Creak! Tight! They inserted the anchor bolts in the holes excavated 45 degrees in angle to the end and twisted the bar in the middle part of the anchor bolt, which moved to twist the bolt head connected to the bar. The anchor head twisted following the furrow in the ground and entered the body of the anchor bolts. The deeper the head entered, the end of the anchor bolts grew wider in diameter, completely filling up the space inside and tightly fastening. Afterward, Lloyd poured the grout solution into the hole. The solution was a hardener made by mixing the lime with the first-grade glue, which he produced by melting the slime, and it pulled the rope attached to the anchor bolt. Lloyd then looped the other end of the rope to the flat plate installed on the ground. This plate was made of granite and cross-shaped, and six feet by length and width.

The anchor bolt is in the ground. The plate is installed on the surface. In between was a rope that tightly pulled down the plate with its force, which worked to press the slope. To analogize, the piles they had constructed were like toothpicks in hamburgers. And these anchor bolts were like a needle with a thread that penetrated the hamburger. The thread was connected to a plastic plate on the bun. In short, the anchor bolt was a needle. The rope was a thread. The plate was plastic. When the thread was tightened, the plastic pressed the burger, holding down each ingredient. To actualize this design in real life, everyone labored to bore and insert the piles and anchors.

Javier sweated profusely, and the skeletons worked their fingers to the bones. Ggoming fluttered his wings, and Lloyd yelled. This was a daily occurrence. One day passed, and two days passed. Ten... A month, and two months later, the flowers began to bloom in the spring, and the maples in the highlands turned red. Finally, on the first snow day of the season, the tediously long construction was finally completed. The result was successful. The cliff slope that was crumbling away every day saw a chance. It no longer crumbled down. Count Namaran exclaimed when he saw it with his own eyes.

“Here is the payment I promised,” Count Namaran said a few days later when Lloyd and Javier were getting ready to leave.

“Is this... a carriage?” asked Lloyd, dazed.

“Yes, it is.”

“Pray, Your Excellency, this is not all your payment, is it?”

“Hahaha, of course not. Look inside the carriage,” said the count as he smiled gently.

A sense of expectation suddenly washed over Lloyd.

Is this...

Lloyd began to sense that a great prize was waiting for him. His heart pounding and thumping fast, Lloyd opened the carriage door, and his eyes widened.

“My token of appreciation.”

“...”

Crates. Crates were everywhere, and inside them were gold coins. Am I dreaming?! Lloyd wondered.

“Is this... all mine?” asked Lloyd in a daze.

“Can you not believe it? Hahaha! I decided to be generous. To be honest, I thought of being more generous given how you saved my daughter and city, but I did not like how you turned down this old man’s previous offer.”

“Haha,” said Lloyd, “You didn’t have to, Your Excellency.”

Lloyd grumbled, but he was already grinning ear to ear.

Hurray!

Lloyd discretely clenched his fists. He was looking at five crates packed with gold and silver coins. This was enough to cover all the expenses for the fiefdom and refugees without royal assistance.

Nice. Really nice.

I knew it, Lloyd said to himself, nothing beats money. Money was the best thing in the world. With this, he could spend the rest of his life lazing around and enjoying every good thing this world offered. Confident, Lloyd prepared to depart for home alongside the carriage laden with gold coins and with the Skeleton Corp. Count and Lady Namaran escorted them on their way off. And just like that, Lloyd left Namaran. The journey back home was long, and on the 12th day since they left the city, a few hours before their arrival in the morning, Lloyd gently called Javier, who was cleaning the bonfire at the camp.

“Hey, Javier.”

“Yes, Master Lloyd. Is there anything you need?”

“Javier, my Javier. You can’t play dumb like this.” urged Lloyd.

“I am playing dumb...? I’m not sure what you mean.”

“The bet. Lady Ella. You are to return to the fiefdom in that costume, remember?”

“...”

“You couldn’t have forgotten about it, right?”

“...”

But he did. Javier had completely forgotten about it. His heart suddenly dropped, but Lloyd’s face brightened with a mischievous and evil smile. And then he saw Lloyd’s hands carrying the dress and wig that belonged to Lady Ella.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 181: Father’s Waiting (1)

“Bibeong!”

Like always, Biebong’s vigorous shout resounded across Frontera county, the eco-friendly alarm welcoming the arrival of morning. Count Frontera’s heart thumped faster than usual as he met the morning. The day he had been waiting for was finally here.

Today is the day.

The count lifted the warm teacup a maid brought for him and looked out the window. It was softly snowing outside. His bedroom window offered a panoramic view of the cozy garden to the hill leading up to the manor. Since it was the season when branches went bare, the view was clearer in his eyes. The count was glad it was so because it meant a higher chance of spotting his son returning home.

It is likely he will be back by today.

Just then, Count Frontera recalled the homing pigeon that had arrived at the manor a few days ago. It contained the letter formed by Count Namaran, and it shared that Lloyd and Javier left Namaran city and were expected to arrive at Frontera fiefdom sometime soon. Count Namaran also expressed his deep gratitude to Count Frontera.

I never expected my son to go through such an event there.

Count Frontera’s eyes grew serious as he recalled the content of the letter. His son had left for Namaran City, saying that he would be back in no time after finishing the construction project. So, it was beyond Count Frontera’s imagination for Lloyd to go through such a terrible event there, that is, eliminating a group of dark magicians and fighting against Hell’s Knight.

Lloyd clutched the enemy’s leg, an enemy that even Javier couldn’t handle so easily... Whew.

What if things went wrong during the fight? The mere thought of it made his heart sink. Sure, Lloyd had merited another accomplishment now, but it didn’t matter to Count Frontera. Accomplishments or bragging rights were not what he needed. Lloyd was his son, and living a good and healthy life was all the count wanted from him. That was enough.

I should scold him when he comes back.

Count Frontera decided to scold Lloyd to stop getting involved in such affairs from now on and run away when things get dangerous. With that resolve in mind, Count Frontera stayed around the window and skipped breakfast, feeling restless and excited at the same time. He drank another cup of tea instead, but it didn’t quench his thirst. Another cup. Another, and another. The maid entered and left each time, brewing a new pot and taking the empty cups. The morning passed, and the afternoon arrived soon until the short sun of early winter moved southward. Even then, he continued hovering near the window.

Could it be that he’s not coming today? Perhaps he will arrive tomorrow? Or did something happen on his way here? And right around the time Count Frontera started growing anxious, he stopped dead in his tracks and bolted out of the room, taking two flights of stairs to descend down. Passing the main chamber and shoving the door open, he went out of the manor and ignored the maid’s hurried suggestion for a coat. He ran across the garden and looked down at the hill that leads to the manor.

“Oh.”

A carriage was coming up against the snow that had considerably grown thicker, leaving a long track behind its way. It was slowly driving up the hill until it stopped at the main gate of the manor. Just then, Count Frontera let out a squeaky noise.

“Eh?”

His gaze moved to the box seat, and the horseman, who was sitting there, greeted him.

Clack! The horseman happily waved its bony hands and smiled as its lower jaw clacked. Bony hands and clicking jaws. In other words, this horseman was a skeleton soldier.

“Eeeek?”

My son was supposed to be here. Lloyd was supposed to be here, not a skeletal soldier sitting in the box seat of a carriage. Count Frontera was about to sink to the ground in shock when the door opened just in time to save him. If it didn’t, he would have dirtied his pants in the muddy snow.

Click!

“Hmm? When did you come out here?”

It was Lloyd who stuck out his face through the door that opened. He smiled pleasingly at the frightened count.

“U-um, you see,” the count said as he struggled to collect his thoughts. “I came out just now.”

“Did I surprise you? You’re not even wearing a coat in this cold weather.”

“Yes, you see...”

Lloyd was already down from the carriage and near the count. He removed the coat and placed it on the count’s shoulders. The warmth calmed his troubled heart.

“I will be honest with you,” the count said, “I ran out to welcome you, and I nearly fainted in shock. What are those skeletons over there?”

The count pointed at the skeleton on the box seat, but it wasn’t alone. Two files of skeleton soldiers marched up the hill behind the carriage like rows of sausage links. Lloyd shrugged.

“Um, Count Namaran mentioned that he would explain the events that had taken place through the letter,” Lloyd mused. “But I suppose he skipped the part about the Skeleton Corps?”

“S-skeleton Corps?” repeated the count.

“Yes.”

“What is that?”

“My new workers.”

“Those skeletons are your workers?”

“Yes.”

“...”

“They’re friendlier than they appear,” assured Lloyd. “They may be eerie at first, but once you spend time with them, you will get used to their company. What’s more, they are hardworking and never slack off. Oh, allow me to introduce you, the one sitting on the box seat. That’s Turtle Neck, the leader of the Skeleton Corps.”

Clack! Turtle Neck waved its hands happily at the count. Lloyd then pointed to the rest of the skeletons.

“The two standing in the very front of each line are Square Jaw and Frozen Shoulder. As for the others... I have yet to memorize them because their names confuse me,” said Lloyd.

“...”

“Anyway, do not be afraid. They don’t bite.”

“...”

Count Frontera thought to himself that they looked like they would bury people alive, not bite, at one false move. He strove hard to push away the eerie feeling. Just then, Lloyd’s face grew serious, and he looked back. The count wondered if there was more to see than the current group of skeletons.

Smirking at the inside of the carriage, Lloyd said, “Hey, don’t you think it’s time for you to come out?”

But no one answered. Lloyd’s smile grew more mischievous.

“Hello?” asked Lloyd, “Are you possibly embarrassed?”

The count wondered who else might be there. That was when he realized that he hadn’t seen Javier. It was a cloudy and snowy day, so the inside of the carriage was hardly visible. Unable to make out who was in there, the count narrowed his eyes to slits. Just then, a cynical response came from the inside.

“Embarrassed? That’s a misunderstanding.”

“Then?” asked Lloyd.

“I was rearranging my skirt.”

“To look pretty?”

“Certainly. I’m trying to mind my manners toward my lord, whom I am meeting after a long while. I could never show such an untidy appearance in front of him.”

With that, Javier stepped out of the carriage. Count Frontera’s mouth hung wide open in sheer shock. But he wasn’t alone. The servants and maids that followed him and the countess that rejoiced in the return of her son from afar suddenly felt as though the world around them became blindingly bright at the sight of Javier.

Oh, everyone exclaimed. The world was such a beautiful place. They wondered if it was the weather that was bright. That was how gorgeous the sight of Javier getting off the carriage and straightening the hem of his modest dress was. The way he got down on his knee and paid his respect to the count. His appearance, the wig, the apron, and the old shoes were all modest, but they hardly mattered. Javier was ravishingly gorgeous. A simple bow made him glow to the point that nearby onlookers were abruptly overcome with the desire to be crushed between the small wrinkles on his forehead. In short, everyone who stood outside the manor was lost for words at the sudden appearance of Lady Ella.

“Knight Asrahan, I am honored to be in your presence.”

“Oh... mhm.” Cough! Cough! Flustered, Count Frontera broke out into a coughing fit. Lady Ella, no, Javier rose and stood up after paying his respects to the count. He then strode across everyone, still speechless and flustered to the core. Before anybody could stop him or ask any questions, Javier entered the main gate as though he was fleeing the scene. He crossed the garden and hurriedly entered his chamber in an annex building of the manor. A second after he set foot there, he threw the wig and dress into a garbage bin to make sure that they would be unwearable in the future.

“Whew.”

Javier sighed, wondering what led him to do such a thing. Just then, he recalled what happened earlier in the morning. It was the last morning of their journey to his fiefdom from Namaran. Just like always, he tidied up the campsite, and that was when Lloyd approached and asked if he had forgotten anything with a suggestive gaze. Subsequently, he swayed that despicable wig and dress in front of him. Javier couldn’t fight. He had made a bet. A promise had to be kept.

There won’t be any reason for me to wear those clothes now.

Never again. Javier would make sure that was the case. He resolved so as he stared at the wig and dress crumpled inside the bin. Then he sulked inside his room all day, never setting even a toe outside.

***

The following morning rolled around.

“Hey, Lady Ella.”

“...”

“Lady Ella?”

“...”

“Sir Asrahan?”

“Yes, what do you need?”

Javier’s reply was icy. Lloyd grinned at his attitude.

“Did what happened yesterday upset you a lot?” asked Lloyd.

“Not at all. I was not upset.”

“But your door was locked. I came over at night to sing a lullaby for you since it had been a while.”

“I was sleeping,” said Javier curtly.

“Really?” asked Lloyd, raising his eyebrow.

“Yes.”

“But I heard you sigh.”

“I must have done so while I was asleep.”

“No, it couldn’t be,” Lloyd rebutted. “I heard a shaky sigh coming out of your nose like you were trying to hold back your anger.”

“I must have been having a bad dream,” retorted Javier.

“Like what?”

“Like meeting Master Lloyd in my dream. Or talking to Master Lloyd in my dream. Or eating with Master Lloyd. Or being near Master Lloyd. Or spotting Master Lloyd from afar. Or hearing news about Master Lloyd. Or seeing a cow dung that resembles Master Lloyd. Those kinds of dreams.”

“…”

“Should I go on?” asked Javier.

“Yes, it’s very interesting. It sounds like just hearing me breathe is enough to offend you,” said Lloyd.

“I see you’re aware of it.”

“Yes, that is why it is so fun to tease you.”

“Is that so?” asked Javier. “Master Lloyd, you must be thrilled.”

“Why would I be?”

“For you will be stripping the bachelor title you have been holding for the past 27 years soon.”

“Hm? What do you mean?”

Lloyd cocked his head. He was still single and didn’t even have a girl he was interested in, let alone a girlfriend. So, what was the knight talking about? Javier gave a chilling response.

“Soon, it will be another year, and you will be in your 28th year of being single.”

Lloyd was too shocked to speak.

“Congratulations in advance,” said Javier.

“Ah, yes. Thank you. I’m crying tears of joy,” said Lloyd dryly.

“Not at all.”

“…”

Lloyd felt like he messed with the bull and got the horns. Or as though he threw a tiny marble and then was socked in the gut with a shot put ball.

Forcing a bitter smile on his face, Lloyd spoke.

“So, do you feel better?”

“Yes. Thanks to you, a little bit.”

“Yeah? Then let’s go.”

“Where to, Master Lloyd?”

“To the construction site.”

Lloyd spoke as he straightened his collar to block the cold wind. He had fully recovered from his travel after taking a day off yesterday. It was time to do the work he had been pushing off.

“The apartment complex and major sewage system. I received the report from Sir Bayern last night, but I should check with my own eyes.”

While Lloyd and Javier were out in Namaran, Sir Bayern accomplished numerous things. He reported to Lloyd that he had done an excellent job in finishing the apartment complex and the sewage construction.

“So, let’s go see for ourselves.”

Starting that day, Lloyd inspected the apartment complex and main sewage system for the next five days, making sure that everything was built according to the original design and no defects were found. Lloyd inspected the whole place with a fine-tooth comb, even using the surveying skill. The result was highly satisfactory.

Good. I think I can give it 90 points out of 100.

The apartment complex pleased him very much. Those who live upstairs might experience some inconveniences taking the stairs, but it was good enough shelter from the rain and cold. Just like that, people started to move into the apartment complex. The elderly and those with disabilities took the lower floors, while the relatively young and healthy individuals took the upper floors. The units weren’t particularly flashy or large. The structure simply allowed them to sleep inside. But that alone was enough to make them rejoice as they had lost their homes after being stricken by the Monster Domino phenomenon. The event led them to reside in a refugee camp with harsh living conditions for over a year. But now, they finally owned a house that allowed them to stay guarded against the rain and wind.

Well, taking the stairs will surely be a bother, but for now, this should be enough. And once things get a little better for them, they can build their own houses and move out of here.

And when the complex units became empty, Lloyd could turn this whole building into a dorm for the engineering corps and guards.

But that will happen later. As of now, I've overcome one major obstacle.

On the final day of the move-in, Lloyd threw his body on the bed, completely drained out and exhausted. Though he was fatigued, he was content. He must have received thousands of thank-yous in the past few days from refugees who were joyful to get a home for their new life. It was his first time receiving so much praise and gratitude.

Well, it kind of makes sense.

If someone suddenly came up to him and handed him a key to a free studio apartment out of goodwill when he was living in a room rental in Korea, he would have been overwhelmed with gratitude too, just like them.

I've done a good deed. And it's going to benefit me in the future.

Now that they had all moved into the apartment complex, they were no longer refugees. They were now proud residents of Frontera county.

And all of them will pay taxes.

A lifetime pension. The thought of it made him smile ear-to-ear.

Ahh. Great! The refugee problem's been solved. I won't have to worry about the fiefdom's finances for the time being, thanks to the money and jewels from Namaran. Well, well, looks like all that’s left is to sit back and enjoy life.

There weren’t any large construction projects or turmoil in his future. He would just enjoy a quiet and luxurious life. Resolving that, Lloyd was able to fall asleep soundly. And the following day, Lloyd welcomed the envoys of Queen Magentano, which were dispatched to depart for the sultan's kingdom.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 182: Father’s Waiting (2)

Fwick! The letter opened, and a serious gaze looked over the paper.

“Hmm.”

A wrinkle appeared on Queen Magentano’s forehead.

“Hell’s Knight, huh.”

She searched her memory. She read a mention of it in an old book, about how it was a knight that led a corps in Hell. But it had never ascended to earth since ancient times. The book warned that its arrival on earth would bring an apocalypse for every living being.

Should I be relieved that Hell’s Knight was summoned in such an imperfect form?

The kingdom could have been reduced to dust, but that didn’t happen. All the credit was due to the brave knights and people of Namaran. They thwarted the dark magicians’ schemes and struggled until they succeeded in suppressing Hell’s Knight. The report, written by Count Namaran, informed her.

But I question the veracity of this report.

Under the flickering candlelight, the queen’s eyes held a faint smile as they read the report. Something didn’t sit right.

Certainly, I could believe that Namaran’s knights defeated and arrested a group of dark magicians, but Hell’s Knight? Regardless of its defects, they really managed to defeat it?

She could not believe it.

The report added afterward is more suspicious.

Her gaze moved downward, which detailed how Hell's Knight was subdued.

Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family, was residing in Namaran just in time, and his singing threw Hell's Knight into great confusion. Thanks to it, Sir Javier Asrahan and the other knights worked to defeat the formidable enemy. But hmm... What kind of song must one sing to perturb the knight of hell?

She couldn't imagine it. But she could faintly catch what was going on inside the report.

Count Namaran downplayed the report at the request of the eldest son of the Frontera family.

The queen could sense it right on. Certainly, she wasn't at the scene to witness the event. But the hints and clues from the report allowed her to postulate so.

To begin with, Hell's Knight is not an enemy the knights of Namaran can fight against. That is, even if they risked their lives. Yet the report says the knights worked together with Sir Asrahan. No. In reality, Lloyd Frontera and Javier Asrahan were probably the only ones that fought against Hell's Knight.

The queen harked back to the past, particularly the night someone tried to assassinate her and the capacities Lloyd and Javier showed on that night. Javier suppressed Sir Kyle, the sword master. And Lloyd manifested a variety of talents and skills even though he wasn't a sword master. Based on that night, the duo would have put up a good fight against Hell's Knight, as the latter was imperfect.

But it is a wonder as to why Count Namaran understated their role in his report. Hmm, is he trying to help Lloyd lead a quiet life?

Just when her thought reached that point, Queen Magentano smirked. She was well aware of Lloyd's modest tendencies. How he wasn't ambitious and longed to live an ordinary life. The reports she had gathered in various ways allowed her to detailedly understand his character.

That must be why he asked the count. He must have requested him to understate his role.! But too bad. Lloyd Frontera. Cannavaro, the very man transferred here last night, will end up confessing everything. Furthermore, I plan on making good use of you for the time being.

A competent individual was to be used. Ignoring one's talent was wasteful, and it bordered on being sinful. The more tired capable individuals became, the more prosperous the kingdom and people's lives became. This was especially true at this critical juncture when the kingdom was experiencing a diplomatic row with a powerful neighboring nation.

"That is the reason why I included Lloyd Frontera in the delegation. Am I wrong?" asked Queen Magentano, her question echoing heavily in the study.

"You are certainly correct, Your Majesty," answered the foreign affairs secretary standing politely beside her.

"Correct? But did you not tilt your head in confusion regarding my plan up until I dispatched the envoys? Did you change your mind?"

"Certainly not, Your Majesty."

"Then what do you mean?" asked the queen.

"Your humble servant simply wanted to make inquiries and express his opinions until a decision was made, Your Highness."

"Do you mean that you will not make an independent judgment on my decisions?"

"Yes, Your Majesty. However..." said the secretary, stopping midway.

"However?"

The secretary hesitated to speak.

“Do speak,” the queen urged, “I will not reprimand you for your opinions.”

“Thank you, Your Majesty. To reveal my thoughts, I am simply curious about what we benefit by including Lloyd Frontera as an envoy,” said the secretary, his words careful.

Deepening her smile, the queen said, “Hmm, I see what you are saying. Are you wondering what contribution Lloyd Frontera will make to the delegation when he is not an expert in diplomacy?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“To be honest, I have no high hopes for him, either.”

“Your Majesty?”

The secretary lifted his head, his eyes lifting in confusion. Queen Magentano smiled softly.

“Lloyd Frontera will only act as the face of the envoys. He is a symbolic figure that represents the countless victims of the Monster Domino phenomenon.”

“Is that all, Your Majesty?”

“Yes, that is it. However, I cannot say that I have absolutely no expectations of him.”

“Then...”

“I have never seen a man stingier than him.”

“Your Majesty?”

The secretary tilted his head in confusion, and the queen scoffed.

“From the moment I was born,” the queen went on, “I grew up in the political arena of the kingdom. I had to overcome countless competitions and feuds to rise to the throne. And I have met many people along the way.

The wicked, the fierce, the fool, the cunning, and the clever. But Lloyd Frontera was different."

"Do you mean that you saw a side of him that stands out from the others?"

"I did. It was my first time encountering such a hard-working yet cheap person who's also incredibly stubborn and petty all at once."

"..."

"The reason why I hold high hopes for him is probably because of his character. I think he may come back to us with a surprising achievement."

"..."

Queen Magentano's calm voice rang aloud the study, and because of that heavy atmosphere, the secretary couldn't dare answer anymore. He simply hung his head down, thinking to himself.

Is she cursing the man or complimenting him...?

He couldn't ascertain it. So, he only wished that the delegation dispatched to the sultan's kingdom would strike a successful negotiation and not end in a war.

***

"Excuse me? So, um, are you telling me that I have to join the envoys for us to avoid a war with the sultan's kingdom?"

"I am certain that you know this as well. This is not coming from me. It is an order from Her Majesty."

Flip! Tick! The scroll of royal order rolled up. Count Ventura, the head of the envoys, spoke after he finished reading the queen's order.

"Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera family, I have no doubt that you know this as well. A royal order from the queen must be abided by at all costs."

“Ah, yes, I am aware of that, but-”

“The delegation departs tomorrow morning. Make sure you are ready before then.”

Whoosh. Count Ventura turned around. The empty spot he left behind was replaced with a cold gust of wind that hit Lloyd’s chest.

Ha...

The sigh just came out naturally. What in the world happened? Lloyd wondered to himself. He was happy up until last night. The refugee issue was all taken care of as the apartment complex and the main sewage system had been completed. He had earned a great sum in Namaran, and so he had nothing to worry about for the time being. There were no signs of any more trouble. And so, Lloyd thought he was set for a happy, lazy, and prosperous life.

My queen! Why are you doing this to me?!

Lloyd blamed the queen, who was in the palace far, far away from him, and recalled the event of this morning at the same time. It must have been right after breakfast. Lloyd felt slightly more sleep deprived than usual, so he decided to sleep more and threw himself on the bed, happy and content. That was when he heard a fuss on the first floor, and he heard the servants and maids moving around.

Curious as to what was happening downstairs, Lloyd went out to the corridor, and he met the count and countess hurrying down the stairs. Stopping short, the count turned around and told Lloyd that the royal messenger of the queen was here. He should dress up and get down. Lloyd wondered what it could be about and suddenly got an ominous feeling. After changing into formal clothes, he got down and kneeled. He carefully listened to the royal envoy reading the order. The order was simple yet destructive. Lloyd was to join the diplomatic delegation, which was heading to the sultan’s kingdom. It ordered that Lloyd must assist the team that would be engaging in diplomatic negotiation with the sultan.

Me? The delegation? Help them? How?

Lloyd couldn't put his finger on it. But he had a vague idea of a role he could potentially take on.

What, am I the face?

Lloyd racked his brain, and it was clear as day as to why the queen would send the delegation to the sultan in the east.

Monster domino.

The queen was holding them to be accountable. She was trying to obtain compensation and a diplomatic agreement to prevent such an event from happening again. That had to be the reason why the queen put him on the team. The Frontera fiefdom was one of the places that were harmed by the phenomenon. It was the only fiefdom that survived and became the hub for reconstruction.

She's making me the representative of the victims. Yeah. That's it. I'm the witness in charge of describing the damage that was done to this region.

That was it. That was the purpose of sending Lloyd.

Haa… Did I whine too much the last time?

Lloyd looked back to the time he received funds from the queen. He had whined and thrown an ugly tantrum in the letter he sent, and that must have left a powerful impression on her.

That's why she's sending me. To whine and cry before the sultan like that time, so I can spice up the negotiation. Goodness.

Lloyd felt bitter. The royal order had already been announced, so there was no way of refuting or refusing it. In other words, Lloyd was forced to join the delegation first thing tomorrow and go to the sultan's kingdom.

I never thought I'd have to visit the sultan kingdom.

But it wasn’t a light, carefree journey. Suppose the delegation failed to strike a negotiation, and the sultan brazenly refused to be held accountable. In that case, the diplomatic row would worsen for the two kingdoms. That could lead to war, which would be a disaster for the Frontera fiefdom.

We’ll be dragged into the war between the two powers.

In the case his kingdom lays a siege first, the Frontera fiefdom would become a bridgehead for invasion. On the other hand, in the case the sultan's kingdom attacks first, the fiefdom would turn into a defensive frontline. In short, his fiefdom would become a battlefield, and Lloyd detested the thought of it in either scenario.

“Are you sure you will be all right?”

“Oh, yes.”

Count Frontera placed his hand on Lloyd’s shoulder, and Lloyd smiled at him as he turned. Truly, Lloyd didn’t welcome this situation wherein he had to abruptly leave the fiefdom again. He was even more bitter as his plans of spending his life in a peaceful retirement was delayed. But what else could he do? And since he was ordered to go anyway, he might as well finish up quickly and return. Thinking so, Lloyd got ready for departure. But there really wasn’t much to prepare.

I’m just a member of the delegation, so yeah.

The food and lodging would be all provided for. Starting a fire or getting a tent ready would all be taken care of by the people in the delegation, so Lloyd simply needed to pack a few of his clothes. And something else to kill his boredom during the journey.

“And that is me?”

“Duh. Of course.”

“Do I exist to kill your boredom, Master Lloyd?” asked Javier.

“Yes, Of course.”

Lloyd nodded his head at Javier’s question.

