’s name?!

He was afraid of being given the terrifyingly horrible name the old man suggested. The bum Lloyd shivered in anxiety, but it didn’t conclude that moment.

“Very well, please give me some time to think about it.”

“Understood.”

The voices of the two men faded away. It appeared that they were going somewhere while conversing with one another. The bum Lloyd breathed a sigh of relief and felt extreme fatigue all of a sudden.

Phew. Thank goodness. For now.

It was fortuitous that he wasn’t given that name at the moment thanks to his new father’s intervention. It was clear his father did not like that name.

Come on. Be more assertive. It’s your own son!

The bum Lloyd desperately wished for his father to express his thoughts more clearly. But he gradually felt more fatigued and tired, and couldn’t overcome the urge to fall asleep.

I guess it’s because I’m a newborn...

He couldn’t resist. Lloyd fell asleep like that, and couldn’t think of anything anymore. It was comfortable and cozy. He was sound asleep.

***

He did not know how many hours had passed when he fully woke back up. He recalled how he had awakened a few times in the middle of the sleep, only to pass out again.

He tried to pay attention to his surroundings, which clearly felt a bit different. The air was different as well. The cozy warmth surrounded him as if somebody was holding him, and the voices of people were louder than ever.

“Oh, he woke up.”

It was the voice of the man from before, but in a whispering manner, followed by the voice of a woman.

“Honey. Are you sure about that name?”

“Yeah. I don’t think we can persuade your father, so we’ll just have to do it.”

“But he may be upset if he finds out about it. He even went to the shaman.”

“It’s okay. Do you want to name our kid Palbong?”

“...No.”

“See? I thought the same. I love my father-in-law, but that’s a bit of a stretch.”

The conversation was clearly between his new father and mother. The bum Lloyd breathed a sigh of relief, as it appeared that his parents were intent on declining the terrible name.

I wonder what my new name is going to be.

It was going to be decided soon, and he would forget the memories from his past life the moment he was called by the new name so he could lead a whole new life.

And I won't screw up this time. I swear.

He recalled everyone that he felt sorry for from his previous life such as his family and knights in his service, and vowed again never to forget this mindset even if all memories were lost. The huge hand approached the baby as he strengthened his resolve, and cautiously and gently touched him in the forehead.

"You're so small and adorable."

"Stop. You're going to make him cry."

"Even if he does, he'll still be so cute."

"Haha."

"Alright then, we agree on the name, right?"

The woman's body slightly rocked as she held the baby. It appeared that she was nodding to her husband's response. The bum Lloyd nervously anticipated what kind of name he'd be given. He was curious about the new life that was ahead of him. He was full of worries and excitement at the same time.

And the gentle voice of his new father graced his ears.

"Do you hear me? This is your dad. I'm so excited about raising a boy."

...Huh?

That was when the bum Lloyd began forgetting things. Memories about the Frontera Estate when he was young, the picnic he went on with his family, and when he made fun of Javier and ran away began to fade away and pop like bubbles, one by one.

“My boy.”

The moments he cherished and loved slowly but surely disappeared with each word his new father spoke.

“Suho Kim, my beautiful son.”

The gentle touch from his father’s hand on the baby’s cheeks caused the former bum Lloyd to put a smile on his face. The baby Suho Kim was genuinely delighted to start anew.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

THE GREATEST ESTATE
DEVELOPER

Chapter 1: I Become a Villain in a Novel

Something that seemed like a work of fiction happened to me. When I opened my eyes, I was in The Knight of Blood and Iron; an epic novel about the indomitable leadership of ice-cold protagonist Javier Asrahan. I'd been sucked into the grandiose realm of the book, as the drunken young master whom Javier served in his unremarkable early years. At the time I couldn't imagine that this would be the beginning of my own epic story. How could a mere civil engineering student become the guardian of this world?

***

[RP (relationship point) system activated.

You can earn RP by improving your relationships with the main characters.

You can acquire special skills in exchange for RP.]

[Current RP: 0]

A strange message rang in his head like an alarm, and he wondered what this RP and skill development was all about. I'm tired and sleepy. Suho scowled as he lay back on the bed. It was annoying, but it was typical.

He attended classes during the day. He worked hard at a part-time job in the evening. Meanwhile—in an attempt to change his mood–he spent all night reading a novel. So, it was only natural that he felt tired. Actually…it was more like karma.

But I still finished all my assignments. I can sleep in for thirty more minutes. The very thought put a smile on his face. However, Suho's smile didn't last for long.

"…up, please."

He heard an unfamiliar voice. The voice was cold and direct. Is this a dream? Assuming he was hearing things in his sleep, Suho flopped over onto his other side. But the adjustment didn't block out that urgent voice.

“It’s late. It’s time to get up, Master Lloyd.”

Huh…? It wasn’t a dream. The voice was definitely coming from right next to him. But how?

He suddenly emerged from his confusion and came to his senses. This was a dorm room of just over seventy square feet, and he always kept the door locked. Yet somehow, someone was in his room talking to him?

Suho cautiously opened his eyes. His body involuntarily tightened up.

“You are awake sir. You woke up right away today, I see.”

A handsome man with silver hair sat patiently beside the bed. He didn’t look a day over twenty years old. His face revealed not one ounce of laughter in it, which nicely matched his figure—which resembled a sword of ice carved from the top of a glacier.

“Javier… Asrahan?” Suho mumbled involuntarily.

It was certain. This was the book he spent all last night reading: The Knight of Blood and Iron. The illustration of the epic’s hero—Javier Asrahan—looked just like him. They were identical. Even his smirk was as stylish as that painting.

“So, you finally remembered my name. Thank you, sir.”

His expression, however, didn’t look the least bit thankful.

“But what am I doing here?” Suho blurted out loud.

Javier’s smirk deepened a little more. “Master has put me in charge of escorting you.”

“His Lordship? Escort?”

“That is correct.”

“Why?”

“To prevent events such as last night from happening again.”

“But last night, I was…”

“You were so drunk you couldn’t walk. Three tables, five chairs, nineteen dishes, and six candlesticks were damaged when you threw a fit at the pub. Ah, and the pub owner’s precious ornamental buffalo horn table was also destroyed entirely.”

I’m innocent… Really. I was just reading a book in my room. But then he felt a throbbing pain in his head. I didn’t even drink, yet I have a hangover? Well, that’s not fair.

“Hmm. Then first, get me some water.”

He wanted to get his mind back in order. While taking sips of the water Javier fetched him, he looked around the bedroom. It was unfamiliar, yet it was large and tidy. It was on a totally different level from the grubby, tiny dorm room and its scruffy yellow walls. This is pretty awesome. He wondered if he really was reincarnated into a literary character. Nobility, at that! Suho accepted this “reality” in his own way. This was heaven compared to the miserable, lonely life in the dorms.

But something caught his eye.

“What’s that?” Suho pointed at the cupboard on the other side of the bed. A conspicuous red piece of paper was stuck to the cupboard. And it wasn’t the only one. They were on the large desk, the refreshment table, on the bed where Suho lay, and even the chair on which Javier sat. Every single piece of furniture had a red ticket stuck to it.

Could it be…? Absentmindedly, Suho swallowed.

Then Javier replied to Suho’s inquiry, “Have you forgotten already? They are repossession notices from yesterday.”

It was a terse response. Suddenly he recalled the fact that, at the beginning of the novel, the baron who hired Javier had fallen into ruin.

A con artist fools the baron and baroness. They lose their estate and their land and then take their own lives. And Lloyd, their eldest son? His alcoholism makes him sick, and he dies. Javier makes a grave for Lloyd and then leaves the fiefdom. That's when Javier Asrahan takes his first steps as the star of this grand epic.

So, I'm possessing the body of that brutish young master who dies from alcoholism at an early age? That's me?

His joy at becoming a nobleman quickly fizzled out. Either way, it was a big problem.

***

"Ugh, it's true. It is actually true."

Some hours later, Suho…no, Lloyd looked at himself in the mirror. His full-length mirror also had a red repo tag attached to it, just like all the other furniture. A sleek, dark-haired man stood there looking back at him.

It was Lloyd.

So that's me now. He still had trouble accepting the reality of what had happened. Yet, he didn't hate it either. Honestly, he kind of liked it. His life back in South Korea was only full of hardship.

I did nothing but suffer.

Suho was the only son of an ordinary family. He'd passed the college entrance exams and become a civil engineering student. But trouble came while he was serving his mandatory duty in the army. His parents were cheated out of their lives as victims of a real estate investment scam. The only thing they left him after they died was colossal debt. Their house and all of their property were seized. To avoid taking on the remaining debt, he had to give up his inheritance.

Without the scholarship money for low-income students, I would never have been able to attend school.

He was diligent in his studies, but the cost of living was a separate matter from tuition. He bounced between several part-time jobs, but it was no easy task to keep up good grades while working. His dorm room was no more than a cramped closet. He would get seven nosebleeds a day. The free kimchi and rice served at the dorm were the last defense keeping his body alive. With only that, Suho managed to tightly cling on to life…up until yesterday.

But to think that I became a nobleman from an old book I picked up. Now I can truly breathe.

He wasn't even as grand as a duke or a count. He was a mere baron in charge of managing a countryside fiefdom. However, that made being Lloyd appeal to him even more.

I probably won't be getting into any kind of big mishaps, like a rebellion or something. That was always the problem in any historical or medieval drama. It didn't matter if you were a well-off aristocrat. Once you got tangled up in a rebellion, it was over. There was no room for excuses, and you were beheaded in one fell swoop.

I'd much rather be the baron of some remote area. It's like its own niche market. No big conspiracies, just the countryside and a sweet life of affluence. He could live a life of ease if he held on to his comfortable, stable status. Although, that can only happen after the baron's debt is settled.

That was the problem.

Why now of all times?

He recalled Javier's explanation. Those repo tags were placed yesterday. So, what could've happened if he'd possessed Lloyd's body a month or two sooner? He could have prevented the baron from being conned. Now he felt like he wanted to grab the author by his shirt collar.

Well, it's already happened, so now I must fix it. If he didn't, by next year the baron and baroness would commit suicide. Selling this house and fiefdom would make him into a beggar.

Just like back in Korea.

That was a nightmare of a thought. He rejected the very idea of it and had no interest in a repeat. So somehow or other, he had to come up with enough money to cover the baron's debts.

He looked into the mirror for a long time. Then suddenly, something popped into his head. Turning to the frosty Javier beside him, he asked, "Hey."

"Yes, Master Lloyd."

"Does our estate have a lot of money?"

"Sir?"

"If I asked the people for money, how much would it be?"

"Are you referring to a tax?"

"No, not that."

"Then?"

"Something like a gold collection campaign…ugh, never mind."

Lloyd shook his head. If he gathered funds from the people, it might help. But thinking about it more, it didn't feel quite right. Obviously, without a good reason, asking the people for money would result in dissent. I wouldn't be able to pay all of it off with that amount anyway.

He thought about the introduction from the novel. The time limit to pay off the debt was two years. But before the time was up, the baron and baroness commit suicide. The pressure of the debt continued, and the interest kept growing. The pathway to settling the debt was a dark, murky swamp, and the couple drowning in that debt let go of their hope.

That's exactly one year from now.

And five months later, Lloyd dies vomiting blood in the pub where he was a regular. The very beginning of The Knight of Blood and Iron describes all of this.

Dammit. Is this some kind of déjà vu? It was basically a mirror image of what happened to his family back in Korea. Thinking about it spoiled his mood.

"Hmph. Let's take a walk or something."

Walking is the best way to clear the mind. Even back when he was still Suho Kim, walking was part of his routine. Actually, it was pretty much the only comfort he had, since it didn't cost any money.

So, he and Javier left the room and entered the hallway. Just then he encountered a woman approaching from the opposite end of the hall. The woman carried herself with sophistication and elegance. She was a beauty who'd aged gracefully into her middle years.

Could it be…?

Suddenly a name popped into his head. Marbella Frontera. She was the baroness. Lloyd's mother. She was the only middle-aged woman in this estate who could have that kind of air about her.

Lloyd gulped dryly. Of course we would run into each other.

Is there a parent who does not recognize their child? He worried that she would catch on to the fact that he was a fake. Thankfully (?!), he worried in vain. As soon as the baroness looked his way, she clicked her tongue at him.

"Did you go out drinking again?" That look she had in her eyes… It was full of heartache and worry. Was it because her son was unseemly—drinking his life away and raising hell—all while their home was being torn apart? There was no way of knowing.

"You should enjoy it in moderation. It is not good for your health."

The baroness sighed quietly and brushed past him. Lloyd was left assured. I didn't get caught. But should I really be happy about that? Lloyd Frontera. A guy who drank the moment he opened his eyes in the morning. Thanks to that, even his own mother had such a poor opinion of Lloyd. That's pretty sad, though.

Then Suho recalled his time as a freshman; back when his family was still affluent. Back then he was rather ignorant. He remembered drinking every day, be it at lunch or on a class trip. Each time, his mother would cook haejang-guk for him… Hangover soup. However, it had become a part of the past.

Humph. Lloyd bit his bottom lip. His stride lengthened as he left the house. That could be why the townsfolk he met along the way scurried off to the side of the road as soon as they noticed him. They all hung their heads to avoid making eye contact. One woman trembled while she squeezed her hands together tightly. Some of the villagers grew visibly pale. Was he coming to grips with his situation within that short span of time?

Right, this is the kind of guy Lloyd was.

The story flashed through his mind. The Beast of the Frontera Barony. That was Lloyd Frontera. He got drunk and would occasionally throw or break things. It was a given that he wrought abusive language and violence upon those below his station. Simply put, he was the worst kind of troublemaker. Human gutter trash.

That's why they're all so spiteful. I'm completely despicable. A bitter laugh escaped him.

"Hey," he whined to Javier beside him, "what's with all of them? It's not normal to treat a lord's son that way."

It was common sense that the lord's son was the most powerful man in the region. So, unless the lord's son was some kind of a dirtbag… They usually tried to smile and at least pretend to respect him. Like the store owner who kindly served the landlord's son their fried chicken. Or like a senior manager who became overly lenient to the president's son when he started as a new employee. Shouldn’t the son of this estate’s owner be the same to its villagers?

“Normally, but.”

“Normally… But?”

“Yes.”

“Then what about now?”

Javier replied coldly, “It’s a state of emergency.”

“Emergency?”

"It refers to the appearance of a being who poses a threat to the livelihood, welfare, and safety of the people of the estate."

"And…that being is supposed to be me?"

“That is correct.”

“That was quite the comeback.”

“What is a comeback?”

“Uh…like cutting someone to the bone with facts.” Javier stared intensely in his direction. His expression showed confusion over the nonsense he’d just heard. And yet, like a painting, he was cold and stately.

Sure, that is the kind of guy Javier was. A noble, honorable knight. A man relentless against injustice. He was a hero and the epitome of knighthood. In the novel, Javier becomes renowned throughout the entire continent of Lorasia. Naturally, just because he was still unknown at this point, didn’t mean his personality was any different.

“I’m unsure what to do in this situation. I’ve not once been disloyal to you, Master Lloyd.”

“Not once?”

“Never.”

“So, you’ve never heard of a fact attack?”

“I know nothing of it.”

“Have you ever detested me then?”

“No. Never.”

But…it definitely seemed that way from his expression, Lloyd realized. This guy hates me too.

Being the virtuous knight that Javier was, he emphasized the importance of honor. So, it was certain he hated a churlish dirt-bag like Lloyd. And yet, he was the kind of guy who’d stay loyally by his side until the day Lloyd died. It seemed he upheld his obedience and loyalty to his master the baron until the very end. An amazing guy, at any rate.

And one of the best swordsmen in the history of the Lorasian continent—an unprecedented grand master. And now this guy was his faithful guard.

Lloyd walked along with an odd feeling until he found himself in front of a shabby building.

"Where are we?"

"This is the pub."

"The pub?"

"Yes. You spend more time here than at your own home, Master Lloyd."

“So, this is where I’m a regular?”

“Of course. Unless you have been frequenting another place without my notice, that is.”

Good gracious. Inside his head, Lloyd was clicking his tongue.

He'd only been walking aimlessly, yet his feet brought him to his regular pub of all places. How often did he come here that even when possessed by another spirit, his body automatically found its way here? Is this like a homing instinct? Am I a carrier pigeon? A spawning salmon? Or a lost dog that somehow travels a hundred miles back home? He chastised the original owner of this body, the baron's eldest son.

He turned away. Either way, I shouldn't be day drinking. Lloyd might have enjoyed it, but Suho no longer did. Besides, he couldn't drink when he already had so much to figure out. He had no other thoughts besides that.

"Are we going back then?"

"Certainly," he answered Javier assuredly. However, Javier's reply was unexpected.

"In that case, what a disappointment."

"Huh…?"

"It is just as I said. You, Master Lloyd, are a disappointment."

"Were you really expecting me to indulge in some day drinking?"

"No."

"Then…?"

"I was under the impression that you were here to apologize and make restitutions for the chaos you caused here last night."

"So, you're disappointed I turned away?"

"That is correct. A nobleman has the duty to take on the responsibility that equals their status."

This punk has been throwing zingers all day. That one he just threw probably exceeded one hundred miles per hour. Javier had a strange talent for giving his helpful advice in a blunt and stinging way.

“The proprietor has been managing this pub his entire life… Even if it is a shabby old saloon. Last night, you caused a ruckus in this precious place and damaged the furniture here. Besides, as you may know, Master Lloyd, he’s caring for his elderly mother all on his own.”

“He is?”

“Yes. Her health has declined quite recently. The owner is gravely concerned.”

“So, I caused trouble for this poor fellow?”

“That is correct.”

It wasn’t even me who really did it. However, Javier continued to sting him.

“Actually, sir, he pleaded with me last night. He told me that, with his mother’s suffering in the winter cold and now the trouble you’ve caused, he’s deeply saddened and longs for death’s sweet embrace. You cannot turn a blind eye. After all, someday in the future, this estate will be under your care, Master Lloyd…”

“Hold on. Stop right there.”

With that, Javier’s speech was cut off. Was it because Lloyd couldn’t bear to hear any more? No. Javier’s words suddenly put an idea in his head.

“The owner’s mother suffers in the winter cold, you said?”

“That is what I said.”

“Then wouldn’t it do to have heated floors?”

“Sir?”

“Do the people here really…not know about heated flooring?” They really didn’t know; you could tell by the look in his eye. Something else popped into his head. Come to think of it, even the bedroom in the baron’s house didn’t have heated floors. He was a civil engineering student, so it was his habit to examine the structure of the buildings wherever he went. He could quickly analyze the construction of the baron’s house.

The baron’s had neither heated floors nor any kind of central heating system. Instead, a single fireplace occupied one side of the room. The pub owner’s home was likely the same design. Unlike the nobility, who would have a fireplace in every room, this man probably had a single fireplace to heat the entirety of his house.

It surely would be cold. Compared to a heated flooring system, a fireplace has a significant amount of heat loss.

Of course, heated floors weren’t without their cons. To get a heated flooring system, you’d have to either rebuild or entirely replace the floors. You must also insulate the building against heat loss. They likely consume a great amount of firewood here.

But those two cons… They can be overcome. Well, actually, they can be taken advantage of. For me, it’s possible.

If Lloyd made use of Suho’s college major, he would have a way of paying off the estate’s huge debt and escaping a bleak fate. With that incentive, he devised a plan that could make him tons of money.

He was certain. He could see it coming together.

This is it. It won’t end with the pub owner’s house. It’ll be even bigger! It will be a large-scale business. My chances of success are high indeed.

His mind was made up. The plans in his head would become a reality.

He took off straight toward the pub.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 2: Model Home, Open House (1)

The inside of the pub was in shambles. Parts of broken tables and chairs were strewn all around, and the floor was littered with smashed dishes.

Gosh, I really did make a big mess.

Lloyd instinctively clicked his tongue when he saw the owner, trying to clean up the disaster that his pub had become.

The balding man had a bitter expression as he looked around at the chaos. As soon as the owner glanced Lloyd's way, his face became pale, and then flushed with anger. His anger diminished quickly, however, and was replaced by an awkward smile. It was the forced smile of a poor man made to continue doing business at his tavern.

"Uh, welcome…?"

Thinking about what happened last night surely curdles his blood, Lloyd thought. It went without saying. Seeing him that way made Lloyd lose his appetite, reminding him of his past as Suho Kim. Those memories flooded his mind. There were plenty of terrible customers when I worked at the Hope Pub. He had many part-time jobs, and working at the Hope was one of them. Since it was a bar, there were all sorts of customers—bad ones among them.

Actually, there were a whole lot of them. It was a given that once they were drunk, they'd verbally harass the part-time staff. Some of them went so far as to break bottles and flip tables; complaining that the prices were too high, the snacks weren't to their liking, or the employees weren't polite enough. They'd swing their broken bottles and demand to see the manager.

Sigh.

He sighed a lot back then. Such was the plight of a part-timer. Nothing could be said to the VIP customers. He was forced to restrain his boiling rage when they would get rowdy.

Let's stop thinking about that.

They were bitter memories, but Lloyd fully empathized with the pub owner's feelings because of them. Although…he wasn't really the one who had done this. The original Lloyd had torn this pub apart.

He faced the pub owner and gave him a heartfelt apology. "I'm here to tell you that I am sorry for what happened last night."

"What…?"

"I've done you wrong. I should've drunk quietly and kept to myself instead of causing a big mess. I won't make excuses. It was entirely my fault."

Despite putting his heart into these words, the intended sincerity did not carry over well.

"Um, young master? What are you saying?" The pallor of the owner's face turned a pale blue as if he'd seen a ghost. "Master, were you not satisfied with last night's business? Please tell me, what did I do wrong?"

"No, I…"

"Why are you being so polite to me? That's even more frightening."

The people of the manor truly loathed him, it seemed. Lloyd smacked his lips and responded, "Is talking casually like this much better?"

"O-of course, sir."

"Do you accept my apology then? I'm thinking of compensating you for the broken items."

"Do you really mean it, sir?"

The poor bloke must've been lied to his whole life. Lloyd clicked his tongue and said, "Of course I mean it! How about a heated flooring system as compensation?"

“Huh?”

“A room with warm, heated floors. Haven’t you heard of that?”

“I’ve heard of heating a stone and sprinkling water on it, but…”

“That’s a steam sauna. I’m talking about the floor itself being heated. A heated flooring system, you know?” Of course, he didn’t know. Just like Javier a moment ago, the pub owner was speechless. His plans were indeed possible. Lloyd licked his lips. “It’s a shame you haven’t heard of it. Your mother would really enjoy it.”

“Excuse me?”

“I’ve heard that your mother is ill.”

“Oh, yes. That is true.”

“Then I recommend heated flooring. It makes the floors warm. You won’t even need a bed. Just lie down on the heated floor, and it will keep you comfortable all day! A sauna can’t even compare.”

He was becoming convinced. Bit by bit, the owner was being won over. But Lloyd could see him wavering, so he took it one step further. “It’s perfect for the elderly and their aching joints in mid-winter when their body gets a chill.”

“Elders like my mother?”

“Indeed.”

It has been true since the beginning of time that older people enjoy keeping warm.

“So, you’re saying that you will give me this, young master?”

“Uh-huh. I’ll build a proper one for you.”

“You’ll make it yourself?”

“Uh-huh.”

“You don’t believe me?”

“Um, well…”

“Of course, you wouldn’t. After all the ruckus I caused, you think I’m pulling your leg. You’re wondering, who do I think I am, offering to make some fantastic heated floors for you. You wonder if such a thing actually even exists. Yet, as you listen, you can’t help but think of your mother. It catches your ear and draws you in. Am I right?”

The pub owner still hesitated.

“Fine, then let’s draw up a contract.”

“A contract?”

“Yup. A construction contract.”

“But…”

“Bring me a pen and paper.”

The confusion on the owner’s face was obvious, but he quickly presented Lloyd with a pen and some paper. Swiftly and skillfully, Lloyd drew up a contract.

If it’s a form I need, I can make it myself. The pub owner is the client. I am the contractor. The construction site is the vacant lot behind the pub, etc.

“Let’s arrange compensation like this… The construction project will cover the costs for all the damage I inflicted on your property last night. What do you think?”

“Are you saying that…instead of paying for the damage, you will install this elaborate heated flooring as reimbursement?”

“That’s right,” Lloyd nodded.

Since the baron was in debt, he was in no position to offer financial compensation. However, if he completed this project successfully from start to finish… This way, I can take care of the reimbursement neatly, while also entirely avoiding accumulating further liability. Not only would this fix his debt problem, but, if all went well, he could make a great deal of money too. This would become the starting point for accumulating wealth instead. That was the big picture Lloyd envisioned.

This is what I do best.

He had studied quite hard in college. He never had any big dreams, of course. He'd selected his civil engineering major based on test scores and assessments, just like everybody else. He did his best to get good grades so that he could snag a stable job. But maybe, just maybe, all the knowledge he accumulated could be used here.

Real estate is always a big money maker—the construction part of it may be more so.

Whether it was apartment blocks, office buildings, bridges, roads, dams, marinas, canals, or ports… All of it was profitable! Construction meant big money, and the larger the project, the truer that was. Lloyd relished in the possibilities of his plan.

"Now, let's sign the contract. What do you think?"

"Then…you're serious?"

"I'm going to build this myself. You don't want it?"

"N-no, that's not it."

Despite his hesitation, the pub owner ultimately signed the contract, with Suho Kim — a South Korean civil engineering student; and Lloyd Frontera — the eldest son of Baron Arcos Frontera.

It was their first work order in this strange world. Although it was a small one. This was to be the first of many steps. With this began his great construction project.

***

Javier had been silent this whole time. Barely a minute after they left the bar he suddenly spoke up. “He’s a naive and desperate man.”

“What do you mean by that?” Lloyd looked back to see Javier’s expression was the same as always. It actually seemed colder than before.

“When a person is cornered, they become desperate. Their perspective narrows and their judgment is blurred. Those people become easy prey for those with guile in their souls.”

“Prey?”

“Yes sir.”

“Ah, so you’re saying the pub owner is the pitiful prey, and I’m the dastardly villain?”

“Whether or not you are dastardly will be judged by your behavior from now on, sir.”

“Hey!”

He felt that the mood had become colder than before. Lloyd finally realized what Javier was thinking.

“Do you think I’m trying to scam the pub owner?”

“No, sir.”

“Then?”

“I think you’re taking advantage of a very vulnerable person.”

…That’s the same thing. Lloyd let out a long sigh. Since entering this body, everything he did seemed to be misunderstood.

“Let’s get this straight. You think I have no intention of constructing a heated flooring system for him, right?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Why not?”

“Because you’re someone who has never once gotten their hands dirty.”

“How would you know that?”

“I’ve heard things…here and there.”

“But you’ve never seen for yourself, have you?”

“That is true.”

“Javier. You are less reasonable than you appear.”

“Excuse me?”

Javier’s sculpted brow frowned ever so slightly, for possibly the first time ever. Lloyd—a mere two inches shorter—looked up at him and said, “I’m disappointed, Javier. Do you judge others based solely on rumor?”

“That’s…”

“It’s prejudice. Oh yes. It still is. You saw me draw up a contract with the owner of that pub. What did you think I might do with that?”

“Surely…”

“You thought I’d ball it up and toss it into a corner, didn’t you?”

“That is not true.”

Not true? He had hit the nail on the head. Lloyd noticed earlier that Javier was a terrible liar. Whenever he lied, he wouldn’t look at you. Just. Like. Now.

“You thought I was pulling a fast one on that guy, with the contract as a smokescreen. That I’d indefinitely put off building the heated floors, and never repay the owner for the damages.”

“I just…”

“That’s called prejudice. Blindly judging people with only your opinion to go on. This causes conflicts to arise! Racial discrimination runs rampant! Homes to be shaken, and society to collapse!”

Javier didn’t anticipate such a response. He shut his mouth. He probably thought it was all a bit of chicanery. But Lloyd didn’t try to change his mind. Instead, he motioned to Javier with his chin. “Hmm… Anyway, since I have a general idea of what you’re thinking, why don’t you step aside.”

“Excuse me?”

“Just two steps to the side. Yes, to that side. I’m trying to take a preliminary survey right now.”

It was true. Even before Javier had opened his mouth. This backyard was where he was going to build this house with heated floors. It was of utmost importance to inspect the site before drafting the design and procuring the construction materials. I’m going to make it small, so I won’t need super-precise measurements. But the land is slightly uneven. I’ll have to raise one side just a bit.

One side of the site reached up to the pub, and the opposite side was where the pub owner’s house was located. He figured placing the heated room between the two would be a good idea.

Let’s look at the ground. Lloyd knelt and looked at the soil of the building site. He touched it and then squeezed it. Ah, reminds me of college.

As he reached into the dirt, memories of soil mechanics class resurfaced. Studying the soil’s volume. Its gaps. He’d scooped up so many different types of turf before. There was so much more to it. He’d roll up the bits of dirt like eraser shreds. He would roll it until it broke down. He’d put the clods in ovens to bake them, roast them, or steam them. Now all this accumulated knowledge was waiting there to help Lloyd out.

This dirt will do. The soil quality wasn't merely okay. Under the surface, a few centimeters down, was reddish soil. It was red clay. Amazing!

Lloyd brushed off his hands as he stood up, then met Javier's curious gaze. "What? You've never seen anyone touch dirt before?"

"I've never seen you do this before, sir."

"Then get used to it. You'll see it often enough from now on."

Javier's eyes reflected a deeper curiosity, but Lloyd ignored it and walked on. He left the site and wandered about the manor. Although he strolled leisurely, Lloyd's gaze was occupied with surveying the land. He focused on a river that ran through the center of town… This seemed like a good place to collect red clay for his project.

"Alright, let's head home."

When he returned home, his work did not cease. This was to be his monumental first construction project. They say it's the first step that counts the most.

It takes just one wrong move to earn a bad reputation. After that, it would be harder to find his next customer. He would be doomed from the start. It was imperative that he did his best to create a high-quality end product to avoid that.

A customer's happiness is my wealth.

He stayed up all night. Schoolwork and part-time jobs had trained him for this moment. From sundown until sunup, he filled many sheets of paper with floor plans. As soon as it was daylight, he set off to find the manor administrator.

"How much lumber do we have in storage?"

“Excuse me?”

It was very early in the morning. The administrator hadn’t eaten breakfast or washed up yet. He tilted his head to one side. He was probably wondering if Lloyd was already drunk this early in the day. “What do you intend to use this wood for, sir?”

“What do you think? I’m using it to build a structure. See, here.”

“This?”

“Collect the amount of timber I’ve noted down here. Transport it to the back of the pub. Understood?”

If you’re going to do a job, might as well get it done swiftly and boldly like a bulldozer. That was how Lloyd approached this project. The administrator nodded indifferently. The order of lumber was stacked behind the pub by lunchtime.

“With my materials in place, I can begin!”

He removed his cumbersome coat and now wore only a light shirt and heavy workman’s gloves. The shovel was a welcome weight in his hands.

Even on vacation, I was doing this sort of work.

It was the same when he was in the army. Majoring in civil engineering, jobs both big and small were always assigned to him. By the time he was discharged, he was treated as their personal work machine.

It’s a man’s lot in life to always be behind a shovel.

It began with leveling and packing the ground beside the garden, where the heated room was to be built. Carefully, but firmly, he continued to stomp down the dirt.

If you move the dirt all at once and build the foundation, there will be a big problem later.

It was a common mistake when hardening the soil. The upper part is easily made firm, but underneath…? Not so much. So, if you moved and hardened a lot of dirt all at once… To the naked eye, the surface would look solid, but the inside would still be too soft. Then, if you built something on top of it… After a few years passed, the building would lean and cause a disaster.

Knowing all of this, Lloyd scooped up the dirt and packed it over and over again. As he worked, he suddenly noticed Javier. That punk had been standing off to one side for some time now. He was probably just faithfully fulfilling his duty as a guard.

“Hey, you.”

“You called for me, Sir Lloyd?”

“Yes, I did.”

“Do you have orders for me?”

“Hmm, I do. Come shovel with me.”

Javier made no reply.

“You don’t want to? Is that it?”

“If you help me, the job will get done twice as quickly.”

“Ah, I bet the pub owner’s mother is suffering from the chills right now. If she could rest in a room with heated floors, her aches would probably disappear in an instant. But for now, that’s impossible! Why? Because the holier-than-thou Sir Javier refuses to pick up a shovel.”

“Oh, if only she could soothe her body in a heated room. Her joint pain would subside, and she would wear a huge smile on her face. But for now, she can’t. Why? Because the almighty Lord Javier refuses to shovel.”

“Ah, for the simple final wish of someone who doesn’t have long to live…”

“Please just give me a shovel…”

In the end, Javier couldn’t take it anymore and grabbed a shovel. A devilish grin spread across Lloyd’s face. With that, the baron’s little monster and the future knight worked together, and the site for the room with the heated floor was well on its way. News of this work spread instantly to every corner of the realm.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 3: Model Home, Open House (2)

The rumors spread. They spread very quickly. It was true that rumors would always exist wherever people lived. Even so, this gossip was more noteworthy than usual, and it spread that much faster as this was something new and unexpected.

“Master Lloyd has finally lost his senses.”

“What?”

“I heard he’s been shoveling.”

“What do you mean?”

“Just like I said, he’s behind the pub, with a shovel, digging. He’s scooping up dirt, and then flattening it.”

“For what?”

“I don’t really know. According to what I heard, he threatened the pub owner.”

“Threatened him?”

“He seems to be claiming the land in the back of the pub for himself.”

“Haha, that’s…”

Everyone around the table continued to malign Lloyd. Out in the gardens, others whispered among themselves too.

“Did you hear? Master Lloyd tried to kill himself.”

“What, finally?”

“That’s what they said. He was digging yesterday, and today he’s doing it again.”

“He’s digging?”

“He’s scooping up dirt then placing flat stones in its place, all while mumbling something to himself.”

“Could it be…”

“Is he digging his own grave?”

Speculation ran rampant in the village. Was he burying a large supply of liquor? Perhaps he was digging a tunnel to keep out of his father’s sight? Some even thought he’d discovered a wild new fetish. A crowd of villagers had heard the rumors and gathered around the site to see for themselves. As they watched, the heated floor gradually took shape.

***

People here sure know how to talk, Lloyd thought as he wiped the sweat dripping from his brow.

He got mud on his face doing this but did not care. Then he took a look around. The room was small, only about twelve square feet. In just a few days, not only had he set the foundation but also built the walls. That was difficult.

Lloyd already expected that making a heated flooring system wouldn’t be easy. After actually doing it himself, it was even harder than he imagined. First of all, he didn’t have the same tools as when he was out working on projects in Korea. I don’t even have a single power tool.

Everything needed to be done by hand. He used his experiences working in construction and in the army to build the foundation. The process took two full days, and his whole body ached in return.

The wood taken from the baron’s lumber yard was trimmed, and the basic structure was made up of this heavy timber. The gabled roofs were erected, and beams were placed between the pillars for reinforcement. Then, a sticky plaster of red clay and straw was applied. Just like that, the red clay walls were completed in three days.

“Whew. Javier?”

“Sir?”

“Aren’t you tired?”

“I’ve grown accustomed to it, sir.”

“Really?”

Despite how good his athletic abilities were, construction work was another matter entirely. However, Javier wasn’t breathing hard at all. It probably takes a lot of energy to work muscles that aren’t normally used. Yet, why is he so composed? The amount of strength he has must be on a whole different level. Lloyd was in awe of his steely, top-condition stamina. Javier was certainly a reliable guy, especially when he was working for free like this.

Lloyd tested his luck using a gracious tone.

“Okay, then try doing what I tell you to.”

“There is more to do?”

“Of course.”

“How so?”

“The heated flooring hasn’t been completed yet.”

“But you only asked me to help for a little while.”

“Did I?”

“Yes sir,” Javier replied curtly in his characteristic cold tone. “First you asked me to help you shovel, saying that would be all. But your requirements kept changing. After finishing compacting the soil, you asked for help with the wood. Later you said that removing the mud was too hard and you asked for my help again."

"Hmm, so were you upset?"

"Of course, sir."

"Because you're a knight?"

Javier didn't reply, but the silence suggested the affirmative. It made sense, though. Instead of a sword, he was handling a shovel and saw while covered in dirt. He probably thought this kind of work was below the honor of a knight such as himself. But Lloyd found a weakness in Javier's line of thought.

"I was thinking, isn't a knight someone who helps the weak?"

"Excuse me?"

"You probably think so too."

"Well, that's…"

"Right? Then this work is also part of a knight's duty. Helping the weak is great practice in the chivalric arts. Wouldn't you say so? At this very moment, the pub owner's mom is probably shivering with chills. If we could even finish this just one day sooner, could you imagine the delighted cheer that would erupt from his poor elderly mother's lips…"

"What must I do now?" Javier sighed deeply.

With an impish smile, Lloyd said, "Split some wood for me."

He pointed outside. "See those logs in the corner out there behind the pub?"

"I see them."

“Okay, good. That’s red pine. Chop them up with an ax to make panels for the roof.”

“What are panels?”

Lloyd scratched a rough drawing of the panels on the ground and said, “They look like this.”

“Make them one span in width, two in length, and about a finger’s height in thickness. Think of it as a longer version of a tablet… oh, you don’t know what a tablet is, do you? Just think of it as a board and cut them all the same size. Understood?”

“Then wouldn’t the saw be better than the ax to cut with?”

“No, no. The ax is better.” Of course, cutting was easier with the saw. It was easier to cut them all the same size that way, too. However, sawing causes severe wear and tear, which could ruin the wood grain. Moisture can seep in and cause rotting in no time. “Unless you’d like to replace the roof in less than a year, use the ax.”

“Understood, but…”

“But?”

Now that Lloyd had his attention, Javier was staring at him with a curious expression.

“Master Lloyd, where did you learn all this?”

“All this? You mean building construction?”

“Yes sir.” His gaze was still frigid, but a glimmer of emotion was hidden beneath his opaque exterior. That feeling was one of intense curiosity.

Lloyd replied with honesty and openness, “Korea University.”

“Excuse me?”

“I learned about it at Korea University. It’s true. I’m not lying.”

“But I’ve never heard of such an academy.”

“Ah, surely you haven’t heard that I attended school somewhere, either?”

“Yes sir.”

“Then keep wondering. Now, let’s move. We have a lot to do, so let’s get working.”

Lloyd waved his hand and ushered Javier outside. Javier was much better at cutting the roof panels than he was. He just had a natural talent. Whether his target was a person or a tree, Javier was best at slicing it in half with a blade.

This punk’s already a top-rank swordsman.

The Knight of Blood and Iron mentioned this early in the novel. It was something no one in the Frontera barony knew yet, not even the baron or Javier himself. Javier was already phenomenally talented. He was close to being a senior swordsman. A provost. Because the nation was small and had only a handful of people of that caliber, it meant he could be commander of a decent size kingdom. And he’s barely even twenty years old.

Only when he departs the baron’s lands does Javier realize the amazing potential he has. But that is yet to come. Anyway, I better keep moving.

Lloyd rested a little, and then they began the next step.

It was the alpha and omega of the heating system. It was the bread and jam. Its existence was as crucial as HD graphics are to AAA computer games. “It” was the floor. This job just became real.

You can make a building as properly as possible, but it’s useless if the heating system didn't work. Lloyd knew this well and did his best to concentrate. It’ll go from here to there, as planned…

He'd done this back in the army too. There was a time when a commander got hooked on dry saunas, and Lloyd was commissioned to build one for the regional headquarters. How did it turn out? The happiness of the commander's wife increased dramatically. Because of this success, Lloyd was rewarded vacation time by the commander himself.

Lloyd was making full use of his experiences and memories. First: he dug into the floor. There had to be a passage for the heat and smoke from the furnace to flow. The passages must be circular in order to distribute the heat's path along the entire floor.

He dug the passages in a winding pattern. While doing so, he didn't forget to carefully decrease the height of the passageway as well. This way, the heat won't escape all at once, and it'll remain for as long as possible.

He made an opening where the initial flow of heat emerged from the furnace and a raised retainer wall where the heat was trapped before the smoke leaves through the chimney flue. The passages channeled the heat, so it flowed efficiently under the floor. A cover on the chimney top was placed last to block any rainwater or cold air from coming in.

This is hard.

He meticulously double-checked the work as he dug to minimize errors. He checked and adjusted, over and over again. Then he finished off the passage walls with red clay and let it dry completely. Above the passages, he carefully placed flat stones.

At the upper end of the passage neck — close to the furnace — I'll put heavy stones. At the opposite end where the lower neck is, I'll put lighter stones. He methodically sorted the stones and placed them in this way because the lower neck, being farther away from the furnace, was slower to heat up. Decreasing the thickness of the stones closer to the lower neck meant being able to evenly distribute heat throughout the entire floor.

Time to fill in the gaps.

He filled the space between the flat stones with gravel and then applied more red clay on top. Again, he placed dried mud and stomped on it to make it firm. He leveled the ground once more to make it flat as possible, then allowed it to dry thoroughly. Afterward, by sanding the surface and applying a light finish, it was complete. So far, it had taken three whole days.

The main part of the heating system was finished but putting it to the test would have to wait.

“Excuse me, young master?”

Just as he was standing there admiring his work, one of the servants walked in.

“Lord Frontera is looking for you.”

Lord Frontera, meaning Arcos Frontera, the baron. His father.

No way. He suddenly realized something…

Lloyd left the unfinished room, and the crowd that had been chattering nearby stopped its whispering at once. Passing through that awkward silence, Lloyd set off for the baron’s mansion.

***

“Apparently there’s a strange rumor going around these days.”

Clack.

His fork picked up a homemade sausage, but the baron’s hand stopped moving. The fork never made it to his mouth. His gaze turned toward the opposite end of the table.

“What are you doing behind that pub?”

His look held no warmth and, frankly, appeared unfeeling. It was more like he was looking at a burden than his own son. It put a bitter taste in Lloyd’s mouth.

This is the downside to being in this body. The owner of this body he found himself within, Lloyd Frontera, was a consummate brute. All he was known for was his binge drinking, gambling, and vandalism. He had quite an extensive record and his bad karma had piled up. So, he was the target of the prejudices of the people around him.

For instance, no matter what he did, people looked at him warily. They wondered what mischief that brute was up to, or what commotion he was going to cause this time. Maybe he was crazy, or maybe it was his time to die. If only he would stop bothering those around him…was what those looks seemed to say. The current situation was no different.

“Let’s hear it. What are you up to this time?”

The baron’s voice was colder than his eyes. As soon as he heard it, Lloyd knew it wasn’t a question — it was a rebuke.

Lloyd shrugged and said, “If you’ve heard the rumors, then you must already know. I’m making the heated flooring system the pub owner ordered.”

“A heated flooring system?”

“Yes.”

“So not only are you making empty promises to the pub owner, but you are even trying to deceive your own father?”

“I can’t help if you think of it that way.”

Lloyd beat around the bush. He didn’t know what he could say at this point that would be believable. It seemed easier to create more pointless misunderstandings. No matter, it felt weird to even try convincing the baron in front of him. It was just awkward. If I talk too much, I might get caught.

Parents will recognize their own children in one way or another. He wasn’t actually Lloyd Frontera. He was Suho Kim, currently the occupant of Lloyd’s body. He was anxious that they would suspect him, so he decided to avoid long conversations.

“If that’s all you wished to say, I’ll finish my meal now,” he said. Just as Lloyd would have, he cut the conversation short and focused on the food, only thinking to stuff himself full and leave before anything else could be said.

Then the baron posed another question. “Is it due to family matters? You’re aware of recent events. You know about what’s happened. Perhaps it has upset you enough that you’re doing this on purpose?”

Likely he was referring to the seizure of their property. As expected, his suspicion was correct.

“It’s fine. Merely a passing storm. Not much will come of it. After all, I am Arcos Frontera, the fifth baron of this estate. Your father can handle this much trouble like nothing, so try not to get in my way. I’m telling you I can handle it, so do not get worked up over it.”

He’d heard this kind of thing before. Suddenly, Lloyd raised his head and looked right at the baron. The baron was a handsome middle-aged man, but his expression was tired. That expression was just like the one he’d seen on his own father’s face.

It’s just like back then. It was the last vacation during his time in the army. His father had the same look on his face after falling for an investment scam. Abruptly, he clasped his hands and said, “Don’t worry, it’ll be fine. It’s nothing, just worry about studying.”

He pleaded and forced a smile, so Suho didn’t know a thing. Suho truly thought everything would be fine. He didn’t have a clue that, one year later, his parents would make a drastic decision because they couldn’t escape from the burden of debt. And now the baron sitting in front of him had that same expression on his face.

Lies.

It wasn’t fine. He was just forcing himself to appear fine in front of his son.

Clink.

Lloyd set his fork down. Long gone were his thoughts of focusing merely on eating, and he momentarily forgot about keeping his distance from the baron. He found himself speaking without realizing it. “Don’t give up, I’ll help too.” Those were the words he wished to say to his father years ago if he could go back in time.

With that, he quietly stood up. The baron stared at him peculiarly. His frigid stare from before now held a slightly different cast. His stare felt heavy, so Lloyd hurried to leave.

Thankfully, the baron didn’t stop him.

***

The construction continued. The heated flooring system in the pub owner’s yard was quickly taking shape. There were groups of spectators gathering around. He charred the panels as they watched intently, formulating their misunderstandings, murmurs, and rumors.

It was a treatment to prevent the wood from rotting through carbonization. He ruined a few at first since he wasn’t used to it. Some burned so much that they split, and others were too soft. However, he started to get the hang of it after a few tries. The trick was to scorch only the top three millimeters of the red pine panels.

Just perfect.

The panels were lightweight, yet hard, so water couldn’t easily penetrate them. They should be good even ten years later.

He layered the panels onto the roof, then carefully rolled out the paper lining and covered up the clay floor. A heftier paper was placed on top of that using a thick paste. He applied soybean oil on top of that, then finished off the waterproofing with a layer of resin.

The heated flooring was complete.

To test it out, he lit a flame and felt the floor.

“It’s done.”

A grin flashed across his face. Now, it was time to check out his customer’s reaction.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 4: Model Home, Open House (3)

“It’s quite…warm,” she said, as her wrinkled hand caressed the floor. With curiosity, at first, she pressed her palm down and then flipped it to brush the floor with her knuckles. Surprise suddenly filled her face. She tossed the cushion aside and plopped herself down on the toasty-warm floor. A smile of satisfaction curved across the white-haired woman’s face.

“So nice…so very nice.”

The elderly lady was a little senile, so her words were very direct. Hearing her approval, the pub owner looked at Lloyd. His face, too, was filled with a smile of gratitude. “My mother loves it, young master.”

“Does she?”

“Yes.”

“Just like I told you, this heated flooring system is very comforting,” Lloyd said with a shrug. He was just relieved that it was such a huge success.

It was still very early spring, and the morning air was crisp. Outside held the chill of the final cold snap. Inside was different. The fire was lit, the floor was toasty warm, and the air was relaxing. The pub owner was relieved to be removing his coat.

“You saw me light the fire earlier, right? All you have to do is start up the furnace outside the door. If you light it once like that, the heat will last about two days. That’s it. It really doesn’t cool off as quickly as you might think.”

“Two days, you said?” Once lit, the heat lasted two days. The pub owner’s eyes became wide with wonder.

Smiling, Lloyd said, “Test it out and see if what I said is true.”

“I…I definitely believe you.”

“Really?”

"Yes. Um, may I be honest?”

“Go right ahead.”

“I really thought you were trying to fool me, sir.”

“Me? Fool you?”

“Yes. I never imagined you would actually build this for me.”

Well, that was understandable. Just a little reminder: Lloyd Frontera was a complete and utter bastard. He’d never done anything for anyone else in his life. It wasn’t in his nature. No wonder the pub owner didn’t trust him.

“I had no faith in this, but you have given us such a great floor, of such warmth. I swear, I’ve never seen such a thing in my life.”

“Really?”

“Yes. My mother loves it so much. I don’t know how to express my thanks to you. Praise be the heated floor!”

I hope someone else can see this! Everyone is praising the magnificence of this classic Korean design! Lloyd coughed nervously and replied, “Ahem, no need to thank me. It was just for the contract.”

“Ah, the contract.”

“Yeah. Right. The contract.”

It was a mere transaction carried out through mutual agreement. Lloyd constructed the heated floor, and that would reimburse the pub owner for the damages inflicted.

“However, I think the cost of this heated floor is greater than the cost of what was broken. Sir, please wait here for a moment.” Lloyd had no idea what the tavern keeper was thinking as he promptly stood up. He returned shortly with a leather pouch in his hand.

“Please, take this.”

“What is it?”

“A small token of my extreme gratitude.”

Clunk. The pouch fell with a heavy metallic sound. There were coins inside.

“Oh my…you didn’t have to…”

Lloyd took up the pouch without hesitation. He then offered more advice on the heated floor’s use as a thank you. “See this window here? On a chilly night, leave this window slightly open at dawn to let in the cold air. Then, fire up the furnace to the max, and cover the floor with a blanket. Wrap some tangerines, roasted potatoes, or sweet potatoes in it to eat. Do you know what will happen next?”

“No. What will happen?”

“The air will be fresh, and your bottom will be warm. You’ll be like a fish at the confluence of warm and cold streams, as their currents converge.”

The pub owner tilted his head to one side, while, with a farewell wave, Lloyd left the room. There was a large group of spectators gathered nearby. They were still looking his way as they jabbered amongst themselves. Their faces held a mixture of some surprise and much doubt.

But of course. A laugh escaped him.

He thought of all the rumors about him that were swirling about: That he was unstable; that he was digging a grave for when he killed himself; that he was swindling the pub owner. There wasn’t a single good rumor!

And yet, before them all, sat a functional heated flooring system. All those convoluted rumors were shattered before their eyes.

Now they'll be even more curious. They'll wonder what kind of building has been made, what it's for, and why the pub owner likes it so much. They'll have no clue about anything.

Lloyd stood back and let the rumors fly. He had no reason to stop them. In fact, it's actually a good thing. It's like free advertising!

Publicity was important. It was life! That was the case for contractors too. This was even more true in South Korea. The smallest apartment began with a big promotion.

Broadcasting, billboards, and infomercials: these were just the basics. Other obvious options included, but were not limited to, social media, targeted search-based results, and viral videos. Reach the people by any means necessary!

That way I can take advantage of widespread promotions, while also muting any criticism. Then, when I open the model house, people will flock to it like seagulls.

As a result, there would be a whole line of contract requests, and it would become a proper business, or so Lloyd hoped.

These rumors drew a crowd here without me having to spend a dime. This is a unique opportunity. There were probably well over a hundred villagers looking his way and murmuring. But Lloyd didn't see the people of the estate. He saw potential contracts. He saw customers that were lining up to hand him their money.

The model house is now open. He stood before the crowd, the focus of all their attention. He cleared his throat and began, "Are you all wondering what it is I've made here?"

As he expected, no one replied. They all only kept their eyes fixed squarely on him. Lloyd smiled. Not bad. All was going as planned.

This would be a short, and rewarding, sales pitch.

“Come in, one by one, and take a look for yourselves!”

Lloyd approached the crowd carefully. He took a woman in front by the sleeve, and led her into the room, even as her face paled in concern.

Ladies first. It was they who started the rumors, after all.

With the pub owner’s permission, they began the tour. The woman’s eyes grew wide as she experienced the comfort of the warm flooring. After that, the rest was a breeze. The other gawkers took turns looking around and became converted to the benefits of a heated floor.

As they entered, their smug faces became ones of envy. Lloyd greeted them from a table he had set up; installation contracts spread out before him.

“Now that you’ve experienced it, what do you think?”

“It’s…it’s much nicer than I expected.”

“It is, isn’t it?”

“Yes. I don’t think we’ll have to worry about the winter cold anymore.”

“That’s why I’ve prepared this ahead of time. Would you like to take a look?”

“This here?”

“This is a blueprint. It’s a kind of plan.”

Lloyd had stayed up all night drafting lovingly hand-drawn pamphlets that demonstrated two styles of heated flooring systems. These he handed out to the people.

“Type A is the one you see here, where the heated floor is built in a separate building in the yard. Type B involves tearing up your existing floor on the ground level and remodeling it. If you order both, you’ll receive a ten percent discount. You have kids at home, right?”

“Yes. My oldest is seven, and the youngest is five.”

“In the winter, doesn’t it bring tears to your eyes to watch your children shiver and cough in the cold? Doesn’t it pain you to see them huddle in front of the fireplace to keep warm? Even the very thought must be heart-wrenching. If you sign a contract now, I’ll give you a special deal where you receive five free bundles of firewood. Consider wisely. This chance doesn’t come by every day.”

“Well, even so…”

“What, you don’t want to?”

The man clamped his mouth shut. Lloyd understood how he felt. It’s because he doesn’t trust me. Or maybe he’s just afraid.

It made sense, after all. He may be a different person, but these people were unaware of it. To them, he was the same old Lloyd Frontera, the scourge of the barony—human trash that was best at drinking and mayhem.

I can’t expect them to suddenly believe in me after showing them just one good deed.

Perhaps they thought it was all a con, or that he was fooling around, so they hesitated to sign a contract. He had already expected as much.

“So? You won’t sign a contract? Really, is that how you’re going to be?”

The man flinched as Lloyd stared at him intently. He’d already figured out the meaning behind the man’s gaze. He probably thinks I’ll make his life here difficult if he doesn’t sign the contract right now. He’s wracked with anxiety. Lloyd stifled a bitter smile. Using the discomfort and fear of the villagers felt like a cheap shot. But for now, it was the best plan.

It won’t hurt to take advantage of my despicable reputation every now and then. It’s not like I’m going to take off with their down payments and never build a single thing.

This launch was the most important thing. He had to obtain signed contracts no matter what. After that, he was confident that good word of mouth would make it all happen. For now, he had to lowball and make good use of Lloyd's notoriety.

Another customer: "Ah… I understand." He was rationalizing between being conned and avoiding an oncoming disaster. The man signed the contract with some hesitation. It was the same for the next and the next and the next. Naturally, Lloyd was confident that he could brighten those faces soon enough.

That's just how efficiently the heated flooring system works. That was his conclusion based on his investigations over the past few days. The current fireplace systems in the area had limitations.

Contrary to appearances, a fireplace is not as efficient as it looks. It only heats what's close by, and because it only warms the air, it cools off quickly. The heat doesn't stay inside for long. Additionally, ash and smoke burn the eyes. It's hard to care for since you can't use just any firewood. To keep the light and heat from going out, one person must stay up all night to watch over it.

His heated flooring system on the other hand? It created a balanced system, as Lloyd continued to confidently persuade the villagers. Before the afternoon had come to a close, Lloyd had secured thirty-two contracts type-A and fifty-seven contracts type-B. This provided him with a hefty sum of deposits.

Awesome!

It wasn't a whole lot of money, of course, and he didn't have anywhere near enough to settle the baron's debt. However, it was from here going forward that was important.

Although it was all a bit forced, when I complete these heated floors to their satisfaction, good news will come of it. Then I'll even be able to branch out to other regions. Branding the heated flooring system and building a business around it in this region was Lloyd's primary goal.

Whew, he finished up the final contract and let out a sigh. Then, he took a look around at the red-tinted sunset that he hadn't admired before. He turned away and saw Javier headed in his direction.

"Hey, you. You're strong, right?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"Then what do you think of being a human crane or forklift?"

"Sir?"

"You said you're strong. Could you use that strength to dig up the ground and lug logs?"

It was a sincere request. Javier was an incredible knight. Certainly, his strength surpassed that of human limitations. If Javier were to do the heavy lifting? His future construction projects would become much simpler and speedier. Efficiency would increase. At the same time, he could take on more projects and greatly increase his income.

However, Javier shook his head without hesitation. "I cannot."

"Why not?"

"Because the baron has given me the mission of your personal protection."

"So, he wouldn't allow you to be a construction worker?"

"That is correct."

"But you've helped me up until now."

"That's because, as a knight, I thought it was my duty to assist the pub owner's elderly mother."

"Protection of the weak?"

"Yes. However, the request you've just made is different."

“You won’t help me with my business?”

“That is correct.”

“You’re certain of this?”

“Indeed.”

Of course, he would be the resolute type. Lloyd smacked his lips. But still, I definitely need heavy equipment.

The difference between having and not having the equipment meant a construction period of up to ten times longer. Even the type of construction options that were possible would change.

If I want to make big money, I’ve got to build on a larger scale.

He was satisfied with heated floors for now, but he wanted to surpass that level at some point. The amount of money he could make with just that was limited.

I don’t want to be paying back debt until I’m at a ripe old age, he worried.

His life in Korea was topsy-turvy because of money, and he really didn’t want to live that way here too.

So, if I intend to pay this whole debt off with a construction company, I have to figure out this heavy equipment issue.

He pondered deeply on this for the entire way back home. Yet Lloyd couldn’t come up with anything. Javier’s cold eyes stared at him; his look had seemingly changed from before.

***

I’m at a loss for words. Javier was quite flustered as he followed behind Lloyd. Lloyd Frontera was the eldest son of his master, Lord Frontera. He had been in charge of escorting him for the past few months, which disconcerted him even more. Was this alky always like this?

Lloyd was a total scumbag — not just in the opinion of the most conservative fellows, but also in the view of the average person. He had no patience, and one could expect neither manners nor refinement from him. He was merely a worthless booze hound, constantly guzzling alcohol.

The day of the foreclosure on his family's home was no different.

Honestly, I hated him. Well, I still do.

The more he got to know him, the more he was unlikeable. If he weren't his master's son, he probably would've already sliced him up. Although Javier was escorting him, he despised his existence. To him, Lloyd was nothing but human garbage.

But suddenly, he's different now.

It was a few days ago, the morning of the day after he caused a scene at his regular pub. Javier still clearly remembered what Lloyd was like that morning. I barely had to call him twice to wake him up. That was unimaginable before. The scoundrel even remembered and called Javier's name for the first time. But that was just the beginning.

He sought out the pub owner to appease him, and instead of monetary compensation, he promised to make him a heated floor. Up until that point, Javier thought he was just up to some more shifty mischief. However, that was not the case. He actually built the heated floor and kept his promise to the pub owner.

It didn't stop there. Lloyd even drew up contracts for all the villagers gathered there. Is he trying to make money? No, that's only an excuse.

Somehow, Javier felt that Lloyd had a bigger goal in mind. Of course, what exactly that was, he couldn't guess. But he was still certain that this behavior wasn't characteristic of Lloyd. It's as if he's become a different person overnight.

His manner of speech was different, his attitude and expressions, and he suddenly had new skills to show off. He designed buildings and showcased whole new heating systems. It was puzzling.

He wondered if maybe he really was a different person. Yet, no matter how closely he watched, the man walking ahead of him step by step truly was that monster, Lloyd Frontera. Then maybe he's been hiding this side of himself the whole time.

That was the only explanation; the only thing that made sense of it all.

Previously he led a life of leisure as part of a baron's family, but once the household hit hard times, he's suddenly showing his true self? He really had no idea if that was the case, of course, it was too soon to make any conclusions. For now, I'll stick to my mission.

And, if it was possible, he'd continue keeping an eye on that jerk, Javier promised to himself, as he glared at the back of Lloyd's head.

At that moment, an unexpected message popped up in front of Lloyd.

***

Ding Dong!

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by two points.

Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -29]

[You have earned 36 RP by improving relationships with a key character.

Current RP: 36]

[Investing in RP will allow you to develop special skills.]

What's this again?

The message floated ahead of him, and Lloyd's eyes fluttered around as he read it.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 5: Increasing Relationship Points (1)

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by two points.

Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -29]

[You have earned 36 RP by improving relationships with a key character.

Current RP: 36]

[Investing in RP will allow you to develop special skills.]

What is this now? A mid-air message floated in front of him.

Somehow, it didn't feel unfamiliar. Come to think of it, I saw something like this when I first arrived here. It was when Javier first woke him up. He heard a voice saying something about RP then too. I thought it was just a silly dream.

But that didn't seem to be the case anymore.

No matter, it was baffling. He wondered what this RP and special skills were all about.

Approval? Improve relationships with the main character?

Lloyd moved his eyes rapidly. He confirmed the message was in front of him.

It wasn't hard to understand.

My approval rating with Javier went up, and our relationship slightly improved. Therefore, I can use this RP I earned to develop my skills?

Lloyd stopped walking, and Javier turned to face him.

"Hey."

“Yes.”

“What were you thinking just now?”

“I’m not sure what you mean.”

“I bet you just judged or made some comment about me in your head, didn’t you? Something like, ‘I thought this guy totally sucked, but it turns out he’s not a complete piece of trash’.”

“I never thought that.”

“Yes, you did.”

“I did not.”

“Really? You didn’t think I was a complete piece of trash earlier?”

“Yes,” Javier said with a sincere expression.

“There is not one person who is pure trash in this world. No matter how much of a mess they are, everyone has at least a shred of human kindness somewhere deep in their hearts. That is what I believe.”

“That’s very comforting.”

To reiterate, Javier had a talent for straightforwardly and carefully making his every word be felt to your bones… no, to your very marrow. Even before you realized it.

“Tsk, let’s just head home.” They started walking toward the manor again.

He sent Javier to his quarters and closed his bedroom door once he was alone. He opened the message related to skills and read it in earnest.

The way to open it was simple. “Skill window.” He tried just to be sure.

[Loading the skill window.]

“Dang, it really works.”

He thought events that felt like fiction had been taking place since he came into the world of the novel. However, what was happening now seemed even more fantastic.

Lloyd looked admiringly at the skill window in front of him.

[Log of special skills that can be developed.]

[Survey skill to identify terrain and space detected.]

[Soil mechanics skill detected.]

[Hydraulics skill detected.]

[These can be combined into a “basic surveying” skill.]

[RP needed for skill development = 15]

What?!

Surveying. A survey was done before designing a structure to identify the topography and expanse of the land. As the word itself suggested, it was one of the basics of civil engineering. That was because surveying was the start of construction.

Yet, I can develop surveying as a skill?

It seemed that his existing knowledge and talent significantly impacted what skills he could develop. Lloyd confirmed this thought while looking at the continually emerging messages.

[Material mechanics skill detected. Statics skill of handling stationary objects detected.]

[Structural mechanics skill detected.]

[Water supply and sewage theory skill detected.]

[Steel structure design and concrete design skill detected.]

[Experience and skill in CAD programming detected.]

[The abilities above can be combined into a “basic design” skill.]

[RP needed for skill development = 20]

Not only was there surveying, but there was also design. These were all things he tirelessly studied in school.

Lloyd tightly squeezed his fist without realizing it. Awesome.

In any case, he was planning to start construction soon to relieve the baron’s debt and earn a fortune. He was even thinking of creating a large-scale construction business in the future.

What he needed most were precise surveys and designs.

But there wasn’t any equipment available here. I couldn’t even dream of a GPS surveyor, and designing was even more hopeless.

He had to draw the design for the heated flooring system by hand.

At that moment, he missed the CAD software he had conveniently used in South Korea.

However, those skills equipped him to do all of these things.

Lloyd made a bold decision. Let’s develop basic surveying and design skills.

He invested 15 RP for now.

The response was immediate.

[Basic surveying skill has been developed.]

[Skill Name: Basic Surveying]

[Consumes a small amount of mana. You can use your eyes to calculate the exact figures of a land’s terrain, area, and altitude. Additionally, you can get a rough insight on the properties of the soil and water that make up a topographic surface.]

[Area that can be measured at once: 330 square feet]

Is this real? Lloyd pinched himself.

He couldn’t believe he could survey 33 feet all at once with his bare eyes. He could even grasp the properties of the soil and bodies of water within range.

It almost felt like cheating.

Let’s check it out first.

He opened his window. Fortunately, his bedroom was on the second floor, and he could see all of the manor’s courtyard. He used his skill while looking around the courtyard.

“Basic surveying.”

[Surveying will begin.]

The message rang out loud. At the same time, part of his view changed into an augmented reality view.

Thirty-three feet by thirty-three feet. Countless numbers and data points appeared overlaid on the given area.

“Amazing.” It was as if he had turned on a 3D map in his head.

While he was at it, he invested 20 RP into developing basic design skills.

[Basic design skill has been developed.]

[Skill Name: Basic Design Skill]

[Consumes a small amount of mana. You can visualize your desired design drawing in the air through three-dimensional forms of dots, lines, and surfaces. Any modeling errors in the drawing will be automatically corrected.]

[Volume of structure that can be projected at once: 3,300 cubic feet]

Let's test this out. He immediately put the skill to use.

A virtual pitch-black space formed in the air before his eyes. Inside it, he could freely manipulate the 3D dots, lines, and surfaces. He could even recall the land's topography he's just now identified with the basic surveying skill!

It was like being able to limitlessly use a futuristic three-dimensional hologram version of the CAD design program.

Oh man. This is nuts. He was swooning at this point.

Is this what it feels like to become the god of architecture? Although, the area of surveying and design is certainly still a bit small. That issue will naturally resolve as I develop more skills in the future.

However, Lloyd felt slightly upset. It would've been nice if I had a skill for heavy machinery or construction equipment.

If he did, he could have even made his own construction equipment. But he did not have that skill. He was a civil engineer, not a mechanical engineer.

Lloyd wistfully licked his lips while looking through the skill window.

Then, his eyes suddenly focused on one spot.

What's this?

[Random Summon Game]

[Send RP to pick a summon.]

[A strong and unique summon partner will provide their unwavering loyalty along with a wide range of skills to their master.]

That was the introduction message written down.

Is this like some sort of mobile lottery game? There are all kinds of things here. I want to try it if possible. But I can't because I don't have enough RP.

[1 Turn = 50 RP]

Tsk, as if.

He had used up most of his RP while acquiring two skills just now and only had one RP point left. I need to collect more RP.

He already knew how to. He needed to win the favor of the main characters around him to improve his relationships with them. There actually were many ways to accomplish this, especially now.

It was at this exact time. He suddenly remembered the first part of the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron.

It was during the time when Javier was still working at the baron's manor. Lord Frontera was severely struggling with the debt collectors who came by every day. That might happen today too. He called the maid and quietly asked. The maid nodded their head. "Ah, yes, young master. There were guests who came looking for the lord earlier."

As I expected. Why else would there be a guest at this time? Lloyd smiled. Perfect timing. How great of them to come right when I need them.

Another way to earn more RP came to his mind.

Lloyd left his bedroom and headed toward the baron's office.

***

"So… what are you going to do now!?"

As Lloyd reached the front of the office, an enraged voice leaked into the hallway. Whether it was because the old manor wasn't properly soundproofed or the uproar inside was greater than he thought, he could only tell it was the latter once he opened the door.

"Lord, how much longer are you going to delay this? Hasn't it been over five days since the promised date?"

"He's right. We won't stay still if you keep dragging this on."

There were two debt collectors there. A pudgy man with a potbelly and a bony man who had a sickly pale complexion.

The two men had their hands on their hips and their chins raised.

And Lord Frontera? He was sitting in his chair, sighing deeply. His drooping shoulders and face made him look like a guilty criminal.

Well, his feelings are understandable.

The potbellied man and the bony man who came today were vicious loan sharks. They never gave up on collecting money. They were the type of people who would try to make more money by selling off their debtor's corpses if they died.

Of course, they might meet their ends while pulling that sort of stunt while Javier slashes their throats.

That event would occur in the distant future, one year from now, after the baron's suicide.

Tsk, how did they end up borrowing money from people like them? He clicked his tongue without realizing it and took a step forward.

He spoke in a subdued voice. "No matter what anyone says, Lord Frontera is the owner of this manor. If you came as a guest, please be polite."

They must've noticed his existence only just then. The two loan sharks turned their heads toward him.

The baron lifted his head.

“Lloyd?” He spoke in a surprised voice.

Lloyd lowered his head slightly toward him.

The potbellied man tilted his head and interrupted them. “Who are you?”

“I am the eldest son of this family.”

“Eldest son?”

“Yes.”

“Aha, the eldest son with the particular manners?”

“I am a bit famous thanks to that.”

“Is that why you are so rudely interrupting our discussion like this?”

“It’s for the honor of this manor’s owner, the baron’s family.”

“That’s a problem.”

“Why so?”

“The owner of this manor will change soon.”

“Time will tell whether the owner changes or not.”

He smiled. “Show me your warrant now.”

“What…?” The potbellied man furrowed his eyebrows.

Lloyd sneered even harder at him and asked, “Don’t you have a warrant?”

“What warrant are you asking for?”

“The Royal Family and Nobility Act, Article 3, Clause 6. All nobles of the kingdom, regardless of status or rank, have appropriate rights and honors as vassals of the king. An aristocrat may exercise their right to protect their personal interests."

"What…"

"I am saying, strictly according to the laws of the kingdom…entry into the residence of a noble family without a warrant is considered trespassing under aristocratic law."

"Are you saying we are trespassing?"

"Ah, did you finally understand?" He clapped his hands.

In reality, no one followed this law. However, it was one that clearly existed.

He suddenly remembered the delightful scene at the beginning of the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron.

It was immediately after the Frontera couple's suicide. A funeral was held at the baron's mansion, and the two loan sharks had come. They caused an uproar, demanding the corpses of the baron and baroness because they needed to sell them.

Right then, Javier pulled out his sword. He asserted the law and slashed the two in one stroke.

Afterward, Javier was brought before a judge but luckily didn't receive any punishment. It was because that law did indeed exist, and the two loan sharks had come without an invitation and caused a great uproar.

Of course, I can't just kill them since they aren't acting as badly right now. But it was the perfect excuse to kick them out.

"Take care then. I hope you learn some manners before your next visit."

"Do you think you'll get away with this?"

"Time will tell the answer to that as well."

The two snarling loan sharks looked ridiculous. They left the office trembling with rage.

Lloyd sent them off with a burst of mocking laughter.

That was when he finally heard Lord Frontera's urgent voice. "What… have you done?"

When he turned around, the baron's face was completely frozen.

Well, it was understandable.

After all, the least they could do was appease the spirited debt collectors, let alone provoke them and kick them out.

A bitter laugh escaped him. Those hyena-like bastards.

Painful memories from South Korea resurfaced in his mind. His parents became victims of insurance fraud. The debt collectors who came every day. His father faded away day by day under their constant harassment.

I won't ever be put in that position again.

The more you weakly cowered, the more you'd be pushed around. That was especially true with bastards like them. However, the baron was in a tough situation. It was much more difficult than you'd think to be confident during hard times. Realistically it was almost impossible.

"Answer my question. What have you just done?" The baron's face had crumpled somewhere along the line. He probably believed his clueless son made a huge mess of things. It was better to show instead of tell in these situations.

He took out a pouch from his arms and placed it on the baron's desk. There was a heavy jingling sound.

"Don't worry."

"What?"

“This should be more than enough to cover this month’s interest. Resolve it with this. Things will quiet down for the time being.”

“What… is this?”

It was the down payments from the heated floors he sold today. However, he did not explain it himself. There was someone else who, at least for now, was more trusted than him.

“If you’re curious, ask Sir Asrahan for the answer.”

Lloyd lowered his head to the baron and quickly left the office before he could be stopped.

Whew. He finally released the breath he was holding. He shook his head once to brush off his pounding heart. He didn’t head toward his bedroom. He went toward the training hall in the back instead.

The training hall was full of moonlight instead of people. He briefly strolled while waiting for about an hour. The alert should come right about now.

Just when he had that thought, the alert he was waiting for came.

Ding Dong.

[Your likeability with Arcos Frontera has increased by six points.]

[Current RP with Arcos Frontera: -14]

[You have earned 60 RP by improving relationships with main characters.]

[Current RP: 61]

Perfect. He clenched his fist.

As expected, the baron seemed to have called in Javier. He must’ve heard about Lloyd’s recent doings through Javier’s explanation.

All is going as planned.

It was less effective to speak of your own good deeds. This was even more true if the good deed came from a guy who had previously acted like nothing more than trash.

Good job, Javier

Javier likely gave a cold and objective explanation, which would’ve made the account even more believable.

Thanks to you, I have 61 RP in total.

It had paid off to wait purposefully in the empty training hall. Finally, it was time to draw his first summon partner.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 6: Increasing Relationship Points (2)

Good job, Javier.

He felt a sense of gratitude arise from seeing the message in front of him.

Javier likely gave a cold and objective explanation of what happened.

Javier was the main character of the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron. He was a cold-blooded and stubborn guy. He wasn't shaken up by any situation. He strived to be objective about everything. He probably tried to show up earlier as well.

There was no doubt he calmly informed the baron of what Lloyd had done and how he had behaved all this time.

It's a relief that the baron didn't negatively judge me.

It was actually a slight gamble.

He used to be a son who did nothing but cause trouble every day. But he suddenly revealed knowledge not known before. He made a heated flooring system that didn't even exist here. As if that wasn't enough, he took things further by making money by setting up construction contracts with the villagers.

It would be justifiable for the baron to be suspicious of the situation.

But he wasn't.

Of course, he probably thought it was strange. However, he seemed to be happy more than anything.

That's just the heart of a parent.