“Did you think you would be staying in this fiefdom while I am being dragged to that far, distant kingdom?” asked Lloyd with a nonchalant look on his face.

“Yes.”

“Wow. You didn’t even hesitate to give your answer.”

“I am merely a man who follows the lord’s command.”

“And the count hasn’t ordered you to protect me. Is that it?”

“That is right.”

“Tsk. I’m pretty sure he has just forgotten to.”

“What do you mean?” asked Javier.

“He didn’t bother to give a separate order because it is too obvious that you will go where I go. Don’t you think so?” asked Lloyd.

“No.”

“That is what you wish to believe. Anyway, let’s do this. I will go and ask him to let me take you.”

“...”

“Hoho, you’re thankful and moved to tears. Right? Think about it. What if you stay behind here all alone? How will you sleep?”

“Sleep? That is something-”

“Something very precious,” interrupted Lloyd. “Sleep greatly affects the body and mind. And you’re going to give that up?”

“I think that is better than being haunted by you, Master Lloyd.”

“And what if something terrible happens to me there? Are you fine with that?”

“Yes, of course.”

“...”

“Why are you staring at me like that, Master Lloyd?” asked Javier.

“You know, I just thought that I have to take you with me. Really, I can’t go alone. That’ll be unfair.”

“...”

“So, hold on for a second here. I’ll go to the count and request that you come with me. Then I’ll sing you a lullaby.”

Lloyd left Javier’s room and skipped toward the count’s study. The inside of the room was brightly lit. However, there was a faint shadow on the count’s face as he welcomed Lloyd. Was it because he had to send his son again after going through all the trouble in Namaran? Or because he was worried about the things Lloyd would go through there? They were right, but there was an even bigger reason.

“I am glad that you are not asleep. I have a favor to ask you, my lord,” said Lloyd.

The count looked at his son, Lloyd, who entered his study with a grin. He wondered the last time Lloyd had called him “father.” It had been too distant in the past that he couldn’t remember.

“I see... What do you need?”

The count decided not to push Lloyd just yet. Let’s wait until he opens up. Resolving such, the count beamed.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 183: Father’s Waiting (3)

It was snowing softly at first. But as the night wore on, it thickened, carpeting the ground under the midnight moonlight. The white field of snow received the first mark of footsteps. Count Frontera turned to the side as the crunching noise of the footsteps whispered in his ears.

“I hope you are not cold,” said Count Frontera.

“I am not. Not very much,” Lloyd replied, and the count grinned as he glanced sideways at his son, who was walking beside him. Seeing Lloyd by his side pleased him. His heart was bursting with contentment.

“I am afraid that I am pestering you,” said the count.

“Not at all. I am fine,” said Lloyd.

“Are you starting to feel tired?” asked the count again.

“Not yet.”

“Should we,” suggested the count, “walk a little longer then?”

“I was just about to suggest that we do.”

“Haha. My boy.”

He laughed again. Count Frontera felt happy every time he looked at Lloyd. He even hated that the foggy breath coming from his laughter momentarily hid Lloyd’s face. The count was on cloud nine as he strolled through the night.

I will have to say goodbye to him for a while again.

Lloyd had just returned from Namaran after a long period of time, but he was set to leave again after a few days. He was to join the envoys and travel to the sultan’s kingdom. When will he return then? Next spring when the flowers bloom? It was because of this sorrowful thought that the count abruptly suggested a night stroll when Lloyd visited his study.

“Tell me if you are feeling cold or tired,” said the count, “a long journey awaits you tomorrow morning.”

“Don’t worry. I’m not very tired.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes.”

Silence again. The two walked side by side, sometimes one taking the lead. They held out their hands when their path turned slippery. Just like that, they strolled around the hills, stone walls, and woods. The count suddenly was hit with memories of the past, and as he glanced at the snow piling on his son’s shoulder, he started to take a trip down memory lane.

“You know,” the count started, “when I was young...”

Lloyd quietly listened as he kept pace with the count.

“I despised this fiefdom,” the count said as he collected his breath. “I was frustrated, bored, and sick of it.”

Count Frontera smiled faintly. He really was tired of it at the time. When he was 17 years old, this fiefdom felt like a giant fence that locked him up.

“I thought it was too rural. I was not happy that I had to spend the rest of my life as a small noble in the middle of nowhere.”

“Was it because you were ambitious?” asked Lloyd.

“Ambition... I can’t say. I was young, I suppose.” The count chuckled, but no sound came out. “I wanted to do something. Something grand and shiny, not this boring life in the province. Would it be funny if I tell you I wanted to be in the big league? Anyway, I wanted to make a name for myself. So, I decided to do it. I left home.”

“Wait, did you run away from home?” Lloyd glanced at the count, his one eyebrow quirking up to reflect his surprise.

“Hmm...”

The count gave him a bitter smile.

“Run away?” continued the count. “It’s a bit of an embarrassing way to put it, but I cannot find a retort back. Yes, you are right. I ran away from home. I left this fiefdom in the middle of the night riding the very horse your grandfather cherished very much, without any notice. It’s fair to say I ran away.”

“Yes, you certainly did.”

“Could it be the reason why? Was I getting punished for it? My life afterward was filled with hardship.”

“By hardships, you mean...” mumbled Lloyd.

“I volunteered for the mercenary in my desire to succeed on my own and prove that I was capable. Then I regretted it.” The count smiled bitterly.

“Imagine it,” he went on, “I was just a seventeen-year-old kid who had no experience with swords other than swinging them around my guards as practice. Who would hire me? That was why the commander barely put me to proper work. Three months of chores, and that was it.”

“You must have been sorely disappointed,” said Lloyd.

“Yes, at first. I wondered if this was all I was capable of. But I endured. I endured believing that my time would come. And my, it really did.”

“How?”

“I met a girl there.”

“Oh,” said Lloyd, his eyes shining for a second.

The count smiled.

“I think it was snowing like this. The commander called me, and there I saw a girl about my age captured there. A big crime she committed, he said. That she will be sold for slavery. He told me to watch her so she would not run away.”

“Then?”

“I asked the girl secretly,” the count went on, “whether it was true. She told me that it was a lie. The truth is that the commander and his team had ransacked her village. That was when I realized.”

“That the mercenary group looted and robbed villages when they were out of work,” Lloyd joined.

“Yes. That was why he put me to chores and nothing else,” agreed Count Frontera.

“What did you do after you learn that?” asked Lloyd, piqued.

“I ran away. With the girl.”

“All safe and well?”

“No.”

The count grinned.

“We fled at midnight, and we were being chased even before the sun rose. So, we galloped, everything around us growing hazy. Of course, with the girl behind my back.”

The count’s gaze moved to the falling snow, and he spoke, his eyes traveling back in time.

“We ran for our lives. But how tenacious they were. We could not get rid of them no matter how far we ran. And on the sixth day, we were surrounded.”

“But given that you are all alive now, I suppose it didn’t end badly?” asked Lloyd.

“It did not. Your grandfather showed up.” The count paused before continuing to talk. “Unbeknownst to me, we were near the western border of my fiefdom when we were captured. I was too busy that I could see it. Thankfully, my father found me. He had been patrolling the fiefdom every day at all hours since I left home.”

“In case you came back home?” asked Lloyd.

“It must have been so. Anyway, he found us just in time and drove away our pursuers with his guards.”

“That concluded your life as a runaway?”

“Indeed. It also concluded the biggest adventure of my life.”

“Then what happened to the girl you came with?” asked Lloyd.

“She is your mother.”

“Woah.”

Lloyd let out an astonished sound, and now he understood how the count and countess maintained such a happy marriage. It never occurred to him that they had such a backstory.

“From then on, I realized dearly at last how much my father cherished me. The same way I cherish you, son,” the count said.

“...”

“Are you feeling shy?”

“Uh, um, it’s not that, but...”

“Then?”

“May I be frank?” asked Lloyd, almost mumbling.

“Yes.”

“I got goosebumps for a second there,” Lloyd said.

“Hmm? Hahaha!” The count broke into laughter.

“Please forgive me,” Lloyd replied.

“No, no,” the count said. “I can understand why.”

The count chuckled as he tapped Lloyd’s shoulder. But he didn’t really care whether Lloyd got goosebumps. If he could, he wanted to tell Lloyd more. I cherish you truly and sincerely. The grand masterpiece, the best chapter of my life is you, Lloyd. Please stay safe on this trip too. That would be more than enough for your old man. Count Frontera yearned to tell these things to Lloyd through the night even after midnight. But he suppressed his desire because he didn’t want to make Lloyd uncomfortable. And what’s more, he wanted to give his son time.

Until the day comes when you call me father again, Lloyd.

Some time ago, his son had completely changed from being a hooligan into an industrious, faithful man. But something else also changed. Lloyd stopped calling them “Father” or “Mother” altogether. Count Frontera was pleased and joyful about the change, but at the same time, wistful and sad, However, he resolved that there wasn’t any need to show it. Lloyd had to open his heart on his own. And as a parent, all he could do was wait until his son fully opened up to them. With such thoughts in mind, Count Frontera ambled on, Lloyd walking on his side.

Whew...

Lloyd sighed internally. He, too, had discerned what was going on. He could not help but notice that the count and countess were bothered by his attitude and how he wasn’t calling them “Father” or “Mother.” He also knew that this saddened them, and they felt sorry about it. However, it wasn’t easy for him to act according to their wishes.

I’m sorry. But I don’t want to act with affectation.

The count and countess were good people. And Lloyd knew very well that they thought dearly of him. That was precisely why he didn’t want to be pretentious around them. He didn’t want to call them father and mother just to please them, as it would only mortify the good couple and be using their innocent hearts. Lloyd never ever wanted to do that. And that was why...

I’m sorry. Just give me some more time.

Until his heart is ready. Until he could nonchalantly brush off the pang of regret and guilt that attacked him for replacing their real son, Lloyd. Until he could come clean to them and bare his heart to them. When the very day came when everyone could accept each other as family, that would be the only time Suho would be qualified to call them his parents.

“I will try.”

In the lack of confidence to say it out loud, Lloyd just mumbled under his breath. And as the snow continued to fall, it was impossible for Lloyd to see how the count was reacting beside him. He simply couldn’t work up the courage to turn and look. But he could feel it somehow. Like a soft feather, like a night wearing on so comfortably, the moon reflected with her light a breath of air coming out of the count. And Lloyd was sure. It was definitely a trace of a soundless, quiet smile.

***

The morning came, and Lloyd joined the envoys as expected. Of course, Javier was with them.

“Mwahaha.”

“Why are you... laughing so mischievously?” asked Javier.

“Does it irk you?”

“Yes. Very much.”

Javier frowned slightly at Lloyd’s question. He started to load his belongings on the back of the horse just a tad more roughly.

“Could it be because you are happy to take me with you?”

“Yeah,” answered Lloyd joyfully.

“Why does that make you happy?”

“Because I won’t have to suffer alone.”

“So sharing suffering makes you happy?”

“No.”

“Then?”

“I’m happy that you’re suffering with me.”

“...”

“It’s unfair that I’m the only one who has to go work there. So, I have to drag at least one person along on the trip. I’ll make him work together beside me. That way I’ll know that I’m not the only one plodding away, and that there’s at least one person going through the same thing as me. I won’t feel alone in my misery. Don’t you think that would give me comfort?”

“This devil...”

“Hm?” asked Lloyd, suddenly shooting a surprised glance at Javier. “What did you say?”

“I said you are a devil.”

“Why, yes, thank you.”

“...”

“Better than being a soft touch.”

Lloyd smirked as he stared at Javier, who started to laugh at his brazenness. And Javier secretly regretted that he didn’t call Lloyd a mole cricket. That could have been a more effective insult. Javier resolved that he would use it the next time. Meanwhile, the envoys were done packing and ready to go. The departure was nothing grand.

“I sincerely express my gratitude to Count Frontera for your unreserved hospitality during our stay here. So long then.”

With the comment of gratitude from Count Ventura, the envoys set off on their journey. Lloyd and Javier bid farewell to the count and countess and left. They headed to the east, climbed the eastern range, and then passed the wasteland, nearing the border of the sultan’s kingdom that sat in the east.

They revealed to the corps commander guarding the border that they were on a diplomatic visit. From then on, the journey became safer and more efficient. The envoys were the official diplomatic delegation dispatched by Queen Magentano, and thus, acted as her representative in sharing and defending her will. They received treatment and respect befitting of their status throughout the sultan’s kingdom territory. And at last, the envoys arrived at “Ahinsya,” the capital city. It had been 24 days since Lloyd left his fiefdom.

“Wow.”

Lloyd found himself exclaiming out loud after passing Ahinsya’s front gate.

What an exotic sight.

Far east from his fiefdom, and far southward from there. The climate was dry due to the location even though it was the middle of winter.

If I was a film director for Arabian Nights, then this place would be perfect for the shoot.

Arabian Nights. The city’s ambiance reminded him of the story. There were round roofs erected everywhere, and the walls were made of dried mud. The atmosphere was completely foreign and exotic to Lloyd.

“Please follow me.”

An official who seemed to be sent by the sultan came to escort the envoys and entered the kingdom. Lloyd was totally engrossed in seeing the structure of the palace.

Wow. This is pretty educational.

Lloyd was surrounded by foreign architecture. Certainly, he didn’t major in architecture, which was poles apart from civil engineering. But the two studies could be traced back to the same foundation. Accordingly, Lloyd’s eyes glimmered as he viewed the various styles and designs. And after a long escort, the reception room door opened, and inside was...

“Are you certain that you are not mistaken?”

Count Ventura’s voice was filled with dismay, which brought Lloyd to look into the hall. There was nothing there. It was extremely simple and austere to a fault. The narrow space seemed unfitting for the palace, and even the table and chairs felt out of place. Rather than simple, it looked cheap. No, it was too shoddy to be called cheap. In other words...

“There must have been a mistake. We are envoys who traveled a long way here to uphold the orders of Her Highness Alicia Termina Magentano. And yet, you present us with a reception room that does not suit our status. Is this where the sultan will meet us?”

Count Ventura’s gaze darted to the palace official as he asked, and the same look of confusion appeared on every member of the delegation. Meanwhile, Lloyd put on a faint smile.

Haha. Will you look at them?

Lloyd merely chuckled, almost certain that there was no mistake here. It was impossible for the sultan to be this clumsy. Therefore, it was an evident show of maltreatment. Lloyd plastered a wry smile as he read the room before the others did. Just then, the door inside the hall opened.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 184: Hurray for the Sultan (1)

This feels quite familiar.

The corners of Lloyd's lips rose, but it was more of a smirk, not a smile. His gaze then traveled to the inner door of the room, which was opening up. Another man, who appeared to be a palace official, walked inside and paid mechanical respect to Lloyd and the others. Then, with a stoic, expressionless face, the man spoke.

"Thank you for traveling all the way here. Please have a seat over here," said the man as he pointed at the table in the reception room.

The table was plain and lacked any decoration, and the same went for the chairs around it. They were chairs that were commonly used in most houses. In other words, this room wasn't set up to entertain diplomatic envoys sent by a foreign monarch. Count Ventura, the one leading the delegation, expressed his dismay.

"Ha... There seems to be a mistake here," announced Count Ventura.

"By mistake, what do you mean?" the official asked.

"I think you brought us to the wrong room."

"I am still clueless as to what you are saying." The official cocked his head to the side with a straight face. This caused Count Ventura to complain further. His voice reflected greater dismay.

"It seems there was a miscommunication on your end causing this mishap to happen. We are special envoys sent by no other than the great queen, Her Highness Queen Alicia Termina Magentano. In other words, we traveled far and wide to speak on her behalf to the sultan. Despite that, we are brought to this small and shoddy reception room. Moreover, to be met by a lowly official instead of the sultan? I don't understand why," said the count at length.

“Why don’t you understand?” the official nonchalantly asked.

“The treatment we received is unbecoming of our status. Do me a favor and go back to your supervisor and ask whether you brought us to the correct place.”

“I am sorry,” said the official, “but I escorted you to the correct place.”

“What is? This place?” the count said as he looked all around. “This small and shoddy reception room where you led us?”

“That is right.”

“How...?” The count’s face shook.

Still wearing a robotic and expressionless face, the official said, “I led you to the right location. Tell me, aren’t you all the envoys from Queen Magentano?”

“We are. I made that clear a while ago.”

“Yes. Then you are in the right place.”

The low-level official only repeated those words like a parrot, and Count Ventura’s eyebrows twitched.

“Is the sultan intent on insulting the queen?” huffed the count.

“That is not something I know. I am simply fulfilling the orders given to me,” the official defended.

“Then bring me your supervisor!” Count Ventura bawled at last.

But the palatial official didn’t even bat an eye. He nodded in a stiff manner, and that was it.

“Understood. Then please wait here for a moment.”

Once the official left, Count Ventura started to bite his underlip in anger.

“What in the world is happening...”

Is he trying to control his rage? Or could it be that he just can’t understand the current situation? Probably both.

Lloyd smiled bitterly as he read the room.

It took everyone a while to get a grasp of the situation. Well, it’s not surprising. These people here have probably never been treated like this before.

Lloyd’s eyes moved to look at Count Ventura and then studied the rest of the members. Everyone belonged to noble families that held considerable influence in the capital.

No wonder they never received this kind of treatment before. That’s why they’re having trouble grasping the situation. They aren’t used to this. It’s foreign to them.

A wry smile continued to escape Lloyd, and his mind flew back to his time in Korea, particularly when he lived in a room rental.

People looked down on me all the time.

He barely had anything. There was nothing for him to boast. After losing his parents, he struggled each day to put food on the table. So, he never dared to treat himself, and that nuked his confidence. He couldn’t hide his cowering attitude that naturally came from his expressions and movements. From that moment on, people started to look down on him quite subtly. The manager of the building joked every time he saw Lloyd, saying, “Make sure you have your rent this month, you hear?” And there was more.

And to all the envoys, have you ever got on a crowded bus only to realize that you didn’t have enough money for the fare? With that thought, have you ever started frantically rummaging through your pocket in panic and spilled a handful of coins to the ground? And after you picked the coins up while apologizing to the other passengers, have you ever realized that you were still a quarter short? Then were you ever forced to get out of the bus again with all the people glowering at you for causing a delay?

The experience still made his stomach churn even now. However, it was because of his disparaging life in South Korea that Lloyd was able to grasp the situation the moment he was led to this shabby reception room. He knew how the sultan planned on treating the envoys. What the sultan was doing wasn't a mystery to him at all. He caught on immediately. He was accustomed to being looked down upon.

They're probably going to be more shameless from now on.

Lloyd took a seat at the table in one corner, deciding to see whether his prediction was right. And while he remained in his seat, observing the situation from one step away, a man who seemed to be a high-ranking official entered the room.

"I heard you wanted to see me," said the supervisor.

"Yes. I did."

Count Ventura, who was walking to and fro with anxious steps, reacted right away, and struggling to put on a calm face, he spoke to the official.

"I just can't properly get my words through to a low-level subordinate," explained the count.

"Hmm, what is the issue here?"

"This place," Count Ventura said. "I assume there has been a slight but grave mistake."

"Oh, I already heard that you expressed dissatisfaction regarding the reception room. But, unfortunately, this reception room has rightfully been assigned to you." The official smiled respectfully.

"What?" Dismay. Count Ventura's eyes were filled with dismay. "Then... What about the sultan? Does he not plan on entertaining us?"

“Regretfully, that will be the case for now.”

“Regretfully? For now?” the count repeated.

“Yes.”

“What do you mean by that?”

“The great and omnipotent sultan is overseeing a plethora of construction projects at the moment. Therefore, he cannot entertain you all as there’s too much work for him to catch up on.”

“But we are the representatives of Queen-”

“I am aware,” interrupted the official. “You are the diplomatic delegation sent by the queen. However, nothing can be done.”

“This is... outrageous!”

As the count shouted aloud, the veins in his neck bulged out of his skin.

“I am trying to be patient, but this has gone too far! What kind of a kingdom treats royal envoys like this?! This is not appropriate diplomatically, and it is out of line!”

“But,” said the official coolly, “there really is nothing we can do.”

“There is nothing you can do? Do you expect me to just accept that?!”

“If you disagree, then you can always go back.”

“What...?” Count Ventura stopped short, wondering if he heard him right.

The corners of the official’s lips rose in a strange manner, and he added, “I have expressed our stance well enough. Let me reiterate to you, the great and omnipotent sultan is currently unavailable to entertain you.”

“So what, we wait?”

“Now you understand our side. Yes. Wait, and the issue will be solved naturally,” stated the official.

“How long should we wait?”

“At least six months.”

“What-”

“As I said, there is nothing we can do. The great and omnipotent sultan is just that busy.”

“Are you mocking us?” challenged the count.

“Not at all.”

“Then what are you doing?!”

“Asking for your understanding.”

“How could you ask for our understanding for such a ridiculous request-”

“If you dislike it, then you can always go back.”

Thump. The official smiled faintly, bringing out a circular gold plate. He then set it on the table.

“The choice is yours to make. Go back now, or stay here and wait. We do not intend to force a decision on you.”

“What is that...?”

Count Ventura pointed at the gold plate with his jaw. The official grinned.

“It is a gift personally bestowed by the great and omnipotent sultan.”

“A gift?”

“Yes. It is a gift you can receive should you choose to wait.”

“Do explain...”

“The golden plate is called ‘Padashar.’ Its use is simple. Have this, and you will not need any money during your stay here in Ahinsya.”

“How so?”

“This Padashar represents the grace of the great and omnipotent sultan. It marks his promise to provide everything you will need during your stay here.”

Seluk, which was the name of the official, continued to explain.

“Carry this wherever you go in the capital, and you will not need to pay for your food. The same goes for when you buy clothes, hire camels and workers, and pay for your lodging.”

“Are you simply treating us like beggars now?” asked the count defiantly.

“You misunderstand me. How would I dare to?”

But the corners of the official’s lips were already up, and it made the count’s eyes tremble.

“Then I will give you some time to think over it. Please excuse me.”

While the rage and dismay continued to swell over the delegation, the high-ranking official bowed and left the room. Lloyd’s smirk on his face deepened.

It’s like I expected. I’m right.

The sultan kingdom. It was explicitly looking down on the delegation. Go back home if you hate waiting. Be in our favor if you wait. In other words, they demanded the envoys toss their pride to the ground, or the negotiation was off. The sultan kingdom was indirectly suggesting nuking the negotiation just like this. They wouldn’t be treated this way otherwise.

Are they planning to deny that they're responsible for the Monster Domino incident?

That seemed to be the case which was slightly problematic for Lloyd.

There'll be a war if the agreement fails.

Lloyd had a bad feeling about this. War had to be avoided. War breaking out was no good for anyone, particularly for the Frontera fiefdom, which would receive tremendous damage.

What's the delegation planning on doing?

Here came the crucial part. How the envoys responded to the preposterous attitude the officials manifested would determine the results of their discussion. But surprisingly, Count Ventura and the delegation remained still, doing nothing, their shoulders only drooping in discouragement.

"Haah. What do we do...?"

"Indeed," one of the envoys agreed. "I never imagined that they would receive us in this fashion. How does this make sense?" Count Ventura expressed his confusion.

"I agree with you. This is not right. We must summon someone in charge again and express our complaint."

"Indeed. We must do it. But what if it doesn't work?" rebutted Count Ventura.

"How about openly condemning the sultan?" one of the envoys suggested.

"Hmm, but we are in the enemy's territory," reminded Count Ventura.

"Then how about we send a letter to the kingdom?" the same official suggested.

"What kind of letter?"

“We will write a letter detailing their lack of respect toward us and ask for a larger delegation.”

“Do you mean to say,” mused the count, “we ask the palace for diplomatic support and pressure?”

“Yes, Your Excellency. Realistically, there seems to be nothing much we can do here.”

“Hmm...” Count Ventura stroked his beard, thinking hard about the subject. “I am clueless as to what we must do. But giving up on the negotiation and going back will only disappoint Her Highness. The war will become inevitable should that happen... But you, what are you doing?”

The count’s brow twitched, and his question was directed to the person in the corner of the room sitting at the table. Lloyd was there, and he grinned at the count.

“Oh, I was taking a gander at this one.”

Lloyd was holding a gold plate in his hand. It was the Padashar the official left on the table. When the count saw it in Lloyd’s hand, his brows trembled hard once more.

“Pray, do you desire that object?” asked the count.

“It seems interesting. That’s all,” Lloyd replied.

“Drop it. That object was given to mortify us. I expect you to keep your curiosity to yourself. And besides...” The count’s gaze grew stern as he looked at Lloyd. “You saw how they treated us, didn’t you?”

“Yes.”

“Then do you have any suggestions for us?”

“Um, nothing much.”

Lloyd shrugged after he spoke. A look of discontentment appeared on the count's face and vanished after a second.

How materialistic he is.

Actually, Count Ventura never liked Lloyd in the first place. Was it because a man from the sticks received favors from the queen? Or because he considered Lloyd to be an upstart? No. Count Ventura admitted that Lloyd was a capable and reputable man. But he hated the strain of materialistic character Lloyd manifested from time to time. For instance, it was right now. Lloyd was stroking the gold plate the sultan handed out to mock them. Count Ventura stared at Lloyd.

"May I advise you on one thing?"

"Yes, of course," answered Lloyd.

"The gold plate you are holding. Stay far away from it. Do not exchange your reason for greed. And do not sell your pride for negligible gains. Most of all, do not spoil our visit here with your foolish behavior."

"Yes. I understand," answered Lloyd.

"Do you mean it?"

"Of course," confirmed Lloyd. "Do not worry. I will not ruin this for everyone."

"Thank you. Thank you for seeing where I am coming from."

"No problem."

Was the count relieved at last? Count Ventura nodded in satisfaction. Lloyd responded by flashing a smile at the count to make sure he appeared trustworthy.

And that very night, Lloyd took the gold plate of the sultan and threw the biggest, wildest party of his life.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 185: Hurray for the Sultan (2)

A credit card. A common object anybody with income carried around in South Korea. Depending on an individual's personal finance credit, they could purchase goods and services on their card and pay it back later. Made of plastic, it was 3.375 inches wide and 2.125 inches high. But Lloyd never owned a credit card before. South Korea and its banks never permitted him to own one. The reason was simple.

Why else? I was pretty much a beggar.

He was young when his parents were alive. Getting an allowance was more than enough for him. But once he grew up, around the time he was old enough to use a credit card, his family went under. And then his parents passed away so soon that he was forced to live in a room rental. He could only make a living by working his butt off on construction sites to cover his expenses. So, making a credit card was impossible. Not a single bank in Korea issued him one.

That was the reason. I could only use a debit card and a transportation card.

Those wretched days came to his mind. In TVs, and everywhere he looked, people seemed to be wealthy. The celebrities on TV wore tens of thousands of dollars worth of watches as though they cost nothing. Ordinary people spent thousands of dollars every month. No, he was in dire straits that he was simply jealous of those who had the luxury of worrying about paying back a thousand-dollar card credit. Those ordinary people. Their ordinary concerns. But such ordinary things were nothing but a fairy tale for Lloyd.

It was obvious. A thousand dollars in credit card debt? Even that was a luxury for me. How starved I was! On bad days, I had to get by with instant ramen.