Was there any parent who didn't first feel overwhelming happiness in a situation where their kid changed for the better?

On the one hand, it did feel unsettling to take advantage of that sincerity, but on the other hand, he didn’t have another choice right now.

For now, let’s just push forward and see what happens.

It was practicality over morality in the present. This was the time to seek profit through practical means.

If not, he would repeat his life in South Korea, forever struggling with poverty.

With that determination, Lloyd looked around at his surroundings again. Thankfully, he didn’t sense another person’s presence in the moonlit training hall.

He took a deep breath and opened the window.

His eyes followed one spot among the sea of information flooding before him.

[Random Summon Game]

[Send RP to pick a summon.]

[A strong and unique summon partner will provide their unwavering loyalty along with a wide range of skills to their master.]

[1 Turn = 50 RP]

[Current RP: 61]

[Would you like to start the summon game?]

[YES / NO]

He chose ‘Yes’ of course and nodded his head.

[The random summon game is starting.]

50 RP were expended with the introduction message.

At the same time, there was something emerging five steps ahead of him.

Fwoosh!

The ground was engraved with a pale light that formed a complex figure. The magic circle gave off mystical energy.

Is it coming out?

He frequently saw this scene in mobile games, but it was a little different seeing it in real life. No, it was very different. It couldn't be compared to mediocre 3D visual effects.

He radiated with anticipation for what would come out of the magic circle. It was heart-pounding to just watch.

Then, something came out at last. Bzzzt! Something surged from the ground with a strong shock wave.

It flew over in his direction, right into his arms.

"Ppodong!"

Soft and fluffy. Furry. Plump bottom. Short arms and legs. A petite figure that was smaller than half his fist.

This was a…

"Hamster?"

"Ppodong!"

"Why did a hamster come out of here?"

"Ppodong! Ppodong!"

"One came out because it's you?"

“Ppodong!”

The hamster nodded his head like it was obvious.

Lloyd set down the hamster, feeling bewildered.

This is a summon partner?

He had used a whopping 50 RP to play the game.

But in the end, what had come out was one mere hamster that couldn’t be seen as anything other than a pet.

However, Lloyd didn’t panic and calmed himself down instead.

I was told that summon partners had a wide variety of skills. First thing, this fella understands my words and responds to me. It must mean he’s not an ordinary hamster starting with this.

It wasn’t only that. Somehow, he could also understand Ppodong’s responses. They could communicate.

He lifted the hamster onto his palm, looked at him, and said, “Hey.”

“Ppodong?”

“Do you have any special abilities?

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“You said you’re a summon partner.”

“Ppodong!”

“How about showing some proof that you are one?”

“Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong!”

The hamster stuffed both hands into his mouth and pulled something out of his cheek. It was a small envelope and a wrinkled piece of paper the size of a business card.

“Ppodong?” “Ppo-do-dong!”

“You’re giving me this?”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Read the paper?”

“Ppodong!”

He smoothed out the piece of paper and saw tiny written words that resembled black sesame. Thankfully, the moonlight was bright so he could manage to read the content.

[Ppodong User Manual

Ppodong is an adorable hamster. Please give him lots of love.

Ppodong will give his utmost loyalty to you, his master. A summon partner is not only your companion animal but also your family, so please don’t neglect them.

Ppodong can change his size by eating one of the enclosed sunflower seeds.]

[Red Sunflower Seed: Ppodong grows to gigantic proportions. Effective for maximum 12 hours.]

[Blue Sunflower Seed: Ppodong shrinks back to a smaller size. Feed this to Ppodong before the 12-hour period ends. Otherwise, he will automatically shrink back once the time limit passes and be too exhausted to grow again for 24 hours.]

[One set of the two colors of sunflower seeds is 1 RP.]

[Ppodong can use a wide range of skills while he is gigantic.]

[Ppodong’s Skill Log]

[Digging (Lv. 1)]

[Packing Dirt (Lv. 1)]

[Cheer Pockets (Lv. 1)]

Hmm. Digging and packing dirt. Could he be used as a forklift?

After Llyod read the user manual, he opened the enclosed envelope that came with it. As expected, there were sunflower seeds inside. There are ten each of red and blue sunflower seeds.

Lloyd stared at the hamster, no, Ppodong. “Hey, you.”

“Ppodong?”

“So, you get bigger if you eat this?”

“Ppodong!”

“How big?”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Very big?”

“Ppodong!”

How much bigger can he get? He’s naturally so small.

Size was a relative concept. He wondered how much bigger it could possibly grow.

He’ll have plenty of uses if he even manages to become human-sized.

He never had a pet hamster before. He only heard somewhere that hamsters were good at digging furrows. That was why he anticipated human-sized Ppodong to be able to do the work of several people.

“Let’s first check it out.”

“Ppodong?”

“Get down first.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

He set Ppodong on the ground and held out a red sunflower seed.

“Do you want to try this?”

“Ppodong?”

“Doesn’t it smell good?”

“Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong?”

“Here, it’ll taste good.”

“Ppodong!”

The hamster sniffed his nose and quickly snatched the sunflower seed. He put it in his mouth and chewed.

Lloyd took a few steps back.

How big will he get? He studied him with equal parts excitement and worry.

And then, the moment Ppodong swallowed the sunflower seed he was munching on…

BOOM!

He grew to over 30 feet tall.

Amazing. Wow. Lloyd looked up in disbelief. Ppodong's face was very far up now that he transformed into a giant hamster.

If I hadn't moved back enough, I could've crashed into him and gone flying like a bouncy ball.

The growth happened in an instant, like popcorn popping or an airbag in a car crash. Ppodong enlarged at an extreme rate.

If he hadn't made enough space between them? He would've crashed against the growing hamster and went flying as if he was in a road accident.

I'll be careful from now on. He made up his mind and looked up at Ppodong.

No matter, he needed to test Ppodong's skills right now.

"Hey, can you hear me?"

"Ppodong?" The hamster looked down at him with his gigantic head.

Thankfully, his eyes still looked friendly. He was no longer worried about getting eaten.

"Do you want to try digging?"

"Ppo-do-dong?"

"Can you make a straight two-meter-deep furrow from here to there?"

"Ppodong?" "Ppo-do-dong!" Ppodong nodded his head.

He swayed his giant chubby butt while moving to the indicated destination. Then he started moving his two short front paws at lightning speed.

"Ppo-do-do-dong!"

Swish! Swish! Swish! It was a soil storm; mounds of dirt explosively flew up into the air.

Ppodong’s chubby body ruthlessly moved forward.

After just three minutes, a gigantic two-meter deep and twenty-meter-long furrow was completed in the training hall.

“Amazing.” It was beyond his wildest dreams and above any of his expectations.

However, Llyod quickly snapped out of his admiring trance. There wasn’t time to be in awe.

I don’t know who might catch this sight after all. He decided to finish the test as swiftly and efficiently as possible.

With that thought in mind, Lloyd spoke to Ppodong. “Good job. Next is packing the dirt.”

“Ppodong?”

“Try filling in the furrow you just made as flatly as possible.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“Can you do it?”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong moved at once. He got into position in front of the recently made furrow. Then he shook his fluffy butt and spread his paws. Finally, he darted rapidly from side to side with gusto.

“Ppo-do-do-dong!”

“Swoosh! Swoosh! Swoosh!”

If the earlier digging was like a soil storm, his current movements were like a vacuum cleaner.

Ppodong’s plump butt was his center of gravity. His hefty behind grounded him as he quickly moved from side to side.

He gathered the messily scattered mounds of dirt he dug earlier and pushed them into the furrow.

The hamster ruthlessly advanced, and the furrow filled in more each time he moved forward. But that wasn’t the end.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

Once Ppodong finished filling in the furrow, he laid his body down and started rolling along the area. Once forward, once back. That was enough.

He used the dense wall of fat on his side to compress the ground like a steamroller.

Thanks to that, the bumpy surface became completely flat after he rolled back and forth over it. There wasn’t a single trace left of the furrow.

Good. Very good. The more he looked, the more he was satisfied.

Lloyd felt Ppodong was worth the 50 RP he invested. What a relief. I had overworked myself to collect the RP.

He had purposefully visited the baron while he was quarreling with the debt collectors and went a bit overboard to improve his appeal. This was all so he could increase his approval with the baron.

It was worth the risk of being suspected. Now, I should test out the final skill.

Lloyd looked up at Ppodong. The hamster was proudly looking at the furrow he filled into perfection.

“Hey, Ppodong?”

“Ppodong?”

“You have cheek pockets, right?”

“Ppodong!”

“Can you hold stuff in there?”

“Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong!”

“It’s possible? How much?”

“Ppodong!” The hamster pointed his paw across the yard to a rock that was about six feet in diameter.

Lloyd knit his eyebrows. No way.

However, it was real.

Before he could say anything, Ppodong had already started moving and put the rock in one of his cheeks.

“Ppu-du-dung!”

“Amazing…”

“Ppuduuung! Ppudung!” “Are you okay?”

“Ppudung! Ppu-du-dung!” He proudly nodded his head.

Every time he nodded, the cheek stuffed with rocks swayed ominously.

I could even use him as a weapon. He’s built like a tank.

Lloyd knew Ppodong was thirty-three feet tall, but he felt like he had met a dinosaur, seeing him in real life. Even the elephants he had seen at the zoo seemed like puppies compared to Ppodong.

“Now, put the rock back in its place.”

“Ppodong?” Ptooey!

“Good job. Do you want to eat this now?

“Ppodong!”

He put the blue sunflower seed in the hamster’s mouth. Ppodong instantly turned small once he swallowed the sunflower seed. Poof.

He took the shrunken hamster in his arms. Ppodong must’ve been tired as he pushed into Lloyd’s inside pocket.

Lloyd felt his small weight and warmth.

It was a success. This is amazing.

He went over what he saw of Ppodong today. The results had far surpassed his expectations.

He dug a sixty-five-foot-long and six-foot-deep furrow in only three minutes and perfectly filled it back in. Furthermore, he was even able to hold a rock weighing several tons in one cheek.

A high-power forklift, a perfect steamroller, and even a dump truck. He had all three functions in one body. It felt like getting the Swiss army knife of heavy machinery.

With these capabilities, he wouldn’t hesitate to spend RP on the sunflower seeds needed for transformation.

On top of everything, he’s incredibly portable.

Before he knew it, Ppodong had fallen fast asleep in his inner pocket.

He probably had to hide him for the time being.

I’ll have to carry around a summoning book. He needed at least this much of an excuse to prepare for when Ppodong would be seen by others. That way, it wouldn’t look suspicious if the troublemaker of the baron’s family suddenly summoned a giant hamster. If anything, people would chant, “Our young master is the best!”

With that, he escaped the training hall with Ppodong in his arms.

As he returned to his bedroom, he thought of what to do next.

I finally have decent construction equipment. Now, it's time to seriously start building.

He already had a successful sale with the heated flooring systems earlier today. It was wise to strike while the iron was hot. He planned to follow the momentum and start his construction business.

To do that, I need a construction team with engineers and seasoned laborers, who will dependably work on-site, and a capable individual to lead them.

Of course, he had thought about how to organize the field team before.

Flicker. The fireplace in the bedroom burned all night.

Lloyd picked up a sheet of paper and a pen.

He refreshed his memories and began making a list of all the main characters early on in the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron.

That was the memorable start of how Baron Frontera's ordinary knights and guards would be transformed into a full-scale construction army.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 7: Overhaul (1)

Lord Frontera's barony was an ordinary rural estate in the corner of the Lorasian continent. His military forces were abysmally small. Not only were they small, but they were pathetic. There were five knights and one hundred soldiers. Even then, they were more like a vigilante gang. That was how the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron described the condition of Lord Frontera's dominion.

It was a sunny morning. The perfect weather to start construction. Under the sun, Lloyd spoke to the eighty men gathered by the river. "…from today on, you will be reborn as elite soldiers on the field. If you work hard to dig up and move everything here, that is." He pointed to the riverside. There was red clay where he pointed. A tremendous amount of it at that.

The red clay had been buried deep in the ground. However, I was able to dig it up thanks to Ppodong.

He had secretly come here early in the morning and created the mound of red clay in just thirty minutes by transforming Ppodong. Afterward, he brought eighty soldiers of the estate here at sunrise, so they could transport the red clay to the construction site.

He looked around at his troops. "You're probably wondering what's going on and why you're being tasked with this kind of labor. That's just how the military is. What's the highlight of the military? It's work."

The Korean army was the same. What about the battle training meant for protecting the nation? That was important, too, but real life was a little different. From trench to drainage construction, I was building one thing today and another the next. I was given project after project, and my time in the military went by before I knew it.

He felt like he became the staff sergeant's personal summoner. That was why he wanted to give this estate's soldiers the same experience. It wasn't just to torture them. It's physical exercise disguised as menial labor.

The red clay was heavy. If you carried around a sack full of red clay? It not only trained the lower body but the abdominal core, shoulders, back, and forearms. The boost in endurance was also a bonus. Labor builds muscle.

With that thought, Lloyd spoke out. “Anyway, we are about to break ground on our estate’s renaissance. I’m talking about the heated flooring construction for the people. To do that, I need all of you to move that clay to the construction site.”

“Yes, young master…” A few soldiers grudgingly replied.

Lloyd smiled. “Good. Then let’s start by stretching.”

“Huh?”

“Do you want to get hurt while working? It’ll be your loss if you hurt your back and knees from pushing your stiff body to carry the heavy supplies. Understand? So, you should warm up your body.”

“Copy my moves. One, two.”

“O-one… two…”

“You’re too quiet. Move properly. One, two!”

“O-one, two!”

Lloyd slowly warmed up his body in front of the soldiers. The soldiers seemed dazed at first. But they started moving faster once Lloyd started making a face at them. The infamous master troublemaker. The notoriety he had amassed this entire time paid off. There’s no point in training if you don’t warm up and end up getting hurt while working. Stretching was more important than you’d expect on a construction site.

The ground could be bumpy, or there could be dangerous objects littered everywhere. Most construction sites were in similarly poor conditions. And if you tried lifting heavy objects without properly warming up? Inevitably, the likelihood of an accident happening went up. Lloyd intended to avoid such accidents at any cost.

I don’t have money to give for treatment. I’ll save that money by taking precautions. That’s why I’m shouting these stupid-sounding chants with all my heart.

He gathered the soldiers in a circle after he finished stretching. He raised his hand. “Copy my moves. Raise your hand.” One by one, the soldiers raised their hands while glancing at each other. Lloyd shouted out a chant. “I will wear a safety helmet!” Tap tap! He hit the helmet he was wearing with his palm.

The soldiers shouted the chant while copying his movement. “I-I will wear… a safety helmet!”

“Good job. I will wear safety gloves!”

“I will wear safety gloves!”

“I will wear safety shoes!”

“I really will!”

At first glance, it was a childish chant and inspection process that better fit a kindergarten classroom. Lloyd thought the same when he was a part-time construction worker in Korea during morning assemblies.

But now that he looked back? He suspected this inspection process was what allowed him to finish his part-time job safely. That thought sometimes crossed his mind. That’s why he didn’t forget to pound safety protocols into the soldiers’ heads one last time after finishing the inspection.

“Don’t forget about the safety precautions. If you think you’ll forget, then take a look at this.” He picked up the sign he made in advance and stuck it in the ground.

The sign had these words written precisely on it:

Safety First!

Workers! Always follow safety precautions on site. If you rush in without a helmet, you may end up closing the barn door after the horse has bolted.

For some reason, if you act recklessly like you're leading a warfare maneuver, you will end up like a victim on the battlefield. You're too lazy to wear safety shoes? I hereby see your big toe has finished preparing its launch to separate into three sections like a rocket. Does this all seem like a lie? If so, ignore all my warnings and die from dioxin poisoning.

ps. You think it can't happen to you, right? Ha!

The soldiers went silent. They all carefully adjusted their safety equipment.

"Good. Let's start if you're ready. Group one, fill the sacks with red clay. Group two, carry the sacks. Go!"

"Yes!"

The floor heating project started on an intense note.

Perhaps due to their mental training, the soldiers were moving fast. He felt pleased watching them.

As expected, they're relatively obedient since they're the estate's soldiers. Persuading the baron was a good decision.

Suddenly, he thought of the incident that happened two hours ago that morning.

***

"So, you want to mobilize the soldiers?" His questioning voice held confusion. Along with confusion, it also held suspicion and disbelief.

Lloyd calmly continued eating breakfast and replied, "Yes."

"For what?"

“There is work I need to assign them”

“What kind of work are you assigning for you to mobilize eighty soldiers.”

“It’s construction work.”

“Construction?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd swallowed his bread and wiped his hands with a napkin. Then he pulled out the document he had prepared. He pushed it over to the baron.

“This is a business plan.”

“What do you mean by a business plan?”

“Please look at it carefully first.”

It was all because he got Ppodong last night. He finally had the confidence to start a full-scale construction business. Thus, he spent all night writing a business plan. The baron’s cooperation is necessary for this business.

Regardless of anything, it was a business within the fiefdom. As such, he needed permission from the baron who was the lord of the manor. It was true from an economic perspective as well. It costs money to separately hire laborers. Personal expenses or daily wages. These were necessary expenses for all construction sites.

But if the baron mobilized his personal soldiers for construction? He could work them for free, since these soldiers were hired by the baron and already on salary.

“Therefore, you should be able to save a fair amount of money.”

“What if there is discontent amongst the soldiers?”

“You can appease them by giving extra cash to them under the guise of providing a bonus.”

“Hmm, but a heated flooring construction business?”

“I was under the impression you listened to Javier’s explanation last night.”

“Yes. Yes, I did. I heard about the strange new heating method that warms the rocks laid on the ground. But why?”

“Are you questioning my intentions?”

“Yes.”

The baron’s eyes looking his way were full of suspicion. But thankfully, they weren’t frigid like before. It’s probably because I chased out the debt collectors and presented a money sack to him yesterday. The baron was able to take care of this month’s interest thanks to that. No small wonder his eyes softened toward Lloyd.

Lloyd spoke. “I wanted to collect money through the villagers.”

“Money?”

“Yes. Money for the debt.”

“I thought of gathering money through special taxes at first.” “But with that…”

“The backlash would be severe.”

“Yes. That was why. I thought of the most legitimate method that would have the least backlash. “

“So, you’re saying a construction business for the so-called heated flooring is what you came up with?”

“Yes. I would make money, and the villagers would be able to have a warm winter in exchange for paying a fair price. It’s a win-win situation.

“By the way, where did you…” The baron’s particularly suspicious gaze turned his way. “Where did you learn this?”

“Are you talking about the heated floors?”

“Yes. It’s my first time ever seeing something like this. So where did you learn about it?”

“I thought of it a while ago.”

“Thought of it?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head. He needed to be brazen in these kinds of moments. He continued talking. “It’s just something I vaguely thought about over the years. A heated stone doesn’t cool easily. So, I wondered what would happen if I laid flat stones on top of a floor and then blew hot smoke underneath them. I got the opportunity to actually build it this time, and it turned out better than I thought. It was warmer than expected too.

“Do you mean the heated floors you built the pub owner?”

“Yes.”

“That’s how you came up with the idea to make it into a business?”

“Yes.” He nodded his head like it was obvious. Truthfully, he did have absolute confidence. But there was still a stubborn trace of suspicion in the baron’s face.

“Yes. The plan is good. This is a well-made plan that’s worthy of praise. I almost can’t believe you’re so talented. But…” The question the baron threw at him was riddled with doubt. “Can I trust your intentions?”

“What?”

“I’m asking if I can trust you.”

“I’m not sure what you mean…”

“You couldn’t have forgotten what happened two years ago, right?”

Two years ago… That part didn’t appear in the novel. It was not in The Knight of Blood and Iron. It didn’t seem like a good idea to give a sloppy response right now. Lloyd waited in silence. Luckily, the baron spoke up first.

“You were the same then. Although, you obviously didn’t have a robust business plan like now. I clearly remember what you told me. You said ‘I will really pull myself together and study hard this time. So please believe me and make an investment.’”

“I was happy. I thought you would finally mend your ways. That was why I readily gave you the money that came from selling the villa for the academy tuition. But…”

“You completely wasted every single cent with the scoundrels you used to go along with! All the while, you shamelessly played around with women and threw grimy parties in a drunken stupor.”

…ah, seriously. Lloyd, you bastard. He swallowed the curse words that threatened to come out of his mouth. He’s a troublemaker, alright. I never dreamed he would’ve done something like that. He thought it was no wonder the baron had such a lukewarm reaction to a perfect business plan. It was a given he couldn’t be trusted after doing something like that. Ugh, you’re a piece of trash, original Lloyd.

His body’s old owner was massively trolling him. He wondered how he would bounce back from this. His brain worked at the speed of light. And at last, he found a clue to the problem. It was thanks to the memories of his past that suddenly came to him.

Come to think of it, I caused similar trouble before, even though it was on a much smaller scale.

It was probably when he was in middle school. He stole the money his mom gave him for his school tutoring at the time. He remembered using it to go to the arcade with his friends every night.

From first-person shooting games to car racing, and even battle arena games… It was a fun time.

However, he ultimately got caught by his mom. She was extremely angry. He had to go on his knees and beg for forgiveness. After a while, he finally earned his mom's forgiveness, but only after making an unbreakable promise.

Tsk, that's the only option I have right now.

Lloyd lifted his head once he found a solution and faced the baron. He spoke to the baron just like when he promised his mom, he would never go to the arcade again. "I will quit drinking."

"What…?"

"Just as I said, I will completely quit drinking if you give me your trust in this."

The baron's look became strange. It seemed to ask if he was serious or if he was up to something.

Lloyd never replied. He just didn't avoid the baron's stare. He stayed silent as if he was answering yes with his tranquil eyes. He didn't know how long they stayed like that.

The baron finally let out a sigh. "Is that true?"

"Yes."

He was a lightweight anyway and didn't really like alcohol either. There was also nothing he particularly missed about getting drunk. So, if he gained even a little bit of the baron's trust by giving up alcohol, that would truly be a huge win.

And at last…

"Alright, I understand." The baron nodded his head. He returned the business plan to Lloyd.

“I will trust you just this once since you went so far as to promise that. I will report to my executive officer that you are allowed to freely utilize the estate’s soldiers in order to advance this business plan.”

“Thank you.”

“This will be the last time I trust you like this. Please don’t disappoint me.”

The baron’s expression somehow felt gentler than earlier and even seemed to pity him a little bit.

The image of his mom during the arcade incident suddenly flashed in his head, and he briefly felt a strange emotion.

Lloyd hurriedly finished his meal and left the table.

***

I got through that step, but there are many more obstacles I have to overcome as expected. With that thought, his lips curved to a bitter smile. It was because of the knight who had approached him while he was briefly lost in thought.

“As you know, I’m an honorable knight. I can’t accept an order to oversee these dirt sacks getting carried even if it comes from the young master.”

The soldier looking his way had repulsive facial features.

Of course, Lloyd knew his name.

Sir Ulrich.

The man he personally chose to lead the soldiers on site today. He was one of the five knights of the Frontera barony. Out of them all, he was the least skilled.

Even in his position, he was the first to betray the crumbling barony. He stole the baron’s favorite horse and ran away. That wasn’t all. He even spat on Llyod’s face during their encounter while he was running away. That’s why I entrusted you with supervising the site.

He called him on purpose. He entrusted him to lead the soldiers. He was looking forward to seeing him resist like this. And the bastard didn’t fail to give him the reaction he was waiting for.

Lloyd wordlessly grabbed his shovel. Then he brightly smiled at Sir Ulrich. “Oh, so you will defy my order?”

“I am not defying it. I am asking you to respect my honor as a knight… Ugh!”

Slam!

The moment Sir Ulrich tried to talk back, the head of the shovel Lloyd wielded violently hit him in the face.

There’s definitely a need to revamp the estate at once.

Lloyd’s eyes glinted coldly as Sir Ulrich’s back teeth scattered in the air.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 8: Overhaul (2)

Slam!

"…Ugh!" Sir Ulrich yelled without realizing it. The world spun. It felt like his cheek had disappeared. Something burst out of his gaping mouth. It flew and scattered in the air. It was only then that Sir Ulrich could vaguely make out what was flying into the distance.

Teeth? Three white molars were separately spinning through the air. The surrounding droplets of spit and blood had intertwined, tracing out a complex line of trajectory.

This is… interesting.

He felt strangely dazed like time had slowed down around him. Within his view, there were teeth and blood flying in the air. He had never seen anything like this in his twenty-six years of living. It was funny, but it made him dizzy.

…Uh, ugh.

His legs lost their strength. He was bent over at the waist. The ground came closer. Against his wishes, his head hit the ground with a hard thud. He was forced to kiss the ground as his lips smooshed down. Blood seeped out of his mouth again.

That was when Sir Ulrich's senses finally returned to normal. Heavy pain from his busted lip, knocked-out molars, and broken cheekbone came with it.

"…Aargh!?" It hurt. It really hurt. It hurt way too much! "What! C-cough!" He tightly held one side of his face. The pain and shock made it impossible to think. He tried to understand the situation.

How did I get hit? An accident? If not, an attack? By whom? He frantically racked his confused brain. However, his furious worrying was no good. The answer was offered far too easily. Along with the shovel coming down toward him.

“What, what!?”

Bam!

“…Urk!” The shovel came straight down and landed on his solar plexus.

He couldn’t breathe. His waist was bent like a shrimp. He looked up to see who dared to attack him. Sir Ulrich’s eyes soon widened. “Young…? Ugh!”

Bang!

The shovel hit his face again.

His head rolled sharply over as his face was further battered.

But Sir Ulrich couldn’t give a proper response. He had already received too many blows, one after another, in his defenseless state.

H-how come? Why?

He couldn’t understand. He couldn’t respond. He couldn’t even dream of standing up. The shovel Lloyd wielded was too deadly for him to make any hasty attempts.

Faced with this ruthless violence, Sir Ulrich did nothing but groan and wrap his arms around his face and head.

Pow, bam! Slam! Whack!

“Gah! Ahh!” Sir Ulrich’s face crumpled in fear. An odd determination was embedded in his mind, which was howling in pain.

I-I’ll really die at this rate! It was true.

The glimpse of Lloyd he could see ahead of him, through the crack between his arms wrapped around his face, said it all. The troublesome young master’s face was proving it. His eyes were too calm while swinging the shovel.

Of course. I need to stay calm to push down someone stronger than me.

Bam!

Lloyd swung his shovel relentlessly. All the while, he thought about how Sir Ulrich would get up if he was even given the slightest chance to catch his breath. If that happened, then his plan would go awry.

After all, I did to successfully launch this attack, do you think I’ll let go of this chance? Me? The first rule for successfully initiating an attack was to ambush Sir Ulrich without ever giving him a chance to react. Thanks to that, he had complete control over the situation.

Even if he’s a knight, he can’t help but collapse if he receives this kind of assault without warning. This was especially true if you were a low-class swordsman who could just barely conjure a manaheart. Like in The Knight of Blood and Iron. A few of the baron’s knights he read about in the novel came to mind. Sir Ulrich was the most incompetent knight of them all.

He thought poorly of Lloyd, even with that status. He pretty much looked down on him.

That’s why I called you today to make an example out of you. It’ll be problematic if more people try to sabotage everything I do. At least in the fiefdom, that is. A person’s determination was important.

If you gave in during a conflict? If excessive generosity became a habit? Afterward, sacrifice and kindness would become an expectation. You were reduced to a pushover.

He had very painfully learned this truth in South Korea. Especially on construction sites. A few of the old men there had awful personalities. The so-called mentors. There were also many warmhearted people…

However, his luck was bad. An ill-tempered mentor became his co-worker. He had to suffer all day. His mentor nitpicked over nothing and usually cursed at him the entire time he was working. He endured it at first. It felt wrong to fight back. He just laughed and tried to be the good guy.

But that wasn't the right answer.

One day the man, his so-called mentor, insulted his parents. He had made a derogatory joke about Lloyd's family.

How did he respond that day?

I did this.

Swack! The shovel Lloyd wielded struck Sir Ulrich's shin this time.

"Ackkk!"

Sir Ulrich, who was just then struggling to stand up, clutched his shin and drew back.

However, Lloyd's face didn't change. It only gets easier in the future after I flip out on them once.

It was true then too. He lost control of himself the moment he heard his family being insulted. Immediately, he bashed his mentor with the shovel he was holding.

Not surprisingly, the site turned into chaos. But afterward?

Things got easier. No one readily bothered him as they did before. In a way, it was an opportunity that made him realize one truth about life.

That's why I called you to the site. Out of all the soldiers of this fiefdom, you're the weakest one. You were just barely able to create a manaheart recently. I thought an attack like this would be enough to crush you.

Lloyd based the plan on events in the novel. He predicted that Sir Ulrich would fight back or act arrogantly toward him at least once. And his prediction was right on the mark. His punishment would serve as a warning to others. He became an example.

Pow! Bang! Slam! Lloyd didn't stop his shovel.

A scream finally burst out of Sir Ulrich's mouth. "Agh! Aghh! Y-young master! Why!"

"Why else? It's because of your lack of loyalty."

Bam!

Every time he swung the shovel, Lloyd's words were more ice cold.

"Now, try repeating what you said earlier."

"Wait… Agh!"

Bam!

"You're an honorable knight? You can't accept an order to oversee bags of dirt being carried?"

"But…"

Bam!

"Argh!"

"But nothing. Should I set the record straight? Does it look like I gathered all the soldiers without notice for personal reasons? Hm?"

Bash!

"Aaargh!"

"Do you see what is written here? This is an order to mobilize soldiers. It's an official document that was approved by my father the baron and issued by the magistrate. So…"

Wham!

“It means you dared to betray your honor as a knight and refused a legitimate order from the lawful lord of this estate to whom you pledged an oath of loyalty. In other words…”

Thwack!

“One: you disobeyed the lord’s orders.”

Thwack!

“Two: you dishonored the lord and failed your duty as a knight.”

Whack!

“Three: you have thrown away your own rights and honor.”

Baang!

Swung fully like a golf club hitting a tee shot, the shovel flew up. The flat side of the shovel slammed up under Sir Ulrich’s chin. That was the end.

Spray!

The blood droplets from the violently beaten Sir Ulrich were flying into the air along with the motion of his head. Sir Ulrich crumpled like a puppet without its strings. He passed out.

“Ha!” Lloyd caught his labored breath. He felt like his lungs would burst from the first intense exercise he had done in a while. But it was worth it.

I must get rid of everyone in my way somehow.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. The Frontera barony had been introduced to in the very scene was a mess. This was proven by the fact that Sir Ulrich, a man who had no loyalty or talent, was made a knight.

A guy like that needs to be nipped in the bud as soon as possible. Afterward, I need to fill in his empty spot with someone promising. That's the only way this barony will have a future.

This fiefdom would be his main source of income for the rest of his life. If he wanted to exploit and grow this place long-term, he needed to bring in more talent.

He wiped the sweat dripping down his forehead with his arm and looked around. "What are you looking at? Is there a show going on?"

The soldiers, who had stopped working to watch, flinched and turned their heads.

Lloyd gestured to a soldier near him. "You here, and the two there. Come over here."

"Yes, yes…!" The three soldiers rushed over at full speed.

Lloyd pointed his chin toward the sprawled-out Sir Ulrich. "Put him away. And bring Sir Bayern from the mansion."

"Yes!"

They had just plainly seen what happened to the soldier who disobeyed Lloyd. As soon as he gave the order, the three soldiers moved at lightning speed. The three carried Sir Ulrich, who had swollen up like a balloon and collapsed. They hurriedly walked back to the mansion.

***

"I heard you called for me, Master Lloyd."

A knight with a sturdy figure and rugged face arrived at the site. It was Sir Bayern, who he had ordered the soldiers to bring earlier. Lloyd put on a satisfied smile as soon as he saw Sir Bayern. He looks better than what I imagined from reading the novel.

Sir Bayern was one of the five knights of the Frontera barony. Like Javier, he didn't betray his lord, even at the very end. His loyalty was verified by the novel. This is the kind of person I should invest in. If the novel is correct, his skills are just ordinary, but I need to prioritize people I can trust.

Sir Bayern was an honest and faithful man. That's why Lloyd's goal was to entrust Sir Bayern with the construction team. Well, I created this situation to begin with.

He called out Sir Ulrich — who would cause harm in the future — and put a stop to his protests for his troops to see. The punishment would serve as a warning to others.

Then he called for Sir Bayern, who he had originally planned to entrust with this position.

That was how he intended to get rid of everyone he needed to, by setting the right mood onsite and appointing Sir Bayern to serve as a positive example.

Lloyd addressed Sir Bayern. "Yes, I was looking for you. I am thinking of entrusting you with overseeing the site today. How do you feel about that?"

"I will do anything you ask."

"Good. It actually isn't much. The soldiers are collecting the red clay here and moving it to the construction site. Supervise the soldiers to make sure they aren't goofing off too much during the job. Obviously, give them sufficient breaks from time to time. It'll be problematic if they pass out from overworking."

"Understood."

He didn't make a single complaint.

Sir Bayern most likely heard of what happened. But he didn't show any signs of it.

That made him seem even more trustworthy. Thus, Lloyd entrusted the clay collection site to Sir Bayern and headed elsewhere. He went to the heated flooring construction site. There were carpenters, blacksmiths, masons, plasterers, and other workers waiting for him. Of course, there wasn't anything close to admiration in the eyes of the artisans' looking at him.

They were worried about why this scumbag troublemaker called for them. They were disgusted by him, and they wanted to avoid getting involved with him as much as circumstance permitted. Their eyes seemed to be filled only with those sorts of feelings.

Lloyd didn't mind any of the looks from these craftspeople. He calmly walked in front of them. "Starting now, I will instruct you about the design concept and construction methods for the heated floors. Listen carefully."

"What…?" The artisans tilted their heads. In their eyes, Lloyd was a troublesome young master who never worked a day in his life. Despite them being old hands at construction, he was trying to teach them something new. It was like trying to teach a fish how to swim or blow fumes up a dragon's snout. Scornful emotions rose in them. But that didn't last long.

"Let's look at this first. Attention everyone."

Swoosh!

Lloyd spread the construction blueprint for the floors in front of them. It was an intricate blueprint done with great design skills. The rural artisans, who constructed buildings with only rough estimates, had never seen such a thing before. Following that, Lloyd's brilliant and professional explanation flowed with the rhythm of a steady drumbeat.

The artisans' expressions started to change a little upon hearing it.

***

Half of the day passed. As expected, Sir Bayern did not disappoint him. Thanks to his careful oversight, the soldiers carried the clay to the construction site without any problems. The physical training they got in the process was a bonus. All the while, Lloyd had been busy.

He spent the entire day training the artisans at the work site. While wearing a work belt, he sweated profusely while putting down the flat stones and taught them how to construct the heated flooring system. This is the process that allowed for a successful first day of construction…

The sun started setting before he knew it. Now that he had successfully completed the official first day of construction, Lloyd inspected the site as it was wrapped up. Luckily, the craftsmen are learning faster than I expected. It'll get easier in the future.

Nonetheless, they were skilled artisans at the end of the day. The experience they accumulated in the field was not just for show. They showed strong interest in these construction methods that were brand new to them. They understood the fundamentals only after learning about the concept behind the design. It seemed that he could completely entrust them with the construction if he guided them for just a little longer.

Then we would finally have a crew in place. The artisans can do the skilled work, the soldiers can do the menial work that requires manpower, and Sir Bayern can supervise the whole operation. This means I can concentrate on other things, since I won't need to stay onsite every day for the project to move forward.

That was why he assembled a professional construction team from the start. A business needed to run on its own. That was how to make money while making time to invest in other matters.

Now that he had achieved that goal, it was time to move on to the next phase. I'm not done overhauling this estate yet.

Sir Ulrich was only the start. There were still thick rotten roots he needed to cut out. It's about time I get a certain message. It was around the time Lloyd had expected.

“Young master Lloyd? I came because I have something to tell you regarding Sir Ulrich.” An arrogant yet haggard voice came from behind him. Javier? It wasn’t him.

You came as expected Sir Neumann.

The senior knight of the Frontera barony, Sir Neumann, had finally arrived. A traitor who contributed the most to the downfall of the barony in the book The Knight of Blood and Iron.

Facing Sir Neumann, Lloyd smiled like a fisherman who had just netted a big fat catfish.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 9: Overhaul (3)

Sir Neumann, senior knight of the Frontera barony. His swordsmanship was not the best. He was just good enough to be treated as a capable knight in this rural fiefdom.

However, he was much more interested in advancing his social status than his swordsmanship. He valued money over loyalty to the lord of the manor. A rapid rise in status over knightly honor. He would do anything to reach his goals.

No, he did achieve those goals… by selling the Frontera's inside information to a swindler.

Lloyd remembered the start of the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron. The fall of the barony, which was the first ordeal suffered by the main character Javier. Sir Neumann was behind it.

He sold information about the barony to a crook. The scam artist approached the baron based on that information. He sweet-talked him into making a huge investment. In the end, he took the money and ran. That brought financial ruin to the baron.

Sir Neumann's betrayal was the trigger for the downfall of the barony.

So obviously you're subject to removal too. Lloyd gently bit his lip. The reason he couldn't comfortably live a lazy life after becoming a rural noble's oldest son. Why he was busy helping this family resolve their pile of debt. It was all the fault of this man.

However, Lloyd didn't rashly show his emotions. When he turned to Sir Neumann, his face had already mellowed into a nonchalant expression.

"Sir Neumann? What did you mean just now?"

"It's just as I said." The corner of Sir Neumann's mouth twitched. "I came here as I have something to say about the unjust violence you used against Sir Ulrich this morning.”

“Violence. Unfair? Well, what can I say?”

“Yes.”

“Then talk.” Go ahead and chatter away to your heart’s content.

Lloyd laughed leisurely. Sir Neumann’s face hardened more.

“As young master Lloyd knows, Sir Ulrich is undeniably the lord’s knight. He took his oath and is entitled to the protection of his rights and honor as a knight. He is not someone you can treat carelessly based on personal feelings.”

“Hm, right.”

“Despite that, you did not respect Sir Ulrich’s honor and rights this morning in the slightest.”

“Hmm, I didn’t.”

“Therefore, as the fiefdom’s senior knight, I would like to hear your official answer. Do you feel nothing at all about the situation?”

“Hmmm, probably.”

He must’ve gotten angry. Sir Neumann’s face turned red all the way to the back of his neck. On the other hand, Lloyd’s face was still shamelessly nonchalant.

“Do my words sound like a joke to you, young master Lloyd?”

“No. They sound correct. Painfully correct.”

Sir Neumann’s eyes trembled. Lloyd put on a brighter smile. What’s up with this guy? Is he riled up just from this? A snort came out of Lloyd at seeing Sir Neumann’s reaction.

Honestly, this was only a low-level provocation by Lloyd's standards. But he was already angry beyond belief. This man would die in a fit of anger if he ever played in a multiplayer online battle arena in South Korea.

It was true. He regularly frequented the world of online combat games since he was young. That was basically the battlefield where the chaos of the century tap danced.

If you made even the smallest mistake in your position, all sorts of insults would pour out of your teammates. It was a feast of curses and barbs hurled at your character. Jokes about your parents were a given. But if you got angry over every little comment? The person who got angry lost. You would tremble with anger and endure further ridicule until your damage meter exploded.

It was a cold and cruel world where you could only survive by laughing off nearly any insults toward your family and responding with something worse. He was an elite veteran who trained in that hell. Actually, most gamers in Korea were.

So, the insult he threw at Sir Neumann just now? It couldn't even be considered a sly greeting. Sir Neumann, however, didn't feel that way. For him, this was one of the greatest insults he received in his life. Who is this guy?

It was so absurd; Sir Neumann was at a total loss for words. He fully knew from the start that Lloyd was a truly troublesome piece of trash. Still, he thought that he wasn't this bad before. Come to see that now, he realized he had been mistaken. It seemed that this insane troublemaker even looked down on him.

"Are you saying now that you will even insult me too?

"Yes, of course."

"Do you not care about my honor and rights at all?"

"Yes, of course."

“Aren’t you worried about the consequences?”

“Yes, of course.”

It was only natural. Sir Neumann was someone he needed to get rid of anyway. He was a man who sold out his lord to a swindler by the back door. Yet he was the same man who stood in front of him, speaking of his honor, rights, and so forth.

A snort escaped Lloyd. Neumann was like a phishing scam call.

Soldiers were bound by their oath to their lord. They didn’t take an oath of loyalty to the baron’s son. Thus, you couldn’t just recklessly treat the soldiers just because you were the baron’s son. It seemed Sir Neumann was trying to stir up the other soldiers using that point.

Of course, Lloyd wasn’t worried about this situation at all. They will all be removed anyway… except Javier and Sir Bayern.

Senior knight Sir Neumann, and his junior officers Sir Ulrich and Sir Conte. They would turn their backs on the barony once it started to crumble. He didn’t need to worry about them just because they were lashing out right now.

It’s more important at present to find an excuse to get rid of them. Lloyd looked around. Everything had quieted down. Was it because there was no one else? No, it was the opposite.

The artisans, who were cleaning up the site, had stopped working and watched what was happening in his direction. They would frantically look away and pretend to work if their eyes met. But they still kept their ears open to what was happening nearby.

Of course. A fight between the baron’s son and the senior knight is a rare sight, after all. It was a fact that the best spectacle to watch was a brawl or fight. With that truth in mind, Lloyd looked at Sir Neuman. “Then let me ask you one question.”

Sir Neumann furrowed his brows.

Lloyd asked, “You know I never learned how to handle a sword, right?”

“I am aware.”

“So can you be considered a knight if you lose a duel to me?”

“What…?” Sir Neumann’s brows twitched. Lloyd burst out laughing at that sight.

“I’m asking if you can call someone that got beaten by a complete beginner in a sword fight a knight.”

“That is…”

“They don’t have the right. It’s a fact. What is a knight’s duty? To guard the domain using sword-fighting skills they painstakingly hone every day. To protect the territory and its people in times of crisis. Isn’t that a knight’s duty and purpose?”

“If he lost a duel to someone who never learned any swordsmanship before. Could I really trust that kind of knight and let him remain employed?

“What does that…”

“I’m saying I question his qualifications.”

“But young master Lloyd…”

“I won’t hear any more protests about Sir Ulrich. Right now, I’m wondering if there’s a need to suspect and question your qualifications too as you continue defending Sir Ulrich.”

“What does that mean?” He must’ve guessed what Lloyd meant. Sir Neumann’s face completely hardened.

Lloyd laughed even harder at that sight and confirmed his suspicion. “What you’re guessing is most likely correct. You defend Sir Ulrich to an unreasonable degree, Sir Neumann. I have fostered some doubts about your qualifications as well.”

“You can’t possibly be saying that you will challenge my skills.”

“Now you're talking.”

“There’s… no way you are challenging me to a duel.”

“But that’s correct.”

“Are you serious?”

“Of course.”

“So, will you or will you not?”

Sir Neumann’s eyes appeared nervous for the first time.

He was just trying to make a complaint to the reckless young master. He was just trying to use that as an excuse to establish his own authority. He never imagined that Lloyd Frontera, who never learned any swordsmanship, would propose a formal duel with him.

Lloyd grinned. Sir Neumann was filled with rage. The man’s response surpassed his expectations. He faithfully helped Sir Neumann make his decision. “Is this the response of the senior knight? You can’t possibly be scared to fight me, right? If you were confident, you would’ve already accepted the duel.”

“But young master Lloyd, you’re the baron’s successor and eldest son. Considering that, I can’t raise my sword at you on the pretext of a duel…”

“Is that your excuse? Your excuse is flimsy. If you’re confident in your skills, you should easily and safely be able to overpower me. Do you not even have the confidence to do that? I’m disappointed. This is why I can’t help but have doubts about your qualifications.”

“Have you finished speaking…?”

“No. I’m not done.”

“I think people like you are the most pitiful. Senior knight? A man who won’t prove his abilities, nor has the courage or confidence to do so, hangs onto his title to wield power. Isn’t that embarrassing even when you think about it?”

“What does everyone else think?” All the attention turned toward Sir Neumann, who had his mouth closed. Lloyd loudly asked the soldiers nearby the question.

At that moment, Sir Neumann made a cackling sound. Lloyd laughed inwardly. Of course.

He received the insult right to his face. But the fact that people around them heard it was more humiliating. That was how people thought. It was the same when someone was being reprimanded. If they were scolded in a quiet place, that was the end of it. But if it happened in front of everyone, especially their subordinates? They would promptly break down.

And right now, that effect was showing. “Understood…” Sir Neumann reluctantly answered.

Lloyd’s mouth stretched into a smile as if he was waiting for this.

“You will do it? The duel?”

“Yes.”

“Good decision. You should resolve your disputes like a man. When would be a good date?”

“Young master can decide that.”

“One month from now. The location is the estate’s training hall. How about it?”

“That is fine.” Sir Neumann nodded his rigid face. “Then is there anything you would demand, based on the outcome of the duel?”

“Of course there is.”

Lloyd put forth his preplanned answer. “I will banish you if I win our duel that day.”

“What?”

“I will remove you from your position and drive you out.”

“Do you have any reason to dispute?”

“No, I don’t. However.”

“However?”

“Young master should get a corresponding outcome.”

“All right. I will bet on my position as well.”

“Your position?”

“My inheritance to this barony as the eldest son, I will give that up.”

“Are you serious?”

“Of course.” Lloyd nodded his head without hesitation. “Don’t worry. I speak the truth. The soldiers here will stand as witnesses. You should just train hard, so you don’t get wrecked like Sir Ulrich.”

“Those words, I hope you don’t come to regret them.”

“Not at all.”

That was how the duel was arranged. Of course he had no regrets. He had already found his secret to victory. To say it directly, he was going to ruthlessly get rid of everyone who stood in his way.

***

Two hours later

“So do you have confidence that you can win?”

“No, not much.”

“I see.” Javier nodded his head. He had been unusually absent from Lloyd’s side all day. It couldn’t be helped. There was an order from Lord Frontera. He had called me in the morning and then ordered me to stop escorting young master Lloyd for just today.

He didn’t know exactly why, but he could guess from what he heard that Lloyd did in his absence today. Something like he made an excuse to assault Sir Ulrich, then proposed a duel with Sir Neumann who had come to protest what happened.

He wondered if Lloyd pushed him away today to do those things. That’s what Javier was speculating. He felt a strange emotion. Why?

He couldn’t understand. Why did he agitate the soldiers who weren’t doing anything? Why did he assault Sir Ulrich and propose a duel with Sir Neumann? Is he just causing trouble again?

That might have seemed like the case at first glance. Although Lloyd had been acting differently recently, the truth was people didn’t change easily. Considering that, it could look like he was throwing a fit because of his bad temper. However, Lloyd didn’t think that was it. His actions are too intentional to say he’s just throwing a fit.

Lloyd pushed him away from his side. After he assaulted Sir Ulrich, he entrusted Sir Bayern with the construction site. When Sir Neumann came to him in a fury, he challenged him to a duel like he was waiting for him. But what was Lloyd’s attitude after causing all this commotion? He was shamelessly nonchalant. It was an attitude he couldn’t have unless he intentionally caused these events. Furthermore, he certainly has an agenda, considering his recent actions…

That was when Javier stopped thinking. Lloyd's voice broke his train of thought.

"Hey, you. What do you mean, 'I see'? That's all?"

"What do you mean, 'that's all'?"

"What else would I mean? Your reaction."

Lloyd, who was having dinner, looked up and slightly tilted his head to one side.

"You wanted to know whether I'm confident of winning a duel against Sir Neumann. What was my answer?"

"You said you were not confident."

"Right?"

"Yes."

"And you're only replying to it with, 'I see'? Seriously? You don't have anything to say, like how you're worried about something, why would I ever do this, and so on?

"I'm not sure why I need to show that sort of reaction."

"You're my guard."

"That is correct… however."

"However?"

"I believe you were the one who proposed the duel, young master."

"Humph, so you mean a duel isn't included in your services as a guard?"

"Of course." It was only natural. What was a duel for, after all? "A duel is the most fair and direct method to resolve a conflict where the disputing parties are stripped of their normal social status and position to stand on an equal playing field to fight each other. As such, I don’t have the power or duty to interfere with the duel between the young master and Sir Neumann.”

“Hmm, I suppose that’s how it is, right?”

“Yes.”

“Well then, how about you teach me swordsmanship during the month before the duel?”

“Are you asking if I will teach you, young master Lloyd?”

“Yes.”

“I don’t want to.”

“Why?”

“Because I’m not personally inclined to.”

It was an honest answer. Whatever happened, he was just his guard. He had no duty to teach swordsmanship to a rowdy young master he didn’t particularly like. And he might go around causing bigger trouble if I pointlessly teach him how to wield a sword. Thus, he felt more strongly that he shouldn’t teach him. So, he wondered why the young master, who he just sharply turned down, had a wicked smile.

“Really?”

Something felt off. An ominous feeling spread through Javier’s body. Lloyd's expression was disquieting. His eyes somehow looked like they knew something about him. His smile seemed to say Javier would act as he intended.

In the end, the ominous feeling became a reality.

“If you give me lessons on swordsmanship…”

Lloyd’s eyes glinted.

“I will cure your insomnia.” Lloyd smiled brightly. “How about it?”

Javier swallowed dryly without Lloyd knowing. Severe chronic insomnia. It was his hidden weakness and a secret that had been torturing him for several years.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 10: The Determined Troublemaker (1)

“I will cure your insomnia. How about it?”

Javier unconsciously clenched his fists. He wondered if this was what it felt like to be hit In the head with a hammer out of nowhere. How does Master Lloyd know about my insomnia?

The insomnia that started torturing him years ago. He never revealed it before. He never told a single soul. He never even remembered showing any signs of it.

Javier gave an awkward smile and said, “I’m not sure what you mean. Insomnia? Where does that come from? I have no idea what you are talking about?”

“Hm, really?”

“Yes.”

“Tsk. tsk, tsk. Javier, are you trying to pretend you don’t know?”

“Of course not.”

“You’re not?”

“Yes.”

“Then why are you smiling? Very awkwardly, at that.”

“What?”

“Did you know? This is the first time you’ve smiled in front of me other than when you put on your cheeky grin.”

“Oh my. Look at you, wiping off your smile after I point it out. You’re making it too obvious. Did you panic? Tsk, tsk, tsk… over something so small. I can see through it, so drop the act. Let’s just get this one thing straight. I will cure your insomnia. In return, you will teach me how to sword fight. How about it? I think that is a pretty good deal."

Javier swallowed dryly. Honestly, he was startled. Chronic insomnia. It was an illness that has tortured him for three years now. The reason or cause for it is unknown. His senses just became overly sensitive at some point.

The idle sound of grasshoppers. The sound of branches swaying in the wind. Even the rustling sound of him tossing and turning under a blanket.

The sounds heard with his ears, the sights seen by his eyes. The sensations on his skin. Even the subtle smell of the air in every breath he took.

He could clearly pick up on all of them.

It was to the point where he could feel his individual eyelashes when he closed his eyes. The sound of his heart beating in his ears prodded him every second of every day.

Short version: his senses pricked his entire body like needles twenty-four hours a day.

He couldn't fall asleep at all. By this point, he got all his sleep from eventually passing out in exhaustion in the early morning after tossing and turning all night.

There were no solutions. Nothing worked. And he'd tried everything.

Three years had already gone by.

It was a pain he struggled with in secret and a bug he couldn't reveal for fear it'd become a weakness. His wish was to sleep soundly for even one night. But he knows? The troublesome young master? How? Javier's face set as if it were frozen in a block of ice.

Lloyd's gaze turned sly. How else? It's because I read the book.

Javier was the protagonist of the novel The Knight of Blood and Iron. Lloyd had read it thoroughly and memorized the contents. He remembered even the most trivial details about Javier… Such as his insomnia.

You probably don't know the cause of the insomnia that's torturing you. But I know. Swordmaster syndrome. That was the cause of the illness. As your swordsmanship approaches master level, all your senses become abnormally acute. Simply put, it's a natural phenomenon that occurs to those who are reaching a superhuman state of being.

It was the same in Javier's case. He was able to become an advanced swordsman at only seventeen. As he developed, so did his affliction. He spent every night tossing and turning in misery. But for a long time, he still couldn't find the cause. That was because of only one reason, Javier was from the countryside.

Forget a sword master, I can barely find a sword novice in this rural wasteland. No, I would likely find three or four high-level sword experts at most, even if I searched the kingdom's capital. That was why he couldn't easily come across information about sword master syndrome.

If this world had internet access, he would've easily found the information by just searching on the web. But this place was different. They could only obtain knowledge through limited personal connections or books. Otherwise, it would be delivered by word of mouth, which was hard to validate. Outside those methods, there was no other way to acquire new information.

For that reason, Javier in the novel finally finds the cause of his insomnia two years from now. From then, it's only after three years that Javier overcomes his insomnia by coincidence.

I can make it happen earlier. He knew how to. He knew for sure.

"I will succeed. Your thoughts?"

"Do I have to answer?"

"Well, you aren't obligated to," Lloyd said, as he stabbed his salad with a fork. "Don't misunderstand. I'm not trying to fool you. I'm just saying you should trust me this once.”

“Trust you, Master Lloyd?”

“Yes. Good is good, after all. People trust each other in situations like this. Building a constructive relationship through trust. Helping each other during hard times. That’s just how it goes in work and life in general, isn’t it? Why is your face so sour? Do I seem like a hustler when I talk like this?”

“If I’m being honest, you do seem like one a bit.”

“Am I that untrustworthy?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded his head.

Lloyd licked his lips. “Then how about we do this? Let’s play a word game.”

“Did you say, ‘a word game’?”

“Yes. Let’s give it a try to build some trust between us. Give me a letter and I’ll come up with a word.”

“What…”

“All right, so… start with the letter M. Now… go!”

Javier looked at him blankly.

“Hurry.”

“…M…”

“My loyal knight Javier, do you not trust me?”

“Maybe.”

“An acrostic poem out of nowhere. You were mistaken if you thought these schemes would easily work on me. More importantly, I would like to ask a question too.”

“Hmm, tsk. What is it?”

“I was wondering why you were carrying around a summoning book all day.” Javier gazed toward the table in front of Lloyd. The basic summoning book. It was what Lloyd was reading while having his meal.

“Oh, this?” Lloyd smirked. “I was just reading it because I got bored.”

“Excuse me?”

“I was just reading it. Is that not allowed?”

Javier closed his mouth.

Lloyd’s smile got bigger. “Javier, I can see through you too easily. Is this how you’re trying to change the topic?”

“I merely asked what I was curious about.”

“Never mind. Just continue what you were saying.”

Javier remained silent.

“So, you can’t trust me?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“I don’t have a specific reason.”

“You just can’t trust me?”

“Yes. I just can’t trust you. Is that not allowed?”

It was a counterattack. As expected, Javier wasn’t easy to deal with. Lloyd brightly smiled. “You think that was a sick burn, right?”

“I didn’t have that thought in particular.”

“Really?”

“Yes. I only gave you an honest answer.”

“Well, all right. Then let’s end our conversation here today.”

“What do you mean by our conversation?”

“We can finish our conversation tomorrow.” Lloyd set down his fork and finished his meal. Afterward, he leaned back on a resting chair and fully concentrated on reading the summoning book. He didn’t even spare Javier a glance. He didn’t talk to him either, of course. It was the same when the maids cleaned up the table and for a while afterward too. Only the sound of turning pages filled the bedroom.

Meanwhile, Javier faithfully guarded Lloyd’s side. His expression was a little more complicated than usual.

The night grew darker.

***

A few days passed.

During that time, the heated flooring construction went by smoothly.

The soldiers moved in perfect order under Lord Bayern’s proper supervision. These were the soldiers who could barely move the red clay on the first day. But they transformed in a few days. They gained stamina. Their muscles grew bigger. They also became more savvy. Now, they could easily move two sacks at once. It was thanks to the adequate amount of work, rest, and nutrition they got.

The artisans acquired many more skills. They were like a sponge soaking up water or orange chicken absorbing sauce through its batter. They quickly learned the new knowledge and ideas Lloyd taught them.

That was how the construction of the first house was completed successfully. Things got even easier with the construction of the second house. There was no longer a need to stay on site all day. He just needed to visit the site once a day to check that everything was in good shape, the construction was going according to the floor plan, there wasn't anything missing, and no mistakes were made. The job ran smoothly with just a general inspection.

Thanks to that there was plenty of leftover time to use productively. He used the time to bother Javier.

"Did you sleep well last night?"

"Yes, I slept soundly."

"Really?"

"Yes."

"You really can't lie."

"Are you talking about me?"

"Yes."

"That couldn't be."

"Yeah, right. Did you know? You make it very obvious when you lie."

"I'm not sure what you're talking about in particular."

"You want me to tell you? I don't want to. If I do, you're going to put on a facade so as not to show anything."

"I won't."

"You won't?"

"Yes." Javier momentarily avoided his eyes as he answered.

As he thought, this guy really had no skill for lying. Lloyd smiled brightly. “I still don’t want to. I’m not going to tell someone who has insomnia. How dare you act up when you can’t even sleep. Do you feel bad? Are you sad? Then accept my proposal.”

“No thank you.”

“I said I’ll help you sleep soundly.”

“I don’t want to even then.”

“Because you can’t trust me?”

“Yes.”

That was how the conversation went. However, Lloyd didn’t give up. He suddenly asked during breakfast: “Hey, Javier?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“Did you sleep well last night? How about accepting my proposal now?”

“No thank you.”

He asked again while walking down the hallway. “By the way, Javier.”

“Go ahead, Master Lloyd.”

“Is it all right to keep losing sleep? That’s why I’m saying to accept my proposal.”

“I refuse.”

He asked again on the way to inspect the construction site. “Oh, right. Javier?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“How does it feel to not be able to sleep all night? Aren’t you starting to have thoughts about accepting my proposal?”

“Not at all.”

He popped in the question during dinner too. “Hmm. Javier?”

“Go ahead…”

“Do you possibly enjoy not being able to sleep? Do you get a rush of endorphins? Do you get a kick out of it? Well, then you’re a pervert.”

He even abruptly asked again while he was lying down in bed to sleep. “Ugh, Javier? You won’t be able to sleep tonight too, right? I’ll sleep soundly in your stead. Aren’t you grateful? Happy? ‘Excuse me, Sir?’ Please answer instead of cursing me out with your eyes.”

“Ha ha… very well then.”

“What do you mean very well?”

“I will accept your proposal, Master Lloyd.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd bolted up.

Javier bit his lip. He was beyond tired of it now. The constant pestering throughout the day was killing him. It was almost impossible to even doze off because of his frazzled nerves. Of course, it’s not like I trust Master Lloyd’s proposal. Lloyd Frontera was not a very reliable person. But to put an end to the constant ridicule and questions? He thought this was the only way to stop it. “Regardless of anything, this acceptance is contingent on the promise that you actually will cure my insomnia. So, curing my insomnia is the priority.”

Obviously, there was no possibility it would be cured. He had no hopes that Lloyd would have that kind of ability. It was better to just accept the proposal and let him fail. Making him give up like this seemed easier. Since I don't want to teach him how to sword fight.

He couldn't trust Lloyd. Until a few days ago, Lloyd was someone who did nothing but drink every day and cause trouble. Although he did change a little recently, it was uncertain how long this would last. There was no knowing when his bad habits would raise their head again. Yet, teach that kind of person how to sword fight? It's nonsense.

He thought it would be better to hand a knife to a child. With that thought in mind, he spoke. "As such, please prove that you can cure my insomnia first, Master Lloyd."

"All right, I will. Can you sit here for now?"

"Yes."

Javier sat down on the resting chair as Lloyd ordered, and then inwardly snorted. It was because he saw Lloyd clearing his throat. Could it be he's going to sing me a lullaby or something? A lullaby. It wasn't even funny anymore. At the same time, he became certain there was no way he would experience an unbelievable miracle and sleep soundly tonight.

But the moment Lloyd opened his mouth his certainty started to splinter.

"If the yield strength of the steel, fy, is stressed to conduct the tensile test and results in a less than 0.003 strain rate, then the reinforcement's design strength can be maintained without decreasing fy."

What…? Javier couldn't understand a word being said. He was talking normally. It wasn't like he was speaking in some mysterious foreign tongue. Meaning they were speaking the same language. But he couldn't understand anything he said. And, he kept on talking like that!

"…However, the yield strength cannot be greater than 5,500kgf/ . This is because when the yield strength of the steel is 5,500kgf/ , the yield strain is almost the same as the 0.003 maximum strain rate of the compacted concrete. And…”

He had blanked out while listening to something. This was definitely a reality, but he felt like his mind was drifting away.

“And the amount of steel … blah, blah, blah … Except for the slabs that require reinforcement…yada, yada, yada… The reinforcement ratio, P, in its given cross-sectional area… this or that… The maximum reinforcement ratio, P, has to be over min=14/fy … blah, blah, blah…”

He felt drowsy. His entire body was floating. His consciousness was slipping away. The line between reality and imagination became blurry. Resistance was pointless. Even if he tried to pry open his eyes. Even if he tried to sluggishly move his fingers. Nothing would work. I can’t… fall… asleep…

“…Over here the unit of fy is kgf/ … The reason for the minimum reinforcement ratio… more gibberish… In order to prevent flexural failure… If the reinforced flexural, 0.10$f$ck A…la-la-la…

This was the power that reading a college textbook had that was even more destructive than sleeping pills.

That was the end.

Javier’s eyes relaxed. His eyelids closed. His consciousness flew away. He sank into the resting chair. Before he knew it, he was sound asleep.

A smile of satisfaction spread across Lloyd’s face. As expected, it’s just like the scene in the novel.

That day Javier overcame his insomnia for the first time. On that day, he coincidentally heard the reading of a complex magic technique. The quiet and never-ending reading made him fall asleep before he realized it.

Just like now.

Javier would never again be able to forget the feeling of a restful good night's sleep he experienced today. His body would no longer be able to sleep without a college textbook lullaby.

Lloyd put on a satisfied yet wicked smile. Your swordsmanship is all mine now.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 11: The Determined Troublemaker (2)

I'm tired and sleepy.

Javier scowled as he tossed and turned on a comfortable chair. He wanted to sleep a little more, and nothing was surprising about that, given his schedule. In the afternoon, he protected the troublemaking young master. At night, he laid on the bed only to stay awake through the night because of insomnia. And, in between the breaks he rarely had, he trained himself to stay sharp with his sword. Thus, it was only natural that he was exhausted.

No, it was almost karma. I think I dozed fairly longer than on other days. Javier strangely felt that he slept longer than usual. So, he smiled, satisfied that he was able to get some rest. But a voice interrupted his state of momentary euphoria.

"Haven't you slept enough…?"

The stranger's words sounded mocking to Javier's ears. But at the same time, they didn't sound mean spirited. Am I dreaming?

But he immediately knew that it wasn't a dream because he hadn't dreamed for the past couple years. I'm probably hearing things due to sleep deprivation. Javier flopped himself in the other direction to silence the voice.

But the voice came again.

"It's late. Time to wake up, sleepyhead."

What the…? It's not a dream. The voice was definitely coming from right beside him.

I'm a sleepyhead? No way… The grogginess was starting to fade, and clarity was returning gradually. He recalled how he had been suffering from insomnia for many years now. So, there was no way someone would call him sleepyhead. Plus, he had exceptionally sharp senses. They picked up on this stranger's movement and woke Javier even before they had time to walk over to his side and speak in his ear.

He snapped open his eyes to see who it was. He scanned the room, and he felt his body stiffen.

"Finally awake? Sheesh, if I didn't get you up, you'd be waking up when the sun is shining over you."

Standing beside his chair was a young man with black hair. He looked like he was in his mid-twenties. The guy was looking at him with a playful expression. But at the same time, it looked menacing and mischievous, like the face of a naughty kid who discovered the nicest toy in the world.

"Master Lloyd…?" Javier found himself muttering, as the pieces began to snap together in his head. The guy standing in front of him was the young master he protected. The beast and menace of the fiefdom. The very man who for some reason had been acting very strange in recent days.

Lloyd smirked as he looked at Javier. Javier didn't like it.

"At last, you recognize me. I'm truly honored," Lloyd mocked. Honored.…? He doesn't look a tad bit honored.

"But sir, why are you waking me up…?" Javier didn't mean to mutter, but his words came out all jumbled and mixed. He was too dazed and confused. Everything was in a blur.

Why is this guy waking me up? This has never happened before. Javier thought to himself. It was impossible. It was that snake Lloyd that always slept in, and I had to wake him up every single morning without exception. So, it was a wonder for Javier to see his young master proudly standing beside him, smirking triumphantly.

"What do you mean, why? You fell asleep here," Lloyd stated.

"I did? Here?" Javier's eyes widened for a second.

"Yes."

“Why?”

“Hey, don’t you remember what happened last night?”

“But last night, I was…”

“Passed out. Totally passed out,” Lloyd interrupted. “And you slept like a baby. You snored and ground your teeth in your sleep. You know, I thought I was in the middle of a night at the opera or something.”

“Yeah, I understand. The concrete lecture does that to people. I almost lost it when I took that class,” Lloyd admitted in an emphatic voice. “I was even getting sleepy myself as I was reading the lecture out loud.”

I don’t know what happened… I can’t remember anything. Really. I just leaned on this chair, and that was it. Last night was a blur, but Javier was certain of one thing: Now his head felt clear and light. He couldn’t believe he got a good night’s sleep. It was a marvelous and unknown experience.

“Tsk. I guess you’re still groggy. Here, drink this. It will wake you up.” Lloyd held out a glass. The cold clear water undulated in it.

After gulping the drink down, Javier inspected his body. He clenched his fists. He felt strong and revitalized. Which was something he did not feel the day before. He could feel the blood coursing through his clenched fists. He felt alive and refreshed, so very unlike the endless days when sleep deprivation wore him down. This is amazing. Did I really sleep well and defeat that hellish insomnia?

Although it seemed like an impossibility, Javier decided to accept this new reality. After all, his body was the proof. Being an excellent swordsman, he decided to trust the signs from his body. But just then, something caught his eye.

“What is that?” Javier was gazing at Lloyd, particularly at his waist. A wooden sword was hanging down at his side. There was more. The young master’s outfit was different from usual. He was wearing sturdy leather armor on top of his daily outfit. Leather protective pads were strapped around his knees and elbows. And a towel was draped around his neck.

Javier had the impression that his young master was all set, ready to take action, whatever that action was. Wait a second. Is he…? Javier involuntarily sucked in his breath, because he felt something ominous was coming his way, and he was correct.

“Did you forget already? We agreed that you’d teach me how to use a sword if I cured your insomnia,” Lloyd said matter-of-factly.

Lloyd’s confident voice called to mind what the event of the night before was. Last night, Javier took Lloyd’s offer. It was a kind of bet. The two made a deal that Javier would teach his vulgar young master the way of the sword if he helped him overcome insomnia and get a good night’s sleep. Lloyd made the offer, and Javier agreed to it. What? Now I have to teach this jerk how to fight with a sword? Me?

He wasn’t celebrating anymore that he had finally won the battle against insomnia and tasted the sweet victory of restful sleep.

Now he was in deep trouble.

***

“We will start with running,” Javier announced.

They were in the training hall with plenty of sunlight. Standing on one side of the hall, Javier continued. “Please stand over here. Good. You will be running laps around the hall. Do you have any questions?”

“No. What’s there to it? It’s just running.” Lloyd looked at Javier with a quizzical look. “Hold on, you weren’t going to pep-talk me, were you?” Lloyd asked.

“Pep talk? I don’t know what you mean.”

“Oh, come on. You know how coaches and trainers put on their solemn faces and say, ‘all training boils down to the basics, like running. The powerful slashes and impressive techniques must be backed by strong stamina and basic strength.' And blah, blah, blah."

Feeling exposed, Javier shut his mouth.

Lloyd shrugged. "And don't tell me that you pictured me refusing to run and whining to get on to the sword fighting right away," Lloyd continued. "And then you would reject me in a solemn voice that it was me who wanted to learn the sword in the first place, not you. Is that what you imagined?"

"Crap, I am right." Lloyd shook his head. "Whew. What are you, a baby? Tsk. I'm off now." With that, Lloyd began to jog.

Left alone at the starting line, Javier furrowed his brow. I really thought he would complain that he couldn't run.

The young master's reaction was completely different from what he expected. He was very cooperative, even. But I'm sure his true colors will show if I just make him keep running.

Javier was certain. He was certain that everyone brims with confidence when they first try something out. They imagine that they could do it. That the goal was near. That they were almost there.

But at the moment they need to overcome their physical and mental limits. Their initial confidence and bravado dissipate like they never existed. They made compromises because things weren't easy anymore. And, at last, they proved to the world that they were weak and fragile by giving up. Much like those who went on a diet only to start snacking again four days later. Like those smokers who started smoking a day after telling their friends that they'd quit.

Lloyd Frontera. You're no different. Javier knew his young master. He had no experience of this kind of situation… where he was forced to run. Javier could already picture what was going to happen after a few laps. He's going to regret being so arrogant. He might even ditch this whole thing and call off our deal.

Honestly, Javier direly wished that he would call it off. He didn’t want to teach swordsmanship to that jackass. He couldn’t trust his young master. After all, Lloyd was a drunk whose sole purpose in life was to get wasted. And he caused a riot every time he got loaded.

Javier flinched a little when he imagined the kinds of troubles that lush would get into once he learned how to use a sword. I can never let that happen.

Sure, his sadistic drunken ways had mellowed in the past few days. But one’s nature doesn't change that easily. He told himself it must be the same for Master Lloyd. For all anyone knew, his old habits could live again today. I’m going to treat you as harshly as possible. I will do so until you get exhausted and quit. Or, until you overcome your nature and prove that you are worthy of my efforts.

Javier resolved that he would put his foot down on this.

He gazed icily at Lloyd, and he waited. He would wait until Lloyd gave up. But things didn’t go as he planned.

Lloyd kept running. Without any words, he ran. He ran ten laps, then twenty, thirty… On and on, he ran. He passed Javier dozens of times. Yet he never voiced a word of complaint. Not even once.

He was out of breath. He was sweaty all over. His legs staggered in exhaustion. Yet he continued to run without a break, never slowing down.

But how? Javier thought. Javier’s eyes trembled in disbelief. He tried to hide it at first but didn’t even bother after a while. He couldn’t wrap his head around the young master’s mental strength. His tenacity was inconceivable, and Javier wanted to know where it was coming from.

However, to Lloyd, the secret was plain and simple. He had done countless things that were more physically demanding than simply running laps.

It was true.

During the time he was in the military, he had to undergo an exhausting number of marches and training. It was even worse when his parents passed away, and he had to make a living doing part-time jobs.

One time, he spent a whole day carrying bricks on his back up to the fourth floor of a house for a construction job. Then there was the time he loaded and unloaded the boxes and goods that went in and out of a warehouse all through the night.

Only those who went through such struggles knew what it felt like. During those times, Lloyd felt like his body was morphing into a gear in a machine. His muscles felt like they were on the brink of disintegrating after being endlessly used and abused.

Then, when he reached the point where breathing became a chore, he would look hopefully at his watch. He'd tell himself that it would be over soon, that it was almost time for a break. However, the reality he always faced was nothing but… a world of shit. Whenever he looked at his watch, he would see that not even half the time had passed! So, compared to the miserable days when he had to grind and hustle to earn some money, running around the hall was the same as being up in the sweet heaven above.

That was Lloyd's life back in Korea. Every day was a stifling struggle back then. Misery and despair assaulted his thoughts, and he constantly wondered, How long do I have to live like this?

And yet… he couldn't give up because he had to survive.

For just a few pennies…

Just to make ends meet…

He had to overcome his limits all the time. Even when he couldn't push himself anymore, he had to keep moving like a zombie. That was the only way he would not starve. But now, it was simple. I just have to run, and that's it.

He wasn’t moving because he had to. He was moving and running because he wanted to learn how to use the sword.

Sure, his body was sore. But he was happy and enjoying himself. He was out of breath and covered in sweat. His legs were losing strength. The world was becoming a smudge in front of his eyes from lack of oxygen. Despite all of this, he was happy.

Lloyd kept running.

When he reached fifty laps, Lloyd grinned at Javier as he passed by. “Hey, Javier, I’m the one who’s running, so why does your face look so bad?”

Another lap.

“Hey, don’t tell me I totally shattered your expectations.”

Another lap.

“Fine, keep staring into space then.”

Another lap.

And Lloyd continued running.

Finally, Javier stopped him. “Master Lloyd, please stop running.”

“W-why?”

“You’re exhausted and staggering.”

“I know…I know that. So?”

“So, take a rest.”

“Whew. Okay. Fine.”

At last, he stopped.

“Did I fluster you?” Lloyd asked as he caught his breath.

“No.”

“No, my foot. You are. You are flustered. Ha… Fine. I guess you didn’t see this coming,” Lloyd said and paused for a second. “I’m pretty sure that you got here ready to tell me something like, ‘Master Lloyd, I am disappointed in your lack of determination,’ or ‘Master Lloyd, you have to keep running until I tell you to stop.’ Tell me I’m wrong.”