There was a time when a long monsoon put a pause on a construction project. That was when Lloyd naturally learned the art of surviving with one cup of instant ramen a day. In the morning, he cooked an instant noodle and ate only the noodle, leaving the soup untouched as much as possible. That was the most important part here. Kill the desire to chug the soup in one go, and that promised him a generous serving of lunch and dinner. Why? It was because he could use the soup again.

For lunch, I cooked the dried noodles offered at the room rental in the ramen soup and only the noodles. Then, for dinner, I mixed in the rice they give out at night with the leftover ramen soup from lunch. This method allowed me to get through the day with one bowl of instant ramen.

Otherwise, he threw an egg and some oil in a large bowl of rice and made fried rice out of it. It was a mess in terms of nutrition, but it was one of the most filling meals out there. It was because of the oil that made the rice greasy and slowed his metabolism.

The downside was that I felt bloated for the rest of the night, but it was better than getting a stomach ache from starving.

The resurfacing memories made his stomach flip over with bitterness. But those miserable days were over for him. The struggle of not having a credit card was nothing but history. It was different now. Why?

“That gold plate... Is that the Padashar, the one that the great and omnipotent sultan bestows...?”

“Yes, it is the one. I am glad that you recognized it right away.”

“Well, of course...”

Gulp. The restaurant owner’s Adam’s apple bobbed visibly, and his eyes, which were buried in fat, observed the gold plate. It was real. It had to be real. The symbol of sultan was engraved in the center of the gold plate. No one could replicate or copy it. It was the absolute law for anyone living under the rule of the sultan.

“So, what do you want to get with the Padashar?” The owner asked Lloyd.

“Everything,” stated Lloyd with a grin.

“Excuse me?”

“I want everything on the menu in this restaurant. Use all the ingredients you have,” demanded Lloyd.

“What are you saying...?”

“Do not think. Just go grill and fry. Consider closing your business for today.”

“Are you telling me to cook your meal using all the ingredients stored for today?”

“Yes, that is what I mean.”

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction. But the restaurant owner’s forehead started to form beads of sweat.

“But as you can see, this is not like any other restaurant. Only the wealthiest in Ahinsya can come in-”

“And that’s why I’m here. With the Padashar bestowed by the great and omnipotent sultan.”

Swish. Swish. Lloyd swayed the gold plate in front of the owner’s eyes, and the latter’s gaze shook.

“Ah... I understand.”

The authority of the Padashar can be trusted, the owner told himself. The sultan would eventually pay him later. Even if he used all the ingredients for today, amounting to an exorbitant bill no ordinary citizen could imagine for one meal, the sultan would pay it all back. So, in a way, this was an opportunity, a golden opportunity to make the most money ever since the restaurant opened.

“Then please wait here for a moment. No, I will escort you personally. Over here.”

Realizing what was going on, the owner dismissed his workers and led Lloyd to the most luxurious room. And he flashed the most courteous smile at Lloyd as though he was looking at a bar of gold.

“So, should I bring all the food to this table?”

“No.”

Lloyd shook his head, and with a carefree smile, he spoke.

“I want you to distribute it to everyone in the restaurant.”

“Excuse me...?”

“Look, I am not a monster. I can’t eat all of that alone. So, bring me one reasonable serving of food. As for the rest, distribute it all to the customers here.”

“But that’s going to-”

“Any reason you can’t?”

“...”

There wasn’t any reason not to. Surely, doing this was an outrageous and irrational way to spend money, but there wasn’t any rule that prevented him from doing so.

“Duly noted.”

The owner hurried into the kitchen and urged the chef and the others. The food came out in no time. Now, Ahinsya was the capital of the sultan’s kingdom and the largest port on the southeastern coast of the continent. So the quality of food was far from ordinary as the restaurant itself was high-end, to say the least. Expensive food continued to be served in series to the point that the table legs shook. Lobster was just the common one. Lamb aged with a 50-year-old wine. Rare jellyfish are caught only in the Arctic. Mushrooms grow only in the deepest part of the cave. Dessert fried from the oil extracted by a flower that blooms every 30 years... Lloyd used his fork and knife as he heard the chef personally explain each food to him. And Lloyd thought to himself...

Oh, I want to eat soybean paste stew.

Was it because Lloyd preferred simpler food? The chef boasted that his food was gourmet. But Lloyd couldn’t feel that exquisite quality when he tasted them. But still, they were more delicious and filling than he thought. And just like that, he stepped out of the VIP room slapping his belly which had grown slightly chubbier. And he looked around the restaurant with a confident gait, wherein people started to murmur and stare. It was obvious why. Lloyd was the first customer ever to empty the pantry of this high-end, gourmet restaurant in Ahinsya in just one day.

“Everyone,” Lloyd said, his jolly voice echoing through the wide and flashy restaurant. “I am joyful and honored to pay for your meals today. But most of you must be wondering. Why is this man, a total stranger, paying for such an expensive meal for us?”

Everyone nodded their heads. All of them were actually curious. Why on earth is he doing it? What is up with this alien? They used their wildest imaginations but no answer came. They couldn’t wrap their heads around his behavior. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose slightly.

“There is only one thing I would like to say. May the glory of the great and omnipotent sultan spread everywhere! Yes, that’s right. I am not the one paying for the food here. It’s the sultan’s treat. No, wait, he is paying for the food,” clarified Lloyd, thinking that they won’t know what “treat” meant.

Lloyd then held up the Padashar in his hand, and everyone’s eyes widened in surprise.

“I am sure you know what this object is. Yes, it is the Padashar bestowed by the great and omnipotent sultan. That is right! Every bit of food or sip of drink you enjoy today reflects the grace and consideration of the great and omnipotent sultan. So, let us cheer.”

Lloyd raised the Padashar high. And then...

“Long live the sultan!” Lloyd yelled.

“Long live the sultan...!” Not knowing why, the rich merchants and emirs in the restaurant yelled together.

Lloyd continued to yell, this time louder. “Long live the great and omnipotent sultan!”

“Long live the sultan!”

“Should we,” Lloyd went on, “spend the night partying as we wish for the eternal glory of the great and merciful sultan?”

“Long live the sultan!”

The atmosphere in the restaurant heated up, and on top of the endless buffet of superb food and alcohol, the best of the best bandsmen and dancers were hired. The generous pay guaranteed by the Padashar made them happy. They went an extra mile in their performance, and soon enough, the fanciest restaurant in the capital transformed into a flashy club. And Lloyd was behind the transcendental partying.

Who cares?! It’s not my money anyway!

Is this what it felt like to swipe a VIP card that couldn’t be maxed out? Everything was on the sultan, and there was no limit to its usage. The officials told Lloyd what? Meeting the sultan would take at least six months? Lloyd actually couldn’t be any happier. The opportunity appeared right in front of him, and he meant to grab it hard. So, the next six months would be spent swiping this credit card and shamelessly throwing money down the drain.

Now, this is the sweet life I was talking about!

Lloyd shouted at everyone, “Thank you so much, sultan!”

“Thank you so much!”

The customers in the restaurant and those who just joined after hearing the rumor all roared under the heated atmosphere.

“Our sultan! Our great leader! Our god! We praise you!”

“We praise you!”

The night advanced, equally heating up Lloyd’s unbridled money-spending party.

***

A few days later, there was a fuss at the Ahinsya palace. In particular, the palatial high-ranking official’s heart sank.

“What... is this?”

“It’s the credit history of the Padashar used by the Magentano delegation,” replied the official under him.

The high-ranking official’s eyes shook as he looked at the history. “Tell me, are you sure this is the right one?”

There seemed to be an error in the amount. One or two zeros were mistakenly recorded maybe? The high-ranking official hoped a little. This couldn’t be real. It had been only a few days since he handed over the Padashar after mortifying them.

“They splurged this much money in just a few days? That delegation?

He could not believe it, but the response from a low-ranking official was more unbelievable.

“There is no error in the amount. One more thing... It was not used by the whole delegation.”

“Then?”

“It is used independently by one member of the delegation,” said the official.

“What...?”

Just one? Not many? This amount? The high-ranking official’s mouth hung wide open. In a shaking voice, the subordinate spoke.

“I could not believe it at first when I received the history. So, I checked it over two, three times. And then...”

“And?”

“I found out that a member named Lloyd Frontera used the Padashar in various places. He searched for the best of the best restaurants and ordered food and drinks until they ran out of ingredients.”

“Did he eat and drink everything alone?” asked the superior in shock.

“No, he didn’t drink a sip of alcohol, and he shared food with the other customers.”

“To others?” he asked.

“Yes. It is said that he made people praise the sultan by telling them that the food is being paid for by him.”

“Hahaha...”

“It does not end there. He purchased all the silk in the capital, and we discovered that he bought a merchant ship to send every bit of it to the north sea.”

“Silk? To the north sea?”

“The destination is the Cremo port of the Magentano kingdom,” answered the subordinate.

“...”

“It was presumed that it will pass the Cremo port to be finally sent to the Frontera fiefdom...”

“...”

“Furthermore, an extravagant festival is happening every night,” he went on, “And he is purchasing not only silk but also pottery, jewelry, and other valuable items using the Padashar. And he is shipping them to port Cremo...”

“He is shipping them all?”

“Yes. Thanks to him, the palatial budget for this year is...” mumbled the subject.

“It can’t be.”

“...”

“You are not telling me,” the high-ranking official paused, “that we spent the budget already?”

“I am sorry.”

“...”

What kind of weirdo is he? The face of the high-ranking official turned pale as a sheet, and if the report was true, this was a grave matter. No one in the palace imagined such a thing would happen when he offered the Padashar, the grace of the great and omnipotent sultan, to the Magentano envoys. Why? They were the delegation from Queen Magentano and would not dare fall under the grace of the sultan so thoughtlessly. That would be a great shame for them. The official had had no inkling of doubt about it. That was the normal way to think. It was common sense. The natural order of society.

It was beyond his imagination for a loony in the delegation to abuse the Padashar to his heart’s content and act so absurdly. The official jumped to his feet.

“Stay here for a while.”

“Sir? W-where are you going?”

“I must report the matter to the sultan.”

This matter couldn’t be covered up anyway. It had to be reported before it was too late. Something had to be done before it spiraled out of control. So, the official rushed to the palace of the sultan. And later that afternoon, the sultan sent out an order.

“Bring Lloyd Frontera to the palace.”

And just like that, the meeting with the sultan, which was expected to take at least six months, was shortened to a few days. It was all thanks to Lloyd’s unrestrained use of money.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 186: Covetous Talent (1)

“I, the son of Arcos Frontera, Lloyd Frontera, am honored to be allowed presence with the great and omnipotent sultan.”

The black marble floor. Gold-clad pillars. Unreachable ceiling. Lloyd’s voice rocketed in that expansive space. Lloyd then strode across the sleek marble floor, passed the pillars, and kneeled and bowed his head at the throne elevated by 16 flights of stairs. But Samarkhan Al Ahinsyad didn’t respond to his greeting. He only stared down at Lloyd with a cool and deep gaze.

Is that him?

Sultan Samarkhan’s eyes shook slightly with complication. Lloyd Frontera. He had heard a lot about him. No, the sultan knew who he was. How could he not? The very Monster Domino operation he had instructed eventually led to the birth of the greatest noble in the Magentano kingdom: Lloyd Frontera.

I thought I could turn the eastern border of Magentano into an irreparable wasteland for at least the next couple of decades.

But he failed. Even though the dozens of fiefdoms were swept away, the smallest one endured and survived, fending off every monster that invaded its territory. Not only that, this fiefdom received tens of thousands of refugees who had lost their homes due to the monsters. And backed by the generous assistance of the Magentano kingdom, the fiefdom then rose to become the hub of reconstruction. Sultan Samarkhan was aware of the man behind such success.

This man was at the epicenter of everything.

Lloyd Frontera. It was because of him. He was the one who defended the Monster Domino. He had turned his fiefdom into the hub of reconstruction by showing many amazing tricks. But that wasn’t the end of his show.

He laid a counterattack to my western border.

The sultan frowned. He couldn't forget the report to this day. A portion of the monsters that were pushed to the Magentano kingdom came back this way, and the defense guards on the border received considerable damage. The one responsible for it was this man, Lloyd Frontera.

Occasionally, no, I frequently got curious. Without fail, the many reports I received on this subject intrigued me. I wondered how great this man was. Whether his reputation was exaggerated or not. But as I see him now... He is more brazen than I expected.

Just then, he recalled what had happened earlier in the day. A high-ranking official in charge of the palace scurried into the hall and reported the matter.

How dare he abuse my Padashar and resort to such wasteful extravagance.

The sultan was caught off-guard, too. Could it be that this alien had no sense of shame? Or was he just gutsy? Or was this a blatant act of protest? The Padashar symbolized the holistic favor from the sultan, and initially, it was to be used with care in eternal gratitude to the sultan. Or it was to bring the recipient great humiliation, knowing they were being belittled by their enemy.

What is going on inside that man's head that he dared to act this way? How could he remain calm after being summoned here?

The sultan felt baffled. After observing Lloyd for a while, the sultan finally spoke.

"Lloyd Frontera."

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"Did you enjoy it?" The sultan asked.

"Your Majesty?"

“I am asking whether you enjoyed rashly using the Padashar to your heart’s content.”

“Why, yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd said. “Truly and sincerely, I enjoyed it very much.”

“That much...?”

“Long live the sultan! Long live the sultan!”

“...”

Lloyd practically put his head to the ground and yelled aloud, which made the sultan clamp his mouth shut. The sultan had expected Lloyd to feel at least a little embarrassed. It never occurred to him that Lloyd would be so joyful to be under the grace of the sultan.

“How surprising. Are you not afraid that you will now be doubted by Queen Magentano?” asked the sultan.

“By doubt, may I inquire what you mean, Your Majesty?”

“That you are trying to betray your kingdom by earning my favor. You neither rejected nor were unreserved in receiving a favor from an enemy kingdom. No, you didn’t even hesitate to show your joy and gratitude. Are you not worried?”

“No, Your Majesty. I am not.”

“How?”

“For Queen Magentano has spent more money on me than Your Majesty,” stated Lloyd coolly.

“...”

“It is with regret to inform you that the money you have bestowed on me is far lesser than what I received. However, Your Majesty, do not worry. This humble man is eternally grateful for the grace that was generously bestowed on me."

"Ha! What a brazen-faced fellow you are."

The sultan burst into laughter at the absurdity of his attitude. But strangely, the sultan didn't dislike him very much. The reason was simple. The sultan had lived in the center of the palace, so his whole life was surrounded by cunning and sly people trying to butter him up. Countless groveling officials attempted to please him around the clock to earn his favor and grace. They were like a bunch of power-hungry flies, and those two-faced officials always sucked up to him. But what Lloyd just said was not flattery. The sultan could see that clearly.

He is truly shameless and strange. How dare he utter such words without any ulterior motive in my presence?

The sultan couldn't spot an iota of pretense in Lloyd's words. Everything that the man said came from his genuine heart. That truly amazed the sultan.

"What if I bestow you with more gold and treasure? Are you willing to change the flag you are loyal to?"

Like poking a new toy or mole cricket on the ground, the sultan asked as he twitched his lip. He was excited to hear the other man's answer. Lloyd didn't disappoint him.

"Please forgive this humble man for saying this to Your Majesty, the great and omnipotent sultan, but permit me to inquire whether you wish to have a man who changes his allegiance so easily under your command."

"Ha?"

"I like gold and treasure in all honesty," went on Lloyd, "Rather than like, I love them. Should Your Majesty guarantee endless riches to me, my heart would waver at the offer, to be honest. However, this humble man is aware that changing my allegiance at the drop of a hat will only work to lose Your Majesty's trust."

"Hmm," mused the sultan. "You wish to change your allegiance, but that will only make me lose my trust in you?"

"Yes, Your Majesty. Therefore, the flag of temptation that Your Majesty sways right now will be unattainable in this lifetime."

"Tsk... How cunning you are."

The sultan then chuckled in amusement. Lloyd Frontera. He was truly a talent the sultan desired to keep. This man managed to put a brake on the sultan's plans. That was how capable he was. Plus, he was cherished by Queen Magentano. As such, recruiting him would be helpful in many ways.

But if he changes his allegiance for a couple of gold coins... I would be equally disappointed.

Such a chameleon like that couldn't be used regardless of one's competence. That was why the sultan tested him out, but it looked like the young man already saw through his intentions.

That is why I want him all the more.

The sultan was pleased. He became greedier. But his covet had to end here. Now, it was time to get to the core of why he had called Lloyd here.

"I see, then I have a question to ask you. I presume you wanted to meet me?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"That is why you used the Padashar to your heart's content?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

Lloyd nodded his head. It was true. He had whipped out the Padashar at every store with a plan in mind, and it served a clear purpose. Right now, when the delegation was being ignored so explicitly, Lloyd figured the most efficient way to draw the sultan's attention was this.

That's why I didn't hold back on spending. But it turned out to be much better than I thought. This is why you have to make good friends.

Lloyd recalled the events of a few days ago. Even though he boasted the money to follow his plan, he truly enjoyed doing it. That was his first time spending so much money. Along the way, he learned the important lesson of why people were obsessed with money.

That was the reason why people always said that we've got to make good friends. Like how they said that we must be friends with those who try to buy friendship, that we must keep such people on our side for life.

Such friends were helpful in many ways. If possible, such friendships were to be maintained with great passion and care. Case in point, the sultan in front of Lloyd was that kind of friend. Marking that lesson in his heart, Lloyd carefully spoke.

"Please forgive me for saying this, Your Majesty, my actions were my desperate entreaty for Your Majesty, the great and omnipotent sultan, to sit at the negotiation table with us."

"Me? Negotiate with your delegation?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"How so?"

"For the war will bring misfortune to everyone," said Lloyd, his voice ringing aloud in the air.

The sultan rolled up a corner of his lips. "I do not see it that way."

"Your Majesty?"

"Why would a war bring misery? I just need to win."

“In other words, is Your Majesty confident that victory will be yours once the war breaks out against the Magentano kingdom?”

“It is not that,” replied the sultan, his smile deepening.

“There is no such thing as guaranteed victory in this world. I am not foolish enough to believe that. However, what I am confident is that the war against the Magentano kingdom would never be a loss for my kingdom.”

“Could you mean...”

“What a nice expression you are wearing right now. Have you realized my intentions already?”

“Is your plan to shift the panic inside the kingdom to the outside?” theorized Lloyd.

“I knew it. I have a good eye for people.”

“...”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut. Pushing the internal chaos outside? Overcoming political conflict using a foreign enemy? This was a classic tactic countless rulers had resorted to throughout the earth’s history. Lloyd quickly racked his head.

There must be a conflict in this kingdom. Something chaotic. And he is trying to use war against Magentano to cover it up or solve it. What could that be? Think. Think. Come on brain, you can do it!

Lloyd searched through his memory, trying to remember the stories in the novel. He went through every buried memory of his. And soon, he was hit with something.

Drought.

It must have been around the time Javier was traversing the sultan’s kingdom in the novel. There was an episode about Javier passing a location suffering from a prolonged drought. The resentful local residents vented to Javier that this place had become unlivable due to drought and everyone was about to perish. Yet the sultan cared nothing about it. All he cared for was the riches of Ahinsya, the capital. That was why they planned on revolting. Bring down the sultan, and open a new era. The powerful emirs in the regions resonated with such sentiment.

Eventually, a large-scale revolt broke out. Then it led to a civil war that lasted for several years.

The civil war ended with the sultan getting defeated. And he jumped off from the top of the spire of the Ahinsya palace enclosed in several layers of protestors. That was what was written in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

In other words, the sultan will risk losing his power if he stays put.

Of course, it could be different from the novel. The event's exact timeline and scale could change, just like the Namaran incident. But judging by the sultan's attitude now...

There's a chance for a revolt. That's why he isn't against going to war with the Magentano kingdom. He's trying to use the war to silence the public's complaints and shift their attention elsewhere. And the prolonged drought is the main cause of this unrest.

At last, the puzzles pieced together in his head. Wage a war. Conscript men in the regions. The families and elderly would have no power to raise a revolt. All they could hope for is that their sons, husbands, and fathers in the war would return safely. Moreover, the special circumstance, which arose from the war, helped the sultan for the better.

The people wouldn't be able to express their dissatisfaction, and anybody who grumbled and protested could be framed as traitors and rats who work for the enemy. They'd know that stirring up internal conflict would only make things worse during war times, harming their family members out on the battlefield. Those anxious thoughts and worries would work against their anti-kingdom sentiments.

That's how the sultan will keep tight control over the people. He's trying to forcibly unite everyone.

Lloyd nodded as he imagined the scenario in his head, like what intentions the sultan had and what he was faced with. If that was the case... Lloyd thought he could throw bait to the sultan.

"However," Lloyd said, "I would like to dare say that the drought is not something that can be covered up easily with a war."

"What...?"

Lloyd's words made the sultan's eyebrows twitch. But he had already set how the conversation should take off.

"I ask for your generous forgiveness, Your Majesty, but I cannot bear the thought of Your Majesty in trouble when you have been so kind and generous to this lowly existence."

"I will be in trouble...?" asked the sultan.

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"Explain."

"Your Majesty, consider with your generosity with what I am-"

"Omit the lip service."

Was it because Lloyd was able to pinpoint so easily that the problem was the drought? The sultan maintained a straight face and wasn't smiling at all. But this was not so bad. At last, the negotiation table opened up. Sensing so, Lloyd spoke.

"I will be straightforward as Your Majesty ordered of me. I have heard that the Kandahar region is suffering from a prolonged drought. Am I correct?"

"Yes."

“If I solve the drought that continuously plagues the Kandahar region, will Your Majesty grant my wish and entertain the Magentano delegation?”

“What...?”

The sultan’s beard twitched.

“You can solve the drought?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“You can solve a drought that has even dried up the oasis? You can do that?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“How?”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty, but I cannot answer that until Your Majesty agrees to my terms.”

“How so?” asked the sultan.

Lloyd looked up at last. Attempting to appear extremely polite, wearing the I-don’t-have-a-choice look on his face, making sure that his rich client would not be offended, Lloyd spoke, his voice and eyes wretchedly desperate.

“It is a trade secret.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 187: Covetous Talent (2)

“It is a trade secret.”

“Ha?”

Though Lloyd’s answer was jolly, it was never rude. Though his voice was light, his face was desperate. The same went for his pleading gaze that darted toward the sultan. His eyes were glossy. Just then, the sultan seemed to feel those emotions coming from him.

“I am dying to tell it to you, but spilling out my trade secret here so recklessly is going to make me lose my job and throw me to the streets forever, so please, please, let it slide, oh, my dear heavenly client, with your generosity.”

“Hahahaha!”

The sultan broke into laughter. It was too dumbfounding that the very man he thought was a loony was gazing at him like that. And Lloyd’s reckless answer stood so much contrast with his begging eyes. It was so dumbfounding that the sultan started to feel amazed.

Where did this brazen-faced fellow come from?

The sultan was amazed. This man was competent. He knew he was competent and when to use his skills at the right time. But he never went out of line, depending on his skills. Staying within the line, he freakishly kept just the right amount of impertinence. He knew how to portray himself as bold without getting on the superior’s nerves. That was the impression the sultan received from Lloyd from this encounter and his answers. Avarice swelled over his eyes toward Lloyd.

That makes him more desirable.

Suddenly, the sultan became envious of Queen Magentano for having such a man under her. If only he could, he wanted to steal Lloyd away and put him under his command. The sultan yearned to enjoy the look the queen would make when she realized that her talent was stolen from her.

“Haha, a trade secret! Hahahaha!”

The sultan, who was looking down at Lloyd, smiled and tossed Lloyd a question as though he was watching his grandson dance and play around.

“Do you mean that you will only spill the secret to solve the drought when I agree to your terms?” asked the sultan.

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty, but it is the case, oh, great and omnipotent sultan.”

“Hmm... How impudent and reckless you are. Are you not afraid that my wrath may have you beheaded?”

“I am afraid, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd, “I am afraid well enough.”

“Then how can you dare say those words?”

“It’s because I have no doubts about your grace and mercy, Your Majesty.”

“Haha. Now you are flattering the leader of your enemy.”

“My words are not mere flattery, Your Majesty. They are the truth.”

“How so?” asked the sultan.

“How can it be flattery when I am risking my life?”

Indeed. It was a gamble of its own. Though Lloyd was gambling because he saw a chance of success, he was nonetheless risking himself by having the sultan as his opponent.

The one who loses more by the drought is the sultan, not me.

Sure, the sultan claimed that the war would be the solution because people’s attention would naturally shift and be distracted. But what would the sultan really feel deep down?

He won't be as relaxed as he portrays himself to be.

He had to be racking his brain every night for a solution to solve the drought. Not a band-aid solution like war. A solution that got to the root of the problem. He must have contemplated hard but failed to arrive at one.

That's why he is trying to use war as a distraction for the issue.

This was primarily the reason why Lloyd was convinced that the sultan would react to his suggestion of solving the drought problem. Moreover, Lloyd actually had a solution to the drought.

"Good... I am glad that you regard me in such a manner. I shall then take up your offer."

"That means..."

"Lloyd Frontera, find the solution to the drought, and I will give you what you want," said the sultan solemnly.

"Do you mean the term that Your Majesty will negotiate with the Magentano delegation?"

"Indeed. Although I cannot guarantee a certain outcome."

"This humble man asks no more than that, Your Majesty."

The negotiation was a matter the delegation had to resolve on its own. All Lloyd could do was put everyone at the same table, and he had no plans to do more than that.

"If that's the case, I am sure you can speak now. Your trade secret," urged the sultan.

"Why, yes, Your Majesty."

Lloyd bowed deeply. The sultan just gave the nod to Lloyd. And so, from that moment, the sultan was his client, more valuable and precious than any king in the world. Ready to serve his client, Lloyd spoke.

“I heard that the underground water in the Kandahar region often dries up from any decrease in rainfall due to the lack of oases in the area. Am I correct, Your Majesty?”

“Indeed,” confirmed the sultan. “So, what is your solution to drought?”

“It is Qanat.”

“Qanat?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“I have never heard of it. I need an explanation,” requested the sultan as he stared at Lloyd.

“It is a water supply system used by various ancient desert kingdoms.”

“Ancient desert kingdoms?” The mention of the desert kingdom made the sultan’s brows quirk up.

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd paused before continuing his eloquent explanation. “In the ancient kingdom named ‘Persia,’ this facility was called ‘Qanat.’ And in the nearby regions of Pakistan and Afghanistan, it was called ‘Karez.’ In Morocco, it was called ‘Lettara.’ And in Northern Africa, it was called ‘Foggara.’ The names varied, but it was all the same kind of system.”

It was true. Although Persia didn’t belong to this realm of the world, it was nonetheless a kingdom in the ancient past. And it was also true that Qanat had many names depending on the region. Moreover, it is still being utilized on earth in modern days.

“Thus, the principle is all the same,” Lloyd said as he continued his explanation that was endless as a fountain. “Since deserts are naturally hot and dry, the water running along the earth evaporates before it reaches the villages and cities. As such, the water must flow through a cold underground tunnel to draw it out effectively."

"I believe so. But there must be a limit to using underground water."

"Undoubtedly, Your Majesty."

It really was the case. In fact, the underground water of the desert was barely reliable. It was also the case for the oasis, which many people here regarded as the hope of the desert. Why? Not to mention the small water volume there, it was infected with a host of germs and fatal viruses as it was shared with not only the humans but also the other creatures, including the bacteria. Furthermore, the underground water and oasis tended to have too much sodium, unlike other bodies of water. In short, the water wasn't potable until it was boiled and distilled due to its germs and sodium.

"So," Lloyd said, "the underground waterway of Qanat must never touch the existing underground vein of water. This is to ensure that the clean water of Qanat will not mix with the contaminated and salty underground water."

"The clean water of Qanat..." mused the sultan before speaking."Where do we draw such clean water if not from underground?"

"From the foot of a faraway mountain."

"Foot of a mountain?"

"Yes, Your Majesty." Lloyd nodded his head. "I have heard that a tall mountain range stands on the outskirts of the Kandahar region. And that the foot of the mountain range teems with water melted by the permanent snow at the peak."

"Are you possibly suggesting that you can draw that water through an underground passage to the Kandahar region?"

"That is exactly the case, Your Majesty."

"That is a tremendous distance. Can you do it?"

“It is my job as your humble servant to make that possible,” answered Lloyd confidently.

The sultan frowned as he looked at Lloyd.

“I wonder if that really is possible. The mountain is dozens of miles from here. Moreover, where did you acquire such wisdom? You say Persia of the ancient desert kingdom. However, I have never heard of that name before.” The sultan’s voice was filled with doubt.

“It was a coincidence that I came across a nameless book in an old library, Your Majesty.”

“An old book?” asked the sultan.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm... Is that so? To be frank, I am not sure I could trust your knowledge and source of wisdom. However, I will trust you, given your accomplishments and reputation in the Magentano kingdom. The results of the construction will verify your mastery anyway.”

“Your Majesty, do you mean you will leave the construction to this humble peasant?”

“Yes.” The sultan nodded before speaking on. “Do find the solution to the drought in the Kandahar through the Qanat you mentioned a while ago. Should your construction end in success, I will sit at the negotiation table with the Magentano envoys as I promised.”

The sultan’s declaration was made forth, and Lloyd bowed in sheer gratitude.

“Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty. Pray, may I borrow a paper and pen for just a moment here?”

“A paper and pen?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd

“What use will they serve?”

“To create a construction contract, Your Majesty.”

“A construction contract?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd answered.

The sultan’s furrow deepened. “You dare write a contract? With me?”

“Please forgive me, but yes, Your Majesty.”

“That will be unnecessary,” defied the sultan with a curt reply. “I am aware of the importance of a contract. But it is a meaningless piece of paper to me, regardless of how great it is. Have you forgotten where you are? Have you got no sense of which land you are stepping on?” The sultan continued to speak with gravitas. “This is my palace, and all the land in this desert is in the palm of my hands and belongs to me. Here, one word from my mouth holds more legitimacy than hundreds or thousands of paper contracts.”

“However...”

“Do you mean you dare not trust my promise?” warned the sultan.

“Certainly not, Your Majesty,” Lloyd said, his voice almost pleading.

“Then what is the reason behind your stubbornness?”

“Since I distrust myself, Your Majesty.”

“What...?” The scowl on the sultan’s face relaxed a little. Lloyd continued to speak.

“I ask for your mercy, Your Majesty, for saying this, but how would I dare distrust the great and omnipotent sultan? If it’s coming from Your Majesty’s mouth, I would believe that sand can be turned into gold and sand can be made from boiled water. The question is, does Your Majesty have enough trust in me?”

“What is it that you wish to speak?”

“I wish to say that a contract is mutual, Your Majesty.”

“Mutual, you say.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. Thus, it is important to have a written contract. What if I break the terms made with Your Majesty? What if I trick Your Majesty and half-heartedly construct the Qanat so that it only works for a short time after its completion?”

“Are you implying that you will do a flimsy job?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. I have the capacity to do so.”

“Haha. How daring you are to say that out loud.”

“I am simply speaking of the possibilities, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd bowed his head lower.

“Should I develop any bad intentions, what I said could fully happen. I could cheat and deceive Your Majesty only to fulfill the goal of opening up a negotiation for the envoys. It is true that a part of me is tempted to do so. That is why-”

“Writing the contract will prevent such from happening,” the sultan said as he finished Lloyd’s words.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

That was how crucial contracts were. Lloyd held a plethora of experience working in construction. And so, he recognized this fact from the depths of his soul.

I can’t do anything without a contract. There are countless problems that arise even for constructions with a contract.

It really was the case. Avoiding responsibility for any change in design. Construction halted due to lien conflict. Such issues and conflicts were common in construction sites. That was even when the contracts were signed. And without them? All hell broke loose.

“Therefore, please forgive this humble servant when he says that writing a construction contract is a must. This is not because I cannot trust you but to prove that Your Majesty can be rest assured in leaving the project in my hands,” said Lloyd, carefully choosing his words.

“Hmm.”

Lloyd was still lying flat on his belly, bowing. The sultan wore an incomprehensible expression as he looked at Lloyd’s back.

What a strange man.

This man spoke only the right things, and yet, they didn’t sound annoying in his ears. The sultan faintly could know why.

He is being considerate. He dares to be considerate of me.

This man named Lloyd was nothing but a successor of a county in a foreign land. And yet, he was being considerate toward this very sultan, the ruler of the vast desert. The sultan could feel it from his careful words and actions. Lloyd’s attitude could be likened to a salesman delicately helping out a customer coming to the store for the first time. He was helping out in a way that would not make them uncomfortable and ensure a wise choice. His considerate guidance and assistance were both offensive and commendable to the sultan.

How dare he treat me this way… Should I be angry or grateful? Goodness.

At last, the sultan simply scoffed and granted Lloyd’s request. The two wrote the construction contract and signed it. Once the work was done and Lloyd left, the sultan pondered for a long time. And that night, he called one of his daughters to the palace. He had dozens of daughters from many wives, but this one was his favorite due to her bold character and way with swords.

“You called for me, Father.”

“I did. My dear daughter, Sheherazade. I wish to entrust you with a job. From now on, act as a guard for a man named Lloyd Frontera, who will be dispatched to the Kandahar region. Blend in naturally and accompany him.”

“Simply guard him, Father?” the daughter asked. “Anything else that I must do?”

“Make him yours.”

“Your Majesty...?” For a split second, Sheherazade’s eyes shook.

“Resort to every means possible. You can suppress him with your sword. Or find a fault in him and use it to your advantage. Do anything it takes to make him your man and come back to Ahinsya.”

“Does that mean-”

“Indeed. He shall be my son-in-law.”

This Lloyd person was more desirable than the sultan had expected. Previously, the sultan simply wanted to have Lloyd. It was just vague greed. But today’s encounter changed his heart. Lloyd Frontera. The sultan had a feeling that his kingdom’s future would take on a different path the moment he had Lloyd as his son-in-law.

“We must have him on our side no matter what.”

Sultan Samarkhan recalled Lloyd, and his eyes held a deep glint of greed and longing toward the talent.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 188: A Greedy Man’s Charity (1)

The past few days were a repeat of the same routine for Lloyd. After dinner, he hopped on the camel’s back and was rocked on and on as the animal trudged ahead. The similar desert scenery spanned before him all day. And when the moon went westward to give way to the morning, he got down from the camel, had breakfast half-asleep, and crept into the camp installed under the shade for sleep. And when the night came, he got on the camel’s back again. Just like that, every day was the same, and the pattern only broke a few days later when the regular desert scenery was replaced with a new one.

“We are now in Kandara, the central city of Kandahar.”

“…”

Lloyd’s ears perked up at Sheherazade’s words. She was the female bodyguard the sultan personally assigned to him.

“Have we now arrived at our destination?” asked Lloyd joyfully.

“You could say that,” replied Sheherazade.

“Woah.”

Lloyd drew in a breath. He was finally here. He welcomed the arrival and was happy.

Goodbye to riding on the camel for a while.

All of a sudden, his thoughts flew back to the events a few days ago. It must have been a day after he signed the construction contract with the sultan in Ahinsya. He received the people the sultan sent and hurried to leave for Kandahar. And along the way, he quickly explained the situation to the delegation, who was befuddled as to what was happening. Just like that, Lloyd hurried and left Ahinsya, and the days that followed made Lloyd feel as though he was undergoing an Antarctic expedition.

I did hear that the desert gets cold at night, but I never thought it'd be this bad.

Lloyd shivered. Desert. Camel. Anyone would associate those words with the searing heat. The same thing went on in Lloyd's head when he was to leave for Kandahar and when he left the capital. He expected to traverse through the scorching desert and worried that he had no sunblock with him. But his worry turned out to be unnecessary and foolish. The journey took off in direct contrast to his expectations.

When it was boiling hot outside, we set up a camp under the shade. And when the sun set, we moved through the night.

When the sun was gone from the sky, the temperature in the desert plummeted along with his happiness. It was cold. Terribly cold. How painful the gust of wind was! It was so biting that Lloyd was reminded of the winter training during his military years. He missed the old long padded coats he used to wear in South Korea.

Anyway, goodbye to such a cold for a while since I've safely arrived.

Lloyd never liked cold things to begin with. So, the mere fact that he could avoid being in it gladdened him.

"Then are we staying here for a while?"

Sheherazade nodded her head at Lloyd's question.

"Yes," she answered, "Over here. Allow me to escort you to our quarters"

"Oh, excuse me. Then..."

"Do you have any questions?"

"Even at the lodging, will Miss…" asked Lloyd.

"You can call me Sheherazade."

“Oh, then Miss Sheherazade. Will you be guarding me in the lodging as well?”

“That is right,” she said plainly.

“Ack. Are we using the same room?”

“That is correct, too.”

“...”

“What is wrong?” asked Sheherazade. She was staring at Lloyd hard, and her dark-pearly eyes made him uncomfortable. Lloyd decided to be frank and expressed his sentiments to her as he smiled wryly.

“I feel slightly uncomfortable. In any case, you are a woman.”

“I am all right,” she said.

“I... don’t feel all right.”

His wry smile deepened.

“I wish to be comfortable in my room. I want to change in peace as well and be less self-conscious. But if you stay with me, then-”

“But the great and omnipotent sultan left your safety in my hands,” opposed Sheherazade adamantly.

“Sir Asrahan can protect me very well if you are concerned about my safety,” argued Lloyd as he glanced at Javier.

“...”

Sheherazade’s glance moved toward the silver-hair knight, Javier.

“As I introduced to you on the day of our departure,” Lloyd explained, “he has been protecting me since I was at the fiefdom. He is Sir Javier Asrahan. He may have his share of shortcomings, such as his snobby attitude, inclination to hurt people with his cold words, and a face that's slightly more good-looking than mine, but he nonetheless is a useful guy when it comes to guarding."

"I am aware," replied Sheherazade. "It is an honor to be with the young sword master everyone talks about. But it appears that he is much more handsome than you, not a little."

"Mhm... Okay. Anyway, Sir Asrahan is here," Lloyd said, deciding not to dwell on that.

"So what?" she asked.

"Please leave my protection to Sir Asrahan in my room."

"Are you forcing me to go against the order of the great and omnipotent sultan?" She stared at Lloyd hard as she said those words.

"Uhm, no. That's not it."

Lloyd was flustered. Was it because of Sheherazade's adamant attitude? Surely, it was one reason. But there was a greater factor.

That sultan guy is more shameless than I pegged him to be. Seriously. How can he so boldly send his own daughter as my bodyguard?

Sheherazade. The sultan had told Lloyd that she was an excellent bodyguard. Though a woman, she was an unrivaled sword fighter. So, stay rest assured, the sultan urged Lloyd, adding that her acute sword skills and attention to detail would promise him the best protection. The sultan personally complimented her and assigned her to him. But Lloyd wasn't fooled because he had already read The Knight of Blood and Iron, which detailed that the sultan had a daughter named Sheherazade. Not only that, she was one of the ones that tried to protect the captured tower right before the sultan took his own life. She was also the best female sword fighter in the desert. Thanks to her skills, she had the freedom to leave the palace at a young age compared to the rest of the princesses that had to stay within the palace their whole life. Her skills were honed and mastered under the special permission of the sultan. But according to the novel, no one aside from the sultan and his close cohorts knew that she was his daughter.

That must be why she's using her real name. There's no way for anyone to presume her real identity. More so for me as I'm a foreigner.

Generally speaking, the princesses in the desert were hidden behind a veil. Their faces and names were tightly kept a secret within the walls of the palace.

But too bad. I read the novel. I recognized that she was the sultan's daughter from the moment he introduced her to me.

The sultan who assigned his own daughter to protect him. The daughter who insisted on staying in the same room as him. Lloyd could vaguely make out what was happening.

Oh, again. Again! I can feel it. l can sense what's happening.

Lloyd Frontera! Be my son-in-law! Lloyd seemed to hear the sultan shout that at him. This wasn't something Lloyd experienced for the first time.

This happened in Cremo. "Will you be my son-in-law?" And in Namaran. "Do marry my daughter." I might have heard the same thing if the queen had a daughter. "You. Take my daughter."Woah. And now, the enemy country's sultan is one of my candidates for a father-in-law.

Lloyd couldn't believe it. It looked like the daughters barely had any interest in him. And yet, he was wildly popular with his candidates for father-in-law.

Am I popular among elderly men?

As the epiphany hit him, his eyes started to well up with sad tears. But Lloyd laughed it off with resignation in secret and looked at Sheherazade.

"Yes. I'm asking you to go against his command," said Lloyd.

"..."

“Don’t worry,” Lloyd added. “I can always fabricate that you did protect me when I go back to Ahinsya and tell the sultan. That you stayed by my side night and day.”

“Surely-”

“Please don’t say you can’t,” interrupted Lloyd.

“...”

“I am a mid-level sword expert. In other words, you don’t have to stick your neck out for me.”

“But I am-”

“Yes,” said Lloyd, cutting in again, “You are a high-level sword expert. So, your senses must be extremely heightened. But what to do? I told you. This knight over here is a sword master.”

“...”

“Here’s the thing. Once you prove that you can guard better than a sword master, then you and I can stay in the same room. But if that’s not the case, I want the right to be free in my lodging. And I don’t want to impose on you.”

“Are you serious about that?”

“Yes, every word,” said Lloyd without a hint of concession.

“...”

The dark pearly eyes of Sheherazade shook. Tears? No. They were embers of rage. That pleased Lloyd.

Good. Hate me more.

Sheherazade must hate me, Lloyd told himself. That was the best way to sabotage the sultan’s plan to make Lloyd his son-in-law. Why? Lloyd had no interest in this princess and the sultan in the first place.

All I want is to laze around the rest of my life, enjoying the abundance and ordinariness of life.

Just like that, Lloyd grinned wide, his heart burning with a desire as hot as a cup of black coffee. He fixed his eyes on her, unabashedly receiving her glare. Lloyd shrugged and put an end to the matter.

“Then please take me to my room. Of course, you should look for your own room after.”

The princess wheeled around, saying nothing further, and she walked toward the lodging just like Lloyd asked. There was something rough about her gesture now, but Lloyd didn’t care. Just like that, he was led to his room, and he quickly unpacked his stuff and immediately tried to leave with Javier lest Sheherazade tag along. But he failed.

“Were you planning to leave me behind?” Sheherazade demanded.

“Uh... Um, hahaha.”

Sheherazade was standing in the corridor of his room. Could it be that she saw this coming? It appeared so.

Smiling awkwardly, Lloyd asked, “Have you been waiting here for long?”

“No, not really. I just arrived,” she replied.

“Do you plan on accompanying me from now on?”

“Yes, of course.”

That was exactly the problem, Lloyd thought to himself.

I can’t be bothered.

Lloyd wished to lose her if that was an option. It was particularly so as he had to get cracking with the surveying.

I don’t want to have her glued to me like this. It’s uncomfortable.

It didn’t matter whether she was really trying to protect him or simply using the sultan’s order to get close to him. Either way, she made Lloyd uncomfortable. He didn’t have any plans to be friends with her in the first place. Moreover, her presence would only disturb him when he was surveying the site.

I’m used to Javier because he’s been with me for a long time. He makes sure that he doesn’t stand in my way when he senses that I’m surveying the area after meticulously sensing my gaze.

But Sheherazade was inexperienced. She would barely know what surveying would be like. So, it was better for him to expect nothing from her.

That’s not happening.

Lloyd yearned to quickly finish the construction so that the negotiation would happen between the sultan and the envoys. That way, he could return to the Frontera fiefdom, the place where the second chapter of life would truly begin.

So, I have to construct Qanat quickly. Surveying? I have to finish it up, pronto.

But what would happen if someone hovered around him and bothered his work? It would cause a delay, His return to the Frontera fiefdom and life of prosperity would be equally delayed.

Never. I refuse.

Lloyd shook his head in his heart and put his brain to work. What would be the best excuse to leave her here? Order Javier to knock her out? Lock her up?

No. No, that’s too harsh. What if she tells her father? Son-in-law and construction whatnot, he might kill me without a second thought.

Lloyd shivered as his shoulders felt cold. At last, he came up with a brilliant idea.

“Miss Sheherazade, may we have a word?” suggested Lloyd.

“What about?”

“Something that must be discussed indoors. Would you mind coming in for a minute?”

Lloyd grinned as he led her inside her room. Curiosity appeared in her eyes because she remembered how he loathed being in the same room with her. But now, he suggested that she enter as there was something to discuss.

“...”

She entered, and along the way, she saw. She saw Lloyd hinting at Javier with his gaze to stay outside and wait.

Hmm...

As she was led inside the room and sat on the sofa at Lloyd’s urge, she furrowed a little. Just then, the sultan’s order hit her. He had wanted to have this man as his son-in-law. So, she was to resort to any means possible to make him hers. Even foul play was allowed.

“...”

The opportunity to make it happen came earlier than expected. This was the moment to have a private conversation without interruption or disruption. Sensing it in her bones, Sheherazade resolved to her that the chance to prove to his father was now here. And now, she could make up for the resentment of not being born as a prince.

Only if I could make that man mine.

She would accept any friendly conversations. Thinking so, she looked at Lloyd, her gaze and expression ready to respond to him amiably, to break the ice, and to earn his favor. She was all set. Just then...

"For concrete, we will use high-strength concrete with high compressive strength to improve adhesion with PSC materials and reduce cross-sectional dimensions, and to this end, do preferably reduce the water-cement ratio (W/C) and improve workability."

Eh...?

Lloyd spoke, but what came out of his mouth was some unexpected, incomprehensible gibberish in her ears.

What is this... She wanted to ask. What are you doing?! But she couldn’t.

"Maximum dimensions of the thick aggregate used during the production of PSCs will be determined by the tight concrete filling around PS steel, sheath, rebars, etc., and should average around 20 mm or 25 mm."

“...”

Dazed. Sheherazade suddenly felt blank, light. She was definitely listening to his words, but strangely, her eyes felt heavy.

It’s strange.

Could it be because she lacked sleep? She had been struggling with severe insomnia since becoming a high-level sword expert. Her senses grew too sensitive toward all the sounds around her. She had endured solely with her willpower. Could it be the reason why? Could it be that she forgot what it felt like to have a good night's sleep? Could it be why this unexpected drowsiness felt so welcoming?

I shouldn’t... fall asleep now...

Her body felt light. And her ears continued to enjoy the strange spell, which sounded like music from heaven.

“It is recommended that the compressive strength of concrete when pre-stress is introduced into the secondary material is 350 kgf/cm squared or higher in pretension and 300 kgf/cm squared in port tension. In both ways... What the... Must be at least 1.7 times the maximum introduction stress...

Blah blah blah The compressive strength on the 28th... Yada yada yada... It must be 350 kgf/cm squared in the pre-tensioning member... Blah blah...” And with that, she passed out. She was now soundly sleeping after being unable to fight against sleep no more. A smile of satisfaction appeared on Lloyd’s mouth.

Operation Lose the Princess? Success! Hope you have a long, sweet dream. I’ll come back soon!

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 189: A Greedy Man’s Charity (2)

“Have you succeeded?”

“Hm? Yeah,” said Lloyd, realizing what Javier meant.

“Is she sound asleep?”

“Pretty much.”

“Are you happy?”

“Very much.” Lloyd scoffed.

Quietly shutting the door behind him, Lloyd winked at Javier. The operation was a success. Sheherazade. The daughter of the sultan and an excellent swordswoman. The novel described her as a high-level sword expert. And that was accurate based on the signs Lloyd had observed throughout their journey to Kandara. She couldn’t get any sleep. Tossing and turning with every minute, even the softest blow of the wind made her ears twitch. Seeing that every day, Lloyd was certain.

She’s experiencing sword master syndrome.

Lloyd was certain. She was acting much like the first time Lloyd saw Javier. The syndrome referred to when someone’s senses grew extremely sensitive as they became a high-level sword master. However, since they weren’t a sword master yet, they became tortured by the lack of control they had over their senses. That was what the sword master syndrome was, and Sheherazade was going through exactly that.

I never saw her sleeping for more than ten minutes since we left Ahinsya.

As such, her eyes were slightly bloodshot at all times. They reminded Lloyd of when he gave up sleeping under the crushing burden of his construction job and school work in South Korea. So, he resorted to his ultimate game plan, the lullaby. The result was highly satisfactory.

“She’s sound asleep,” Lloyd said, “It should be her first time falling asleep like this. It’ll probably be tomorrow until she wakes up as she catches up on all the sleep she missed. Much like you used to.”

Lloyd spoke, then flashed an evil smile, looking back to the first time he put Javier to sleep. Could it be that Javier thought the same thing?

“Is that so?” asked Javier. But his face was sterner than before.

“Yeah, uh-huh.”

“So, are you happy?” asked Javier again.

“Hmm?”

“Never mind. If you got what you want, let us proceed,” dismissed Javier. With that, he wheeled around coldly and walked ahead along the corridor that led outside. But something about his back seemed strange. His gait was slightly faster than usual, and there was a roughness in his movement, though menial. The others wouldn’t have noticed it, but Lloyd, who almost always stuck to Javier all day, was able to catch the slight difference right away.

Hmm? Could he be...

Lloyd could sense it. Then he grinned. With a naughty smile on his face, he strode ahead and got closer to Javier, who was marching across the corridor.

“Hey, tell me. Are you sulking by any chance?” asked Lloyd.

“I am not sure what you mean,” denied Javier.

“I think you’re sulking. Right? You are upset about something, aren’t you?”

“No,” Javier denied once again. “I have no complaints of any sort.”

“Then why are you acting like that?”

“How am I acting?”

“You are obviously behaving like you are sulking.”

“What an unpleasant... speculation,” defied Javier.

“More like an accurate speculation,” quipped Lloyd.

“It is the wrong one.”

“Is it?”

Lloyd then grinned and glued to Javier as they stepped out of the building. He then stared hard at Javier with a meaningful side glance.

“It’s because of the lullaby, isn’t it?” postulated Lloyd.

“...”

Javier stopped dead and turned to Lloyd. Could it be that Lloyd hit home? Javier finally spoke up.

“The lullaby service. I did not know it was given free of charge.”

“Hmm?”

“I had to teach you the Asrahan Core Technique to hear your lullaby.”

“Aha.” Lloyd’s smile deepened. “And that is why you’re upset?”

“I am not upset as I told you before.”

“But,” pointed out Lloyd, “the Asrahan Core Technique was the result of a collaborative effort between you and I. Weren’t you struggling by yourself because you missed the most vital aspect of the skill?” asked Lloyd.

“But-”

“Don’t worry,” interrupted Lloyd. “It’s not free. Do you peg me as someone who bestows kindness to people for free?”

“No, never.”

“Right?”

“Yes,” agreed Javier, “For Master Lloyd is a petty cheat who likes to hold long grudges against people and cannot even fathom doing good and philanthropic deeds.”

“You know, you strangely become very detailed in moments like these,” said Lloyd.

“I was simply stating the truth here.”

“Hmm, hmm. Anyway, my lullaby service is not free. You can stay rest assured. I’m going to make sure that she pays for my lullaby service.”

“Is that so?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, yes.”

“I knew it,” scoffed Javier.

“...”

Why is he scoffing? And what’s that shrug in relief? Lloyd flashed a wry smile. Whatever the case was, the sultan’s daughter was now gone, and it was time to do business.

“Do you plan on looking around the construction area right away?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, since I should get a feel for the atmosphere before anything,” answered Lloyd.

“By that, you mean-”

“I need to see what it’s like here.”

Lloyd strode dutifully as he answered Javier's question, heading to the city district quite distant from his lodging. The scenery of the deserted small city spanned in front of him. Under the sweltering sun of the desert, the sandy wind blew restlessly. Lloyd then spotted a line of people in the windy plaza. They were those who had lined up to receive the ration Lloyd carried from Ahinsya.

"They must have been hungry."

Javier spoke as he frowned. Indeed, everyone didn't look good. Most of them were scrawny, and their skins were dry and rough.

"After all, they had to endure a prolonged drought," replied Lloyd with astonishment in his voice. "Lack of water. Lack of crops. This place is lucky because it's fertile, at least. Otherwise, everyone would have starved to death already."

It was true. Lloyd was hit with the story in the novel. The city of Kandara was one of the places Javier passed through. And almost all its people perished after several years of drought until the city disappeared at last.

But the sultan does nothing about it. He didn't even give out relief supplies. Worse, he forbade people from moving elsewhere to contain the public rage until everyone died trapped there.

And that became the seed of revolt. The resentment and rage against the sultan and the flame of hatred burned to the sky until the people succeeded in bringing down the sultan from his throne. In short, this city represented the trigger of revolt and civil war in the novel.

"Anyway, thank goodness that we had the Padashar from the sultan," remarked Lloyd. "Did you know that, technically, the food was gifted to us by the great and omnipotent sultan?"

"Wait, are you taking credit when it was the sultan that spent the money?" accused Javier with a gaze.

"Well, yeah, you're right," admitted Lloyd.

Lloyd then shrugged as he wistfully looked at the people receiving the food from the delegation.

“You know, it doesn’t look like they’re so happy to see us even though we brought them food.”

“Yes, it appears so.”

The thing was, people were throwing glances from time to time at the delegation and Lloyd and Javier. But they weren’t so nice. They were full of alarm. Some didn’t even hide their cynical and subtle hostility toward them. But Lloyd wasn’t offended by their behavior. He knew why they were acting like that.

It’s because I’m here under the sultan’s order.

Lloyd signed the contract with the sultan to construct something here. He came to this place at the sultan’s command with the sultan’s guards and people. The whole delegation was flashy, to say the least. As such, it was only obvious how he would be viewed by the residents here.

The sultan’s stool pigeon. Spiteful informant. We’re nothing more than that in their eyes.

The bitter smile on Lloyd’s face deepened. This place was suffering from several years of drought, but Ahinsya stood in stark contrast with Kandara due to its prosperity. Ahinsya enjoyed perpetual abundance. Drought was irrelevant there. This reason was simple. The sultan was in Ahinsya.

The sultan spends an exorbitant amount of money all the time. He hires magicians and buys thousands of carriages and ships with his enormous capital to transfer water to Ahinsya through various channels.