Javier looked at Lloyd without a word.

“I told you this before, but you’re pretty judgmental.”

“I’m not sure what you mean.”

“Did you think I was joking when I asked you to teach me swordsmanship?” Lloyd said, gazing coldly at him. The smile was gone from his lips.

Javier couldn’t come up with an answer when he met his gaze. He felt exposed.

“Is swordsmanship a joke to you? Is that it?” Lloyd demanded.

“Of course it’s not.”

“Then why didn’t you take me seriously when I asked you to teach me?”

“That’s…”

“You think you can teach me with that lax attitude of yours?”

Javier was struck speechless again. For the first time in his life, he wanted to run away and hide. The jabs from the young master — who he dismissed as a mere troublemaker — continued to stab him in the heart.

“Come to think of it, I should be assessing whether you’re qualified to teach me how to use the sword, not the other way around. Am I wrong? So please, let’s do it right. Instead of arguing whether I’m worthy or not, spend your time finding out how to teach better. Got that?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes…” Javier bit his bottom lip involuntarily.

I can’t believe I got scolded by that good-for-nothing. It felt like a smack in the head. He wanted to deny it. But he could not.

I can’t because he is right. Javier accepted that he was in the wrong. He was more concerned if Lloyd was even worthy of being his student. He couldn’t care less about instructing him properly. Just as his young master pointed out.

He was unprepared to teach, yet he wanted to see if his young master had what it took to be his student. Javier felt ashamed as he reflected on his attitude.

Just then…

Ding dong.

A new message popped up in front of Lloyd.

[Your approval rating with Javier Asrahan has increased by one point.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -28]

[You have earned 18 RP by improving relationships with main characters.]

[Current RP: 29]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 12: The Asrahan Core Technique (1)

Sword training continued over the following few days.

Nothing exceptional took place.

As in the first session, Lloyd ran repeatedly around the training hall. When he had the time, he learned how to hold the sword, get into a fighting stance, and use his feet. The training mainly centered on the basics. But Lloyd didn't gripe even once. He never demanded that Javier move on to the powerful techniques that are useful in actual combat. He simply gave himself entirely over to the training.

Javier was surprised to see this. But he wasn't alone. The people in the barony were equally surprised.

"The young master spent the whole day training, again?" a maid said.

"Yeah, He didn't complain once. From morning to night," another yawped.

"Good gracious. Even though he comes home exhausted every day…"

"I know, right? I can hardly believe what I'm seeing."

"Me too. This makes no sense."

"What do you mean?"

"Hmm, do you think he might be ill?" The maid's voice sounded wary.

"Ill? How so?"

"I mean, mentally ill."

"You mean, he's lost it?" Another maid spoke.

"Yes, yes. It looks like it."

“You have a point…”

This kind of talk among the maids became common on the estate. The soldiers were just as confused as the maids were.

“What do you think is wrong with the young master?”

“Eh? Be specific,” a soldier said.

“I mean, he seems a bit strange. Doesn't he? Have you seen him drink lately?”

“Oh my, I don’t think I have?!” He exclaimed.

“Right?”

“Huh. Now that you mention it… I don’t think I’ve seen him drink for at least two weeks.”

“Wow,” another soldier paused for a second. “Wait a second.”

“What is it?”

“I know it sounds absurd, but I have a possible explanation.”

“What?”

“Maybe Lloyd is taking drugs in secret.”

“Drugs?”

“Uh-huh.” The soldier nodded.

“Yeah, but what kind?”

“What do you mean by what kind of drugs? The drugs,” the guy emphasized.

“What!?” he exclaimed in disbelief.

“Shh. Lower your voice. Hear me out,” he leaned over to make sure no one was listening. “This man, who did nothing but drink every day, quit overnight. And, he spends all day training in the hall. What else is there? It’s the drugs in him that give him the energy.”

“Come on… You’re being absurd.”

“No, I’m not. There is a kind that helps the user get hyper-focused. He might be taking that. That’s what’s keeping him in one piece despite the training.”

“Right? How else would that piece of trash be able to train so hard? Uh, uhm… Shush.”

“What is it?”

“Behind you… behind,” he muttered.

“Behind…? Oh… how are you today, Baroness Frontera!”

The soldiers guarding the front gate bowed when they saw Baroness Frontera walking toward them. She smiled elegantly.

“Very well. I hope you are doing very well, too,” she cooed gently.

“Th-thank you, madame.”

“Here. Could you give my son this towel when he returns from training?”

“Yes, madame.”

“Thank you. It must be boring to guard the gates, mustn’t it?”

“Pardon me?”

“Gossip is an excellent distraction to help alleviate boredom. However, please mind the subject of your discussions. After all, he is my son,” she said with a reserved sternness in her voice.

“We will keep that in mind, madame…”

So, Lloyd found himself at the center of estate gossip. The maids concluded that he was mentally ill. The soldiers, on the other hand, believed that he was taking drugs. Lloyd’s parents were happy and concerned at the same time about their son. All the while, Lloyd continued his training without a hitch.

Like everyone else, Javier was equally stupefied. It’s as if he’s become a different person overnight.

He trained from morning to night. It was a hectic and hellish regimen. He ran and even rolled on the ground all day. He brandished his sword in the same position innumerable times. The skin around his palms scraped and peeled, leaving calluses and bloody scabs.

And yet, he doesn’t complain. He’s enjoying it instead. Initially, Javier was convinced that Lloyd’s cockiness would disappear after a few days. But he had since changed his mind. Rather, he became concerned over the young master’s injuries. Lloyd’s determination was too strong. Javier watched over Lloyd’s training with great anxiety. And when Lloyd seemed to have reached his tipping point, Javier jumped in and forced him to rest.

How is it possible for a person to change this drastically? How is he no longer the wild drunk who lived only to drink another bottle and take his rage out on innocent people?

And where did he pick up all those strange stories he recites every night? Every night Lloyd prattled on about concrete, stress points, and so many other things Javier couldn’t remember because he would fall fast asleep. It didn’t sound like a magic spell, but it worked. Though he could barely remember the gibberish, it put him to good, happy sleep.

It could be something academic. Whatever it is, it’s more potent than sleeping pills. The only thing he had to do was just sit back and relax. After a few words, Javier passed out. He could fall asleep without worry. Lloyd’s ability to put him to sleep was beyond surprising. It was magical.

Javier furrowed his brow.

Who is he? Really, who is he? His indecent past was filled with disappointments. But his decent present was filled with surprises. The huge gap between the two stopped Javier from crediting it to a mere change of attitude. It would make more sense if another soul came to be in Lloyd's body, Javier thought to himself.

Though it would be completely absurd… Javier shook his head.

He shouted to Lloyd, who was on his 30th lap of runs. "That is enough, Master Lloyd."

"Whew. Already? I can run some more," Lloyd said as he panted for air.

"I know that."

"But why did you stop me?"

"I'm thinking about moving to the next step."

"Next step?"

"Mana reaction training."

"Whoa!" The corners of Lloyd's lips rose.

This was the moment he had been waiting for.

I was starting to get bored with basic training. Lloyd had been running for many days now, never complaining that he wanted to move up to the next level.

That was mainly because he was reaping the benefits of enduring the strenuous workout. His skin tone brightened. There was more vitality in his body. When he woke up in the morning, he felt refreshed and strong. On top of that, thanks to the commitment he demonstrated to others, he earned quite a lot of additional RP.

I've earned quite a lot. I already have 97 RP. In the last few days, his approval rating increased by one point with Javier. That got Lloyd 18 RP. And the approval rating with his father and mother increased by two and three points, respectively, bagging him 20 and 30 RP.

Lloyd was getting the hang of this RP system.

So, for every increase by one of my approval rating, I get 18 RP with Javier. As for my fictional parents, it's 10 RP for every approval rating increase. I guess that means the characters in the novel give out different RP. He concluded that the higher the significance of the characters in the story, the more RP he would get.

This means that I should work hard to get liked by Javier. As for the baron and baroness… they were a surprise. The novel hardly mentioned the baron and baroness in the story. To put it bluntly, they were only extras in the introduction. So, it came as a surprise that they would render more than half of the RP Javier gives out. This meant they could have a greater role in this world that has yet to be revealed.

Anyway, I'm finally proceeding to mana reaction training. The upcoming lessons filled his heart with expectation. I need to start reinforcing my mana now, so I can beat Sir Neumann.

The duel was fifteen days away.

He knew that he wouldn't be able to reach the level of skill required to conjure a manaheart in such a short period of time. It took a tremendous amount of work before one could create a manaheart. More than ten years for a person lacking any skills. Around five years for an average person. A gifted person would take two, while a genius may require six months to be able to use it. Even under the dedicated training of a learned master, that was how long it took to develop a manaheart.

But Javier reaches the level in a day. And he does that all by himself. What a monster. Lloyd was thinking about it when Javier spoke.

“Surely, it is in your best interest to curb your hopes that you will be able to develop a manaheart as soon as you reinforce and strengthen your mana. You need to take this one step at a time. In any case, you will see your body getting stronger by simple training of mana reinforcement.” Javier continued to speak. “Please, take your seat here.”

“This way?”

“Yes. Please relax. Lose the tension around your shoulders,” Javier urged.

“Will this do?”

“Yes. Now, I will imbue some of the mana into your body.”

“What should I do?”

“Nothing,” Javier replied. “Close your eyes and feel the mana coursing through your body as I control its movement.”

“Is it like energy transference?” Lloyd muttered a concept he picked up while he was reading fantasy stories.

“What is energy transference?” Javier asked.

“Nothing. Let’s get started,” Lloyd said.

“Yes.”

Lloyd then closed his eyes. He relaxed all of his body as the tension loosened. He felt Javier’s palm touching his back, and the rough and rigid texture caused Lloyd to think how coarse it was for an elegant, noble-looking person. Seconds later, cold and clear energy flowed into his body, starting from the back.

Whoosh…

So this is what mana feels like. It’s foreign yet amazing. The mana penetrated his skin and muscles. Like a dry cloth slowly absorbing water, the mana passed through his body down to his intestines and further down to his navel. That's where the mana made a U-turn. Like an automobile making its way onto the highway, it entered the spine. It crept upward from one bone to another, stimulating the senses along the way. It traveled up to the back of his neck and to the tip of his head. Afterward, it spread downward, from his face down to his chest. It then started to wrap around his heart.

Thump! Thump!

Lloyd heard the clear rhythm of his pounding heart. The swollen muscles around the organ pulsed and contracted. It sucked and released blood in a steady and strong repetitive motion. A glob of mana seeped into the heart, following the organ's movement and flow. It came naturally into the center of his heart, spreading its energy to other parts of the body.

Lloyd's mind cleared. He remained still in that state of clarity and opened his eyes several seconds later.

"How was it?"

Javier's voice sounded clearer than before. There was more. The training hall, the clouds, and everything in front of him appeared more vivid than earlier. The world he perceived previously was in HD. But now, with mana-powered vision, the world appeared in 8K Ultra HD.

Even the wind felt different as it brushed against his skin. Lloyd's senses improved in all aspects just from one mana reaction session. He turned around and found Javier softly grinning at him. Lloyd grinned back.

It was his first mana reaction experience; and now, it was time for Lloyd to give Javier his honest feedback.

"It sucks," Lloyd concluded.

"Excuse me…?"

"It sucks," Lloyd said once again.

The satisfaction on Javier's face vanished right away.

But Lloyd didn’t care about his change of expression. He simply became more brazen and nonchalantly added, “I don’t feel much different.”

“Did you not feel the movement of mana in your body?” Javier inquired.

“Oh, I did.”

“Master Lloyd, that means you reacted to the mana. I am sure your senses became sharper than before,” Javier said in an almost defensive manner.

“Oh, come on. Are you telling me you deserve a pat on the back just for this?”

“Master Lloyd.”

Javier’s look grew serious, and there was irritation in his eyes. It was also reflected in his voice. “You cannot overlook and dismiss the change. It is what it is.”

“The mana reaction training is about this? That’s it?”

“Yes. I think you have been gravely mistaken,” Javier stated.

“Mistaken? What do you mean?”

“You had too many expectations.”

“For myself, you mean?” Lloyd spoke nonchalantly.

“Yes.” Javier’s tone sounded a bit irritated. “One session does not turn you into an outlandishly strong man or super-human. It’s rather the opposite. In order to develop a manaheart, it is of great importance that you take one step at a time,” Javier explained patiently. “You cannot expect the first spoonful of soup to fill your stomach. I am sure you know this since it is common sense.”

“Yeah, of course I do,” Lloyd replied.

“But then, why are you complaining?”

“Complaining? Me?”

“Yes. Are you feeling anxious as the day of the duel is coming near?” Javier asked. “To be honest, you barely stand a chance in the duel. It was an unfair contest in the first place. Sir Neumann is not a weak man. He is a knight who is on the path to being a proper sword expert.”

“Yeah, I know. I know that he’s a sword expert. Definitely not someone I can easily compete with, especially when I’m here just beginning basic mana reaction training.”

“Excuse me…?” Javier, who had been eloquently defending his case, stuttered for the first time.

Lloyd looked at him in the eyes meaningfully. “Do you think that I’m simply being ruthless and stubborn without any plans?” Lloyd asked.

“Well…”

“Come on. How long are you going to pretend you have no idea?”

“I still do not know what you are getting at.”

“Hey, Javier Asrahan. Why do you think I singularly picked you to teach me swordsmanship?” Lloyd inquired. “Did you really think of me as a dweeb who goes to challenge an experienced swordsman because fifteen days of mana training is what it takes to beat that old knight?”

“Um, well…”

“Let’s be honest, Javier. You got something more than this typical reinforcement method, don’t you? Something that you hide for yourself.” I knew it. Lloyd once again realized that Javier sucked at lying. He’s just too obvious. The thought made Lloyd laugh.

A chuckle escaped him. “Fine, I will be blunt. The Asrahan Core Technique. I want you to teach me that. And don’t even think of playing dumb this time.”

Javier’s eyes widened in disbelief.

In The Knight of Blood and Iron, the Asrahan Core Technique was the exceptional training method Javier developed that led him to become the first grandmaster in history.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 13: The Asrahan Core Technique (2)

“The Asrahan Core Technique. I want you to teach me that. And don’t even think of playing dumb this time.”

Javier was stupefied. His eyes widened, and his mouth hung open in disbelief. It was only natural. To Javier, the person in front of him was nothing but an object of protection. And yet he uttered something Javier had never imagined even once.

Master Lloyd knows about my mana training? How? He couldn’t wrap his head around it. Just like when his master talked about his insomnia. But this mana training confounded him more. It was exclusive to himself, a secret he had never mentioned nor hinted of to anyone.

Plus, it had only been a month since he named the training ‘Asrahan Core Technique.’

How did he find this out? I haven’t even completed it yet… Javier wondered for a second if Lloyd had mastered the art of mind reading. In that flash of a second, Lloyd appeared like a mysterious and inexplicable being. Javier’s eyes reflected his emotions as he looked at his master.

Lloyd scoffed at the sight. “What? Why? What? Why are you squinting your eyes like that?” Lloyd demanded to know.

“Well, of course…”

“Of course, what?” Lloyd retorted.

“How did you find out about it?”

For the past few weeks, Lloyd had been exposing Javier’s innermost thoughts he only kept to himself. And each time Javier tried to deny them, Lloyd blatantly scoffed at and mocked him. Since Javier held enough of such experiences, he decided that he shouldn’t deny it anymore. But he wanted to find out how his young master saw through him like that.

Lloyd's answer was simple. "You said it all in your sleep," Lloyd stated coolly.

"Pardon?" Javier frowned.

"I'm telling you. You explained it to me while you were asleep," Lloyd reiterated.

"Are you telling the truth?"

"Uh-huh." Lloyd smiled brightly.

Telling the truth, my foot. It's obviously a lie. Javier never snored nor talked in his sleep. When he could sleep, he slept like a piece of fine sculpture, matching his elegant appearance.

But Lloyd decided to silence his protesting conscience and take the low road by lying. "Do you want me to prove it to you?" Lloyd offered.

"Prove? How?"

"Well, I'll tell you the details," Lloyd said. He began to recite the Asrahan Core Technique, as he had read it in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

"There is a limit to a human's manaheart. It's biological and determined from birth. So that means there's a limit to the amount one can mobilize at a go." The principle was simple. It was the same idea behind computer RAM or a water bucket. Eight gigabytes of RAM could store only eight gigabytes of data at a time and nothing more. In the same way, a one-liter bucket could contain only as much as it can, which is one liter of liquid. The same went for the amount of mana humans can use and mobilize within their hearts.

Its limit was the size of the heart. No human could go over the limit.

"There are no exceptions. Even the strongest swordsmen and knights who've achieved extraordinary feats. Why? It's simple," Lloyd explained confidently. "Because they're born human. A human body… no… specifically a human heart, can never overcome the biological limits it has.

That’s why dragons are such buff creatures in the stories. They have a dragon heart.”

“That is…”

“Shush. I’m not done yet.” Lloyd cut him short. “So, you thought to yourself. What if I can draw in the mana from the outside instead of sourcing it from my body? What would happen if I concentrated the mana absorbed from external sources into my manaheart? You wondered if you could temporarily overcome your biological limits and use more mana than you can handle.” Lloyd grinned after he finished.

Javier appeared calm and collected. But he couldn’t fool Lloyd, who caught the slight tremble in Javier’s eyes.

“And your questions led you to secretly research new ways to manipulate mana. And you gave a name to it. The Asrahan Core Technique. About a month ago… if I’m correct. Right?”

“Yes… you are correct,” Javier answered hesitantly.

“Hey, are you okay? You’re conceding awfully quickly today.”

“That is because you are so right about everything that I cannot even think of denying it.”

“As I thought, then let’s go back to where we left off.”

Lloyd figured that it was time to bring up what he really had in mind.

“First. How dare you? You had a sleek, amazing technique up your sleeve, and you dare try to teach me the simplest and most boring technique everyone knows how to use?” Lloyd raised his voice accusingly. “Did you used to teach preschool kids who were just happy with everything you do? How dare you try to bamboozle me like that.”

“But Master Lloyd…”

“I know.” Lloyd looked at Javier gravely. “This technique is yours, and you don’t give it out to strangers. But come on. I’m not a stranger to you, am I?”

“Yes, you are,” Javier answered resolutely.

“Dang.”

“Technically speaking, you are just the master I protect, and…”

“And…?” Anticipation clouded Lloyd’s face.

“And even if I wish to teach you my technique, it is impossible.”

“How so?”

“Because it is incomplete.” Javier’s voice grew solemn. “The concept you just explained is correct,” Javier went on. “The idea is that you absorb the mana from external sources, so you can use it. But no one has ever succeeded in this. I simply heard about the theory.” Javier shrugged. “I, for one, never succeeded.”

“So?” Lloyd asked.

“It is dangerous,” Javier explained matter-of-factly, “especially so for someone like you, Master Lloyd, who is taking baby steps in channeling mana.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

“Are you saying that, because you are worried about me?”

“Of course not.”

“Tsk. So straightforward.”

“Thank you.”

“So, what you’re saying is you can’t teach me that because it’s dangerous, right?”

“Yes,” Javier answered.

“What if it were not dangerous?”

“Excuse me…?” There was a slight quiver in Javier’s eyebrows.

Lloyd chuckled. He must be nervous about what I’m going to bring up this time.

“Allow me to point out the part you’re stuck with, why it’s yet to be completed.”

“I don’t know what you are getting at…”

“You absorb the mana from outside, it works. You transfer it to your manaheart, and it works. But when you’re about to combine that with the mana that was already in your body… Bam!” Lloyd clapped his hands in exaggeration.

“That’s where you get stuck. You mix the two, but two different mana clash and bounce off. That’s the part you’re struggling with, right?” Lloyd said.

Javier’s eyes trembled. “How did you know that?”

“How else? I told you. I heard you talk in your sleep,” Lloyd reminded Javier. This lie—that Javier talked about in his sleep—worked perfectly to silence Javier and clear Lloyd from any suspicion. It was like a cheat code. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose further up. I bet he’s got nothing to say. I mean, how can he prove that he didn’t say it while he was completely out of it happily sleeping?

Just then, Lloyd recalled the beginning of The Knight of Blood and Iron. At first, Javier wasn’t able to perfect the technique because of the mana collision. He tried out several other methods but failed each time. It took five more years until he came up with a new approach to complete the technique. Afterward, he worked even harder to polish the finished product.

And at last, he became the first grand master in the history of the Lorasian continent.

Lloyd remembered the approach that took Javier five years to find. With that in mind, Lloyd said, “From my perspective, I think it’s a mistake, not an error mind you, to combine the internal and external mana into one.”

“What?” Javier’s brow rose upward. “I’m not sure what you mean.”

“It’s just as I said. Why do you have to shove the external mana into the manaheart?” Lloyd inquired. “If you do that, it takes a toll on the heart because of the storage capacity of your manaheart. And why do you have to mix the two mana in the first place? Don’t you think you’re being a bit narrow-minded?”

“You mean…”

“You can always circulate the mana outside. Away from the manaheart,” Lloyd concluded, raising his hands in the air.

Javier’s eyes widened in utter shock.

This should be enough info for him to work with. Lloyd picked up a wood branch in the corner of the training hall. He then began to illustrate his point by drawing on the ground. “Look. You absorb the mana from outside, and… you rotate it this way. Around the heart and manaheart,” Lloyd explained as he drew a heart.

“Do you mean that I should create a mana circle and wrap the heart with it?” Javier inquired.

“That’s it. A circle. It’s a good name.” Lloyd confirmed.

“But what about the natural mana in your body…?”

“You don’t have to mix the two. You operate it separately. Your natural mana works inside your manaheart, while the other one will rotate your manaheart from the outside in a circular form. What do you think?”

“Hey, I’m just suggesting here. You know that I’m just a noob with this stuff. I guess I was just able to think outside the box,” Lloyd commented. “Well, you can always try it out if you’re doubtful.”

“I will.” Javier immediately nodded his head. It appeared that he understood what his young master meant. After that, Lloyd talked no more. He simply stepped aside and watched Javier test out the new method.

Sometime later…

Javier finally opened his eyes. And he turned and looked at Lloyd.

“Thank you.”

Ding Dong.

[Your approval rating with Javier Asrahan has increased by five points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -22]

[You have earned 90 RP by improving relationships with main characters.]

[Current RP: 187]

[Your relationship state with Javier Asrahan has been changed from hatred to awkward.]

[You have earned 5 RP as a bonus for the improvement.]

[Current RP: 192]

He did it.

He could tell from how Javier thanked him. And his gaze was a little bit different too. It was more adoring. Not only that, but the approval rating message proved that Javier succeeded.

“Did it go well?” Lloyd asked him nonetheless.

“Yes, Master Lloyd,” Javier replied.

“What about the circle?”

“It worked,” Javier answered, his voice sounding a little exhilarated. “But I created several circles because it seemed inefficient to utilize just one circle and focus all the absorbed mana there.”

“How many did you make?”

“Three.”

“Dang.”

First, he succeeds in separating the mana at the first attempt, and now he creates three circles in one go? Lloyd once again realized that Javier was a knight with enormous potential. I guess it’s just a matter of time until he becomes a sword master.

Currently, Javier was a high-level sword expert, so he still had a way to go before he could step up and move on to the next level. But since he was able to create three circles around the manaheart, fighting a sword master shouldn’t take that much of a toll on him. If he’s lucky, the fight might end up in a draw.

The advantage of using the Asrahan Core Technique was that it empowered the users to go beyond their current level. That was possible because it absorbed the mana from an external source to be added to the existing mana. Each circle was like a supplementary engine added to the main one.

Javier’s success reminded Lloyd of what happened in the novel. Javier completes the Asrahan Core Technique when he is a sword master. As soon as he perfects it, he creates four circles or the quadra-circles. That alone equips him with unrivaled power among his fellow sword masters. And when he rises as the grandmaster, he succeeds in creating penta-circles. In the final part of the epic, he achieves the extraordinary feat of hexa-circles. The story states that the amount of mana Javier uses in one motion far exceeds that of a dragon heart.

But of course, Javier was ignorant of all of this. He had no idea that he had just fast-forwarded the beginning of his epic story, the completion of the Asrahan Core Technique, by five years.

Lloyd was dazed, basking in joy to witness such a legendary moment up close. But he shook his head because it wasn't the time to be impressed. It didn't put food on his table. This was the time to seize any opportunities that would make him rich.

"You must be grateful to me, aren't you, Javier?" Lloyd said, his voice sounding meaningful and suggestive.

"Yes, Master Lloyd," Javier replied.

"I guess now you have a reason to teach me then."

"Pardon?" Javier frowned.

"The Asrahan Core Technique," Lloyd said as he took a step forward. "Eh? What's that attitude? Don't tell me that you're just going to thank me and turn around and leave."

"But Master Lloyd…"

"Yeah, what is it?"

"I believe that you should learn the basics first — how to reinforce and draw the mana — that is more important."

"Yeah, so?"

"So why don't you learn the basics first and my technique later?"

"Yeah… No." Lloyd flatly rejected the offer. That was mainly because the duel was happening in two weeks. He was in a hurry. "Try to put yourself in my shoes," Lloyd explained. "Do you think that this basic mana training would come in useful at a duel that's happening in fifteen days?"

"I do not think it will," Javier confessed.

“Right? So, I guess what you’re saying is that I should just lose the duel, right? I know. I know what you’re thinking right now, Javier. Look at the long-term. Immediate defeat wouldn’t harm me much. It’s better to master the basics,” Lloyd stated. “You’re not wrong about that. It really isn’t wrong. But to me, it is wrong.”

“How so?”

“Because this duel matters a lot to me.” Lloyd was telling the truth. Sir Neumann had already betrayed the baron behind everyone’s back. And Lloyd finally had the chance to make an example out of him and show everyone what happens to those who betray the barony.

But if he lost, that would be it for him. Everything would be a mess. He needed this fiefdom to stay wealthy and comfortable for the rest of his life.

“I must win, come hell or high water,” Lloyd stated, his voice brimming with determination. “And I’m going to learn the Asrahan Core Technique.”

“But what if I say no?” Javier asked.

“Oh, is that how you want to play this? Well, I have my ways then.” Lloyd smiled brightly.

He had a surefire offer that would get Javier to accept the deal.

“If you don’t teach me your technique, say goodbye to my lullaby service.”

“What? Why? What? Why are you looking at me like that? You think that’s a cheap shot?”

“A little bit,” Javier confessed.

“Well, there is no such thing as a free lunch. You can always teach me your technique if you feel wronged.”

Javier was deep in thought.

Lloyd flashed a meaningful smile. You won't be able to reject the deal. I know because you've already tasted the bliss of peaceful uninterrupted sleep.

For the past few days, Javier has been sleeping like a baby, thanks to Lloyd's recitation of the lectures he learned back when he was a civil engineering student. Lloyd was confident that Javier's heart sank when he announced the possible cancellation of the lullaby service. We humans are like that. It sucks more when we've received something only for it to be taken away.

This was a universal truth.

There was no going back after experiencing the convenience and comfort of certain objects and services provided. People can't go back to using payphones because they know how convenient it is to use smartphones. It's the same with robot vacuums, height-boosting insoles, food delivery apps, social sharing sites, and elevators. The discomfort of living without them becomes too overwhelming to bear.

Javier must be going through this right now. He had been suffering from insomnia for many years now, and he had just learned what it was like to rest well. There was no going back for him. Just as Lloyd expected, Javier nodded in affirmation.

"Whew… All right"

"All right, what?"

"I will teach you my Asrahan Core Technique."

"Good choice." Lloyd clenched his fists. I knew it. All your sword skills will eventually be mine.

The Asrahan Core Technique.

It was time to master it.

***

Time flew. The day of the duel was getting closer. Training never stopped for the entire time. Lloyd's basic stamina improved manyfold. He also focused on the Asrahan Core Technique.

Lloyd had commissioned a blacksmith to create a special weapon for him. "It has to be pure steel. Here's the design," Lloyd said as he held out the design to the blacksmith.

"Master Lloyd? what is this?"

"It's the design for my weapon. Why? Is it strange?"

"No, but how are you going to fight with this…?" the blacksmith muttered.

"No questions, please. Can you make it?"

"Eh? Y-yes."

"I'll leave you to it, then."

The blacksmith was dumbfounded when he received the design from Lloyd. He looked at it several times. It didn't look like a suitable weapon to be used in a fight. But what could he do? The blacksmith knew what Lloyd was like: the son of the feudal lord and the worst hooligan in the land. He wouldn't dare work up the courage to criticize Lloyd's request.

A few days later.

It was finally the day.

The duel was happening today.

"Young Master, the blacksmith delivered the weapon." The weapon Lloyd commissioned was delivered to the estate. As he heard the maid announce the delivery, Lloyd softly clenched his fists.

The Asrahan Core Technique. And my special weapon… Everything was all set.

Sir Neumann. You're so dead. Lloyd's eyes flashed with fierce determination.

At last, the day had come for him to trim a weed.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 14: The Lunatic’s Four Weapons (1)

The early spring sun blessed the land with light. Everyone was finishing their morning chores. Farmers wiped their sweat off in the fields, while lumberjacks set down their axes and breathed in some fresh air. A shepherd’s flute filled the meadow with sweet melodies. Winemakers in their vineyards and laundry maids down by the river all paused their work for a while. Everything came to a halt at this hour, for it was time for lunch.

However, something was different today. Something extraordinary was taking place at the Frontera estate’s training center.

“Hey, what do you think will happen today in the duel?” a farmer asked his friend.

“What do you mean? It’s clear who’s going to win,” he replied.

“Are you thinking what I’m thinking?”

“Of course. Who else?” he said matter-of-factly.

“Right? How in the world could Sir Lloyd beat Sir Neumann?”

“We’ll all have fun, ha-ha. Oh, what fun we'll have to see them fight,” the guy said with a smile on his face.

“Hahaha, you’re not wrong,” another exclaimed. “I’m going to savor every moment the young master gets thrown to the ground with a face full of dirt. This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.”

The farmers chattered with one another as they gathered in the corner of the training center. Beside them was a group of women who also skipped lunch for the duel.

“I’m a bit worried,” one of them said.

“Worried? How so?” another replied.

“I’m worried about the young master. What if he wins against Sir Neumann? That’s going to make him more of a jerk.”

“My, why would you worry about it? You’ve got nothing to worry about,” another replied as she waved her hands.

“How so? I heard that Master Lloyd whipped and smacked Sir Ulrich until he begged for mercy,” she countered.

“But we’re talking about Sir Neumann here.”

“Hmm… So, are you saying there’s no chance for Master Lloyd to win?”

“Certainly not. Sir Neumann is the strongest man in the fiefdom,” she boasted. “And who cares who wins? This kind of entertainment was just what we need to kill the boredom.”

Dozens of people gathered at the training center to watch the duel. Most of them anticipated that Lloyd Frontera would be the loser. They rooted for Sir Neumann. As far as they knew, their young master had never even held a sword before. Although he had calmed down a month or two ago, the Lloyd Frontera they knew was a man who lived in a drunken stupor. Aside from his drinking problem, the people cheered for Sir Neumann because of the troubles Lloyd had caused in the land. He was a bad example to the children of their land. Almost everyone was a victim of his unsightly behavior and harassment.

I pray to the heavens that Sir Neumann will put the fear of God into that man. That must be enough to teach him a lesson to stay low and keep things down. Please, please…!

Most of those gathered had the same wish. But there were a few who supported Lloyd.

“But you know, Master Lloyd has been staying out of trouble these days.” It was a shepherd boy who spoke. His voice sounded cautious. But his comment immediately attracted the annoyed voices of the woodcutters around him.

“Hey, kid. People don’t change,” one of them said defiantly.

“Sir, but it is true that he has changed,” the boy insisted.

“Sure. That’s true. But so what? It’s only been two months. He’s got to keep up that good behavior for a while to earn our trust,” the man huffed.

“But he installed the floor heating system, the ondol, in my house,” the boy cried.

“Tsk. Didn’t you pay for it?” the guy huffed again.

“But it’s very warm and nice,” the boy replied.

“Goodness. Whatever. You’re a boy crying wolf anyway.”

“I’m not lying. I’m telling the truth!”

“Enough,” the guy said solemnly. “I’ve signed the contract for that floor heating system or whatever, so I’ll find out soon. Let’s enjoy the show first.”

“Yes, sir…”

Other than the shepherd boy, few rooted for Lloyd.

The baron and the baroness were there in support of their son. Baron Frontera called Sir Neumann earlier in the day to ask a favor of him.

“Sir Neumann,” Baron Frontera called.

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Please take care of my son today.”

“Understood. Please do not worry about it.”

“Thank you,” the baron continued, “Though my son has acted impertinently, he is going to be your master in the future. So please don’t be too harsh on him. Make sure he is free from injury."

"I will keep that in mind, sir."

In short, even those who rooted for him didn't believe that he would actually win. So not a single soul in the crowd thought victory would go to Lloyd. When Lloyd finally appeared in the arena, what little hope they had in their hearts vanished immediately. The result of the duel was already determined in their heads. Sir Neumann would win.

"I present to you, Sir Lloyd!" the estate servant shouted.

The announcement moved everyone to turn toward the entrance. And at last, Lloyd trudged into the training center. He was holding a shovel in his hand.

"Eh?" Everyone's eyes widened in surprise.

They saw the shovel. And they wondered for a second if they were on a construction site.

I thought he came here for a duel.

Why is he holding a shovel instead of a sword, an ax, or a spear? They wondered to themselves.

"Hey, is construction happening here after the fight?" one of the soldiers asked.

"What do you mean?" answered another.

"I mean, the floor heating system construction Sir Lloyd is obsessed with these days," he replied.

"Are you asking if it's happening here? No way."

"Right?"

"Yeah, no way."

The soldiers who weren't working today chatted with one another. They couldn’t wrap their brains around this. As everyone stared and wondered, Lloyd strolled into the center of the ring looking nonchalant. The bright sunlight revealed the shovel in his hand more clearly. Everyone could see that the shovel was made out of solid steel from top to bottom.

There was only one reason why Lloyd commissioned it that way. The shovel was a weapon, not a garden tool. Lloyd walked closer to the bleachers where the baron was sitting. He then spoke aloud. “I, Lloyd Frontera, the son of Arcos Frontera, is ready to face Sir Neumann in armed combat!”

It became crystal clear to everyone. He really was here to do this duel.

The baron furrowed his eyebrows.

“Are you prepared for this duel?” the baron asked.

“Yes,” Lloyd answered.

“What about your weapon? Where is your weapon?”

“Here,” Lloyd said as he smiled and lifted up the steel shovel. “This is my weapon.”

The baron was too shocked to respond. He had thought Lloyd was coming to his senses, but he was wrong. His hope for his eldest son to realize his mistakes and live a proper life was abjectly betrayed. I can’t believe he has come to the duel with such a perfunctory attitude.

The baron gritted his teeth. His heart sank with disappointment. With a sterner countenance, he gazed at Sir Neumann, and nodded slightly at him. You can rough him up. Pull him back to his senses.

Sir Neumann nodded at his master in response, understanding his look. Yes, My Lord. At your service.

This was just as he wanted. Things were developing exactly according to his wishes. Every fiber of his being yearned to roughen up the arrogant young master and hammer some sense into him. And when he turned and saw the way the young master was standing, Sir Neumann became more eager to beat him down.

Chatter, chatter. The audience murmured in wonder.

Lloyd was striking a weird pose that no one had ever seen before. He was holding his shovel, with arms wide apart. His left hand clutched right below the shovel head. His right hand casually held the handle. He steadily bent his arms. This made him look like he was almost carrying the shovel in the air, and its sharp head pointed toward Sir Neumann. This posture looked ridiculously funny and awkward to Sir Neumann, who had never seen anything like it.

Unable to hold still any longer, Sir Neumann squeezed his nose. “Master Lloyd, may I remind you… We are meant to duel.”

“Yeah, I know that.”

“Then why are you standing like that?” Sir Neumann asked.

“Oh? I’m getting ready to fight,” Lloyd answered.

“Are you mocking me with your childish pranks?”

“Eh? No, I’m not.”

“Then what are you trying to do?” Sir Neumann demanded.

“Can’t you see? I’m getting ready to beat the crap out of you.”

“I see… I’ll make you regret those words.”

“Pshaw, whatever.”

Crack! Sir Neumann gritted his teeth.

Trying to hold back the rage surging in his heart for being so insulted, Sir Neumann looked at Baron Frontera and spoke. “I am ready to duel.”

Sir Neumann's announcement was solemn and stern. The audience swallowed nervously as they felt the iciness in his voice. They tensed up in anticipation of the duel and hoped it would live up to their expectations.

Finally, the baron declared, "I hereby announce the commencement of this fair contest between these two honorable gentlemen of the realm."

As soon as the official announcement was made, Sir Neumann revealed his fangs. He immediately charged toward Lloyd.

You little punk! I'll teach you a lesson! Whoosh! Sir Neumann's feet pushed lightly off the ground, sending his body charging forward. He was faster than an ordinary person.

Lloyd and Sir Neumann were standing at a four-yard distance before the fight began. But it took only one leap for Sir Neumann to close the gap.

"Wow…!" The audience exclaimed, impressed by his lightning speed.

Before the noise died down, Sir Neumann's sword moved. Still encased in its sheath, it slashed through the air. I'll start by giving you one or two broken bones!

Sir Neumann knew how to tame a wild horse. He beat the animal until it came to its senses and calmed down.

He was already sick and tired of this tacky province stuck in the middle of nowhere. He began hating this place a long time ago. That's why he decided to take advantage of this chance to crush the young master, who he deemed unworthy of his station.

I'm going to unleash the beast today! The baron won't hold me to blame. Afterward, I'll leave this place. Just as I promised! Bwahahahaha!!!

He pictured a rosy future for himself and his partner in crime. Others criticized him for being a real estate swindler. But Sir Neumann begged to differ. His business was just! It's all fair game! Sir Neumann had passed along information about the Frontera barony to his partner, who had used it to usurp the baron’s assets. In return, Sir Neumann received a healthy kickback as payment.

There was more.

This business partner had offered that Sir Neumann should come to work for him and leave this good-for-nothing province. He promised better treatment befitting his prestigious knightly status.

Of course, he should! My talent is too precious to be wasted in the sticks!

Sir Neumann was an ambitious man with big dreams. He dreamed of rising to fame with his sword and living in riches. Now he was close to achieving that dream. But there were things to take care of first like the rude and impertinent young master he was about to drop some schooling on. Hard.

I’ll teach you a lesson!

Swoosh! The encased long sword swung in the air. The audience shuddered at the sight. He brandished the sword diagonally from right to left. His target was Lloyd’s left clavicle. Let’s start with a collarbone! Sir Neumann’s eyes gleamed with cruelty. He was resolute.

That upstart Lloyd would never be able to defend the incoming blow. It would be an impossibility for that dumb punk standing there stupidly with a shovel in his hand.

Everyone there thought exactly the same thing. Including Baron Frontera, who was watching the fight from behind his usual stern expression; and, the baroness, who had dug her nails into her palms in anxiety.

But there was one in the crowd that thought otherwise. It was Javier. Master Lloyd was not joking when he assumed that position. Narrowing his eyes to slits, Javier observed the fight, following every movement between the two. He considered Lloyd’s posture unusually awkward; but, at the same time, he looked stable and comfortable. That stance couldn’t have been mastered overnight. Such stable footing told Javier that Lloyd had struck such a pose many times before the duel.

He had never assumed that position while he practiced with me. Does this mean that he also trained separately without my knowing? Whatever the case was, one thing was for sure. There's no mistaking it. This position was only created for the real fight. Chills ran down his spine at the realization. He had a feeling that the duel might end up entirely different from what everyone expected. And a second later, Javier realized that he was right.

Swish! The steel shovel moved at last. It softly drew a vertical line in the air, blocking the incoming long sword.

Clatter! His motion was so simple that it looked easy.

Sir Neumann wasn't taken aback when his blow didn't land as expected.

Ha! Try blocking it all you want! He thought Lloyd had just gotten lucky. He fumbled to defend it like any other novice, and it worked. Pure luck and nothing else. Sir Neumann scoffed, remembering who he was. He was a knight that had reached expert swordsman level. He could use mana Lloyd would never be able to conjure.

I'll shatter your defenses with my strength!

*Flash! S*ir Neumann's eyes blazed with anger. His long sword glimmered softly. Mana flowed into his sword, covering its blade with a thin layer of mysterious energy.

But seconds later… The energy suddenly faded away.

To be precise, it was absorbed into the steel shovel. The mana was transferred from the sword into the shovel. The same happened in his body. The mana left Sir Neumann 's manaheart with a 'swoosh.'

Eh…? Sir Neumann's eyes flew wide open in astonishment.

At that moment, the shovel moved again. Clang! The sword was pushed to the side, like a fly being swatted away. Sir Neumann strove to endure the pressure on his sword, but he could not. He felt strange, like the power was leaving his body.

Sensing an opportunity, Lloyd swung his shovel very hard.

Thwack!

“Argh…!”

The shovel knocked Sir Neumann right in the face.

Drops of blood splattered out of his mouth, as the sheer force of the strike sent his head jerking to one side.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 15: The Lunatic's Four Weapons (2)

Thwack!

A painful blow to the face.

"Oof!"

Sir Neumann's world just turned upside down.

What just happened? He was dazed at that moment. But it didn't last long. Sir Neumann quickly recovered himself and immediately figured out the predicament he was in. Okay. He blocked my attack. And not only that, he struck back at me! Is this for real?

Time seemed to have slowed down. He saw drops of blood flying slowly through the air. It was his blood, from his mouth. That's when he noticed the numbness. The strike must have busted up his mouth. That punk did this to me?

Crack! Sir Neumann found himself gritting his teeth again. He moved quickly, spreading his legs wide to get a stable footing. He lowered his back just in time to avoid falling to the ground.

"Ah-h-h!!" he shouted out loud, as soon as he regained balance. Then, he drew out mana from his manaheart. It spread all over his body. Feeling the energy coming back to him, he pulled his sword out and wielded it high.

His counterattack was immediately blocked again. Kerrang!

"Oh, would you look at that? You attack right away. I did the same to Sir Ulrich, and it completely knocked him out."

"Grrr…!"

The wide shovel head blocked the long sword. But Sir Neumann wasn't going to give up. He shifted his approach with the sword when he saw that the attack didn’t work. He took a step forward and gave his sword a twist.

Brangg! The sword and shovel slammed together with a loud metallic crash.

Time to lose your shovel! Sir Neumann quickly devised a plan. He would press his sword hard against the shovel. Next, he’d rotate it twice and give a strong jerk to disarm Lloyd. Then, he would trip Lloyd and knock him to the ground.

He thought it was a surefire method to neutralize Lloyd.

But he failed to realize one important truth in life, and that was that everyone had a brilliant plan until they were destroyed.

“Tsk. Are you trying to disarm me? Nice try,” Lloyd said defiantly.

Clatter! Just as soon as Lloyd finished speaking, the sword and shovel froze in midair. Technically, it was Lloyd who willed the shovel to stop, which made the sword halt too. Then something else happened. The power in Sir Neumann’s manaheart started to get sucked out like the tide.

Neumann’s power flowed out from his manaheart, through his arms, and into his sword… And it streamed from the sword into the shovel just like soda pops up a drinking straw. Lloyd sucked up all that power like a dry sponge. Lloyd’s shovel was sucking the mana right out of Sir Neumann’s body.

“What is this?!” Terrified, Sir Neumann attempted to pull his sword back quickly. But he couldn’t separate it. Now drained of mana he found himself moving slower than usual. It was as if he had become an ordinary person at that moment.

As Sir Neumann was suffering, Lloyd pressed forward his attack with speed and skill that would normally be displayed only by a far more advanced fighter. “I am so relieved,” Lloyd muttered under his breath.

Zoom! With that, Lloyd easily narrowed his distance from Sir Neumann.

“You!!” Sir Neumann attempted to brandish his sword with the scabbard still on.

But Lloyd was faster. Swoosh!

Sir Neumann caught a glimpse of the shovel handle heading straight for his face. A second later he felt a searing pain in his nose. Crack!

“Ack!” Is my nose broken!? He wondered. He couldn’t open his eyes because of the searing pain. He staggered back three steps.

Lloyd didn’t stop there. He charged forth. The fire was in him now.

“I was a bit worried, actually,” Lloyd said nonchalantly. “I’ve never tested whether a single circle can take the mana of a swordsman at your level.”

“Arggh!” Sir Neumann shrieked and frantically swung his sword down to counterattack. He felt a small portion of his mana restored at that second. But Lloyd defended the attack with his shovel in a breeze, and despair clouded over Sir Neumann’s face again.

The tiny bit of mana left in the sword got sucked into the shovel once more!

This is nuts!

Wham! Lloyd swung his mana-charged shovel and slapped Sir Neumann in the face. It blinded him as his head jerked to one side. Such a thing had never happened before. Sir Neumann had never imagined that this was even possible in real life.

That punk is… absorbing my mana…

Sir Neumann was starting to understand what was happening. But that pitched him into much further dismay. How can he absorb another person’s mana? And how can he use it as his own…? How???

He felt cheated. This was unfair. But he was no quitter. Sir Neumann struggled to get back on his feet to continue the attack. But it was all in vain. The more he struggled, the more he became ensnared.

Must be confused, eh? I'm sure you can't wrap your head around this. That's why you're losing. You spent the last month goofing around, simply being overly confident that you were going to win. But I didn't! Lloyd thought to himself.

Over the past month, Lloyd carefully analyzed the opponent he was going up against. He predicted all the possibilities in the duel. He covered everything — from A to Z — to ensure that he would win. Now he was reaping the fruits of his labor.

Clang! Thwack! The shovel danced in his hands as he stood his ground at the edge of striking distance. He barely had to move to defend against the incoming blows from Sir Neumann's sword. Moving his left foot forward, Lloyd extended the shovel head. With a simple jerk of his wrist, he slapped Sir Neumann in the face with the back of the shovel.

Lloyd's heart pounded like it had never pounded before. Could this be from the mana circle forming around his heart?

Ziiing!

The first weapon Lloyd was equipped with for the duel was the mana circle, which he formed using the Asrahan Core Technique. The mana circle furiously rotated around his heart, fueled by his opponent's mana. The orbiting mana around his heart caused it to pump more violently, rushing fresh blood to all of his organs in an explosive manner. The blood combined with the mana that emanated from the circle.

So, this is the power of the single circle. It was truly amazing. Lloyd hadn't expected it to be this powerful. He imagined Sir Neumann would only be slightly weakened after absorbing his mana. But it did more than that. The power in his body far exceeded his expectations. It allowed Lloyd to use Sir Neumann's power without any difficulty.

Sword experts are amazing.

Lloyd felt like he had become superhuman. He realized how powerful knights like Sir Neumann are.

Clang! Clatter!

The second weapon Lloyd prepared was the steel shovel. His shovel looked like a shield attached to a javelin. People may laugh at the weapon, but shovels are amazing tools.

Anybody who used a shovel in the military knew how useful the tool was. It was more than useful.

If you found roots while digging, you just simply had to hold the shovel straight and scoop them up. One swing was enough to pluck small bushes and roots. It was like an ax in that sense.

There's more. Lloyd was aware that shovels were historically useful weapons in war. They were used in the gruesome trench warfare on the Western Front of World War I. Shovels were even widely used in the Battle of Stalingrad in World War II. They came in handy during hand-to-hand combat. One powerful swing was enough to slice a helmet in half and crack your opponent's skull.

Apart from these examples, shovels have a variety of other uses.

The shovel head can be used as a shield because of its width. You can lock the opponent's weapon with the base and pull it hard. The sharp point of the head can be used as a spear. And you know what happens if you hold it facing down and stand on the top of the shovel head? You can make it into a pogo stick!

The shovel was a truly versatile tool, and Lloyd was a master at handling one. It was his trustworthy companion as a junior enlisted soldier in the military. It was always there for him, even when he worked construction to pay for his tuition. That was how familiar he was with it.

And on top of that, he created new skills with the RP he recently amassed.

That was his third weapon.

The Tool Apprenticeship Skill: (Shovel), which he had spent a grand total of 40 RP to gain.

Ding dong!

[Tool Artisanship Skill: (Shovel) has been activated.]

The tool and I are one! Today is all about shoveling!

[Skill Level: 1]

[You use 10% less strength when using the shovel.]

[Shovel speed has increased by 5%.]

[Shovel power has increased by 5%.]

[Your chances of losing your grip on the shovel have decreased by 20%.]

The shovel was his go-to tool, and the skill he purchased with RP enabled him to use it more efficiently. This weapon was perfect for him.

And my fourth and last weapon is this.

Clang! Clatter!

Lloyd brandished his shovel again, impeccably parrying the thrusts of his opponent. The shovel never needed to move beyond Lloyd's center line. Each movement was simple, brief, and measured. It couldn't get any more efficient and practical.

Unbeknownst to everyone present at the scene, Lloyd was using a skill that went perfectly with the shovel. It was the bayonet exercises any military men and women would be familiar with.

Whoosh! Clang! Thwack! Crack!

Lloyd moved aside and stabbed toward the right. Sir Neumann retreated as he brandished his sword. Lloyd defended his lower half, and he engaged.

When Sir Neumann stepped back, Lloyd easily stepped forward. He swiveled to the left and held his shovel straight in defense. At the same time, he kicked Sir Neumann in the crotch. When he saw his opponent get flustered, he knocked him in the temple with the shovel handle.

Bam!

“Argh!” Sir Neumann staggered back.

Lloyd smiled, panting for air. It’s working. The bayonet exercises. Contrary to popular belief, these exercises weren’t useless.

They were believed to be useless because they had become so common in the military. But their origins date back to European short sword techniques from the 18th century. With that foundation, the old techniques were mixed with boxing steps. Eventually, after the two World Wars and the Korean War, the exercises were reborn with much more finesse.

So, in short, it actually was a practical combat exercise. And you see, it goes perfectly with the shovel!

Lloyd had seen whole battalions exercise with shovels. He was right there with them. He combined the basics of sword fighting he’d learned from Javier with it. The result was devastating.

The mana circle of the Asrahan Core Technique.

The ever-versatile steel shovel.

The construction site shoveling experience.

The practical bayonet exercises, mixed with Javier’s sword teaching.

These four powerful weapons Lloyd had prepared for the duel created a dynamic synergy. He wielded them in combination to unilaterally dominate and crush Sir Neumann, who had walked into the duel unprepared.

“Arggh!!”

Thwack! Sir Neumann staggered when the handle hit him in the temple. But he wasn't spared a second to fall down. Lloyd leaped forward and…

Thwack! He smacked Sir Neumann's side with the flat surface of the shovel. Then he struck down at his feet with the pointed tip. Smack!

"Ack…!!!" Sir Neumann was beginning to lose it. He fought back, only to lose his mana again. The unpredictable attacks were unrelenting. Lloyd's maneuvers with the shovel felt too easy in his eyes. Each of his movements was clear-cut and precise, never giving time for a counterattack.

This is not happening! Anger surged in his heart. He blew a fuse. He was getting beaten by a rookie. And what's worse, he was getting crushed by someone who was using a shovel.

Most of the people in the fiefdom were gathered around to watch the fight.

I'm going to kill him. I'm going to kill him!!! Sir Neumann's eyes gleamed with dark bloodlust. He didn't give a damn whether this was a duel. This rookie who humiliated him in front of everyone had to be punished. He needed to end this son of a bitch by all means necessary.

Accidents happen during duels all the time! A simple thrust of the sword might pierce his heart. A random brandishing of the sword might slice his throat. It happened all the time. And even if such a thing were to happen in this duel, Sir Neumann was confident that he would be exonerated.

This fiefdom is going to go under soon anyway. I'm just going to leave this rathole earlier than scheduled! A new master, and I'll be living in riches! Who cares about a little dueling accident? What could I do? It's a duel, for pity's sake! They can't punish me!

His mind was set. After the duel, he'd disappear. He would leave and go find a new master. With the plan all set, Sir Neumann tightened his hand on the sword grip. Then, he placed his other hand on the scabbard. He pulled the sword out of its sheath.

Swish! The sharp blade of the long sword stood revealed. Without a second's hesitation, he charged toward Lloyd. The point of the sword aimed straight at his heart.

"Ahhh!!"

This attack was more menacing than the others, and it was intended to kill. The audience shrieked in surprise. Baron Frontera sprang to his feet.

But Lloyd stood calm. Ha! So what if you pull your sword out? He did feel the murderous vibe Sir Neumann gave off. But no matter, he thought to himself. His attack was laughably slow. And the many blows prior to this moment had sapped him of much energy. He may be carrying an extraordinary sword, but Lloyd was way too strong and agile to let this pathetic attack get him.

Lloyd had already anticipated that Sir Neumann would turn vicious. I've been waiting for you to do this.

Clatter! The steel shovel casually parried the attack. And the weapons were in a bind, just like Sir Neuman tried to do previously. Clang! Clang! The two weapons hit and pressed against each other. Lloyd suddenly tugged at and took the sword. He wrenched it away.

"Eh…?"

Swish! The long sword was hurled into the air. It dug into the ground ten steps away from them. Silence fell over the training center. Hundreds of people gazed at the sight in shock. Sir Neumann had lost his sword, and Lloyd was pointing the shovel at his face. It was clear as day who won, though the outcome was unbelievable.

Lloyd, however, wasn't done here.

"You think the battle is over just because you're beaten? Hmmm?"

Everyone's eyes slowly traced the shovel as it was lifted high in the air, and then descended at lightning speed to strike the face of Sir Neumann.

Thwack!

Was Lloyd attacking him again just to blow off some steam?

No, he wasn’t.

I’m just getting started now.

Lloyd was bent on removing the spoiled apple from the barrel. He was going to sever this problem at its roots.

First, I need this traitor to confess.

Lloyd’s eyes flashed with anger as he stared at Sir Neumann.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 16: Setting an Example (1)

Sir Neumann. The senior knight of the Frontera barony. He hated this provincial fiefdom.

He wanted to succeed. He wanted to live in riches. To him, this was a vile cesspool.

The Frontera barony sat in a remote part of the kingdom. The idyllic scenery did not make up for it being on the outskirts of nowhere. Sir Neumann believed that enjoying the peace and tranquility of the countryside was suitable for retired old hags. This was not the place he belonged. He deserved more than being stuck here to rot.

I wanted to get out of here!

He wanted to go somewhere far from these lands. A bigger world was waiting for him, where he'd make his way to the top. He desired a life of luxury. To do that, he had to renounce his allegiance to Baron Frontera. But that was impossible.

He knew very well what happened to knights who swore off their allegiance to their master. They were ostracized wherever they went. No lord wished to take in that sort of knight. The stigma of being a dishonorable knight who betrayed their master would follow them for the rest of their lives.

So, he devised a plan. If he couldn't leave his lord and his dominion, he could bring about their ruin. Then his reputation would not be tarnished. He could leave this sickeningly tacky place without anyone pointing fingers at him.

He put his plan into action and made a deal with an outsider. He sold information about the baron and his estate. This led to the baron falling prey to an investment scam. When the financial burden on the baron became too much to bear, he reached out to loan sharks.

Sir Neumann was ecstatic. Soon the baron would go bankrupt. His freedom was near. Everything was perfect. I just had to wait a little longer. So, why? Why am I getting thrashed by this garish twerp?

Whip!

It was the sound of the shovel flying in his direction. The head of the shovel seemed to grow larger as he stared at it. Then rang a loud and crisp clanging noise, as his head was jerked violently off to one side. His skull rattled from the searing pain.

Thwack!

“Argh!!!” Sir Neumann’s legs lost all strength under him. Yet, he somehow barely managed to remain standing. Instead of fighting back, he pleaded in the most pitiful voice he could produce.

“S-stop! I do not hold my sword!” It was true. The sword had already left Sir Neumann long ago. He was unarmed. The victor of the duel was evident to all. It should have ended already by that point. That was the only proper thing to do. By the moral code Sir Neumann once followed, this was the proper procedure. It was just common sense. But Sir Neumann was right, he really had landed himself in a pool of shit.

Even though he was rendered weaponless, Lloyd didn’t stop attacking him. Lloyd simply lifted him back up and beat the hell out of him. Sir Neumann cried out in surrender several times, but Lloyd repeatedly turned a deaf ear and kept on beating him. Sir Neumann stumbled as he ran away, but Lloyd was hot on his heels, shovel in hand to hit him again and again.

“S-s-stop! Please, do not humiliate me any more!” yelled Sir Neumann, unable to hold it back any longer.

But Lloyd didn’t answer. Instead, he simply swung his shovel again.

Thwack!

“Argh!!” Neumann’s skull shook. Someone… Please stop him… The world around him was beginning to grow dark. He was afraid that he might actually die if it went on. And so, he realized that this wasn’t the time to guard his dignity. Eyes brimming with desperation, Sir Neumann looked at Baron Frontera. My lord! Please help me!

Sir Neumann knew that if there was anyone who could put a stop to the merciless thrashing from this son of a bitch, it was his father the baron. Sir Neumann turned frantically toward his master and collapsed. He lifted his head and stretched out one hand… Please!

At that moment, he forgot what he had done to the baron. He was a traitor. But when his life was at stake, he didn’t care about this betrayal. Fortune was on his side then, as the baron rose from his seat. “Lloyd, do stop now. It appears that the duel is over,” Baron Frontera said, his voice ringing loudly in the training center. His voice was low but carried the full weight of his authority as lord of these lands.

All thought then that Lloyd Frontera would stop his thrashing. The farmers, woodcutters, maids, and soldiers all thought the same. It was obvious. The order came from his father, the baron. Lloyd may often have his way, but this was an event of the state. The lord issued an order. No one imagined that Lloyd could ignore his father and continue this ferocious act of brutality.

But they were totally wrong.

Thwack!

The head of the shovel traced a clear arc through the afternoon sky, in a swing like that of a pro golfer at the first tee. It connected with the point of Sir Neuman’s chin with a clear and ringing crash.

“Ack…!”

“Ack, my foot,” Lloyd scoffed. “It’s not over yet. You deserve some more.”

Cough, cough! “Ack!” Sir Neumann coughed and sighed.

“Why? Why does it hurt? You think this is unfair? You think I’ve gone nuts? Is that it?” Lloyd asked.

“S-s-stop!”

“Stop?”

“Y-yes…”

“Who do you think you are to tell me what to do?”

Smack!

Lloyd struck Sir Neumann’s back with the shovel handle. Sir Neumann collapsed, crying in pain again. But Llyod’s expression was calm and composed. You think this is unfair? There’s nothing you can do about it. I’m making an example out of you. If you didn’t want to end up this way, you shouldn’t have stabbed the baron in the back. There wasn’t a single mistruth in his thoughts. It was a fact that the knight was a traitor. Going soft and forgiving him wouldn’t teach a lesson to him and everyone else. Would anyone believe he had repented and became a new person?

Never. Lloyd shook his head. Such stories existed only in fairytales. Lloyd knew too well how ugly the real world was. He had lived at the bottom of the social pyramid for way too long and he knew how people were.

I remember when I lived in a dorm. A man got caught after secretly stealing my food from the communal refrigerator. I should have lashed out at him. But instead, I got soft. But being nice wasn’t the right answer. At that time, he was so flustered that he missed the opportunity to say something. He simply laughed it off, nicely telling him to never do it again.

But what happened? The guy kept stealing. He even became more brazen after a while and reprimanded Lloyd for being so selfish. The world is all about sharing, the guy said. Lloyd just chuckled in disbelief. That dumbfounded feeling still chafed, even now.

How can I go soft on this traitor when the world is like that? Not a chance. People were nothing but shameless and selfish creatures who would happily sacrifice their morality over a small meal. Considering that, what would happen if he forgave this betrayer? What would happen if he extended mercy to this disgusting little traitor? He'd take advantage of it.

Lloyd was absolutely certain that would give birth to a gaggle of disgusting chicken hawks like Neumann who would join forces and try to ruin the barony.

"So, I'm going to make an example out of you," Lloyd announced solemnly. "That means I'm going to beat you up until you can't even blink your eyes. It's not over yet. So, stop talking gibberish and get up."

Lloyd had been waiting for this moment. He reached out his hand and grabbed Sir Neumann by the collar. With his other hand, Lloyd picked up his shovel.

"Did you not hear me when I ordered you to stop?!" The baron's scream echoed in the center.

Lloyd flinched and turned to the baron. He answered nonchalantly, "I heard it, sir." Thwack! He hit the middle of Sir Neumann's head as he answered.

The baron knitted his eyebrows. "What!?"

"I heard your order, but I can't follow it." Thwack! Lloyd smacked Sir Neumann once more.

The baron's face darkened. "Do you have any idea what you are doing right now?" the baron asked, his voice now high-pitched.

"Of course."

Wham!

Each time the shovel hit Sir Neumann; his body convulsed.

The baron's eyes gleamed with rage. "You are dishonoring your opponent," the baron patiently stated, "and what is more, you are mistreating a senior knight who has been serving our family for five generations."

"Yes," Lloyd answered. "And he's also a traitor who betrayed you and this estate after he received so much of your trust."

"What?" The baron flinched.

Lloyd responded coolly, "I knew you'd question me in disbelief. So, I came here prepared with proof. Please look under your tablecloth."

"What…"

"I've placed something for you under there," Lloyd directed.

The baron was dumbfounded. He wondered what his son meant. He couldn't believe that Sir Neumann would betray him. Though he was still too dazed to respond, he lifted the tablecloth as instructed. And his eyes widened in surprise. "This is…"

There was an envelope. He opened it. Several smudged papers were inside.

"What is this?" Baron Frontera asked.

"I will tell you once you are done reading it," Lloyd replied.

Baron Frontera had a bad feeling about this. His son's attitude was too confident for him to be messing around. He looked at the letters. He calmly started to read through them. Midway through, his fingers trembled, and he finished the rest in one quick skim.

"This is…"

Crumple! The baron clutched the letters. He glared fiercely at Sir Neumann in utter disbelief. His reaction wasn't surprising, given that the letters Lloyd delivered to the baron were the ones Sir Neumann had exchanged with the conman he had sold the information to about the workings of the estate.

Suddenly a name popped into his head. Tordes. He was a young merchant who had approached the baron. A passionate, discreet man with plenty of initiative. He came to the baron's estate one day and guaranteed on his honor that he came bearing good news. He said he knew of a great land investment, but it was worth nothing right now. He assured the baron that he should give it a few years; the value would increase manyfold.

Tordes promised that the baron would increase his assets in a few years if he purchased the land in advance. The baron trusted him, but he knew that every investment opportunity came with risks. Even if the investment went bad or rendered a smaller profit than he expected, he could just sell the land that he'd bought. He was at ease about the whole thing.

Since there was no reason to hesitate, he purchased the land using the estate's money as well as some that were loaned. And now… he had become penniless. It turned out that the lands I'd purchased existed only on paper. Of course he lost all of his investment.

Tordes, who had deceived him, went into hiding after taking the money. The baron found himself under crippling debt overnight. And… the guy who leaked my preferences, interests, finances, and other personal information was… Sir Neumann?

He remembered the many gifts he received from Tordes. From the mahogany furniture to a snow eagle collared shirt. Tordes showered him with gifts that he loved so much. Their topics of conversation were the same. Each time he conversed with Tordes, the subjects that arose were his favorite ones. He wondered how they were so perfectly compatible.

I thought he and I just clicked. And that's why I trusted him. The result of his trust was painful betrayal and bankruptcy. And Sir Neumann was responsible.

Thwack!

The baron felt his blood curdle. The pounding of his heart rang aloud in his ears. The world was getting hazy, and he suddenly became dizzy.

Lloyd smiled bitterly as he looked at the baron. He must be shocked. His closest associate turned out to be a traitor who was leading him to destruction. The shock and betrayal must be stinging. Even from a distance, Lloyd saw that the baron's face was as pale as a sheet. It wouldn't be strange for him to collapse. Lloyd wondered for a second if he had made the right choice by showing the letters to him.

But what else could I do? I needed hard proof for them to believe me. Ppodong the enchanted hamster was utilized for this purpose. He sent Ppodong into Sir Neumann's bedroom to find the letters. He knew the location of the letters from The Knight of Blood and Iron, which says that the correspondence between Sir Neumann and Tordes was stored in the bedside table drawer.

And it turned out to be true. So Ppodong infiltrated Sir Neumann's bedroom like a good little hamster. He was a small but strong animal, so it was a breeze for him to open the drawer. And that's how Lloyd was able to acquire the letters that incriminated the knight.

The letters contain the promise that Tordes would hire Sir Neumann in the future. It even has a charmed signature that proves the letter is real. That's why Sir Neumann couldn't throw it away. Thanks to that, I was able to get him.

Suddenly, Lloyd felt bitter about everything. He wished that the same thing would've happened in South Korea. Lloyd regretted that he hadn't left the evidence of the swindlers that deceived his father. That would have saved his family from falling on misfortune. His parents wouldn't have died like that at least.

Whew… Come on. Now's not the time to be sentimental. Lloyd shook his head. Now wasn't the time for it. He needed to make sure that this situation went to his advantage. Thinking that, Lloyd lifted his head. He spoke to the baron, whose face was still pale as a sheet. "Are you okay? If you are dizzy, please take a seat first and take a deep breath," Lloyd suggested.

"All… right…" The baron struggled to speak.

Witnessing the baron's reaction, Lloyd's initial impression that he didn't have the guts to be firm and stern was confirmed. He could only rule over the land with a good heart. Such a person could receive praise from people for being a saint when everything was well and peaceful. But it was a different story when the world was going through tough times. People took advantage of such good-hearted people. He would end up becoming a pushover and fall behind.

It's clear what the baron is like. Just look at him. Look how he just stands there in shock, not knowing what to do after finding out that his most trusted knight is a traitor.

Shock and chaos clouded the baron's expression. Until now, Sir Neumann was a trustworthy knight to him. The baron didn't know how he should take this betrayal, or how he should take care of it. That was why he was vacillating over his course of action and not being adamantly decisive right away.

*I'll do it for you, then. S*omeone had to do the job anyway. If the baron did nothing right now, his whole fiefdom would descend into chaos.

Lloyd began to speak, "I, Lloyd Frontera, the son of Arcos Frontera, have something to say as the rightful heir to this estate."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 17: Setting an Example (2)

“I, Lloyd Frontera, the son of Arcos Frontera, have something to say as the rightful heir to this estate.”

Lloyd’s voice rang loudly in the hall. Everyone was staring hard at him. A farmer gulped nervously. A woodcutter found himself clenching his fist. A winemaker chewed on his lips. Nobody saw this coming. The defeat of the senior knight.

His opponent wasn’t even a proper knight. He was the baron’s son — a notoriously lazy drunken rogue — and yet he made mincemeat of the knight. That alone was shocking enough. But that wasn’t quite all of it. Lloyd kept assaulting the senior knight even after the duel ended.

The baron grew impatient at last and lashed out at his son to stop the cruelty.

Lloyd boldly responded to his father, announcing to everyone that this knight had betrayed the baron. Everyone was doubtful at first. But they saw how the baron’s face turned pale after he read the letters presented to him as evidence of the knight’s deceit. He slumped down on his chair as if his knees had buckled. Then he glared at Sir Neumann. His eyes welled in disappointment. That gave everyone a hint of the severity of what had happened.

Really? Is what the young master said true? They thought to themselves as they read the baron’s expression. Everyone waited in silence, wondering what would happen to Sir Neumann. All eyes were on Lloyd. They waited for him to speak.

Lloyd felt their stares. Here comes the important part. Before getting here, he had run several scenarios through his head. He organized all the details of the novel as much as his memory allowed. Afterward, he considered the status quo of the fiefdom and the relationships and emotions of the people. He predicted how the story could be changed by his actions. In short, he reached this point after carefully planning every detail. And surely, among the many deliberations he had made, one of them included the baron's reaction. It's going to backfire if I propose something too drastic.

The baron was a good man with a soft heart. Even after tasting the bitter medicine of betrayal, he couldn't cut Sir Neumann out and punish him as he deserved. So, Lloyd thought that suggesting a harsh punishment for the traitor would only work in the scoundrel's favor.

In time he will take the bait. He understood his limits in this situation. He could only offer counsel and support, and that was it. The ball was in the baron's court. So, he needed to prime the baron to make sure that he would agree to whatever was suggested.

Lloyd cleared his throat. "I'm sure you are in a difficult spot. I am too. Sir Neumann holds a long history with our family, and he has done great things that he should be duly credited for."

"Hmm… Continue talking." The baron tilted his head in confusion, perhaps surprised to see his son cover for Sir Neumann instead of lashing out at him.

Lloyd continued to speak. "Surely, the actions revealed by today's duel are nothing short of shocking. He has turned his back on you and done great harm to the fiefdom."

"Are you suggesting that he has done good things we should be appreciative of and bad things that require our attention?" the baron asked.

"Yes," Lloyd answered. Thankfully, the conversation was going well. The baron was not a fool. He was simply a good man.

"So, do you mean that I must deal with him, considering everything he has done for us in the past?"

"Yes, that's right," replied Lloyd.

"Hmm… I am sensing that you have a punishment in mind."

“I sure do.” Lloyd let out a chuckle. And without a second of hesitation, he announced the punishment to the baron. “I am thinking of dropping a rat on his head,” Lloyd said calmly.

“A rat…?” the baron asked in confusion.

“Yes,” Lloyd answered and continued to explain. “I’m going to drop a rat on Sir Neumann’s head, and if he’s free from harm, let us spare him and give him a chance to atone for his mistakes.

“A chance to atone… What do you mean?” the baron inquired.

“I believe it would be fitting to demote him to an ordinary soldier.”

“Are you suggesting that he prove his repentance and loyalty by serving as an ordinary soldier?”

“Yes,” Lloyd answered.

The baron remained silent. The baroness found herself clutching her hands. Some of the audience started to turn to the side and chat among themselves. The sound of their indistinct murmurs and chattering were audible.

“Hey, what is he talking about?” a farmer asked a woodcutter beside him.

“I think he’s going to drop a rat,” the woodcutter replied.

“Right? You heard that too, right?”

“Yeah. Master Lloyd will drop a mouse on Sir Neumann’s head.”

“Could that be the punishment? That’s it?” the farmer asked.

“Uhm… I don’t know why, but maybe?” the woodcutter answered. The farmer shrugged his shoulders, and the woodcutter shook his head. They were baffled by the situation.

This time, one of the women spoke. “Who in the world would get hurt having a rat dropped on their head?”

“Uhm, I would,” another woman confessed.

“How?”

“I’m afraid of rats. It’s possible he would jump and scream and trip over something on the ground, getting hurt in the process,” she explained.

“But… it’s Sir Neumann we’re talking about.”

“So, he won’t be surprised,” she finally conceded.

“Of course,” the woman concluded.

The peasants chattered to themselves. They came up with several theories and racked their brains to imagine what could happen. But in the end, they concluded that dropping a rat on Sir Neumann’s head wouldn’t hurt him.

Therefore, everyone interpreted Lloyd’s suggestion the following way. “Master Lloyd is suggesting forgiving Sir Neumann. Don’t you think so, Javier?” Sir Bayern asked.

Javier, who was standing beside him, replied, “I think so too. It appears that the young master judges that such punishment is the most appropriate one.”

“Master Lloyd thinks so?”

“Yes, that’s right,” replied Javier. He paused for a second before continuing. “Sir Neumann has already been humiliated enough in front of everyone. And even if he is forgiven, that wouldn’t be the end of his disgrace.”

“You’re right,” Sir Bayern agreed, “He’ll be stripped of his knightly status and serve as an ordinary soldier.”

“Indeed. Nothing would be more disgraceful than that,” Javier said. “However…”

“What is it?” Sir Bayern asked.

“Something feels wrong here.”

“What do you mean?”

“What Master Lloyd suggested. Personally, I believe it’s a bit odd.”

Sir Bayern looked at Javier in confusion.

Javier searched for the best way to explain this. “It’s much too tame,” Javier finally said. “It’s exceedingly merciful of Master Lloyd — so much so, that it doesn’t sound like him. In my opinion, that kid, no… the young master isn’t the type of person to be merciful and mild.”

Javier was telling the truth. He had been protecting Lloyd Frontera, and he observed what a man he was and how he held grudges against people. He’s cunning, extraordinarily so. Not to mention, he’s also meticulous, tenacious, and manipulative. Javier didn’t consider Lloyd a bad person. But he didn’t consider him a good person either.

The man has a petty heart. He never did anything that would result in a loss for him. He was nothing but an unscrupulous manipulator. That was Javier’s recent assessment of Lloyd’s character. How else could I judge him?

The man had drastically changed out of the blue. His daily drunken tantrums had stopped. But they were replaced by extreme pettiness. He meticulously tracked the construction payments from the villagers, and if he discovered that someone paid less, he would rush out — even in the middle of dinner — to get it. What’s more, he’s keeping a tight rein on me with that peculiar lullaby service of his.

Every night Javier was serenaded with incomprehensible words that put him soundly to sleep. At first, he was happy as a clam. It felt like he owned the world because he could sleep well. But he soon realized that he was wrong. I realized the service came at a high cost.

That man threatened him several times a day. “Teach me how to use the sword, or else no more lullaby service. You do know that you and I share the copyright for the Asrahan Core Technique, right? Say yes if you want to keep sleeping well at night. I'm a bit thirsty. You know what to do. Bring me a glass of water, and I'll extend the service by a day."

Words fell short of describing Lloyd's pettiness. Javier was in the palm of his hand. There was no way to escape. No, he didn't even have the courage to cut the snare by himself, because the lullabies that man provided were much too sweet.

Whew… I feel so pathetic every time I think about it. Anyway, there is simply no way that such a devious person would easily forgive Sir Neumann for betraying the fiefdom and challenging his authority. No way. That was possible when he was a drunk. But now? Not in a million years would he forgive the knight like that.

Javier was certain that Lloyd had something up his sleeve. The young master was hiding a vicious scheme. Javier narrowed his eyes and glared at Lloyd. He was the only person in the hall to doubt him. The others were utterly surprised by the unexpected magnanimity and benevolence Lloyd was showing to his enemy. Among them, Baron Frontera was the most astounded.

Yes. You've come up with a rather mild judgment, Lloyd. The baron nodded in approval. He didn't see this coming. He was pleased. I thought my son would die a hooligan without any fear of the heavens. But that wasn't the case. Looking back, he realized that he was wrong. His son was already a grown, mature man.

This is absolutely amazing. Now I get it. My dear son, you had it all figured out before the fight with Sir Neumann. You knew about his betrayal. That's why you picked a fight with Sir Neumann and challenged him to a duel. Everything Lloyd did was by design, and he wanted to punish Sir Neumann publicly and severely for a reason.

Yes. Your plan was to punish him and make it clear to everyone what fate awaited traitors. And by manifesting your generosity at a crucial moment such as now and shattering everyone's expectations, you will wisely win the hearts of the people. The baron's heart swelled with pride as he thought this.

Sir Neumann may have betrayed the fiefdom, but there was no denying that he was a valuable asset. A knight of such caliber is hard to come by. The baron knew that his lands sat in a remote area of the kingdom. Knights usually avoided coming down here. That was even more true for knights who were experts with a sword.

My son is setting the order right in the fiefdom by teaching a lesson to Sir Neumann. At the same time, he's also exhibiting generosity by giving the traitor a chance to repent and correct his faults. As such, the fiefdom is still able to keep the traitor's talent for its own use. Brilliant. Sir Neumann must have learned something from this, Baron Frontera told himself.

The baron was certain that the senior knight would be moved by the decision to forgive him. He would repent for his wrongdoings with genuine remorse, thus prompting him to be more loyal. The baron was overwhelmed. I cannot believe my son came up with this plan. How thorough and wise. The baron almost choked up in pride.

Suppressing the joy that surged in his heart, he nodded. "Okay, Lloyd. You may do as you please. Sir Neumann. What do you say to the offer Lloyd has suggested?"

"It's good…!" Sir Neumann, who was sprawled on the ground, immediately nodded several times. Though almost all his bodily functions were damaged because of the merciless beatings and thrashings, Sir Neumann's hearing was intact. And so, he was able to hear everything Lloyd proposed to the baron. Inside, Sir Neumann was throwing a party in joy.

He's just going to drop one rat over my head, and forgive me if I am not hurt? Why would I say no!? He would be forgiven, and the situation would be overlooked. Sir Neumann planned what he should do next. Repentance, my ass! I won't let myself be demoted to a simple soldier. Not a chance. Every fiber of his being rejected the idea.

I'm going to leave this sickening backwater right away. And then I shall exact my revenge.

Crack! He gritted his teeth, but not too loud for others to notice. He put on the most remorseful and contrite expression he could come up with. With an intentionally shaky voice, he said, “I shall prove it to you right now. I ask your baron to grant me the chance to accept the young master’s wise proposal.”

“Indeed.” The baron nodded. “Lloyd, do you have the rat you will drop on his head?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied. “I came here with it.”

“Good. Do proceed,” the baron announced.

“Yes.”

Finally, the baron approved. The corners of Sir Neumann’s lip rose.

Lloyd had a vicious smile on his face.

“Hey, Sir Neumann. In a good mood? You’re smiling.” Lloyd pointed out.

“Pardon?” Sir Neumann asked.

“Well, fine. Congratulations. You think that you got the easy way out, right?”

“I am not… sure what you mean,” Sir Neumann said as he tilted his head. Now something felt wrong. Sir Neumann wondered why the young master was flashing such a happy smile. It also looked menacing.

“Oh, let me explain it to you.” Lloyd’s smile became even more vicious.

Just then, Sir Neumann noticed a small hamster in Lloyd’s hand. Lloyd was holding a red sunflower seed with his other hand.

No one except Sir Neumann saw this, as the others were all far away.

“There’s no easy way to beg for forgiveness.”

Sir Neuman replied bewilderingly… “Excuse me…?”

Crunch! The hamster chomped down on the red sunflower seed. A second later, Lloyd threw the animal high in the air and stepped well back.

And… Leap!

“Ppodong! Jump on him!!”

“Ppodong!”

A ginormous thirty-foot-tall hamster landed a belly flop right on top of Sir Neumann.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 18: All Roads Lead to Rome (1)

“Ppodong!”

With that, Ppodong landed on his plump belly. Something that was between his belly and the ground cracked and crunched terribly.

Crunch! The walnut shell cracked. Ppodong smiled brightly as he removed the nuts from the crushed shell. “Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong. Ppodong.”

“Taste good?” Lloyd asked.

“Ppodong!” Then the hamster stuck the walnuts into his mouth at lightning speed.

Lloyd chuckled as he saw him do so. “Want another one?”

“Ppodong!”

“Want me to break the shells for you?”

“Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong!”

“Okay, hold on for a second.”

Lloyd grabbed the walnut with his right hand. Then he raised his left hand and used the Asrahan Core Technique. Whew… His heart was beating in time with his breathing. The beating pumped a flow of energy into his left hand. Lloyd absorbed the energy, which was natural mana floating in the air.

Oh, it works. Of course, the power wasn’t much. He could merely draw from a tiny portion of the mana floating in the air. He was just getting the hang of the Asrahan Core Technique, and could only create a single circle. But that was enough for him.

Swish! Lloyd transferred the power of the mana absorbed by his left hand to the outer part of his heart and rotated it. The mana was amplified as it rotated. Once it was done, Lloyd transferred the mana to his other hand. He clenched his right fist to crush the walnut.

“Argh… Ackk!!” Crack! The hard walnut shell was crushed in his hand. Whoa. It worked. I cracked the walnut with my bare hand. This feat was unimaginable in the past. Basking in his success, Lloyd gave the walnut to Ppodong. “Here, take them.”

“Ppodong!”

“Are you happy?”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Yes, me too.” Llyod felt that he was above the average man in physical ability now. He felt relieved by the realization. This world is one of swords and knives. Lloyd understood that he wasn’t in South Korea anymore. Dangers lingered everywhere. Just outside the fiefdom, bandits as big as pro wrestlers were happy to stab anyone in sight.

And so, he knew what his life would be like if he didn’t at least have basic self-defense skills. I could die anytime. No, thank you. Lloyd was relieved that he’d learned the Asrahan Core Technique from Javier.

Just then. Knock knock. There was someone at his bedroom door.

“Master Lloyd. Are you inside?” The voice was distinctively cynical in tone.

Javier. Lloyd chuckled. He rose from the bed and opened the door. Just as he expected, Javier was standing there. “Speak of the devil. Come on in.”

“Were you talking about me?” Javier asked.

“Don’t worry about it. So, did you do what I asked?”

“I’m coming from making the report to the lord.”

“Yeah?”

“Yes.”

“What did the baron say?”

“Are you asking if he mentioned anything special?”

“Yeah.”

“He did.”

“What did he say?” asked Lloyd.

“He wished Sir Neumann good luck.”

“Ha, he’s going to need it, especially right now,” stated Lloyd nonchalantly. Sir Neumann. Lloyd smirked as he thought about him. The events that had taken place in the past few days replayed in his head. The day of the duel when he exposed Sir Neumann to everybody. He has luck on his side or maybe not this time. Sir Neumann didn’t die. He was a tough, tenacious man who’d survived the crushing weight of the gigantic hamster Ppodong.

But the price of his survival was monumental. Dozens of broken bones throughout his entire body. The sight of him was a gory one. Everyone gasped as they found Sir Neumann looking much like a squid that had been sitting in a seafood market for a week. A doctor just shook his head in pity when confronted with Sir Neumann. “The man is better off dead. Even if he receives the favor of the heavens and fully recovers, he won’t ever have a normal life. He won’t be able to walk or stand up. He will spend his entire life in bed, having someone feed him porridge that he can barely swallow.”

The doctor’s diagnosis was hopeless for Sir Neumann. He had barely survived with the treatment he received in the past few days. And today, he was to be kicked out of the baron’s lands for good.

“Oh, well, he won’t die right away given that his family got banished along with him,” Lloyd said.

“I think so, too.”

Others were banished as well. Sir Ulrich and Conte, who mentored under Sir Neumann, were exiled. On top of that, they both had tendons slashed in a hand and leg. They won't ever be able to pick up a sword again. I kind of feel bad for them. However, order has been established in the land. I have succeeded.

The two were going to betray the fiefdom… according to the novel anyway. They would only continue to harm the barony. It was obvious they would never change no matter how many chances they received. So, Lloyd wanted to get rid of them as soon as possible. Today, he got what he wanted.

Lloyd felt good.

"So, you've become the vice commander of the knights now, Sir Asrahan? How are you feeling?" Lloyd asked with a smile.

"I do not feel anything in particular," Javier replied.

"Really?"

"Yes."

"How so?"

"Because I'm just one of two knights left, including Sir Bayern," Javier stated coolly.

"Hmm… You must be lonely then, I suppose? Tsk. I see. You are bored and lonely because you don't have any friends. That's what's happening," Lloyd concluded.

"That's obviously…"

"What's happening," Lloyd interrupted, "I know. Oh, well. What can you do? That's life."

"Master Lloyd."

“What?! Are you going to just glare at me? You have something to tell me?” Lloyd asked.

Unsurprisingly, Javier nodded. “Yes. I have a question to ask.”

“What is it?”

“It’s about the hamster.” Javier pointed at Ppodong, who was eating the pieces of walnut on top of the desk. Javier’s expression turned graver, and his focus sharpened.

Lloyd became slightly nervous at the sight. He wondered what Javier wanted to ask with such a dark expression on his face. What is it? Is he suspicious of my summoning magic? Lloyd suspected that it might be. It was fully plausible. Right, although I purposefully carried the basic summoning book with me for a whole month, that wouldn’t be enough to clear me of all suspicion. The thing was, summoning magic was still magic. So, unless he was born a genius, it made no sense that he could summon something with just a month of self-instruction.

Still, what else can I do? He’s not going to believe me, even if I tell him honestly about the RP system and the random summoning game. So, I might as well just insist on it. Lloyd decided that he should tell him that he had studied magic all by himself. Lloyd waited for Javier to ask.

Javier, who was waffling along with a serious expression, finally spoke. “What should I call him?”

“What…?” Lloyd asked in a daze.

“I’m curious what his name is.”

“Wait, are you asking for his name?”

“Yes.”

“That’s all you wanted to know?”

“Yes. It is your summon.”

“Oh, you mean you wanted to call him by his name because you’ll be seeing him a lot?” Lloyd asked again.

“Yes.”

“Then why did you act all serious about it?”

“Excuse me?” Javier looked innocently at Lloyd.

“Whew… Never mind. His name is Ppodong. That’s his name.”

“Ppodong?”

“Uh-huh.”

“Hmm… That is a bit of a shabby name with his gigantic size.”

“I named it myself.”

“Come to think of it, everyone knows a rubbish name is perfect for making your opponents put their guards down. You chose the best name for him.”

“Are you sure? You don’t have to lie when you don’t mean it. Anyway, I didn’t name it. It was his name from the beginning.”

“So, what should I call him…?”

“Anything you like.”

“I understand. Sir Ppodong?” Javier stooped down to greet Ppodong eye to eye.

Ppodong, who was chewing the walnut, lifted his head. “Ppodong?”

“My name is Javier Asrahan. I am the knight who protects Master Lloyd. Nice to meet you.”

“Ppodong!”

Javier’s long fingers interlocked with Ppodong’s short front legs to shake hands.

Lloyd yawned. “Done introducing each other?”

“Yes.”

“Shall we head out? I was actually waiting for you. I have some business to take care of,” Lloyd stated.

“Me?”

“Uh-huh. You’re my guard and way stronger than me.”

“That’s…”

“Forget it. Everyone tries to hide their true ability to some degree. Right?”

Javier flinched.

Lloyd chuckled. Javier was already an advanced swordsman. At first, Lloyd thought he simply failed to notice his true powers because that was how it was described in The Knight of Blood and Iron. But after spending many days with this knight, Lloyd noticed something different from the novel.

The more time Lloyd spent with Javier — bickering with him and learning the ways of the sword — the more it became evident to Lloyd. Javier knew his skill level very well. He was simply hiding it. Lloyd hadn’t figured out the reason yet, but he could guess.

Everyone will go mental if they find out that the youngest knight is already close to becoming a sword master.

Sir Neumann and other high-ranked knights would be green with envy, not to mention the countless offers that would come from nearby feudal lords to bring him into their employ. Such aggravating efforts would surely leave the Frontera barony in tatters.

It's his way of preventing that chaos from happening and staying loyal to the baron. Lloyd thought highly of his knight, who had both skill and character.

"Anyway, let's head out. The sun will be setting soon." Lloyd sprang to his feet.

As expected, Javier looked relieved by that.

Lloyd figured that Javier didn't wish to continue talking about this subject. It was the same for him as well. Your secret is safe with me. So don't bring up anything about my bayonet technique. Just keep any questions you might have to yourself.

If there was a genius sword fighter, it was Javier. It only made sense that he would recognize the bayonet exercise, which held a long history. I'm sure he noticed that I didn't invent the moves, since I'm just a novice. The thing with martial arts and sports is that one sees only as far as one's knowledge goes, Lloyd thought to himself. Boxing and MMA were his best examples.

Boxing matches were an absolute bore to watch when he had no knowledge of the sport. MMA fights were even worse. The competitors did nothing but wrestle each other to the ground. When he started learning boxing and hapkido in high school and college, things started to change.

Boxing no longer put him to sleep.

MMA fighting used to just look like two people rolling around on the floor. Now it was an exciting battle that pumped his adrenaline.

Because people only look for what they know.

It went without saying that for Javier, a truly unique sword-fighting genius, it would be the same. He had, of course, already figured out most of the characteristics of the bayonet exercise. Yeah, I can't avoid everything. Stay quiet, and I'll do the same for you. But don't do anything more than that. Lloyd looked at him meaningfully. It seemed like Javier understood him.

Javier quietly stood up. “Let us go. I will escort you.” Thus, he and Javier left the bedroom. They left the mansion grounds, meeting several people as they walked. And Lloyd noticed a change in their reactions. They used to turn back and scurry away as soon as they met him on the street. They hung their heads low, because they were scared to look him in the eyes.

But that wasn’t the case anymore. A woman smiled and greeted him. She was the one who trembled in front of him on the first day he possessed Lloyd’s body. She wasn’t alone. Later, another farmer walked over to him and asked him with a smile, “Young master, excuse me. When can you start putting floor heating in my house?”

“Hmm?”

Lloyd recognized him. The farmer’s eyes were glimmering right now, but when he first met him, he was pale as snow. Lloyd rubbed his chin and said, “I can’t remember very well. Where was your house?”

“It’s left at the rock that stands at the entrance of the oak tree woods,” the farmer replied.

“Oh, there. Let’s see. Hmmm. Looks like you have two more houses ahead of yours.”

“So, when can I expect you to start…?”

“At this rate, probably around two more weeks, so wait a little longer. It’s springtime anyway.”

“But the wind is still cold,” the farmer explained.

“Okay, do you want me to hug you? Maybe that will warm you up.”

“N-no, that’s not it.”

“Don’t like that, do you? Good. I hate it too. I’m getting goosebumps,” Lloyd replied.

“Anyway, I'll be in your care, young master.”

“All right, and don’t forget to pay,” Lloyd reminded him.

“Of course.”

“Okay. Now, can you let go of my hands?” Lloyd resumed walking after tearing the farmer away from him. Whew… I feel so popular these days. The villagers started to see him in a different light. Look at them. Just look at their beady little eyes. It’s like I’ve become a player who carries the whole game till victory, and my teammates are rooting for me.

Suddenly, a bitter smile escaped him. Lloyd knew why they were looking at him like that. But still, he wanted to hear it from someone else. “Hey.” He casually called to Javier beside him. “What’s the deal with them? They used to hate me so visibly before.”

“Well, that was true in the past,” Javier explained.

“Was…? In the past?”

“Yes.”

“Then what about now?”

Javier replied as though he was reading a text. “It’s the birth of a capable man.”

“A capable man?”

“You defeated the senior knight with just a month of training. It would obviously appear impressive since they don’t know about the Asrahan Core Technique. Plus, you exposed his schemes to the public and did the summoning magic that shocked everyone in the audience.”

“Hmm… It does sound kind of cool when you say it like that. In short, I’m a truly amazing person who’s well-versed in sword fighting and magic, right?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded.

“If you think in their shoes, you will easily see why they welcome your change with open arms. You became a completely different person. From a good-for-nothing drunkard, who caused trouble daily, to an unbelievably accomplished man.

Lloyd was speechless.

“Their future leader has become a talented, skillful individual; no longer a hopeless scumbag. Surely you understand why they cheer over your change,” Javier concluded.

“Hey, that’s a compliment, right?” Lloyd asked suspiciously.

“Yes, it is.”

“You know, it’s quite weighty for a compliment.”

“What do you mean by that?”

“Your words came at me with a speed of at least 105mph,” Lloyd added.

“105mph?”

“Oh, come on. It means that my heart exploded from your compliment. You killer.”

Javier simply stared at him. His expression showed confusion over the nonsense he’d just heard.

But Lloyd noticed how even his dazed countenance resembled a beautiful painting that required untold hours to finish: elegant and perfect. Must be nice to be good-looking. This bastard is a good fighter. Well-mannered and on top of everything. Handsome too. Lloyd suddenly spoke like he was talking to his mother’s friend’s son, who he had never met but was constantly compared to. “What are you looking at? Move. Let me work.”

“Work?”

“From here to there.” Lloyd pointed at the ground with his fingers. He was pointing from the estate entrance to the foot of the eastern mountain. Lloyd was using his surveying and design skills as he looked at the area. He observed the geography and gathered data points. He visualized a blueprint of the building he wished to make.

The imaginary representation of the building allowed him a glimpse of the future of this area.

“All roads lead to Rome. This is the first time you heard about it, right?” Lloyd grinned, looking back at Javier. Of course, Javier didn’t know the meaning behind that smile.

He also didn’t know that this area would be used to build a paved road on that would become key to the territory’s development and that, in the future, it would lead the barony to become the primary travel hub for the kingdom.

That was until Lloyd spoke. When he listened to his young master, Javier caught a brief glimpse of their bright future.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 19: All Roads Lead to Rome (2)

All roads lead to Rome. Anyone would have heard that saying at least once in their life. The expression was coined in Ancient Rome, where countless roads were built that stretched out to the ends of the empire.

Making roads was almost an obsession in the Roman Empire.

The Romans adhered to a strict set of construction principles. The roads had to be built in straight lines wherever possible. The roads connected all corners of their vast domain. They did not avoid drilling through mountains or building bridges over valleys. The Romans built fifty thousand miles of stone-paved roads. That was enough to circle the equator twice.

“That’s how important a road is. Do you know what’s the biggest factor that affects land value?” Lloyd asked.

“I don’t know,” Javier replied.

“Transportation. It’s transportation.”

Lloyd continued to speak while Javier remained silent. “Let’s say you have a house, and the road to the market from your house is very rough. There are mountains and streams to cross, and then you have bungee jumping to do as well. Every time you try to leave your house your body begs you to just stay inside. Would you want to live there?”

“I think it would be a great training opportunity.”

Lloyd was speechless.

“Hiking and swimming every day would certainly improve my endurance. The bungee jump… I do not know what that is, but if it pushes me to my limits, I am sure it would be a boon to my sword training,” Javier explained.

“I’m not talking about sword fanatics like you. I mean normal people.”

“Hmm… Then that would be a problem.”

“Right?” Lloyd beamed.

“Yes.”

“Now we’re talking.” The corners of Lloyd’s mouth rose in satisfaction.

“It’s not just the house. The fiefdom is the same. Care to guess what our biggest problem is?”

“In the past, you were the problem,” Javier answered coldly. “I am not so sure now.”

Lloyd cleared his throat. “The road. It’s the road.”

“The road?”

“Yes. Have you seen any properly paved roads in this estate?”

“No,” Javier answered.

“Right? That’s the problem.”

It was true. Not a single road in the Frontera barony was paved. There were only dirt paths that developed naturally on the bare grass patches of frequently traveled routes. Lloyd thought the time had come for this to change. His goal wasn’t just to create conventional roads. He aimed to utilize them for a greater goal.

“But you don’t need to know now what I plan on doing. So, can you move? I’ve got surveying to do,” Lloyd huffed. When it came to road construction, the result mattered more than the reason. Lloyd believed he should act rather than explain right now. He waved Javier away and studied the topography of the land.

Asphalt would be the best option, but it won’t happen here. Considering the technology available, I think the construction of Rome’s Via Appia is the best model we’ve got.

Lloyd recalled the Appian Way from when he was in the university. He had even done a class presentation about it.

The Appian Way was one of the earliest stone roads in Rome. Dozens more were constructed afterward. It greatly aided in the empire's conquest of the southern Italian Peninsula. The road remains strong and is still in use today.

The Appian Way boasted more than 2,300 years of history. Yet not a single inch needed any upgrading. It provides a window into civil engineering's advances in ancient Rome. Lloyd intended to build his own Appian Way through the central section of his estate.

From here to there.

Specifically, it would extend from the baron's estate to the far eastern mountain — cutting across the fiefdom in a straight line. It had the potential to become the main road once the fiefdom expanded in the future. The plan was perfect. But for him to achieve it, he needed to survey and design first.

First, I need to level up my skills. Lloyd opened his skill window.

Ding Dong.

[Loading the skill log.]

[Basic Surveying: Level 2]

[Basic Design: Level 2]

[Tool Artisanship Skill (Shovel): Level 1]

Hmm… It's just as I thought. I need to invest more in my surveying and design skills. For the past few months, he had surveyed and designed several heated flooring systems, and those skills improved by one point each time. But that wasn't enough for road construction.

I can only survey fourteen square yards at this skill level. And as for design, it's just 1,740 cubic yards of volume. That won't be enough. It's too inefficient. Lloyd furrowed his brow. His design and survey skills were not good enough. A few days ago, he tested out how long his body would hold up before giving away to exhaustion. The result was not satisfying.

Each skill had a limit of ten uses. After that, he suffered from terrible fatigue and dizziness. Of course, the skill got canceled on its own as well. Making things worse, he needed almost a full day of recovery to use the skill again. In other words, he could survey 1,447 square yards of land and 17,408 cubic yards of volume in a day.

That is a problem, considering how far the mountain is from here. I need to hurry if I want to finish construction before the spring monsoon arrives. He didn't have much time. But fortunately, he had saved up a lot of RP.

[Current RP: 659]

He had saved quite a lot.

My, my, I feel like I should bow to Sir Neumann in gratitude. The duel with Sir Neumann made him rich with RP.

His approval rating increased manyfold. Twenty points each from the baron and baroness. Two points from Javier. One from Sir Bayern. And six from the people of the fiefdom. Thanks to that, he earned a big sum of 507 RP in a single day. But Lloyd didn't squander the points, because he knew they would be useful someday.

With that thought in mind, he had been frugal with his spending up until this moment. But now was the time to use the RP. Let's see. I'll level up each skill to see what happens. Lloyd looked at one side of the skill window. There was a level-up button. He blinked at it twice as if he was clicking a mouse.

Ding Dong.

[Log of skills you can level up]

[Basic Surveying: Level 2→ 3 (Required RP: 10)]

[Basic Design: Level 2 → 3 (Required RP: 10)]

[Tool Artisanship Skill (Shovel): Level 1 → 2 (Required RP: 15)]

I'll start with the surveying and design. He chose those two skills.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Level Up!]

[Basic Surveying: Level 3]

[Area that can be measured at once: 172 yd^2]

[Required RP to level up: 15]

[Basic Design: Level 3]

[Volume of structure that can be projected at once: 2,067 yd^3]

[Required RP to level up: 15]

[Current RP: 639]

Lloyd noticed a slight increase in his skill level, but he wasn't happy yet. Might as well go all out while I'm at it. Surveying and designing were the very skills that would put food on the table. Being cheap with them would only harm him in the long run. He boldly used the rest of his RP to level up those skills.

The surveying and design skills leveled on and on.

From level three to four…

Then level five to six…

Eventually, he reached level ten.

When he used the RP that last time to level up, a message appeared.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Class Level Up!]

[Your skill class has reached <Intermediate>.]

[Skills options have been made available following your change of skill class.]

[Intermediate Surveying: Level 1]

[Area that can be measured at once: 1,900 yd^2]

[Skill Option 1: Land Appraisal—You can appraise the land you measure. (Error rate: +/- 5%)]

[Skill Option 2: Underground Scanning—You can automatically scan the measured geography as deep as 16 feet. Geographical composition, soil quality, bedrock, underground water, reserved resources, etc., can be identified.]

[Required RP to level up: 100]

[Your skill class has reached <Intermediate>.]

[Skills options have been made available following your change of skill class.]

[Intermediate Design: Level 1]

[Volume of structure that can be projected at once: 83,700 yd^3]

[Skill Option 1: Plan Print—You can accurately print out your design on a designated surface such as paper.

[Skill Option 2: Floor Plan Indication (2D)—You can see the 2D floor plan of your designed output in the actual land. (Note: Only you can see it.)]

[Required RP to level up: 100]

[Current RP: 119]

Woah. This is amazing. Lloyd's eyes widened as he processed the changes. He had invested quite a lot of RP, but that barely mattered to him.

The potential survey area and design volume significantly increased. But there is something even more amazing than that. Lloyd looked at the skill options that were now available as the level of his basic skills went over ten. These options were seriously amazing.

Appraisal? Now that I can see the current price of land, this is no different from a real estate app. And underground scanning? For real? Lloyd decided to put this to the test. He looked at the ground and activated his intermediate-level skills.

Measure.

Crackle! A hazy ray of blue light filled his eyes. At the same time, the landscape changed in front of him. He scanned the square area of 130 feet in length and width. Several data points about the lot popped up. First was the estimated price.

Woah… I had no idea our lands were so worthless. The area Lloyd was scanning was a fairly developed one. There were several shops and taverns. The place was a metropolis in its own way. But for each ten square foot lot the selling price hardly reached one piece of gold!

Tsk. I guess I should work harder to bump up the price.

That was when it really dawned on Lloyd how small and rural the Frontera barony was. But that was all going to change further down the road. The land value would naturally go up if he kept improving things.

Lloyd turned his focus on other information collected with his new surveying skill. Underground scanning revealed many things.

Hey, this is way more useful than I expected. It was just as it said in the skill description. He could see sixteen feet underground. He saw the way the tree roots spread through the soil and how the underground water flowed. He even saw rabbit burrows dug here and there.

Lloyd gulped unconsciously. This… is glorious.

Until today, his survey skills only rendered information about the ground's surface for him. What was beneath the ground could only be known after the land was excavated. But now that hassle was resolved in one swoop.

It's going to be super helpful when I'm laying the ground for any construction work. Foundations were crucial in construction. Its importance was amplified when the scale of the job grew. For example, if the workers did a poor job of laying the foundation of bridges or dams, the consequences were obvious. Whatever was built would tilt to one side, or its foundation would quickly crack and crumble. And finally, the entire structure would collapse. In some cases, the construction companies had to demolish the whole thing before disaster unfolded. It didn't matter how much money was used up to that point. The spending only doubled from there if you had to tear everything down to prevent further damage.

But that can be prevented by scanning the ground right from the beginning. The construction time would be greatly reduced as well. He would be able to inspect the groundwork in real-time, drastically shortening the construction period. And he'd be able to save money as well.

This design skill option is really something else. Lloyd looked at the two options in the design skill. Printing out the plan and seeing the floor plan… He wanted to put them to use, but Javier was right beside him. He could casually use his design skill, but that would seriously make Javier mistake him for a human blueprint printer.

I'll use the design skill when I'm alone. First up, surveying. Crackle! After that day, Lloyd engrossed himself in surveying the land during the day. He calculated the area of the road and surveyed the route. Over the next few days, he processed the data he collected. And he used the design skill with the assembled data. So, during the day, he surveyed the land, while at night, he focused on the design.

Each night, he rushed to put Javier to sleep.

“A plastic limit (PL) is defined as the percentage of water content when kneaded soil is rolled into a thread of 3.2mm (1/8”) in diameter. The PL… is soil… blah blah blah… and it’s the same case when the liquid limit is determined… blah blah blah… in case the cylindrical cone with the weight of 240g is used… the moisture content that responds to the entrance of the cone that is the size of d = 20mm is… blah blah blah…”

Snore…

When Javier drifted off, Lloyd could activate his design skills as much as he wanted. He designed the route and the cross-section of the roads based on the information he gathered from surveying. He gathered the floor plans as quietly as possible to not wake his sleeping friend Javier.

Be-beep! He tested printing the plan out on paper. Then, like magic, the floor plan was printed just the way he designed it.

Wow. It works. It really works! Up until today, he had to directly draw the floor plans he had designed by hand. It was unpleasant and tedious work. The accuracy dropped a bit too. But now, things were breezy and convenient. The plan got printed out like he would have drawn it.

The power of the skill options didn’t stop there.

One morning, a few days later, Lloyd tested the design skill as he stood in the construction area. He pointed to the area that would be turned into a road as he looked at Javier.

“Hey, Javier. Do you see that?”

“Excuse me? What do you mean?”

“There. Don’t you see the lines drawn all over the ground?” Lloyd asked.

“I don’t see them. But…” Javier muttered.

“But?”

“I am a bit worried about your eyes and… mental health.” Javier’s look was filled with concern.

“Are you saying that I’m seeing things?”

“Yes,” Javier answered.

“Baa ha-ha. I see.” Lloyd let out a wicked laugh. It was just as he expected. He had come out here the night before to draw the two-dimensional plan on several areas. But it was visible only to him and no one else.

Everything’s set. I can do it.

His surveying and design skills had improved much more than he anticipated. Thanks to that, the preparation was completed in a breeze.

Now, it was time to dive into full-scale construction work.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 20: All Roads Lead to Rome (3)

Construction took off at full tilt. With Lloyd's improved surveying and design skills, the first part was completed in a breeze.

"Hey, Ppodong?" called Lloyd.

"Ppodong?"

"I will draw a line on the ground now. You see?"

"Ppodong!"

"Could you dig a five-foot-deep hole within the lines for me?"

"Ppo-do-dong!" Ppodong nodded his chubby head while resting it on Lloyd's hand.

"Great. First, eat this."

"Ppodong!"

Lloyd held out a red sunflower seed. Ppodong chewed it up like he couldn't wait for it. Boom! Within seconds, he grew to become a thirty-foot-tall giant hamster. Lloyd picked up his shovel and drew a straight line with it. He was following the line of the 2D floor plan that was only visible to him.

Swishhh!

"Okay, starting from here… In this direction. Right along the line, not an inch off. Everything must be forty-two feet wide," Lloyd instructed.

"Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!"

Swish! Swish! Swish! Ppodong deftly dug the ground up with his front paws. Each time his plump butt moved, a massive amount of sand flew behind him. Lloyd was impressed. Ppodong was no different than a high-capacity forklift.

Afterward, Lloyd ordered, “Civil engineers, group one. In now.”

“Yes!”

The group of engineers was composed of thirty soldiers. Each one carried a shovel, and they all moved together in formation. They jumped into the hole Ppodong dug out for them, and they shoveled the rocks, branches, and other small items out.

Clang! Clatter! Clash! Thwack! Pwash!

Thirty shovels dug up the ground at once. It was almost like a dance. The beads of sweat on their faces shone in the sunlight. As they worked, the sides and bottoms of the holes flattened beautifully. After that, Ppodong squashed the ground flat once again with his weight.

“Ppodong!”

Crush! His stout bottom squashed the soil like a stamp pressed onto a sheet of paper. All twenty-five tons of him pressed the earth down hard. He curled up and rolled around to compress the ground. Swoosh! Lloyd thought that Ppodong was nothing short of a big hamster construction roller.

While the basic construction work was underway, the second group of civil engineers moved diligently. This group transferred the fine sand from the river. Once they finished that, the first group transferred the sand to the hole, and the compacting job would continue. The engineers compacted the ground by patting it down with their shovels and Ppodong pressed the earth down further with his butt, making sure that the depth of the sand layer was fifteen inches.

This process ran in repeated cycles. Dig, cover, pat, and press.

Then the sand layer was covered with egg-sized pebbles, adding a layer a further fifteen inches deep. On top of that were tiny stones of the same thickness. Afterward, walnut-sized pieces of gravel carpeted the stone layer. Finally, it was covered with a seven-inch-thick layer of fine sand.

Sixty civil engineers, stonecutters, and miners put their noses to the grindstone. The tasks were efficiently assigned. They had enough time for rest and meals to get recharged. By the time everyone called it a day, about a hundred square feet had been completed.

“Good.” Lloyd smiled in satisfaction. They were making more progress than he expected. It’s all thanks to Ppodong. Seriously, heavy machinery is a necessity in construction. Ppodong acted as a forklift and roller, speeding up the entire construction process. Aside from the hamster, the soldiers’ contribution could not be overstated. They worked their asses off.

The training they got from the heated floor project is finally paying off. The sixty engineers were becoming masters of shoveling. Their stamina had also improved considerably. All that labor built up their physique.

Lloyd suddenly recalled the days he slaved away as a soldier in the Korean army. He joined the military to protect his country. But reality was much different than what he imagined. Once he was deployed to a base, he found himself protecting the company barracks and facilities in his line of duty, instead of protecting the country. His life in the military was full of nothing but various menial jobs and construction projects. It was far from military training.

There were all sorts of projects to do every day. He cut the grass and repaired the fences and plumbing. He repaired broken roofs and patched cracked walls. He set up a plastic shed behind the barracks and expanded the warehouse. All just because I majored in civil engineering.

He was like a genie to his superior officers… offering free construction services… Tsk. It’s giving me the chills. Remembering those days, Lloyd looked at the civil engineer soldiers, and he flashed a vicious grin. All of you will know what I went through.

He didn’t care the least about them. After all, these soldiers had been hired by the fiefdom to protect the place. He only needed to pay them a little more as an incentive, and that was it. No more complaints would be voiced. They were exactly what Lloyd needed: workers he could shovel into endless hours of labor at little cost.

The construction was still in its initial phase. He had a long way to go, and come hell or high water he was resolved to finish the first section of the paved road before the spring rains came.

***

A few days passed. Thankfully, the weather was clear. So, construction took off without any hassles. The work area stretched on and on every day. In the process, townspeople flooded in to see the roadwork and watch the project unfold.

“Woah, what is going on here?” A man asked as he passed by. “What’s all this fuss for?”

“Hey, haven’t you heard?”

“Heard what?”

“I heard this is called a paved road.”

“A paved road?”

“Yeah.”

“What’s it for?”

“I don’t know. But I heard it’s good.”

“Good? For what?”

“Who knows… It must be good for… well, something.”

“Well, I guess you’re just as ignorant as I am.”

“Phew.”

Others shook their heads and whispered among themselves. Seeing the road being built through the center of the land, many wondered what its purpose would be.

“Maybe it’s going to be a canal.”

“Not really, it looks like he’s going to pour water in there and freeze it to make an ice-skating rink.”

“No, you’re all wrong. That’s a field for crops. He’s going to stretch it up over yonder, so it’d be easy to harvest.”

“I’m not so sure about that… It’d be more convincing if you told me that he’s digging up the ground to play dominos.”

“Oh, come on! It’s a waterway!”

“Nah. It’s a skating rink.”

“Seriously, it’s a field.”

“I say that it’s a track for the runners to race on.”

Of course these people weren’t really so stupid that they didn’t notice what Lloyd was building. And they knew very well the purpose of paving a road. A paved road would make traveling much easier. It was also good for wagons that carried supplies. Which was exactly why people couldn’t understand. Trade and travel don’t happen often enough here to need a new road… So, what’s happening…?

People wondered why the young master was hell-bent on paving this new road. No one could wrap their head around it. This whole project appeared abruptly and seemed unnecessary. Sure, the old road turned muddy sometimes, but that was a minor inconvenience. So, it was a wonder to everyone why the construction was even taking place. The money, hours, and people put in there… ‘Was it worth it?’ they asked themselves.

But they weren’t alone. The soldiers digging things up felt the same way.

“Ugh! Whew… This is tough. Way too tough.”

“Hey, no goofing around. It’s not like you’re having it harder than anyone else.”

“I know that, but still. Hey, don’t you think this is a bit much?”

“What is?”

“Us. Being civil engineers. Sure, we get incentives the others don’t receive. But think about it. Don’t you think we’re just wasting our time and energy right now?”

“Wasting?”

“Stop and think about it. What’s the point of paving the road like this?”

“Um, well…”

“Nothing comes to mind, right?”

“You… are right…” The guy just scratched his head.

The complaining soldier wiped the sweat dripping from his brow. “That’s what I’m talking about. What do we have in this tiny fiefdom? It’s not like we’re trading with other lands. And there aren’t any armed forces or foreign delegations visiting us.”

“True, and we’re located far, far east in the kingdom.”

“Right? There’s nothing beyond here. It’s just us. No other kingdoms. Just mountains and barren lands.”

“Hmm, now that you put it that way, I see what you mean.”

“Now we’re talking. So what’s the point of working our butts off to pave a huge road? And did you notice that we’re building toward the east when nothing’s there?”

“What?! Are you sure?”

“Yeah, I am. See for yourself.”

“Shoot… You’re right…”

“Right?”

“Whew. But what can we do? The young master says jump, and we say how high.”

“You’re right about that. Tsk!”

Thwack! Thwack! Thwack! Their shoveling became more aggravated. The soldiers had been going through the same painstaking routine for several days straight. They were starting to ask themselves what all this was for. But the construction continued regardless of what doubts they harbored in their hearts. After all, it had already started.

Lloyd wasn’t ignorant of all this. He was already aware of what was grumbling in their hearts. But he didn’t care. He had no plans of quitting. He had a clear goal to achieve.

Everyone must be doubting and complaining right now. But just wait until it’s done… Once the construction was over, things would be different. They would be enlightened as to his grand plan. He was confident of that, so he decided to save his breath. He simply needed to show them the results.

And so, construction continued without any sign of stopping, reflecting his resolve.

They dug. They covered the holes with gravel and sand. They compressed and flattened the surface. Each day, more area was paved. The road reached from the center of the fiefdom to the foot of the mountain in the east. Afterward, they climbed the low slope, then the mountain foot, and worked on the mountain’s flank. When the construction reached that level, Lloyd decided that he should take it up a notch. It was time to get some serious paving done. Lloyd mobilized every mason in the estate.

“Okay. Your job is crucial from here on out. Everything that we did was for this very job. It’s time to pave the road for real,” he announced.

“Yes, young master.”

“Listen carefully. You should pave the road with stones by…”

Lloyd explained how the job must be done. The masons’ eyes glimmered with interest as they heard about the new construction technique. And with that, the paving project kicked off.

“Okay then! Let’s move! Don’t forget to comply with the safety guidelines!” Lloyd instructed.

“Yes, sir!”

The masons and soldiers were stationed in groups. They uniformly laid the road using large, flat stones composed of various materials. Each side of the stone was about two feet long. They were pieced together on the ground like a puzzle. Each piece fit so perfectly that there was barely any space between them.

There was more.

The center of the twenty-foot-wide road was built slightly higher than its edges. This was to create an arch, so that when it rained, the water would flow down the road on both sides instead of pooling in the center. The sides of the raised road had one-and-a-half-foot wide by half-foot deep drainage ditches. On the sides of the ditches were ten-foot-wide sidewalks.

This way, the roads won’t become submerged in water. The ditches on each side will naturally take care of the water, and the gravel, sand, and stones beneath the road will prevent the water from pooling. Finally, the sidewalks will separate the carriage and foot traffic.

As one last touch, Lloyd designated no-tree-planting zones on both sides of the road. He knew that tree roots might reach into the road’s foundation and make them uneven.

The construction took off again. The road expanded day by day. From the entrance of the baron’s estate to the residential areas. From the residential areas and market to the outskirts of the fiefdom. And then, from the outskirts to halfway up the eastern mountain. There, the construction ended.

For the first time in its history, a paved road that cut across the Frontera barony was established. But people could not understand exactly what the road was for. The people, the engineers, and even Baron Frontera who authorized it… No one knew. They were all in the dark about why Lloyd built the road.

These questions lingered in their heads, but time passed to welcome the spring rain. It rained hard for more than ten days. All the old roads turned muddy. Only the newly paved road was fine. This was not surprising. People saw this coming already. They had taken so much time to pave the road. So, it was obvious the road would remain in good condition even in the rain.

Although everyone had expected this, the doubt in them still lingered. They asked themselves why the young master created this luxurious road and wondered about its purpose. They started to have more questions as it rained harder.

On the morning the sky cleared up, Lloyd walked along the paved road. He climbed halfway up the mountain in the east. There, to everyone's surprise, he planted a construction notice.

Bituminous Coal Construction. No Farming Without Permission. Lloyd Frontera.

The grand plan Lloyd had imagined from the first day he was forced into this world was now slowly coming into existence.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 21: Second Random Summon Game (1)

Clang! Clang! The sound of the shovel rang out clearly. The blade shone in the spring sunlight every time it moved. The shovel pounded the notice down with the metal clanking loudly. Clang! The sign was planted deep into the earth at last. Lloyd wiped off the sweat flowing down his forehead. “Whew.”

A warm breeze quickly dried the beads of sweat. The sunshine put him in a good mood. And the sign in front of him made him grin.

“Hey, what do you think?” Lloyd turned around as he spoke. He looked at the silver-haired knight standing behind him.

Javier, the silver-haired knight, threw a cynical look at Lloyd. “What do you mean by that?” he asked.

“Well, this.” Lloyd pointed at the notice. Javier looked at it. It was a wooden plank that had the following words painted large on it.

Bituminous Coal Construction Here: No Farming Without Permission. Lloyd Frontera.

“Notices like these need to be installed in advance. Otherwise, things get complicated,” Lloyd explained.

“How so?”

“They’ll turn this place into a field of peppers and cabbages and whatnot.” Lloyd smiled bitterly.

“I mean the old and young women alike. They’re so industrious in their farm work that they’ll rush to plant all sorts of veggies when they chance upon good land. Can you imagine what would happen if the land was originally meant for construction?”

It was a frequent occurrence in South Korea. When people did this, it would be bulldozed over by the construction companies. And penalties would be imposed on those who used the land without permission. It was a pitiful thing. Lloyd had no plans to make people go through the same thing here.

“Can you imagine what would happen if I plowed over the fields to build something?” Lloyd wondered. “People would bludgeon me for destroying their land. Some would even say that I’m a tyrant. And the good public image I’ve worked hard to build would go away like a dragon soaring high in the sky. Goodbye forever.”

“In short… You would be faced with severe criticism.”

“Yeah, that’s what I mean.” Lloyd brightly smiled. He had been receiving quite a lot of trust from people these days. And he wasn’t going to lose it over a tiny dispute.

“Anyway, the construction will begin soon. I’ll dig the land here to turn it into a mine, so we can extract coal.”

“By that, do you mean coal, sir?” Javier asked.

“Yeah, exactly. You know about it?”

“A little bit.”

Javier nodded his head.

“Coal is a small rock that is formed underground. I heard it is a great source of fire but much softer than firewood.”

“Yup, correct. That’s what we’ll be mining here.”

“Do you mean that coal is buried down here?” Javier asked.

“Yes.” Lloyd chuckled. “I found a record that claimed the previous lords tried twice to construct a mine but failed. The mine collapsed because the ground was weak.” Lloyd knew because he had read it in the Knight of Blood and Iron, and he had just remembered it.

Arcos Frontera.

In the novel, Lloyd's father killed himself when crushing debt became too much of a burden. Right before his unfortunate death, he cried his heart out about how today's tragedy could have been avoided had his father, Mattias Frontera, succeeded in building the mine.

That part of the novel was as clear as day in his head. Ever since then, he decided to develop these lands. He counted this mine as one of the most important parts of his agenda. But he didn't forget to check the site for himself, and his intermediate skills greatly helped him. The surveying skill allowed him to scan as deep as ten feet beneath the ground. He could study its rock formation, underground waterway, and body of ore.

Although, it would be nice if I could see deeper. He decided this place was the best option after scanning several viable candidates. That's why he laid out the paved road near here. Transferring coal from the mine would be a breeze. "Coal mining will become our golden goose for the time being. It's going to be the most efficient method to solve the firewood shortage that will surely come this winter."

"Firewood shortage?"

"Yes. Firewood will be in serious shortage because of the heated floors I'm installing. I'm not guessing here. It's bound to happen. I'm sure."

Lloyd shrugged and continued explaining. "That's the way it is with the heated floors. They warm you up. But, you need a lot of firewood since you're heating up the floor of the entire house, not just the kitchen or a small area like with a furnace. This could use up all the resources in the forest! In other words, the mountain will become bare in a few years."

"Because people cut down too many trees for firewood?"

"Yes."

"Then…"

“Did I see it coming? Of course, I did.” Lloyd’s smile became slightly more sinister.

“You know me. I designed the heated flooring system. Of course I saw this coming. By the time we’re in mid-winter, everyone will start to feel that the firewood in their backyard isn’t enough.”

“Then you deceived everyone?”

“Me?”

“Yes.” Javier’s voice was cold.

“They replaced their furnaces with your system because they trusted you. But if the firewood runs short, they will be spending half the winter shivering in the cold.”

“You are correct.”

“You cheated them.”

“No, not really.”

“Then…”

“I will be selling coal.”

“To the people here?”

“Totally. Coal is superior to wood. They’ll be begging me to sell it to them.” That was Lloyd’s plan. Stage one was to supply the heated flooring system to people. As more people installed it in their homes, firewood would run short. They would start to notice a flaw in the floor, its huge consumption of firewood. That was when he would sell them the coal he had been hoarding.

And I’ll expand my business to neighboring fiefdoms, eventually exporting coal to them as well.

Heated floors. Coal. These two would become the cash cows that contributed to paying off the fiefdom’s debt. The mere thought raised the corners of his mouth further.

On the other hand, Javier’s expression turned grim. “Please do not tell me that you had planned all this when you began.”

“Yes.”

“Since when?”

“Since day one. Since we visited the bar owner to apologize and got the first contract. If you have something to say, say it. Don’t look at me like that.”

“May I?”

“Go ahead.”

Javier did not hold back. “You are a wicked man.”

“Well, that’s better than being naive.”

“I hate that about you.”

“Me?”

“Yes.”

“You’re forgetting something.”

“What do you mean?”

“The person you hate sends you to dreamland every night. So, do you hate my lullaby service too? Ha-ha. You don’t have to think so hard. Look at you, just sweating over it. It’s so obvious. You stare into space like that, right after what I said. Open your eyes, man. I won’t tease you anymore. Relieved now, huh. So cute.”

“I…”

“Leave it. I’ll continue singing my lullabies to you every night, so don’t fret like a puppy.”

I’m not a puppy!!! Javier almost shouted back at his young master.

Before those words had the chance of slipping out of Javier’s mouth, Lloyd spoke first. “Well, I get why you’re reacting that way. You think that I’m fooling and using everyone for my benefit and you find that side of me deceitful. I know. I won’t deny it. But what else can I do? I need to save our fiefdom before anything else.”

The vicious smile on Lloyd’s face turned slightly bitter.

“You know what? Honestly, I thought that money wasn’t everything when I was young. But I realized that I was mistaken when I grew up. Nothing beats money. It turned out to be way better than my childish thoughts could ever fathom.”

“Master Lloyd…”

“Yeah, yeah. Money can’t buy happiness. But you can be happier if you have money. So, allow me to be underhanded and cunning for a while until I make some money. Let’s try to start paying off the debt in the fiefdom, okay?”

Javier closed his mouth. The sense of disgust that swirled in his heart vanished as soon as he heard Lloyd’s plan. His young master was calling himself a cheat and laughing about it. Though he didn’t say it out loud, his look seemed to say, I’m going to bear all the blame. The criticism. The finger-pointing… I’ll take them alone, so don’t say anything. Just follow me.

This guy… He was nothing but a good-for-nothing hooligan. But recently he had surprised Javier from time to time. The same thing was happening now. But Javier didn’t dislike it.

His methods are dubious, but…

In the many experiences Javier had with his young master, Lloyd was right most of the time. Lloyd had helped him finish the Asrahan Core Technique. He had exposed Sir Neumann. And so, Javier considered that it was possible that his young master was laying the foundation for projects that would advance the fiefdom further.

“Yes.” Javier found himself chuckling. “I will permit you.” He spoke from his heart. Master Lloyd… Javier gazed meaningfully at his young master, the person he must guard and protect.

Lloyd returned the look and cocked his head to one side. “Permit me? Wait, you’re permitting my plan?”

“Yes.”

“I think you’re confused right now.”

“Pardon?”

“I never asked for your permission.”

“You see… I’m the baron’s son. I don’t need your permission to dig a mine… So, enough with your misunderstandings, and move aside. I need to do some surveying.”

Javier’s elegant face crumpled. Lloyd chuckled out loud like a naughty child. Oh, how fun. Javier. You’re so fun to tease.

***

Ever since that day, Lloyd confined himself to the mine construction site. He surveyed the surroundings and analyzed the environment. There had been two previous attempts to dig a mine. Both of them had failed. Lloyd studied those cases and planned his own construction.

The traditional method of drilling through the rocks won’t work. It takes too much time, and more than that, it’s too dangerous.

As luck would have it, he discovered records of the failed construction attempts in his estate study. He went over them and found out they had tried to drill the rocks to construct a mine.

Splitting the rocks to pieces by heating and cooling them off and going deeper and deeper…

That was the traditional method of doing things back then. When the workers hit a large rock, they set fire to it. And then they poured cold water on it. The sudden change in temperature created a crack, making the rock easier for them to break into pieces.

That's how they did it at first. But they dug 100 feet. The mine collapsed. Twice.

And unfortunately, everyone in the mine lost their lives. That's why his grandfather, Mattias Frontera, gave up on his plan of building the mine.

What happened back then is simple. The place collapsed because of the weak ground.

Accidents were bound to happen if you failed to properly understand the geographical characteristics. After further surveying, Lloyd learned that the earth on this mountain was weak, containing a mix of rock and soil. He needed to employ a technique specific to this environment.

"I am thinking of using the shield method," Lloyd announced.

"Shield method?"

This was at dinner time. Lloyd slid a slip of paper toward the baron from his seat at the dining table.

"I have been thinking about it, and if you look here, you'll see a concept illustration of the shield method."

"Shield method…"

The baron looked at the illustration.

Lloyd continued to explain. “To put it simply, a shield refers to a large circular frame made of steel. The workers would get inside there and dig out the soil and rocks. The shield would protect the place from crumbling down as it will bear the pressure of the mine.”

“Hmm,” the baron mused, “it literally is a shield that supports the whole area.”

“Yes. Have you ever heard of shipworms?”

“Ship… worms?”

“Yes.”

“Do explain.”

“It’s a distant relative of a squid or snail. The little guy is quite harmful because of how it eats up ship hulls and burrows holes in them,” Lloyd explained.

“What does it have to do with this construction project?”

“This fellow is what inspired me to come up with the shield method,” Lloyd said. He smiled. It was true. In the mid-1800s, the Thames Tunnel was constructed in the following way, right beneath the River Thames in London, England. Marc Isambard Brunel, who constructed the Thames Tunnel, developed this method after drawing inspiration from shipworms.

“Shipworms burrow holes in the bottom of boats with their shield-like shell. But the wood expands when it gets soaked in water. That narrows the hole they burrowed, leading some of them to get squeezed to death. To prevent that, they paste their secretions as they burrow a hole. The secretions prevent the wood from expanding. The same goes for this shield method.” Lloyd pointed at the illustration and continued to explain.

“The shield acts as the shell of the shipworms. It protects the workers. And it would burrow a hole at the forefront. People will be divided into groups.

Some will dig, while some will install real-time facilities that will prevent the mine from collapsing.”

“Just like how the shipworm's secretions prevent the holes from being damaged?” asked the baron.

“Yes.”

“So, the whole process will be slow and steady. Burrowing and repairing all at the same time.”

“That is almost perfectly correct.”

Lloyd then explained more details of the construction while the baron remained still, listening to his son. The baron was intrigued. Coal was an excellent source of fire. Digging it up would naturally translate to profit. Under the pressure of crippling debt, the baron couldn’t help but be intrigued. And what was more, Lloyd’s plan sounded feasible and plausible.

At last, the baron approved the construction. “This is great, but I have one condition.”

“What is it?”

“I do not want you in the mine while the construction is happening.”

“Because it could be dangerous?” Lloyd asked.

“Of course,” the baron said. His voice was firm.

“I know this is a new method, but we cannot guarantee its safety.”

“But I can’t promise you that.”

“How so?”

“If I don’t go in,” Lloyd reasoned, “no workers would trust my method and do the work. Moreover, I need to actively observe any changes in the mine’s condition or surroundings. That’s the only way I can prevent accidents.”

“But…”

“It will be safe. I give you my word.”

“Hahaha.”

The two went back and forth. But Lloyd was the stubborn one. In the end, the baron gave in to his stubbornness and approved the construction of the mine.

But Lloyd didn’t get to it right away. He had another task to tackle first. He waited for night to come. When it did, he put Javier to sleep. And he walked out to the training hall behind his estate. Late at night, he opened the system window and clicked on the random summon game.

I can’t use Ppodong for this job. He’s too big to burrow a mine. But it’s also too time-consuming for humans to do the job.

The longer the construction time, the more expensive it became. The shield method only guaranteed everyone’s safety. It didn’t shorten the construction period. So, Lloyd needed a capable worker who was going to shorten the construction period and save some money.

It’d be best if this summon got some skills related to digging. Lloyd then activated the random game. He still had enough RP around even after all of his upgrading.

[Cost of 2nd Random Summon Game = 70 RP]

[Current RP: 119]

[Would you like to start the random summon game?]

[YES / NO]

He chose “YES.”

[The random summon game is starting.]

Fwoosh!

A bright light enveloped the area. A complex magic circle formed in the air, and the space rumbled. A hazy silhouette gradually appeared in the rumbling space, slowly revealing itself.

Lloyd’s eyes widened when he finally met the summon.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 22: Second Random Summon Game (2)

Fwoosh! A bright light enveloped the area. An unfamiliar silhouette started to take shape. The summon revealed itself with a bang and shockwave.

Crackle!

“Bangul!” Something shrieked and flew toward Lloyd. He quickly reached out to save it from hitting the ground. Her skin felt plush in his hands.

What kind of summon partner is this? Lloyd quickly checked to see what it could be.

“Bangul!”

“Huh?”

She was plump and about four inches long. She had a large round head, and her beady eyes glimmered. There was a gold bell attached to the end of her tail with a ribbon.

“A snake…?” Yes. The new summon partner was a snake.

She’s so strangely proportioned. Lloyd wasn’t making fun of her appearance. He was simply making an objective observation of his new friend, whose body and head were of equal size.

“Are you… really a snake?”

“Bangul!” She nodded in the affirmative. Her expression was quite coy.

Then he remembered something. So, he asked, “Is your name Bangul?”

“Bangul! Ba-bangul!” Bangul nodded once again.

Lloyd was right. Well, it’s nothing surprising for a creature to yell out its name. That famous yellow cartoon character did the same, yelling ‘peeka peeka’. That helped him to better understand the relationship between the summon creatures and their language.

Lloyd stared at Bangul. A short, equally proportioned snake.… He wondered if she could slither around properly. But he wasn’t the kind of person to make a hasty judgment. He had already experienced Ppodong. That taught him that he must not judge summons based on their looks.

“Hey, Bangul?”

“Bangul?”

“Do you have a manual or something?”

“Ba-bangul? Bangul!”

Lloyd was skeptical, but she really did have one. Bangul opened her mouth wide. There was a bag inside. He opened the bag and found ten sets of sunflower seeds and a neatly folded note. Lloyd read it carefully.

[Bangul User Manual

Bangul is a lovely rattlesnake. Please show her love and care.

Bangul will give her utmost loyalty to you, her master. A summon partner is not only your companion animal but also your family, so please don’t neglect them.

Bangul can change her size by eating one of the enclosed sunflower seeds.]

[Red Sunflower Seed: Bangul grows to gigantic proportions. Effective for maximum of 12 hours.]

[Blue Sunflower Seed: Bangul shrinks back to a smaller size. Feed this to Bangul before the 12-hour limit is up. Bangul will be dehydrated if she goes past the 12-hour limit without eating a blue sunflower seed. She will automatically shrink back to her small size, but she will not be able to grow gigantic for the next 24 hours.]

[One set of each color of sunflower seed costs 1 RP.]

[Bangul can use a wide range of skills while she is gigantic.]

[Bangul's Skill Log]

[Chomping Dirt (Lvl. 1)]

[Accelerated Dirt Digestion (Lvl. 1)]

[Steel Dung Launcher (Lvl. 1)]

Whaaat? Dirt chomping? Accelerated dirt digestion? Steel dung launching? Lloyd's mouth hung wide open in disbelief when he read Bangul's skill log. It was dumbfounding.

Wait a minute, she's not going to poop steel after eating dirt, is she? With lingering doubt, Lloyd brought out a red sunflower seed and gave it to Bangul to test.

"Hey, Bangul?"

"Bangul?"

"Do you want to eat this?"

"Bangul!"

Bangul chewed it up as if she was waiting for it. Lloyd put her down on the ground and stepped back. The moment Bangul swallowed the sunflower seed she was munching on… Boom!

"Bangul!"

She became gigantic. Bangul was now sixteen feet tall, but her head and body were still of equal proportion. Yes, this is nothing new. He had already experienced the same phenomenon with Ppodong.

Lloyd walked over to Bangul. "Hey, Bangul?"

“Bangul!”

“Do you want to test out your skills?”

“Bangul?”

“You know, eating and digesting dirt, stuff like that. Can you do it?”

“Ba-bangul?” Bangul’s eyes sank as though she was disappointed by her doubtful master.

Lloyd flinched in guilt. Hmm… She’s a bit snobbish. I guess Ppodong and Bangul are different. That was how it appeared. So, Lloyd adjusted his tone to sound more like a request.

“Of course I trust you. It’s just that I need to see it. I just want to see how cool you are,” Lloyd cooed.

“Bangul?”

“I mean it.”

“Bangul!” Bangul’s face brightened, and she wriggled her body in happiness. Then she hung her large, round head toward the ground of the hall and opened her mouth.

“Ba-bangul!”

Chomp! Yum! Gulp!

Goodness… She's eating dirt. Is that how I look when I’m eating fried chicken? The way Bangul savored the dirt made him wonder. She scooped the dirt up with her mouth and scarfed it down. After a long while, she let out a big burp.

Then she started to shake her short, chubby tail. “Bangul! Ba-bangul!” Jingle! The bell tied to the end of her tail rattled noisily.

Then she lifted her tail high and made a straining expression.

And… Clank! Clank! She squeezed out a long, steaming, red-hot turd made of steel.

OMG. It's like she's making popcorn. Lloyd suppressed his embarrassment and examined the steel poo she had just deposited. It was only then that he realized Bangul's true potential.

This is amazing. Her shit was actual steel. And it wasn't shaped like the poop emoji. It's a steel bar. It was about thirty-two feet long and the width of a human thumb. The steel bar was polished and perfect, without any bumps. From the start to the end, the steel bar was sleek and smooth.

It was a rod of perfectly reinforced steel rebar. And it's very hot. The steel bar poop was still as red and hot as when it came out. This meant just one thing. I can cut it before it cools down. I can cut or bend the bar in any way I want.

Lloyd realized that he now had an unlimited supply of steel rebar as long as he just kept feeding her dirt.

This is… Woah. It's too good to be true! It was indeed too good to be true. Come to think of it, I can do more than produce steel bars from her. She could eat the dirt. Which meant that she could dig out an underground tunnel. So, if he included Bangul in his plan…

Bangul would eat the dirt in the shield machine and dig a tunnel. At the same time, she would release steel bars, and the blacksmiths would cut them to the needed length right on the spot. The workers would then make and set up the sections of metal walls that would support the mine. Once the metal walls have been erected, we could move the shield and repeat the process.

The construction plan slowly came together in his head. The more he thought about it, the more amazed he became. If this plan works, the construction period would only be a tenth of what I expected.

Lloyd only wished for a summon who had the ability to dig the earth. But the one he got turned out to be much better than that. Lloyd stood there, looking at Bangul in a daze.

“Hey, Bangul?”

“Bangul?”

“You are really something. You’re the best,” Lloyd said.

“Ba-bangul!?”

“No, I correct myself. You are the best, the bomb, the greatest one there is.”

“Bangul!”

Lloyd gave her a thumbs up.

Bangul flashed back a happy grin.

***

After he earned Bangul from the summoning game, construction preparation gained momentum. Lloyd customized his shield machine design for Bangul. The segments and rebar components that made up the walls were fitted accordingly. The construction work now centered around Bangul.

“Ppodong?” “Ppo-do-dong!”

“Bangul?”

“Ppodong!”

“Ba-bangul!”

To Lloyd’s relief, Ppodong and Bangul got along very well. The fact that they were a snake and a hamster combo worried him, but he realized that he was mistaken. Instead, the fuzzy hamster and chubby rattlesnake instantly clicked and became best friends, perhaps because of their shared identity as summon creatures. They stuck with each other, rolling around and playing on the ground on days without work. They even sunbathed and dozed off to sleep together.

Whew. Good for you two. You can goof around all day, and people will call you cute. While the two summon beasts lazed around, Lloyd busied himself with his tasks.

He visited the forge every day, pestering the blacksmiths. He personally supervised the production of the shield device. After about ten days, they finally completed the shield. It looked like a soda pop can laid down on its side with open ends. Its diameter was about ten feet, and its front area was reserved for Bangul. The dense construction of the sides ensured that the circular shape would remain intact and firm despite the weight of the earth in the mine.

The back area was for the workers. They would be protected by the shield structure there and be able to cut the steel bars Bangul would produce from all the dirt she ate. That allowed them to quickly install the metal walls that would keep the mine from collapsing.

We're all set. The next task was assembling the workers. A group of blacksmiths to cut and shape the hot steel bars underground. An army of civil engineers to push the shield device forward while supporting the blacksmiths. Planning out the division of labor was completed with ease. The baron's approval made things move along seamlessly.

With everything ready, Lloyd began construction. Finally, it was time for the shield device to see the light of day.

"Bangul! Ba-bangul!"

Inside the shield, Bangul moved her large head around. She opened her mouth and swallowed any dirt or rocks in sight. A little later, her stomach wiggled, and she rattled her short tail.

Jingle! Her tail rattled more vigorously.

"It's coming!"

Lloyd’s shout made the blacksmiths nervous. Finally, Bangul blessed the workers with bars of steel poop.

Fwish! The red-hot steel bars flew into the air.

“Hurry up before they cool. Javier!” Lloyd shouted.

At his call, Javier moved quickly. He removed his coat and drew his sword. Swish! The long blade shone as coldly as Javier’s face. He wielded the sword like a bolt of lightning, splitting the hot steel bars.

Swoosh! Javier—the expert swordsman—slashed down at the scorching bar with all his strength, and cleanly cut through it. However, there was more.

“Hey! You’re cutting the correct lengths, right?” Lloyd yelled.

“Of course.”

Swoosh! Swoosh! Slice! Slice! Slash! Javier’s long sword brilliantly danced in the air. He sliced the steel bar ruthlessly.

In the original Knight of Blood and Iron novel, Javier’s sword struck down powerful enemies with ease. But now he brandished his sword to slice up the metal poo of a summon partner. His precise swordwork reminded him of chefs in seafood restaurants who effortlessly cut fish into equal pieces.

Clank! Clunk!

Dozens of short and long bars littered the ground. Everything was a perfect size. Lloyd gave Javier a thumbs up. “Good! Not a single inch short.”

“Thank you,” Javier said hesitantly. While Lloyd erupted in joy, Javier sighed at length for having been demoted to a steel cutter. Once he finished, it was time for the blacksmiths to work.

“Move before the steel gets cold! Assemble them!” Lloyd shouted.

“Yes, Young Master!” the blacksmiths yelled in unison. “Let’s go!” The blacksmiths moved with shipman-like precision. They bent Javier’s steel bars according to Lloyd's precise measurements. They carefully weaved, fixed, and assembled them into a wall that fit right into the inner side of the shield.

Once Lloyd was satisfied with the work, he yelled, "Shield! Forward!"

"Forward!" Dozens of civil engineers repeated in unison. They mightily pushed the lever connected behind the shield, and it slowly crawled forward, despite the massive weight of Bangul and the workers. The shield moved three feet, which was the exact distance Bangul had cleared the way for them by eating the earth. When it lurched forward, the three-foot metal walls were released from the shield, holding the ground back behind them.

Rumble! The shield's movement caused the walls and ceiling of the tunnel to shake, but it didn't collapse. The metal walls behind the shield firmly supported them.

Everything was happening just as Lloyd had planned. Good. It's working. Lloyd's eyes flashed with determination. His voice now contained more confidence while leading the project.

At the same time, he meticulously examined what was in front of him. Flash! He was using his intermediate surveying skill. Lloyd could scan the ground sixteen feet ahead of him that would be dug out later. He studied the geographical characteristics and whether a dangerous gas layer lurked nearby. The skill enabled him to supervise his people while getting a full picture of the work. It was the ultimate method to prevent any construction disasters. His eyes boasted the capability of modern seismic prediction monitors and reflective imagery for observing underground construction sites.

"Okay, people!" Yelled Lloyd. "Let's keep up the momentum!"

"Go, go, go!" The workers enthusiastically replied.

"Bangul!" Shouted Bangul.

The yells of Lloyd and his people, along with Bangul's booming exclamation, rang loud in the underground. They burrowed deeper into the mountain.

The construction went quickly.

But no one suspected what waited for them at the end of the tunnel.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 23: Beasts of the Underground (1)

It was a sunny spring day. The sun this year was brighter and warmer than any before it. Thanks to its blessing, the construction in the Frontera barony sailed along smoothly.

Heated flooring system construction continued to take place; one house at a time. The installation rate reached over thirty percent in preparation for the upcoming winter.

The mine construction also proceeded without any problems. The shield method prevented any accidents in the process. The workers were originally anxious about it. But now, they felt relieved. They focused on their work.

There was an atmosphere of vitality in the entire fiefdom. The farmers busily plowed the fields, while the soldiers in the engineering corps kept their noses to the grindstone. The women worked hard to keep the men supplied with meals and drinks. Even the children were busy. In spring they used to go capture frogs. This year, the frogs enjoyed peace for the first time in their lives. Instead of chasing frogs, the kids hung around the construction site. Why? To catch a glimpse of Bangul, the summon partner Lloyd conjured for the project.

“Wow! She’s come out!”

They would shout whenever Bangul made a rare appearance. When they cheered and hollered in excitement, Bangul never disappointed their little hearts. Even though she was out there to rest, she knew how to please her fans.

“Bangul! Ba-bangul!”

She’d take a bite of ground nearby. Then she’d release steel turds as she rattled her tail. Each time she did it, the children’s shouting became more excited. That would bring the resting workers out of the mine to shout:

“Kids! Stop causing a fuss near the construction site! How many times do we have to tell you that it’s dangerous out here!”

“No, it’s not! It’s safe here.”

“You brats! If you don’t listen to adults, ants as big as wolves will come to get you.”

“That kind of ant doesn’t exist!”

“Of course they do. Just wander up the mountain. There are many of those beasts in the eastern wasteland.”

“But there aren’t any here.”

“Whoa! Won’t you stop talking back!”

There was great energy and activity every day in the fiefdom. But not for everyone. There was one exception. That was Ppodong.

“Ppodong… Ppo-do-dong…”

I’m bored. Ppodong yawned at length as he thought to himself. I must have slept in. Wait, did I wake up in the morning and fall asleep again?

“Ppo-do-dong…”

He didn’t actually have anything to do even if he did wake up early. That’s how it was for the past few days. Lloyd didn’t take him to the mine. He left him on the estate, advising him to relax and take a break once in a while. The reason was simple. I’m sorry. I don’t have enough sunflower seeds. I think I barely even have enough for Bangul.

In order for Lloyd to mobilize his summons, he needed to feed them red sunflower seeds. That would make them gigantic. But Lloyd had a limited supply. They came in red and blue, and he used one RP each time he bought one of them. That’s why Ppodong was left behind in the mansion.

Lloyd thought Bangul would make a better worker as she could dig tunnels much more safely. “I’m also worried that you might hurt yourself. And the mine is a bit small for you. You can get badly hurt if it collapses. Do you get what I’m saying?”

Lloyd had merely comforted himself. Ppodong was slightly upset. But he knew that he couldn’t complain. Lloyd was sincere when he said those words. So, ever since construction started, Ppodong was unemployed.

“Ppodong… Ppo-do-dong…”

He rolled one way. And then the other way. Resting did feel nice. But it was too boring. There was no one to play with. For the entire day, he did nothing but roll around. First to the left; then to the right. But after twenty days passed, he resolved that he must take action and bring change to his monotonous existence.

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-do-dong!”

He shook his round head, his plump cheeks swinging. He thought to himself that something must be done.

“Ppodong!”

He needed to do something. The boredom would kill him at this rate. So, he made up his mind to go outside. Resolved, he kicked off his handkerchief and lifted himself up. Slowly, but steadily, he slid down the table leg. Then he waddled towards the door. He crawled up and pressed on the doorknob with his body.

Click. The door opened. And he went out of the room into the hallway.

“Ppodong?”

It was his first time going out this far without Lloyd. When he looked down the long hallway, a feeling of adventure and curiosity — not fear — swelled in his heart.

“Ppodong!”

Let's head out first. Ppodong trotted along the hallway. He went down the stairs and followed the maids. Sometime later… Ppodong found himself in the courtyard of the estate.

"Ppo-do-dong…"

The sun felt warm. The smell of grass in the soft wind pleased him. There was also a sweet scent of flowers coming from somewhere. The aroma led his way, and he followed it until he met eyes with someone.

"Oh!"

Ppodong heard the elegant voice of a human above. He looked up to see who it was. It was Baroness Frontera.

"A mouse…?"

"Ppodong?"

"Are you saying that you are not a mouse?"

"Ppodong!" He nodded.

Baroness Frontera, who was tending to her flower garden, removed her soiled gloves.

"I know now. You are my son's huge summon partner. Am I right?"

"Ppodong!"

"But, what led you into this garden?"

"Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong."

"Hmm, I am sorry, but I cannot understand your words. Could it be… that you came to help me?"

"Ppodong?"

“I understand. Just as I thought. Is that right?”

“Ppo-do-dong?” Ppodong tilted his head to one side.

She smiled in satisfaction. “I’m very grateful. I was, in fact, concerned about my garden lately. Some mice have been ruining it badly.”

“Ppodong?”

“They must be your cousins.”

“Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong?”

“If possible, could you go find them? Please send them a message that I would like to keep my flower garden beautiful.”

“Ppodong?”

“Can you do that?”

“Ppodong?”

Ppodong found himself nodding. But the truth was, he wasn’t a cousin to the mice. He wasn’t sure that they would be able to communicate. But her voice and smile felt so warm that he couldn’t deny her. Besides, her request just gave him something to do, and it would ease the boredom he had been feeling.

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong?”

Ppodong stood up, supporting himself on two feet. He pounded his chest with his tiny paws as if to show his trustworthiness. After agreeing to go on this quest for Baroness Frontera, he rushed into the grass and disappeared.

***

Thwack!

“Push!”

Craaack! The energetic command rang loudly in the tunnel. Workers moved quickly, and the torches in the dark tunnel glinted on the sweaty muscles of the workers. They were covered with bulging veins. The steel shield slowly moved forward, and each time it lurched ahead, huge metal walls were placed behind it. The metal walls supported the weight of the tunnel. Nobody in the mine counted the number of metal walls they had built. They simply moved as they were ordered. As the blacksmiths and engineers panted for air, Lloyd yelled out a command.

“All right! Good job! Switch!”

“Switch!”

“On the double. Rest up. Next group, come in now!”

“Now!”

A group of blacksmiths and engineers moved from behind the shield, and they were replaced by another group.

“Master Lloyd, are you alright?” A blacksmith asked.