And so, Ahinsya never ran out of water. But what happened to the regions that didn’t receive the grace of the sultan? They had to go through all sorts of hardships when the drought struck. The land dried and cracked, and the crops desiccated. But no one could leave this cruel, arid land and dream of moving into the prosperous Ahinsya due to their prosperity.

This sultan kingdom strictly classifies people through their class. People are classified by region. Those living in Ahinsya are the top brass of the kingdom. And those that come next are the ones living around the capital. The lowest in the pyramid system are the ones living in the provinces.

The closer they lived to Ahinsya, the higher their status was. What about those in the lower class? They were permitted to reside in regions that suited their social class. In short, anybody who was born in the lower brass of society could never set foot in Ahinsya ever.

It's dirty. Unfair. And it's not like one can climb the social ladder so easily. The chances of winning the lottery are higher.

In other words, those in the lower class of the sultan kingdom suffered through the drought for their entire lives.

That's why several regions in the kingdom are antagonistic.

The thing is, if everybody's stomach was satisfied, none of this class system would have mattered. That was the case for the past 200 years. But as the drought frequently plagued the regions in recent years, everyone started to flip their lids. The atmosphere was the same in the Kandahar region and Kandara, the central city of the region. The sultan was already their enemy. It was just that they didn't have the power to voice out themselves. As such, Lloyd and the others wouldn't be welcomed as they came under the order of the sultan, even if he showered them with food.

Duh. People here are not foolish. What good does an occasional supply of food do to them when the sultan forever locks them up in agony? They'll never be grateful for the sultan. Instead, they probably feel like they're being managed like livestock. I mean, I'd feel the same way.

As his thinking developed that way, Lloyd was able to understand their antagonistic gaze well enough. But at the same time, he couldn't help but feel frustrated.

"Haa. I still need their cooperation."

“What?”

Lloyd was talking to himself, speaking his thoughts aloud. But it looked like Javier heard it. He cocked his head in confusion. Lloyd scoffed before shrugging and speaking.

“No, never mind. I think I understand what’s going on. Let’s get moving.”

Lloyd then guided Javier into an unpopulated area, and he brought Ggoming out.

“Ggoming,” called Lloyd.

“Ggoming!”

“I think you need to carry us and move around. We’ll be heavy, but can you do it?”

“Ggomiming!”

“Yes, thank you.”

Ggoming nodded as though it was A-OK. Lloyd stroked his round head and asked the others in his embrace.

“Are you guys feeling hot down there?”

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“Hamang!”

“Not bored or hungry?”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha!”

The fantastical creatures heartily answered that they were okay. Lloyd was grateful and proud of them.

“Yes, good. Then let’s get started.”

Lloyd fed the red sunflower seed to Ggoming and carried him and Javier on his back. Ggoming flew up as he spread out his wings.

“To the west!”

“Ggoming!”

In no time, they were high up in the air and outside Kandara. Ggoming flew in the direction of the west, passing countless dunes under him. Lloyd activated his surveying skill, Subterranean Scanning.

Let’s see.

His gaze swept over the underground, 16 feet deep. It scanned thoroughly lest he missed an area. But nothing he wanted could be spotted.

“It’s not here. Could it be somewhere deeper than 16 feet?”

“What...?”

“No, never mind.”

“...”

Nothing? Javier asked himself. Then why was Master Lloyd looking dismayed? Javier was curious as he stayed on Ggoming’s back.

He must be looking around the areas where the construction will take place. Surveying. Did he call it? But Master Lloyd is slightly different from his usual self.

This time, there was a slight difference in the manner Master Lloyd surveyed the ground. It looked like he had a specific target he wanted to uncover but couldn’t.

What could he be looking for?

Javier was curious, but before his curiosity could be resolved, the scenery under him changed. Ggoming, who faithfully flew toward the west, was no longer flying over the desert. Intermittent patches of grass appeared in their view until the foot of a mountain appeared. Then the streams of water flowing down from the mountain came into view.

“Higher,” Lloyd said calmly.

“Ggoming!”

Ggoming fluttered his wings, taking them higher to the foot of the mountain. The wind gradually turned chiller, colder. At last, a white permanent snow line spanned below them. Lloyd asked Ggoming to land on the field of snow. And he looked around.

“Hmm... Good. No contaminants. No bacteria. Just the right amount of sodium. Just perfect.”

Satisfaction appeared in Lloyd’s eyes. This was the place where the water that would be used for the Qanat was produced. The permanent snow line would melt to form a waterway that would flow along the foot of the mountain. Then he could construct the intake station along the waterway, and the water gathered that way would be transferred via the underground channel.

“So, Hamang,” called Lloyd.

“Hamang!”

“Time to work today.”

“Hamamang!”

Lloyd brought Hamang out of his pocket. And pointing at the snow field, he gently asked, “Tell me, do you like ice snacks?”

“Hamang!”

“So, anything with water is good for you, yeah? Then what about that?”

“Hamamang!”

Hamang nodded his head, saying that it went without saying that he liked it. A content smile appeared on Lloyd’s mouth.

“All right. I want you to put as much as you can of that in your mouth and turn it all into water. Do you remember the Kandara city we just visited? The people there are very thirsty,” explained Lloyd.

“Hamang!”

From then on, Hamang darted in the direction of the snowfield as though he was back home. Then he took a bite of the white snow, swallowed it, and the snow melted to fill his stomach. Hamang became happier with it.

“Hamamang! Hamang! Hamamamang!”

He continued to devour the snow, and his stomach swayed up and down, inflating his size in no time. Soon, he grew to become 229 feet in diameter.

“Are you happy now that your stomach is all full?” asked Lloyd.

“Humu-mung! Humung!”

Hamang responded, saying that he couldn’t be any happier. A smile appeared on Lloyd’s face as well.

“Great. Then let’s go back.”

“Humung!”

Everyone flew up again toward the east on Ggoming’s back. Hamang, on the other hand, rolled and rolled, coming down the foot of the mountain and traversing the desert. And when they were finally back in Kandara, it was already deep into the night.

“What now, Master Lloyd?” asked Javier. “You seemed to have instructed Sir Hamang to carry the water and give it to the people.”

“You’re right,” Lloyd agreed, “I came to give it to them.”

“Then do you plan on waiting until morning arrives?”

“Hm? Why?”

“Because everyone should be sleeping now-”

“That’s why we must wake them up.”

“Excuse me?”

Javier thought he heard him wrong. Lloyd smiled.

“You saw when we got to the foot of the mountain where the intake station will be constructed, right? How distant it is from here.”

“Yes.”

“It was almost 25 miles away.”

“Indeed.”

“So...” Lloyd paused before continuing. “The distance is too far, so we can’t do this job on our own. People here must help us. So we’ve got to wake them all up and give water,” he said matter-of-factly.

“But,” protested Javier, “an act of generosity and charity must be-”

“Must be done so openly and obviously. Yes, yes, of course.” Lloyd then put on an evil and rewarding smile before he finally said, “That’s how we can earn brownie points from them, right?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 190: A Greedy Man’s Charity (3)

“That’s how we can earn brownie points from them, right?”

Lloyd’s smile looked evil and happy. Sly and proud. So, Javier thought to himself...

This man is serious.

Lloyd Frontera. The young master he served. The former hooligan, the dreadfully hateful figure. How in the world did he come up with these ideas? How in the world did he behave like this without a second of hesitation? Javier was genuinely curious. Entranced by the existence of human beings, he lifted his head and stared at everyone gathered in the plaza in the middle of the night. They were the people of Kandara.

“Okay! Line up! Line up here! Don’t forget to bring a bucket or basin with you!”

A long line of people extended in front of Lloyd, and he loudly yelled at them, leading the groggy, half-asleep, and yawning individuals into a line. He quickly guided those glancing around in wonder. Afterward, Lloyd distributed water in the order they were in.

“So, Hamang,” called Lloyd.

“Humung!” said Hamang, keeping his mouth tight shut lest water spilled out of it.

“You know what to do, right? Spit out a little at a time so it doesn’t overflow.”

“Humu-mung! The 36-foot giant water balloon, no, Hamang responded and obeyed Lloyd’s instruction.

“One bucket!”

“Humung!”

Splash! Hamang spat water out through the straw in his mouth. The water came from melting the permanent snow at the peak of a mountain range dozens of miles away. The top-quality, pure, and pristine water started filling the bucket in no time. Lloyd’s white teeth were exposed as he grinned wide.

“Now, may you have a mighty day with this!” encouraged Lloyd.

“Oh? Okay...”

A citizen wearing a confused look walked off, lugging the bucket away. But he continued to look back as if he couldn’t shake off the dismay in him. He gave a look at Lloyd, who was smiling nonchalantly. And then, he looked at Hamang, who was as big as a mountain. He finally stared at the clean water splashing in his bucket. What kind of luck is this? The man wondered as he cocked his head. Carrying the water that would last more than a day, he trudged back home. Most of the citizens had a similar reaction. Meanwhile, a big and prideful smile appeared on Lloyd’s mouth.

Good. This is really good. This is how we do charity. By making it completely public!

It was really the case. He needed to make it blatant. Doing the opposite would only bring trouble.

Anonymous charity? Then people really won’t know of it.

One can volunteer his butt off, sure. But what’s the point if nobody knows it? There’s no reward if no one knows of one’s good works. That was something Lloyd desperately wanted to avoid.

After all, I’m no hero.

There were many respectable, great men and women in this world, particularly those who did good deeds behind everyone’s back. They didn’t receive any rewards or anything similar. They were willing to work and suffer without any recognition. Making someone happy through their act of goodness. That alone was the goal of their sincere charity, and those types of people were thick on the ground in the world. However, Lloyd? He was different.

I'm not that kind of a person. I'm just not cut out for it.

He was different. He wasn't that amazing and didn't dare wish for it. Moreover, unlike such women and men of exemplary character, Lloyd clearly wanted something in return. In other words, his kindness came with strings attached.

I'm doing all of this hoping I'd get something. Like, for example, the people's cooperation.

Lloyd looked at the people receiving the water, and he could see that they were swelled with surprise and dismay. Even still, their gaze remained cold. There remained the same sense of alarm. A doubt of sorts that ascertained this man wanted something in return. Such a distrustful sentiment seemed to linger in their gaze. And so...

I have to change that perception. Break down their walls and make them like me. That's the core of the construction project.

Qanat. The facility he had boasted to the sultan to build. But the process to create one was not simple.

The distance is too far.

Lloyd made a recollection of the mountain range he had gone to in the afternoon. The distance reached over 22 miles. That distance in South Korea was equivalent to the travel between Seoul Station and Munsan county in Paju city. From the center of Seoul to the areas near the Military Demarcation Line. Make that horizontal, and the 22 miles would cover the far corner of Gangdong-gu to the Gangseo-gu beyond the Gimpo international airport. Southward, one can reach Suwon from Seoul station. In short, it was a tremendous distance.

That's why I can't just go and start constructing. That would take me more than a year to finish everything.

And even that was only if Bangul, the high-functioning excavating machine, and Javier were utilized for the project. But it was not what Lloyd wanted.

Nope. Nuh-uh. That can't happen. I'm not going to rot here for an entire year! Not a chance.

What was more, this place wasn't his fiefdom. Building up someone else's neighborhood to open up a negotiation with the sultan wasn't enough of a reward for Lloyd to waste a year of his precious life here.

The novel said that there are many caves here and there beneath.

Lloyd recalled the story in the novel. It mentioned that the Kandahar region held caves under the ground woven so intricately. It wasn't a natural one. About 1,000 years ago, the monks who came to hide in this region away from religious oppression dug the caves, their work lasting more than 100 years. And so, three generations of monks lived as recluses, shunned away from the sun.

So, the caves are said to have remained to this day. Thanks to that, the protesters against the sultan used it as their hideout.

Lloyd planned on using the caves because it would be much more convenient for him to connect the existing caves than to dig fresh ones in the ground.

I won't be able to connect them in a straight line. But finding the most efficient route will be enough. A route that ensures the shortest travel time even if the caves are divided into dozens of independent paths. A route that ensures the least excavation distance and that will direct the water without any spillages or leaks.

Lloyd just had to find them. Only after then could he start surveying and designing. Moreover, there was one more advantage to utilizing the existing cave beside the reduced construction period and effort.

Since the caves are dug underground, they are naturally waterproof. In other words, it's set up so the water won't leak into the ground.

The crux of the Qanat project was making sure that the underground water did not seep into the earth. That way, the water drawn from the mountain range would not be contaminated. So, using the cave that was already waterproof would give him one less issue to think about. And the work and time necessary for the construction would be reduced just as much.

That's why I kept observing the ground as I surveyed. But...

Lloyd couldn't find anything. He used his Subterranean Scanning option until his eyes grew bloodshot but failed. What it meant was clear.

It means that the caves the monks dug are located much lower than 16 feet underground.

His Subterranean Scanning skill came with a limit. He could only look up to 16 feet underground. Any further down was impossible.

And it's not like I can dig all day looking for it.

That was too inefficient. It was so even if there were multiple caves. And even if he came across one cave out of luck, he would have to search for dozens more scattered throughout the ground.

I might as well spend a year making a new cave than resort to that.

It was too inefficient. And it wasn't something he wanted for himself either.

So, I'm only left with this option.

Lloyd made a decision. The residents had to lower their guards. He had to be favored and earn their trust. Since these people were the locals of this city and since some among them were already planning a coup, Lloyd could inquire about the locations of the caves all spread out in various places as long as he could earn their trust. With such a goal in mind, Lloyd knuckled down loudly advertising his kind acts. Once the water distribution was finished, Lloyd called for Ppodong.

“Okay, from here to here. Dig it for me,” Lloyd instructed.

“Ppodong!”

Swish! Swish! Swish! Ppodong dug a square in the ground and thoroughly laid down the flat stones like tiles. Then Lloyd poured the rest of the water there.

“Hamang? You know what to do.”

“Humu-mung!” Blergh! Hamang spat out the rest of the water, and it soon filled up the hole Ppodong and Lloyd worked on a moment ago. It was a temporary water storage reservoir.

“Okay, time to build the awning so the water doesn’t evaporate in the afternoon.”

Lloyd put up the pillars around the station and covered them with a large cloth, constructing a temporary awning that would shun the water from the scorching sun.

“Whew.”

Once it was over, the morning sun was rising. But Lloyd didn’t stop there.

“What is that?”

“A sign.”

Lloyd grinned at Javier’s question and stuck the sign in front of the reservoir. The following words were written on the sign.

[This temporary storage reservoir has been constructed by Lloyd Frontera for the people of the city of Kandara. The water is to be used by anyone for free. Moving forward, more water will be drawn every night and stored in here.]

“...”

Javier’s eyes continued to move as he read the writing. Then he noticed additional sentences that were written in smaller fonts.

[Lloyd Frontera treads the path of suffering and tribulation to the distant mountain range for clean water, skipping sleep every night. Only for the people of Kandara! His feet are swollen! His body is fatigued! Fever and chills assail him! The burden placed on him may try to knock him cold, but he doesn't want a thing in return. He does this solely with your happiness and well-being in mind. With an angelic heart, Lloyd Frontera takes another step to bring water to you all today.]

“...”

Angelic heart? He is fatigued? Javier stared hard at Lloyd, who scoffed visibly.

“What? Why? What?”

“...”

“Why are you squinting your eyes like that?” Lloyd demanded to know.

“I think you are too shameless, Master Lloyd.”

“Me? Shameless?”

“Yes.”

“How?” huffed Lloyd.

“In all honesty, Master Lloyd, weren’t you able to draw the water without lifting a finger?”

“What are you saying?”

“The truth. Sir Hamang enthusiastically drank up the water and rolled over here.”

“...”

“Whereas you, Master Lloyd, comfortably sat on Sir Ggoming’s back while he flew around.”

“Ahem...! Hmm! Hmm! That’s what marketing is,” said Lloyd, forcing his voice.

“Marketing?”

“Indeed. That’s exactly right.”

Lloyd flashed a smile that was likened to the one unconscientious employers usually wear.

“A marketing to draw a beautiful result. It’s like a wrapper. Do you think people care about the truth? Never. They only care about the clean water they can enjoy. Who do you think is concerned with where I got the water and how?”

“You mean,” said Javier, “to say that you are willing to exaggerate and lie to draw the result of your desire.”

“But it’s not like I’m cheating anyone in the distribution process, right?”

It was true. The water was pristine. He just slightly exaggerated the process of drawing that very water. Nothing more. The water was the cleanest, finest water melted from the permanent snow line in the mountain peak. It would become a precious source of life for everyone suffering from the drought.

“You know it, too, right? There are many shameless employers who mess with their workers’ livelihoods. Compared to them, I’m an angel. I didn’t lie about where the water came from. I didn’t add any extra ingredients. Moreover, it’s free. Ha! It’ll be hard to find anyone as generous as me out there. Don’t you think so?” insisted Lloyd.

“...”

Javier clamped his mouth shut. What Lloyd was saying was all true and correct, but since they were coming out of Lloyd's mouth, Javier hated him more for it. Just like that, Lloyd planted the sign full of exaggeration and lies in front of the storage reservoir. But he didn't stop there.

"All right, let's go."

"What?"

"Don't cock your head. It's time to advertise," said Lloyd.

"..."

Advertise? What? Javier followed Lloyd with a dazed feeling, and the sunny morning street welcomed them. From then on, Javier was able to see Lloyd's true colors.

"My! Hello, sir! How are you?" suddenly greeted Lloyd as he stopped in front of an elderly man.

"Huh? Excuse me?"

"Do you not remember who I am?" Lloyd asked, plastering a big smile on his face and ignoring the confused look of the man, who was just walking down the street.

Evidently flustered, the man replied, "You are, of course-"

"My name is Lloyd Frontera. Do you remember me, sir? Did you not see me yesterday morning?" imposed Lloyd.

"Th-that's-"

"Yes, yes," said Lloyd jovially. "I remember you as well, of course. You were the 23rd person to receive water from me. Let's see, aha! I am right. Night or morning, you look dashing, sir. Tell me, how was the water you received? Did you like it?"

"Uh, yes, of course-"

“Oh, you did!” exclaimed Lloyd, cutting in. “That is a relief! Thank you!”

“Wait, I...”

“The water wasn’t too cold or hot?”

“Of course-”

“Thankfully, the temperature seems to have been perfect as well. My, my, what a relief. Thank you!”

After handshaking the elderly man with both hands, Lloyd bowed like a well-oiled hinge and a smooth folder phone. His torso was curved at an acute angle. Just like that, he greeted the nameless elderly folks one by one while relentlessly stressing the good deeds he did the previous night.

“Have a nice day, sir!”

“O-okay...”

One of the dismayed and troubled elderly men hurried off, but Lloyd didn’t care. He was still unabashed.

I have to be more shameless.

It was all or nothing. He had to definitively show that he was on their side. And so, Lloyd became the friendliest guy in town, much like politicians campaigning before an election. Of course, his good deeds continued. He drew water from the mountain range every night, filling up the temporary water reservoir. In the afternoon, he promoted his kind work as he greeted people around. And when his sacrificial campaigning reached the 15th day, at last, there came the first sign of change in the villagers’ attitudes toward Lloyd.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 191: Between Kidnapping and Fishing (1)

"If a vehicle near the top of the retaining wall has an equal distribution load like a building, these loads increase earth’s pressure on the retaining wall. Fixed loads such as buildings convert the weight of the building into the weight of the backfill soil of the retaining wall. And it calculates the earth’s pressure by seeing that there is more soil.”

“H-hold on...”

The sun had fallen, and it was early at night. In a lodging in Kandara, a calm voice echoed under the flickering candlelight. The voice was serious. Consistent. Monotonous. Without a single emotion. There was only an enumeration of knowledge. As the calm and merciless lullaby struck the air, a lady pleaded. Please make it stop. I’m going to collapse. My eyes will close in despair and open up tomorrow morning. But the man who was singing the lullaby was absolutely void of any mercy, tolerance, or kindness in his voice.

"The influence of roads or railways installed near the top of the retaining wall cannot be accurately converted to static loads because they cause a dynamic reaction due to repeated loads. However, in the case of roads, it is common to design with the view that the equal distribution load acts as 1 ton f/m squared for DB-24 and DB-18 loads and 0.7 ton f/m squared for DB-13.5 loads.”

Snore... The resisting lady, Sheherazade, fell asleep. The merciless man, Lloyd, smiled.

“Good.”

The perfect way to put a patient with sword master syndrome to sleep was with a lullaby. Since they had severe insomnia and were constantly sleep-deprived, the lullaby worked like a charm. What was better was that he didn’t have to worry about them developing resistance or side effects.

Rather, it becomes a habit.

What happens when a sleep-deprived individual gets a good night's sleep with one lullaby and the taste of a sweet dream? That experience leaves a powerful mark on the body that it keeps wanting more. Their body yearns more. Sing a lullaby for me! It’s the only thing that can make me get a good night's sleep! Literally speaking, the body yearns for it more than the mind.

And that was proven by Javier even today. Bwhahaha.

Javier was already a sword master, and he could control his senses. But he was somewhat reliant on lullabies to this day.

So that daughter of the sultan won’t be much different.

There was no way that she could resist when Javier couldn’t. She’d flake out until tomorrow morning. Confident of it, Lloyd quietly stepped out of her room and returned to his room with light steps.

“Javier? Have you been waiting for a long time?”

But no response. For some reason, the room was empty. Lloyd shrugged.

“Tsk. Is he out for a walk? He won’t have a chance to sleep if not now.”

Too bad. Javier wouldn’t be able to sleep tonight. Lloyd didn’t intend to wait for Javier to return. He was planning to head to bed right now.

“Whew. I’ve got to get to bed now.”

Lloyd removed his boots and jumped onto the bed. He should try to get some sleep now. That was as he had to wake up at midnight, ride Ggoming, and take Hamang to the western mountain range to draw water. Falling asleep now assured him about three or four hours of rest. As he thought so, just then, the events that happened in the past few days crossed his head. How the residents cast a doubtful and cold glance at Lloyd. How they seemed to accuse him of being the sultan’s stool pigeon and cunning informant. How resentful their gaze was! Lloyd acted more thick-skinned despite everything. He headed to the west to draw water every day. He then shared it with the resentful villagers, loudly showing that he was sacrificing himself for them.

I'm going to do it tomorrow too. I'll gather everyone around in the morning and distribute water. How many days has it been? 15? It's about time that people start to look at me differently. There have to be some signs now. Maybe I'll see some today?

Lloyd wouldn't know except the fact that what he was doing now was likened to fishing. He simply cast a fishing pole down the water, and it was up to the fish to bite down on the bait. He could only wait for any movements to occur while gazing at the calm water after throwing a juicy bait. So, he had...

Whew...

His vision started to grow dark. His feelings grew dazed. As if he was floating high or sinking into the bed, sleep charged at him, his consciousness taking him to dreamland. Every part of him relaxed. Breathing grew calm. And his neck was tightened.

Grab! "...!"

A grip suddenly grabbed his neck. Lloyd snapped his eyes open and held out his hands by reflex. But he failed because someone pinned them down tight, pressing his whole body, including his arms and legs.

"Argh...! Ergh! Eup!"

Lloyd flailed and struggled as his neck and body were pressed down. He counted several intruders, and he tried hard to get a look at them. The room was dark without any light, and Lloyd could only vaguely make out the outlines of his attackers.

Ten?

No, there were more. Five were pinning him down, and about five or six surrounded him. Lloyd activated the Asrahan Core Technique right away.

Ziiing!

“Ack...?!”

“My strength...”

“Don’t let go of him!”

Lloyd started to absorb the mana of those that touched him. They were assaulted with a pang of dizziness and weakness. Lloyd could hear the fuss and mess they made in dismay. Just then...

Thump! His head burned and his vision was filled with white light. Could it be that Lloyd was hit with a club? The world seemed to spin around him. And the Asrahan Core Technique was deactivated right away. There were frantic voices of men around him.

“Whew... Ha... What was that?”

“Don’t just stand there like a fool. Tie him up. Come on.”

The rustling, squeezing, and tying sound came as Lloyd’s wrists and ankles tightened. Lloyd felt stifled, so he wondered if his blood wasn’t circulating properly. His hands and feet tingled and turned numb. Soon, he sensed a muzzle over his mouth.

“Cover him up with this. We never know when he’ll wake up again.”

They must have put a cover over his head. Everything became dark.

“Okay, come on. Before that silver-haired guard comes back.”

Javier. Where are you? Lloyd lifted his head with a struggle. But he couldn’t see anything through the cover. He again tried the Asrahan Core Technique, but it was only a meaningless fight as his hands and feet were tied up. But Lloyd was able to stay calm. He didn’t even panic or activate the Supercharge optional skill. Instead, he struggled a few times with all his might. But that stopped when the rope started scraping his skin.

“Now, do you understand what predicament you’re in?”

Nod. The question was directed to Lloyd, and he nodded. The speaker seemed to be satisfied by Lloyd’s answer.

“You can resist, but that’s a waste of energy. You catch on quickly. I like that.”

“...”

“Okay, move him.”

Lloyd felt himself being carried by someone big. He didn’t fight. It was meaningless to do so now. As he was carried on someone’s shoulder like a bag of rice, Lloyd concentrated his senses on the surrounding sound and flow of the air.

I knew they’d be heading outside the city.

Footsteps. A dog barking on the street. The direction of the wind and its smell. After a long while, he found himself being placed on a hard floor.

“On your knees.”

Lloyd obeyed the command, and the bag covering his face was finally removed.

“...”

His forehead ached from the blow he received earlier, and he looked up as he grimaced. It was a dark room, and there were about 20 people surrounding him, all of whom Lloyd could only make out their outlines.

Am I in a waste material warehouse?

The room was filled with the smell of rotten wood and the musty smell of dust. There were also a few windows sparsely nailed with planks. The high ceiling supported by the pillar was covered with spider webs.

Woah. This really feels like a place for kidnapping.

Lloyd sighed internally. This one seemed like the scene he used to see in gangster or noir movies. So, he couldn't help but smirk. As soon as the muzzle was removed from his mouth, Lloyd asked a question of the men.

"All of you. Who are you?"

But they all stared back at Lloyd without a word, the heavy silence narrowing on Lloyd like a siege. The answer came very much later.

"Do you not understand the predicament you are in? You seemed to be confused. We ask the questions. You answer."

One of the men stepped forward. Tall with broad shoulders. He had blond hair and a fit physique. He approached Lloyd and got down on one knee to be at eye level. Stroking his rough beard, he icily stared at Lloyd.

"You. Why are you sacrificing yourself for the city?"

The man continued to speak.

"Everyday, you distribute water to the people after drawing it in your eerie monster's belly. Then you boast of it all day. That's why it's strange. We are always thankful for any generosity, but your actions clearly have an ulterior motive. So." The man's gaze grew colder. Shaper. "What is it that you want? Why are you boisterously advertising your charitable actions?"

The man's gaze was likened to a detective interrogating a criminal or a lawyer accusing a witness. It was stern. No, it was dangerous. The same went for everyone standing around him. They appeared to be ready to teach him some violent lessons if Lloyd didn't give the answer they wanted or resisted and obstinately clamped his mouth. And so, Lloyd quickly spoke.