Lloyd chuckled. “Why? Are you worried?”

“Well, of course…”

“It’s alright. It’s not like I’m working like all of you are.”

“But if you continue staying here in this hot area, without much air…”

“My, my, you’re moving me to tears. Don’t worry about me. Let’s just get to work.” Lloyd waved him aside. The blacksmith turned and moved away. Lloyd was not fine. I’m burning. The mine was hot inside. It wasn’t just warm. The place felt like a sauna. There was also barely any ventilation.

None of this surprised Lloyd, however. The area of excavation sat at the far end of the mine. The blind end. The temperature underground was naturally higher than on land. There was also the heat coming from the workers’ bodies. Additionally, proper ventilation was out of the question as well.

If there was better technology, I'd have come up with a more efficient ventilation system. The construction of the tunnels hugely depended on ventilation. It directly correlated with the workers' safety. It wasn't good to breathe in large amounts of dust, but a lack of oxygen in an enclosed area could become a life-threatening situation. Knowing all this, Lloyd opted to create a makeshift ventilation system.

"Hey! Get your feet off the oxygen pipe," Lloyd shouted sharply. A soldier stepped back in shock, realizing that he had been stepping on a metal pipe as thick as an arm. The pipe served as the only channel to bring in oxygen from outside.

We're holding up because at least we have that. The pipe was connected to the outside of the mine, where several workers operated a lever nonstop. The lever spun a pinwheel, sending air into the pipe to the end where they were.

"You could have created a hole in the pipe! You may not notice it now, but if you create a hole in the pipe, the air is going to get thinner as we go down. There would be no more fresh air coming in. Got that? Watch where you step."

"I… I'm sorry."

"Tsk. Forget it. Let's get to work."

"Y-yes!"

The stuffy and oppressive environment made Lloyd irritable. But he didn't have the luxury to take breaks outside as the others did. I need to supervise the project all the time. He had a long list of things to check.

First on the list was the course of the mine. He needed to make sure that the shield was burrowing in the right direction, that is, toward the layer where coal was located. Thankfully, I have detailed records of the previous baron. He had paid a great sum to hire wizards and conduct a geographical investigation of the place, meticulously recording the seam of coal they had found then. They made setting the path much easier. However, he had much more to watch out for.

Dozens of dangers we cannot see lurk underground. Like groundwater or a layer of methane gas. Hit the wrong area, and the underground water could flood the entire tunnel. A layer of methane gas was worse. It was flammable, so it could cause an explosion.

We'd be completely done for. This was the scariest part of the coal mining project.

Coal fed on methoxylated aromatic compounds, breeding methane bacteria that create methane gas. Because of the methane produced by the microorganisms, gas layers inevitably lurked in coal mines.

So, I can't let my guard down for even a second. Lloyd needed to use his surveying skill at least three times a day. What lay ahead needed to be checked on a regular basis. Aside from that, Lloyd had to stay vigilant to watch out for any tail voids between the moving shield and the metal walls.

It can happen because the shield has a larger diameter than the metal wall. The diameter between the advancing shield and the metal walls built did have a slight difference. So that difference would cause the land to sink a little after the shield traveled forward. The difference was merely a couple of inches, but it had the potential to wreak havoc and bury everyone alive. It wasn't something to overlook.

Like I'd let that happen. The scorching heat. The murky air. Lloyd fought to stay focused in the midst of it all. He removed his soaked shirt and sweated in the heat. When he got dizzy, he put his mouth down to the ventilation pipe and inhaled some fresh air. The construction continued like this for several days. The tunnel grew longer, getting closer to the coal he was aiming for.

Just a little more. He struggled to relieve the stress that piled on with the hot and murky air around him. Each morning he woke up, his body felt like it weighed a ton. Everything would be all right if he just endured it for a little bit more. This was not an unfamiliar situation for Lloyd.

It was even worse back then! Compared to the days he spent in his single dorm room in Korea, this felt heavenly. Back there, he could hardly sleep. In the afternoon, his nose bled in the lecture rooms. At night, the same thing happened during his part-time jobs because of sheer exhaustion. But there was more. He had to squeeze in some time to finish a pile of school assignments. The easiest way to make a few more hours in the day was to sleep less.

He cut down his sleep time one hour after another. Sleep deprivation and fatigue became routine. Like a zombie on the verge of collapse, he studied and worked day and night.

But right now, I can eat to my heart's content and get a good night's sleep. It's only hard during the actual construction time. The food quality was incomparably better here than during his days as a student.

All I had was the free rice and kimchi the dormitory offered! These memories straightened out his attitude. He never wanted to go back to those days. He resolved every day to make this fiefdom more prosperous. That determination and resolve became the drive that kept the construction going without pause.

As the days progressed, Bangul and the workers became more proficient. The construction was picking up its pace. And finally, many days later, Lloyd's surveying skill led to the seam of coal.

It finally appeared. Just sixteen feet from their base awaited a rich black bed of coal. Treasure from underground… Coal.

"All right, we're almost there! Let's go!"

"Let's go!"

"Bangul!"

Lloyd shouted in excitement. The workers and Bangul cheered with him. Even the usually calm Javier shouted with the rest. Everyone felt it. The difficult digging was nearing its end.

They could finally see the light at the end of the tunnel.

“Bba-bangul!”

Bangul gobbled up one more chunk of soil right before the coal bed.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 24: Beasts of the Underground (2)

“Bangul!”

Chomp! Bangul opened her mouth wide and ate a large chunk of soil in one big bite. And there it was. Something black filled the space where the soil had been. Up until right now, Bangul had been chomping on nothing but dirt. Occasionally, gray rocks appeared stuck in the soil. But this was different.

“It’s bituminous coal. Hey, Bangul. Stop!” Lloyd quickly ordered his summon partner. At last, the seam of coal appeared before them. This meant everything in the walls of the mine was precious coal. It was too valuable for Bangul to eat.

“The important part of our job starts now. Everyone stay focused.”

He calmed down the workers, who were about to let out a cheer of excitement. Disasters and accidents would take place the second they let their guard down. That moment would have been now if everyone let loose just before reaching their goal. Reassuring himself that now was the time to focus, Lloyd quickly told everyone, “We’re not done yet. We just made it to the threshold of the coal deposit. We can cheer later. The celebration can happen once we make this score. Okay? So, good job everyone. Time to change shifts and tell the guys to bring the support pillars.”

They needed to start careful excavation work now. Lloyd sent out the exhausted workers and called in a fresh crew. While he was waiting for them to come down, he held a blue sunflower seed out to Bangul.

“Hey, Bangul?”

“Bangul!”

“Yes, you did a very good job. I mean it when I say that. We couldn’t have dug down this far so quickly without you.”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

“Haha, okay. I’ll feed you something good once we go back up. But right now, will you be happy with this?”

“Bangul!”

He put the blue sunflower seed in her mouth. Bangul happily swallowed it. Gulp! Three seconds later, Bangul became small again.

“Bangul!”

“All right! Good job. Thank you.” He took her in his arms. The new workers finally arrived, carrying support pillars over their shoulders.

“As you can all see, we finally found the coal. This is the most important part. We’re going to expand this end of the mine along the seam of coal. It’s a dangerous job, so you have to follow my instructions carefully. Am I clear?”

Everyone nodded.

Lloyd activated his intermediate surveying skill.

Measure. Crackle! A faint light flashed before his eyes. Then, information about the mine and the coal appeared as he looked around.

Thankfully, the ground near the coal is firm. We can do without the shield, and the place won’t collapse. The coal seam is stretched to… okay, this way. Lloyd turned around and faced the workers. “Okay, so we’ll dismantle the shield. As slowly and carefully as possible.”

The shield was no longer needed, but they couldn’t push it up to the ground. So, the only available option was to dismantle it back to its component parts.

“Okay, grab that part. Two, three, pull!”

Clunk! Lloyd ordered, and the workers moved. One by one, they disassembled the shield.

By the time they were almost done with it, Lloyd shouted, “Bring the support pillars!”

Three workers who were waiting for his command jumped to their feet right away. They carried the support pillars and the upper and lower planks over their shoulders and headed into the blind end of the mine. The planks and pillars were set up where the shield had been installed seconds ago. The makeshift device was meant to prevent the blind end from collapsing.

“Let’s get started with the reinforcement work. Don’t forget what we practiced!”

“Yes, sir!”

Everyone worked together like parts of a machine. They shoveled along the walls. The end of the tunnel was widened. Temporary supporting planks and pillars were installed. They worked to secure more mining space.

Meanwhile, Lloyd continued surveying. He kept an eye on the walls and ceiling at all times for signs of crumbling. They would have to evacuate everyone if they should collapse. Fortunately, the work proceeded without a hitch or any hints of a cave-in.

It’s done. The most difficult part was over. It was time to call it a day. And if they continued the reinforcement work tomorrow? At this pace, they would be able to mine the coal starting next month. “Whew.” At last, he relaxed with relief. The worn-out and sweaty faces of the workers brightened. The mine was dug out at last.

“All right, you guys did a good job. Let’s go up. Tonight, we’re going to party. There’ll be meat, booze, and a hefty bonus.”

Work hard, play hard. That was Lloyd’s motto. Such a principle was already known to the workers who had been with Lloyd for many months now.

“Woah! It’ll be a good bonus this time too, right?”

“Where should I spend all that money?

“Wait for me, Rosalia. Your brother will pay for all your tuition!”

Digging the mine was more difficult than any other project. The heated flooring system and road paving were nothing compared to this. So that meant the bonus for this job would be larger. This put a big smile on everyone’s face. They sashayed around as they arranged the tools. Their hearts felt lighter as if they were already out of the mine.

But, just at that happy moment…

Thud.

There was a faint sound coming from the coal seam. Lloyd turned toward the source of the sound. What was that? Rocks falling?

And then another…

Thud…!

This time, the sound was louder.

Lloyd looked down at the ground, but there were no fallen rocks. And the thudding noise came again from the other end of the coal seam. What is that? Something felt odd. He felt something was seriously wrong. No sound should have been coming from there.

By reflex, Lloyd activated his survey skill. Measure. Crackle! He studied the coal deposit, and his eyes widened in surprise. What?

Lloyd saw a cave about ten feet away. It wasn’t there before. The cave, which was about six feet wide, was getting bigger as he watched. What the…!? Is something collapsing? No. Nothing’s sinking. Lloyd realized that something was burrowing a hole in his direction. Whatever it was, it was digging fast.

Whip!

The mysterious burrower popped its head out.

It was a gigantic ant. Its head was twice as big as a watermelon. Its elongated mandibles extended longer than a human arm.

“What? Argh!”

Lloyd fell down on his butt as he hurriedly backed away. Lucky that he did.

Clack! The ant swooped ahead and snapped its mandibles shut right in front of Lloyd; so close that it almost touched his nose. Its mandibles — as sharp as sawblades — glistened in the torchlight.

If it bites me, it’s taking an arm or a leg off… or two, for sure… A chill ran down his spine.

“What is that?! Why is there an ant here?!”

“Ackkk!”

Panic-stricken shouts erupted from the workers. They were terrified by the sudden appearance of the ant and the sheer size of it. It was as big as a wolf. They had no time to stop and think about that. Lloyd fumbled around on the ground, trying to grab anything that would help. He managed to grab his pure steel shovel. Lifting it up high, he swung it in the direction of the ant.

Wham!

The sharp head of the shovel dug into the side of the ant’s head.

“Kieek!”

The stricken ant shrieked. It shook its head in pain. A transparent fluid spurted out of its head and splattered all over Lloyd’s face. The spray snapped him out of his trance.

“Everybody, run!” He yelled by instinct. The petrified workers rushed toward the entrance of the mine. Lloyd tried to get on his feet, but the ant didn’t let him.

“Skreee!”

Now, clearly pissed off by the attack, the ant hurtled toward Lloyd. Its mandibles opened again, aimed straight at Lloyd’s neck. Lloyd was still rooted to the ground.

Argh!

Lloyd was desperate to avoid its counterstrike, but he was in no position to do so. He could feel the danger drawing closer, the mandibles inching forward to chop his head off.

Damn.

Just then.

Slash!

He saw a flash of silver light above his head.

Swish! Swoosh!

The fierce mandibles got sliced off.

Wham!

Another silver flash dove deep into its forehead. The sword penetrated the ant’s head, the blade driven into the ground like a nail. As the sword twisted, the crunching sound of the ant’s head shattering to pieces followed.

“Skreee!”

After some wriggling, the ant hung limp. Lloyd saw the sword being pulled out of the monstrous ant, and someone offered a hand in his direction.

“Are you okay, young master?”

The firm calloused palm. The calm and composed expression. It was Javier. He was holding out his hand. Lloyd quickly grabbed it and sprang to his feet.

“What in the world is that?!”

“I don’t know, but…”

“But?”

“I speculate that they are the beast ants that inhabit the wilderness across the mountain range.”

“Beast ants? What are they doing here?”

Lloyd was seriously baffled. Supposedly, these giant ants lived in the eastern wilderness across the mountain range. So it made no sense for them to show up underground. The whole thing didn’t make any sense.

“The ant cave must have expanded underground near this area without our knowledge. If that’s not the case…”

“Well?”

Just then, another giant ant climbed out of the coal hole. As soon as it laid its compound eyes on the two, it charged toward them, swinging its thick antennae like baseball bats.

“They must have heard us tunneling and snuck up in their own holes to attack us.”

Whack!

Javier’s sword swung in a flash of silver once again. The ant’s head was split in half vertically. However, there was another one right behind it. Lloyd suddenly realized that the ants would continue to come out of the hole one after another in an endless stream.

“Aw, shit.”

Javier’s second assumption sounded plausible. When I first discovered the seam of coal a while ago, I didn’t see any caves behind it. He was certain. He had used the surveying skill to keep a close eye on their surroundings. There wasn’t any sign of ant caves. It was only later that he discovered the ant cave and the giant ants.

What should I do? This took him by surprise. It stung that he didn’t prepare for this. There wasn’t any record of ant caves in the former baron’s records. I should’ve been more careful and prepared for it. He did know that preparing for undocumented circumstances hardly sounded plausible. It was an impossible job, but regardless of that, this happened. So, he needed to find a solution.

Do we need to stop them here? The confusion and fatigue. The stifling heat. He frantically racked his brain. There was only one thing he was certain of. If the ants get out of the mine, we’re done for. The exit led to the fiefdom, and disaster was inevitable if the ants crawled out of the mine.

The soldiers wouldn’t be able to protect the place. The sheer number of ants made it impossible. Worst-case scenario, the entire place gets wiped out. The situation would get completely out of hand.

I can’t let that happen. The mere thought of it caused him to sweat. But Javier seemed to have misread Lloyd.

“Master Lloyd, pull yourself together.”

Pop! Javier softly punched Lloyd in the gut, winding him.

“Ack…!” Lloyd panted for air. Javier probably meant to give a light tap, but the surprise punch hurt a lot.

“Hey, what was that for?!”

“You cannot let fear get to you in situations like these.”

“I’m not scared! I was just thinking about what I should do next!”

“Then, please give me a solution.”

Swish! Crack! Even while Javier was fending off the army of ants, he was calmly responding to his young master. Javier wasn’t out of breath in the slightest. Each time he swung, Javier either split or chopped off an ant’s head. But his upper torso was thoroughly soaked in sweat. Having already removed his shirt, his sweaty muscles shone against the light.

This is bad. Yes, it’s Javier, but he still has his limits. Lloyd knew this by instinct. Javier was strong, of course. But the place they were stuck at was the blind end of the mine with crippling ventilation. Even Javier would eventually reach his limit as he fought endlessly with an army of angry ants.

I need to come up with a solution while he is still holding up. How should I block the ants without leading them to the barony in the least damaging way possible? Should I just collapse the mine? No, that’s impossible. The metal walls are too robust, and damaging the structure in one or two places would barely do anything. Besides, the ants dig way too fast even if I succeed in destroying the mine. Lloyd shook his head.

One wrong move and everyone could get wiped out by the colony of giant ants. This won’t work with a half-assed plan. I need something to firmly block the ants and get rid of them in one blow… Eh? Hold on. Then a solution hit him.

Lloyd lifted his head. He looked at Javier, shouting, “Hey! Javier! Do you think you could break through them?”

“Break through?” Swoosh! “ I do not understand what you mean,” Javier said as he sliced off a charging ant’s antennae in one clean sweep.

Lloyd shouted. “Of course, you know! Breaking through these ants and charging ahead! Can you do it?!”

“Charge through these ants?”

“Yes.”

Javier turned to look at Lloyd. His face silently told him to stop spouting nonsense when he was busy enough fighting ants.

This time, Lloyd shouted more nonchalantly. “I think it’s the only way to save everyone and stop these ants! Can’t believe it? Or scared? Run away if you’re scared!”

“Are you insinuating that I am scared?”

“Of course.”

“Such misunderstanding is not welcome.”

“So? Can you do it?”

“Of course. But break through them? How far?”

“Right into the ant’s nest!”

“Wait, into it? Until the end?”

“Yes.”

“Do you have a plan in mind?”

“Sure thing! I’ve got a brilliant plan! What? Can’t trust me?”

“No need to ask such an obvious question.”

“Hey! Really? Now’s not the time…”

“I pray that your brilliant method is not something insane.”

It appeared he made a resolution. Or it could be that he resigned and realized he had no other choice but to obey Lloyd. Crack! The grip around his sword tightened. His voice grew more menacing.

“Make sure that you stay close behind me. Do not wander and get lost.”

Javier’s blade flashed in such a lethal manner that it looked like his sword was brewing a storm.

Swish! Slash! Slash!

Lloyd admired the glimmering sword that danced in Javier’s hands. Five ants rushing toward them got sliced into pieces. Javier jumped in between them. His movement reminded Lloyd of a silvery beast. Lloyd ran after his knight with a torch and steel shovel in his hands.

“Run! Don’t stop!”

In a split second, he entered the inner part of the ant nest, beyond the hole in the coal seam. Thankfully, the colony of ants didn’t crawl up toward the entrance of the mine. Instead, they turned around and pursued the human intruders. Javier and Lloyd sliced and chopped down the ants that blocked their way. They ran without stopping into the ant nest.

“Continue running down!”

Lloyd obsessively scanned the ant cave with his survey skill as he ran.

This is the only solution right now. I must give it a try no matter what.

There was only one thing Lloyd was looking for: the methane gas layer deep in the ant cave.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 25: Beasts of the Underground (3)

“My lord! W-we have a serious problem!!”

The baron had been enjoying the afternoon sun when he was rudely interrupted. A soldier burst into his office unannounced bearing startling news. The baron dropped his teacup, which tumbled onto the floor.

Kee-rash! Clink, clink, clink.

“What…?” The baron’s face turned pale as a sheet. “Tell me that again. Did you just say ants? Giant ants?”

“Yes, my lord. Giant beast ants appeared in Master Lloyd‘s mine.”

“Where is Lloyd?”

“The workers said that he chose to stay behind and told everyone else to flee…”

“Is he alone?”

“No. Sir Asrahan is with him.” The soldier’s face became tearful after he gave his report. Everyone in the room had heard about the beast ants that lived beyond the eastern mountain range. Those creatures instilled fear in the land. Every single ant had the strength and savagery of a wolf. And they came in great numbers. They were without fear and moved in force. To confront the creatures was to guarantee your own death. The chances of surviving an encounter with them where they burrow underground were slim to none.

“Sir Bayern has mobilized the soldiers and assembled them at the mine entrance. He is ready to seal the mine.”

That was the best they could do. If the ant colony left the mine, they would wipe out everything in their path. The villagers would be massacred. The people and livestock would be turned into meat dumplings stuffing. If you were lucky, you would be paralyzed and taken alive to be put away in storage. At least you'd have a chance. Otherwise, you would become a hearty meal for little ant babies. So, to prevent such a disaster from unfolding, the mine had to be shut down. The baron, however, remained silent after hearing this plan.

"My lord? Sir Bayern has told me to receive orders from you, my lord…"

Nervous and confused, the soldier glanced at his lord. The baron remained silent for some time. Seconds later, he sprang to his feet and opened the armoire in his office. He began to put on the armor that was kept inside.

"My lord?" The soldier called, but the baron did not respond. The only sound in the office came from clanking metal armor.

Clack! Click!

He put a steel-studded brigandine on his chest and silvery poleyn knee guards. The baron strapped demi-greaves over his shins and placed a bascinet on his head. Next, he strapped an iron-framed shield onto his back and hung a well-worn long sword at his hip. He was clearly preparing for battle.

The soldier watched his lord suiting up while he wore a befuddled expression, as surely the baron had not carried a sword in at least the last decade.

"My lord? What…"

"Let us go."

"Excuse me?"

"I shall leave you behind if you do not follow me."

Slam! The baron rushed out of the office, almost kicking open the door. He ran down the stairs and headed to the stable and hopped onto a horse.

"Go!" He prodded the flanks of the horse.

At that moment, the baron was preoccupied with only one concern. W*ait for me just a little longer Lloyd. You must hang in there!* He rushed to the mine at a gallop, with his heart growing more desperate each second.

***

Thwaaack! Slash!

Javier leaped up off the ground and swung his sword through the air. He aimed to drop right on top of an ant's head. Whack!

"Skreee!"

Another giant ant dead, its head split in half. The scream was accompanied by a spray of translucent liquid that spattered out in all directions. Before the effluvium could splash on the ground his sword was already aimed at his next target. The blade shone with a cool light.

Swoosh! Clatter! Stab!

Javier slashed an ant's side and twisted the blade in its thorax. He kicked the abdomen aside and deflected an incoming attack. He stabbed, slashed, and swung his sword. As soon as the sword slashed down on one it was thrust forward towards another ant.

One slash on the left, another on the right. Slice the upper left and stab the side. And a blow to the head? Lloyd clucked his tongue as he ran through the narrow mine. He was impressed. He couldn't help it. Javier was charging forward two steps ahead, and he couldn't help but praise the swordsmanship on display in front of him.

Dang. He's amazing. That's the skill of a true knight. Sir Neumann was nothing compared to Javier. His movements flowed like a river, each and every step unhindered and free. But at the same time, each strike was fatal. There were small movements that his eyes couldn't keep up with. His sword flashed for several seconds, masterfully attacking, and deceiving his opponent in a series of impressive maneuvers. In short, Javier's swordsmanship bordered on art. The wild ant hoards were slashed away with his elegant, yet powerful sword strikes.

“Hey! Aren’t you getting tired?” Lloyd yelled as he followed behind.

Javier glanced behind as he fought. “I am tired.” He answered in a calm and monotonal voice.

No one would be able to tell he was tired from his voice alone. But Lloyd knew. We don’t have much time. Sure, Javier was strong, but he was still just human. He had his limits. No one could fight forever. Had Javier reached the level of a sword master, the endless circulation of mana would have kept him strong and robust no matter what. But he wasn’t there yet. Right now, the Asrahan Core Technique was only slowing down his fatigue. But that would eventually reach its limit too.

“Master Lloyd, when is your brilliant plan going to kick in?” Slash! Javier inquired as he sliced an ant blocking the way into three pieces.

Lloyd frowned. “Not yet!”

“When will it start?”

“I don’t know. I’m trying my best to look for it!”

“Look for it…?”

“Hush! Keep clearing the way. The more we move, the greater our chance of survival!” Lloyd shouted with some irritation. It was true. Even now, Lloyd was pushing his surveying skill to its limit. He had been scanning the cave without stopping for a second. He was scanning frantically to find the methane gas layer that was hidden somewhere below the ant nest.

I’m sure it’s here. This area is dotted with bituminous coal. Methane gas is bound to be here. Lloyd kept running. With Javier taking the lead, Lloyd sprinted around the ant cave. He scanned everywhere, keeping the skill range to a minimum. After a while of frantic and desperate scanning, Lloyd finally caught sight of something.

Found it! He caught a slight amount of methane gas beneath the ground. It wasn't the main reserve of gas. Just a small stream of it. But I can't get full access from here. A sixteen-foot-wide layer of soil and rock sat between the cave and the gas. It would take more than a month to dig that deep with his shovel. Bangul was not an option, since the cave was too small for her to grow large.

"Javier! Over there!" Lloyd pointed at a passageway that ran in the direction of the methane gas layer.

"From now on, run wherever I point. Okay?!"

"I understand. But…"

"But?"

"Will we make it out alive?" Javier glared at Lloyd as he calmly sliced open an ant. His look signaled he was ready to die here.

Lloyd found himself chuckling when he saw Javier's look of dire resolve. "What? You're scared?"

"I am not scared, but…"

"Then?"

"I think it is a bit unfair."

"That you might die here?"

"No."

"What, did you hide a stash of porn under your bed or something? Are you scared that people might find them after you're gone?"

"Of course not. To be fully honest…" Javier sighed at length. "I do not like how I am going to die with a man like you."

"Wow."

“It’s my selfish desire as a knight. I personally believe that the most honorable death a knight can encounter is sacrificing his life for someone more respectable and worthy.”

“Ha-ha… So, you think it sucks that you will perish side by side with a hooligan like me?”

“That is perfectly correct.”

“Yeah? Look at you; speaking so shamelessly.”

“Well, what is the good of hiding it when we are both bound to perish here?”

“So, you’re showing your true colors, yeah?”

“I said it because I thought I should be honest about it at least once before I die.”

Clatter! Thwack! Slash!

The colony of ants kept charging in their direction. The soldier ants stood guarding the nest, trying to stop Lloyd and Javier from moving forward. Each time they did so, Javier chopped them up. Lloyd was panting for air as he followed. With his torch and steel shovel, he kept back the colony that was chasing them. And so, they used their bodies to fight the ants. Just as they used their mouths to quarrel with each other.

“Ha! Fine! We might as well have a heart-to-heart talk since we’re about to die anyway!”

“Heart-to-heart talk?”

“Yeah! Let’s forget our rank and just talk honestly. Woah!”

“I like that. Hah!”

Clang! Slash!

Both ran into the left passageway. Javier swung his sword while Lloyd held up his torch and wielded his shovel. Their bickering continued. Naturally, Lloyd shouted first.

“I’ll start then. You’re so annoying!”

“How so?”

“You’re too good-looking!”

“But I was born with this face.”

“Yes, exactly!”

“Are you done?”

“What if I’m not?”

“I will simply get my turn. It would be unfair to only get insulted one-sidedly like this.”

“Oh, yeah? Saving time?”

“Yes.”

“That’s good for you because time is gold, my friend. Although, of course, you don’t have either of those things! You’re crying? Huh? Why are you letting my words beat you up?”

“For a second, I pitied you.”

“Wait, why?”

“Come to think of it, my nipples are more good-looking than you.”

“What…?”

That blow was stronger than he expected. He clenched his teeth and struck back. “Ha! But how come you never had a girlfriend with that face of yours?”

“I devoted all of my time to swordsmanship training.”

“A-ha, so that’s why you’ve been single all this time?”

“The same goes for you, Master Lloyd.”

“What?!”

“From what I know, you have always been single. As for me…”

“What?”

“I have received a fair amount of love letters from women.”

“What? Love letters?”

“Yes.”

Javier swung his sword. Lloyd witnessed Javier’s eyes brimming with confidence.

Lloyd deflected an ant’s strike and asked, “How many times?”

“Uhm, I have about two cartons of them.”

“Liar!”

“I am telling the truth.”

“No way! We’re a small fiefdom. You would have to have received a letter from all the women in the land to collect that amount.”

“Heh.”

“Hey, don’t look down on me for being single!”

Master Lloyd, your girlfriend lives in a nation called the imagination.”

Lloyd attempted to hide a grimace.

“You are single by choice, right? Someone else’s choice, that is.”

Lloyd glared at Javier.

“Are you going to meet your imaginary girlfriend in your dreams tonight?”

“You son of a… Stop there!” Lloyd shouted.

But it wasn’t because he was out of comebacks. No. They had finally arrived at their destination. Javier must have noticed it too, as his look changed.

“Are we here?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd looked around them. He could see into the ground below them, and there was an empty space as wide as five feet. But it was not empty. That’s the methane gas layer. It’s so huge. The area he saw with his skill was only the tip of the iceberg. There surely was more down there. Lloyd spat out his plan.

“I’m going to burrow into the ground here. While I do that, you protect me.”

“Understood.”

They shared the same miserable fate, and they only had each other right now. They didn’t have a reason or need to doubt the other person. Lloyd began frantically shoveling the ground. Javier protected him from the incoming ants.

Just then…

“Skreee!”

Something terrifying screeched at the other end of the passageway. The entire cave rumbled as it approached. It finally revealed itself. The head was twice as big as the giant soldier ants', and its body almost filled the passageway. Its mandibles were as long and sharp as a longsword.

The queen ant? It appeared so. However, Lloyd didn't care much about her appearance. I'm not going after the queen ant!

This wasn't one of the battle arena video games where you have to behead the boss to win. Even if he were to capture the queen, the rest of the ants would barely budge. Worse case, it would just fire them up more. So, the best course of action was to focus on his original plan.

"You need to properly block her! Until I'm done digging!"

"Understood."

Javier raised his long sword. He guarded Lloyd from the ant queen. This must have angered her because she charged straight toward Javier.

"Skreee!!"

Thud! Thud! Thud!

The queen ant's body was larger than the narrow passageway, but she pushed herself to widen the tunnel and attack Javier. But he stood his ground, not taking one step back.

"Ohm.." He steadied his breathing.

Each time he breathed in, the mana around him fluttered. It rumbled and focused on him. It came together to form a triple circle. The mana increased and flowed out.

Slash! Clang!

The triple circle long sword. The mandibles of the ginormous insect. The two weapons clashed forcibly. The first encounter ended in a draw.

Clang! Clang!

“Skreee?”

Javier’s long sword and ant queen possessed the same amount of strength. Javier’s eyes squinted in a penetrating glare. The ant queen twitched its antennae. The two manifested equal amounts of devastating power. Both were taken aback by the strength of their enemy.

But the ant struck first.

“Skreee!”

Whoosh!

Its huge antennae were thicker and longer than softball bats.

Javier ducked to avoid the blow. Using the momentum, he lifted his sword. The ant deflected the blow with her head. And so began the battle between Javier and the ant queen. The two went all out in their attacks, using every skill and offensive technique they could employ. They blocked and swung forward. They kicked and punched. They hacked and shoved. They got shoved and struck back. They dodged and attacked. They rolled and dashed. Victory, however, was leaning in favor of the ant as the fight carried on.

He’s getting tired! Lloyd’s shoveling sped up. He was tired as well, but he considered his burden nothing compared to Javier, who was fighting for his life.

Just some more! A little more! If Javier fainted, it was over for him. With him gone, the plan would fail. The beast ants would reach the surface.

Crap! I shouldn’t have constructed the mine to be so solid! It was too late to demolish the mine. Even if he tried, it would barely be effective. The mine would collapse only in parts, and that wasn’t enough to stop the ants.

Thus, I must succeed. Lloyd became more earnest in his shoveling. Dirt was scattered in all directions every time he moved his shovel. Streams of sweat flowed down his neck and back. At last, he succeeded in digging out the desired spot. Yes!

Pshhh! A plume of methane gas spurted out of the hole he'd just dug. Lloyd hurriedly grabbed his shovel and shouted to Javier, "Hey! Come over here!"

Javier responded right away. With one powerful slash, he protected himself against the queen and rushed to Lloyd's side.

Lloyd waited until Javier started to run to him. And they began to run toward the opposite passageway together.

The ant queen chased fiercely after them.

Lloyd turned around and made eye contact with the ant. At that moment he laughed and hurled the torch toward the ant. It hit her smack in the head. With a thud, the torch bounced off, flying over the back of the ant, and met the invisible methane gas spreading throughout the passageway. Flame and gas danced together, igniting a violent chemical reaction.

Burning methane produces 891 kilojoules of energy per mole of methane molecules. Thought Lloyd… Boom…

Ka-boom!

The massive explosion engulfed everything around it.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 26: Double Circle (1)

Thwomp.

A chunk of dirt fell from the ceiling and onto Lloyd's face.

His itchy eyelids twitched, but he couldn't raise a hand to brush it away. He wanted to shake his head to shift it off, but this proved harder than he thought.

I feel so wasted. But it's not so bad. Everything swirled in front of his eyes. His head felt empty and distant. That probably explains the hallucinations.

What now? It feels like the CGI thingies are getting closer. Someone was in front of him. The glowing mushrooms on the walls lit it softly. Lloyd decided it couldn't be human.

It actually was a human, but Lloyd refused to consider that possibility because of the sheer out-of-the-world handsomeness of the person. Dang, he's too good-looking. Silvery hair and blue eyes. A perfectly symmetrical face, to the point that he looked like a painting. The smudges on his skin hardly affected his beauty. Though his face was peppered with drops of sweat and blobs of dirt, the man looked as handsome as ever. Heck, he even looked charming in a different way because of the dirt. He looked macho. Which stood in stark contrast to his usually noble visage.

Crap. I'm getting annoyed seeing his face. It wasn't fair that a man could be that handsome. His mere existence disrupted the ecosystem. Lloyd was convinced that this guy could not be human. He was a CGI projection that could somehow eat, sleep, talk… Just keep telling yourself it's only human or you will become too self-conscious to continue wanting to live.

"Master… Lloyd, are you okay?"

Don't talk to me, CGI. I'm dizzy. I feel like throwing up.

But CGI Javier lifted his hand, not knowing that an inferiority complex was killing Lloyd on the inside. Then he suddenly slapped Lloyd in the face. Thwack!

“Wake up.” Thwack! “You must not close your eyes here.”

“Stop… Stop right there!” Lloyd said, as his senses very slowly came back to him.

There was an urgency in the way Lloyd said ‘stop’. So, Javier put down his hand before he could slap Lloyd a third time. Now he looked relieved.

“Are you okay, lord?”

“No, not at all. It’s all your fault.”

“Pardon?”

“You’re quite a slapper.”

“Thank you.”

“Wow.”

“Do you think you can get on your feet?”

“I don’t think so. Someone just slapped me with a whole lot of gusto.”

“I was simply doing what was necessary.”

“Yeah, right.”

“Please get to your feet.” Javier held out his hand.

But Lloyd realized that Javier couldn’t help him up. The reason was simple. Javier was sprawled out flat on the ground.

“Hey. Did you hurt your legs?”

“Yes.”

“Which part?”

“I fear I sprained my ankle.” Javier pointed at his injured ankle. Could the pain be severe?

Lloyd noticed that there was cold sweat dripping down Javier’s forehead. “Does it hurt that much? To the point that you can’t stand up?”

“I hurt both of my ankles.”

“A-ha, so when you held out your hand a while ago, was it because you wanted me to help you out of here?”

“Yes.”

What a shameless brat! “What do you think I am, a taxi service?”

“What’s a ‘taxi’?”

“Well, it’s a thing. Never mind. Hold on for a second.”

Lloyd studied the condition of his little party. Javier injured both of his legs. Bangul passed out in his arms. But Lloyd was fine, without any major fractures or wounds. He was in perfect condition… apart from the many scrapes and bruises all over his body that ached like hell. This freaking hurts so bad. His entire body was a big ball of pain.

It was like the morning after a hellish workout with an overly enthusiastic physical trainer with intimidating musculature. He felt exhausted, as though he had been thrown into a washing machine that ran all day. Quite literally every muscle and joint in his body ached. I think even my armpit hairs ache! It’s a miracle that I survived this.

Lloyd looked around his surroundings with the help of the glowing mushrooms that sprouted throughout the tunnel. The first thing that caught his attention was the ruined pathway. Next, he noticed the shredded pieces of the ant queen scattered around.

That’s when it dawned on him… How had they managed to survive the explosion? The ant queen acted as a shield, saving us all. The methane gas exploded behind them. However, the ant queen stood between the raging fire and the two of them.

The gigantic ant was big enough to cover the entire pathway. Her sheer size saved us, like a cork that stops a champagne bottle from popping. Her ginormous body acted as the cork and took the brunt of the explosion. Thankfully, that dispersed the flames. If she wasn’t there, all of them would be dead.

We were lucky. It goes without saying what would’ve happened if most of the explosion wasn’t blocked by that ant. They would have been scorched to ashes. The torn-apart remains of the ant queen made that apparent. The blast must have been terrifying, really. I mean, that ant survived even when Javier harnessed all his powers into the sword and hit her.

A chill ran down his spine. Shaking the goosebumps away, Lloyd said, “Let’s get moving right away. We’re gonna die here if we stick around.” Luck had saved them from the blast. But it was too soon for them to let their guard down. The grim situation was as gloomy as it was before the explosion.

“Do you think the ants on the other side are dead?” Javier looked back and examined the crumbled tunnel as he got back on his feet with Lloyd’s support.

Lloyd nodded his head. “Probably.” It had to literally be hell where the explosion started. The beast ants would have surely burned to death in the fire. And any ants that managed to survive? “Most of the tunnel should have collapsed. They were probably buried alive under the weight of the dirt. Those that survived somehow would obviously be dying due to lack of oxygen.”

The ant nest ran all through the coal deposit. The fire must have started there, producing a large volume of toxic gas. And the ants seemed to have died while surrounded by the terrible heat and fumes.

“You can comfortably assume that the ants on the other side have been exterminated.”

Even with modern technology, fire, and explosions are a terrifying prospect for workers underground. Regardless of advanced safety precautions and systems, workers died every year on construction sites. Giant ants were no exception. A huge gas fire would suck up all the oxygen, making it impossible for the ants to survive.

“Anyway, let’s evacuate. Here we go. Aargh!”

It was time for them to leave the site alive. Lloyd flexed his arm which supported Javier and helped lift him up. Then, he turned around quickly, bent over, and said, “Ride on my back.”

“Excuse me?”

“I’ll give you a piggyback ride.”

“Thank you.”

“Wow.”

Javier immediately climbed on him without any hesitation. Once he rested comfortably on Lloyd’s back, he tilted his head to the side and asked, “Master Lloyd, did you…”

“What?”

“Did you think that I would hesitate?”

“Yes, out of courtesy.” It was the truth. Lloyd expected that Javier would refuse once or twice. He even prepared a typical response such as any man would give, “I hate doing this for a grownup.” But Lloyd failed to predict that Javier was a brash and thick-skinned man.

“You made a wise decision. It is reasonable. This allows more mobility than supporting me with both of your arms.”

“Hey, I think you’re mistaken to think that I’d definitely take you out of here.”

“Are you going to leave me here then?”

“That depends on how you behave.”

“But I am already on your back.”

“And you’re ridiculously heavy. Why are you so heavy when you look so thin and scrawny? It turned out that Javier weighed way more than Lloyd had expected. All the muscles in Javier’s body made Lloyd feel like he was carrying a huge bale of iron.

“It could be that you have poor stamina. Not that I am heavy,” Javier said.

“Woah, you’re seriously making me want to throw you off and leave here alone.”

“I will not let go of you.”

“What are you, a leech?” Lloyd huffed.

“I bet you never saw a leech as handsome as me.” Javier smiled.

“God bless you with your brazenness. Now you’re just bragging.”

“I shall lend you my mana.”

“Yeah, I’m so thankful. Should I be grateful to you for patronizing my taxi service? I might as well bend over backward for you,” Lloyd answered.

“You mentioned the ‘taxi’ a while ago. But now, what does bend over backward mean? How do you do that?”

“Oh, never mind. Just make sure that you hold me tight.”

“Will do.”

Lloyd kept moving as he bickered with Javier. But he was already exhausted. Every time he got tired, Javier blew his mana into Lloyd. He was giving him the mana of a high-level sword expert through the triple circle Asrahan Core Technique. It had a tremendous effect. Each time Javier fueled Lloyd with mana, he felt like a tractor, all fueled up and ready to go plow the fields.

“Huff! My strength is growing nicely! Huff! Huff!”

“Do you want some more?”

“Oh my, your precious mana being poured into a shabby body like mine. Shut up and give me more. Come on. I’m just seconds away from collapsing. No joke.”

“I understand. But may I remind you that the technique gets less effective when you talk and breathe at the same time? It makes your breathing uneven, eventually draining your energy. Let’s drop the small talk.”

“You want me to shut up and just walk? No way. Huff!”

Thwack!

“Ouch! What was that for?”

“Giddyap.”

“I’ll seriously throw you off…”

Prattling and bickering like that, they used each other to mutual benefit. Javier was using Lloyd for transportation while Lloyd was using Javier as a fueling station. And the chattering worked to comfort them both.

If I was stuck down here alone, I’d have lost my marbles. Lloyd shuddered at the thought, his shoulders trembling. They were hundreds of feet below the surface. Even the fires from the explosion had dissipated. The only source of light was the glowing mushrooms that grew along the walls. If Lloyd was all alone with no one to talk to, fear would have eaten him alive. He realized later that carrying Javier piggyback had a generous payoff.

A message dinged in front of him.

Ding Dong.

[Javier Asrahan is very grateful for what you are doing for him.]

[Javier Asrahan is developing feelings of trust for you for the first time.]

[Your approval rating with Javier Asrahan has increased by six points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -14]

[You have earned 108 RP by improving relationships with main characters.]

[Current RP: 157]

Still carrying Javier on his back and shoulders, Lloyd glanced over his shoulder and chuckled. “You scamp, are you grateful?”

“What do you mean?”

“Never mind. Hey, I think I’m starting to see a familiar path.”

“I see it too.”

Thankfully, the path that led aboveground could be found easily. The countless battles with the giant ants left breadcrumbs; making a trail they could follow. They saw the sliced and severed body parts of the ants on the ground. Lloyd simply needed to follow the bits of dead ants. A familiar route started to appear, filling them with hope. Their hearts began to brighten. That is until they saw that the tunnel had collapsed and the path was blocked.

“Hmm.”

Lloyd wondered if the explosion caused this. He wiped the sweat off his forehead and studied the blocked path. He used the surveying skill to find out what was on the other side. But he didn’t see any open space beyond the sixteen-foot limit. This meant that he had to burrow at least sixteen feet to make it out to the other side. Sixteen feet? Could be 160 for all I know. If that were the case, it'd be faster for him to find another path than to stick with this one.

Lloyd whipped around. They didn't have much time. I gotta hurry…

Just then.

Rumble! Rumble!

A booming sound rang out. The entire cave shook. A gust of sand blew in his direction. But instead of running away from it, he jumped into it. And there, he saw the path behind them had completely collapsed. This meant only one thing.

"Are we seriously trapped in here?"

"It appears so." He couldn't laugh it off this time. Lloyd looked down at Javier. Then he studied the collapsed path behind them. It was as thick as the one in front. He saw nothing beyond sixteen feet. We're screwed.

They were completely trapped. Lloyd's heart pounded. He was losing hope. The dire worst-case scenario he yearned to avoid had happened. How long can we survive here?

Lloyd quickly read the space he was doomed in. It was small. Barely a couple dozen square feet. They would run out of oxygen soon. I say thirty minutes? Maybe less.

After that, oxygen would grow scarce in the place. That meant the end for both of them. But Lloyd couldn't just stand still. He brought out Bangul and handed her to Javier.

"Can you please wake her up? Slap her or something. Okay? We need her right now."

"Will do."

Javier seemed to have understood the situation as he took the snake-like animal without any complaints.

Lloyd racked his brain for a solution. It's a do-or-die situation. There's nowhere else to go.

Everything would end if he gave up here. He needed to try his best, using every means possible. He had 157 RP in his hands right now, and the time had come for him to employ it to maximum effect.

Lloyd opened up his skill window.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 27: Double Circle (2)

Lloyd was trapped inside a collapsed tunnel with only about thirty minutes of air. Now there was no going back. He opened his skill window.

[Loading skill window.]

I need to do everything I can. Lloyd's eyes moved rapidly. He selected a menu that caught his interest: "Develop Special Skills."

[Searching abilities for skill development.]

Yes, it works. Lloyd clenched his fists. He remembered the time he opened the skill window after earning some RP from Javier. He clearly recalled every word in the message that guided him through it. There was a message that said I can spend RP to develop special skills…

He was right. It allowed his abilities and knowledge to be turned into skills. That's how he was able to develop surveying and designing skills. They came from the civil engineering he learned in college.

There was more. He had upgraded his shoveling experience into a special skill. The long years of doing part-time jobs and shoveling until numb turned out to have benefits too. The system considered shoveling as one of his abilities and advanced it into a skill. This means that the same thing could happen with other abilities.

Lloyd had no doubt that the skills he needed most right now could be upgraded from the experience he already had.

Just as Lloyd wished, a new message popped up.

[Log of special skills that can be developed:

Absorbing mana from surroundings.

Processing absorbed mana.

Amplification of absorbed mana.]

[These skills can be combined into the skill “Asrahan Core Technique.”]

[RP needed for skill development = 15]

Yes! It was just as he had expected. The result could not be any better. Without hesitation, he invested fifteen RP.

Ding Dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique has been developed.]

[Skill Name: The Asrahan Core Technique.]

[Stage: Single Circle Level 5]

[The skill absorbs the mana around you. Absorbed mana is processed or amplified into the circle produced around your heart. The higher the number of circles, the higher the amplification rate.]

[Mana amplified to: 120%]

[Required RP to level up: 10]

[Current RP: 142]

Great! The result was as desired. Asrahan Core Technique was now a skill he possessed. And even better, he wasn’t starting at skill-level one. He was at level five… much higher than expected. It’s probably because of all the practice I did. He had trained quite hard. He had used it in an actual fight during his duel with Sir Neumann.

After that, he used every chance he had to train in the technique. It seemed his efforts were paying off. He wasn’t going to be satisfied getting just that far. If that had been enough, I wouldn’t have to use my precious RP. The skill didn’t improve his technique at all. The ability to absorb, process, and amplify mana makes a difference.

Now he could make more drastic changes, thanks to his technique turning into skills. I don't have to train and practice anymore. With just some RP investment, I can make vast improvements. That was the biggest difference. Lloyd invested more RP in the Asrahan Core Technique.

[Skill Level Up!]

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Single Circle Level 6]

[Mana amplified to: 125%]

[Required RP to level up: 15]

[Current RP: 132]

One level up and his mana was amplified by another 5 percent. All right. Not bad. Lloyd added the numbers in his head. Each level-up required an additional five RP over the previous one. What would happen if he exhausted all his RP? I'd easily go over level ten for the single circle, and if my calculations are correct, I could turn that up to eleven. It's a close call, but still possible.

It was a gamble regardless. He would fail if the system consumed more than five RP for each level up. However, he wouldn't know until he tried. Plus, he didn't have time to hesitate right now. It's all or nothing! Lloyd must invest all the RP he had to level up.

His Asrahan Core Technique levels soared through the roof.

From level six to seven…

From level nine to ten…

At last, after draining every last bit of RP, the message he hoped to read appeared.

Ding Dong.

[Skill Class Level Up!]

Success! Lloyd clenched his fists again. Just as he expected, one level up from level ten increased his skill class. To his great relief, he did not come up short on RP in the process. He read through the message that popped up in front of him.

[Your Asrahan Core Technique class has been increased to <Double>.]

[Skill options have been made available following your change in skill class.]

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Double Circle Level 1]

[Mana amplified to: 200%]

[Skill Option 1: Energizer - Utilizes the double circle to its maximum efficiency. Allows ten minutes of movement without fatigue. (Limit: Can only be used once per day.)]

[Skill Option 2: Latent Power Surge - Drives the amplification of the circle to the farthest limit. Mana amplification is tripled for 20 seconds. However, after one use, you will be drained of all energy, and you will not be able to use the Asrahan Core Technique for a day. (Limit: Can only be used once per day.)]

[Required RP to level up: 100]

[Current RP: 7]

Thud! Thud!

When Lloyd was almost finished reading the skill description, his heart thumped twice. A strange and powerful sensation gripped his chest.

Crackle…

The single circle he had created before floated perpendicular to a new circle he created. From the front, it looked like his heart was being wrapped in a cross. The new circle started to rotate. Z*iiing!*

“Whew!”

The two circles rotated in harmony. New energy rushed through his blood vessels, waking every single cell in his body. Lloyd sucked in a deep breath unexpectedly. He was overwhelmed by this awesomeness. A gentle smile spread across his face.

It’s done. It was amazing. He was doubtful of the explanation of skills. But now — as his body underwent a thoroughly extraordinary transformation — he realized the power of the double circle.

Up until a little while ago, he was extremely exhausted. But now he didn’t feel a trace of fatigue. In fact, his entire body had been revitalized with energy that wasn’t there earlier. This vigor and vitality were on a different level from what he felt with the single circle. Good job, Lloyd. You modified the Asrahan Core Technique into a skill.

Lloyd wanted to gain two things by turning the technique he had practiced into a skill.

One was rapid growth. As soon as it became a skill, he could use his RP to level up and get better. If he was lucky, he could shorten months and years of work and training to a few minutes or hours. His assumptions had been right on the mark.

Second was more skill options following the upgrade in class. Lloyd had already raised the class of survey and design skills before. He had a lot of fun at the time with the skill options he had gained. And he thought the same could happen with Asrahan Core Technique. Once the skill leveled up and reached double circle, he assumed he would be rewarded with corresponding options. This assumption proved to be correct as well.

The options were amazing. The first one transformed him into an energizer that provided him with inexhaustible power for ten minutes once a day. The second one granted him a burst of explosive power for twenty seconds. These options are extremely useful right now. Okay, let’s try them out.

Crack! Lloyd grabbed his steel shovel. And remembered why he spent all his RP to deal with this situation. To clear a path and get out of here. Like this!

Bang! His shovel flew with a sonic boom. Lloyd energetically dug through the gravel that blocked the cave entrance. He shoveled out hunks of earth with an unmatched force.

Swoosh! Thwack! Thwip! Whack! His forearms bulged from the effort.

A little more! Don't stop! The frantic shoveling stirred up a storm around the place. This was shoveling far beyond what was normally possible. He ferociously dug out huge rocks and chunks of earth, each shovelful removing a bucket-sized hole. He tore through it faster than a starving man eating his first meal in a week.

Thwack! Squash! Smack!

I'm not getting tired! This is great! Lloyd had already activated the energizer, which was the first option. It worked just as promised. He didn't tire, no matter how much he dug. No signs of sweat or heavy breathing. Despite the constant shoveling, the double circles amply retained the mana amplified around the heart. He transferred the mana into his shovel. His shoveling grew even more powerful and precise.

I shouldn't dig like an animal. This place could collapse again. The tunnel had already caved in from the methane gas blast. Any more pressure could make it crumble down again. So, even though Lloyd's shoveling was rough, it was measured. Fierce but careful. Fast but gentle.

It was all the product of his many years of shoveling. It was a good thing that I went down to the job center whenever I needed some money. Lloyd had been praised countless times for his shoveling. In the military. On construction sites. Back in that other world, all that experience digging was what helped him out the most right now.

That was practically my major. Moving cement around with a shovel. Most other Korean guys who were in the military or worked construction had probably done the job before at least once. First, mix the sand and cement and stack a mound of them up. Then, hollow out a hole in the center. Pour the correct amount of water into it. Finally, you break down the mix surrounding the hole with your shovel and quickly combine it with the water. It was crucial to maintain strict shovel control and keep the water in the mix, not letting any spill outside. This was Lloyd's special shovel training. I can't believe I'm doing this right now!

Thwack! Crack! Whack!

He had dug into the wall of rubble countless times. The shovel moved and plunged like it was Lloyd's third hand. He adjusted the intensity and placement with precision. It was strong when he scraped and dug the earth and delicate when he scooped and skimmed. When he turned it over and stabbed, he was fast and smooth. Each movement worked in harmony. The integrity of the tunnel walls remained intact even though Lloyd excavated it at awe-stirring speed. Over a hundred feet, he kept on digging… So, please…! Come on! Show yourself! He was now five minutes in using the energizer skill. Lloyd bit his lip in anxiety.

Digging up a storm, he used the surveying skill at the same time. He could see fifteen feet ahead of him in the path he was making. But there was still no sign of hope.

Fifteen feet.

There was nothing but earth. Making matters worse, the air was slowly growing murky.

I won't even be able to use Bangul. There wasn't enough room for Bangul to turn gigantic. He also feared she would consume all the oxygen in the tunnel. Giving her a red seed was out of the question. Lloyd clenched his teeth.

I need to do this by myself. The future looked bleak, but he couldn't stop now. There would be nothing but despair if he did. He started digging even more relentlessly.

Thwack! Thwack! Crack! Whack! The excavation expanded. It had gone from eighteen to twenty-one feet.

Just then…

Huh? Lloyd noticed something straight ahead. It was a space as small as a fist. Could it be…?

Wham! Thwack! Lloyd sped up his shoveling. He advanced faster. Each time he took a step forward, the space fifteen feet ahead of him grew larger. It started at just the size of a fist. Then it grew to the size of a watermelon. Then to the size of a barrel. Finally, he could see the whole width of the passage they had drilled. Found it! The tunnel stood right in front of him — fully intact — just fourteen feet away.

“Javier!” Lloyd shouted. “Follow me! If you can’t walk, crawl!” His head started pounding. He started seeing double. Symptoms of hypoxia. He was running out of oxygen.

I don’t have much time. He was feeling drowsy. Soon, he would lose consciousness. He’d drift off to sleep, slowly suffocating to death. Hypoxia. Anoxia. All the air gone. Fade to black.

Every time drowsiness clawed at him to drag him down he bit his lip and moved his shovel. A little more. Just a little more! Just about nine feet more. He didn’t even have to dig out the entire wall. Just a small hole. As small as a fist. Big enough to let the oxygen in. That was their shot at survival.

Ding, Dong!

[Energizer has reached its ten-minute time limit.]

Ten minutes were over already. As soon as the message appeared, he lost all strength. The fatigue was devastating. A thorough assault on mind and body. No, it can’t end here.

There wasn’t much left. Just a little more. Even as he struggled against the drowsiness from lack of oxygen, Lloyd’s eyes suddenly flew open. Latent Power Surge!

Ding Dong.

[Asrahan Core Technique skill option, Latent Power Surge, has been activated.]

[Amplification of the double circle is active up to the maximum limit.]

[Mana amplification rate has been tripled for 20 seconds.]

[Mana amplified to: 600%]

Fwoosh! Thwack!

No more careful shoveling. Like a ferocious beast clawing its way out of a trap, Lloyd stabbed, scooped, scraped, and dug away the dirt in front of him. He was getting very close to the intact part of the original tunnel, which was their only way out.

Crack! Smack! Thwack! Six feet… Four feet… Three feet… Two… He forced his way forward for survival. And at last, the only obstacle that stood before him was a one-foot-wide wall of dirt.

[Latent Power Surge has reached its 20-second time limit.]

[A consequence of activating the option is complete exhaustion.]

Clunk! He suddenly became weak. The shovel slipped out of his hands. His knees buckled. He tried to force his eyes open, but it was no use.

Shit. He held out his hand to grab the shovel. I’m almost there. It’s right in front of my eyes. I dug about thirty-six feet in ten minutes. I just need to take one more step. Is this how I die?

Lloyd was frustrated. Lloyd was also sorry. And Lloyd felt way more wretched when he looked at Javier, who was lying sprawled out on the ground, unconscious. I shouldn't have dragged him into this. A bitter smile escaped him. And sleepiness slowly crept in.

That's when he started hearing things.

"Ppodong!"

"Eh…?"

But something was off. The sound was too clear to be a hallucination. Mustering the last shred of strength he had, Lloyd lifted his head. And… P-Pop! That hole the size of a fist he so desperately wished for suddenly appeared in front of him. A hole made by a hamster the size of a fist, who poked his head through and said…

"Ppodong!"

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 28: Double Circle (3)

“Ppodong!”

A hole appeared in the wall in front of Lloyd. Ppodong stuck his head out of it and smiled at Lloyd, who had collapsed just in front of the wall. Lloyd called out in utter disbelief.

“Ppodong…?”

“Ppodong!”

“Is that really you?”

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong?”

Ppodong nodded eagerly and began his tale of recent events.

***

While Lloyd was engrossed in mine excavation, Ppodong had been bored to death. Since Bangul was helping out on that job, Ppodong was left with nothing to do and spent his days just goofing around in his room. He liked it at first, but the boredom started to feel wretchedly dull. After a few days, the boredom became unbearable and Ppodong walked out of Lloyd’s room to wander around the estate.

On his journey, he bumped into Lloyd’s mother, who was tending to the flowers in her garden. With a warm welcome, she said, “I’m very grateful. I was, in fact, concerned about my garden lately since some mice have been causing trouble. They must be your cousins; could you go find them? Please tell them to stop, that I would like to keep my flower garden beautiful. Can you do that, Ppodong?”

Ppodong accepted right away since he had nothing else to do anyway. Excited and bolstered by this new mission, he rushed into the grass. After Ppodong scavenged the estate and its surroundings for some time, he spotted the group of mice and met the chief. Ppodong made what he thought was a quite decent offer to the chief.

“Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong?”

He proposed that the mice clan stay away from the baroness’s flower garden.

But the chief of the mice said, “Squeak! Squeak? Squeak, squeak!”

The chief did not understand Ppodong at all.

Due to the language barrier between the two of them, the deal collapsed and that triggered a war between the mice and the hamsters. It was Ppodong that waged war and bravely charged forth. Every time he saw them in the garden, he pressed and bounced and rammed the mice family.

The mice went berserk every time Ppodong laid into them, scattering in fear from the terrifying hamster. Today was unlike any other as Ppodong pursued the chief mouse, but he was proving to be faster than Ppodong expected.

The chief mouse just barely escaped Ppodong’s reach every time. Their chase led them through the flower garden, its entrance, the village, and the foot of the mountain until they ultimately found themselves in the mines. Before he knew it, Ppodong had entered the mine and had reached the ant cave.

“Ppodong?”

Ppodong didn’t know where he had ended up. Plus, he lost the mice and prepared to turn back. Ppodong would have returned home if he didn’t hear a familiar voice nearby just then.

“Hah! Whew!”

Technically speaking, it wasn’t a voice but a gasp. Still, Ppodong recognized the owner of the pained vocalization right away.

“Ppodong!”

It was the same guy who summoned him into this world and took him under his wing. It was Lloyd.

“Ppodong? Ppo-do-dong!” Ppodong had exclaimed in pure hamster joy, but Lloyd did not answer and simply panted for air somewhere nearby. His breathing was followed by the sound of shoveling.

“Ppodong?”

Ppodong cocked his head to the side and thought, Lloyd must be digging up the ground somewhere! I can help him then!

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

Standing still, Ppodong intensely studied where the sound was coming from. Lloyd was near… He’s on the other side of where I was standing!

As his little paws swiftly dug at the earth in Lloyd’s direction, his chubby little hamster butt swayed each time the wall of earth thinned down. Just as his tiny paws began to sweat, Ppdong poked his head through the wall of dirt and reached Lloyd at last.

“Is that really you?”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong casually waddled over to Lloyd and rubbed his backside against him. It was when Lloyd could even smell Ppodong’s unique hamster scent that he became convinced Ppodong was real.

“Woah, how did you end up here?” What a pleasant surprise. I thought we were going to die in here. The drowsiness was slowly fading away thanks to the small hole that Ppodong made, which was letting in fresh air.

The headache is still there, but… This place still lacks oxygen. Although it was better than nothing, the small hole worked only to prevent the situation from becoming a disaster. It’s better than dying, Lloyd thought as he wriggled his fingers. He was grateful that they moved at all when he wanted them to.

“Hey, Ppodong? I have a favor to ask you.”

“Ppodong?”

“Can you bite my nose? I need to wake up.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“It’s all right. That won’t kill me.”

“Ppodong?”

“I mean it. Come on.”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong climbed on Lloyd’s shoulder. He stood on his hind legs and placed his front paws against Lloyd’s cheek and promptly bit his nose.

“Ppodong!”

“Ack!”

The pain stung more than he thought it would, causing his body to shudder in response. But the pain successfully jostled him out of the numbing stupor.

“Y-yes… Th-thank you!”

Lloyd flashed a smile at Ppodong, who flashed the high-five sign back at Lloyd as he stood up on the human’s shoulders. After some struggle, Lloyd got to the wall on all fours. Once he took several gulps of air through the small hole in the wall, his mind cleared. I need to save that guy as well. Lloyd turned around and crawled back to Javier, who was several feet away from him.

Javier was knocked out cold b. But he was still breathing. With immense effort, Lloyd dragged him to the air hole. Grabbing him by the collar, Lloyd lifted his body and brought his face near the hole. A few seconds later, the color in his pale face returned. Okay, time to get out. The place seemed ready to collapse at any time. With heightened urgency, Lloyd struggled to get to his feet and picked the steel shovel up off the ground.

He could not use the Asrahan Core Technique anymore, due to the penalty imposed on him for using the surge of latent power. But he had some physical strength left in his body. He stabbed the wall with his shovel in one feeble motion. Stab.

The shovel merely dug into one centimeter of dirt, but that was enough. Lloyd leaned over and pressed his body against the shovel.

Thud… Pushed forward by the weight of his body, the shovel dug deeper, slowly and gradually, until the dirt wall started to give way.

Thwack! The shovel suddenly burst through. It finally penetrated the foot-thick wall. It worked! Lloyd flexed his muscles and leaned forward a little more. The pressure of his weight turned into a weapon.

Crash! He pushed at the wall with his shoulder and pressed against it with his entire weight. Finally, the wall crumbled.

“Whew!”

It got him covered in dirt, but he didn’t care. Air rushed into his lungs as he took another deep breath, much more than what he barely got from the tiny hole. He felt invigorated.

“Can you please open your eyes now?” Lloyd grumbled as he again carried Javier on piggyback who felt heavier now for some reason. He wondered if it was because Javier was passed out, or because of his own exhaustion. Nonetheless, Lloyd ambled toward the exit. I need to walk slower at a time like this. My steps must be measured. No unnecessary exertion. Gird my loin and thigh. This is how you moved heavy objects when you’re tired. Forcefully tensing your muscles would only lead to faster exhaustion. The heavier the object, the slower you should move. The more tired you were, the more technique you needed to employ.

Back in the days when he visited the job center every morning, Lloyd carried heavy bags of cement and bricks on his back. I even carried tiles and bricks on my back and went up and down four-story apartment units! This is nothing! He clenched his teeth, every synapse of his mind focused on walking. The path toward the exit could be found easily as Ppodong led the way. He simply focused all his heart and mind on each step. One foot in front of the other. Soon he'd be walking out the door.

Sometime later…an unexpected message popped in front of him.

Ding Dong.

[You were able to overcome physical limitations in extreme circumstances through impressive skills of improvisation.]

[This experience is having a strong effect on your Asrahan Core Technique.]

[A new skill option has been opened.]

[Skill Option 3: Power Saving Mode—Even in extreme exhaustion, you can use the Asrahan Core Technique, albeit weakly. Mana amplification rate is fixed at 10 percent in this state.]

Eh? What now? Lloyd blinked in surprise. He had never imagined a skill option like this would be available. Its effect was felt immediately.

Zi-zing! The mana of the double circle, which was dormant due to exhaustion, started to rotate again. The rotation was at 10 percent of usual but that was enough for him. Having suffered from severe fatigue, this bit of mana was enough for him. It was like sweet rain on a dry day.

Mana is being absorbed again! The Asrahan Core Technique was automatically working again, even though he didn't will it. His body absorbed a small portion of mana around the area, causing it to rotate around the circle and nurture various parts of his body. He was revitalized. I can do it! I can get out! His steps became faster and more vigorous. He walked on and on, never stopping, despite having Javier on his back.

Lloyd's surroundings began to change. The number of glowing mushrooms started to lessen. Yet the area didn't get any darker. That was because a swinging torch illuminated the path for Lloyd straight ahead of him.

"Over there! It's Master Lloyd!" Someone shouted, followed by dozens of frantic footsteps. They rushed forward to support him. The baron was among them.

"Are you fine? Are you hurt anywhere?" The baron held Lloyd's face and asked, his voice full of alarm.

Lloyd chuckled.

He wasn't in the right mind to answer the question. I'm alive, he thought as all the pent-up tension in his body began to release. A smile escaped him. His eyelids shut. Hah, it's been a long day. He used to experience this feeling when he was living in the dorms. Overwhelmed by exhaustion, he collapsed in the baron's embrace. This long, hectic ordeal was finally over.

***

Many days later.

Lloyd was still sleeping, and nobody expected that he'd sleep this long. Even after two days, he hadn't opened his eyes. He was perfectly fine, save for some over-stretched muscles and ligaments. He had no signs of sickness, either. After the doctor came to check up on Lloyd, he explained to the baron and baroness that he was simply taking a rest, as his body was suffering from severe fatigue. The baron and baroness were often in his bedroom, so as to stay beside him every moment they were free.

This was especially the case with the baron. He had not hesitated to kill the beast ants, and he led the way to clear the path that led to the underground ant nest. Although he broke his arm in the fight and suffered from a fever, he refused to be bedridden all the time. He rushed to check up on Lloyd. The baroness was just as doting as her husband. She held down the fort while the baron recovered, taking over the responsibilities of the barony. She personally visited the soldiers injured in the fight against the ants, praised their efforts, and supported their recovery.

Meanwhile, a heartwarming rumor slowly spread across the fiefdom.

It was about Lloyd.

The rumor claimed that this formerly quite brutish young master had evacuated the workers when the giant ants appeared. He then stayed behind with Javier to keep everyone safe. As if that wasn't enough, he bravely charged into the ant nest, saving Javier in the process. Many witnesses verified the rumor. They were the evacuated workers and soldiers who saw Lloyd hobbling out with Javier on his back.

The young master had risked his life to protect the people in his lands and never gave up on his loyal knight. The men in the fiefdom raised their fists in respect, the women found their hearts fluttering as they heard of Lloyd's heroism, and the soft-hearted elders wiped tears from their eyes.

When Javier first woke up, the baron and the baroness called to him, and asked what happened down in the tunnels. As the loyal young knight related his story, the couple reacted in shock, regret, and relief.

And everyone waited, hoping sincerely that the young master would regain consciousness and return to good health.

At long last, four days after his rescue, Lloyd did wake up.

[All of Baron Frontera's subjects were deeply moved by your heroic courage and sent their praises.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of Bonus RP.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 29: A Favorable Plan (1)

Ding Dong.

[All of Baron Frontera's subjects were deeply moved by your heroic courage and sent their praises.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 500 RP.]

[Current RP: 507]

Lloyd blinked absentmindedly. He wondered if it was because he had slept for too long. Everything was blurry. No, technically speaking, he was seeing things. Wait, RP? A large amount of bonus? A whopping 500 RP? Still feeling the grogginess in his head, he read the message. Then, the events that had taken place began to come back to him.

Oh. He remembered the mine construction, the wild ants, the methane gas explosion, the rescue from the dark tunnel, and the hard, painstaking walk with Javier on his back. Everything was slowly returning to him.

I'm alive. He especially recalled the gut-wrenching walk with Javier on his back and how the baron and the group of soldiers arrived to save him. As the backstory of the RP award became clear in his head, he understood the message.

Kekeke. Everyone's praising my accomplishment, eh? This is going great. Very great.

Lloyd was satisfied. He had done his utmost to stay alive, and he managed to survive like a tenacious honeysuckle.

He was now being compensated with a hefty sum of RP. This feels like finding a 50-dollar bill in a jacket pocket after forgetting about it the whole time. Sweet. He fell into a happy reverie. How should I use this? Wait, hold on for a second. You know what? I better save them up instead of splurging it all away. The future was uncertain and the most reliable help he could turn to in contingencies was the richly accumulated RP. He knew this from his personal experience.

What would've happened if Javier's impression of me didn't improve when I got him on my back? He wouldn't have acquired any RP. He would've wasted all his hard-earned RP by failing to turn the Asrahan Core Technique into a skill. I'd have helplessly perished there.

Every strand of hair on his arms stood at the thought. Since RP is my last resort and insurance in dangerous situations, I shouldn't waste any and should save some for later.

Lloyd shook off his jitters, then slightly turned and froze.

He spoke. "Hey, what are you doing there?"

"I am watching you, Master Lloyd."

Lloyd asked a question and Javier answered it. After that, a heavy silence fell over them.

Just like any other time, Lloyd was the one to speak first.

"No, I mean, since when were you sitting over there like a statue and watching me?"

"Well, if you are inquiring about the time, I say about three hours."

"Three hours?"

"Yes, I have been like this since I took the shift from the baron after breakfast."

"So are you saying that you've been sitting down there since you ate breakfast?"

"Yes."

“And you’ve been keeping a careful eye on me this whole morning?”

“Yes.”

“Are you a pervert?”

“No, Young Master.”

“Then what are you doing?”

“I was just nursing you, that is all,” Javier explained.

“Nurse me? How so?”

“I was prepared to call someone the moment you stopped breathing in your sleep.”

“I am joking.”

“Ha, it doesn’t sound like one.”

“You are mistaken,” Javier said.

“By the way, how are you?”

“I am doing quite okay.”

Lloyd’s gaze moved down to Javier’s ankles. A smile of satisfaction spread across Javier’s face.

“They are perfectly healed.”

“Already? How long has it been?”

“Four days,” Javier replied.

“What? You mean I was out for four days?” Lloyd’s voice grew high-pitched.

“Yes.”

“And that’s how long it took for your badly sprained ankles to heal completely?”

“Yes.”

“What? Tell me honestly. You were malingering, right?”

“What is malingering?”

“Feigning illness.”

“I have never feigned any illness. Javier retorted in confusion.

The veins in Lloyd’s temples popped out.

“Don’t lie to me. You couldn’t walk at all. You totally looked like you were about to cry. Hm? You whined, saying, ‘Master Lloyd, I cannot walk.’ Don’t you remember? You cried like a baby. Right? That’s why I personally carried you on my back. Was it all an act?”

“Of course not.”

Javier shrugged and in a cynical tone unique to Javier, he blurted,

“It is all thanks to the triple circle’s recuperative powers.”

“Recuperative powers? Triple circle?”

“Yes,” Javier answered.

“Aha. So you are saying that you heal wildly fast because of the triple circle that explodes your mana?”

“That is perfectly correct.”

“Yikes. Now you’re upsetting me. It’s so unfair. My bones ache even now as I speak.”

“Do not get upset,” Javier comforted.

“Why not?”

“Perhaps it would be comforting if you attribute your slow healing to old age.”

“Goodness, are you a rocketman or something? Stop attacking me with the truth.”

“I never attacked you. However...”

“However?”

“I want you to know that I am happy that you are awake.”

“Sure, yes. I’m happy, too, you bastard.”

A chuckle escaped Lloyd. He couldn’t help but feel relieved. The fact that he was alive and Javier was okay relieved him.

He welcomed it very much. Lloyd noticed that the feeling must be mutual for Javier.

“What a relief, really,” Lloyd said as the reality of surviving that horrid and dreadful ant cave finally sank in him.

He slowly rose from his bed feeling relieved. But he couldn’t neglect his job anymore. He had work to do.

***

Lloyd’s body healed very fast. It was the power of the double circle he’d acquired underground. All day long, he used the Asrahan Core Technique whenever he had the chance. He amplified the mana he absorbed with two circles and had it rotate around every part of his body.

The bio-cycle of his somatic cells quickened and so did their recovery period. Within ten days or less, Lloyd’s badly sprained muscles and ligaments had almost completely healed.

On top of his fast healing, there was more good news. The orange foreclosure notices Lloyd saw the first time he arrived in this world were gone now, bugging him no more.

The baron estate was no longer a foreclosed property. It's all thanks to me. Lloyd recalled the story in The Knight of Blood and Iron. If things happened according to the novel, the baron's estate should have been completely empty now because of the early foreclosure.

However, the seizures had been canceled instead. He had worked hard to grow a heated flooring business, and it granted him the money to pay off the interest debt.

I was also able to recover the credit of the barony. What a huge relief. In the novel, the family members of the baron get evicted from the property around this time. The baron and baroness spend days in stupor and despair while Lloyd's drinking streak gets worse to the point that it spins out of control.

None of that was true anymore. The unfair tragedy was being rewritten by Lloyd himself.

So, Lloyd resolved to keep changing the future.

"So move! Stop lazing around because it's getting hot."

Lloyd's voice boomed aloud on the construction site. Time had flown by, and he was already wrapping up the mine construction project. With a tool belt hanging on his waist, he took charge and commanded the workers.

He always oversaw any hard and dangerous jobs. The artisans and civil engineer soldiers put their noses to the grindstone with more zeal and sweated heavily without any complaint.

Now trusting Lloyd all the more, they thought to themselves, The young master puts our lives and safety before his. The foolish little boy they knew was long gone. His past no longer mattered to them. What mattered more was that Lloyd had stayed behind to make sure everyone evacuated safely on the day the wild ants appeared. His sacrifice and devotion left a huge impression on their hearts. Thus, they thought to themselves that such selflessness wasn't a common trait. They could trust someone like him to lead them.

He would be there to protect them even if they fell into danger again. Trust was a powerful thing. Thanks to it, there was an air of vitality in the site.

"Okay, this is the last reinforcement pillar! A little more! Okay, on three! Two! Three!"

"Argh!"

The final stage of construction came to an end at Lloyd's command. The coal mine was completed at last. However, Lloyd wasn't excited about it. He knew that this was just the start. During the dinner celebrating the construction and during the moment he handed a large bonus to everyone, he didn't get their elated emotions to carry him away.

Instead, he calmly thought about his next steps and put them into action.

Don't rush. One step at a time. Now that construction came to an end, it was time to go through safety checks. I have to grind away to pay off the debt! It went without saying that he needed to work hard. The baron's estate had only managed to avoid foreclosure at this time. The money he earned from the heated flooring system was just barely enough to cover the monthly interest.

And I still have the principal debt to pay off. The principal, not the interest, burdened Lloyd very much. He couldn't afford to take any breaks to pay off everything. But at the same time, he couldn't be hasty.

Safety first. Safety above all, In truth, he could simply open up the mine right now if he just wanted to pay off the debt as soon as possible. Recruit miners and educate them — the process behind it was simple. He could start mining for coal right away. Opening now without a thorough safety check would save time and money. However, Lloyd wasn’t interested in the short-term profit.

Sure, I can make some easy money by doing that. However, considering the long-term prospects is especially important for these kinds of projects.

He recalled the countless events he had gone through back when he was in South Korea.

South Korea was a fast-paced country. He couldn’t even dream of having things like safety inspections. Heck, workers were treated like disposable objects. Factories, warehouses, and construction sites...Everywhere was the same.

People get their hands cut in the machines. They fall into the furnace and get electrocuted by the high-voltage wire. Get stuck in a screen door on the train. Boom. Accident. Fix an escalator, and you find a worker sucked into the belt...Tragic accidents make news, and the supervisors and managers make fake promises of more vigilance and shed some tears of guilt. That’s all. Everything’s back to square one once the camera is off. And they fill the empty positions left behind after an accident with new workers. They make them work until someone gets injured again. They don’t care if there’s another accident because they see the workers as replaceable. There’s nothing strange about this. It’s just a tradition. Out with the old and in with the new. Easy and convenient.

It was the dark side of society he painfully felt as he watched the news and lived in poverty,

Such tradition sickened Lloyd to the core. It even bordered on abhorrence. Opening up the mine may make me happy now, but in the long run, I’ll lose the trust of the workers. No one’s going to do a job I give them afterward. On top of that, if an accident occurred the costs for repair would be high. Most importantly, he didn’t like that people would be exposed to such dangers under his management. Therefore, it was necessary to perform a safety check before opening the mine. At least I have the surveying skill with me. It’s very handy. Survey!

Crackle! Lloyd's eyes faintly shone as he meticulously studied the mine. Lloyd meticulously inspected the internal composition and structure of the mine. He checked to see if the geographical composition was stable, the foundation was well-placed, and there weren't any signs of subsidence.

He made a great effort to make sure he scanned every inch of the ground. Once he was done with the mine, he decided to go further in.

"Please do not tell me you will be going into the ant cave again."

The coalbed that rested at the bottom of the mine—Lloyd was making his way there through an opening when Javier asked a question from behind. Lloyd chuckled as he looked back at Javier.

"Yeah, are you scared?"

"No, Young Master. I am curious why you are going in there." However..."

"However?"

"Curious? Why, it's for the safety check."

Lloyd's impassive voice implied that Javier was asking the obvious question.

"The mine we constructed is safer than this place. Sure, everyone knows ants built impressive tunnels, but there was still an explosion here. The foundation was probably weakened. And a large collapse could affect our mine higher up the ground."

Lloyd continued to explain.

"There's more. I need to inspect if there are any leftover methane gas leaks or wild ants that survived wandering around. They could come up and attack the miners. That answers your question, right? Then let's go."

After that, Lloyd entered the ant cave with Javier.

"I still do not understand."

“Really? What part?”

“Why are you risking your own life?”

“You mean why don’t I just assign someone else for the job?”

“Yes.”

Javier tilted his head to the side and said, “I have never heard of any aristocrat personally doing these dangerous jobs.”

“Is it bad for such an aristocrat to exist?”

“Excuse me?”

“I’m just checking to make sure that everything’s safe for my people. Is it that weird?”

“That’s not what I meant. It is reckless but outstanding.”

“Oh, dang. It’s not every day I get a compliment from you.”

“Please be reminded that I said ‘reckless’ before praising you.”

“Don’t be shy. Just compliment me if you want to.”

“No, thank you.”

“Haha, you’re getting soft now.”

“Soft? What is that now?”

“Nothing. Hold on. What’s that over there?”

Their bickering, which took place as they examined the ant cave, came to a halt. Squinting his eyes, Lloyd held out his torch to see what lay straight ahead. Something glimmered on the floor.

“I will check it,” Javier said as he drew his sword and moved forward.

He inspected the area Lloyd pointed out. The glimmering object turned out to be...

“A sword,” Javier announced.

“A sword?”

“Yes.”

Javier picked up the weapon.

“It is not used by humans. It is shoddy and unbalanced. Given the shape of its hilt and damaged shape...I say this belongs to an orc.”

“An orc?” Lloyd repeated in disbelief.

“Yes.”

“What’s an orc’s sword doing here?”

“I am in the dark about that.”

Lloyd was confused. He recalled orcs with pig heads occasionally appearing in The Knight of Blood and Iron. It was a shock to see an orc’s sword was found hundreds and thousands of feet away from the ground.

“Don’t they live in the wilderness across the eastern mountain range?”

“Yes, they do.”

“Hmm...Interesting.”

It could be that an ant just dragged it down here. Thinking that in his head, Lloyd put his worries aside.

“If we keep looking, something might turn up. Let’s get moving,” Lloyd urged.

“Understood.”

With that, they resumed their inspection. The cave was vast and complex. 15 days passed by in a flash as they meticulously studied the cave. On the 16th day...They came across a young orc warrior lying inside storage at the bottom of the ant cave.

“What is this?”

What’s an orc doing here? Dazed, Lloyd studied the orc. Javier was doing the same when he said, “It appears that this one has been captured by the ants. But it seems like he is breathing.”

“What?!” Javier exclaimed in disbelief. “It’s alive? Like a frozen person?”

Javier nodded his head.

“I believe he’s been poisoned.”

Just then, Lloyd recalled the story about the wild ants in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

Yes, right. The wild ants tend to store a portion of their food by paralyzing them alive.

That must have been what happened to the orc, Lloyd thought. Once he confirmed the truth, a new idea dawned on him.

“Hold on...Bingo.”

Just as soon as he checked the orc’s state, Lloyd came up with a surprisingly good plan.

A smile of contentment spread across Lloyd’s face.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 30: A Favorable Plan (2)

“My name is Arosh. I am the thirtieth fortieth fifth descendant of Akash the Great, oink!”

“Thirtieth fortieth fifth descendant?”

“Yes, oink.”

“Do you mean thirty plus forty plus five?”

“No. Forty minus thirty plus five, oink!”

“So you’re the fifteenth descendant, yeah?’

“You calculated that in the blink of an eye. You are a genius, oink!”

Phew. With mixed feelings, Lloyd stared at Arosh, who had just woken up. He thought to himself, Maybe I picked up a fool who doesn’t have a frontal lobe. Or it could be that this orc has only fifteen wrinkles in his brain.

Just then, he recalled the event that happened earlier in the morning. He was exploring the ant cave with Javier, and they were in the last stage of the safety check, which had taken over 16 days to complete.

At last, they arrived at the deepest part of the ant cave, the storage where they found this orc. Surprisingly, he was alive.

“I feel shaky and numb because I slept for a long time. The ant’s paralysis poison hurts too much, oink.”

“Paralysis poison?”

“Yes, oink.”

“Of course, I knew it was paralysis poison.”

Things were starting to piece together in his head. Arosh was stored in a state of suspended animation. The purpose of keeping him alive was obvious. The ants must have stored him here as a source of food by using the paralysis poison. The best way to keep the food fresh was to keep it alive because livestock never spoiled or rotted. Arosh smiled, his sharp fangs sticking out of his mouth.

“My name is Arosh the Reckless. I cannot die when I have not gone through the coming-of-age ceremony, oink.”

“Coming-of-age ceremony?”

“Yes, oink.”

“So you’re a minor?”

“What’s a minor, oink?”

“Minor is...when you’re not an adult yet.”

“I will be accepted as a warrior orc after the coming-of-age ceremony. That’s why I charged into the wild ants’ territory, oink.”

“Wait, your coming-of-age ceremony involves hunting a wild ant?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes, oink.”

Arosh continued to explain.

“It is a tradition that was passed down from our great ancestors. That is, it first started when my grandfather’s father’s father settled in the eastern wilderness, oink.”

“Just say he’s your great-great-grandfather...”

“Anyway, I hunted a lot of wild ants. I punched, slashed, and killed them. I killed ten of them at once ten times. But I got too excited, oink.”

“So?” Lloyd asked.

“I wanted to become the greatest warrior after killing the queen ant. So I headed into the ant cave, oink.”

“You rushed to the ant cave? On purpose? Alone?”

“Of course. A warrior fears not being alone, oink.”

“You’re nuts.”

The story made it clear to Lloyd how this orc ended up in the ants and became a lump of juicy meat. He got carried away by the adrenaline rush and threw himself into the ants. He fought until the ants circled around and wore him out. Eventually, the poison paralyzed him.

Lloyd chuckled. We have good luck. Both the orc that got rescued and me who rescued him.

He called to mind the event that took place here a while ago. As soon as Lloyd confirmed that the orc was alive, he carried the orc into his room. The estate went berserk as a result.

The maids, who saw the orc for the first time, almost blacked out in fear. The baron rushed into Lloyd’s room as soon as he heard the news. Still donned in pajamas, the baron’s face turned pale as a sheet.

“Lloyd, what are you doing?”

“I’m inheriting the throne...No, as you can see, I brought an orc here.”

“Yes, but why?”

“Because I have a plan in mind. First, take a glass of cold water.”

Lloyd responded calmly to ensure that the baron would relax.

“I found him while I was exploring the ant cave. Saving this orc would be greatly beneficial to the fiefdom someday.”

“Beneficial? What do you mean?”

“As far as my knowledge allows, orcs are brave warriors, and they’re very strict when it comes to returning the favors and exacting revenge.”

It was true. Lloyd knew because he had read it in The Knight of Blood and Iron several times.

“I have heard of their character very well. But still, is this a good idea?”

“Yes. Even if this orc wakes up and throws a massive fit, Javier can easily subdue him.”

It took quite an effort for Lloyd to convince the baron that everything would be all right.

Lloyd laid Arosh on the bed and called the physician. Thankfully, the doctor came up with the diagnosis right away.

“Hmm...Given his blue nails, he must have been poisoned by the wild ants to be stored away to be eaten later. Give him this, and he will awake soon.”

“What is this?”

“The powder is made of dried and grounded tanaria leaves. It’s perfect for treating paralysis.”

Lloyd gave the orc the medicine. The physician was right. It worked very well. Within ten minutes of taking the medicine, Arosh stirred awake and opened his eyes.

“Anyway, thank you. If you didn’t take me out of there, I could have been eaten by the ants, oink.”

“Right? You’re thankful, right?”

“Yes, you are my lifesaver, oink.”

“Then you should return the favor for saving your life, right?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, oink!”

“So is this the time for me to say what I want?”

He’s falling for it. Lloyd’s voice turned sly and Arosh nodded enthusiastically.

“Of course. Anything you want, human! Oink!”

“I need about 120 male orcs who can work in the mine for us.”

Lloyd cut to the chase right away as if he had been waiting for the moment. He didn’t beat around the bush. This was the reason why he saved Arosh in the first place.

Orcs were strong as they had great stamina and were powerful. Since they were brave and bold, they didn’t fear jumping into dangerous situations. In short, orcs were as good as dwarfs when it came to tiresome mine work.

This is why I saved you. Why do you think I’d carry you all the way here if it weren’t for that?

He saved the orc for that reason and to make the orc indebted. Lloyd spoke of what he wanted but against his expectations, Arosh looked suspicious. He even avoided Lloyd’s gaze.

“Hey?” Lloyd asked.

“I thought you wanted me to say anything I want.”

Lloyd tilted his head in confusion with a nonchalant expression. Arosh avoided Lloyd’s gaze again by rolling his eyes to the side.

“Mister?”

“Mister Orc, will you please look me in the eyes?”

“Oink. That is...difficult, oink?”

“Difficult? What is?”

“Human, I am thankful for being saved. I will do anything to return the favor. But what you asked for just now is of a different nature, oink.”

“How is it different?”

“You’re not a warrior, oink.”

“So?” Lloyd asked.

“Anyone who is not a warrior cannot make orders to orcs. You are not qualified to do that, oink.”

Arosh’s face was filled with embarrassment to the point that he started to get flushed. With his whole heart, Arosh said, “I am sorry, human. I don’t think I can answer your request, oink.”

He was sincere. Arosh knew that this human named Lloyd had saved his life. He could have ended up as a piece of meat to the wild ants, but he saw the light of the day thanks to the human. He wanted to pay him back and wanted to give anything he asked for. Orc warriors didn’t hesitate to sacrifice their life to return a favor. This was their dignity and honor, so Arosh’s heart swelled with regret. He wanted to give what Lloyd wanted, but it was out of his control.

“Wait, do you mean that I cannot command your brothers because I’m not a warrior?”

“Yes, oink.”

“What do I have to do to get accepted as a warrior from your people?”

“You must go through a coming-of-age ceremony. The same one as us. Your accomplishments also need to be recognized by the chief, oink.”

“Really?”

A smile spread across Lloyd’s face. Raising his chin, he asked, “I think I am qualified.”

“What, oink?”

“Yeah. The coming-of-age ceremony? It’s about hunting the wild ants, no?”

“Yes, oink.”

“Well, then, can you look at that first?” Lloyd spoke as he lifted his hand.

He pointed at a corner of the room with his thumb, and Arosh moved his gaze. From Lloyd’s shoulder to the bedside wall...His gaze finally arrived at the wall. An item was hanging there.

“It’s the head of the queen. I thought I should hang it on the wall as a trophy. How is that?”

“Oink...?”

Arosh’s mouth hung wide open in surprise. The head hanging on the wall belonged to the queen.It wasn’t fake. His tribe had battled against wild ants since the beginning of their existence. There was no way he wouldn’t recognize them, let alone the queen ant!

“How did you, oink?”

“What do you mean, how? I hunted and hung it there.”

Lloyd lightly grinned as what he said was half true and half false. He did kill the queen by using the methane gas explosion, but he technically didn’t kill it after fighting it firsthand.

Lloyd flicked his lips several times. Putting on a thick face, he said, “But you see...There’s something interesting about how I killed it. Do you know what it is?”

“What is it, oink?”

“The queen didn’t have much strength left in her when I fought her.”

Lloyd’s voice turned sly.

“It was worn out as if she had already fought someone else. That’s when I came across a sword in the area. Javier?”

Lloyd turned around and Javier, who was standing still behind Lloyd, silently held up a sword. It was the sword they had found while investigating the ant cave. Arosh’s eyes widened in surprise.

“Oink? That’s my sword, oink?”

“Right? I knew it.”

Lloyd smiled meaningfully.

“Now, things are starting to come together in my head. Can you guess who drained the queen before fighting me?”

“Is it me, oink?”

“Yes, that’s it. You’re smart.”

Lloyd brightly smiled. Of course, Lloyd was lying through his teeth. The sword was discovered in an area with zero relevance to the queen, but the truth hardly mattered here.

What matters is for him to believe it. He lied because he wanted to make this deal successful. Making a deal with the orc was all that mattered to Lloyd. However, it didn’t mean that he was free from criticism. Lloyd endured Javier's piercing and judgmental gaze, branding him as a swindler.

But once again, it didn’t matter.

“Think for a second. Did you see any ant that was unusually larger than the others?” Lloyd asked.

“Oink...Argh...”

“I suppose you didn’t have the time to take a good look at them because you were too focused on fighting, no?”

“Yes, oink.”

“Let me tell you, there was a big one. Here’s the proof.”

Lloyd took the knife from Javier and handed it to Arosh.

“Here, this sword is the proof. The queen ant was drained because of you.”

“So what are you saying, human? Oink.”

“Why, I am saying that I cannot take the full credit for catching the queen.”

“Wait a minute, oink?”

“Yes, yes. We hunted it together. The queen ant died. In your hands and mine. We caught her.”

“Joint effort. Joint production. Joint copyright. Whew, these are such beautiful words. Aren’t they?”

“Then...Oink.”

“Let’s just say we killed it together,” Lloyd announced, his words as sharp as a nail.

“Technically speaking, you failed the coming-of-age ceremony. After all, you didn’t make it to the village on time. You can return now, but they’ll treat you like a loser. You know that, right?”

“Oink?”

“But just imagine right now you holding this giant head as you enter the village. Can you picture it?”

“Awesome, no?”

Gulp. Arosh loudly swallowed. Just thinking about it excited him. Countless orcs went through the coming-of-age ceremony, but no one had ever caught the queen before. So, if he arrived at the village with her head in his hand, he would make history and get the attention of all the lady orcs.

Not only that, he would be respected by all of the orc warriors. Lloyd continued to speak. He said just the right words. It was as if his words were scratching the itchy areas in the orc's body.

"Think about it. What's there to lose? And we're not tricking anyone. It's just a fact. I wouldn't have gotten the queen if it weren't for you. Right?"

"So...Oink."

"Yes, so stand up straight. You're one impressive orc."

"Oink!"

"Great. Look at you. That's better. So, can you do what I asked?"

"What you asked? Oink?"

"Hey, we teamed up to hunt that queen ant down. So what you need to do is for you to take me to your village and get me approved by your chief. Once that's through, send me one hundred and twenty orcs to our fiefdom."

"And I would...Oink..."

"You would be the warrior who passed the coming-of-age ceremony with flying colors. And what's even better is that you can return the favor you owe me. Everyone will be happy. How do you like that?"

Arosh stared at Lloyd. This human was grinning at him, had saved him from dying, and had eyes that looked kind and gentle. He was also making a suggestion Arosh was so grateful for.

Arosh decided what he must do.

“Okay, human! I am a warrior who never thinks lightly of someone’s kindness. I will do my best so you can earn the warrior title, oink!”

Arosh, young and naive, held out his thick and chubby hands. Lloyd took it and gave a hard shake. Of course, Arosh didn’t know anything. He didn’t notice the agitated smile of the man behind Lloyd. He never imagined that Lloyd was gently smiling because he was able to scam this gigantic buffoon. Just like that, Lloyd’s plan to hire the best miners to work for free in the newly completed mine was drawing close.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 31: Muscle Loss Prevention Facility (1)

“Father, oink!”

Sprint! Arosh marched toward his father, and his worm-like veins wriggled with each step he took. The ground shook as his muscular legs, which were as thick as a lamp post, hit the floor. Lloyd was reminded of a wild hog in Ural Mountain as he watched the big orc run toward his father at an unbelievable speed. Then, Arosh was received by a fiercer and larger orc.

“Son, oink!”

Stomp! Stomp! Stomp! A middle-aged orc ran in his direction. The older orc boasted veins bigger than Arosh’s. His were as thick as snakes and his legs were as thick as utility poles. The ground shook more violently as he ran. His physique was as large as a Russian bear and so, a tiny sandstorm was created around him as he ran toward his son. The two didn’t stop until their bodies collided violently. Crash!

When Lloyd saw the two muscular giants tightly hug each other, he felt sorry for the air particles that were stuck in between them. While Lloyd was looking at them with distaste, the father and son were having a moment as they embraced one another.

“My boy, Arosh! Oink!”

“Father! Oiiink!”

“Are you okay, oink?!”

“I am fine! Waa, oink!!”

“What a relief. But don’t cry, son, oink.”

“Even right now, father, oink?”

“Of course. I fear you will lose more muscle by crying when you have already gotten smaller, oink!!”

“Muscle atrophy, oink!”

“A warrior never lets that happen to his body, right, my son? Oink.”

“Father, you are indeed wise, oink!”

Wise? More like his head is made of dumbbells. Lloyd let out a sigh. He watched the orcs catching up with one another. They were so muscular that Lloyd was sure that they could easily do bench presses, squats, and deadlifts with one-ton weights as a light warm-up.

They were obsessed with muscle. Even right now, their conversation revolved around building up muscle mass. Lloyd remembered how The Knight of Blood and Iron described the orcs as muscular fools. The author was right for calling them that. He scoffed. The sight of the two orcs called to mind the event that had taken place fifteen days ago.

***

“Are you sure the plan will work?”

“Yes, probably.”

Lloyd nodded his head. He lifted the kettle and poured the fresh tea into the baron’s cup.

“Just like I have told you, Arosh trusts me completely. He considers me his lifesaver. And I heard that he is the son of a tribal chief.”

“A son? Of a tribe chief?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd spoke as he held up his teacup. He brought it to his mouth and took a sip.

“The chief will likely acknowledge his son’s accomplishment.”

“Because of the queen ant’s head...” the baron said.

“Yes, and I’ll just be freeloading.”

Joint effort and Joint hunting. Lloyd planned on throwing around some fancy words to win the chief’s heart. He would explain that he and Arosh hunted the queen ant together. That was his plan to be acknowledged by the chief, so he could be considered a warrior.

“But do you think the chief would acknowledge you so easily?” the baron asked in doubt.

“It won’t be easy. But it’s worth a try. The potential gain is too big not to try.”

It was true. The acknowledgment from the chief meant that Lloyd would obtain one hundred and twenty orcs as mine workers. One hundred and twenty brave and robust orcs would excavate the coal without getting tired. The group of orcs would be more productive than a thousand human miners.

“Plus, we’re saving the labor fee by hiring them. We simply have to shoulder their lodging and meals. It means we can use highly trained and strong laborers for free.”

“But don’t you think this is too dangerous? I do not think it is best for you to personally go to the orc village...”

“I am fine. Arosh is the son of a tribal chief, and I am his savior.”

“Hmm...”

The baron’s nose crinkled. He didn’t like that Lloyd was taking a risk. After all, the orcs were notorious for being violent and rough. So, setting his foot in their land didn’t sound very appealing. The baron wanted to do everything he could to stop Lloyd. That led to a series of more exchanges between them, each trying to persuade the other. It was a battle of persistence. Of course, in the end, Lloyd won.

“Fine...But on one condition,” the baron said.

“What is it?”

“Take about 30 soldiers with you.”

The baron explained that he would feel relieved if Lloyd took at least thirty men with him.

Lloyd accepted the terms and he would be guarded by thirty soldiers. They were a reliable backup plan should things go awry.

“Yes. On top of the thirty civil engineer soldiers, I will have Sir Asrahan to join me as well.”

So, the preparation for their departure began. He packed up camping supplies and food. The following morning, Lloyd was ready to leave. The baron and baroness walked them out of the estate. They were sincerely worried about their son, and Lloyd felt apologetic. The realization dawned upon him that, had events unfolded as depicted in the novel, they would have already faced imminent danger, with death lurking nearby.

“I’ll leave now.”

Lloyd bid farewell, his heart feeling a bit heavy. He then turned around and left the estate.

He crossed over the eastern mountain range with his men. Arosh was a competent warrior and guide. He guided his human companions very well, for he knew all the corners of the mountains. Thanks to him, Lloyd and his men could avoid bumping into dangerous monsters. With that, they finally arrived at the orc village ten days later.

And at last...

“Oink! Nice to meet you! I, Akush, am the father of Arosh! Oink!”

Lloyd shook hands with the tribal chief as hundreds of orcs watched the human and orc handshake.

“Yes, it’s a pleasure to meet you.”

“Arosh told me that you saved my son, oink.”

“Yes, somehow.”

“Great! That makes you my savior as well, oink!”

“At the same time, your son and I hunted the queen ant.”

“What, oink?”

Akush cocked his head to the side. Lloyd glanced at Javier, and he revealed the stuff he was carrying on his back. It was as large as a gym ball. He opened it and a large and dark chunk of something appeared.

“It’s the head of the queen. I got it as a souvenir.”

“Oink?”

Akush’s eyes widened in disbelief, and his mouth slightly hung open. Chief Akush wasn’t the only one surprised. It was the same for hundreds of orcs that had surrounded them.

“Oink?! What is it, oink?!”

“Oink! I have never seen a wild ant’s head as big as that!”

“It looks fierce, oink!”

“It looks strong, oink!”

“It looks delicious, oink!”

“It sure looks tasty, oink!”

In short, the orc village was put in awe and descended into chaos. It's time. Lloyd told himself. He couldn't miss this opportunity. He couldn't give the orcs the time to make a proper decision. It was time for him to push, so he could get the upper hand here. So, Lloyd quickly cut in, saying, "I was exploring the cave of the wild ants when I bumped into the queen, all tired and staggering. After some struggle, I was able to finish her. But you know what? I found a metal sword near the ant."

"Orc's metal sword? Oink?"

"Yes. Your son's sword."

After saying that, Lloyd glanced at Arosh and hinted that it was time for him to talk. Arosh exhaled through his nose.

"What my savior said is correct, oink!"

"So, son, are you saying that you weakened the queen ant, and the savior finished her off, oink?"

"Yes, oink. So we fought together, oink!"

"Hmm...Oink..."

The chief Akush's eyebrows crinkled. His dark green eyes moved from his son and Lloyd to the ant head. The ant head surely belonged to the queen. It was a no-brainer for Akush. It really is the queen. He had spent his entire life battling wild ants. He knew more than anyone else how powerful and mighty the queen was. So it was quite a shock for him to hear that his son hunted down that great foe. The chief's thick pecs trembled in admiration.

"Son, oink!"

"Yes, oink!"

"Congratulations! You're now a warrior! I, tribal chief Akush, declare that Arosh earned the rightful title of a warrior! Oink!"

"Thank you, oink!"

“Great! This calls for a celebration. Time to work out the legs! Oink!”

“ A man is nothing without his legs, oink!”

As soon as Akush ordered, Arosh ran to a side of the village. Once there, he lifted a large statue and tossed it on his shoulders. It was not just large, it was huge, probably weighing around 2,000 pounds. Even more, it was gilded in gold. Aside from the expensive statue, the place was littered with luxurious goods, and they were only used as workout tools.

A chandelier was being used as plates. The bar in the middle was a pillar adorned with expensive pearls. The chest full of treasures was being used as a kettlebell! Wow, incredible.

Lloyd recalled how capable the orcs were at pilfering and battling. It was described as so in The Knight of Blood and Iron. However, in reality, they stole much more. It must be the loot they have been stealing for decades. But those riches mean nothing to these orcs. Tsk.

The riches and treasures got downgraded to workout instruments. Arosh was doing squats with a gold statue. Lloyd’s heart swelled with greed as he surveyed the place. Meanwhile, Arosh heavily exhaled through his nose as he carried the statue. He squatted up and down, and his anaconda-like thigh muscles bulged. Akush’s face brightened with a smile as he looked at his son.

“Just look at him. What a splendid day, oink.”

Akush then turned to Lloyd’s side. He hand-gripped Lloyd’s shoulder. His hand was as big as a frying pan.

“Thank you, human. You not only saved my son but proved your courage by hunting the queen ant, oink.”

“Do you mean that I’m going to be a warrior as well?” Lloyd asked.

Sometimes, one needed to be brazen. Some questions needed to be asked as bluntly as possible. Akush happily nodded.

“Of course! I, Tribal Chief Akush, declare that...Oink?”

“It’s Lloyd. Lloyd Frontera..”

“I appoint the human, Lloyd Frontera, as a rightful warrior of the tribe, oink!”

Finally, Akush announced the birth of a new warrior. Hundreds of orcs exclaimed in joy. In an exceedingly nonchalant manner, Akush shouted, “The human lifesaver has become a warrior! This is leg day for him, too, oink!”

“Excuse me...?”

Hold on. This muscle man said what? He can’t seriously expect me to squat with that statue on my back. Lloyd swallowed absentmindedly, but his gut feelings, especially the bad ones, were always right. Chief Akush smiled widely as he slammed Lloyd’s back.

“Let’s go! I am feeling good today. I shall do it together with you, oink!”

“ A man is nothing without his legs, oink!”

Dear heavens...He was in despair as the shouts around him were growing larger and more excited. Lloyd’s anxiety and embarrassment grew just as much.

“Excuse me.”

“Oink?”

“I like working out and lifting heavy stuff, but that’s just...” Lloyd trailed off.

“Oink?! What do you mean, oink?”

“That is too heavy for me.”

Lloyd came clean on this one. It was true. Though Lloyd was quite confident when it came to lifting heavy stuff with all the extra power the Asrahan Core Technique gave him, he wasn't strong enough to carry a despairingly heavy statue and squat with a smile on his face.

"Thank you for the workout offer, but do you think you have anything lighter?"

He wanted to protect his waist and legs, so he asked. Akush's expression darkened.

"What? You can't carry that, oink?"

"No," Lloyd answered.

"Even when you're a warrior, oink?"

"Surely..."

"It cannot be! But you are a warrior, oink!"

"It is one of the lightest tools in the village. It is a warm-up tool for young warriors. So if you can't lift that, you don't deserve to be a warrior, oink."

"But I am not an orc."

"But you are a warrior, oink."

Akush's face was growing solemn each second. Lloyd's expression was hardening as well.

Dammit. Things were going smoothly for him. Lloyd never expected his plan would be obstructed by something as absurd as squatting. So he racked his brain for a solution.

It's all gone if I tell him that I can't squat. What should I do?

He had come too far now to give up. The benefit of earning the title of warrior was too great as it allowed for gratuitous access to one hundred and twenty strong orc miners. He didn’t wish to give up easily, but at the same time, he didn’t like the idea of breaking his back from lifting that heavy thing up even more.

I need something else. He needed to win over the chief’s heart with something else other than the squat. He needed to use something he was good at. That’s all it took for him to get approved by them. Lloyd rapidly moved his eyes. He surveyed every corner of the village, its environment, lifestyle, and anything he could lay his eyes on. After much classifying and analyzing, he realized that something oddly stood out in the village. Hold on. He stared at a hole made in the corner of the village.

“What is that?” Lloyd asked as he pointed at the hole.

Akush answered, “That? A hole for throwing meat away, oink.”

“Throw meat away?”

“Yes, we toss them there and bury them in soil, oink.”

Akush nodded.

“We throw away the spoiled meat. They can give you an upset stomach if you aren’t careful. If you get sick, you can’t work out. No workout means muscle loss, oink.”

The chief’s voice contained a tinge of regret.

“It is a regretful thing. If we could eat everything, we could build even more muscle. I never feel good throwing it all away, oink.”

“Is that so?”

“That’s right, oink.”

Akush licked his lips and the corners of Lloyd’s lips rose. This is it. Just then, Lloyd recalled the middle of The Knight of Blood and Iron. In the later part of the story, Javier goes out on an adventure and winds up in a battle with the orc tribe all alone.

The battle proved to be tough. But his clever trick finally gets him to defeat this muscular tribe. The trick was disrupting the orcs' hunting. This wilderness is barren. Farming is impossible, and foraging won't be enough to procure a sufficient food supply. So they heavily rely on hunting. Almost all of the food among the orcs are acquired through hunting.

They put food on their tables by hunting large and menacing monsters in the wilderness.

That was why they had to be so brave and courageous. However, they didn't have a way to store their hard-earned food. They simply threw their food in a pile and ate. That's why even freshly caught food spoiled easily. Javier sees through that weakness and interferes with the orc's hunting. In less than ten days, the orc village experienced a food shortage. They had no system to store and preserve food and with Javier's interruption, the orcs failed to even procure new meat. That eventually leads to a food shortage. Lloyd recalled such a part in the novel.

"I have a suggestion," Lloyd said.

"Suggestion, oink?"

"No," Lloyd answered.

He looked up at Akush.

"Instead of the leg workout, I will build cold storage for your people. Approve me then as your warrior."

Then, pay us back with your overflowing gold and silver. This way, Lloyd would be accepted as a warrior, and he could take the orc workers with him. While he was at it, he'd also sign a contract with Akush and demand payment for the construction.

He would kill two birds with one stone and fill two needs with one deed or carry two faces under one hood. After finishing the calculation in his head, Lloyd smiled mischievously.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 32: Muscle Loss Prevention Facility (2)

“Yeah, we’re making a seokbinggo.”

Whoosh. The wind blew in the wilderness and sand particles assaulted Lloyd’s eyes. Lloyd squinted his eyes and looked around the empty lot with a small slope.

“What is that?”

Just as Lloyd expected, Javier asked what it was. Lloyd scoffed.

“Bingo.”

“Pardon?” Javier asked.

“No, never mind. Have you ever heard of an ice house?”

“I never have.”

“I’m sure you haven’t.”

Seokbinggo, otherwise known as an ice house. These facilities had been used in the past to store ice during the hot season. Seokbinggo was used in Korea during the Joseon Dynasty, while the latter was used in ancient Europe. The Yazd region in the Middle East had one of those, too. Its name was moayedi, and that ice storage facility could still be found in recent times. In short, such facilities were used everywhere in the world throughout history,

However, it was different for the Laurasia continent, where The Knight of Blood and Iron was set.

*The continent doesn’t have it because of magic.*In this world, ice was a luxury only sought after by wealthy aristocrats during the summer and some mages happily stepped forward to serve the rich. Mages always stood by to immediately summon a glass of iced sangria in the scorching summer.

“So, I’m thinking of constructing that for the first time in this continent’s history.”

“For the orcs?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head.

This sloped land appeared perfect for a seokbinggo. In his head, Lloyd calculated the population of the orc village and the average amount of food they ate and hunted. He then measured the dimension of the seokbinggo accordingly. This one should definitely be bigger than the one built during the Joseon Dynasty. As Lloyd used his surveying and measuring skills, he recalled the event that had taken place a while ago.

***

“Instead of doing a leg workout, I will build a cold food storage for your people. Approve me then as your warrior.”

“Oink?”

Chief Akush raised his thick eyebrows at the suggestion.

“Food storage, oink? What is that?”

“Exactly what the name suggests. It’s a storage that preserves food.”

“Does constructing that change anything, oink?”

“Yes, something will change.”

“What will?”

“Your meat won’t spoil easily.”

“Oink? Is that possible, oink?”

“Of course.”

Akush furrowed in disbelief and Lloyd smiled at the chief. Okay, it's time to be confident.

Thinking that in his head, Lloyd said, "Just imagine it, chief. You hunted a huge monster, but it starts to rot before you eat even half of it. It would be very sad to waste all that natural protein, don't you think?"

"Oiink!!! It's infuriating, oink!!"

"That's it," Lloyd agreed.

"Yes, oink!!"

"And now, imagine you can savor every shred of that meat because it's kept fresh in cold storage. All that juicy meat turns into rich nutrients in your body. Imagine them bulking your muscles. How's that? Pretty awesome, no?"

Whoosh! Chief Akush harshly exhaled through his nose instead of giving a response.

The thought thrilled the orc.

"Is that possible, oink?"

"Of course, it is. Who do you think I am?"

"Our savior, oink!"

"That's right," Lloyd agreed.

"Yes, oink!"

"Good. Thank you for trusting me. Now, before we start, let's sign a construction contract."

"A construction...contract, oink?"

“Yes, contracts are very important in these kinds of jobs. Javier?” Lloyd turned around.

Javier casually handed Lloyd a piece of paper and pen as if he was familiar with the current situation. Lloyd jotted down a simple, concise contract on the paper.

“This is the way it is. Any construction project that starts without any clear agreements is bound to be legally muddy, eventually leading to a conflict. And with our relationship, chief? It’d be very sad if such a thing were to happen, right?”

“Oink...I don’t know what you mean, but sure, oink.”

“Good thinking, chief. You are wise, indeed. Here. Take this.”

“Oink?”

“Sign your name at the bottom.”

“Sign, oink?”

“It’s the same as leaving a mark that you agree with the terms of the contract as a great chief.”

“Mark! I like it! I’m good at leaving that, oink!”

Akush then lifted his basketball-sized fist into the air and slammed it down on the paper. Bam! The contract was pressed four inches deep into the stone. Dang. He’s a monster. The chief orc was a monster but in a different way than Javier. It became clear to Lloyd how powerful the chief orc was. Well, I’m not surprised, really. Even Javier struggled to suppress him in the novel. Javier had just become a sword master at that part of the story.

This meant that this gigantic muscular orc held combat powers equal to a high-level sword expert and sword master. This guy has nothing but his physical strength. He doesn’t know how to use mana at all, and yet that’s how formidable he is. The more he thought about him, the more ghastly this orc was. However, he didn’t need to be in fear right now because this muscle giant was on his side. Lloyd grinned.

“Thank you, chief, for arriving at a wise choice. You just have to trust me from now on.”

“Of course! Akush trusts human Lloyd, oink!”

“Yes, please leave the job to me.”

Lloyd signed his name on the paper glued to the floor. The contract went on like this:

[Lloyd Frontera will make a seokbinggo for the orc tribe.]

[The orc tribe will acknowledge Lloyd Frontera as a warrior and pay for the construction.]

[The payment for construction will be in the form of fitness tools for the orcs to use in the village.]

[However, Lloyd Frontera will refine the stones and make fitness tools that weigh the same as the payments.]

In short, the contract benefited both sides, and no one was at a loss. No one’s losing in this contract. It’s a win-win for everyone. The orcs used their gold and other treasures as fitness instruments. They didn’t see any other value to them and Lloyd would get compensated with those valueless treasures for the construction.

In return, they’d be blessed with a more efficient set of new tools made out of stones and a giant refrigerator that would preserve their food. Thus, the contract was beneficial to both sides.

“This is the reason why we can’t let them down. We need to construct a good one. Let’s see, so this can be the entrance.”

Lloyd spoke as he surveyed the land and imagined the series of events that led up to this point. He was bent on doing a great job with the seokbinggo.

This was only natural for him because he understood the importance of trust. Orcs may look dull and dumb, but you could never think lightly of them. Doing a haphazard job in construction for immediate profit would backfire eventually, and karma would hit him very hard. Karma would hit especially hard when his opponent was that muscular monster. It's better for me in the long term to maintain the trust they have in me. Orcs asserted massive influence and power over the land. Every orc was tough and powerful. If a war broke out, dozens of orc villages in the area would form an alliance in the blink of an eye that could stand against the elite forces of a nation.

So it's important that I gain the orc's trust all the more. There was even a possibility that Lloyd could earn more RP from them. Thinking that in his head, Lloyd did his best to survey and design the seokbinggo. The entrance and exit will be southward. The main storage where the ice and food will be stored will face north as it's colder there. Lloyd's plan was modeled after the seokbinggo. When he was a freshman, he was part of a student society that studied traditional architecture. That experience was helping him a lot now.

Anyway, it's really dry here. The village sat in the dry wilderness. This means that the seokbinggo here would be more efficient than the one in Joseon.

Aside from these, he meticulously inspected and designated multiple factors that would make the facility more functional. It's important to direct the hot air above. The facility was a semi-basement type as half of the storage sat below the ground level. The other half, which was a ceiling, was elevated above the ground. And it was shaped like an arch.

Lloyd then created a structure that would transfer the heat outside I need to make some uneven spaces between the arched ceiling since that's where the heat will be trapped. The center of the dug area must be equipped with a ventilation facility, so the heat will then be transferred outside. Lastly, I just have to put some stone covers right above the ventilation to prevent the sun and rain from getting in...Done.

Flash! A hologram of a floor plan appeared in front of his eyes. The hologram showed the ceiling structure of the facility and Lloyd remembered to make a slope on the floor.

The ice will melt and create a puddle without a slope on the ground, which will make the melting happen faster... So the entrance area was elevated more than the north side, where the storage sat. Then, he built a drain at the end of the storage and focused on keeping the facility cold.

The retaining walls were placed on the north and south of the entrance. This was to make the cold air flowing down from the mountain range in the winter hit the walls and enter the ice storage. Afterward, he secured the areas for insulation. Four days later, Lloyd was finally done with the design.

“Whew, the floor plan is done.”

He printed out the floor plan with the optional skill he acquired after his surveying skill leveled up. Once the floor plan was completed, Lloyd proceeded to the next part of the job—acquiring construction supplies. I can procure mud and limestone for the waterproof layer in the ceiling. And rice husks, wheat straws, and sawdust can be acquired for insulation after I send some of my men back to the fiefdom. I can just use the sandbar in the area to carpet the final layer of the outside. The only problem is the granite. Lloyd gazed westward.

The eastern mountain range sat between the Frontera barony and this wilderness. The foot of the hill was brightly glimmering against the morning sun because of the granite in the bedrock.

Granite is imperative to construction. Granite was created from felsic magma being cooled off, and the formation process allowed the rock to be strong and homogenous.

As such, this meant that it hardly got warped or broken into pieces due to its lack of layers inside. That’s why granite is widely used in the modern world as a supporting stone for semiconductors or measuring devices that require precision. Granite was solid, and it wasn’t prone to change, becoming a popular construction material that could last for several years.

This was especially the case for seokbinggo construction, as it required lasting insulation and waterproofing. However, that wasn't to say it didn't have any downsides. First and foremost, it's extremely tricky to process it. The harder the rock was, the harder it was to break.

Furthermore, the absence of layers inside made it impossible for him to break it into the shape he wanted. So it was infinitely challenging to refine or process the granite in the shape or size one wished. That explains why the Buddha statues used to be so edgy and crude. The Korean Peninsula was rich in granite. Thanks to that, Lloyd's ancestors carved the hard rock by hand one after another. They went through excruciatingly long hours in the process. However, Lloyd wasn't interested in doing manual labor just like his ancestors, especially when the job was for the orcs, not for his people.

He didn't wish to spend a lot of time building an ice storage on someone else's land.

After racking his brain to find a solution, he turned around when he found one at last.

He called the silver-haired knight silently standing behind him.

"Hey, Javier."

"Did you call me?"

"Yes, I did. Let me ask you something."

"Do speak, Young Master."

"Can you split a rock with your sword?"

"Yes."

"How big?"

"I've succeeded with rocks that are about three feet thick."

"For real?"

“Yes.” Javier nonchalantly nodded.

This surprised Lloyd. A sword, no matter how well-made, was nothing but a blade of steel that only weighed a few pounds. Yet here was Javier, telling Lloyd that he could slice a 2,200-pound rock in one sweeping cut. Lloyd hid his emotions and instead, he scoffed at Javier.

“Yeah? I thought you could do better.”

“I thought you’d be able to easily slice and stab through rocks dozens of feet thick. Tsk.”

“What you just described sounds hard even for a sword master...”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

“Aren’t you just coming up with an excuse because you can’t do it?”

“No.”

“No?”

“Yes.”

“You sure?”

“Yes.”

Javier’s tone dripped with iciness, just slightly more than his daily tone. It was probably because Lloyd was annoyingly harping on the subject.

“I am oblivious to your intentions, but if you are trying to make an unreasonable request by abusing your status, I refuse in advance.”

“Oh, look at you. Are you on strike?”

“I am saying this in advance because I cannot do something that is beyond my powers. Both of us will be unhappy eventually if we ignore that.”

“Both of us will be unhappy?”

“Yes.”

“If I push you to do something that’s beyond your powers?”

“We surely will be. May I speak honestly?”

“Go ahead.”

“You are trying to acquire the stones to build a structure you call a seokbinggo.”

“You’re right,” Lloyd conceded.

“And you are trying to use me for the job by making me slice the rocks with my sword. I’m letting you know in advance because I knew what was coming.”

“So, are you saying that you refuse to be a stonemason because that’s not in your job description?”

“Yes, but mainly because the job is impossible with a sword.”

“Tsk, how insolent of you.”

“Thank you,” Javier said.

He then bowed. You think you won this one? The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose. Lloyd flashed a meaningful grin at Javier, who was basking in his victory.

“What if I can make you do it?”

“Pardon?” Javier asked.

“What if I make you slice and blast those heavy rocks with just your sword? Will you do what I ask?”

“I’m not following what you mean...”

Javier trailed off and Lloyd grinned. He knew there was a way. Javier, in the novel, had mastered a destructive skill midway through the story and now, Lloyd planned to make Javier learn it earlier. It was time for some advanced lessons.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 33: Muscles and Express Construction (1)

“Create a hole that is dozens of feet deep with a sword? I do not know what you mean.”

Javier furrowed his brows. The way he looked at Lloyd was filled with incredulity and annoyance.

“Something does not add up here. May I speak honestly?”

“Speak honestly?”

“Yes.”

“No thanks. You’re going to drop truth bombs on me all over again.”

“Again, I have never dropped anything on you or hurt you, Master Lloyd.”

“Yes, you have.”

“When did I ever do that?”

“In the ant cave. You punched me in the gut.”

“Well, that’s...”

“Oh, I almost forgot. You slapped me three times in a row to wake me up as well. Am I wrong?”

“Twice, actually. I stopped before landing the third blow since you woke up.”

“Oh, so you’re saying that you wish you had slapped me, yeah?”

“Of course, I do...not.”

“Anyway, to go back and tell you frankly, I have never heard of anyone who succeeded in what you just described.”

“None?”

“None, not even of a sword master.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Javier was right. A sword couldn’t create a hole several feet deep in the rock. Moreover, blast it from the inside? He had never even heard of such a feat. Such a feat was impossible for even any of the countless sword masters recorded in history.

Well, it was even impossible for Sir Mikael, the founding king, who fell behind others at first but rose to be the most powerful swordsman in history. The record shows that Sir Mikael’s sword aura extended as far as three feet. Add to the length of the blade, and he must have been able to slice or destroy anything a little over 6 feet ahead of him. The sword aura. This technique referred to adding a layer of highly concentrated mana to the sword. It was a signature skill for sword masters as they were the only ones who could use it. However, the skill had its limits despite its destructiveness. The sword master could not attack outside the range of their aura

After all, swords are short-range weapons. No matter how fatal an attack was, the sword master still needed to move close to slash and stab their opponent. They weren’t like mages who could barrage their opponents with magic from a distance. That was what differentiated them from mages. At the same time, it was also their weakness.

“Master Lloyd, you are ignoring common sense. You are stating that you will teach me an imaginary skill that doesn’t exist. It’s like...”

“I’m losing it?”

“Yes.”

Javier immediately nodded his head.

“You surely are. The words you speak can only come out of someone who is crazy, insane, or losing their mind.

“Hey, I know you may think you’re right about this one, but don’t be so judgy.”

“Judgy? What is that?”

“Haa, never mind. Anyway...”

Lloyd chuckled.

“What if I teach you that skill?”

“Are you really saying that you can do it?”

“Yeah! Just answer the question.”

“If your bluffing is proven to be true...”

Javier’s eyes grew serious.

“I shall happily follow your will.”

“Really? You would do anything I ask you?”

“Of course.” Javier nodded.

If what Lloyd was saying proved to be true, he had nothing to lose. But at the same time, he thought to himself that Lloyd was bluffing. It was just one of his pretentious talks. There was no way for such a gibberish, senseless thing to be true.

“Good. We have a deal. Well then...”

Lloyd held out his hand. Then, he grabbed Javier on the shoulder and nonchalantly said, “Draw your sword, up your mana circle rotation to the max, and force the two circles to collide by overlapping them together.”

“Excuse me...?”

“Oh, but the remaining circles must not be used for the collision. The others have to protect the heart. Or else, your heart rate will go up from the trauma until it completely stops. One boom, and you’ll be kicking the bucket.”

“Why would I kick the bucket...?”

“Just try it, will you?”

“Here? Now?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded his head and Javier was flustered. Is it possible? He felt like he was going against common sense. The Asrahan Core Technique almost felt like a part of his body, but this technique felt strange.

He had never tried anything like it. He never gave a thought that it would be possible. Javier’s doubts were only logical. Each mana circle rotated around the heart faster, with more power generated into it. Once the rotation gained speed, the repulsive power in each circle increased. Afterward, the circles pushed the other away like two opposing magnetic poles, and here was Lloyd, suggesting to collide them by force.

“It’s all right. Just make sure that you protect your heart with the other circle. Everything’s going to be fine that way.”

Lloyd sounded way too casual, and his tone made him less trustworthy for Javier. But there was something that was hidden from Javier’s knowledge, and it was that he came up with this very skill by himself in the novel. It made him the strongest knight that ever set foot on the Laurasia continent.

But, of course, that happens much later on in the story. Lloyd recalled the story in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Mana blast was the name of the technique. Javier was already a sword master by the time he developed this technique. He also had his fourth circle equipped.

The combination of the sword master status and quadra-circle alone was enough to make him the most powerful knight in history.

But one day, he was faced with an obstacle that even he could not surpass, Namaran's Wall.

The wall was under destructive, evil magic. Behind it, thousands of refugees direly waited for Javier to save them. This magic wall stood indomitable despite the powerful combination of the aura-layered sword and the amplification of the quadra-circle. Time passed without any success, and the day the evil mage would appear came near.

Every single refuge was doomed to be sacrificed. When the following morning rolled around, Javier attempted the final assault to bring down the wall. His frantic attempt led to a collision of two circles, causing an unimaginable force to explode and crumble the wall at once. This was the first time he ever used the mana blast. After that event, it became his go-to skill, along with the Asrahan Core Technique.

And now, Lloyd was trying to teach that very skill to Javier. It was a strange experience at the same time, being able to teach the soon-to-be sword master. I should master this once I can manage the triple circle. Even though Lloyd wanted to use the skill, he couldn't learn it at the moment. He could only create two circles, and the skill required an additional one to protect his heart.

In short, the mana blast required three circles to be used. But even those who can use triple circles don't have it easy. That was true for Javier as well. With that thought in mind, Lloyd put on a smirk.

"Hey, you're still hesitating. Am I that hard to trust?"

"Are you scared?" Lloyd asked.

"Of course not. However..."

"However?"

“I need you to promise me one thing.”

“Hmm...Promise you what?”

“That skill you just taught me...”

“Uh-huh.”

“If it is a lie or an attempt to pull my leg...”

“Yeah?”

“Promise me that you will infinitely extend your lullaby service for free.”

“What the?”

The suggestion was bolder than Lloyd thought. At the same time, it granted Lloyd a glimpse of what Javier thought of his lullabies.

“Hey,” Lloyd said, the corners of his eyes rising.

“I see your body’s become dependent on my lullaby service.”

Flinch. Javier’s shoulders startled very faintly and Lloyd continued to speak.

“Oh, there’s no point in hiding. It’s way too obvious.”

“You are overly speculating.”

“Come on. Look me in the eyes when you say it.”

“I have never avoided your gaze.”

“I guess my eyes sit below my nose.”

“You know what? Drop it. I give you my word.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“Yes. I promise you a lifetime extension of my service if it’s found that I was lying. Completely free, moreover.”

“You promised.”

“Yeah, yeah. Just go try now. Do you remember what I told you?”

“Yes.”

Swish! Javier pulled out his long sword. Lloyd took a few steps back. I’m sort of worried because it’s his first try...But it’s Javier we’re talking about. He’s gonna be okay. When it came to the Asrahan Core Technique, Javier was way ahead of Lloyd. He had a triple circle with him. He controlled each of the mana circles exceedingly well like a seasoned expert.

And so, while he knew that this was Javier’s first attempt at the skill, Lloyd believed that nothing bad would happen to his heart. The next few days are going to be an uphill battle for him. This technique involved clashing the two mana circles madly spinning near the heart.

That would put a great strain and pressure on his body, and it’d take time to get used to it, no matter how much of a genius he was. At best, he’d need a week. Or two weeks, even. I gotta adjust the schedule because that’s the only time the quarrying work can be done-

Thwack!

“It was a success.”

Something utterly unbelievable happened. Lloyd stared at Javier a few steps away from him, his mouth agape. Then, he looked further behind. There was a mark on the floor that wasn’t there a while ago.

“I worried for nothing. It turned out to be not difficult.”

A long furrow behind him stretched as far as 30 feet. Lloyd noticed how even and delicate the mark was. The long hole appeared from the inside, which meant that the explosion started from there to extend all the way straight.

“Hey, Javier?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“Are you a monster?”

“No. I am, of course, a human.”

No, I think you’re a monster. Or the rumored family friend my mother knows. Lloyd stared at Javier with an embarrassed look and a corner of his lip rose elegantly.

“Thank you, Master Lloyd. Now I know that you were not making fun of me.”

“You learned that just now?”

“Yes.”

“Whew. You are so brazen.”

“I had no choice. I have never thought of it that way.”

“How about now? Can you make sense of it?”

“Yes, however...”

“However? What is it again?”

“I am curious how you managed to come up with such a brilliant technique.”

“Why, am I not allowed to come up with one?”

“Of course, it’s not that, but...”

Javier stuttered and tightening the muscles around his neck, Lloyd said,

“Never mind. Keep your promise. Can we agree that I'm not teasing you?”

“Yes.”

“Does that mean you’ll do what I tell you to do without a fight?”

“I am at your service.”

He’s a bit snobby, but he does it when he says he will. Javier nodded. Just then, a message popped in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong.

[Javier Asrahan is very grateful for what you are doing for him.]

[Your likeability with Javier Asrahan has increased by three points.]

[Current RP with Javier Asrahan: -11]

[You have earned 54 RP by improving relationships with main characters.]

[Current RP: 561]

Amazing. Lloyd was certain that Javier had raised his white flag for certain. Now, it was time to test him out for the quarry work.

***

“Okay, from now on, you’ll be a human dynamite.”

The following morning rolled around. Lloyd and Javier were on the far western side of the orc village. Lloyd held up a large brush as he stood on the granite bedrock that revealed the range foot. He dipped the brush into the jar he was carrying in his arms. Splash. The red ink had been given by the orcs. He held up the dipped brush and splotched the ground in even intervals.

“Here. And here. Here too.”

Sweep! Sweep! Sweep! Red dots as big as his fist were painted on the ground.

“Do you see these points?”

“Yes, is that where I need to stab my sword?”

“Yes. Smart boy. Stab, mana circle collision, bang. Got it?”

“I understand. By the way, how deep should I go?”

“Uhm, thirty feet.”

“Thirty feet?”

“That’s the deepest you can get at this moment, right?”

“Yes.”

“Stab it evenly. And make an explosion with all the power you got.”

Lloyd clenched his fists and opened them up.

“I marked those dots because I already calculated the depth. But make sure you run back here after making the explosion, okay? I don’t want you to be pressed under the rocks and go ouch. Okay?”

“Yes...” Javier nodded.

Lloyd moved far, far away from the explosion spot. He held up his arms high, facing Javier.

“Three! Two! One! Fire in the hole!” Lloyd shouted.

A second later, he saw Javier holding up his sword, and a few more seconds later, Javier disappeared from his sight. No, he grew faint. Javier was stabbing the rocks with his sword as he moved around at lightning speed. Lloyd clenched his fists as he saw Javier do so. Please succeed. His success would make the quarry job thousands of times easier.

Just like how Alfred Nobel revolutionized quarry work and shortened the year of painstaking work it used to require to a mere few days by inventing dynamite. If Javier acted as the ANFO or New MITE, both of which were used to create a confined blast, Lloyd could complete the seokbinggo within this month. I taught you the mana blast for this very reason! So show me that it wasn't all for nothing! Lloyd wished in his heart and then, he saw it happen. Flash!

Rays of light burst out of the large granite bedrock. Lloyd noticed Javier rushing in his direction. Javier came to a stop a second later.

"I did it."

Clank! Javier put the sword back into the sheath. Just then... Boom! A massive shockwave and subsequent sandstorm engulfed the land. The large bedrock crumbled to dozens of pieces like a giant collapsing to the floor.

Rumble! The ground shook, followed by an overwhelming roar. Lloyd tightly squeezed his fist without realizing it. He was certain.

"You did it."

At last, all preparations for the construction were complete. It was now time to get started.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 34: Muscles and Express Construction (2)

“Fire in the hole!”

Whoosh! Flash! It was a bright morning and Lloyd’s loud shout cut across the sky. At the same time, Javier’s long sword glimmered. A blinding flash of light cut deep into the granite.

A second later, it exploded. Crack!

The granite that has endured the test of time for thousands and thousands of years exploded and crumbled to pieces. A crack appeared in the bedrock in one unified direction. And the chasm deepened a second later, causing it to crumble to several pieces as the weight became unbearable. Rumble! Pieces of granite that resembled dice fell out, each almost weighing a ton.

“Good job, Javier!” Lloyd gave Javier a thumbs up.

Javier wiped his forehead with a handkerchief. He did his part and now, it was Ppodong’s time to shine.

“Hey, Ppodong.”

“Ppodong?”

“Do you want to eat this? It’s a red sunflower seed.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“I had this specially ordered just for you. A set includes only one piece of each of the red and blue seeds, and I had to pay a whopping 1 RP for it.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“Do you know how many sets I bought last night? 50. I spent a whopping 50 RP in total. You do know that I’m working my head off because I want to give you and Bangul the best of the best, right?”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

“So, what do you say? Will you enjoy it?”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong happily took the red sunflower seed from Lloyd’s palm and he began to chew.

Lloyd stepped far back and watched the hamster grow in gigantic size. Bam! A 30-foot monster appeared.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Yes, good job, Ppodong. You deserve a good rub.”

“Ppodong!”

“Good boy. Hey, Ppodong, could you move that, please?”

Lloyd pointed at the cube-shaped granite hunks.

“Just to the orc village. How about it? Can you do it?”

“Ppodong!” The hamster nodded his large, round head.

Then, he waddled over to the granite chunks and stretched out his hands at them. He opened up his cute mouth and shoved the granite into his mouth.

“Ppudung? Ppu-pu-dung!”

One side of his cheek became square.

“Great job, Ppodong. Can you stash those as well?”

“Ppu-pu-dung!”

The other side of his cheek became square too. Lloyd hopped on Ppodong’s back.

“Let’s go!”

“Ppudung?”

Ppodong’s gait was light and quick even with a mouthful of weighty granite chunks. He headed to the orc village as fast as a dump truck. Once Ppodong transferred the rocks to the village, it was time for Lloyd, Arosh, and the 20 civil engineer soldiers to shine.

“The rocks are here, oink!”

“Everyone, get ready!”

Zoom! They were waiting at the construction site and as Lloyd appeared in the distance, they held up their chisels, hammers, and pickaxes. Ppodong stopped and spat out the chunks of granite. Everyone started to charge at them.

“Arosh will break it, oink!”

“Let’s show the orcs what we got!”

“Woah!!!”

That began the sweaty, painstaking construction for Arosh and the rest of the soldiers.

They cut the chunks according to the mark Lloyd drew for them and evened them out to be made into bricks. Amid the hustle and bustle, Ppodong busied himself with another job.

“Hey, Ppodong?”

“Ppodong?”

“Could you please dig here? From here to here. Around this much. 20-feet deep.”

“Ppo-do-dong?”

Lloyd began to draw lines with a tree branch on the ground. It seemed random, but he was actually following the floor plan of the seokbinggo. The optional design skill allowed him to manufacture a 2D floor plan. This is so handy. I can't believe that the floor plan is appearing right on the ground in real-time. He simply needed to summon the model of the seokbinggo he had designed beforehand and place it on the ground where the structure would be built.

A floor plan only he could see was engraved on the ground. So, the lines Lloyd drew exactly matched the ones in the floor plan. He clearly instructed Ppodong how deep and wide he must dig the hole.

"All right, I trust you with this."

"Ppodong!"

Ppodong raised his arms up high and the fierce digging began. Swish! Swish! Swish!

Now, even though the land was pretty much dry, it couldn't stop Ppodong from skillfully scooping the earth. He spooned out the earth with his paws at a fierce speed and a huge amount of the soil got excavated. Despite being assaulted by sand particles all over his face, Lloyd stayed beside his hamster friend. More sand flew toward his face and body, yet Lloyd never left Ppodong's side as he knew that the hamster was working hard for him.

From time to time, Lloyd carefully inspected Ppodong's work to check if there were any errors in the digging. He made sure that Ppodong scooped just the right amount of sand, nothing more and nothing less. Every inch of the ground was surveyed through his skills.

When he discovered an error, he hopped down with a shovel in his hand. He securely filled in the areas Ppodong left out and carefully scooped out the areas with excess sand.

Digging and mending the ground...Lloyd actualized the floor plan as meticulously as possible, leaving no room for error. Digging the ground is the most important part of construction. That's true regardless of what I'm building. Since it involved constructing the foundation of the facility, he could never do the task perfunctorily. Otherwise, a problem could arise in the future in the facility.

And if that happens, my credibility will be affected, and people will talk badly of me. That would hurt my business, and I won't be able to maintain it for long.

Lloyd understood how crucial *credibility was i*n this industry. Be it a human or an orc, it didn't matter. The orc chief was a client who had signed a construction contract with Lloyd.

Humans, orcs, and monsters...It hardly mattered to Lloyd who the client was. Everyone was a client as long as the contract was signed.

Do I think this way because I'm a seasoned professional? Nah! It's because they pay me! Anybody who pays me for a job is my king, my idol! So he needed to ensure the best results for his clients. That required him to pour all his efforts into the business. Lloyd imagined how rich he would be in the future after this construction, and that motivated him to put his nose to the grindstone.

With that thought, Lloyd happily let the sweat drip down his forehead.

A few days passed in a flash but the work was still tough and exhausting. Javier blasted the granite and shattered it into chunks. Ppodong transferred the rocks to the site. Arosh and the soldiers smoothened them. Lloyd evened out the ground and checked over it. About ten days later, the foundation work was finished.

"We don't have any time to rest! Let's keep going!"

"Yes, Master!"

Lloyd took off his shirt and led the way. He joined the soldiers in transferring the granite bricks and stacked them up on the smoothened ground. The experience he gained in South Korea with laying out tiles helped him a lot.

Although, these bricks are incomparably large and heavy! Nevertheless, both shared the same principle: finishing the ground with heavy material. The process had many commonalities: First, you solidified the ground. Second, you pre-set the level and slope. Third, you covered the ground with rocks. Last, you filled the gaps between the rocks.

The only difference was in the last step, where he needed to waterproof the mixture by mixing the mud with limestone instead of tile grout filler. Anyway, the overall construction went smoothly until the floor was finished. As soon as Lloyd proceeded to stack up the bricks to make the walls, problems arose.

“Arghah!!!” One of the civil engineers moaned strangely. It was followed by a snapping sound, which came from his back.

“Hey, you okay?”

“Argh...It looks like my back is sprained.”

The man had to stay bedridden for several days in pain. The granite proved to be too heavy for him to lift. Starting with him, more soldiers got similarly injured. More and more spent their time in bed as days passed by and their injuries weren't exclusive to the back. Some got hurt in the wrist while others got hurt in the shoulders. Even the experienced soldiers, who had worked on several different past projects, ended up in the same state.

At last, Lloyd was the only one left who could lift up the bricks. Javier wasn’t there to help him as he was already in bed, recovering from terrible fatigue. His body had been worn down from using the mana blast for several days in a row.

Lloyd furrowed his brows.

This is a pickle. I wish Arosh was here. Goodness. Why did he have to go out hunting now?

To Lloyd’s misfortune, Arosh wasn’t in the village. At the time the floor was getting finished, he was fulfilling his duty as a warrior and on a group hunt with his village orcs. I can't give Ppodong the red seed, either. Since the floor was just finished, the rocks hadn't been set in place yet. The whole floor could be ruined if Ppodong, who was several tons heavy, waddled around to stack the bricks.

What should I do? Lloyd contemplated a solution. The problem lay in the weight of the rocks. But he couldn't cut down the size, either. Otherwise, it wouldn't be insulated.

The sole purpose of building the seokbinggo was to keep the temperature cold. And so, large and thick rocks were imperative to prevent the heat from entering. Should I just wait until the ground firms up? Is Ppodong the only option I have? That looked like the best plan for the soldiers' safety. One afternoon, when Lloyd was still mulling over the matter, the solution was simply handed over to him in a rather unexpected way.

"Oink?! You cannot lift that like that, oink!"

A group of orcs was always at the construction site to watch the process. They oinked in excitement when Ppodong and Lloyd smoothened the ground and when soldiers chiseled the rocks. It was the same this day. Lloyd was struggling to stack the rocks all alone. Its weight left a great toll on him but the job wasn't entirely impossible as he had the Asrahan Core Technique. It was more like weight training for him. That's when the orcs began to interrupt and meddle.

"Human! You're lifting that wrong, oink!"

"Pardon?" Javier asked.

Lloyd lifted his head, all flushed and red because of the heavy weight of rock in his arms.

A senile orc, who was looking down at the construction burrow from the ground, was speaking in his direction.

"What did you just say?"

“It’s just as I said. You’re not working your muscles if you lift like that, oink.”

“Whaat?”

“Straighten your back and stick your butt out. Your chest should be straight, too. And make sure your ankles are positioned flexibly because that’s the only way you can train your muscles, oink!!”

“Uhm, but I’m not doing this for exercise.”

“It doesn’t matter, oink!!”

After that, the other spectating orcs started to chime in too.

“Grab the lower part, oink!”

“Mind your breathing! Oink!”

“Rise faster when you lift it up, oink!”

“One more, oink!!”

The construction site suddenly transformed into a gym for highly seasoned, ripped, and motivated trainers. The orcs were the trainers, while Lloyd was the scrawny guy taking baby steps on his journey to be buff. Eventually, the orcs came forward out of frustration and demonstrated the movement themselves.

“Oink! Oink! He’s insufferable, oink!”

“Why can’t he do it properly?! Oink!”

“Let us show him, oink!!”

“Watch and learn, oink!”

About ten ripped orcs jumped down into the construction site and before Lloyd could stop them, each carried a granite brick in their arms. Their veins, as thick as an anaconda, popped out.

“Alrighty! Oink!”

“Yes, oink!!”

The rock was terribly heavy for Lloyd, even with the help of the Asrahan Core Technique.

It took about three or four soldiers to carry just one. However, with these orcs, it was a cakewalk. It was like a giant gorilla that appeared in the Olympic weightlifting games and made fun of all the athletes by lifting up the weights without breaking a sweat.

“Wow.” Lloyd gaped at the incredible sight.

But he quickly jostled himself out of the daze and realized what he had to do.

He immediately exclaimed, “Oh, my, you’re so amazing!”

“Oink! This is nothing, Oink!”

“No. You are amazing. I never dreamed of being able to move that all the way over there, let alone lift it.”

“Over there, oink?”

Lloyd pointed at the half-finished wall. The orc glanced at it and scoffed.

“This is the problem with humans. Watch me, oink.”

As though he was lifting up an empty box, he raised the rock over his head. Afterward, he gently placed it on the area Lloyd just pointed to. Clunk! The rock thudded as the orc put it on top of the other rocks. He was able to put it down exactly where it needed to be.

Perfect. This is it. Lloyd discretely clenched his fists. Then, he moved on to carry another brick beside him. He struggled with it on purpose.

“Ow! Arghh!! I can’t do it. Why?”

“Tsk, tsk. Move, human. I will show you how it’s done, oink!!”

Thud! The orc placed the rock in its correct place once again. This process was repeated several times. Lloyd feigned weakness as he wiped the sweat off his face. He tugged at the heartstrings of the orcs by showing his incompetence, and it was enough to win him an Oscar.

Each time he did so, the orcs helped him out, feeling extremely sorry for this poor human. Their muscles trembled in regret and they never stopped trying to teach Lloyd the right posture. Lloyd noticed how warm and kind they were despite their menacing appearances with their bulky physique. Thanks to the orcs’ generous meddling, the wall was completed in just a few hours. However, he didn’t stop there.

“My, my! It’s harder to lift his way! Ouch! Yikes!”

Lloyd pretended to struggle the next day as well. He acted like someone trying to summon a gym trainer by misusing fitness equipment. The orcs must have talked about Lloyd the previous day as more orcs showed up this time. With a burning passion for imparting the proper way of working out, they started to instruct this miserable newbie, and thanks to their almost voluntary help, the outline of the arch-shaped ceiling was built in less than two days.

And they’re stacking up the bricks so well. The orcs were like a crane. They were so strong that they could quickly put the bricks in their proper spots. Long live muscles. Lloyd’s dream was getting materialized. The construction took place at lightning speed.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 35: Muscles and Express Construction (3)

“Oink? What is this? Could it be that...the seokbinggo is completed already, oink?!”

Orc Arosh was a natural-born warrior. He battled against enemies and he hunted for the tribe. So, he naturally came to consider courage as a virtue. He had lived his whole life fighting. He was ignorant when it came to construction, so the processes and results all were a blur for him.

However, he understood this one thing and that was that no construction ended in a day. So, Arosh was shocked when he returned to the construction site.

“A few days ago, this area was just a hole! What happened?! It is full of rocks, oink!”

Arosh had every bit of reason to be taken aback. After all, he had to put down his shovel and leave to go hunting.

“I’m sorry! I’ll hunt for a few days and come back, oink!”

Hunting was one of the warriors’ sacred duties. Like all South Korean males who had to serve in the military and attend reserved force training, all the orcs were mandated to regularly attend group hunts and Arosh’s turn had come.

“I will help you once I come back, oink!” He spoke as he tapped Lloyd on the shoulder.

When the hunt was over, he ran as fast as he could to return to the construction site.

He did so to help out his savior Lloyd, but when he came back, his expectations were shattered. It had been only a few days, but everything changed. The empty lot, which everyone once struggled to burrow, was replaced with a stone chamber made of thick, dense granite! Lloyd was standing in front of the stone chamber, no, the seokbinggo.

“Hey, Arosh. I know, right? I didn’t even realize how far I got. But it’s not fully constructed yet.”

Lloyd shrugged, unimpressed by the progress. Arosh gulped in nervousness.

He suddenly felt as if he was in the presence of a mythical creature. Who in the world is my savior, oink?! There was something great about him. He felt that way the more he spent time with Lloyd. Lloyd seemed to possess some kind of magical ability to create whatever he wanted. It wasn’t a rare event and it happened all the time.

Lloyd, my savior, gave an order to Javier. Then, a part of the rocky mountain got sliced into half. He brought those rocks and dug the ground, oink. And… There it was...a stone chamber Lloyd called the seokbinggo. But he didn’t even use any magic, oink. Arosh thought that Lloyd surpassed the limits of magic and so, he gave a thumbs up to Lloyd.

“My savior! You! I declare that you have a wide nostril! Oink!”

“A wide...nostril?”

“Yes, oink!!”

Lloyd cocked his head to the side. Arosh heavily exhaled through his nose.

“Wide nostrils make breathing easier. Easy breathing makes you last longer in fights and hunting. A tireless orc is the best warrior, oink!”

“Aha! Did you mean that as a compliment?”

“Of course, oink!”

Arosh smiled, his sharp fangs sticking out of his mouth. Lloyd chuckled.

“You’re very generous to compliment me over just this. I’m embarrassed. I actually never took a lesson on how to build a seokbinggo.”

“You didn’t learn how to make it, oink?”

“No, I didn’t. My major is civil engineering, so this area is a completely different field of study.”

“Civil...Oink?”

“Haha, there is such a thing like that. But I have always been interested in stuff like this. I guess it’s finally paying off.”

Lloyd had been a long-time enthusiast for traditional architecture, including the heated flooring system and seokbinggo. The student society he had signed up for back in college was also related to the field. What’s more, when his financial situation was good back then, he and his friends traveled to various places in the country to enjoy these architectural spectacles.

“But it’s all in the past now. Anyway, this seokbinggo is not finished yet. Sure, the shell is there, but I have yet to construct the inside. It’s far from being finished.”

Clap clap! Lloyd slapped the walls with his palm as he continued.

“But as you can see, the slope is there, and so are the waterway, arch, and ventilation system. All thanks to your strong warriors.”

It was true as the orc warriors were exceedingly strong. Each orc did more than what a hundred soldiers could do. They were like gorillas, and thanks to their bulky muscles, Lloyd enjoyed the comfort of working on the construction site without soiling his hands with dirt for the past few days.

The walls and arch ceiling were completed in the blink of an eye as the orcs transferred the bricks around using their muscles, but the construction wasn’t finished yet.

“It’s just flashy on the outside. But it can’t properly store anything right now.”

“Useless, oink?” asked Arosh.

“Uh-huh. There’s no insulation.”

Lloyd continued to speak.

“Even with the thickest granite bricks, it doesn’t have any insulation right now. Without additional layers of insulation, the heat during the summer will seep into the storage. So I need some other things to prevent that from happening.”

“Where can Arosh get the insulation, oink?”

“You don’t have to get anything,” said Lloyd.

“Nothing, oink?”

“Yep. We just have to wait. I sent ten soldiers back to my fiefdom to bring here the materials that can be used for insulation.”

It was true. Sometime before Lloyd taught Javier the mana blast, he selected ten of the strongest soldiers and sent them back to the fiefdom. Their mission was to come back with materials that could be used for insulation.

“I told them to bring the things that can’t be acquired here. Rice husks, wheat straws, and sawdust.”

The village lacked those materials because it sat in the middle of the wilderness. The barren land gave no crops, so the orcs knew nothing about farming. The materials Lloyd just mentioned could only be obtained on farms and agricultural lands.

“Hmm, they should be back soon. It’s been days since they left already,” Lloyd told Arosh.

Since they were expected soon, Lloyd simply waited for their return.

The waiting, however, dragged on. A day passed, two days passed, and just like that, even after four and five days later… No soldiers returned to the village even after ten days passed. Not a single sign indicated their return.