"Oh, I'm glad that you asked me that question."

Lloyd smacked his lips with saliva and knuckled down to talk as though he had been waiting for this moment and the chance to talk. He then went all out.

“I felt very cramped while you brought me here after attacking me when I was about to fall asleep. It was all because of the sudden bag over my head,” said Lloyd, “But I am glad that you are letting me speak now. It looks like you have a lot of questions, so I suppose I should introduce myself first. Nice to meet you. I am Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Count Arcos Frontera, who is the lord of the Frontera county in the Magentano Kingdom.”

“Oh, it’s nice to meet...”

“To answer your question first, you all doubted my kind actions and wondered what my intentions were. I have to admit that my actions were poles apart from those amazing individuals who choose to cover and hide their good actions instead of flaunting them as I did. That’s why I had been wanting to give an explanation, and I’m glad I have the chance now.”

“Um, well, of course...”

“First, I am not the sultan’s informant or his stool pigeon. You won’t believe me when I say that, of course. So, to understand everything, you must know the history of Frontera county and my family situation. About two years and a few months ago, Frontera county, which was a barony back then, found itself under a crippling debt. The sky seemed to crumble over me, and the ground sank beneath me. I was in despair and abyss. But I could not give up. Just like how everyone goes through hard and unfortunate times in life, I simply lived on thinking that this storm was just another test of life. The thought gave me strength and hope. And so, I made a new offer to the bar owner in the central plaza of my fiefdom.”

“Wait, hold on-”

“So I made the ondol... Blah blah blah... Because I could do it so well, the pavement road... Blah blah... Built the mine with the expectation and enthusiasm of my family and people... And in Cremo, I decided to move forward amid the raving attention being poured on me... Blah blah... Triple mana blast was used with the deep resolution that I cannot retreat when the queen’s life was on the line...”

Lloyd went on. Nonstop. He continued to talk endlessly, and the faces of the men around him changed to that of confusion. This wasn't like anything they expected. This foreigner, Lloyd, was suspected of being the sultan's informant. And that was why they dragged him here. To interrogate what in the world he was doing in this city, and their expectation was that this stool pigeon would be obstinate and shut his mouth without spilling anything. Thus, they came here with a venomous determination that they would not hesitate to be ruthless and cruel. But a frank, tedious, and sickening narration of his life story? That was the last thing they expected to hear. Unable to endure any longer, the blond man shouted.

"S-stop!"

"Excuse me...?" asked Lloyd with a quizzical look on his face.

"Are you insulting us?!"

"No, you had doubts about my intentions, and I was just giving my most honest and elaborate answer."

"But-"

"Anyway, I'm not done yet. You asked. So, please listen. Captain Frontera is just about to make an appearance to exterminate the swarm of locusts."

"..."

"From the moment I grabbed the lid, I burst with a sense of calling I never knew I had. It was coming from deep within. So, I..."

Stop it. Please stop it, you nut-job. The blond-haired man wanted to beg. A look of desperation appeared on everyone's faces, their eyes slowly blanking out while Lloyd went on with his unending and forthright life story. They nodded mechanically as they listened. Meanwhile, Lloyd cast a glance at a window in the corner. In between the planks that covered it, through a gap, Lloyd exchanged his gaze with Javier, who had been on standby.

They took the bait!

The rebels bit the bait. So now, it was time to find and take over the caves they used as their hideouts.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 192: Between Kidnapping and Fishing (2)

Is that what you call fishing?

Lloyd's never-ending words. The dumbstruck kidnappers. And Javier lightly frowned as he watched what was happening in the warehouse outside through the window...

Did Master Lloyd really predict this situation would happen?

It appeared so. Then his mind took him back to the event in the afternoon when Lloyd, with an unusually serious look, told him that kidnappers would come that night. So, he was to wait near the room and never take any action until Lloyd was in danger. He was to follow the kidnappers and observe the situation. At Lloyd's request, Javier asked back how on earth he could predict such a thing. Lloyd didn't give an answer. He simply flashed a grin and said that it was a hunch.

"..."

Javier's gaze deepened as he remembered Lloyd's words. Sometimes, no, oftentimes, Javier was entranced by his young master. What was happening now was too accurate to be a hunch. Could it be that he had an amazing intuition? Or was he simply intelligent?

No, this feat is far too large for those explanations.

Javier didn't regard Lloyd as a genius based on his observations. Certainly, his young master was slightly more quick-witted than most others. But there wasn't any streak of ingenious intelligence in him. And so, Javier posited another possibility.

There might be something I don't know.

Looking back, it was always the case. It was the case when Lloyd figured out a way to complete the Asrahan Core Technique, which he himself struggled hard to perfect it. The same case when Lloyd predicted the assassination of the queen back in the capital. And when he doubted Cannavaro, the warlock in Namaran.

Sometimes... he feels like someone who's seen a glimpse of the future or has already experienced it.

Javier knew very well that such a thing was impossible. But still, Lloyd gave off that feeling. It was as if he borrowed a portion of a memory of an omnipotent being. Along those lines, he manifested an intuition that went beyond one's senses and intelligence. It was the same today.

I should watch over him more.

He couldn't ascertain anything yet. It was just a gut feeling. Javier stared into the inside of the warehouse with a deepened gaze and observed Lloyd, who was wrapping the kidnappers around his little finger with his words. Thankfully, his endless story was nearing its end.

"That's why I did it... I felt a strong sense of duty after recognizing the heavy burden on the shoulders of the people here and started drawing water to follow my heart. That is how I came to distribute water to people here. Haah, but I don't regret it. Even if I could time travel and go back a few days ago and know in advance that I would get kidnapped, I'll make the same choice."

"To earn the trust of the people here and finish the construction and bring the sultan to the negotiation table?"

"Oh, I suppose you understood where I was getting at?"

"Of course," said the man, dumbfounded that Lloyd was surprised. "You've been confessing for an hour and a half."

Lloyd smiled as he looked up. The blond-haired man, who was the leader among the kidnappers, heaved a drawn sigh. He couldn't help it.

What kind of guy is this?

Dismay pervaded the man’s eyes as he looked at Lloyd. At first, he thought this foreigner was working for the sultan to report everything about this place. The construction was just a pretense to look into the inner workings of the region. That was what he thought Lloyd was. As such, the man was bothered as Lloyd continued to be kind and distribute water. His doubts worsened, and it put him on edge. He was dead certain that this man had something up his sleeve. An ulterior motive of some kind. In the end, he decided to kidnap him. Even if he had to threaten and interrogate him, he would uncover the man’s intentions as well as the sultan’s schemes and objectives. But...

“Let me be frank with you. I have never received such a confession like this,” the man said. “I am torn whether I should compliment you for your elaborate story or say you went overboard. Anyway, I think I know what you are now.”

“What am I?” asked Lloyd, intrigued.

“A man who wants to use us.”

The blond-haired man’s eyes grew stern as he stared at Lloyd. “You. I suppose you already know who we are, right?”

“Yes, of course,” said Lloyd without hiding.

“Can you guess who I am?”

“Certainly, I do. You are Termes, the leader of the rebels.”

“I knew it.” Termes scoffed. “All that sharing of water to people. That was to meet us. Am I right?”

“Yes,” admitted Lloyd, “though it took longer than I expected.”

A smile formed on Lloyd’s mouth. Termes was right. Lloyd did wait for the rebels to show up. He strove to meet them, and this was the best way. There was absolutely no way the residents would answer nicely if Lloyd went up to them and asked where and how he could meet the rebels. Threatening the people wasn’t the answer either. As such, Lloyd resorted to excessive philanthropy for the people here. He went all out, explicitly showing that he was doing something good here. He did the math and figured that the rebels would notice him eventually, that they would grow more doubtful and vigilant against him as they watched him do good deeds every day. And his prediction was spot on.

After all, they thought I was working for the sultan.

It would have looked more strange that a sultan’s man was doing good deeds for the community. Lloyd capitalized on that and used it as bait. And thankfully, he was able to get kidnapped by the rebel and thereby succeeded in meeting them.

“I was expecting that you would come to meet me last night or today. Well, though, your method was much rougher than I predicted,” said Lloyd as he scoffed and frowned. A corner of his forehead was slightly swollen because of the blow. Termes, the leader of the rebel, looked at Lloyd more stringently.

“How bold of you. We could have knocked you out harder.”

“Such a thing,” said Lloyd, “could happen if I was kidnapped by mountain thieves or robbers who have no sense of morality. They scare and kidnap innocent people.”

“Are you trying to criticize us?”

“No. It hurt a while ago, but I can understand well enough.”

“Then what is it that you want from us?”

Termes’s eyes grew suggestive. Actually, he still had doubts about Lloyd. It was so even after Lloyd shared his entire life story in full detail. Why? Such stories could be fabricated well enough. Anyone could easily come up with a similar lie. That was the reason why he didn’t stop Lloyd when he blabbered. As the story drew out, there was a greater chance for loopholes to be found, and it would be easier for Termes to spot them. But he couldn't find any loopholes or lies in Lloyd's story, and that was surprising.

I must figure out what this man is up to.

If this foreigner was indeed working for the sultan and trying to cleanse the rebels, slashing his neck was the best option.

But I should listen to his story first.

Termes decided to listen first before judging. He waited for Lloyd to speak. Lloyd faintly smiled.

"What do I want? Well, it's simple. Hand over all your hideouts."

"What...?"

Termes thought he heard him wrong. He never imagined that a kidnapped man with tied hands and feet would make such a preposterous demand. But Lloyd went further, and his brazen voice pierced everyone's ears.

"It is just as I said. All of you must be using the caves scattered throughout the regions as your hideouts, but I just can't find them out on my own. So, please share all of them with me," demanded Lloyd.

"What... Are you out of your mind?"

"No, I'm not. You need to give me those caves to solve the drought that constantly plagues your region."

"What?"

Termes, who was about to fly into a rage, stopped. Give up the caves? That's the solution to drought? What gibberish is that?

"Explain..."

"Of course," said Lloyd with a grin. "As I have told you, I came here after signing a contract with the sultan to build a water facility called Qanat. It's an underground waterway that can connect the mountain range to this place, traveling about 23 miles."

"Then why do you need our caves?" Termes demanded to know.

"Because I plan on connecting the caves to build the waterway," replied Lloyd.

"..."

"I mean it. That's how I can shorten the construction period. It would equally reduce the time people suffer due to drought. Additionally, the sultan won't need to go so far as to wage war against us to turn things around for him, which means your neighbors and friends won't have to be dragged to war, and my hometown, Frontera county, won't wind up in it either. Everyone will be happy. That is, only if you all kindly give up the caves," explained Lloyd.

"..."

Everyone was at a loss for words. They couldn't rashly give an answer or react. The scale of things Lloyd so nonchalantly narrated now was beyond their expectations and common sense. They thought that Lloyd was a nut-job when he demanded the cave. But now that they listened to his rationale, it made sense somehow.

"Whew, hold on. Let's summarize for a second," said Termes as he suppressed dismay. "So, you want to use our hideouts for your project to solve the drought?"

"Yes."

"To connect them together and build the waterway by drawing water from the mountain range?"

"You're perfectly right."

"Ha. But what about us? What's going to happen to us?"

Termes smirked after a pause.

“Since you know about us already,” Termes went on. “I won’t hide it anymore. You are right. We are rebels against the sultan. We are resentful toward the sultan who does nothing even when our lands are getting destroyed by drought and everyone is in pain. We are ready and resolved to use force to let him know of our sufferings and put an end to this agonizing drought by using the wealth of Ahinsya. That is, even if it means staining our hands with blood.”

Temers paused before continuing to talk.

“So you see, we are rebels. Rebels against the sultan. But what? Give you our hideouts? Then everyone can happily escape the drought? Fine. Let us say that things do go on according to your way. Let us say that the waterway is built. That’s something we will gladly welcome as well. The cause of our pain which provoked us will be gone. But what about afterward? What will happen later when we give out the hideouts for your construction? What will happen to us after losing our safe house?”

A faint hostility appeared in Termes’s eyes as they stared at Lloyd. “Do you think we’ll be safe after we lose them? You are not so innocent to believe that the sultan will forgive us for cooperating with the construction project, right?”

“No, of course not.” Lloyd nodded his head. “It’s obvious he won’t. After all, the sultan is the ruler.”

It was true. The fact was obvious Cooperating in the Qanat construction and giving up their hideouts didn’t guarantee the possibility that the sultan would forgive the rebels. There was no chance it would happen. That kind of happy ending only existed in fairy tales. Lloyd ascertained so without a doubt.

He’s a despot in every sense of the word. Him forgiving the people that schemed rebellion just because they cooperated in his project? No way he’d set such precedence. Never.

The world wasn’t that beautiful. There was no guarantee that cooperation would be awarded. It was the case this time too, and that was why...

Termes, you are reacting exactly the same as I predicted.

Lloyd had seen it coming. He expected that Termes would want to demand what would come after giving up their caves. And so, Lloyd had the answer.

“You can all leave here.”

“What...?”

“What can you do? You’re going to get killed by the sultan, so you’ve got to run.”

“Are you... mocking us?”

Grab! Termes held out his hands and grabbed his collar, looking daggers at him, ready to throw a punch. But Lloyd reacted nonchalantly.

“Mocking you? I am serious now.”

“Then what is with your gibberish? Run? Escape here? Do you really think that’s possible?”

“Yes.”

“How?”

“You can come live in my fiefdom.”

“...”

“Defect,” said Lloyd. “Safely. I’m going to take you all.”

“Come on.” Termes shot him a look in disbelief. “Are you in your right mind?”

“Of course.”

They had no elsewhere to go. That was the case even if they didn’t give up the caves. In the end, they were destined to fail and die miserably.

That happens in the novel. Termes and the people beside him all fail. They get captured by the sultan’s forces and perish at the guillotine. But that becomes a catalyst for the emirs in the regions to rise up. A second coup breaks out, and the sultan finally comes down from his throne.

That was how the story went in the novel. In short, Termes and his men would perish and die amidst the emerging revolution.

I’m offering you a chance to live and solve the drought as a bonus. Moreover, I would also put the sultan at the negotiation table and prevent my fiefdom from getting sucked into a war.

This road was the path that ensured everyone’s happiness. This plan would leave everyone to smile. Could it be that Termes vaguely got an idea of his intentions? Could it be that Termes realized that handing the caves to Lloyd will solve the drought and open up the possibility for everyone’s happiness?

“How can I trust you?” Termes asked, his eyes burning with more passion. And his grip on Lloyd’s collar tightened. “Are you insulting us? Or have you lost your mind? How do you expect us to believe such an outrageous suggestion?”

“Is it,” asked Lloyd, “that you need proof that you can trust me?”

“Absolutely.” Termes’s eyes burned still. “That outrageous suggestion better have proof. Show me proof that I can trust. Or else, I’m going to slice your neck and bury you in the sand.”

“Well, fine then.”

Lloyd shrugged, still caught in Termes’s grip. The latter was growling in anger, and Lloyd understood where he was coming from. He was still distrusting Lloyd. He still believed that Lloyd’s suggestion could be a trick of the sultan. So in order to make sure that he would take up the offer, Lloyd needed a foolproof way to earn his trust. Thankfully, Lloyd had one in mind.

“Then let me ask you one thing,” said Lloyd as he lifted his head, fully taking in the fiery glare of his kidnapper. “Are you free to travel 11 nights and 12 days from today?”

“What...?”

“I need you to fly with me somewhere,” said Lloyd.

“Me? With you?”

“Yes.”

“Go fly with you for 12 days?”

“Yeah, and by then, you’ll have complete trust in me.”

“Where?” asked Termes.

Termes’s question was laden with doubt and confidence that such a thing would never happen. And his stare reflected just as much of his doubt. Receiving the distrustful gaze of Termes, Lloyd grinned. He replied so casually that it sounded like he was suggesting they go to a convenience store or bank to enjoy some air conditioning.

“To Magentano Kingdom. Let’s go meet the queen.”

Therefore, this was a terribly easy matter. What proof in the world was more solid than a grant for asylum issued by the queen herself?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 193: Between Kidnapping and Fishing (3)

“Your Majesty, Lloyd Frontera of the delegation and the others have arrived.”

“Let them in.”

Magentano palace. A dignified voice rang aloud through the training hall that sat at the center of the flashy palace. Its door opened.

“...”

Termes, the leader of the rebels in the sultan kingdom, was swallowed by reflex. He couldn’t think straight and was dazed. The door that just opened in front of him. The spectacle of the vast training hall. The red-haired woman standing at the center. Everything felt too unreal. Dazed, he followed Lloyd and got down on his one knee before the woman, and that, too, felt exceedingly unreal.

“Lloyd Frontera, the son of Arcos Frontera, is honored to be in your presence, Your Majesty.”

“D-Damieta Termes of the sultan kingdom is honored to be in the presence of the queen of the Magentano kingdom.”

Fearing he would stutter or give an improper greeting, Termes had practiced dozens of times to himself after he arrived at the palace. He was on pins and needles about making a mistake. But when the moment finally came, his lips automatically moved to greet the queen, and he couldn’t inspect whether he had said it right or stuttered. Breathing heavily, he tried to calm himself. Just then, he thought about the events of the previous days.

I never imagined I would really come here.

About five nights ago, he and his team kidnapped and interrogated Lloyd Frontera because they believed him to be working for the sultan. They did so because they wanted to discover his ulterior motive behind his good actions toward the people of Kandara and what the sultan was up to.

But getting such an outrageous suggestion was the last thing on my mind.

Lloyd Frontera. He was ballsy enough to throw a suggestion at his kidnappers as though he had been waiting for the right time. His demand was to hand over the caves used for their hideouts. That way, the underground waterway could be constructed to solve the drought. Should they accept that, Lloyd promised to accept them into his fiefdom. The suggestion itself was absolutely outrageous and unimaginable. Termes obviously scoffed at first.

I couldn't trust him.

There was no proof that Lloyd wasn't the sultan's stool pigeon. Thus, he didn't trust Lloyd, arguing that he could never trust the suggestion and that Lloyd must prove he wasn't lying first. Termes roughly and forcefully argued with him, but Lloyd's response was a masterpiece.

He suggested that we should go meet Queen Magentano to receive a grant for asylum.

His suggestion was clearly off the wall. Termes and his team all agreed on that. However, what did Lloyd say in reply?

"Well, you chumps can stay knightly together in this city as you suffer through the drought then."

Lloyd scoffed as he pathetically stared at them. It was because of that stare. That stare reminded Termes of the drought that swept over his hometown and of his young boy, panting helplessly as he perished in his arms. How utterly helpless he was amid such misery! The rancor and despair of that day were brought back to ache his hurt once more.

"Fine... We will go together and see. But you are a dead man if I detect any falsehood in your offer."

He had accepted the offer as he glowered at Lloyd as though he was going to chomp him up. And just like that, they set out on the journey. Termes wasn't worried about getting beaten up. Why? He was confident with his sword. And so, they got on a huge bird and started to fly west. Along the journey, Termes started to go through a change of heart. He was still skeptical in the desert. But when they reached the mountain range, he was curious. And when they crossed into the Magentano border, he was surprised. And today, he was flabbergasted, primarily because he was meeting the queen.

"You are the rebel leader of the sultan kingdom who came with Lloyd Frontera."

Flinch! A soft voice jostled Termes out of his trance. He flinched visibly by reflex.

"Yes, Your Majesty! Yes! I am him, Your Majesty!"

Termes found himself bawling at the top of his lungs. A wry smile formed on her face.

"It is all good. I do not intend on hurting you, so you can relax."

I am not going to hurt you. Her voice was soft but resolute, making it more reliable. The tensions that were built up around Termes's shoulders loosened up at last, and he dared lift his head slightly, stealing a glance at the queen.

That woman is the queen...

Alicia Termina Magentano. The monarch of the Magentano kingdom and the sword master. Termes heard countless rumors about her, how she rose to the level of a sword master at a relatively young age. How she overcame heaps of political conspiracies and strife until she grabbed the queen title. She was said to be an intelligent sword master, and not enough with that, her political skills were known to be top-notch.

But I never pegged her to look like that.

Termes had imagined that he would find himself in the presence of an authoritative figure sitting on a luxurious throne. But in actuality, he wasn't. Queen Magentano was covered with mud. Her modest training clothes, as well as the boots and knee protectors, were all stained with sand and mud. And her top was no different. Though it wasn't muddy, it was soaked in sweat. The shirt that was supposed to be brown was so soaked that it looked black. The towel around her neck was the same. And the long sword in her hand, particularly the hilt, was worn out and tattered due to prolonged use. Every aspect of her appearance made more sense if she was a knight who had just finished her training. The place Termes was met with was the same.

I presume she was training until now.

Behind the queen, a group of knights was scattered, lying on the sandy ground, each clutching their arms, legs, and shoulders in pain. There seemed to be around 50 soldiers, and Termes figured that the queen had beaten them.

Amazing. I see that's the power of a sword master.

The knights in the palace had to be fairly skilled. So, the queen was the monstrous one for being able to beat the daylights out of these 50 knights with only one sword. And now, Termes was here. To meet that monster and get her approval for asylum here.

Is this really happening?

Termes collected his breath again, and everything that was happening around him seemed so unreal. Queen Magentano let out a soft scoff at Termes.

"How surprising."

Her eyes moved toward Lloyd, who was kneeling beside Termes.

"Lloyd Frontera, it has been a long time," Queen Magentano said.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty. Words fail to capture the joy I am experiencing to be in Your Majesty’s presence,” said Lloyd.

“Truly?”

“Without a doubt, Your Majesty...” said Lloyd after a second of pause. “That is the reason behind my visit here. To have a countenance with Your Majesty while I was in the far sultan kingdom.”

“Tsk. How dare you use such obvious flattery against me. If you followed my orders, you should be residing in Ahinsya right now. How do you explain your presence here?” asked the queen.

“Shall I keep my report short, Your Majesty?”

“I want the details.”

“Your words are my command.”

Lloyd bowed hard, beginning to narrate his long story, keeping as many details as possible. One by one, Lloyd reported the events that took place. By the time he was done, there was a slight crease on her forehead.

“In short... the sultan's kingdom poorly treated my delegation so you signed a contract with the sultan in exchange for starting the negotiation table. And thus, now require the cooperation of this rebel leader to make the construction a success?” summarized the queen.

“Yes, that is indeed right, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“So, you wish that I grant him asylum to my kingdom?”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“Your gratitude comes too early,” pointed out the queen. “I did not grant your request yet.”

“However, I, Lloyd Frontera, have no inkling of doubt on Your Majesty’s mercy and grace.”

“Tsk. I wonder how long your shamelessness will last,” quipped the queen.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“Enough with your overwhelming gratitude.”

Queen Magentano spoke, but a scoff escaped her at last. She tried to hold it, but it just came out. Lloyd Frontera. She couldn't help but laugh at his absurd behavior.

Yes. The best way to prove that he is not working for the sultan is to come to me when he needs this man’s cooperation.

Taking the rebel leader to this kingdom? That was a bold idea that anybody could come up with. However, what was truly surprising about Lloyd was his outrageous level of initiative to make that bold idea into reality.

Should I say he’s shameless or fearless?

A wry smile slightly deepened as she was torn on which word described Lloyd best. Or could it be that he was the type of person to use any means possible to achieve his goals?

“Lloyd Frontera.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“You are truly an impudent loyal subject.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“No, no need for forgiveness. If I take a step back, I see your work today will be one of the actions you have taken to fulfill the mission entrusted to you by me.”

“I am overwhelmed with your gratitude for understanding me, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk. Do stop with your gratitude. I know they are empty words,” she said. “So, I should only permit his asylum then?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd bowed, flatter this time. The queen called for her official, and as she spoke aloud the content of the paper, the official wrote it down. Five minutes later, the paper that contained the official insignia of the monarch was in Termes’s hands.

“Now... With this, you and your followers will earn the right to become the people of Magentano,” she announced.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” Termes said. Then he took the paper, his heart beating very fast. Five days ago, this moment was regarded as nothing but Lloyd’s bravado at the remote storage.

I can’t believe his words were real.

Termes felt like he was dreaming. He felt the same even later when he left as he paid his respects to Queen Magentano and when she stopped and called Lloyd.

“Oh, Lloyd Frontera... I have something to tell you now that you are here,” said the queen.

“What could it be, Your Majesty?”

“It is about that warlock you captured in Namaran. Cannavaro.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“The interrogation is expected to end soon,” she went on. “I might need your assistance and summon you to the capital.”

“Me, Your Majesty...?” said Lloyd, his voice growing smaller.

“Indeed. Do you not like me summoning you?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty.”

“That’s what I thought.”

“Of course, Your Majesty.”

“Right. You should be. I can tell just from this unexpected visit from you today. To you, I am someone you wish to meet at any time. Aren’t I correct?”

“T-truly, Your Majesty.”

“Hmm... I think your eyes wavered just now.”

“Your Majesty, that is due to fatigue.”

“Because you flew day and night to meet me?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“That means you will fly day and night like today the next time I call you, correct?”

“Of course... Your Majesty.”

“Again. There. Your eyes wavered.”

“Clearly, it is due to fatigue, Your Majesty.”

“I see. Clearly, it is from fatigue.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Indeed. It must be. I pray you aren’t a selfish and sly man who only comes to meet me when you need me. Isn’t that right?”

Queen Magentano smiled, and her eyes seemed to hold a grudge. Lloyd then left her presence, smiling and sweating.

“Woah.”

Once he was safely out of the training hall, Lloyd heaved out a breath he had been holding back there. Then he turned toward Termes.

“So what now?” asked Lloyd. “Can you trust me now?”

“...”

Termes didn’t say anything. He simply moved his gaze down to his hand holding the paper, which contained the queen’s insignia granting his asylum. Laughter escaped him.

“Ha. I never imagined this to work,” confessed Termes.

“You didn’t, huh?”

“Haah. Not a chance. Truly.”

“So, are you going to take up the suggestion I made?” asked Lloyd.

“Of course. Our caves are yours.”

Termes nodded. Now, there was no reason to not believe this eccentric young master. Should someone in the group still distrust him, Termes was ready to badger them around until they were persuaded.

“Are we then going back to Kandara?” asked Termes.

“Yes, we should. Just as I told you when we took off.”

“11 nights and 12 days. Is that correct?”

“Yeah. But a day shorter if the weather is nice like this.”

“I see,” said Termes.

“Yes, indeed.”

The two walked out of the palace. Just then, Lloyd scoffed.

“Wait a minute,” he added as an afterthought, “we never officially introduced ourselves to each other.”

“Hmm?”

“Let me officially introduce myself. I am Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera county that is loyal to the Magentano family.”

“...”

Lloyd held out his hand, and Termes took it and shook.

“I am Damieta Termes, soon to defect to Frontera county. Nice to meet you.”

“All right,” Lloyd said, “then let’s forget that the kidnapping ever happened.”

“Certainly. You will be the ruler of my future home anyhow.”

“Then I suppose you will no longer club me in the forehead in the middle of the night?”

“I am very sorry about that...”