Hmm...This is strange. Lloyd waited for them as he fooled around with Javier in the village.

His gaze always darted to the west to seek any signs of their return, but as the waiting dragged on without any promise, Lloyd began to grow anxious.

They should have come back yesterday at the latest.

Since the soldiers took the same route Lloyd had traveled to get to the orc village from home, he was able to calculate how much time it would take for the soldiers to travel back to the fiefdom and return with the materials. According to his calculation, they should have been back the previous night at the latest.

“Hey, Javier.” Lloyd, who was lazily swinging his leg on the bed in the tent, spoke.

The answer was quick to return.

“Did you call me?” Javier asked.

“Yes, I did. I have an errand for you.”

“What is it...?”

“I need you to go to the mountain range over there.”

“Is it a search?”

“Yes.”

The two didn’t need to explain. Javier was already aware of what was going on with his young master lately and what concerned him.

“It would be a welcome and search party at the same time.”

“I suppose it will. Their belated arrival can only mean that something happened to them.” Lloyd spoke, his voice sounding firm.

The previous day was the final deadline for Lloyd. The delegation should have arrived yesterday. Lloyd had considered all the factors, their stamina, the weight and size of their loads, and even the delays the rough geography would pose. So, it was sufficient to say that the deadline factored in every possible element that could affect their arrival.

“But no news? This means that one of the two things happened. Something’s up, or they’re just goofing around.”

“I understand. I will go out on a search, taking the same route we took last time.”

“Yes and be careful out there. And while you’re at it, bring me a slushy.”

“Excuse me...?”

“Nothing. Off you go,” Lloyd said as he stuck his tongue out. Javier sighed instead of replying back.

He immediately rose up and stashed his camping bag along with several other items.

Once everything was set, he walked over to the exit. But before exiting, he halted and whipped around with a cynical expression unique to him.

Then, he deadpanned, “Right back at you...”

“Eh?!”

Javier then bolted out of the tent, leaving no second for Lloyd to respond.

“Huh! Hahaha.” Lloyd snorted involuntarily.

But he immediately grew serious a second later. Whew...I hope everyone’s fine. He had a bad feeling about this. Four days later, Lloyd’s bad feelings became a reality.

“I found this, Young Master.”

Javier spoke as he passed a tattered glove to Lloyd. Lloyd recognized the glove right away.

This is the glove we use. Lloyd recognized it because he had personally given those pairs to the soldiers who were doing construction work. Lloyd's face darkened.

He asked, "Where did you find it?"

"I found it in the valley located beside the eastern range. It is marked as 'Plogia Gorge' on the royal map. I found it two days ago."

"Explain more."

"My search initially focused on the route we had used to cross the range. I figured that would give me the best chance to bump into them as they may be coming late. But I didn't meet them even when I went over to Pano Peak and Pesano Peak. Of course, not a single footstep could be found, either. That told me one thing."

"Chances of them slacking around were zero."

"Yes, and after making that conclusion, I weighed the possibility that they might have fallen in an accident. And that's when I picked up this glove in Plogia Gorge and some strands of husks scattered around on the ground."

"So?" Lloyd asked.

"They were scattered by strands here and there. So I followed until I was led to a cave of considerable size."

"Plogia Gorge and a cave...So? Did you go in?"

"Yes, and there I found..."

Javier impassively rolled up his left sleeve, revealing his white arm and there was a serious wound on it, which stood in stark contrast with his nonchalant expression.

“This happened. There was a magic circle at the entrance. It got activated when I took a few steps inside.”

“Hey, are you all right...?”

“Yes, I am fine. It’s just a scrape.”

“A scrape? It looks like a bad burn.”

The wound was considerably big and it wasn’t a simple burn. Javier’s skin looked red and blue as though he suffered from a burn and frostbite at the same time.

“Although I cannot ascertain it, it looks like a form of curse magic. Thankfully, however, I managed to avoid the full blow.”

“I am truly fine. The wound didn’t spread into my muscles. I will be completely healed without any scars as long as I keep using my mana to heal the injury.”

“Okay, that is a relief, and as for the soldiers...”

“Yes, I am worried about the soldiers.”

Javier, who was impassive when he showed his wound, grew serious when he mentioned the soldiers.

“The husks went deeper into the cave. That means that they were...”

“Dragged in there,” Lloyd cut in and finished Javier’s words.

“It appears so.”

Javier lowered his head.

“Even after the blow from the first magic circle, I tried to get in several more times. But that was impossible. Please forgive me, Young Master.”

“Tsk. Don’t be.”

Javier didn’t do anything wrong. He actually did a fantastic job by making it out alive despite the defensive magic in the cave.

“I am a knight. My duty is not only to command the soldiers in the fiefdom but to keep the forces safe and intact. Thus, I failed in my duty to rescue them because I was not good enough. So if you give me another chance...”

Javier paused for a second before continuing.

“I shall return to the fiefdom as fast as possible and prepare to lay an offense on the cave.”

“Are you saying you’ll attack the cave?”

“Yes. Given the force of the protective magic at the entrance and the intricacy of the curse, I presume that a dark sorcerer of considerable power lurks in the cave. The sorcerer must have kidnapped our soldiers with evil intentions”

“It looks like time is of the essence then.”

“Precisely. The longer they are with the sorcerer, the greater danger they’ll be.”

“Hmm. Then let’s go right away,” suggested Lloyd.

His suggestion was out of the blue, as though he was just making a trip to a convenience store to buy some sushi or to an internet cafe for a game. His voice sounded very casual and confident. Javier’s eyes widened at his sudden suggestion.

“Pardon? What are you...”

“What are you, what? You said it yourself. The dark sorcerer took my men. And not to mention, he usurped all of my precious construction supplies. Isn’t that right?”

“Yes, but...”

Javier shook his head.

“But it is dangerous for you to personally go in this one without any prior preparation. It is too risky.”

“You think so?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes. Very much.”

Javier’s gaze was serious and resolute.

“Even I struggled against the defensive magic in there. Your miserable ability in fighting will stand no chance against our opponent, who is no other than a dark sorcerer. No one knows what evil traps are set up there.”

“Dang. Miserable? You’re not holding back at all.”

“It is just the truth when you are compared to me.”

“Well, whatever. So you are saying that I’ll be beaten up if I go now, right?”

“Precisely. I fear that you will be slashed, frozen, crushed, or fried to pieces with your current abilities. All black and crisp like a burnt prawn the cook forgot to pull out of a fryer on Thanksgiving.

“Hey...That description sounded very personal, you know that?”

“Not at all. You misunderstand me, Young Master.”

“Misunderstanding, my ass. It sounded super serious.”

Lloyd chuckled and stood up. Before he knew it, there was a fully packed bag in his hand.

The bag contained food and other supplies that would last several days in the mountain.

“Let’s go then.”

“Excuse me?”

“I told you. We should go to that cave right now. You said we were short on time. The longer we leave them hostage, the more danger they’ll be in.”

“Yes, it is true, but right now...”

“It’s alright. Just trust me on this.” Lloyd spoke as he carried another bag and tossed it into Javier’s arms.

“Come along quickly. If not, I’m going to leave you behind.”

Javier took the bag in a daze. But the knight’s face had darkened. This act was far too reckless. However, there was something Javier was oblivious to but was known to Lloyd.

The cave in Plogia Gorge, no, the dungeon of the dark sorcerer, which he had to leave, appeared in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

In the novel, Javier laid his attack on the cave a few years after the current time. Lloyd had read about it and so, he knew how they should storm the dungeon. However, Javier was completely unaware of this. The guy who got beaten up by Javier in the gorge episode...What was his name? Was it Lupellan?

Crack! Lloyd gritted his teeth. He didn’t care whether or not there was a defensive curse magic circle in there. It was time for Lloyd to teach the sorcerer what fate awaited those who messed with his men and construction supplies. As payback, Lloyd resolved to loot anything that had value in the dungeon. Even the smallest things would become his. Death would be a sweet escape for the sorcerer. But he wouldn’t get it easily. Lloyd was determined to squeeze him dry.

So, in short, you’re dead meat.

With the goals of retaliation and extortion in mind, Lloyd headed to the gorge.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 36: True Repentance (1)

“Master Lloyd, do you plan on going inside the cave?”

“Of course,” Lloyd answered as he looked up at the sky.

There wasn’t a cloud in the sky. Therefore, the sun should have been scorching everything under it. However, the place was completely absent of sunlight and they were instead besieged by dreary shadows. What a foreboding place this is. Lloyd unwittingly shrugged.

The Plogia Gorge turned out to be narrower and deeper than what he had pictured in mind.

So it was extremely difficult for the sun to reach the bottom of the gorge. It looks like this place was out of the sun for tens of thousands of years. Damp moss and unknown mushrooms carpeted the rocks, and not a single blade of grass grew in between the cracks.

It was especially so at the dungeon entrance Lloyd was looking at.

“But it is still dangerous. Like I have told you countless times over the past few days.”

Javier’s distinct cold and dry voice pierced into Lloyd’s ears.

“Master Lloyd, it is not too late to go back. Again, we are dealing with a sorcerer.”

“It would be better to gear up in the fiefdom first and come back here afterward.”

“Master Lloyd?” Javier called again.

“Yes.”

“Are you listening to me?” Javier inquired.

“No. You’re talking to a wall.”

Lloyd, still looking at the entrance, spoke. “By chance, are you a parrot? You’ve been hitting me over the head with the same warning ever since we left the village.”

“When did I...”

“What do you mean, when? You’ve been harping on me nonstop. Master Lloyd, it’s dangerous. Master Lloyd, it’s reckless. Master Lloyd, it cannot be done. Master Lloyd, you hide. I will count. No, not the last one. Anyway...”

Lloyd wrinkled his nose.

“Your opinion. I don’t like it.”

“How so?”

Javier shot back with a question right away.

Lloyd immediately answered him.

“Because you’re trying hard to hide the uncomfortable truth.”

“Excuse me?”

“You won’t be able to deny what I’m about to say.”

Lloyd turned around and faced Javier. Javier’s eyes trembled for a second as Lloyd’s gaze bore into him.

“Javier. No, Sir Asrahan. Let me ask you a question. Let’s say I do what you say, and we return here after properly gearing up at the fiefdom.”

“Yes.”

“What do you think will happen to the soldiers in there? They’ll all die, right?”

“That’s...”

“Right?”

“Yes...It is likely that they will.” Javier nodded reluctantly.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose. But it looked bitter.

“Yes, that will happen. That’s the uncomfortable truth you and I both know. But you made a judgment in your head. The successor of the fiefdom must not be put in danger to save some soldiers. Am I right?”

“Master Lloyd, I...”

“You don’t have to explain yourself. I accept that your judgment is reasonable. But it’s a different story when we know how to bypass the magic circles in the dungeon.”

“Excuse me?”

What now? Javier’s eyes narrowed.

“Do you already have a plan for getting through them?”

“Yeah. I think we can use the Asrahan Core Technique,” announced Lloyd.

“That technique, Young Master?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded.

Lloyd recalled The Knight of Blood and Iron in his head. Javier, you used the technique in the dungeon a few years after you became the sword master. The Javier in the story was much more seasoned than the current knight. With all the experience he had accumulated, he efficiently passed through the defensive magic circles and conquered the dungeon.

He did so by using the mana absorption skill in the Asrahan Core Technique. Thinking of the very method future Javier employed in the story,

Lloyd said, “Hey, have you ever chomped the mana in the air using the Asrahan Core Technique?”

“Chomped the mana?”

“Absorbed them.”

“Yes, of course,” Javier answered. “I do it regularly every day.”

“You bet you are. It’s the same for me, too. It’s a great training exercise because it can be done anywhere at any time,” Lloyd replied.

It was true, and for that reason, Lloyd used the Asrahan Core Technique every time he had the chance. He absorbed the natural mana spread in the air and amplified it just by a hair’s breadth, so no one would notice. This method proved to be an excellent training exercise.

“How do you feel when you absorb the mana in the air?”

“Well...”

Javier thought for a second and answered,

“I feel at peace.”

“Peace? How so?”

“I presume it is because there is always an equal amount of mana in the air.”

“I know, right?”

“Yes.”

That was true as well as the mana dispersed in the air was always uniform. It was rare for the mana to be clotted together or non-existent in one area so Lloyd and Javier absorbed an equal amount of mana into their circles.

“Exactly. It’s always uniform, just like when we breathe in air. But think about it. How would it feel if you used the same technique and absorbed the mana around the hidden magic circles?”

“Eh? Of course, that would...Oh.” Javier’s expression changed.

He gazed at Lloyd in realization.

“The mana that’s abnormally clumped together around the magic circles would flood into my own.”

“That’s right. I suppose this clarifies my message, right?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd brightly smiled. Javier was impressed, but he didn’t show it. The method was quite simple but the first of its kind. Master Lloyd is right. Magic circles are devices that artificially absorb the mana in nature and arrange the energy to cause a magical reaction. So it’s obvious that there would be an abnormal cluster of mana around where there is a magic circle. Therefore, finding the magic circle was simple: Use the Asrahan Core Technique and absorb the mana nearby. Keep absorbing and amble around. Then, watch out for the areas where a large amount of mana is absorbed. That’s where the traps are set.

Afterward, I can estimate the direction and distance of the mana clump. This means that I’ll be able to locate it just by my senses alone without having to see anything directly.

Javier’s gaze moved to Lloyd.

“Master Lloyd.”

“Hmm?”

“This sounds plausible.”

“I know, right?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded.

Lloyd brightly smiled. “So, what now? Feel like charging into the dungeon now?”

“Yes. So please wait out here. I will make the trip alone.”

“That’s not happening.”

“Why not? It’s dangerous inside as well.”

“Yeah, I know,” Lloyd spoke and glanced to the side.

“Hey, tell me, will you really feel relieved if you leave me behind here and go in alone?”

“Excuse me?”

“What guarantee do you have that it’s safe out here?”

“That’s...”

“You don’t, right?”

Javier didn’t answer. Come to think of it, Lloyd wasn’t wrong. Javier couldn’t ascertain that the dark sorcerer was the only dangerous entity in this gorge. If he left Lloyd alone out here and something happened... He wouldn’t be able to protect him. Javier sighed shortly. “I understand. Let us go in together. But on one condition.”

“Condition? Tell me.”

“Promise me that you will run away as soon as the situation turns dangerous.”

“When the situation turns dangerous?”

“Yes. I understand your desire to save the soldiers trapped inside, but your safety is the most important priority. So...”

Javier’s eyes and expression looked determined.

“Run away if the situation gets dangerous. Even if it means that you have to abandon me.”

“Huh? What gave you the idea that I won’t? Doesn’t it go without saying?”

Javier gaped at Lloyd.

“Of course, I will leave you behind and run away in a life-threatening situation. Please, that’s so obvious.”

“Hey, did I upset you? Are you pouting right now?”

“No.”

“No, my foot. Do you know what you look like right now?”

“I do not know. I do not wish to know.”

“Hey, hey, look at that. You’re upset.”

There was a slight wiggle in one of Javier’s eyebrows. Amused, Lloyd picked up his shovel.

The two then neared the dungeon entrance, and they naturally tensed and sharpened their senses as they entered.

Javier took a step forward and said, “I will take the front from here.”

“Yes, go, robot vacuum.”

“What is...a robot vacuum?”

“There’s something like that. It’s used to describe someone pretty.”

“But I am not pretty.”

“You know yourself very well. Focus now, Javier. This isn’t the time to fool around.”

“You started to fool around first...Whew, never mind.”

Javier’s expression became cool. It looked like he was getting focused. His gait became slow and measured. He slowly moved forward, one step at a time. The sight resembled a robot vacuum cleaning up the floor. Javier began to sense his surroundings as he minutely absorbed the mana around him.

Swoosh, swoosh. The dungeon entrance, located at the far bottom of the gorge, was completely windless. The only sound that rang in this area was Javier’s faint footsteps.

Sometime later...Javier stopped in his tracks.

“Here. Three steps ahead of me.”

“Hey, be more specific. That’s too vague. You’ve seen a pocket watch, haven’t you?”

“Yes.”

“Use the time in the watch to point to directions. Twelve o’clock for the front. Six for the rear. Just like that.”

This was how they needed to communicate. Using vague descriptions to point to directions could bring about disastrous consequences. For example, they could step on a magic circle if they pointed in the wrong direction by only a couple of centimeters. Javier must have realized what Lloyd meant. He corrected himself right away.

“Three steps, one o’clock,” Javier said.

“Okay.”

Swoosh, swoosh. Both of them moved. Javier continued feeling the mana in the air.

“Two o’clock. Two steps.”

“What about eleven?”

“Nothing is there.”

“Then let’s take two steps in the eleven o’clock direction.”

“Yes.”

“Found anything?”

“This is the nine o’clock direction. It’s clear ahead.”

“Okay. Let’s get moving again.”

Even after that, they continued to move and explore. There were, of course, some moments of danger. It turned out that the magic circles weren’t the only traps inside.

Clack! Swish! There was a faint noise under their feet. At the same time, arrows shot out from both of their sides. The arrows were smudged in green. They were poisonous.

“Ha!”

Clang! Lloyd raised his shovel to block the arrow flying right into Javier’s chest.

“Whew, thank you.”

“Don’t be. Let’s go. Keep moving. You watch out for the magic circles, and I’ll block the physical traps. Okay?”

“I understand. However...”

“However?”

“Don’t push yourself too much.”

“Aha. Do you mean that I shouldn’t put myself in harm’s way trying to protect you from things like arrows?”

“Exactly. If you find yourself in imminent danger, you may use me as your shield.”

“Actually, that was my plan from the beginning,” Lloyd said.

“You keep saying the obvious. Come on, man.”

Lloyd didn’t respond.

“Don’t tell me you’re upset again. Let’s move.”

They kept moving and Javier kept a watch on the magic circles while Lloyd protected both of them from any physical traps. Can’t believe Javier did this all by himself in the novel.

Of course, he managed to do so because he was a sword master. Now, he was just a high-level sword expert.

Thus, it was impossible for him to do both jobs at the same time. This mana-absorbing task was a wretchedly delicate job. I said a large amount would be absorbed, but actually, it’s like picking out a tiny piece of spring onion after drinking a liter of ramen soup. No, it’s gotta be more delicate than that. In short, the job required meticulous attentiveness. Lloyd had to help Javier laser-focus on his job.

“Okay, okay, let's go. Slowly. Don’t rush.”

Both of them walked forward slowly. It was getting dark already. The light from the outside streamed into the cave no more. The only source of light they could rely on was the torch but they continued to move. The two continued to watch for magic circles and avoid traps for thirty minutes, an hour, and before they knew it, two hours later.

Meanwhile, Lloyd kept going back to the story in the novel over and over again in his head. At the end of the long trap zone that’s where the trap that no one could ever avoid emerged.

It's about here based on the descriptions in the novel. Just then, the path in front of them swerved to the far right and became wide. The widened path ended with a vast, expansive space ahead of them. They finally arrived at the deepest part of the dungeon, the laboratory of the dark sorcerer.

Found it. They saw that the sorcerer was dressed in a black robe and sitting at the center table. The villain jolted out of his seat when he spotted them. He made a hand gesture at Lloyd and Javier. Just then, an inescapable trap was activated and it fell from the ceiling.

Creak. Clack. Crash! A thick metal wall dropped from the ceiling, completely blocking off the path ahead of them. The same thing happened behind them and another metal wall dropped. Crash! Thus, they found themselves trapped in between the gigantic metal walls.

There was more as a spraying noise came from the ceiling, emitting a sweet, aromatic gas into the closed space.

It was a powerful aromatic gas that induced sleep. However, Lloyd and Javier remained utterly calm. Not a single brow was raised. They were so calm that not even a cell in their organs flinched at their predicament.

"Hey, this situation feels quite familiar, don't you agree?"

"Well, it does now that you mention it."

The dark path, closed space, and isolation reminded Lloyd of the ant cave. The two of them chuckled under their breath at this familiar predicament. The two of them responded to the situation so casually that sometime later...The dark sorcerer realized that he had gotten ahead of himself.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 37: True Repentance (2)

Fwoosh! Transparent gas flooded out of the ceiling. The sweet, aromatic gas tickled Lloyd's nose. It drifted deep into his brain, making him drowsy. The gas was notorious in the continent for its potency. It was so strong that even an elephant fell asleep after a whiff.

Once someone fell asleep from the gas, they would never be able to wake up again and die.

The gas was made out of asonia extracts.

Fwoosh! The closed space was soon filled to the brim with asonia gas. If it wasn't Lloyd and Javier but other ordinary people trapped in here, they would have collapsed already and entered into a permanent state of unconsciousness.

However, it was a different case for these two. It's exactly the same as the novel!

Lloyd casually looked around. The asonia gas kept assaulting and entering through his nose and mouth but not a single sign of drowsiness or sleepiness could be traced in Lloyd.

"Are you okay, Young Master?"

"Yeah." Lloyd's lips moved as he replied.

There was a white leaf in between his lips, and it had been staying there for quite a while.

The white leaf was the insonia that could neutralize the asonia's effects. I've come prepared.

The metal walls and fatal sleeping gas. These two things appeared in The Knight of Blood and Iron. Thus, he was able to prepare it prior to entering the dungeon.

He had plucked the insonia flower’s petals every time he saw one on the way here from the village. Afterward, he carefully stashed them in the pocket until he brought them out a while ago and bit them.

So the asonia gas failed to induce sleepiness in Lloyd and Javier. However, biting the leaf came at a cost. This leaf...it’s very spicy. I wonder if this leaf wakes the bitter with its spiciness. Lloyd assumed so as insonia was indeed spicy. Any part of his lips that touched the insonia leaf burned. It burned so much that he wondered if his lips were being burned to a crisp. I’m so glad that I’m a Korean. Thankfully, he was Korean and they loved spicy food so much that they dipped chili peppers into a spicy paste.

Lloyd was the same. He craved spicy food when it rained and often ordered hot wings.

On hot and sunny days, he made fermented bean soup with an excessive amount of spicy peppers that made him sweat. His tastes didn’t change even when he was forced to live in a dorm room after his family’s downfall. He used to pick out the spiciest triangle kimbap when he needed a quick bite in the convenience store. So, his lifelong diet built him a tolerance to capsaicin, and it was helping him very much at the moment. That was how he endured the burning pain and managed to keep biting on the leaf.

“How about you? You okay?” Lloyd asked as he endured the burning sensation.

Javier yawned a little to Lloyd’s surprise.

“Yes. But I am a little sleepy.”

“Sleepy? How bad?”

“Just enough to remind me what it feels like to be sleepy after meals.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Javier was telling the truth. He was a bit sleepy but it wasn't enough to put him to sleep because, after all, he suffered from insomnia. Just like every insomniac, he had attempted every possible method to sleep like a log. He counted the sheep in his head. He put on the sleep shade. He took a bath, even a foot bath. He burned an incense candle good for sleep.

He meditated to find mental peace. He even attempted yoga, which he had heard was a trend in a far continent. When all else failed, he resorted to the last method—sniffing the asonia. However, it failed to cure his insomnia. So Javier's eyes were left bloodshot as he spent many waking nights without a wink of sleep. So, this small attack meant nothing to Javier.

However, it did cause an onrush of sadness in his heart. Whew...Even the large amount of asonia gas doesn't affect me. It's really nothing compared to Master Lloyd's lullaby. Has it reached a point where I can't sleep without his singing? Javier started to feel anxious as he realized that he might be stuck with this man for life. He became absolutely ashamed of himself at the thought. It was so bitter, like a cup of espresso. Javier unwittingly heaved a sigh. He strove to deny the reality and drew his sword. Now that he had learned that everyone was safe and unharmed, it was time for him to get out of this trap.

"Do you want me to smash the metal wall?"

"No."

Lloyd shook his head.

"I know you're not going to slash or stab it. You're gonna use the mana blast to penetrate the wall, right? Just so you know, my eardrums will pop the moment you use it in a closed area like this."

Javier guiltily laid down his sword. Lloyd instead picked up his shovel.

"Let's just dig. I'm going to make a tunnel. You follow."

"Yes."

With that, Lloyd began shoveling. He activated the optional skills to the Asrahan Core Technique. Energizer.

Ding Dong.

[The skill option of the Asrahan Core Technique, Energizer, has been activated.]

[The double circle's efficiency has been brought to the max.]

[You will never get tired for the next ten minutes.]

Time to dig! Scoop! Thwack! Fwoosh! His shoveling looked like a frenzied dance.

Each time Lloyd dug, a bucketful of earth got excavated, and a pit appeared in no time.

It was knee-deep at first. Next, it was waist-deep, and at last, it was deeper than Lloyd's height.

Once he was done with the depth, he changed the direction of the shoveling.

It's time to make a tunnel! The skill lasted only for ten minutes, but it was enough to dig a tunnel that would lead them out of the wall.

Lloyd moved forward, his shoveling full of pizzazz and fierceness. Javier, on the other hand, quietly stayed behind. Staring at Lloyd's back, he thought to himself. He looks like a mole cricket. I'm going to remember this and use it against him next time. If he makes fun of me, I'm going to shoot back at him with this someday.

Javier wrote this expression in his head and he simultaneously looked around lest the sorcerer attack them from the top of the tunnel.

A few minutes later, "Hey." Lloyd called.

"Come over here. Stab to the side, and boom, mana blast. Got it?"

“What about your eardrum?”

“It’s fine. You’re not hitting the metal anyway.”

“Yes.” Javier nodded.

Now that they passed the metal wall through the underground tunnel Lloyd instantly made, it was time for them to come up to the ground. Of course, the surfacing part had to be quick and forceful. They needed to catch the sorcerer unprepared.

“Please step back.”

Once Javier checked that Lloyd was at a safe distance, he held up his sword. He pulled and stabbed.

Swoosh!

At the same time, the three circles spun around his heart at an incredible speed. The circles began to spin at opposite angles and two circles closed in on each other at lightning speed, finally causing a giant collision.

The shockwave spread from the heart and raced along the veins.

It amplified as it traveled to the muscles and reached the sword after navigating through his elbow, wrist, and fingers. It then spurted out from the tip of the sword and exploded.

Boom! The explosion boomed in a vertical direction, and the earth evaporated out of thin air, creating a thirty-feet hole that led to the ground.

“Let’s go! Quick!”

Lloyd, who was covering his ears, yelled. Two of them bolted up to the ground, like two fierce animals escaping out of a zoo. The dark sorcerer’s eyes snapped open in pure panic when he saw them.

“Eek! What the!”

He had complete trust in his defensive posture but it got neutralized so easily.

He couldn’t believe it. No way. That silver-haired guy is the one that didn’t make it through the entrance a few days ago! In fact, he had been keeping a close eye on the situation ever since Javier tried to enter the dungeon.

It had been a while since the dungeon had a visitor. Though Javier walked away because of the magic circles at the entrance, the sorcerer figured that he mustn’t be overlooked. Why? Because Javier didn’t die after being hit by the magic circle, the dark sorcerer thought to himself that this intruder would show up soon.

My prediction was right.

So he began to work. After he was left alone, he ramped up the defenses in the dungeon by doubling the number of magic circles.

That gave him some relief and he thought that he was safe now. He realized that he was wrong. The silver-haired man appeared with someone else, and this time, they managed to encroach into the deepest part of the dungeon. Even worse, they didn’t even activate a single magic circle on their way!

He was shocked. The intrusion was made plain to him only after they made inroads into the dungeon. He didn’t know because they avoided all the magic circles. So, he proceeded to use his last resort for defense.

The metal walls had shot down from the ceiling to trap them, and then a deadly gas was released.

And yet! They managed to bypass that! These two just rose from underground. It turned out they were no ordinary people. It was time to focus or he would lose. He immediately clasped his hands. “Yap!”

His laced hands formed a special shape. Some fingers were bent. Some were straightened.

Mana flowed following his hand signs, to be rearranged in a special pattern. A large four-inch dark magic circle appeared right in front of his hand. Then, he stretched out his hand.

“Take this!”

Swoosh! The magic circle jerked.

A mysterious liquid gushed out like a monster puking out acid.

Splash! The slimy liquid gushed forward, forming a straight line, directly to Javier. Just then, Javier wielded his sword and struck the air. From bottom to top his sword moved vertically, creating a force that shot straight ahead. When it met the gushing liquid, it split in half. The liquid parted by the sheer power of force.

When the liquid spluttered onto the rocks, they soon boiled and melted away. Meanwhile, Javier hurtled toward his opponent.

Kaboom!

The dark sorcerer’s eyes widened in shock. The magic he just cast was an acidic attack, so it couldn’t be protected. It was especially so for swords and shields. It had to be. But he just slashed the liquid in half! With just a force he had created out of the blade! That’s possible? This is impossible. That silver-haired knight is ridiculous. Is he a sword master or something?!

He concluded to himself that he could be a sword master. The knight was different from the rest of the sword experts he knew. However, this didn’t mean that he was going to give up now and surrender. Animosity flashed in his eyes.

“Argh!” He took a knee as he yelled viciously.

He widened his arms and touched the ground with his hands. His fingers dug into the earth.

The mana arrangement changed again depending on the angle and depth of his fingers in the earth. A new magic circle was formed on the ground.

Rumble! The black magic circle wriggled and seconds later, it trembled as it tapped the ground.Bam! A gray hand shot upward under the earth, grabbed Javier's ankle, and stopped him from charging at the sorcerer.

There was more. A second after Javier hesitated, dozens of hands popped out of the ground at the same time.

At first, it was the hand, then it was the wrist, the arms, the shoulders, and eventually, the rotten face.

"Kaaaak! Kwoop! Kaaaak!"

The ghouls thirsted for fresh human flesh.

"Kaaak!!"

Ghouls sprang up around Javier. There were fifty ghouls in total. So, Javier found himself besieged by these demonic monsters. The dark sorcerer started to smile at the sight.

Wahahahaha! These aren't just ordinary ghouls! They are different from the brainless and slow ordinary ghouls! I spent 100 days experimenting and strengthening my magic circle to create them! Their skins are granite-hard! They move like the wind! And they're absolutely obedient to me. And what ferocity they possess! Each ghoul is as strong as a death knight, and one can battle dozens of sword experts! This is my weapon, the powerful and…

Even before the dark sorcerer had the time to smile fully, a strong flash of light burst around Javier. It was followed by a deadly, chilly wind. The fifty ghouls rushing to him stopped dead in their tracks. They all made the same noise a second later.

"Ghoul?"

That was the end of them. Thud, thud. All of them were beheaded and their heads dropped to the floor followed by their arms, legs, waist, and then body. Each section of the body was cut one after another. These so-called enhanced ghouls collapsed like broken legos.

Thud. A cold silence fell over the dungeon. Javier lifted his head in silence, and his cynical gaze moved to the dark sorcerer.

“Do you have any more friends to invite?”

At that moment, the dark sorcerer despaired. I’m going to die today.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 38: True Repentance (3)

“Uhm...Uhm...”

The dark sorcerer, Lupellan, retreated. His heart pounded violently and fear crept into his heart. He wanted to run away but it was impossible.

Step. Step. Javier, the silver-haired knight, was slowly walking toward him. His gaze didn’t leave Lupellan for even a second. He will raise his sword at me if I try anything. Lupellan sensed it. The silver-haired knight would wield his sword the moment he tried to run away.

He would never be able to avoid or block the blow. The wizard couldn’t even dare to think of fighting back.

This was all because he was out of mana. *Who would have thought he’d wipe out the enhanced ghouls so easily...*Lupellan never imagined it. The ghouls were made out of various potions and dark magic. He had specially processed the magic circle, which took him over a hundred days of working day and night to design. So the enhanced ghouls boasted strength that was incomparable to their ordinary counterparts. Their steel-like skin even bounced off axes and their movement was swift like the wind.

Furthermore, they were also fairly intelligent. Combined with their ferocity, even Lupellan was chilled to the bones in their presence. In short, these enhanced ghouls were the perfect killing machine, the ultimate weapon in Lupellan’s arsenal. But who was this silver-haired knight in front of him? What kind of knight could slash through fifty enhanced ghouls in one sweep and turn them into rotten meat?

“You! Who in the world are you?!” Lupellan snarled, resentful.

The veins behind his neck popped.

“Why in the world are you throwing a fit here?”

He found himself yelling in fear, resentment, and desperation. On one end, it was his outcry of self-resignation. He sensed it, too. He sensed that his death was near. I don't want to die.

He wanted to live. There was research he direly wanted to complete successfully. He had to finish it. That was how he could save his lost family and how he could restore his happy past.

That belief was what kept Lupellan going every day. The approaching silver-haired knight looked like a grim reaper.

Tap. Tap. Javier's steps gradually narrowed their distance one by one. There was no escape or opportunity to fight back. What's worse was that Javier was coming near without uttering a single word. This meant that there was no room for negotiation. Zero. That realization drove the dark sorcerer into a panic.

"Stop! Don't come near! Don't come near!" Lupellan screeched, but it was in vain.

The silver-haired knight's blue eyes flashed with murderous animosity.

His sword emitted light and swished in the air. Slash!

"Eek...!"

Lupellan squeezed his eyes shut.

Just then, "Javier, stop."

An unexpected voice spoke. At the same time, a soft breeze touched the back of his neck.

Whew.

Was I beheaded? Lupellan carefully opened his eyes. Then, once again, he shrieked aloud.

He realized that the silver-haired knight’s sword was just an inch away from his neck.

“Ha...Whew!”

His legs wobbled and his body lost strength. Just then, a voice, which sounded like a lifeline, was heard again.

“Don’t kill him just yet, Javier. I have something to do first.”

Who could it be? Lupellan wondered. His gaze moved over to the source. There was a man with black hair. Feeling the sorcerer’s gaze, Lloyd scoffed and said, “I have something to discuss with him, so put the sword away.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Javier removed the sword and Lupellan heaved a sigh. Lloyd walked over to him and said, “Hey, are you all right?”

Lupellan wondered what in the world Lloyd meant when both of them had just fought with swords and magic just a few minutes ago. He didn’t consider Lloyd brazen and regardless, Lloyd was his savior. Lupellan carefully said, “Whew...Whew...It is fine. Anyway, thank you very much for having mercy and sparing me.”

“Mercy? Ha.” Lloyd snickered.

He didn’t save this black sorcerer because he felt merciful. He did so because the sorcerer was useful. It was plain and simple, everything he had done up to this point was for retaliation. Now, it was time for exploitation. At the same time, it was playtime for Lloyd. Going over the plans in his head, Lloyd said, “Mercy...You know, I am not that kind.”

“Anyway, you kidnapped my soldiers and stole my construction supplies. Am I wrong?”

“Uhm...Are you talking about the men I took here a few days ago?”

“Yeah. Are they alive?”

“Yes, they are.”

“Everyone?”

“Yes,” said Lupellan.

“That’s great. Because I was going to kill you immediately if something happened to even one of them.”

Lloyd grinned. The corners of Lupellan’s eyes flinched slightly.

“Uhm...Uhm...You see, I am sorry.”

“Sorry? That’s it?”

“Of course not.”

Lupellan shook his head in a hurry.

“I shall let them go immediately. So, would it be alright if I move for a moment?”

“Be my guest.” Lloyd permitted.

Lupellan carefully rose from the ground. He walked over to a corner of the laboratory and pulled down the lever. Clank! Clank! A metallic noise rang several times and at last, the wooden wall on the side of the lab opened and revealed a prison hidden behind it.

“Tsk, tsk.” Lloyd scowled when he saw the inside.

He couldn’t help himself.

“Look at them. They’ve become emaciated.”

It was true. The soldiers looked terribly sick. There were twenty in total. Ten had been sent back by Lloyd to bring the insulation materials. Another ten, Lloyd assumed, were sent by the fiefdom. The cavernous eyes and protruded cheekbones of the men behind the cell indicated that they had starved.

“I...I apologize.”

“You think an apology would cut it? What were you going to do if they died in there?”

Lupellan became silent.

“You know, I’m starting to get curious. What are you? A pervert? Just what were you planning on doing with them by locking them up?”

“Be honest with me now. It looks like you have your own reasons.”

Lloyd’s tone strangely sounded like a nag and encouragement at the same time. Perhaps that was the reason why Lupellan slowly spoke up after opening and closing his lips in hesitation.

“In fact...Uhm...I was...researching how to bring back the dead.”

“Bring back the dead? Do you mean the undead?”

Lloyd turned to look at what was left of the enhanced ghouls. Lupellan shook his head.

“No, it’s not that. I wasn’t researching the undead. That’s different.”

“Different? What’s the difference?”

“I researched how to bring back those that simply just passed away.”

“Those that passed away? Do you mean resurrection?”

“Resurrection...Yes. It is something like that.”

Lupellan nodded in a hurry.

“I wanted to bring back my family. I mean my wife and children...”

“Why? Did something happen to them?”

“Yes,” replied Lupellan.

For the first time since they met, his voice sounded sad.

“I used to be a sorcerer in an ordinary fiefdom. I had a typical family with a wife and children. I was happy. No, I would have continued to be happy if it weren’t for that awful accident...”

“Stop there. If you’re trying to narrate a tedious story of what happened with every detail, don’t bother.”

“Anyway...I wanted to bring back my family. That’s why I did it.”

“That’s why you researched magic down here?”

“Yeah.”

“Tell me, do you have to sacrifice living souls in order to bring back the dead?”

“That’s...”

“You have to.”

Lloyd’s eyes narrowed to slits.

“And it looks like you’ve tried it out several times already. Am I right?”

The dark sorcerer grew silent and Lloyd’s voice grew edgier.

“You’ve been researching forbidden magic. I presume you have sacrificed dozens of people already.”

“That’s...”

“Shut your mouth, please. Do you know what you’ve done?”

His edgy voice was now becoming rough.

“Bring back the dead? Do you think that’s remotely possible? Use common sense, you idiot.”

“I just...”

“Shut it. Fine. Let’s say that you did it. Let’s say for a second that this outrageous attempt works, and you bring back your wife and children. Do you really think they would thank you for saving them? Wait, yeah. They might. After all, birds of a feather flock together. Maybe not your children, but your wife.”

“Please don’t speak ill of my wife and children.”

“You made me speak ill of them.”

“Why? Don’t you like hearing it? Are you upset? But you have nothing to say, right?”

“Do you now see what you’ve done? Foolish idiot. The dead are dead. It’s courteous of you to let them be at peace once they’re gone.”

At that moment, Lloyd wrinkled his nose. It must be because he remembered his parents.

Lupellan bit his lips. “Of course, I...I know that. But I cannot forget my beloved wife and my children, who were more important than life itself. How can I move on so easily? No matter if I close or open my eyes, they never leave my sight for a second. I cannot bear it.”

“So, you’re saying that’s why you weren’t able to move on?”

“It’s my fault. I know that. I know it’s my greed and foolishness.”

“So? What are you going to do from now on?”

“Forget them...What else can I do?”

Hot tears started to slide down Lupellan’s cheeks. Instead of wiping the tears off, he stared at Lloyd, his eyes red.

“I’m going to stop this research.”

“Really? Are you really going to stop it?”

“Yes. Actually, I am...tired as well.”

“Tsk. You should have grown tired sooner.”

“You can accuse me a hundred times, and I’m still guilty. So in return...”

Lupellan looked away and at the end of his gaze was a huge metal box.

Pointing at the box, he said, “I’m going to give you everything in that box.”

“That one? What’s that?”

“It contains the magical potions and items I’ve garnered to conduct my research.”

“Hmm...It must be expensive.”

“They mean nothing to me anymore.”

“I guess you really made a decision...”

“I don’t have another choice, do I? Here, take this. I’ll open the box for you.”

The black sorcerer walked over to the box. He then bit the end of his index finger in front of it and brought his bleeding finger into its keyhole. The blood soaked into the hole.

“This is a magical lock. It opens up only by my blood. My blood that is spilled when I am alive, that is. Otherwise, even a slight push from the outside melts every item in the box.”

He must have been telling the truth because the box clunked open. Inside, Lloyd saw that the box contained a variety of magic potions, ingredients, and goods, all compressed together.

“This is my way of compensating you for all the damage I’ve caused by kidnapping your men. Please accept it.”

“If you insist.”

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction and Lupellan smiled bitterly. At last, he brought his hand up to wipe the tears off his eyes and when his face was covered by the sleeve, he raised the corners of his lips. You fool. The dark sorcerer smiled. He was extremely relieved that this young man was fooled.

I’m so relieved that this young gentleman thinks himself smart. Plus, this man was slightly greedy and kind at the same time. Thanks to it, Lupellan pretended to be contrite and managed to be forgiven. Yes, it worked. I can collect magical items anytime. I can always make potions again, too. What matters most is getting out of here alive. Regardless of what he had to give, the most important thing was to stay alive. Afterward, he would resume his research somewhere else. This time, he would work even harder to complete his theory.

Then I’ll be able to bring them back. My wife and kids...We’ll meet again. The mere thought of it touched his heart. His heart trembled in sorrow and he wished to leave this place immediately and get back to his research. I’ll increase the scale of my research. Make it bolder. I’ll sacrifice hundreds, not dozens. That would up my success rate. And after that, I’ll be able to get back my happiness and return to the good days. Lupellan clenched his fists.

He told himself that it was time to say goodbye to this young gentleman as he fooled the latter enough.

He could simply leave this dungeon, pretending to be touched and satisfied.

“I shall...leave now.”

“Where are you going?”

“I do not know yet. I am thinking of wandering around until I find land suitable for farming.”

“I see, that doesn’t sound like a bad idea.”

“Thank you. So long.” Lupellan then gave Lloyd a slight bow. With a sorrowful and serious look on his face, he turned around.

No, he was about to when...

“Javier. Let me ask you one thing.”

Lloyd’s cold voice rang.

“How are serial killers dealt with by the royal law?”

“If the murders were clearly done in bad faith, and when there are objective pieces of evidence, testimonies, confessions, ten or more witnesses to back those murders, a noble is allowed by law to execute them on the spot.”

Javier’s sharp answer rang aloud in the place.Lupellan flinched in surprise.

“What? What do you mean?”

Chills ran down his spine. Immediate execution? What’s he saying? Everyone was in a good mood just a minute ago. Lupellan wondered what prompted a change in the young man’s attitude. Swish. Javier drew his sword.

Sensing that this was not a joke, Lupellan hurried, “Why? Why?”

He frantically stepped back.

Looking at Lloyd, he asked, “Are you really going to kill me? Why? Why?”

“What do you mean, why? Isn’t it obvious?”

“Obvious? I don’t get it...”

“Didn’t you just hear? You’re a serial killer.” Lloyd emphasized.

The way Lloyd looked at Lupellan was completely devoid of the naivety that was there a while ago. There was only a cold, bitter expression. Lupellan’s heart grew desperate.

“But, I repented enough, and...I even acknowledged my fault...”

“So?” Lloyd asked.

“I even shed tears! I shed tears as I repented my sins!”

“Crying makes you all okay? Do your sins go away by being contrite about them?”

“That’s...”

“Hey, please, quit your drivel.”

Lloyd snickered in disbelief.

“I thought I told you a while ago. You did all this for your family? To bring back your beloved wife and children? But what about those that died in your hands? Do you think they didn’t have any families? Do you think they didn’t have their own life?”

“Please, you shouldn’t have covered up your sins with your forced repentance or pretended to be penitent. Did you think I’d be fooled by that? You have no idea how many times I’ve met people like you.”

Lloyd’s voice sounded stern. Suddenly, he called to mind his life back in South Korea.

The news was flooded with heinous criminals every day. People kidnapped, raped, killed, and did entirely inhumane things. But barely did they pay for what they’ve done.

That was because of the country’s justice system. Something was off in the system. Heinous criminals got off cheap, receiving only light sentences.

Some pleaded to the judge that it was a drunken mistake. Some claimed to be mentally ill. Others begged the judge that they were genuinely sorry for what they did and the judges sentenced them magnanimously, spewing some outrageous excuses. Each time he watched the events unfold, Lloyd genuinely wondered if the judges had truly gone mad. He had seen plenty of such cases and so, he was able to see through the dark sorcerer's tricks. All this while, he was just dancing to the latter's tune.

It was so I could get a hold of those magical supplies. Lloyd stole a glance at the box.

To be frank, it was the reason he had temporarily postponed killing him. That was also one of the reasons why he painstakingly worked his way into this dungeon with Javier. Now that he got what he wanted, Lloyd didn't need Lupellan anymore. He wanted to take care of this criminal as harshly as possible. I can forgive him, but he won't learn from his mistakes. It's the same in the novel. He gets forgiven by Javier, only to strike back and get his head sliced off.

It was true. As such, Lloyd was convinced that this dark sorcerer would only take his research somewhere else and massacre hundreds.

"So, I'll summarize things for you. You can exaggerate your stories and give me those crocodile tears of yours, but there's something that won't change. It's your character. Do you know what that is?"

"That you are a serial killer."

"And a serial killer must pay for his sin. It's only right," Lloyd announced.

"Hold on!"

"Javier, do as the law says," Lloyd spoke and turned around.

Lupellan frantically pleaded, asking for mercy. Javier stepped forward as he drew his sword.

“I, Knight Javier Asrahan, am here to execute the holy law of the kingdom under the order of Lloyd Frontera, the son of Baron Frontera.”

Swish. Javier mercilessly flourished his sword.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 39: The Friend of the Orc Tribe (1)

The dark sorcerer was dead, but Lloyd didn’t directly watch it happen. Regardless of his new life, he was still Suho Kim on the inside. He certainly didn’t wish to see someone die.

One time is enough experience. He suddenly recalled the last memory of his parents.

Crinkling his nose, Lloyd brushed the thoughts away and came back to reality.

“Hey, hey. Be careful, everyone. Don’t take your eyes off the ground and step on a weird spot. And make sure to look for any rocks, you might trip yourselves.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

The isolation and hunger had weakened the soldiers. Leading them out of the dungeon took a great toll on Lloyd. It was because of the magical traps that still lingered in the cave.

A few hours later, everyone was able to get out safely. Lloyd then told Javier to go in and take the items from the laboratory. Javier did more than what he was asked of by bringing out the insulation material the dark sorcerer had stacked in the corner of the lab. However, Lloyd still had another problem to solve because the soldiers were in terrible condition.

“Whew! These guys are just seconds away from fainting. Hey, give that to me.”

“Eh?! Master Lloyd?”

“What? Give them to me now.”

Lloyd was referring to the wheat straws that would insulate the seokbinggo. The soldier was tottering down the range because of the straws that heavily weighed down on his back. Lloyd casually walked over and yanked them into his arms. The soldier gazed at Lloyd in utter embarrassment as the weight on his back was snatched away.

“Young Master...! I should be carrying that. I cannot let a noble like yourself take the burden...”

“Oh, really? I’m just scared that you will pass out and force me to carry you as well.”

“I will not pass out.”

“You know that’s not true.”

“You are pale as a sheet. Do you know that?”

“That’s...”

“I told you already. It’s fine. Your late arrival already delayed the construction way too much. If you collapse right now, we’ll have to walk slower to take care of you. Am I wrong or what?” asked Lloyd.

“I’m not doing this because I like you. Don’t get the wrong idea.”

“Ah...I understand.”

“If you do, make sure you don’t fall behind. Here we go!” Lloyd shouted and slung the bundle of straws over to his back.

Without waiting for the soldier to respond, Lloyd turned and moved to the tail of the procession. He then set off, keeping pace with the slowest soldier. But of course, he didn’t show this directly. Instead, he verbally harassed the soldier throughout the trip.

“Hey, why do you keep glancing at me?”

“No, I didn’t, Young Master.”

“Like I would believe that. I saw you clearly stealing a glance at me.”

“Please forgive me.”

“You think you’re excused if you apologize? What are you, a civilian?”

“Of course not.”

“Why are you so stiff?”

“Goodness. I’m scared that you’ll tear up if I keep teasing you. Forget it. Let’s just keep walking.”

Even after that, Lloyd continued to verbally harass his soldiers while taking the burdens from the exhausted ones. This process was repeated over and over again throughout the trip.

“Ha, walking was comparatively easier today. I think it’s thanks to Master Lloyd.”

“Right? It was the same for me yesterday.”

“Hey, me too. I was so grateful to him.”

Late at night, the soldiers gathered up at the temporary campsite. Fearing that their voices could be heard, they gossiped with one another.

“But really, do you think the young master came here to rescue us?” a soldier asked.

“Doesn’t it look like that?”

“Well, I think he was also motivated to take back the insulation materials.”

“Even so, he came for us, and that’s what matters. I thought I was really going to die in there.”

“You’re right. I thought so, too.”

The soldiers were deeply grateful to Lloyd for saving them. Their feelings of gratitude amplified when they heard Javier’s advice.

“You should be feeling more than grateful. All of you must live indebted to Master Lloyd for the rest of your life.”

“Eh? Sir Asrahan?!”

The soldiers tensed up at Javier’s unexpected presence.

Javier impassively went on, “I had recommended Master Lloyd to go back to the fiefdom first, gear up, and fight the dark sorcerer. But he didn’t listen to me. He was worried that you all might die before then. That’s why he threw himself into the cave when it was just the two of us.”

A heavy silence fell among them.

“If it weren’t for his decision, you all would have starved to death or been sacrificed as an offering in the hands of the dark sorcerer. Remember that for the rest of your lives.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

The soldiers were deeply touched. It was Sir Asrahan who was telling the story.

A man who never exaggerated or groveled. Since he was a faithful, just, and objective man, everyone could trust his story without any doubt. I cannot believe Master Lloyd did that for us...He was once considered a hooligan and was at the center of countless gossip.

People talked ill of him behind his back, including them.

Yet, the same man now risked his own life and put himself in harm’s way to save them, some low-rank soldiers. Profoundly touched by his sacrifice, the soldiers secretly wiped their tears off in front of the bonfire. They joked to themselves that it was the smoke of the fire and laughed foolishly. A sense of profound gratitude was deeply engraved upon their heart.

Thanks to that, a new message popped in front of Lloyd.

Ding Dong.

[The rescued soldiers are deeply moved by your actions.]

[Although they are the only ones touched at the moment, the soldiers will spread your heroic story once they are back in the fiefdom. This may eventually lead to social achievement.]

Oh, this is good. Lloyd exclaimed internally.

He was grateful that he managed to save his men and acquire precious magic materials.

Moreover, he managed to safely return to the orc village after retrieving all the insulation materials he needed to build a seokbinggo.

As soon as he arrived at the village, he got to work to finish the last part of the construction. There's nothing more terrible than delaying the construction schedule! Constructing something was always a struggle with time. The longer the construction period was delayed, the higher the costs were.

"So we must move super quick. I wasn't there, so you guys got to rest for the past few days, right?"

Lloyd encouraged the soldiers who stayed behind in the village by taking off his clothes and sweating hard as he instructed everyone on the site. He added water to the mud mixed with limestone. Then, he mixed the rice husks, wheat straws, and sawdust in the right proportion. Afterward, he mixed all the ingredients with water until it thickened like porridge. This type of insulation was inspired by the urethane foam used back in South Korea on construction sites. But it was made out of natural ingredients here.

This will do. He then stuffed the natural, handmade insulation in the empty spaces between the limestone bricks and the ground, pressing down every inch to ensure it was airtight.

He did the same with the arch ceiling.

"Okay, make sure that it's airtight! Fill it as much as you can!"

“Yes!”

Lloyd shouted, and the soldiers resonated in unison. The outside of the ceiling got coated with a thick layer of insulation batter. It was topped again with another thick layer of the limestone and mud mixture, which would prevent any liquid from spilling in from above.

After that, the structure was topped with one more thick layer of soil, making it look like a mound. Once it was done, only the tip of the chimney slightly protruded out of the mound.

Lloyd then covered the chimney with rocks and densely planted wild sandburs around the area.

There should be a thick carpet of grass to keep off the sun’s radiant heat.

The grass would be the first line of defense against the heat. Its roots would absorb the moisture that may seep below.

“Whew, this is the last of the sandbur.”

Lloyd removed his shovel. He placed the hunk of sandbur he had plucked along with its root at the top of the mound. Flattening it with his shovel, Lloyd made sure to sprinkle some water on the grass.

That would help the roots grow into the soil and with that last act of shoveling, the seokbinggo was finished. However, there still was another job that needed to be done.

“Oink?! My savior has finished the seokbinggo. But it’s not as cool here as I heard it would be, oink.”

Arosh had rushed to the site, the hairs in his nostrils swaying against the wind, when he heard that the construction was done. Arosh’s pecs burned in excitement as he thought about how the facility’s cold atmosphere would allow them to preserve their food. When he set foot in the seokbinggo, he was surprised. The inside wasn’t as cool as he expected.

“What happened? It’s not very cool here, oink.” “Right? It’s only a bit cooler than the outside, where the scorching sun is beating down. So it makes sense that you’re confused.”

“Yes, it’s only slightly cooler than outside, and I can’t tell if there’s a big difference, oink.”

Orc Arosh tilted his large head as he was slightly disappointed. However, he had trust in his savior. Until now, Lloyd always forged something fascinating, so Arosh trusted that his savior would have a plan this time, too. His expectation was proved to be correct.

“You’re right. It’s not cool here. Not yet.”

“Not yet, oink?”

“Uh-huh. A seokbinggo needs ice, but there isn’t any here.”

“Ice? Do you mean it will get cold if you put ice in here, oink?”

“Of course. Even if it’s a seokbinggo, the facility can’t cool down by itself. Similar to how an icebox wouldn’t get cold without ice.”

“Ice...box? Oink?”

“Yeah, it’s something similar.”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about. Anyway, where do you plan on getting the ice, oink?”

“There is no way to get them. I mean, ordinarily, there isn’t one.”

“Ordinarily, oink?”

“Uh-huh. We’re in the middle of summer.”

“Aha, oink.”

That was when it dawned on Arosh that the scorching sun was shining brightly outside right now. Forget about the ice. It was so hot that he was worried the creek would dry up.

Arosh's nostrils flared.

"But it looks like you have a plan. Am I correct? Oink?"

"You're right."

Lloyd grinned.

"Since I can't get ice the normal way, I'll make them myself and pack them here," Lloyd announced.

"Make ice? How, oink?"

"How else? I should do it very well."

They were in the middle of summer. They obviously had no place to acquire ice. They weren't in the place to reach out to a sorcerer who uses ice magic, either. So there was only one option left: To make ice himself.

I have the Asrahan Core Technique, after all. Lloyd believed that he could make ice if he used the technique properly. Once the plan was made in his head, he got to work right away.

First, he fed a red sunflower seed to Ppodong. Once the hamster grew gigantic, Lloyd asked, "Hey, Ppodong?"

"Ppodong?"

"Do you know the creek over there in the mountain range?"

"Ppodong!"

"Yeah, that's the place. Would you kindly go and fetch water from there?"

"Ppo-do-dong?"

“As much as your cheeks can hold on both sides. Can you do it?”

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

“Oh, why don’t you take Bangul with you on your way? Bangul, eat this sunflower seed. Here you go.”

“Bangul!”

Boom! Bangul grew gigantic after eating the red sunflower seed. Ppodong rode the transformed Bangul on his back.

“Bangul, fetch a huge bucket of water for me. But don’t make them into steel poops. Tense up your buttocks when you want to, and hold it in a little. Okay?”

“Bangul!”

The two giants waddled as they ran off. Sometime later, they came back, with each holding a huge volume of water in their cheeks and belly.

“Good job! Will you spit it in here?”

“Ppodung? Blergh!”

“Bungul! Blergh!”

The two summons vomited water on the rock mold. The mold, which Lloyd had made prior, became filled up with water.

This is like a gigantic version of the ice cube mold that you put in freezers.

Lloyd created them using the granite that was left over from building the seokbinggo. He meticulously chiseled the rough edges every time he had the chance to. The final output reminded him of the ice mold that was commonly seen in South Korean homes, only this one was larger. The ice molds, which were divided into sections, were transferred into the seokbinggo by the soldiers and Lloyd himself. Afterward, Lloyd sent everyone out. He closed the door, and he was the only one left in there.

Let’s get started.

Lloyd moved to the corner of the seokbinggo. He brought the pile of wheat straws and stuffed them into the lapping water.

Then, he fixed the straws at the bottom and to the sides of the mold by tightly pressing them. This preparation would allow him to conveniently remove the ice safely without damaging it if the water froze later on. So, Lloyd meticulously carpeted the straws around the inside of the ice mold. After that, everything was set. He got to make the ice right away.

Okay, time to focus.

He sat cross-legged in front of the ice mold. After rolling up his sleeves, he put his arms into the water. He calmed his heart to concentrate and then activated the Asrahan Core Technique.

Ziiing…

The two quiet mana circles began to rotate like a car engine. Two circles began to rotate around the center, their absorption power revving up. The power expanded as it traveled across Lloyd’s veins and muscles. Past his shoulders, it went down to the arms and fingertips. The mana near the fingertips began to get absorbed. This process was typical of the Asrahan Core Technique. Lloyd, however, was attempting a different variation.

I don’t need to absorb all the mana, just the warm ones.

He absorbed it slowly. At first, it didn’t go as well as he had hoped as the rotation of the mana circles destabilized at times because he wasn’t familiar with this application method. However, Lloyd didn’t give up.

Slowly and carefully, with more focus, he strove to single out only the warm mana floating around the water.

He engrossed himself in the process for a very long period of time.

One hour...Two hours...Then three hours passed by… Just then, the water began to change.

*Fwish...Fwish...*The heat, or the warm mana, started to grow faint. The water began to grow cooler and the thin layers of ice started to form. At the same moment, a message popped into his head. Ding Dong.

[You have developed a new application for the Asrahan Core Technique.]

[Your skill level of the Asrahan Core Technique has increased because of your notable effort.]

Ice making—the last procedure in the seokbinggo construction. Lloyd's research and effort helped him level up in the technique.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 40: The Friend of the Orc Tribe (2)

Ding Dong.

[Skill Level Up!]

[The Asrahan Core Technique: Double Circle Lv. 2]

[Mana amplified to: 220%]

[Skill Options: 1. Energizer / 2. Latent Power Surge / 3. Power Saving Mode]

[Required RP to level up: 120]

The message rang clear in his ears. He exclaimed under his breath as he heard it.

It's working. The ice is freezing. And I just leveled up. This was what Lloyd had hoped would happen. His novel attempt to freeze the water by using the Asrahan Core Technique and absorbing the warm mana looked like a great training exercise.

He became hopeful, and he was spot on. This is way better than I had expected. He could feel the warm mana flowing into his fingertips as he dipped his hands in the water. The task was challenging at first because he wasn't used to it. But once he got the hang of it, it became easy. It felt like he had just succeeded in riding a bike for the first time. Okay, time to ramp up the force.

Crackle…

The two mana circles around his heart gradually rotated at a faster speed.

The absorption power in his fingertips started to get more forceful. More heat flowed into his hand. The freezing speed increased as well. I need to make sure that my hands won't get stuck in the ice. The water was freezing up like a slushie. Lloyd slowly pulled his hands out until only his fingertips kissed the surface.

The heat absorption continued. The heat was then processed in the mana circles and belched through his mouth. His breathing was hot as it puffed from his mouth. It was because of the heat he was absorbing. Hmm. I look a bit like a chimney, but whatever.

What he looked like wasn't important and as such, Lloyd continued to employ the technique. Finally, he succeeded in creating a huge block of ice.

"Whew."

He pulled his hands out and he opened his eyes. The water that lapped in the mold some hours ago was now frozen solid.

Good. I succeeded. Lloyd lifted his head and looked at the ceiling.

He could feel the heat flowing in the air as he used the Asrahan Core Technique. The heat is traveling out of here. Lloyd could sense that the heat from the hot water was traveling out through the arch ceiling and chimney. The hot air in the seokbinggo was leaving this place.

This was proof that the facility was a success.

Based on the light I can see through the chimney, it looks like it's evening now. Lloyd had entered here alone slightly after lunchtime. But it was dinner time after making one block of ice. I'm so slow. At this rate, it's going to be my sixtieth birthday when I walk out of here after I finish making all the ice. Thinking that he should speed things up, Lloyd sat in front of the next ice mold.

He breathed in and out and put his hands in the water. There was slightly more boldness in his movement and he employed the new technique. Crackle...! Oh, it's working. Just a few minutes in, he sensed the water growing slightly cooler. A bit faster. He revved up the rotation speed of his mana circles. The absorbing power, which Lloyd concentrated at his fingertips, got enhanced by another notch. The water was cooling up quickly, and in seconds, a sheet of thin ice formed on the surface. Its texture was similar to a slushie, and it later hardened into a thick block of ice.

Good. Let's keep going! The second ice took about an hour.He was getting the hang of it and he was getting confident. He jumped right onto the next ice mold. This ice block was made more quickly than the previous one.

*About forty minutes had passed.*The ice-making went on and the production time gradually decreased. The next large block of ice took about thirty minutes. The next one was done in twenty-five minutes and another finished in twenty.

Eventually, a block of ice was created within fifteen minutes. Huff, huff. I need to go on!

Lloyd absorbed the heat with his hands and exhaled the warm air through his mouth.

He felt like he had become a human air conditioner. The ice-making task continued through the night. Lloyd toiled until he was finished freezing the last ice mold, and it was already dawn.

"Whew! Ha..."

The prolonged usage of the technique must have taken a toll on him. The world spun around him when he rose. Even so, he felt it was worth it. My skill leveled up again for the technique. It happened when he was finishing up the last block of ice. The Asrahan Core Technique skill increased to double circle level three. The amplification rate increased to a whopping 240 percent. Anyway, I'm finally done with the construction. Lloyd looked around the seokbinggo with a satisfied expression. The warmth Arosh had complained about the previous day was completely gone. The blocks of ice were giving off cold air, so the whole space was very chilly. It was so cold that Lloyd could see his breath in the air like it was the middle of winter.

Okay, time to wrap things up. He was a bit tired but couldn't rest yet. Once again, he used the Asrahan Core Technique. This time, just normal strength. Here I go! Tug! Lloyd grabbed the strands of straws protruding out of the ice molds. When he slowly pulled them up, the block of ice got dragged out of the mold with a cracking noise.

Lloyd then placed it on the thick straw mat he had made in advance. Once it was done, he generously plastered sawdust and rice husks on all sides, finishing off by sticking dry stalks on the top and sides of the structure. He was adding a separate layer of insulation on the ice itself to make sure that it would not melt. The process was repeated until every single ice block was pulled out of the mold and tightly wrapped in straw. Afterward, he stacked one after another to protect the chill chair. Good. The ice will last until the winter. Lloyd's face, which was marred with exhaustion, beamed in satisfaction. He was finally done with the seokbinggo. The time has come for him to be rewarded with plenty of treasures.

***

"Oink! It's really cool, oink!"

"Oink! It's chilly, oink!"

"Oink! Even the ice is delicious, oink!"

"There's a traitor here...Oink!"

It was pure chaos in the seokbinggo. The orcs' eyes widened in utter shock the moment they set foot in the seokbinggo to store the large monster they'd hunted recently. It was very cold inside. Chief Akush was surprised as well.

"I never imagined it would be this cool, oink."

Akush's widened eyes were filled with adoration as he looked around the seokbinggo.

Lloyd shrugged. "Does that mean you doubted my ability?"

"To be honest, yes. I expected this place to be comparable to a cool basement. But this is... Oink."

“This is nothing to be impressed with. Just make sure that you keep the doors locked and protected. Make sure it’s tightly shut during the summer, but leave it open in the winter to let the cold breeze in.”

Apart from this, Lloyd taught the orcs how to preserve the ice and how to acquire it during the winter and put it in there. He imparted the orcs with useful knowledge about how to run the seokbinggo. Perhaps that was why the next thing happened.

“Truly, oink.”

Akush placed his pot-sized palm on Lloyd’s shoulder. His eyes contained trust that transcended the differences between them.

“Under this low temperature, we can certainly store meat until the winter. Human Lloyd, I truly thank you. You not only saved my son but solved my tribe’s unsolvable problem. You are a true friend and warrior, oink.”

“Does this mean that you will accept me as your warrior?”

“Of course, oink.”

“Even when I can’t do the leg workout using statues that only fat wild pigs...I mean, only you can carry?”

“That is correct, oink.” Chief Akush nodded his large head.

“We are friends from now on. You can be scrawny, bony, frail, soft, and incapable of doing the leg workout. You can also look like a delicate twig that’s about to snap. Even then, we will understand and accept you, oink.”

“Hey...Come on...”

“I am joking, hahaha, oink!”

Llyod and Akush roared in laughter. The former because he was dumbfounded, the latter because he was satisfied. Just then...

Ding Dong.

To his surprise, a new message popped in front of Lloyd.

[The orc race has opened up to you.]

[Orc tribal chief Akush has accepted you as his true friend.]

[The orcs now consider you as a friend on equal footing.]

[You can now increase your likeability through orcs and acquire RP.]

[One hundred RP has been rewarded for forming a new connection with another race.]

[Current RP: six hundred and eleven]

Huh? Lloyd opened his eyes wide. I can now earn RP through orcs, too? In truth, Lloyd wanted this to happen ever since he had saved Arosh. He wondered if he could be liked by the orcs and gain RP. But that didn't happen. He couldn't acquire RP from him for some reason. Not a single message about likeability popped up. That was the case even when Arosh considered him to be his savior. So I just decided that it was impossible to earn RP from the orcs. He had lowered his expectations with those thoughts in mind.

But now I know why. There was a reason why I couldn't obtain RP from him. It was because of the barrier between the two races. The two races had never formed a friendship before. That was why Lloyd couldn't acquire any RP from the orcs. Now, the limitation was gone. What an unexpected gain. Lloyd resolved to continue the friendship with the orcs even in the future. Of course, he didn't forget to collect the compensation he was offered now.

"I suppose it's time to fulfill the other agreements written in our contract," Lloyd said.

"Yes, since you built the seokbinggo for us, we will give our fitness tools to you, oink!!"

"And as stated in the contract, I will make new stone tools for you in return."

Lloyd didn’t need to do any extra work because he had been making fitness tools during the construction whenever he had the chance. Bangul pooped hunks of metal, and he linked them together to manufacture metal poles. Then for the weights, he used granite.

Just like that, massively heavy dumbbells, weights, and other tools were manufactured to be gifted to the orcs. In return, Lloyd received a large amount of gold, silver, and other expensive trinkets the orcs had been using to work out. There were more rewards.

“I, Arosh, made a promise to my savior, Lloyd! I agreed to send 120 orc men to the fiefdom once Lloyd is acknowledged as a warrior! I am a manly warrior, so I will uphold our promise today, oink!” Arosh’s shout rang aloud.

120 buff, muscular orc warriors stood in a line. They were those who volunteered to be deployed to the Frontera barony.

“Humans are weak, oink!”

“I want to teach them how to work out, oink!”

“We must go, oink!”

Just like that, 120 muscle evangelists, no, a deployment team was formed in one snap.

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction as he looked at them. I had no idea that I’d gain this much.

His friendship with the orcs paved the way for him to earn RP. The massive piles of gold and silver in the village became his possession.

Lloyd was now able to use 120 orc warriors as laborers. On top of everything, Lloyd had acquired valuable magic ingredients from the dark sorcerer. The more he thought about what he gained, the more content he became.

Good. Very good. The grand plan Lloyd had envisioned when he first met Arosh in the ant cave turned out to be modest. Something greater and more profitable than that had taken place.

“Let us get going right away.”

Everyone set off and left the village, receiving a fervent, enthusiastic farewell from the other orcs. The procession, which was supposedly composed of Lloyd, Javier, and forty civil engineering soldiers, was added with one hundred twenty orc warriors. The ground shook as the huge procession made its way over the range.

Despite the noise, everyone was safe from the threat of the monsters. That was because once the monsters noticed the one hundred twenty orcs grouped together, they sneaked out and took another path.

Sometimes, however, there were brave monsters that tried to attack Lloyd and his procession. But Javier and the orc warriors fought back and sliced them into tiny, minute-sized pieces. They instantly became a great source of protein for the orcs.

So everyone managed to cross the range without much difficulty. Even the large, heavy treasures posed no problem for anyone. It was because, in the first place, they were nothing but fitness tools for the orcs.

“Walking with these is really working me out, oink!”

“I am getting it! It’s stimulating my shoulders, oink!”

“My fat is burning, oink!”

These objects were heavy for ordinary humans. But orcs were different. They loved them.

They rejoiced that these treasures stimulated their muscles during their walk. They looked like buff, middle-aged gym addicts who shouted that there was nothing better in life than weightlifting. Sometimes, the orcs bickered and scrambled for heavier treasures among themselves. They continued walking, chatting, and crossing over the range for ten days until, at last, a familiar landscape spanned in front of Lloyd.

It was the Frontera barony.He was home. However, when Lloyd entered his estate, he was met with a slightly unexpected turn of events.

“Master Lloyd, the baron is currently in the reception room.”

The housekeeper, who came to welcome Lloyd on behalf of the baron and baroness, bowed to Lloyd. Lloyd asked, “In the reception room? Are they with a guest?”

“Yes, Young Master,” the housekeeper replied.

“Who?”

“It’s...”

“It’s what?”

“Mister Shiloh and Meatloaf.”

“Who are they?”

“Uhm...They are the ones who lent the money to the baron...”

“Aha. The loan sharks?”

Lloyd remembered. The scrawny and fatty that visited the baron the last time.

He recalled how he had kicked them out of the estate by mixing up some lies and threats. Of course, with a dash of politeness. Calling to mind the past event, he smiled.

“Nice timing.”

He meant it. He had been meaning to meet with the loan sharks soon and go over the debt problem. I think we click well together. I mean, they came to visit my house just when I needed them! I'm touched.

Lloyd headed toward the reception room. He couldn't help but hum as he thought about the deal he'd strike with those loan sharks.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 41: The Friend of the Orc Tribe (3)

“I am home.”

Creak. Lloyd opened the door and spoke, forcing a calm tone.

The door opened to the inside of the reception room. Three people were gazing toward the door.

“Hmm? Lloyd?”

The first one to speak was Baron Frontera. His gaze was mixed with surprise, gladness, and a shade of embarrassment. Lloyd courteously paid his respect to the baron.

“Yes, I have returned.”

“Yes, I see you have returned safely. Everything is well with you? Are you hurt anywhere?”

“Yes. It’s all thanks to your concerns.”

“Still, you have grown thinner.”

“It’s nothing. Just hard travel over the mountains.”

Lloyd smiled bitterly. He was grateful that the baron asked how he was the moment they met. On the other hand, he felt relieved that he returned to the fiefdom at the most troubling time for the baron. Lloyd thought so because of the two unwelcome guests sitting across from the baron at the table.

“It’s been a while, Mr. Shiloh and Mr. Meatloaf.”

The two loan sharks kept staring at Lloyd without uttering a word.

Shilo was scrawny and Meatloaf was fat. The two looked at Lloyd with distaste.

It's probably because I kicked them out of the estate using my perfect logic the last time they were here. Lloyd seemed to be right about this assumption. Scrawny Shiloh rolled up a corner of his lips. "Oh, look who it is. It's the eldest son of Baron Frontera, the outstanding one."

"Indeed, he is. And what pretense did you bring today to kick us out?" Fatty Meatloaf seconded his partner's words.

Lloyd's bitter smile deepened as he heard them. "I suppose you have been properly invited today?"

"Of course," Shiloh answered.

"I sent a man to the baron in advance, asking if we could visit him. The wise baron happily agreed to see us. Isn't that true, Lord Frontera?"

"Yes...you are correct," the baron said and nodded.

But his face wasn't bright. It was obvious why. He had borrowed a hefty sum from these two so he couldn't dare stop them from visiting down here. Lloyd didn't need to hear the details to notice what was going on between them. After all, he was used to this kind of situation. My father was the same. The loan sharks came to Lloyd's house day after another.

His father suffered from endless harassment, but he dared not stop them. No matter what they said or did to him, he merely hung his head, seconding everything they said and repeating, "Yes, sir. Yes, sir."

Being powerless was a crime as the debtor was the sinner. Those were the words his father spewed in bitter lamentation as he emptied a bottle of soju the night the loan sharks turned the house upside down. Whew. Stop thinking about it. The mere recollection of those memories flooded Lloyd's heart with bitterness. Lloyd sucked in his breath and repressed those bitter memories. He stared at the two loan sharks in front of him. His gaze had already calmed down. Instead of painful memories, his eyes contained calm shrewdness. His voice was much the same.

“Haha. I see. I sincerely welcome you then. Have you been offered any drinks yet?”

“I don’t want drinks. I want something else.”

Scrawny Shiloh provocatively retorted. Fatty Meatloaf seconded his words again.

“For example, a mine.”

“A mine?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes, a mine,” Meatloaf spoke as his paunchy cheeks tumbled.

His eyes, which were buried under the fat around his eyes, flashed with greed. Punk. The mine you constructed. The idea had suddenly come to him. He remembered the coal mine constructed in the Frontera barony. People said that it was constructed by the soldiers, and it was led by the baron’s eldest son, the notorious brute. At first, Meatloaf didn’t believe it.

He didn’t believe the barony could ever build a mine. He scoffed and mocked that it was an impossibility because the barony wouldn’t have any money to construct one.

However, he was wrong as rumors of such kind continued to spread. They claimed that there was an accident during the mine drilling, wild ants almost got out of the caves, and the brutish young master achieved a heroic rescue to save everyone.

Rumors of all kinds spread one after another and reached Meatloaf’s ears. That was when things started to look odd, even for Meatloaf.

So he sent some people to look into the Frontera barony and see what was happening there.

“Who would have thought the eldest son of our dear baron had such talents? Flat stones? A heated flooring system? I heard you saved some money by making some weird things and talking the villagers into buying them.”

The news had shocked him at first.

“Thanks to that though,” Meatloaf went on, “some things cleared up for us at last. The baron has been faithfully paying his interests in recent days, and now, I know where he got the money. It came from selling the heated flooring system or something like that.”

“And with the money left, he paved the road and dug a mine. Smart. Really, kekeke.” Scrawny Shiloh snickered.

He couldn’t help it. A coal mine? And a new one even? His senses were tingling, and they were excellent at spotting money-making opportunities. If he got his hands on that mine, it would surely be a golden goose for a while for both of them.

“As such, that’s why we are here. To visit the dear baron and have a nice, very nice conversation.”

“What do you mean by a very nice conversation?”

“Let’s say we’re striking a deal that is mutually beneficial.”

Shiloh greasily smiled at Lloyd’s inquiry, and then, he turned to the baron. He gave an arrogant look to the baron.

“Why don’t you tell your son directly?” Shiloh demanded.

The baron stayed silent.

Shiloh clicked his tongue. Lifting his sharp and bony cheek high, he said, “If you have no plans on telling him, I will do it. Simply put, the baron will hand over the rights of the mine to us, and we will exempt him from three months of interest. But you see, the baron has been turning down our offer for some reason.”

“What does the young gentleman have to think about it? It doesn’t seem like a bad idea for you to directly persuade your father. This offer we’re making…don’t you think it’s superb?”

Superb, my ass. I worked my butt off day and night to construct the mine, and they're exempting what? Just three months of interest? Lloyd was at a loss of words. It was too ridiculous. He clenched his fists unwittingly and gritted his teeth. He neither lifted his fists nor scowled.

He knew he would be giving them the upper hand in the negotiation if he let them know that they angered him. The angrier I am, the more relaxed I should become. The more annoyed I am, the slier I should act.

"Oh, my! The deal you're suggesting sounds like a win-win to me."

"Right?!"

Right, my foot. Let me show you how I'll turn things around so that the only winner here is me. Making such a decision in his head, Lloyd grinned.

"So I am going to make a suggestion as well. Will you hear me out?"

"Are you negotiating? I don't think there's a reason I should listen," one of them grunted.

"From now on, we will be repaying our debts in parts. Partial repayment of some sort. And any future interests will be lowered according to the principal that will be reduced as we keep repaying."

"What...?"

"Oops, did you say you didn't need to hear it? But I suppose you did already."

A look of distaste played across Shiloh and Meatloaf's faces. Stroking his plump chin, Meatloaf said, "I don't think I can agree to that."

"I agree. That'll be difficult. We don't do partial repayments. It's our policy," Shiloh seconded.

He then went on, "If you're going to pay, it must be in full. Paying in parts just won't work. That's not how we do things."

“Ha. Do you mean that we should pay that hefty principal all at once?”

“Of course.”

“Then do you mean that we should keep paying the exorbitant interest all the while?” Lloyd asked.

“That’s how we do business. Didn’t you borrow money from us, knowing all that?”

Shiloh raised his eyebrows, throwing a confused look at Lloyd. What Shiloh said was actually reasonable. After all, they were loan sharks. Their goal and business methods were to lend the least amount of money and make more of it through exorbitant interests. So, there could never be such a thing as partial payment for them. The principal did nothing but increase.

How many in this world would be able to pay off the exorbitant amount of money all at once? That would be impossible, especially for those who reached out to these loan sharks to get some quick money. This means that those who borrowed money from them would be ensnared in the trap of unpayable debt. Like ants trapped in the ant lion’s pit, no one would be able to get out no matter how they struggle.

They would be sapped of all body fluids and end up as empty shells. And when the debtor can’t hold up any longer and files for bankruptcy or dies, they purchase their real estate and whatnot to sell at a high price. This was the two loan sharks’ favorite business tactic. In addition, it was the same trap Baron Frontera fell for. Lloyd decided to put a stop to this scam. If I don’t end this now, they’ll never leave me alone no matter how much money I make. The repayment should be accepted in parts and the interest rate should be adjusted according to the decreasing principal. Many things would change once he could get these two to agree to his demands. It wouldn’t be a private loan anymore and it’d be similar to a normal loan. Repaying them would become much easier.

“So that’s why I’m making a deal here. How does that sound? This offer I’m making—don’t you think it’s superb?”

It didn’t matter to Lloyd whether they scoffed or not. He put on a brazen expression and pushed forward. Of course, Shiloh and Meatloaf’s snickers grew louder. Shiloh didn’t even care to hide the mockery in his smile.

“It looks like this young gentleman has lost his mind today. What strange requests you keep griping about! Did you really think that we would accept this outrageous deal of yours?”

“Of course, I do,” Lloyd said.

“Of course?”

“Yes,” Lloyd confirmed.

“Why is that?”

“Because I brought a friend who’s excellent at negotiations.”

“What...?”

Shiloh cocked his head to the side. Meatloaf frowned, the wrinkles on his forehead visible and deep.Lloyd turned around and toward the door, he said, “Hey, you can come in now.”

It was the moment Lloyd spoke out. Just then…Slam! Fwoosh! The door of the reception room opened with such force that even Lloyd wondered if it would be snapped in its entirety.

It created a gust of wind so strong that the collar of Lloyd’s shirts and two loan sharks’ hair swayed in the air.

Then someone bellowed in a loud, crying noise.

“Nice to meet you! I, Orc Arosh, on behalf of the Sand and Steel Tribe, have come to meet the master of the Frontera barony, oink!”

Whoosh! His piercing shout echoed through the room.

Shiloh and Meatloaf unwittingly covered their ears with their hands.

Frightened to the bone, they buried themselves in the chairs. The baron was just as frightened as them.

“Hey, uhm...Long time no see?”

“Yes, oink!”

“Have you come here with my son, Lloyd?”

“Of course! I have come to send the will of my chief, oink!”

“His will?” The baron asked.

“This, oink!”

Stomp, stomp, stomp! Arosh strode across the reception room with his buff muscles.

He tightened his pecs when he passed the frightened loan sharks and placed something heavy on the table. It was a fang of a giant monster.

“It’s the fang of Kargas, which can be hunted by only the bravest and most courageous warrior. The chief wanted you to have it as a seal, oink.”

“A seal? What seal?”

“A seal of blood alliance, oink.”

“What?” The baron’s eyes widened in surprise.

And Arosh continued to explain. “The whole tribe is indebted to Lloyd Frontera. Not only that, he is one of the historically few humans who are acknowledged as the warrior by us the orcs, oink.”

“What...” The baron’s eyes became larger.

It was only natural. Lloyd got acknowledged as a warrior by the orcs? Lloyd had achieved what he boasted he would do before. It hadn’t been an easy task at all. No, it was almost impossible. Of course, there were a few exceptions.

The most popular story was about an anonymous girl who was acknowledged by the great chief Akash hundreds of years ago. However, that was an event that happened in the distant past. It was also only recorded in history books, so its veracity could not be ascertained.

So, the baron barely expected that Lloyd would be able to get approved as a warrior by the orcs when he sent Lloyd away. A similarly unrealistic event was happening now, officially being announced by Arosh, the formidable orc warrior and the son of the chief.

“Moreover, you are the father of Lloyd Frontera, the lifesaver and warrior. You are fully worthy of forming a blood alliance with my tribe, oink.”

Arosh's voice was sincere, and his expression was solemn.

“How does that sound, Lord Frontera? Are you willing to take my chief’s will and form a blood alliance, oink?”

The baron swallowed. This was a great opportunity he never even dared to dream of.

Forming a blood alliance with the orc tribe… This meant that the Frontera barony would become an official member of the alliance of the orc tribes.

“Of course.”

This wasn’t something to hesitate over or sleep on. The baron nodded his head after making a decision. Arosh smiled in satisfaction, revealing his fangs.

“Good! From now on, the Frontera barony is a blood ally of my tribe! We are friends, brothers, and sisters, oink!” Arosh declared.

The baron and Arosh shook hands. While this was taking place, the two loan sharks merely remained in their seats and dazedly looked at the scene.

A little later, when Arosh looked at the two, they found themselves flinching and shuddering.

“But who are these people? Arosh heard everything outside the room. Those humans kept looking down on the baron, oink.”

Scrawny Shiloh and Fatty Meatloaf visibly trembled. The following question of Arosh made their hearts race faster.

“Tell me, are they your enemies, oink?”

The barony and the Sand Steel Tribe were allies by blood. The barony’s enemy was the tribe’s enemy. The virtue of a warrior was to immediately execute the enemies of the tribe and the orcs were famous for being sticklers for paying back a favor. Unfortunately, the two loan sharks knew quite well about the customs of those orcs.

“Hmm, I am not so sure. But they may, unfortunately, become one when they turn down my offer.” Lloyd smiled and teasingly commented.

When they heard Lloyd, cold sweat started to drip down the two loan sharks’ backs.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 42: How to Solve a Food Shortage (1)

Scrawny Shiloh and Fatty Meatloaf made a run for their lives. They did so after acquiescing to Lloyd and taking up his offer. They had no choice. Orc Arosh was flaring his nose beside them. He glowered at them with eyes akin to an angry gorilla.

He was ready to immediately lift the table and slam their heads with it as soon as Lloyd declared them an enemy of the Frontera barony. There weren't many people who could remain calm next to an angry orc. The two loan sharks weren't an exception.

We might really die. The sweat glands in their backs opened up, and they started to sweat profusely, but their sense of trepidation and nervousness wasn't groundless. They knew very well that orc warriors cared little for human law.

If things go south, he might just kill us right away and run back to the wasteland. If that were to happen, they would die in the hands of the furious orc. They would be dying for nothing. After quickly assessing the situation in their heads, the two immediately flashed a smile usually reserved for potential customers.

"Eh? When did we say that we won't accept the young master's offer? Of course, we will take it. Yes, yes, of course, we should," Meatloaf spoke hurriedly.

Shiloh agreed without any hesitation. "Of course we will, considering our relationship. Do you have a contract? I can sign one right away."

"Is that so? My, I am filled with gratitude." A sly smile formed on Lloyd's face.

Lloyd handed the contract to the loan sharks. It was about two things. One was permitting the baron to pay the debt in part and another was reducing the amount of interest according to the remaining principal. The two loan sharks signed the contract, enduring the welling-up bitterness in their heart.

The two not only signed but also stamped it with a seal, but that was only under duress. Lloyd was silently pressuring them.

“Then...So long!”

As soon as they stamped the paper, Shiloh and Meatloaf bolted out of the house like a puppy that needed a potty break. Lloyd had struck a deal and he got what he wanted.

Very good. I was able to get the best result possible in my current situation.

The plan to threaten them with Arosh was very effective. Orc warriors were not restrained by human laws.

They were above the law in the most literal sense. The loan sharks loved to abuse the law and system. So there wasn’t anyone more perfect to counter them with than Arosh.

Of course, if I could just follow my whim, I’d have threatened them more severely to clear the entire debt. Lloyd couldn’t do that because it was impossible in the first place.

It’s illegal. Sure, they’re loan sharks, but it’s true that this barony legally owes them money.

If Lloyd pushed himself and completely nullified the debt by threatening them, the two loan sharks would report him right away.

He would probably be charged with financial blackmail. In short, the entire barony would be caught in a legal debacle. I can’t let that happen. However, the two terms he had gotten out of the loan sharks a while ago fell within the confines of the law. That was the farthest he could go. In other words, he had managed to extract the cream of the crop in this situation.

I’m satisfied for now. I’ll get nothing if I try to get everything. One step at a time, and the way out will appear. He still had a long way to go to pay the entire debt but he believed that he would be able to pay off every penny if he kept working hard. Thinking that in his head, Lloyd turned to face the baron and Arosh.

“So, now that our barony and the Sand and Steel Tribe have become friends, let’s take a celebratory selfie...No, a painting, shall we?”

“That sounds like a good idea.” The baron nodded happily.

Arosh titled his head at the word ”celebratory painting.” Lloyd instructed the housekeeper to summon an artist. The Frontera barony was a remote province in the eastern region of the kingdom. The Sand and Steel Tribe, the powerful tribe over the eastern mountain range.

The two powers that were poles apart had formed a blood alliance. It was truly a historic moment.

***

The following day. Lloyd began to busy himself without getting some rest to relieve his travel fatigue. I don’t have any time to space out. Time wasn’t on his side. Even now, time was flying by before he knew it. Each passing day meant a day closer to the payment deadline—he couldn’t waste any time. He had to work harder. Lloyd wrote down a list of things he needed to get done in order.

First, I want to take care of the treasures I received from the orcs in exchange for building the seokbinggo. The gold and silvers were long used as fitness tools so they were damaged in many ways. Still, disposing of them at once would amount to something quite considerable. Even if he considered the damages the treasures accumulated from poor treatment, they would cover about twenty percent of the debt.

Apart from the treasures, there was something else as well. The metal bars Bangul had occasionally excreted were stacked up quite high. A portion of them was for sales, while the rest was for future construction. Add to that and the treasures, and I might be able to pay thirty percent of the principal. But there is no way to sell them right now.

Even if he owned precious and expensive items, they meant nothing if no one wanted to buy them. The Frontera barony was occupied by ordinary farmers, woodcutters, and some small merchants who sojourned in the fiefdom. There was no one to purchase the treasures and metals.

Even so, I can't hand those over to the two loan sharks. They'll surely haggle the prices of these items way too low. So I must cash them out. The loan sharks had to be paid in coins.

Once he made up his mind, Lloyd resolved to travel to a big city soon to sell those treasures and metals in exchange for gold coins.

Of course, he would need to prepare first before going there. Should he travel all the way there with such a huge crate of items and sell nothing... Should he find no buyers… He would be wasting both time and effort. Every step he takes would be in vain, and so Lloyd went to the baron. He asked the baron to find a merchant who could buy the items he had brought here a few days ago.

"I see that it must be taken care of first. Yes. I will ask around for the merchant. Once I find a buyer, I will arrange it, so you can go to the City of Cremo with those items of yours."

Cremo was a central trade city in the Cremona region, and the Frontera barony sat in the middle of it. Whew, so now, I just have to wait until everything is arranged for me to dispose of those items. In the meantime, I will deal with the others. Another task of priority was excavating coal.

That's why I invited the orc miners. Lloyd lifted his head. The lot space in front of the mine.

one hundred twenty buff orc miners stood there. Lloyd shouted toward them, "Okay, so I believe you have already heard what kind of work we will be doing."

"We've heard, oink!"

"Dig, oink!"

“Break, oink!”

The orc miners lifted their large fists and flailed them around. Lloyd repressed his smile.

“Yes, you are right. We will go into the mine. After that, we will excavate the coal and split and break the rocks.”

“Breaking is fun, oink!”

“I am excited, oink!”

The orc warriors became even more excited. They lifted the pickaxes and shovels that were given to them to use. Their energy was so intense they looked like they were preparing for battle and perhaps that was why the orc warriors widened their already large eyes when they heard what Lloyd said next.

“But not everyone here will be working at the same time. Because, you see, every job has a proper order.”

“What, oink?”

“What do you mean, oink?”

They were curious and they cocked their heads to the side. Lloyd continued to explain.

“Everything that I do is for the sake of ensuring efficiency and safety. Now, look from there to there. And from here to there. Okay, good. Let’s divide into groups.”

Lloyd commanded the orc miners, motioning. After a small bustle, the orcs divided themselves into four groups, with thirty orcs in each.

“Good job. And now, please name your groups for easy identification.”

“Chest, oink!”

“Back, oink!”

“Shoulders, oink!”

“Legs, oink!”

The orc miners bawled the names. Just like that, the names of the four groups were decided in a clip.

Lloyd spoke, “Good job. And now, I will inform you of the schedule for each group.”

Deploying the orc miners by dividing them into groups...That was Lloyd’s plan.

Two shifts every day. One in the day. The other at night. They would be working for six days and on the seventh day...Everyone will rest. After all, rest is crucial. Then the following week, the night and day shifts would be switched. Those who pulled the day shift in the previous week would do the night shift and vice versa. Once such a plan was announced, a commotion broke out among the miners.

“Then we will go in there first, oink!”

“We will dig for coal all day, oink!”

“Workout! Workout, oink!”

The orcs just saw the mine work as exercise…And because of their passion, Lloyd had to sweat a lot to quell them down. It took him a lengthy explanation of how muscles grow faster when their scheduled workouts and breaks are balanced. Aside from this method, Lloyd supervised the men in other ways.

The mine work is tiring and dangerous. Each group was added with five civil engineer soldiers. He appointed them as safety guards. Moreover, a ventilation system was installed in the mine and anti-dust masks were provided. Working after hours was banned and Lloyd installed bath facilities at the entrance of the mine. Not only that, he gave the orc miners a lodging where they could rest up and be at ease.

On top of that, there is also storage as well. He expanded the storage annexed to the estate.

The storage was for stockpiling the coal. Lloyd had to spend a whole month making a proper excavation system.

Meanwhile, the orc miners went all out and boasted their strengths with their entire hearts.

They impeccably satisfied the expectations Lloyd had for them. Truly, they were the best miners there were. The daily labor was nothing but helpful exercise for them. They were never tired and their hearts brimmed with zeal. They wielded pickaxes with impressive strength and they could even push the extremely weighty wheelbarrows. Thanks to them, the coal excavation took off lightning-fast. Wheelbarrows fully loaded with coal were wheeled out of the mine every hour and driven along the paved roads to be stacked up in the estate storage.

Each time it happened, Lloyd found himself growing more content. Good. Very good.

The bituminous coal would be translated to money when the winter came. The thought of it brought a satisfied smile all over his face and there was something else that pleased him.

Ding Dong.

[The heroic story about you is being spread throughout the fiefdom.]

[You have set an example to the others by boldly risking your life to save the soldiers kidnapped by the dark sorcerer.]

[The rescued civil engineer soldiers have been praising you nonstop to their families, relatives, and acquaintances all through the month.]

[Now, everyone in the fiefdom has heard about your feat.]

[Everyone in the fiefdom sends their praises to your noble valiance.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 300 RP.]

[Current RP: 911]

Great.

This was another achievement he hoped to obtain since he got back to the fiefdom and at last, his hope materialized when he earned three hundred RP. RP is an asset I can save up and use whenever I need to. It was an intangible asset and weapon that only he could access.

However, despite the flood of accomplishments, he didn't idle around and lose focus. There was still a long way to go and that long way wouldn't be a walk in the park. It would instead be rife with small and big obstacles throughout the way. So, the obstacles that he could predict in advance had to be cleared or prepared for.

"For instance, one of the potential problems would be the awe-inspiring appetite the orcs have."

"Appetite, Young Master?" Javier asked when Lloyd spoke to him that night.

Javier lifted his gaze to look at the young master. His question brought Lloyd to smile while sitting on the desk in the bedroom.

"It's just as I said. They have amazing appetites. They eat like a madman."

It was true. The orcs' appetites were incredible. If one of them were to debut as a mukbang streamer in South Korea, he would draw a massive audience.

"But if you think about it, it's pretty obvious. They are huge. Moreover, their huge body is mostly composed of muscles. Plus, they use a lot of energy from working half a day in the mine."

“Right. I was a bit surprised earlier by how much they eat.”

“Right? We’re holding up pretty well because we have stored a huge volume of food, but give it a year or two. We’ll run out of food, and all hell will break loose.”

That was true as well. Right now, Lloyd could feed them with the food that had been previously amassed, but one or two years later, the food storage would become empty.

“And that means we’d have to buy rice from the neighboring fiefdom at a high price. If we don’t have a plan, that is.”

“You sound like you have a plan in mind.”

“Do I?”

“Yes.”

“Ding! You are right.”

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction.

“My dear Javier, it looks like sticking around your wise, older friend is paying off. You’ve gotten smarter.”

“I was smart in the first place,” Javier rebutted.

“Oh, yeah?”

“Yes, and besides...”

Javier replied impassively.

“I am not your friend, Master Lloyd.”

“Oh, is that so?”

“Yes.”

“Don’t you sometimes have this growing impulse in your heart to call me ‘friend’?”

“I mean this in the most assured and certain way. I never, ever want to call you such.”

“You hate the idea that much?”

“Yes.”

“Hmm...I was going to teach you something extraordinary if you call me your ‘friend’ just once.”

“Are you curious what the secret is?” Lloyd allured.

“No, never,” Javier said flatly.

“Tsk, you are a brat.”

“Thank you, Young Master. Although I am a bit curious what solution you have in mind.”

“You mean the solution to solve the food shortage because of the orcs?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded.

This young master he served...Sometimes, the man flustered him. Right now was one of those times. I can never make out what he is. The young master spoke nonsense all day.

Even more, he was petty. There was also a side of him that was sly and evil. To be completely honest with his feelings, Javier slightly hated him and found him difficult. At times, Lloyd was unpredictable, enigmatic, and mysterious in the most extraordinary way.

The present conversation was one of those moments Javier felt that way about him. How he scoffs casually and explains the plan that Javier had never even fathomed in his head.

“It’s simple. I am going to turn the wasteland on the south side of the fiefdom into farmland. Well, if you’re asking how I will do it, I’m thinking of mixing the vertical drain (VD) technique.”

“How’s that?” Lloyd smiled at Javier, the latter feeling overwhelmed for some reason.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 43: How to Solve a Food Shortage (2)

The Maritz Wetland was abandoned land. It was filled with muddy swamps, which were inhabited by unidentified living creatures. As such, erecting a building or doing farm work there was impossible. The land was useless and was good for nothing. The Maritz Wetland was treated as if it was nonexistent for generations. The Frontera barony was to its north and the Lacona viscounty was to its south. It was ignored by both lands, but nothing was surprising about that since everyone deemed it dead and barren in the first place.

But of course, those perceptions will all be a thing of the past. It will be different from now on.

Thinking that, Lloyd lifted his head. He turned around and carefully asked, “Are you alright?”

“Of course.” Baron Frontera, who was following behind Lloyd, nodded.

Lloyd quickly gave a full scan of the baron with his gaze. The baron was wearing knee-high boots. The pair was made out of oiled leather, so it boasted an almost perfect waterproof function. Unfortunately, however, today was the day the pair failed to do their job properly.

“It doesn’t look like you are alright. It looks like the water and mud have already gotten into your boots.”

The thing was, the water level in this swampy area went above their knees. So each time the two took a step, they sunk into the water up to their thighs. Thanks to that, the inside of the baron’s boots were already thoroughly soaked. Even his trousers were thoroughly ruined as well. Surprisingly, the baron turned out to be a man of tenacity.

“It’s alright. I expected this to happen.”

“Hmm, is that so?”

*I don’t think he actually did...*Lloyd looked back on what had happened two hours ago.

***

Two hours ago. Lloyd went to the baron’s office. He went there to discuss his plans to develop the Maritz Wetland that sat south of the barony. The reason and purpose behind the development were clear. It was to produce more food for the fiefdom. I need to feed the orc miners. And if not for that, it’s always encouraging to expand the agricultural land of the fiefdom.

Agriculture was the foundation of all industries. That was the case even for advanced societies. The basic issue of food had to be resolved before they could move forward.

Lloyd thought the same principle applied to the fiefdom.

Orc miners are just the start. One day, the population here will grow bigger. If we can’t produce food by then to meet the population level, we’ll be in trouble.

The number of mouths to feed would increase, so he needed to expand production accordingly but the fiefdom was out of land to farm on. The only possible option left was the Maritz Wetland, so Lloyd needed to drain the water there.

A reclamation construction was essential, but to do that, he needed the baron’s approval.

So he revealed the plan to the baron, coming prepared with a way to persuade him if he refused. Shocking him, the baron gave an unexpected answer.

“Do you then plan on observing the topography of the wetland?”

“Excuse me? Well, yes. That is my plan.”

“Okay. Then I am going with you.”

“Excuse me...?”

“Don’t take the servants. You and I can go, just the two of us. First, I should get changed into something more comfortable. Wait here a little.”

The baron immediately started to change his clothes without waiting for Lloyd to answer.

He put on something more comfortable to move in and a pair of leather rain boots.

He even tucked a small knife into his waist. What was more, he even ordered one of the servants to make a lunchbox!

“Hmm...I am not going on a picnic, you know,” Lloyd explained.

“I know.”

“Then, why bring a lunchbox...”

“Surely, it would be troublesome if we get hungry in the wetland.”

“I know that, but still...” persisted Lloyd.

“Am I wrong?”

Lloyd had to shut his mouth.

The baron wasn’t wrong about that but he was wrong to think of this as a picnic. And he thinks it’s a happy one. Lloyd couldn’t wrap his head around the baron’s actions.

He was heading to look around and survey the murky swamps in the wetland, but the baron got ready as though a picnic was waiting for him.

What is he so excited about? Even when he and the baron went out of the estate, cut across the fiefdom toward the south, and floundered around in the muddy swamps after getting there, the baron’s attitude still was a mystery to Lloyd. It was the case even at this moment.

“Whew! Wheeew!” The baron breathed heavily, panting.

Each step he took in the swamp turned him into a slapstick comedian. The reason was simple: The baron had raised his arms to save the lunchbox. Unable to just watch any longer, Lloyd said, “Uhm, can you give me that lunchbox basket? I will hold it for you.”

“No, I am fine.”

“But if you keep your hands raised like that, your arms will start to hurt, and balancing yourself will be more difficult.”

“It’s not hard. Focus on your work,” the baron insisted.

“Well, having that in my arms won’t affect what I’m doing, really.”

Lloyd was telling the truth. He had been using the surveying skill from earlier and didn’t have to focus to use it. The data from the survey results is stored automatically.

The data from the survey could be called upon anytime he wanted when he returned to the estate later. He could focus on it then and so, right now, holding a picnic basket for the baron was a cinch. The baron, however, was stubborn as a mule.

“I’m the one who told you that I would tag along. So how can I burden you?” the baron said.

“Hmm, you don’t have to think like that.”

“I am really fine, so do go on.” The baron motioned with his eyes.

“Yes,” said Lloyd. “Shall we then rest for a bit over there?”

Straight ahead, there was an elevated area in the middle of the wetland. It was a small mound whose soft patch of grass rose above the water. Even so, it can only be a few feet wide at best. It was the perfect place for a respite.

“Please follow me. Don’t trip yourself.”

“Do not worry. Whew!”

Lloyd led the baron to the mound. Once he was up, he noticed a considerably flat and wide rock. Lloyd sat on the rock and collected his breath. Meanwhile, the baron opened up the basket beside him. Inside was a wooden lunch box wrapped in pure white cloth.

“I’ve been wondering, what’s in there that makes you care for it so much?”

“Isn’t it obvious? I brought the most delicious food in the world.” The baron grinned as he opened up the box.

And inside, there were...

“I brought boiled eggs and tomatoes.”

“Eh?” Lloyd asked.

“The tomatoes are drizzled with lots of honey. Here, take a fork.”

Lloyd was a little surprised. Since he was a noble, he expected the lunch to be something fancier. The content smile on the baron’s face deepened.

“Are you dazed because it has been a while? But you see, this was your favorite food when you were young.”

“It is still clear in my eyes. You threw such a tantrum that you did not want all sorts of nice, greasy foods on the table. Instead, you insisted that boiled eggs and honey-soaked tomatoes were the best. How embarrassed I was each time you did that.”

Lloyd remained silent.

“Sometimes, even now, I regret it,” a look of remorse flashed on his face. “I should have given you as many boiled eggs and tomatoes as you wanted...”

Lloyd didn’t know what to say. He simply chewed on his lips with a fork in his hand.

The surveying skill had already been turned off. Lloyd simply stared at his fork, blank and wordless. The baron grinned and peeled an egg before handing it to his hand.

“Here, take the salt. Dip the egg in it. Make sure to drink some water, so you don’t choke.”

“You haven’t talked since earlier. Am I making you feel awkward?”

“Uh, Uhm, it’s not that,” Lloyd finally uttered.

“No, I completely understand.”

The baron’s gaze at Lloyd flashed inexplicable remorse.

It was short-lived as the baron burst out in laughter. “Hahaha. I am making you very uncomfortable. Here, let us eat now.”

“Yes...”

After that, neither the baron nor Lloyd spoke. They simply ate the crumbling boiled eggs and tomatoes as they sat on a rock in the grayish wetland. For the past few months, the baron regretted his past behaviors. Back then, he had been sorely disappointed with his son for not meeting his expectations. He had hated Lloyd. However, he felt sorry for his son at the same time. The baron wanted to apologize to Lloyd for his past behaviors.

But it wasn’t easy for him to work up the courage to express those regrets out loud. Instead, he silently passed the water bottle to Lloyd. Lloyd drank from it without saying a word, either. In return, Lloyd passed the salt to dip the eggs. The two continued to remain silent. On the way home, it was Lloyd who held the lunchbox basket. The baron didn’t refuse Lloyd this time. The basket was lighter on their way home. And albeit very slightly, their steps became lighter as well. Just like that, the first day of surveying the wetland passed by.

***

Even after the first survey, Lloyd preoccupied himself with surveying for quite a while.

The Maritz Wetland was more vast than he expected. A day or two of surveying wasn't enough to cover the entire land. But I'm thankful that this is an intermediate-level skill.

Because it was intermediate, he was able to survey about 130 feet of land in one try.

After doing everything he could with the skill, he succeeded in surveying quite a lot of land. About twenty days or so later Lloyd was done surveying most of the land that would be reclaimed in the first part of the construction. The topography of the land within the range was now in his hands. However, that didn't mean everything would be smooth sailing from now on. Constructing is a matter entirely different from surveying. Lloyd furrowed his brows as he studied the topographical data of the Maritz Wetland.

I expected there would be many variables but not this many. The wetland was situated on low-lying ground, embracing two courses of a river. There were frequent floods, and the stagnant river water invaded the land as there was no proper drainage system. And after a long period, the land turned into a wetland.

Seriously, anywhere you go, these stagnant waters are always a problem.

Whether it was about a game or a piece of land, it was the same. The stagnation had to be solved adequately to survive a game or sell a piece of land. Thinking of that fact in his head, Lloyd racked his brain to figure out a way to reclaim the wetland.

Of course, I have a plan. I just have to use the vertical drain technique with the support of my summon partners. Quicken the consolidation process, and I'm good to go. But I must make sure that the embankments and waterways are installed exactly where they should be. However, there were just too many variables because of the sheer size of the land mass.

Lloyd wasn’t sure whether the water would fully drain as he intended it to. But I can’t hastily start the construction without any thought. That might backfire on me. Lloyd would find himself in serious trouble if the water didn’t drain after having toiled away to make the embankments and waterways. All the work and money he put in would be in absolute vain.

That was the last thing he wanted to experience.

Hmm. I wish I could run a simulation at least. It would be nice if I could run a simulation by throwing the topographical data of the Maritz Wetland into a supercomputer. However, that was impossible in this world.

Just then…

“Uhm...”

In one corner of the bedroom, Javier fidgeted in a comfy chair. Lloyd wondered if Javier was having a bad dream. His elegant eyebrows were furrowed. He’ll wake up if I just leave him like this, Lloyd thought to himself. So, he recited a magical spell in Javier’s ears.

“The drain construction method consists of a draining tool to collect rainfall and river water that has penetrated the embankment during a flood, and a filtering tool to prevent the draining tool from clogging by receiving drainage at a fixed rate. The thickness of the drain ball...blah blah blah… At least 1.5 feet above the ground in the embankment… The average dynamic slope (H/D) on the front of the drain hole does not exceed 0.3…blah blah… A structure that ensures a constant safety rate against slip destruction… Go fall asleep, zap.”

Javier sunk back to sleep. Lloyd grinned. He grinned as an alternative method to create a simulation popped into his head while reciting a passage from his textbook to put Javier to sleep.

It’s a good thing that I read the chapter about embankment building. The answer was right there in the textbook. Okay, let’s try it out. He walked out of the bedroom and headed to the training hall, which is the backyard of his estate.

There, under the moonlight, he held up his shovel. He dug the soil, gathered it into one place, and carefully shaped it. Next, he fetched some water and mixed it with mashed grass and red clay. He then collected small pebbles around the area. The beads of sweat on his face glistened against the moonlight. Lloyd kept busying himself even after that until the following morning rolled around. The result of his toil revealed itself under the sun. It was a miniature model of the Maritz Wetland that was about thirteen feet in width and length.

“Whew. I wonder if this will do.”

Lloyd grinned in contentment as exhaustion washed over him. In his eyes, the miniature model of the wetland looked quite convincing. Of course, it should. The model is based on the data I collected with my surveying skills.

He had reflected countless details of the wetland in the model, including the overall topography, height, slope, amount of stagnated water, and water flow. With such a precise model, he would be able to try out a simulation in a more traditional way.

Let’s get started. Lloyd rolled his sleeves and pants all the way up. He started touching the model like a farmer planting new crops. A miniaturized embankment was created into the model as he used his design skills. He bore a hole in the ground and a waterway in the other.

Afterward, he studied how the water was drained. The job wasn’t easy.

Now, once the morning gave way to the afternoon, the scorching summer sun beat down on Lloyd mercilessly. It beat down on his back. No, it was grilling him, to be more exact. His back began to sweat profusely as if he was soaked with rain. The sight brought a crowd of villagers around him.

“Look, what is Master Lloyd up to now?”

“Maybe he realized how fun it is to play in the mud.”

“That’s not it. It must be for something else, I’m sure.”

Perhaps it was a relief that people no longer unilaterally doubted him like before. Things have changed. Lloyd went on running an analog simulation under the gaze of countless observers but he failed each time he tried. The water was drained, sure, but not enough to satisfy Lloyd. However, he didn't give up. He would never back down until he found the way.

If I were going to back down and give up, I wouldn't have started it in the first place! Each failure stimulated him to be more tenacious.

He yelled, "Again!" and restored the model with his hands, poured the thick water once more, and created embankments and waterways of various shapes. After a series of attempts and failures, when it was late in the afternoon, and the sun was slowly setting down...

At last, Lloyd invented an embankment and waterway model that properly drained the water. I did it! Lloyd clenched his fists, his body soaked in fatigue and sweat. The water was finally draining out properly. Furthermore, the shapes of the embankment and waterway were preserved without being destroyed. Lloyd reaped the sweet reward of an entire day's worth of work. Just then, an unexpected message popped in front of him.

Ding Dong.

[You have overcome a limitation by being wise and tenacious amid hardship.]

[That special experience is having a strong effect on your <Skill: Design>]

[A new skill option has been opened.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 44: The Third Random Summon Game (1)

Ding Dong.

[A new skill option has been opened.]

[Skill Option 3: Simulation Mode - You can run a virtual simulation of the topographical data you have obtained from your surveying skill. This will allow you to observe various physical changes that occur within the terrain.]

Huh? Lloyd blinked several times. Did he blink because the beads of sweat streaked down his forehead and went into his eyes? No, it was because of the message that popped up in front of him. He couldn't believe what he read.

Wow. What is this? An optional enhancement for my design skill?

The skill was none other than simulation, the very skill he had direly wanted to have.

This was a reward he never thought nor expected to earn. However, Lloyd didn't remain dazed and quickly jumped into action. From the survey and design skills to the Asrahan Core Technique, he had thoroughly experienced the power of these optional skills. It was the same case here.

Actions speak louder than words.

He could read a manual for a hundred days or watch a tutorial over and over again for an entire day. The best way to master a game was to play right away and learn while getting cursed out by other players. So, Lloyd activated his design skill at once.

Crackle...!

A virtual hologram appeared in front of him. It was only visible to Lloyd and no one else. Lloyd imported the data from the survey of the Maritz

Wetland into it.

The terrain of the Maritz Wetland appeared in the virtual design space. This process was the same as all the other surveys and designs he had done prior except for that there was now a selection window at the bottom of the virtual space.

[Simulation Mode On]

This is the one. Lloyd knew immediately what it would do and he pressed the window.

[Skill Option Three: Simulation mode has been activated.]

[The topographical data of the current virtual design will be available for simulation.]

Bzzt! The background of the space brightened and numerous lines and dots appeared on the Maritz Wetland's terrain. It looked like a 3D graphic model. I wonder if I can operate it similarly. He wondered if that would be the case and so he held out his hand and pinched the line that had formed a mound. He then pulled it up.

Crash...! The peak of the mound pulled upward, following Lloyd's fingers.

Now, the small mound turned into a high hill that sat in the corner of the Maritz Wetland.

The murky mud and water that once surrounded the area consequently streamed down to the lower ground.*Wow.*He felt like he had become a god and that he was using a terrain editor in a simulation game.

This is awesome. Lloyd swallowed unwittingly. He was a civil engineering student and civil engineering involved more than only constructing buildings. No, putting up buildings and structures is what architectural engineers do. Civil engineers do much, much more than just put up buildings. There was a quote from a famous movie that said the wind was something to overcome not prepare for. Lloyd thought civil engineering approached topographic evaluations in the same way. Well, it's not completely similar. Topography is to be overcome and prepared for.

That is, the goal of civil engineering was to plan and alter various terrains to enrich human lives. It drilled through mountains to create tunnels. It repaired jagged coastlines and then built ports. It studied and overcame numerous terrains to build roads and railways. It designed sewer systems and reclaimed lands or split them at times. It built bridges on top of steep cliffs, allowing people to connect with one another. Since the beginning of humanity, the very area of study that exercised the most influence on humankind was civil engineering. That was what Lloyd believed.

Therefore, meticulously studying and testing the terrain was necessary to accomplish such a goal. And now, I have that weapon in my hands. Me, I have it. He clenched his fists. It was after that Lloyd destroyed the miniature version of the wetland he had installed at the back of his yard.

He then zoomed off to take a bath and scraped the mud off his body. For five straight days, he then isolated himself from the world by shutting himself in his bedroom. Embankments and waterways were added and erased on the virtual Maritz Wetland. He added them again and he erased them once more. This took place over and over again. He ran the simulation as many times as he could. He meticulously went over the wetland development plan and reviewed it on repeat. Thanks to this skill, Lloyd was able to touch up the construction model he had completed in his backyard. Now, it was more sophisticated. While all of this was happening, Javier was forced to stay at Lloyd's side and serve him.

"Master Lloyd, it is time for your lunch."

"Mhm. Just leave it there."

"I think it is best to eat now."

"Now? But I'm busy. Can you not talk to me?"

"But you didn't even finish the breakfast I served you."

“Hey. Are you nagging me right now?”

“I am only speaking out of concern.”

“Concern? You? About me?”

“Yes.”

“No way. You’re worried about me? Look here. Who are you? Where did you hide my dear Javier?”

“It’s a joke. Can’t you see that I’m trying to focus right now?”

“Yes.”

“My serious expression and eyes. Can’t you see them?”

“No, I cannot. But...”

Javier sighed at length.

“I want to tell you that you have been fumbling your hands in front of nothing all day like someone has lost their mind.”

“Oh, given your subtle insults, you are indeed Javier. But, too bad for you, I have not gone mad.” Lloyd nonchalantly replied as he floundered his hands in the air.

Lloyd understood where Javier was coming from. After all, this simulation space is visible only in my eyes. Even now, Lloyd was delicately controlling the landform of the wetland he projected on the simulation space. He was testing out various ways to employ the vertical drain technique. Of course, this wouldn’t be visible to Javier’s eyes and to him, Lloyd would simply be making weird motions in the air.

“I am just thinking here. Haven’t you heard? How people’s senses are concentrated in their hands.”

“So?”

“So moving your hands like this stimulates your senses and triggers brain activity. Anyway, I seriously need to focus.”

“But, Master Lloyd, you must not skip your meals.” Javier stared at Lloyd.

“Oh, come on. You are not my mother.”

“If this goes on, I shall have to tell the baroness that you are not eating at all.”

“Tsk, I can’t,” Lloyd huffed.

“Excuse me?”

“I said I can’t think because of all your blabbering, you goody-two-shoes. Fine. Will you come over here then and take a seat on this comfy chair for a second?”

“What are you trying to do?” Javier asked, his voice sounding incredulous.

“If you sit down quietly, I will eat my lunch.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“Do you really think I’m trying to trick you?”

“I will sit...” Javier took his seat.

A mischievous smile formed on Lloyd’s face.

“Yes, good. Just take a break for a while. In principle, the Pack Drain (PD) method is the same as the Sand Drain or Paper Drain method...Four or six 12 cm diameter casings attached to a dedicated punching machine are simultaneously pressed into the ground...The installation depth can be up to 35m, and the installation diameter is 12 cm, making it workable...Blah blah...”

“Eh...? What are...”

*Snore.*An ambush lullaby service. He gave a passionate reading, recalling the words of the civil engineering textbook. Javier started to look absentminded, and his eyes soon lost focus.

He then started to doze off, his body slowly leaning to the side. Lloyd gently reached out and supported Javier's leaning body, nudging it toward the back of the chair. The forceful lullaby service went on so that Javier would completely knock out.

"The type of plastic board drain, PBD, can be divided into two. The first is a nonwoven drainage material, and a needle punch nonwoven plate with a thickness of about 5 mm is about 100 mm wide...There you go. Go fall asleep, boop."

Snore…

Javier fell into a deep sleep and now that Lloyd had created a suitable environment for work, he went back to concentrate on the simulation mode. One day, two days, and three days passed. Javier's nagging and the lullaby defense became a daily occurrence. However, the reclamation project for the Maritz Wetland started to shape up.

"I'm done."

On the fifth day, the corners of Lloyd's lips rose in satisfaction. Now, it was time to put together a team for the project and get his hands on the heavy equipment.

* * *

"Hey, Ppodong? Bangul?"

"Ppodong!"

"Bangul!"

The moon shone brightly that night and Lloyd was out in his backyard. Of course, Lloyd made sure that Javier was deep asleep.

“I’m thinking of summoning a new friend.”

“Ppodong?”

“Bangul?”

“I just think that it’d be better if you two came and watched me.”

Lloyd grinned. Tonight, he planned on picking a new summon partner. It was for the reclamation project that was expected to start soon.

“I hope something connected to water comes out. But I don’t mind even if that isn’t the case. I just need one that’s as large as you both.”

The Maritz Wetland reclamation project. The vertical drain method would be employed for the project. In short, it referred to drilling several holes in the floor of the wetland and inserting plastic drain boards to solidify the weak foundation. The survey showed me that the wetland resembled the Netherlands terrain before it was reclaimed. The low-level ground had stagnated with mud and muddy water for a long time. The thick peat deposit was full of water. Not only that, it was mushy and easily sunk in. But, what if Lloyd successfully drained the water there? Things become easier. Once water was sucked out of the peat deposit, it became compressed downward because of its weight. This phenomenon was called consolidation.

So it’s crucial to drain the water first. But I don’t have any equipment for VD. Not even a pump to suck out water. However, there were, of course, replacements he could use.

Javier could use his mana blast to bore holes in the ground and the summon partners could scoop the water out of the wetland. That’s why Lloyd was standing alone at night with Ppodong and Bangul: To pick another summon partner.

“Hey, Ppodong? Bangul?”

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“I wish the new guy could scoop water just as good as you all can,” Lloyd spoke, meaning every word.

Ppodong and Bangul were excellent at scooping water. Ppodong used his giant cheeks to hold huge amounts, and Bangul used her bloating stomach as a bucket. They could easily hold and transfer as much water as common water tanks. This was essentially possible because of the gigantic size these two grew when they ate the red sunflower seed. Other summon partners should be similar. I just need to have four or five summon partners that can grow as large as Ppodong or Bangul. Nothing more. Each summon partner held varying special powers and abilities and most of them became massive when they changed shape.

Lloyd planned on taking good advantage of their sheer size.

I don’t give a hoot about what its special power is. It’ll be icing on the cake if it’s connected to water, but I won’t push my luck. I simply need a big one! One that can transport water, whether that’s with its mouth or another body part. He had low expectations. I was very lucky until now. Ppodong and Bangul helped Lloyd by providing him with the most critical skills at the time. However, it would be for the better not to hope to strike such luck again, Lloyd thought to himself. With that thought, Lloyd opened the random summon window.

Ding Dong.

[Random Summon Game]

[Spend RP to pick a summon.]

[A strong and unique summon partner will provide their unwavering loyalty along with a wide range of skills to their master.]

[Cost of 3rd Random Summon Game = 100 RP]

*Hmm...*The cost of picking a new summon partner was increased by 1.5 times.

But it's all right. I've been frugal with my RP, and I have saved up. Lloyd checked how much RP he had. He had a whopping amount of 931, 20 of which were garnered from the recent trip (or picnic) to the wetland with the baron.

I have enough RP. Sometimes, a rush of impulse shot through him whenever he earned RP, and he thought about spending it rashly. However, he kept a tight rein, reminding himself that RP was his last resort in case of emergencies. Now, he was glad that he fought that impulse. The goal is to pick four summon partners that are the size of Ppodong and Bangul and can carry water.

If each pick cost 1.5 more RP than the previous pick, Lloyd calculated that he would need about 800 RP.

Let's give it a try. Determined, Lloyd gazed downward.

[Would you like to start the random summon game?]

[Yes / No]

Without a second of hesitation, he selected Yes.

[The random summon game is starting.]

Fwoosh! A magic circle appeared in the air and a pale light enveloped his whole surrounding.

The space rumbled, summoning a silhouette Lloyd could not recognize right away. The first thing he saw was a round-shaped body. Then, its head appeared next. It had round buttocks and legs and its overall silhouette was round like a ball. Wait, it's not going to be the same kind as Ppodong, is it? Lloyd focused his gaze and observed his newly summoned partner.

At last, the third summon partner revealed itself, a shock wave shooting out with it.

Crackle!

“Hamang!” Something shouted cutely.

It flew toward Lloyd’s side and landed in his arms. Lloyd accepted the new summon partner with both of his hands. He felt the plushy and soft texture of the skin on his palms and immediately checked his new friend. Lloyd’s eyes widened. He unconsciously murmured, “Wait...a thirsty hippo? What is he doing here?”

“Hamang!”

A small, chubby, and baby pink hippopotamus, whose name was “Hamang,” smiled brightly as he looked up at Lloyd from his palm.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 45: The Third Random Summon Game (2)

“Hamang!”

“Eh...?”

Lloyd opened his eyes wide, his palm feeling the animal wriggling his small, chubby butt.

His head was round and he was gazing up at Lloyd with his beady eyes.

“Thirsty hippo?”

“Hamang!”

“Are you really a hippo?”

“Hamamang!”

The baby pink hippo nodded cutely as he stood on Lloyd’s palm. Was he happy because Lloyd brought him into this world? The baby hippo was joyfully smiling and he looked pretty cute.

But of course, I should never judge summon partners by their outside looks. Their cuteness was nothing but a first impression. Their real form was revealed when they ate the red sunflower seed. That was when they showed their true value and power. Buoyed with expectations, Lloyd asked the baby hippo, “Yes, nice to meet you. So your name is Hamang, right?”

“Hamamang? Hamang?”

“How did I find that out? Am I a genius?”

“Hamang!”

“No, I’m not a genius. I’m just an ordinary person.”

“Hamamang! Hamang!”

“I mean it. I just assumed based on your cry. Anyway, it’s nice to meet you, Hamang.”

“Hamang!”

New summon partners were always welcome. The senior summons, who were watching beside Hamang, welcomed him with all their hearts.

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

With that, the introduction was finished. Seeing it was over, Lloyd asked, “Hamang? Do you carry a manual as well?”

“Hamang? Hamamang!”

“Can you please show it to me?”

“Hamang!”

Hamang opened his mouth. Just like Lloyd expected, he found a badly crumpled note inside.

He took it and carefully opened it up.

[Hamang User Manual]

[Hamang is a lovely baby hippopotamus. Please show him love and care.]

[Hamang will give his utmost loyalty to you, his master. A summon partner is not only your companion animal but also your family, so please don’t neglect them.]

[Unlike the other summon partners, Hamang does not eat sunflower seeds.]

[Unlike the other summon partners, Hamang cannot grow gigantic in size.]

[Hamang’s Skill Log]

[One Shot (Lv. 1)]

Eh? Lloyd cocked his head to the side. One shot? He only has one skill? Lloyd was slightly confused and doubtful at the same time.

He doesn’t eat sunflower seeds and cannot turn gigantic? Lloyd had a feeling that this new summon partner was different from Ppodong and Bangul in quite a lot of ways.

His gut told him something was off and ominous.

Forcibly suppressing the growing feeling that he was out of luck this time, Lloyd asked Hamang, “Hey, Hamang.”

“Hamang?”

“I am sorry to ask you this question, but do you, uhm, dislike sunflower seeds?”

“Hamamang? Hamang!”

Hamang nodded zealously.

“Hamang! Hamamang! Hamang!”

“You hate it that much...?”

“Hamang!”

He was adamant. So Lloyd hurriedly asked a follow-up question. “So, you don’t go boom and turn giant like your older brother Ppodong or older sister Bangul here?”

“Hamang!”

“You don’t need to?”

“Hamamang!”

“Because being cute is all that matters?”

“Hamang!”

Oh, crap. I’m screwed.

From the looks of it, Hamang’s only ability was to look cute and nothing more. Lloyd was slightly displeased. Tsk, right. I’ve been pretty lucky up until now.

As Lloyd came to think of it again, this was a “random” summon game. No one knew what kind of a summon partner would burst out of the magic circle. Sometimes you hit the jackpot and sometimes you didn’t. But which one had he been hitting so far?

*I’ve been lucky with Ppodong and Bangul. I obtained the skills that I needed the most. How I wish it was the same case this time. Hmm...*No, he had only hoped for a summoned partner who could turn enormous. It would’ve been fine even if they didn’t have a special power.

Lloyd’s plan involved mobilizing huge summon partners to drain the water in the wetland. Out of all the summon partners out there, the one that can’t get big had to come out. A failure, he thought to himself as disappointment filled his heart. However, he didn’t show it as he had brought this creature into this world. The responsibility to take good care of Hamang was on Lloyd.

Even though he may not be useful right now, that might change in the future.

Lloyd might find another way to use him in the future or Hamang could grow up. The situation could change at any time. Thinking that in his head, Lloyd warmly embraced Hamang.

“Then Hamang. Will you come in here?”

“Hamamang?”

“Come in with Ppodong. There you go. Good.”

“Hamang!”

Lloyd nested Hamang in his embrace.

And he checked his remaining RP.

[Current RP: 831]

Good. I still have enough. He had saved a lot of RP. He still owned over 800 RP after playing the random summon game. This would grant him three or four more attempts. Lloyd opened the summon game window.

[Random Summon Game]

[Cost of 4th Random Summon Game = 150 RP]

Surely, it got more expensive. However, he had no choice but to play it. Determined, Lloyd activated the game.

[Would you like to start the random summon game?]

[Yes / No]

He chose “Yes.” Just then…

Zzt! A spark crackled in the air, softly electrocuting his finger that pressed the “Yes” button.

“Ow.” He instantly pulled back at the sting.

Then, an unexpected message popped in front of him.

[The Random Summon Game can only be played once a day.]

[You can play the game after 23hr 47m 16s]

Oh, my. I didn't know there was a limit to this game. The corners of his lips twitched at the unexpected turn of events. Tsk. I guess it's a total flop today. He had intended to pick four summon partners in a row and start reclaiming the Maritz Wetland the first thing tomorrow.

But now, he was forced to alter his plans. Great. The new summon partner is useless, and I can't pick anything more today. I can say goodbye to tomorrow's construction. How great would it be, Lloyd wished, if Hamang could turn gigantic?

The more he wished for it, the more wistful he had become. However, there was nothing he could do about it. Well, this isn't anything new if I think about the days I worked on construction sites. Lloyd recalled his difficult life in South Korea. In need of quick cash, he had frequently worked on construction sites as they paid daily wages.

At first, young Lloyd was lofty. I thought I'd make a lot of money if I worked a whole month without missing a single day. He really thought it was possible. He was fairly confident that he could endure the hard, restless labor. He had plenty of motivation, but reality turned out to be a bit different.

I couldn't work every day as I'd wanted. It was outside of my control.

Many construction sites closed when it rained. That wasn't the end of it. Sometimes there was no work for him at all. When he was just starting out, there were times when he had to come back home even though he had gone to the employment agency at dawn. Things didn't get better for him even after he started getting recognized after frequenting the construction sites so often. It was the same even after he gained a regular team. When his senior couldn't get to work, it was a rest day for Lloyd, too, whether he liked it or not. That was the case since he was nothing but an assistant for his senior.

And so, I had to rest quite a lot of days. Working throughout the month and getting paid a heavy sum...? It turned out to be my lofty fantasy.

However, he couldn't remain disappointed with the harsh reality. Productively using his rest days was also important. What would happen if he goofed around in boredom because he had no work? His hard-earned money from the previous day would be spent. If he worked one day, then took a break and spent what he earned the next day Lloyd would have ended up living paycheck to paycheck forever. He had seen quite a lot of people living like that at construction sites. So I engrossed myself in my studies during those days. I did it even when I filed for LOA to earn money.

Getting a permanent job was his dream, and he dreamed of his life turning for the better.

Truly, the days he had to live paycheck to paycheck in South Korea were difficult. Compared to that, my current predicament is a walk in the park. Just because things didn't go according to his plans and wishes, there was no reason he should let disappointment flood his heart.

If he was stumped, he should simply find what he could do right now. For instance, that would be checking out the one skill Hamang thankfully possessed. Resolved to do that, he looked down inside his arms.

"Hamang?"

"Hamaang?"

Could it be that he was drifting off in Lloyd's warm embrace? Hamang looked up, his black eyes slightly drowsy. A pleasant smile formed on Lloyd's face.

"Hamang, can I ask something about your skill?"

"Hamang?"

"The skill you have. One shot?"

"Hamang."

"What does it do?"

"Hamamang? Hamang! Hamang!"

“Drinking water?”

“Hamang!” Hamang nodded zealously.

Lloyd asked, “Uhm, I can drink water, too. Do you like drinking water?”

“Hamang!”

“How much do you like it?”

“Hamamang! Hamang!”

“Very very much?”

“Hamang!” Hamang nodded once again.

Gazing up, Hamang waved his short arms. “Hamamang. Hamang! Hamang! Hamamang?”

“Hmm... You mean you can drink as much as your stretched arms?”

“Hamang!”

A smile formed on Lloyd’s face again. I guess I shouldn’t expect too much. Hamang was barely the size of Lloyd’s fist. This hippo could stretch out his arms wide, but it was only a hand span long. That’s how much Hamang could drink. This meant that even if he drank to his heart’s content, it’d be just enough to fill up a small water balloon.

No, you never know. Lloyd shook his head. He decided not to form hasty judgments. He needed to see it with his own eyes. Who knows? He might inflate himself, maybe, around the size of a gym ball. Or a bit larger than that. If he did, that would be enough. Thinking so, Lloyd started to walk, heading out of the dark training hall that sat in his backyard.

“So Hamang.”

“Hamang?”

“I know a place with a lot of water. Do you want to go drink water with me?”

“Hamang!”

Hamang nodded several times as though the suggestion excited him. Lloyd patted and stroked his summon partner and walked out of the estate. He cut across the fiefdom under the moonlight. Then, to a place with lots of water, he went. He headed south and finally, he arrived at the northern boundary of the Maritz Wetland.

Buzzz!

As soon as he set foot in the wetland, he was fervently welcomed by a swarm of mosquitoes.

Lloyd waved his hands, repelling away the hungry pests. He resolved to himself, Whew. I need to reclaim this wetland very soon.

Mosquitoes were the source of all evil. Reminding this universal, unchanging truth to himself, Lloyd reached his hand into his embrace. He gently brought out Hamang, who was peacefully sleeping.

“So, Hamang.”

“Hamaang?”

“I am sorry for waking you up. So, you told me you like drinking water, right?”

“Hamang!”

The word “water” got Hamang to snap his eyes open. They started to glimmer.

Lloyd smiled.

“I am glad that you like it. That’s why we came here. Look ahead to see what’s in front of you.”

“Hamang?”

Hamang turned his round head and in front of him spanned the outstretched view of the wetland.

“Hamaaang?”

Hamang gaped slightly. There was rapture in his eyes. They resembled the eyes of a man who arrived at a buffet after starving for four days. Smiling, Lloyd gently pushed Hamang’s fat butt.

“I am glad that you like it. I took you here because I wanted you to drink to your heart’s content.”

“Hamang! Hamamang?”

“Are you asking if you could empty this place?”

“Hamang!”

“Yes, of course.”

“Hamamang!”

Hamang leaped to his feet in excitement.

Lloyd’s bitter smile deepened. How I wish he could really drink all the water. Lloyd told himself that he must not expect too much from Hamang. Looking at his small size, that task would be impossible. Realistically, a bucket load of water would be his limit. While such thoughts were crossing Lloyd’s mind, Hamang was getting ready to drink water.

“Hamamang! Hamang!”

He lifted his butt and lowered his head. He brought his mouth to the splashing water. The water drinking began, and it happened with unimaginable force.

Swooosh!

“Eh...?”

The water level lowered in a blink of an eye. The water that splashed some inches away from Lloyd’s feet became farther in no time and Hamang was growing gigantic at the same time!

“Hamang! Hamamang! Hamang!”

Hamang became six, nine, and then fifteen-foot tall. He continued to inflate like a balloon.

The larger he became, the lower the water level became. It was getting farther from Lloyd.

Hamang, despite his growing size, didn’t stop. He simply shoved his face deeper as the land started to run out of water.

“Hamamang!”

Swooosh! The water in the area was disappearing in real-time. No, it wasn’t disappearing. It was getting absorbed by Hamang. In no time, the bottom of the water in one area revealed itself and that’s when Hamang lifted his head. He was smiling in satisfaction as he lifted his now gigantic head.

“Hamang! Belch!”

Lloyd looked up at Hamang, feeling awed and terrified at the same time. However, first, he had to retreat several steps in a hurry to make sure that he wouldn’t get crushed under Hamang. Hamang reminded Lloyd of a ginormous water balloon whose diameter was over 150 feet. That was his first impression of Hamang as he looked up.

“Uhm, Hamang.”

“Hamaang?”

“Are you okay?”

“Hamang! Hamamang!”

“Your stomach doesn’t hurt or anything?”

“Hamang!”

I guess he really is fine. Embarrassed, Lloyd turned to look at the wetland, no, at the land that was once a wetland. The splashing water was completely gone. Some minnows and tadpoles and other creatures fluttered on the ground. However, of course, the entire wetland hadn’t been drained. The Maritz Wetland was a vast place. The area Hamang had drunken up was only a part of the vast wetland. Even so, it was enough. He did finish one area in one shot, leaving not a drop of water behind.

My goodness! I’ve hit the jackpot! He thought he failed this time, but once all the cards were revealed, he realized he had hit the jackpot. This will work. I don’t have to pick another summon partner. I can get started with the construction first thing tomorrow.

Draining the water in the wetland then, using the vertical drain method afterward would allow him to suck every drop of water stored underneath the peat deposits. Also by accelerating the consolidation phenomenon, the weak foundation would be stabilized and ready to be turned into farmland. All those things, the first steps of his project, would immediately commence tomorrow. Full of conviction, Lloyd clenched his fists. It was time to initiate and reclaim the Maritz Wetland.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 46: How to Make Land (1)

“Today, we will turn this place into fertile land.”

Lloyd began his speech. Just then, a frog in the swamp croaked aloud in response.

“Ribbit! Ribbit!”

However, not a single one of the 120 civil engineers gathered in the area smiled. Was it because Sir Javier and Bayern stood beside Lloyd with a grim look on their faces? It might be for some, but for most of them, that wasn’t the case.

I wonder what I’ll go through in this construction.

The ondol, or the heated flooring system, the paved road, the coal mine, and for some, the seokbinggo had been tremendous projects. These experiences along with the storage expansion and dorms for the orc miners to live had transformed these ordinary soldiers.

They were transformed into a group of elite civil engineers who had been trained through numerous construction projects. As such, their past experiences told them how crucial this speech was. After all, Master Lloyd believes this part of the process is important. This speech was usually given right before the construction. It was straight to the point with no flowery words. There wasn’t any unnecessary pep talk or empty flattery. Lloyd’s speech was only packed with words the soldiers needed to hear.

“Alright, precautions first. We are working in swamps. So, don’t move around alone at your whim. Just imagine. Bad luck hits you, and you get your feet stuck in the swamp. What do you think would happen after that? This place has zero visibility. Look around. Lots of reeds stand all around us. You’ll become a piece of dry beef jerky scorched under the sun. If you don’t want that to happen to you, move in groups of two. Understood?”

“Yes!”

“Good. Next precaution. It’s hot and super humid here because we’re in a wetland. What do we do now?”

“Take a break every hour!”

“Correct. And what’s another thing?”

“We must drink water with salt every break!”

“Very good. I’ll have the saltwater ready right here, so you can drink that. Don’t stash plain water behind my back and gulp it all down just because you’re thirsty. You’re going to get dizzy and collapse.”

“Excuse me, but what if I find the salt water too bland?”

One of the soldiers asked as he raised his hand, all awkward and clumsy. The number of civil engineers had doubled recently, and he appeared to be one of the new recruits. Lloyd flashed a gentle, kind smile as he looked at the newbie.

“You still have to drink it, obviously.”

“Even if I feel like vomiting?”

“Yes. You can choose not to drink and collapse. But your daily wage for that day will be deducted from your bonus.”

“I will drink it, Young Master!” The recruit agreed immediately.

A lot of soldiers had applied for the civil engineer position for the thick bonus that came after the construction.

“And lastly, this is the most important thing. Hamang will be drinking the water in the wetland. So if I ever find or hear you excusing yourself in the water throughout any time in the construction, I am going to throw you behind bars. Relieve yourself in the makeshift bathrooms. Am I clear?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd!”

“Alright, then, let’s get started. Hamang?”

“Hamang!”

Lloyd brought Hamang out of his embrace. This caused the soldiers’ eyes to widen in surprise. There was a stir among them, and they chatted that their young master seemed to have made a contract with a new summon partner. However, something else happened later that made their mouths hang wide open all the more.

“Hamang? Could you please drink the water here?”

“Hamamang? Hamang?”

“Yes, you can drink it all.”

“Hamang?”

“Aha, after that? Do you see the branch of the course of the river? It’s over there.”

“Hamamang!”

“Yes, you can roll over all the way there and spit it out. But don’t do it all at once. You’ll be causing flooding downstream.”

“Hamang!” Hamang nodded in understanding.

Once Lloyd put him down, Hamang immediately shoved his round face into the water.

The suctioning began.

“Humung!” Sluuurp! Swooosh!

Hamang sucked in the water and a whirlpool appeared around him. It looked like a gigantic vacuum was sucking up the water. The water level of the wasteland decreased immediately.

At the same pace, Hamang started to puff up. He continued to grow thirty feet, sixty feet, and even 150 feet tall.

“Woah...”

The soldiers had already stayed far away from the water at Lloyd’s instruction. Their jaws dropped, but that wasn’t the end of their shock.

“Humung!”

Hamang, all inflated and blown up, moved his body, rolling off to the downstream Lloyd had pointed earlier. He resembled a giant 150-feet water balloon rolling away. When he got there, he started to slowly spew the water out.

“Humung! Blergh!”

Splash! Thousands of minnows, frogs, and other living creatures that were sucked in by Hamang came out of his mouth, finding a new home downstream. They became the newbies of the river ecosystem. This whole process was repeated several times afterward. Hamang absorbed the water of the wetland and then rolled his inflated body down to the river. He then spat it all out.

“What am I seeing right now...?” The civil engineers muttered to themselves in a daze, and before they knew it, the water nearby was completely gone.

Of course, other areas needed to be drained as well. Hamang had only drained the water in one area here. However, it was enough to get started with the construction for the day.

Lloyd ordered, “Hold up your shovels.”

“Shovels!”

“From now on, you will get rid of all the grass and other remnants of rotten plants in areas I marked. Let’s get started with a shout.”

“Woah!!”

The soldiers got to work. They shoveled the ground with sweat pouring out of their body. The rotten leaves and roots of aquatic plants were cleared in all the areas where the embankment would be installed.

Lloyd joined in on the shoveling and commanded his men. If I don’t do this basic process properly, the embankment will leak and erode. Here we go!

Sometimes, some workers and managers disregarded this process, thinking all it took to build an embankment was to pile up the earth and turn it into a mound. However, that wasn’t the case at all. Even the common embankment you see every day was the product of rigorous science and engineering. The work wasn’t comparable to how children played in the sand. That was especially the case right now. The foundation here is wet and weak. Thus, the land required clearing and gruffing. Not only that, the water at the bottom of the ground had to be drained to stabilize the foundation.

“Javier?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd turned around and faced Javier. Javier, who heard what he had to do, immediately got to work. He drew his sword and he stabbed the area on the ground Lloyd had marked.

Swish! Clack! Shank!

The mana circles hit one another and a powerful blast shot out of his sword. The force penetrated the metamorphic layer of rock beneath them. A one-and-a-half-foot wide hole was created, and it went down as deep as thirty-two feet, each hole standing thirteen feet apart.

Lloyd shouted. “Sir Bayern!”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Lloyd shouted, and Sir Bayern answered. He commandeered the civil engineers under him.

They brought with them some bamboo sticks uniformly cut thirty-six feet in length. Then, they inserted the vertical drains Javier had blasted one by one into the ground. The insides of the sticks were hollow like straws made out of bamboo. Next up, it was Ppodong's turn.

"Ppodong!"

"Ppodung?" Ppodong, who was on standby, came running as he waddled his chubby butt.

Something gushed out of his two fat cheeks.

"Ppu-pu-dung! Blergh!"

Splash! It was all of the sand he had obtained in the river.

"Engineers! Transfer the sand into the vertical drains!"

"Yes!"

The civil engineers, who were waiting with a shovel in each of their hands, started to get moving. They charged at the mountain of sand Ppodong had spurted out. They scooped it up and tossed it into the vertical drains. The drains with the bamboo straw in the center became filled with the sand pile.

Good. Everything is going well. The construction site was bustling with movement.

Lloyd clenched his fists as he commanded the whole process. The vertical drain method, particularly the sand drain method, is working out just as I had wanted.

This method used to reinforce weak foundations was first introduced in 1936, and it saw massive technological advancement in the late 1940s. To be more specific, the method consisted of drilling long artificial holes in soft cohesive soil and then inserting plastic drain boards to drain water from the ground to accelerate consolidation.

But, of course, I can't use this modern method as it is. He lacked the equipment to do so.

Thus, he decided to be clever about it. He bore vertical drains using Javier's mana blast.

That was how Lloyd replaced the vibrating sand drain equipment with Javier, the silver-haired knight. Next, he filled them up with bamboo sticks and sand he had prepared beforehand.

So what he was doing was actually a combination of the sand and paper drain method.

Next up was Ppodong. Lloyd ordered him to roll on the ground. "Hey, Ppodong? Roll!"

"Ppodong!"

Ppodong, who weighed several tons, rolled around to his heart's content. His massive weight moved on top of the strata, just like a wet roll of paper towels being pressed. The moisture soaked in the ground began to seep out. It was concentrated near the sand piles planted in the earth.

*Rumble...*The ground started to slowly sink. This place had been a wetland for thousands and thousands of years. For all those years, a huge amount of dead plants sunk into the water, remaining undissolved, and it resulted in a thick accumulation of fibers.

Once those fibers got soaked in a huge volume of water, they created a soft, mushy layer of what was known as peat deposits. However, the pressure from Ppodong was forcibly draining the peat deposits. The evenly placed sand piles accelerated the discharge of moisture all the more.

Squeeze...! The peat deposits got compressed as they drained, and their increased weight made them thicker. The consolidation phenomenon was taking place. Lloyd then ordered something that would accelerate the phenomenon.

“Hamang? Do you like bamboo straws?”

“Hamang!”

“Will you slurp it up then?”

“Hamamang!”

Hamang closely walked over to the bamboo straws planted around the ground. He then slurped the water pooled around the sand pile using the straws.

“Humung! Humu-mung!”

The water in the strata traveled to Hamang’s mouth in full. Hamang started to inflate like a giant balloon. The added weight put more pressure on the strata. The consolidation phenomenon accelerated. At this point, Lloyd and the soldiers moved to the next part of the construction. It was time to build the embankment that would wrap around the entire wetland.

“Ppodong! Spit!”

“Ppodung! Ptooey!”

Ppodong acted as their dump truck. He repeatedly stashed a huge amount of sand into his mouth and brought it to them. Afterward, the soldiers moved according to Lloyd’s instructions. They busied themselves with their shovels and built a strong foundation.

Of course, they built it just as Lloyd had designed it beforehand.

They should obviously do so. If we stack it up without order, the slope will erode after some time. Or the slope inside of the embankment will be fluidized because of the water leak. Or the piping phenomenon might destroy the slope by causing a landslide. All of these disasters would destroy the embankment and once it was crushed, the river would overflow and flood the reclaimed land, dooming it to become a murky swamp again.

In short, a meticulous design was imperative to prevent such awful situations that would prompt everyone's happiness index to take a nosedive. The slopes of the embankment were created and smoothened as much as possible. Its height was set to its maximum, taking into account the ground that would sink due to consolidation. That naturally created a difference in the height of the front slope, which would block any incoming river water, and the rear slope which would be installed on the side of the reclaimed land. The sides that would hold the pressure in the rear slope incline were constructed as firmly as possible. Of course, Lloyd didn't forget to press both slopes. The job was entrusted to Ppodong, who wholeheartedly rolled around the slopes.

"Ppo-do-dong! Ppo-do-do-dong!"

Roll! Ppodong perfectly embodied the role of a bulldozer or a roller. Afterward, Lloyd deployed his men to densely plant the grass in a single row. The roots of the grass firmly grasped the earth in the soil. This would prevent the earth from sliding down easily.

To finish everything off, Lloyd told everyone to carefully dig outside waterways to ensure that any rainwater would be drained through them.

After ten days of hard work...Finally, one section was finished. Woah. We did it.

Wiping his sweat off, Lloyd looked around himself. The murky swamps that were filled with all sorts of water plants no longer existed. The only thing Lloyd could see around him was dry land and firm embankments. This was it. He had finished reclaiming and building embankments in one area of the wetland. However, Lloyd couldn't stop there. There was still more land to be reclaimed.

"Keep moving! Once we are done, I'm going to shower you with money!"

Encouraged by Lloyd, the engineers moved to the next section. The Maritz Wetland wasn't composed of a single swamp. This vast wetland was instead composed of dozens of irregular swamps that spread all over the place.

Therefore, Lloyd decided to go about the construction, tackling one section, or a swamp, at a time. This geographical feature allowed him to reclaim and construct modules. Plus, the timing was perfect as it was the dry summer season. It hardly rained. The sun was out all day. So no weather could be any more perfect than this one for the reclamation project.

Thanks to that, the construction saw more momentum.

"Be careful of heat strokes! Make sure to take breaks! Give me a shout, and let's get to work on the third section. Go!"

"Ahhh!!"

Lloyd, Javier, the summoned partners, and the engineers all became one for the construction. The process of digging, drinking, spitting, scooping, filling, piling, and pressing became second nature to them. They became skilled at their jobs. At first, the reclamation and construction of one section took ten days. However, with time, that period became shorter and shorter. From ten days, it was down to nine. From nine to eight. From eight to six.

Just like that, three months passed. The embankments got connected to be longer as days progressed, and everyone's arms thickened with muscles. With each drop of sweat on their faces, the murky and humid swamps became drier. Originally, the Maritz Wetland was abandoned land filled with muddy swamps. Nameless creatures inhabited this place and erecting a building or doing farm work was impossible. The land was useless and was good for nothing. Just like that, the Maritz Wetland was treated as if it was nonexistent for many generations. That had been the case ever since humans began to reside in this land. For tens and thousands of years, the fate of this land was unchanged.

Everyone thought that it'd be the same in the future. It had been abandoned, and it would remain so. Just like how the sun rose in the east to go down the west, it was obviously the case. But all that changed now. Master Lloyd changed it. The people in the fiefdom and the baron and the baroness hurried to watch the marvelous scene unfold before their eyes. The useless, good-for-nothing wetland was transforming into a vast stretch of rice paddies and fields.

What's more, this transformation wasn't taking decades for it to be done. It was happening just within three months. The very person who was making the impossible possible was currently with them. It could be we're experiencing a miracle that no one in history witnessed or thought was possible before. And just like that...The people's impression of Lloyd was changing once again. Their feelings moved beyond simple courtesy into a sort of respect.

Ding Dong.

[Everyone in the Frontera barony is deeply impressed by the magic-like miracle you have performed. They greatly respect and praise you.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 47: How to Make Land (2)

Ding Dong.

[Everyone in the Frontera barony is deeply impressed by the magic-like miracle you have performed. They greatly respect and praise you.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 450 RP.]

[Current RP: 1131]