The leader of the rebel, Termes, broke into an embarrassed smile. 15 days later, thanks to Ggoming’s eager flight, Lloyd and Termes were able to get back to Kandara. But this time, it was to end this prolonged drought. Backed by the active cooperation of the rebels, the time had come for Lloyd to knuckle down and seriously start surveying to build the Qanat.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 194: Drillers (1)

The surveying began in full swing. It was a necessary step in every construction project. The process felt repetitive each time but was never the same. This time was no different.

This time, we're connecting the underground tunnels dispersed irregularly all over the place.

The location. Length. Depth. Direction. All these tunnels had different routes and expanded from Kandara to the barren plain of the mountain range in a random fashion. Moreover, each went as deep as 16 feet. So, Subterranean Scanning wasn't enough to identify the shape and size of the tunnels in the ground.

"That is why I need your cooperation, everyone."

Lloyd was at the abandoned warehouse located in the remote part of the city. This was also the place Lloyd was abducted about 15 days ago. Gathered in this nostalgic venue, Lloyd lifted his head and looked around at the people.

"Did you bring the map I mentioned earlier?" asked Lloyd.

Termes and the rebel executives nodded at Lloyd's question. Termes then piled the dozens of maps collected from the others on the table.

"Here you go," he said as he spread out the maps one after another. "These maps," he went on, "indicate most of the tunnels we have acquired or are aware of. Here, we tried grouping them together."

"Grouping them? How?" asked Lloyd.

"They were organized by their proximity to Kandara. If the distance was the same, the tunnels were organized by size. We grouped them based on those two criteria," explained Termes.

“Oh, wow.”

Lloyd yelled in delight in his head. He liked how Termes, the leader of the rebels, was smarter than he expected him to be.

“Great.”

Lloyd’s eyes held a glint of satisfaction as he looked at the maps, which were more detailed than he initially thought. What was more, it looked like the maps had been systematically organized. The markings, units, and symbols were all neatly put together.

Good. Very good.

Their efforts lessened his workload since he wouldn’t have to strain over the backbreaking task of organizing the map and putting together its key.

“I guess my turn has come.”

Crack! Crack!

Lloyd stepped back from the table after taking the maps and stretched his whole body. Termes looked at Lloyd with a confused gaze.

“Your turn?” asked Termes for clarification.

“Oh.” A grin appeared on Lloyd’s face. And in a nonchalant manner, he added, “I’m going to run around for a bit using your maps.”

“Wait, run inside the tunnels?” asked Termes again in disbelief.

“Yes.”

“…”

“This shouldn’t come as a surprise. I need to survey and see everything with my own eyes.”

“The distance will be considerable,” pointed out Termes.

“Exactly the reason why I wore comfortable clothes.”

Indeed, Lloyd was wearing a comfy shirt and wide-fit pants. He even had a towel around his neck. The look was likened to a marathon runner.

“Thanks to your organized maps, though,” continued Lloyd, “I think I’ll run half of the distance I initially anticipated. Look, do you see this path here? I can easily tell that I won’t have to go there at all.”

“Is it a good thing that you don’t?”

“Yes, so do cheer me on, please.”

Lloyd then stepped out of the warehouse after stretching. Outside, 32-foot-sized Ppodong was waiting for him.

“Ppodong!”

“Where’s Ggoming?” asked Lloyd.

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!”

“His wing muscles are still sore?”

“Ppodong!”

“Okay,” said Lloyd. “It’s all right. He overworked himself traveling to the kingdom. I’m letting him rest for now.”

“Ppodong! Ppo-do-dong!”

“Okay, let’s go. Come one, Termes, please hop on.”

Lloyd and Termes hopped on Ppodong’s back. A smile escaped Lloyd as it had been quite a while since he sat on Ppodong’s fluffy and comfy back. Afterward, Ppodong sprinted westward, following the guidance of Termes, until they arrived at the closest underground tunnel to Kandara. Lloyd entered the tunnel and ran alone. The marathon to survey had begun.

“Huff, huff!”

Lloyd ran along the underground tunnel, lightly collecting his breath. Sometimes, the tunnel was straight. Sometimes, it was curved. Lloyd had the surveying skill activated throughout his run in the tunnel, and a torch was in his hand as if he was participating in an Olympic torch relay. Crackle...!

Countless pieces of information about the tunnel were collected.

My goodness. Never did I imagine before that I’d be doing something like this.

Running a marathon dozens of feet underground? A smile escaped Lloyd. At the same time, several memories came to his mind.

I remember when I first started learning how to sword fight.

It was around the time Lloyd tried to combat Sir Neumann, the traitor of his fiefdom. Lloyd worked on his stamina as he learned the basics of swordsmanship from Javier. That day, he had run more than the combined distance he ran in his life. But now, he was able to run faster and longer than before. It was thanks to the Asrahan Core Technique utilizing the triple circle and his manaheart which was close to the level of a mid-level sword expert.

“Huff! Huff!”

When was the last time I ran this much? Oh, right. The wild ants.

It must have been when he constructed the coal mine in his fiefdom. The last face of the mine touched the underground tunnels of the wild ants, which had Lloyd sprint and dash through the tunnels to attract the ants away from his people.

This reminds me of that time.

Lloyd scoffed again, putting an end to his reminiscing. And before he knew it, he was already near the end of the tunnel. He then studied the map.

Good. I think I can build the waterway according to the route I've run. I'll also block here, here, and here to prevent water from flowing out in another direction.

Lloyd then quickly checked several points of the map. Around an hour or two later, he finished surveying one underground tunnel. And then...

"Let's get moving again."

"Ppodong!"

He got on Ppodong again and moved to the next tunnel under Termes's guidance. Of course, Lloyd didn't rest in between the two tunnels. He precisely measured the course of the first and second tunnels, gauging and calculating the shortest route to connect them. In no time, he arrived at the second tunnel.

"Please wait here with Ppodong until I come back. If you're bored, play a word game with him," suggested Lloyd.

"What's a word game?" asked Termes.

"I'll show you. Ppodong?"

"Ppodong?"

"Why don't you start?"

"Ppodong!"

"Now," said Lloyd, "the next word you should say has to start with the letter 'D.'"

Lloyd looked at Termes, and the latter mumbled something.

"E…Expand."

"Hey, Ppodong. Your turn."

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Ppodong said, ‘Painter.’ But since he can only say ‘Ppodong,’ your word must start with a ‘D’ every time. Got it?”

“...”

This is cheating, Termes wanted to rebut. But Lloyd had already dashed into the tunnel without waiting to start surveying again. Now, left all alone, Termes was forced to say the following as he turned to look at Ppodong.

“Whew. Dinner.”

“Ppodong!”

“Destroy.”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“...”

For some reason, Termes felt like he was in a more challenging battle than one against the sultan.

***

Slash!

“Argh...! Ugh!”

A giant wall. One that was so tall, its peak couldn’t be seen. Is this what it felt like to be blocked by such a wall? Sheherazade shuddered at the pang of stifling helplessness. But she wielded her sword again.

“Tssk!”

Whoosh! High-level sword expert. She had trained with all of her might to get to this level, so her attack contained all the years of her blood and sweat.

So, she had always been confident with her sword until she was faced with this opponent.

Boom!

“...!”

She missed. Not even a scrape. Her attack posed no threat.

How?

Her black-pearly eyes trembled, and her gaze quickly traced the trajectory of her opponent. She immediately braced herself for a possible counterattack. But her opponent didn’t fight back. Instead, he simply stepped back from the sword strike trajectory.

“Are you making fun of me?!”

As her shaky voice boomed in the room, her opponent, Javier, replied with a face void of any emotion.

“Not at all.”

“Then?”

“I told you,” Javier said, “I am simply following Master Lloyd’s order.”

“That ridiculous order to lock me up here?”

“He did not order me to lock you up here. He simply told me to take good care of you,” stated Javier tonelessly.

“That’s the same thing!”

Slash! Swish! Provoked, Sheherazade took two steps forward, laying two attacks as she broke the rhythm of her movement. The scimitar, the curved sword used in desert regions, split the space diagonally. The timing of her attack was perfect as it capitalized on the split second in between breathing. Had the opponent been an ordinary swordsman or a high-level sword expert knight of a similar caliber, she would have caught him off guard well enough. But unfortunately, she was up against Javier.

“...”

Rustle. A half step back without a blink of an eye. That was all that was enough for Javier to make Sheherazade’s calculated attack meaningless. Her sword missed and sliced a nearby table and the back of a chair.

“Take care of me?” huffed Sheherazade. “Don’t be ridiculous. I’m a guard. Assigned by the sultan!”

“I know,” answered Javier, his voice dripping with composure.

“Then why are you doing this to me?!”

“Again, I am doing this at the order of Master Lloyd.”

“What did he say?!”

“That the desert sun is not good for your skin.”

“What...?” Sheherazade, who was breathlessly attacking Javier, stopped for the first time.

“What did you just say?” she asked as her brow shook.

“I am relaying exactly what Master Lloyd had said. Verbatim.”

“What now-”

“He said that the radiation from the desert sun accelerates skin aging and that the dry air in this area makes it the worst. The fine dust is also harmful to the respiratory system, and in the long term, it increases the chances of various kinds of lung conditions, according to him.”

“...”

What does that suppose to mean? She listened to Javier, feeling slightly dazed.

“Frankly, I do not know what radiation is either. And to be honest, I am not so happy about holding you here through the afternoon.”

“Then why won’t you let me out?” demanded Sheherazade.

“Again, I am doing this at the order of Master Lloyd.”

“That! That again!”

Provoked again, she gripped her scimitar hard, a part of her heart growing heavily anxious.

No. I can’t continue wasting my time like this.

She has been locked up in this room for several days now. In the afternoon, Javier stopped her from leaving. At night, Lloyd visited and spewed enchanting, enigmatic words that sounded like a spell. Lloyd didn’t give her even the slightest chance to strike up anything close to a conversation. Just hearing him talk brought a flood, a tsunami of sleepiness. She resisted by widening her eyes and firmly pinching her thighs. But eventually, she found herself sleeping in bed against her will. It was one of the best and most comfortable nights of sleep she ever had.

That’s the problem!

She enjoyed having a peaceful night of sleep. But once she woke up, it was already bright in the morning. There was no trace of Lloyd. Instead, there was sword master Javier at the door, blocking her from leaving just like today, right now. In other words, she was completely imprisoned day and night.

This is intentional. They’re confining me here on purpose. I don’t know why. But I’m certain that they’re trying to cast me aside.

And so, she was on edge. This was one of the rare chances the sultan offered her. She had the chance to satisfy his expectations. If she could make Lloyd Frontera hers and bring him as the sultan’s son-in-law, she could be properly acknowledged by her father for the first time.

I can’t... I can’t miss such a precious opportunity!

She had to step out of this room. She had to be on Lloyd’s side as his guard and naturally spend more time with him. So, escaping this sickening room was the first thing to do! Sheherazade brandished her sword as she gritted her teeth, but she failed to reach her opponent. She couldn’t touch any part of him, not even a strand of his hair or an edge of his sleeves. It was even the case when Javier wasn’t attacking back at all. Worse, he was barehanded and moved only within a two-step perimeter. That fact made her even more frustrated.

“Arghhh! Please! Come on!”

Be captured. Be hit by my sword. She swung and struggled as she wailed desperately. Of course, Javier rejected her plea flatly, avoiding her attack much too easily. At the same time, he looked at her with a strange gaze.

“...”

Javier then remembered what Lloyd had hinted to him about her. How she was actually the daughter of the sultan. How she was here with ulterior motives. So, Lloyd suggested it was better to confine her here in this room lest she does something. It was only for the better that the sultan's daughter did not meet the rebels. Javier recalled the warning from Lloyd.

Well, at her skill level, this is a good training opportunity for you too.

His gaze toward her deepened. She was a high-level sword expert, which was far below his own status. Even so, there was a uniquely sharp ferocity in her sword movements that made her opponents flinch in fear.

What a talented woman.

Javier was impressed, but he didn’t show it. Not everyone could swing a sword with this much vigor. It wasn’t something that could be achieved by simply leveling up.

It is a matter of talent.

Looking at talent alone, Javier figured she would be on par with Queen Magentano. If she met a good teacher and had the right opportunity, she would be able to rise to the level of a sword master.

Master Lloyd must be aware of it as well.

A crease appeared on his forehead. Master Lloyd was a quick-witted man, and it was only obvious that he saw through what potential this lady, who was going berserk now, had for herself. And yet, why did he put me to her side to jail her? wondered Javier. And he remembered how Lloyd had added that he could teach her a lesson if necessary. It didn't matter whether he showed what true sword fighting was. Lloyd had said those words as he scoffed.

"..."

What would happen, Javier wondered, if this lady became a sword master as she fought against him? The daughter of the sultan. The princess of the enemy kingdom. Should such a woman become a sword master, it would only mean more power for the enemy state.

Still, if he entrusted the job to me... I must only assume that Master Lloyd has a bigger plan in mind.

Javier decided to trust him. The Lloyd he knew until now would have a trustworthy plan in mind.

Then, I will help you out with your plan.

Javier made a decision. He would teach her a lesson. With that, Javier grabbed a candlelight hanging on a wall.

Clang! His candlelight easily blocked her scimitar, embers sparking at the blow.

“...!”

Her eyes widened in surprise. Javier’s eyes flashed with iciness. From that moment on, Sheherazade sincerely regretted her childhood decision to pursue the solitary path of sword fighting.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 195: Drillers (2)

"Once upon a time, a long, long time ago, the water quality of the treated water was comparatively good, and the slow filtration method was adopted when the E. coli group was less than 1,000 (100mL, MPN), biological oxygen demand (BOD) was less than 2 mg/L, and the maximum turbidity was less than 10 degrees."

“Hold on...”

“Raw water treatment method aims at removing small amounts of turbidity and traces of organic matter from raw groundwater, eutrophication-free dam water, lake water, and pollution-free river water. The slow filtration method slowly filters raw water through a relatively thin layer of sand...”

“St...op...”

“This action also removes trace amounts of ammonia nitrogen, manganese, bacteria, and odor substances from the turbidity. Sedimentation paper is unnecessary at a maximum turbidity of 50°F or less per year, normal sedimentation paper is installed at a maximum turbidity of 50°F to 86°F per year, and a sedimentation paper capable of drug treatment is installed at a maximum turbidity of 50°F or higher per year.”

Zzz... Sheherazade’s head roughly jerked back, and her snores rang aloud the room. A satisfied smile appeared on Lloyd’s mouth.

Perfect.

Judging by how she fell asleep, it was obvious that the afternoon had been exhausting for her. Probably due to Javier’s strenuous sword lessons. Lloyd turned and looked at Javier, who was standing beside him, and then, he motioned a message with his hand.

“It’s over. Open your ears.”

Javier reacted to the hand motion by opening his ears which he had purposefully blocked off.

“Is it over?” asked Javier.

“Yeah. Why, did you want to listen to the lullaby as well?”

“No, not at all.” Javier shook his head with a serious look on his face.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled further up mischievously.

“Not at all? Really? Truly?”

“Yes, without a doubt.”

“Be honest with me. I know you want to listen to my lullaby. Right?” insisted Lloyd.

“Not at all.”

“Just imagine it. You fall into a nice, peaceful sleep. And as the soft lullaby fills your ears, you slowly travel to your dreamland where pain or stress doesn’t exist. Completely relaxed. You’re so relaxed that even the dead skin on your feet let loose. It’s soothing. Warm. Comfortable. Fluffy. Imagine it in your head. Wow. Doesn’t it sound awesome?”

“...”

“Hey, did you know your eyes slightly closed just now?”

“...”

“My, my. No need to force them open now.”

“...”

“And now, you’re glowering at me.”

“Haah… Come on.”

Javier finally let out a sigh. He hated Lloyd. Hated him so much. If only he could, he wanted to flick Lloyd on the forehead. He would have done so if the latter wasn't his young master. But now, he didn't have any time to dwell on it. The time to work had arrived.

"So, do I have to repeat what I did yesterday?" asked Javier.

"Uh-huh."

Javier immediately put aside his boiling rage toward Lloyd and calmly asked about his tasks for the day in a professional manner. Lloyd nodded.

"You'll see the markings I made in the afternoon."

"Should the size and slope of the tunnels remain the same?" asked Javier again.

"Yeah. It's all marked the same as yesterday. So, you can just follow them as they are."

"Noted."

Javier got up from his seat and took his sword. Just like the past few days, he wore a robust leather vest on a comfortable shirt and put on a mask that would protect his nose and mouth from the thick layers of dust.

"I suggest you take a break for a bit," suggested Javier to Lloyd.

"Yeah. You should be careful too."

"Yes."

Master Lloyd will come out after an hour or two of sleep like usual. So, my job is to dig the designated areas until he comes back and drill the grounds exactly the way they are designed. Javier walked out of the room thinking so, heading to the field where excavation was taking place to build the Qanat. As he traveled there, the events that had taken place came to his mind one by one.

Has it been two months already?

It had been two months since he arrived in this city. In the first month, he had to spend his time shut inside the room. His daily routine involved dealing with Sheherazade while Lloyd was out surveying and designing. Thankfully, she didn't bore him. Their fights offered him an adequate warm-up exercise and a source of stimulation to improve his swordsmanship. Meanwhile, Lloyd finished surveying the underground tunnels and designing the Qanat. He had shared with Javier that he managed to design a short underground tunnel that would connect the intake station, which would be built at the foot of the western mountain range, to this city. The distance between them was about 23 miles.

The last time I had a proper night of sleep was a month ago.

In the second month of his stay, sleep came rare. The reason was simple. In the afternoon, he was forced to confine Sheherazade as he sword-fought her. At night, he headed to the construction field and dug tunnels. The toil placed a heavy burden on him, leading him to feel extreme fatigue. He even sometimes felt dizzy, and it was the case even when he owned the manaheart of massive density that surpassed any ordinary sword masters and supplemented his lacking stamina using the Asrahan Core Technique. But he barely gave a hang about exhaustion. No, he was actually enjoying this situation. Even when there was a way of knocking her cold fast and taking some breaks, he forced himself to melee for several hours and strained himself on purpose.

In the end, just overcoming extreme fatigue will also serve as a form of training for me.

He wouldn't relax just because he was a sword master. He would push his Asrahan Core Technique to higher levels. For that, he had to resort to extraordinary methods. A half-hearted effort wouldn't suffice. Javier was painfully aware of that fact. He once pushed the limits of being human to become a sword master, and now that he was aiming higher, he had to completely break free from the shackles of man. He had to overcome all the obstacles in his way. He had to defeat them. Reach where no one had ever reached. He was challenging himself to a level no one had ever treaded or reached before. This was the transcendental level of power he was aiming for. So, he accepted that his current suffering and struggle were only natural. He resolved to push forward today like any other day and arrived at the construction site.

“I heard you can start the job from back there. Please follow me.”

Javier was guided by a man in the rebel group who was guarding the site. They walked the long path of the tunnel, and Javier spotted the traces of Lloyd’s work in the afternoon.

Master Lloyd is closing all the paths that won’t be used as the waterway.

Bricks and cement were noticeable throughout, blocking the path that was originally opened up. Javier postulated that it was to control the water inside the Qanat and prevent it from flowing elsewhere.

Master Lloyd must have put his nose to the grindstone all day.

To an untrained eye, those bricks and cement meant nothing. Just an object blocking the tunnel. But Javier was different. He had come to know how challenging waterproofing can get, thanks to his experiences in construction. The cement and brick walls looked simple to put up, but they were actually the results of hard work. They were the byproducts of countless geometrical calculations, careful deliberation, and seasoned experience. But it wasn’t only the design that was tricky. The construction part was the same. After all, a good design didn’t vouch for good results. That was why construction demanded much more care, effort, and deliberation than designing. First, the volcanic ash Bangul excreted must be gathered. Second, the cement must be mixed lest it cracks. Third, the size and angle of the bricks must be exact, not a single location or angle, or thickness wrong. No small gap or hole where water could leak into. Every process of stacking, plastering, and inspecting required thorough care.

I wonder where Master Lloyd learned all of this.

Master Lloyd was nothing but a party animal who liked to waste his years indulging in pleasure. Where did he learn these things without his and the Frontera family’s knowledge?

Once, he gave me an excuse that he learned everything in a mysterious school in his dream.

A memory popped into Javier’s head just then. It was probably around when Viscount Lacona messed up the river and Lloyd constructed the water system to deal with the contaminated river. Javier had asked Lloyd where he had learned of all these. Lloyd answered in a joking manner that he dreamed about it. In a dream, he became a student at a mysterious university and learned all of these about construction. That was how he could do these things.

Could it be that he wasn’t joking?

During that time, Javier thought Lloyd was throwing a joke to fool him. But now, such a ridiculous answer sounded plausible.

“This is it.”

The voice of the rebel broke Javier’s trance, and he looked up. He was already at the end of the tunnel and saw various half-transparent signs marked on the wall. The dots, lines, lines, and sides glowed in faint blue. It was the guideline Lloyd had left for Javier. And on the side, he spotted a note. It was a memo instructing about the job.

[I’m going to get some sleep while you dig this. Good luck.]

“…”

Should I go back and punch his face? Javier tightened his grip on the sword.

***

The Qanat construction continued. The process was similar every day. When the sun was down, Javier headed to the construction site and dug following Lloyd’s construction guidelines. A mana blast, precise and controlled, was blasted each time his sword shone. A 65-foot hole was dug in a flash. Its width was about 23 inches, and 3 feet in height. It was a narrow path suitable for only one person to pass through. It looked too narrow at first glance, but the fact was that the tunnel was dug to maximize the construction's efficiency and safety.

Of course. There's a higher chance of a collapse if the tunnel is dug wider than this.

The pressure inside the tunnel increased as it got wider. As a result, the chances of a collapse grew higher as the weight became too heavy to bear. That and Lloyd's goal to end this project as fast as possible were the reasons behind appropriately sizing the tunnels that would later become waterways. The tunnel sizes needed to meet only two criteria to be appropriate. The maximum size had to be independently strong enough to bear the load weight without any help from support structures, such as steel ribs, shotcretes, and rock bolts. At the same time, it had to contain enough space for a person to pass through for maintenance after the construction was complete. The result was a tunnel that was 23 inches in width and 3 feet in height. Of course, Lloyd had run a host of simulations before making this. He calculated the chances of each section collapsing after water flowed inside for several decades and centuries. He ran the tests countless times on the features of the soil and rocks existing in each section. Ultimately, it gave Javier even more work to do.

"Whew!"

The tunnel that was planned to be used as a waterway was too narrow. Javier had to squat down to move as it was not even 3 feet tall. And its 23 inches of width made it harder for him to turn around or use his sword. However, Javier, the Knight of Blood and Iron, didn't even grumble. He regarded this averse condition as another training exercise that would help him overcome his limits as a sword master.

Boom! Javier's mana blast extended the waterways with each burst. The extended channels connected with the main tunnel to create the shortest path possible. The connected waterways resembled underground capillaries. When Javier was finished digging through the night, Lloyd took up the baton and continued in the morning.

“Lalala! Lalalaa! Bangul!” exclaimed Lloyd.

“Bangul!”

Boom! Bangul’s volcanic ash was gathered and mixed into cement. And Lloyd closed several areas of the tunnel with cement and bricks to ensure the water didn’t take the wrong path.

If I don’t block them, it’s going to be a mess. If the water leaks somewhere odd and stagnates in a corner, it would become a breeding ground for germs.

Then the entire water of Qanat would be contaminated. In other words, the water that took so much pain to draw would become unusable. Thus, Lloyd tightly blocked every nook and corner of the underground tunnel that wouldn’t be used as a waterway. Just like that, the Knight of Blood and Iron blasted the tunnel while the Young Master sealed it. This process continued every day and night. Ten days. A fortnight. A month. Two months. The waterway that was first constructed near Kandara finally started to reach the foot of the mountain range in the west.

“Today, we are finally putting an end to this long construction project.”

On the day of the completion, Lloyd gathered Javier and the rebels in one place. He surveyed everyone at the upper ground of the mother well.

“It was not easy, but you all did a good job,” announced Lloyd in a serious voice.

A look of mixed emotions appeared on the faces of the rebels, including Termes. They had all worked together day and night covered in a thick layer of dust.

Of course. Without their help, the construction would have taken much longer.

Lloyd was grateful for the rebels. He wasn’t alone when he blocked the useless parts of the tunnels. These men had helped move all the cement and bricks, and it was they who transferred the excavated soil outside the tunnel. Aside from that, they drilled countless vertical holes that were 65 feet deep and 328 feet apart from each other, which would be used as a passage to go down to the waterways for future maintenance and repair.

They gladly took those jobs.

Construction wasn't a one-man job. It required a host of workers teaming up and working together. Sometimes, in the process, quarrels and conflicts arose, and they fought over negligible profits and losses. But eventually, they had to work as one to complete the construction. That was the nature of construction work. That was what construction was.

"We all gladly covered ourselves in the dirt for our work until now. And so, I think we should enjoy the final moment of this construction together."

"Do you mean that we shovel all together at the end of the waterway?" Termes asked after Lloyd finished his speech.

"No, that's not the case. It's going to be a disaster if we do that," said Lloyd as he faintly smiled.

"Hmm? Disaster? What do you mean-"

"We'll die."

Termes became speechless. The corners of Lloyd's lips pulled further up.

"I don't know if you know," explained Lloyd, "but only a bedrock that's about 10 feet wide stands in between the end of our waterway and this mother well. But you see, that mother well goes deeper than 98 feet underground. Accordingly, it possesses a large amount of water and pressure."

"Then if we burst the bedrock and connect the waterway-"

"Yes, you're right. The water stagnating in the mother well will burst, sweeping the inside of the waterway with tremendous water pressure. You can imagine what would happen to the last person who bore the tunnel."

Lloyd paused and motioned, slitting his throat with his hand.

“That’ll be the end of him.”

Lloyd was speaking the truth. The water pressure from connecting the waterway and the mother well was intolerable for humans. It would lead to immediate death, nothing more or less. So, the ancient laborers who actually created the Qanat were...

“Do you have any other method in mind?” asked Termes.

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded. Of course, he had something in mind.

“I just need one volunteer to sacrifice.”

That was what the ancient workers did in the Middle East. The oldest laborer met his final moment when the Qanat was constructed. He pickaxed with dignity and composure, connecting the waterway and mother well. Then he died, sacrificing himself to give clean water to future generations and his descendants.

“However, well, we don’t need anyone to die.”

That was also obviously the case. This was not the ancient Middle East. This world was different. There wasn’t any need to sacrifice a healthy individual. This would be especially true if there was an entity that could do the job for them without getting harmed.

“Right?”

Lloyd grinned as he looked at the back of the rebel guys, who all turned back following his gaze. And beyond the mound of rocks in the mountain foot appeared a skull of a skeleton soldier whose neck was stuck out forward. And it shook its bony hand at everyone, making a finger heart sign like it had learned from Lloyd the other time.

Crack! It was Turtle Neck, the leader of the Skeleton Corps, that traveled from Frontera fiefdom and crossed the mountains and deserts to meet Lloyd.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 196: Young Master Is a Top Gun (1)

Crack! Turtle Neck held out his hands and made a finger heart. Behind him appeared some more skeleton soldiers. They all followed their leader and shot a heart at everyone else. This was their way of expressing their joy of meeting Lloyd, their savior, for the first time in a while.

Whew... It was terribly difficult getting here.

Turtle Neck's third cervical vertebrae clacked. Just then, the long journey to get here crossed its mind. It must have been the following morning after Lloyd coldly left the fiefdom with the envoys.

"Boss!"

It happened in the morning when everyone woke up. They had been living in accordance with the construction schedule of the humans and the biorhythm marked in their marrows. It was around the time when they were soaking themselves under the sun, all dazed and blanked out, after opening their coffin lids. One of them raised its hand high, suddenly swaying its fingers and writing words in the air. A human would have had difficulty catching the meaning. But the rest of the skeletons understood in a breeze the meaning of its gesticulation. It was saying that it felt empty.

The rest of the skeletons nodded their skulls.

"Right. Me too."

"I feel the same. For some strange reason, I am agitated."

"I feel like the wind is blowing through my ribs."

"But it always has been like that."

"Oh, come on. I'm saying that's how I feel. You have no say when you have a smaller pelvis than me."

All the skeletons wrote something in the air. Some nodded. Some quarreled. But everyone expressed a similar sentiment. Later, Turtle Neck wrote a message in the air after observing them.

“I think I know why.”

“What is it? Do you know why, boss?”

“Tell us quickly.”

The rest of the skeletons stared at Turtle Neck like baby birds staring up at their mother. Turtle Neck clacked its lower jaw and laughed without any noise.

“It’s because Lloyd left us.”

“Oh! Ah...”

The rest of the skeletons nodded their skulls, and each wrote what they had to say.

“What must we do, boss?” one of them wrote hurriedly.

“Should we bear this emptiness until Lloyd comes back?”

“I don’t want to. I feel like I’ll develop osteoporosis at this rate.”

“Right. I can’t live like this.”

“Let’s do something!”

Their suppressed emotions burst out of them. The longing for their master and lifesaver, Lloyd. The emptiness due to his absence. They yearned to fill the hole in their hearts and find a solution. Turtle Neck struggled for some time to console its team.

“Come on now. Everyone, calm down. Getting all worked up is not healthy for your bones. You will lose your gloss, and your bones will age.”

“Then what do we do, boss?”

“I can’t say for sure. But I have an idea.”

“Tell us now!”

Everyone stared at Turtle Neck’s fingertip, and at last, it wrote its opinion in the air.

“We could go find Lloyd.”

“Oh! Oh!”

“But on one condition.” Turtle Neck wrote.

“Condition?”

“Yeah. I think it would be best if only a select few go find him.”

“Why? Why is that?”

Everyone cocked their skulls. Turtle Neck continued to write.

“Think about it. Lloyd is our master, so he isn’t afraid of us. And the people in this fiefdom heard from him about us, so they’re okay with us. But what about the others?”

“...”

“The moment they lay their sight on us, they will panic and go berserk. They will run away in fear or come attack us. Is that what you all want?”

“No, it’s not.”

“Therefore...”

Turtle Neck began to move faster.

“We must stay low and away from people’s sight as much as possible. But if 200 of us move all at once, the chance of being seen gets higher. That is why we should choose a few of us to look for Lloyd.”

“Are we going there to help Lloyd’s work?”

“Yes.”

Turtle Neck nodded once again.

“Lloyd should be constructing something somewhere. I don’t know why, but I just can feel it. He was always like that. But it hardly matters if he isn’t. Anyway, let us pick the elite among us. About 20. Only they will go find Lloyd and help him out. How does that sound?”

“What about the others?”

“We can’t do anything about them. They will have to be content with cheering on those who are selected to go.”

Turtle Neck adamantly expressed its opinion. There was no opposition. There was about a ten percent chance for a skeleton to be selected. If one got selected, it was set to meet Master Lloyd. If not, it was set to stay under the sun as its bones grew dry. But there wasn’t any other option. After all, their leader, Turtle Neck, was always right.

“Okay. I’m in!”

“Aye!”

“Let’s hurry, and pick who will go!”

Everyone agreed. The process of selecting the team was simple and swift.

“Okay, group into 20 and pick a leader. The leaders will do a fair game of rock, paper, scissors!”

“Paper!”

After several rounds and many groans, 20 skeletons were selected at last. They were Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and 18 other members.

“I leave the command to you Square Jaw while I am gone.”

“Aw... Okay, say hi to Lloyd for us, boss.”

“I will.”

Just like that, Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and 18 other skeleton soldiers picked up a shovel and left the Frontera fiefdom in the middle of the night. They didn't get lost during travel as they were bound to Lloyd by the Zombie Domination. Thanks to it, they could feel where Lloyd was as they moved.

“To the east!”

“Let’s goooo!”

They climbed the eastern mountain range. The journey wasn’t smooth sailing. A host of wild animals and monsters coveted their oily and nice-looking bones, particularly the pack of wolves that kept pestering them as they drooled. But the skeletons defeated them and safely climbed the eastern range until a wasteland without a drop of water appeared. The journey then turned out easy afterward. Why? They didn’t need any water in the first place.

“Wahaha! It’s so nice to bathe in the sun all day!”

They didn’t need any food or water. It went the same even if the desert spanned in front of them. This environment was way more comfortable because now, there was only a little risk of being seen by humans. Just like that, they traversed the desert. Sometimes, they had to travel past the oasis or villages. Even then, it wasn’t a problem. They simply spent their afternoon lazing around the dunes or pits. Even if people passed by, they simply clicked their tongues in pity, thinking that these skeletons must have belonged to those who perished after getting lost in the desert. With such cover and disguise, they kept traveling. There was one time when Lloyd's location suddenly changed.

"Ugh? Lloyd just passed over us!"

"What? Really?"

"I saw it! It was Lloyd! He flew away riding Ggoming!"

There was a stir among them for a while. The location of Lloyd they felt in the eastern desert suddenly changed to Magentano, but the fuss lasted only a while. From the western to eastern desert, Lloyd flew over them again. From then on, they dutifully continued treading their path until today all safe and well after a long journey, no one left behind. Of course, Lloyd, too, was feeling the movement of the skeletons due to his skill.

Oh, you precious little skeletons.

Lloyd swelled with pride and contentment as he gazed at Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and 18 skeleton soldiers that dared all the way to come here.

They don't demand food or fancy lodging. They don't get tired. They're skilled. Moreover, they don't even need to get paid! My, how can I not like you?

And not enough with that, they made it all the way here to lend a hand. How could Lloyd not cherish them? But such a sentiment wasn't shared by the rest of the rebels that looked at the Skeleton Corps.

"Eh?! Eh?"

"What is that?!"

Termes, the leader of the rebels, and the rest of the members were taken unawares. The appearance of Turtle Neck prompted them to raise their shovels and pickaxes by reflex. Hadn't Lloyd interfered at the right time, they would have charged at the skeletons.

“Woah, woah,” said Lloyd as he motioned with his hands. “Everyone calm down.”

Lloyd grabbed Termes’s shovel, and in a nonchalant face, he quickly turned around.

“Don’t be surprised. These friends of mine are very obedient,” said Lloyd.

“Those skeletons obey you...?”

“Yes.”

“Wait, are you a warlock?”

“Oh, no. I’m not.”

Lloyd’s smile turned more playful. “I have a backstory to this. Do you want to listen?”

“Oh...”

Termes and the others flinched in hesitation at Lloyd’s question, and their faces turned pale all of a sudden. It was because their minds flew back to the time when Lloyd talked for more than an hour when they kidnapped him. Termes shook his head quickly.

“No, no,” Termes said. “I don’t think I need to hear your explanation.”

“Right?” agreed Lloyd. “We are close enough to skip those formalities.”

“You are right. Yes, yes, of course,” said Termes as he plastered a hurried and awkward smile on his face.

Lloyd flashed a satisfied smile and said, “I am glad that you trust me. Anyway, they don’t bite. They won’t beat or hurt you. They are dutiful and nice, so they are obedient to me.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes, you see, they are regular workers of my fiefdom.”

More than that, they were star workers. With Lloyd’s introduction, Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and the rest of the skeletons carried their shovels on their shoulder bones with pride. Now that their appearance was explained, Lloyd spoke.

“Anyway, it’s a relief that the talent to penetrate the water vein of the waterway came just in time.”

Lloyd spoke and grinned, tapping Turtle Neck’s shoulder. Everyone’s eyes widened in surprise.

“Wait, are you saying that the skeleton soldiers will break the last vein of water?”

“Yes. That way, no one will die.”

It was obviously the case. Breaking a vein of water in the Qanat was extremely dangerous. How dangerous? The chance of dying was 100%. In other words, anyone who tried was guaranteed death. So, that was the reason why this step of construction was given to the oldest laborers in the ancient Middle East. No, it wasn’t given per se. They volunteered to give their lives away to provide the young ones and their descendants with clean water. But here? That wasn’t necessary.

“Turtle Neck and the others here will be assigned the vein water task.”

“I-is that okay for them?” mumbled Termes.

“Yes, well. But we should at least install a net downstream of the waterway. That way they don’t lose their bones.”

“...”

Everyone nodded, slightly overwhelmed. Just like that, the last operation was done. Several layers of nets and frames were installed downstream. Next, Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and the skeleton soldiers were brought into action.

“Okay, do you see the guideline direction from here?” asked Lloyd. “Just dig along the line.”

Crack! The skeletons nodded their skulls as they held up the shovels and pickaxes. Then they restlessly smite and dug bedrock. A long while later, at last, the vein of water exploded.

“...!”

Boooom! Water gushed out and its terrifying pressure disassembled the skeleton soldiers’ bones within a nanosecond, sweeping them away with a fierce current. Thankfully, every single joint was caught in the net. Even after that, the water continued to flow along the waterway.

Fwoosh! Past underground tunnels of the vast and desolate deserts, through the exactly calculated path, the water arrived at the destination. The end of the Qanat. The clean water flowed from the filtration plant that sat in a corner of Kandara. The water had melted from the permanent snowline in the mountain 23 miles away from the city.

“It’s water! There is water flowing out!”

People of Kandara shouted in excitement as the stream of water filled the filtration plant in no time. In truth, they didn't have much faith in Lloyd before and thought that he was nothing but the sultan’s stool pigeon. That was until the rebels came to clear the misunderstanding, telling them how Lloyd was actually a noble from a kingdom far west and came to solve the drought. They enlightened the people on what was happening.

But still, people remained skeptical about the part of drawing water to their homes. Drawing water from a distant mountain? They thought that it was impossible. A false hope. Such doubt dominated their hearts. After all, this place was abandoned even by their ruler, the sultan himself. The city administrator had long left this city to save his own life as well. And what? A young noble from a foreign country would come to help out? Everyone became united to not expect too much as it will only bring bigger disappointments. They were preparing themselves for the possibility of getting disappointed one day.

But it turned out they were wrong. Lloyd's bravado turned out to be true. Everything that he said happened. The cold water in their hands. The freshwater the city's mothers, daughters, fathers, and sons drank in relief proved so.

It's a relief.

Lloyd smiled in satisfaction as he gazed at the people who now had an infinite source of water amid the drought. But he didn't explicitly shout in happiness like the people. It was too early to dance in joy. He still needed to check the other destinations of the waterway.

The waterway of Qanat doesn't end here. I need to check them all.

Lloyd recalled the construction contract he had signed with the sultan. The contract promised to solve the drought in the entire Kandahar region using the Qanat. But this Kandara city was merely the central city of the region. It wasn't the entire region. And so...

That's why I didn't blindly close all the rebel's tunnels in the first place.

Lloyd only blocked the unnecessary areas after doing some careful calculations and running a simulation. And so, the waterway was designed to even flow into the small cities and villages of Kandahar region like spider webs or blood vessels.

"So, Termes, please come with me," suggested Lloyd.

"Where to?"

"To the small cities and villages."

The people there won't know yet about the existence of the Qanat. So, Lloyd needed to personally fly with Termes and explain to the people that clean water is now available through the rebels' underground tunnels and that they only have to draw water for drinking and farming. Lloyd would then be able to tell the sultan that he fulfilled the duties in the contract.

"Let us go then."

From then on, Lloyd traveled to the small cities and villages in the region, and it took well over three days. He enlightened the people in detail of the Qanat and how to use and manage it. The moment the final village was visited, a rewarding message appeared on Lloyd's eyes.

Ding dong.

[You have accomplished the great feat of connecting miraculous streams of water in the middle of the arid desert with your exceptional wits, bold negotiation skills, and accurate and persistent construction method.]

[The people of Kandahar region who have suffered from the prolonged drought praise you very much.]

[You have earned a new title.]

[A new title <Top Gun from the West> has been created.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 197: Young Master Is a Top Gun (2)

Ding dong.

[A new title <Top Gun from the West> has been created.]

Woo!

A series of messages appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes, and he secretly clenched his fists. He held a bounty of successful experiences and earned various accomplishments and titles from them. So this time, he had also been expecting a decent tribute to come out.

Rather, I'd be upset if these messages didn't appear before me anymore.

The construction took over a whopping four months, which meant that he had to give up his spring season in this scorching and arid desert. As such, it would be only natural to receive a reward. Lloyd's eyes rolled down in anticipation.

[Top Gun from the West]

[Title Level: Regional Hero Tale]

There's no water. We're thirsty. Sultan abandoned us. Even the administrator fled away. No help came our way. That seemed to be it. That seemed to be it without change. All may perish, but nothing will change. Everyone gave up. That was the reason. When a young master from a neighboring country woke us up When he gave us water stressing it was coming from him, What a strange man he is, we thought. What a creepy man he is, we thought. We never knew then. That this young master will never give up on us. That he would toil covered in the sand all day when the sultan and administrator abandoned us. So, what happened now? Allow me to ask you a question first. My dear customer, would you like some tea?

[Compliment Effect: You have become the lifesaver and hero of the entire region by solving the chronic drought that plagued the Kandahar region.

Your tale will spread to all corners of the desert. The shamans of desert tribes in the world bless your name with gratitude and respect. Thanks to it, you will not experience dehydration in any situation in the regions of the complement influence.]

[Title Region: All desert regions. All areas whose annual average climate is 104 °F and above.]

[Active Period of Title: 300 Years.]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 4]

[Current CP: 614]

Wow.

Lloyd exclaimed in pure amazement after reading the title description. He couldn't help it.

I'm immune to dehydration?

The title only worked in hellish deserts and other regions where the climate went above 104 °F on average. It would have been better if it included all regions instead of only the deserts but was still a tremendous skill. Dehydration. It was rare to find any other symptom that could take one's life away so easily.

Of course. We die when we lose about 12% of the water from our bodies. Furthermore, dehydration is not uncommon.

Vomiting and diarrhea from a nasty illness. Not drinking water after sweating much. Or getting lost in the desert. Any of those events could cause dehydration in the body. But now, Lloyd was immune to it, and he wouldn't die in the desert because of it at least.

Not only in the desert, though. I mean, I could fall in hell out of great misfortune, but even then, I'd be okay.

But, well, it was apparent such a thing wouldn't happen. Lloyd shrugged his shoulders and proceeded to focus on the joy of earning a new tribute. However, his joy didn't end there. Aside from the tribute message in front of his eyes, more praises and tributes continued to appear.

"Mister! Water!"

Right after Lloyd returned from teaching people in the small provinces how to use the Qanat, someone shouted at him as he entered the downtown. The voice belonged to a five or six-year-old child, who came sprinting toward Lloyd. And the boy held out the wooden cup to Lloyd.

Slosh! Half of the water splashed out, soaking Lloyd's pants.

"Eek?!"

Lloyd was surprised by the sudden splash, but he didn't blame the boy because the boy's eyes glimmered so brightly.

"Water!"

"You want me to drink it...?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes!"

"Is this mine?"

"Yes!"

The boy, whose blushed cheeks were full like a dumpling, continued to speak, his dark eyes glimmering all the more.

"Mom said! You gave Selim water!" the boy cried out.

"Oh, your name is Selim?"

“Yes!”

“Then Selim, are you gifting this water to me?”

“Yes! Mom said you must be thirsty too!”

“...”

Lloyd took the cup, which was almost empty, and slowly drank from it, feeling several gazes watching him. Countless people of Kandara were gathered and looking at him. Some with a content gaze. Some clapping. Each and everyone was expressing their gratitude and favor in their own way.

“...”

I just did what I had to do to achieve my goal, which was to start the talks and prevent war with the sultan kingdom, Lloyd thought to himself. He started this project to ensure a comfortable life for himself and no one else. So, he was unsure if he deserved this kind of treatment.

It’s strange. This feeling.

Lloyd was shy. At the same time, he was ashamed and apologetic. He particularly felt that way toward Termes and the rest of the rebels.

“You know... You should have been the ones to be applauded and praised by the people. Not me.”

Later that night, Lloyd expressed his feelings to Termes.

“Since you all have conducted various activities against the sultan who gave this region up. You funded and bought water for the people in need and endlessly worked to restore the wells abandoned by the regional administrators who ran away.”

Lloyd was telling the truth, but they actually did more than that. The rebels struggled hard to convince the regional emirs of the redistribution of the prosperity and wealth concentrated in Ahinsya and argued that the scattered regional military power must be brought together to press the sultan. They tenaciously clamored to get help from the emirs.

“But we weren’t able to provide water to the entire region like now,” Termes chuckled as he turned to Lloyd.

Termes was in traveling clothes now. But he wasn’t alone. The rebel executives and their families were all wearing robust traveling clothes. They loaded a handful of items needed for a long camelback journey as they were defecting to the Frontera fiefdom tonight.

“It is true that we tried,” said Termes. “But we failed to be as successful. So, you don’t have to apologize. We should be grateful instead.”

The corners of Termes’s lips pulled further up before continuing. “You gave the people in this region a new life. Not only that, you gave us a new land in your fiefdom where we can start anew. Everything you said when you were abducted all came true.”

“Termes,” said Lloyd.

“Thank you. You are our lifesaver. So...”

Flop. Termes got down on his knee, and the rest of the rebels did the same. Everyone then politely bowed their heads.

“I, the son of Murat Termes, and the people of Damieta Termes vow unchanging allegiance to you, Lloyd Frontera, until we breathe last.”

Woah.

There was no time to stop them. Termes got down on his knee in a flash and vowed his allegiance to Lloyd. Simultaneously, another message appeared in front of his eyes.

Ding dong.

[Damieta Termes has opened his heart to you.]

[The rebel leader of the sultan kingdom, Damieta Termes, vowed his allegiance to you.]

[Damieta Termes will forever be grateful to you and gladly follow you until your death.]

[From now on, you can increase likeability and earn RP from him.]

[50 RP has been rewarded for forming a new connection with another human.]

[Current RP: 2,755]

[Your likeability with Damieta Termes has increased by 11 points.]

[Current RP with Damieta Termes: +61]

[You have earned 77 RP by improving your relationship with a character.]

[Current RP: 2,832]

[Moreover, the likeability of the men and women of Damieta Termes, who vowed allegiance with him, will be included in the average likeability of all the Frontera fiefdom residents.]

Woah.

A title, likeability, and RP? Is it my birthday or something? Lloyd quickly pulled himself together, forcing down the corners of his lips that were pulling up to his ears. And laboriously ignoring Turtle Neck's message that real allegiance comes after death, Lloyd looked at Termes and the rest of the rebels.

"Thank you, everyone..."

When someone expresses or hands out something with a genuine heart, you must do the same. Or you must pretend to act so. That's the polite thing to do. So Lloyd accepted Termes's vow of allegiance in a serious expression, gaze, and voice.

“I will do my best to not let you all down as well,” said Lloyd solemnly.

“Lord...”

“The night will be cold. Be safe on your way back to Frontera fiefdom.”

“Yes, my lord,” said Termes. “We will leave first.”

“Yes. Turtle Neck?”

Crack! At Lloyd’s calling, Turtle Neck stepped forward fast.

“From now on, I want you and Skeleton Corps to guide them. You can do a good job, can’t you?”

Crack! Turtle Neck nodded its skull energetically. It and its team had already once traversed the desert, and such experience allowed them to completely master which road was risky and safe for humans. Moreover, Termes and the rest of the rebels had been born and raised in the desert. The reliable guide that was the Skeleton Corps. The travelers native to the deserts. The two were a wonderful combination. So, there wasn’t anything to worry about regarding their journey to the fiefdom. And just like that, the Skeleton Corp, Termes, and the rest of the rebels set out on their long journey. Lloyd finally sighed in relief as he felt a weight taken off his shoulder.

“Whew.”

Lloyd was used to receiving compliments from the messages, but it was a slightly different scenario to get praised in person by real people. It was uncomfortable and made him shy. He even felt embarrassed to a degree. His heart was eased when he shamelessly went around and showed off his charitable actions to the city’s people to get cooperation from the rebels.

But now that the stage is set, it’s really embarrassing to hear real praises. I’m not making any sense.

A wry smile escaped Lloyd, and soon, he headed back to his lodging again to get ready to leave for Ahinsya the next day. But when he got there, the string of praises that agonized Lloyd continued. The next up in line was surprisingly a member of the delegation the sultan had assigned to him.

“I sincerely respect you, Master Lloyd.”

“...”

What’s the deal with this man now? Lloyd wondered as he stood in the hallway of his room. Lloyd stared at the head of the delegation with a gutted face.

“Actually, I knew this from the beginning,” confessed the delegation head with a serious look on his face. He seemed to be early in his 40s. “How else could I not? That you are constructing with the help of the rebels here.”

“Oh... Did you?” mumbled Lloyd.

“Yes,” the delegation head said as he nodded. “We, too, have eyes and ears. So we contemplated about this matter whether we should stop and report you to the sultan that you joined hands with those that oppose him. But we didn’t. Actually, we thought we shouldn’t.”

“Why is that?” asked Lloyd.

“Since completing the Qanat you are working on will stabilize the lives of the people in this region, which will benefit the sultan in the long run.”

“I suppose,” replied Lloyd, “you saw turning a blind eye is a way to be loyal to the sultan in the grander scheme of things?”

“Business-wise, yes. But personally, no.”

“What do you mean about the latter?” asked Lloyd, intrigued.

“I personally came to respect you.”

...Cough!

“I respect you, Master Lloyd.”

“Ah... I understand. You know, you can let go of your hand...”

“Can I hold them for ten more seconds? I want to tell proudly tell my son about how I held the hands of a wise man once I get back to Ahinsya.”

“Suuure...”

He got goosebumps all over his body. It was more than toe-curling. His hands, feet, neurons, and every hair and cell in his whole body curled in embarrassment. But Lloyd held up, pushing himself with sheer willpower, and endured the uncomfortable and shiny gaze this middle-aged man was shooting at Lloyd. Making things worse, Lloyd even signed the autograph when the latter held out a piece of paper.

Oh, crap. Why is it that I keep being liked by smelly old men? Come on.

Case in point, Lloyd had a group of father-in-law candidates who wanted him as their son-in-law. It was also the case for the men who bore their hearts out so easily and told him that they respect him. The more he thought about it, the deeper he was plunged into sorrow.

With the same thought in his mind, Lloyd and the others left Kandara the next day while the people cheerfully saw them off. And for several days, Lloyd lived through the coldness of the desert at night and rode camelback for several days until he arrived at Ahinsya, the capital of the sultan's kingdom. But Lloyd’s popularity didn’t dwindle here. The most powerful man among the father-in-law candidates was waiting in the palace.

“How come you are not my son-in-law...?”

Sultan Samarkhan, with a fiery gaze and gritting teeth, demanded Lloyd when the latter went to the palace to give a report on the Qanat construction.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 198: A Cunning Man’s Survival Tactic (1)

“How come you are still not my son-in-law...?”

“Your Majesty...?”

The sultan’s question sounded like a blaze of fire as it rang beneath his throne. Shocked, Lloyd almost jerked his head up and committed the mistake of looking at the sultan. Lloyd swallowed.

What the heck? This guy’s more uptight than I thought.

He couldn’t help but form such ideas about the sultan because, after all, he came to report the good news that the construction was over and that the Kandahar region was free from drought. But here came the sultan, spewing this nonsense as soon as he laid his eyes on Lloyd.

How should I answer this?

Lloyd was flustered and wondered how he should respond to the sultan’s overly straightforward question. What reaction would save him from this distressing situation? Around the time Lloyd was thinking deeper about the matter...

“What are you so surprised about?”

Lloyd heard the sultan chuckling.

“Lloyd Frontera, the son of Arcos Frontera, what ruler in this world would discover a talent like you and not become greedy after finding out you are unmarried?” said the sultan.

“Oh...”

“I was expressing my wish. That is it. I presume you did not like my daughter very much.”

“Did you notice that I figured it out already, Your Majesty?”

“She told me the details.”

“...”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut. It looked like Sheherazade had already met with the sultan and reported everything as soon as she was back.

I hope she didn’t twist the story in her favor.

Lloyd remained silent, feeling antsy.

“An affair between a man and a woman,” the sultan went on, “cannot be forced if they do not see eye to eye regardless of what I think. Therefore, I simply spoke my wish out loud, so do not be too bothered.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“You can be grateful to Your Majesty in your kingdom, not me.”

“...”

Lloyd suddenly felt he was getting scolded. However, to his relief, the sultan didn’t stay on the subject for long.

“Now,” the sultan said, “let’s discuss more important matters. Have you completed the Qanat?”

“Yes, oh, great and omnipotent sultan.”

Lloyd, who direly wanted the subject to change, answered swiftly without missing a beat.

“After four months of construction, I was able to draw water from the foot of the mountain. It was all thanks to my efforts as I strove hard to fulfill the contract with the great and omnipotent sultan. Moreover, thanks to it, Kandara and most villages in the Kandahar region are supplied with water. Again, it was all thanks to my efforts as I strove hard to fulfill the contract with the great and omnipotent sultan.”

“So, the credit is due to your effort...?” asked the sultan, his voice slightly dumbstruck.

“I simply strove hard to fulfill the contract with the great and omnipotent sultan.”

“It sounds like you are warning me to fulfill our contract terms,” the sultan accused.

“How could a mere peasant as I dare do that, Your Majesty?”

“I think you are.”

“Not at all, Your Majesty,” denied Lloyd persistently. “As the great and omnipotent sultan is great and omnipotent, I have no inkling of doubt that Your Majesty will easily fulfill the contract terms Your Majesty made with a worthless man like me. Given that, there is no need for me to voice such a ludicrous statement.”

“I see... You are telling me to sit at the negotiation table with the Magentano envoys.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk.”

Sultan Samarkhan clucked his tongue. What a competent and shameless fellow Lloyd was! And yet, he couldn’t hate Lloyd. It was the opposite. He wanted Lloyd even more.

How wonderful it would be if he were my son-in-law.

If Lloyd became his son-in-law, he thought about making the former his right-hand man and using all his talent to change the future of the sultan kingdom.

Alicia Termina Magentano. I wonder why that foolish woman isn’t actively using such a talented man.

Samarkhan wished that she would hand over Lloyd to him if she was going to waste his talent. He couldn't suppress the thought of it. That was how direly the sultan wanted Lloyd, who solved the drought in the Kandahar region. Not only that, there was the detailed report of Sheherazade and the delegation that went there with Lloyd.

I heard he received cooperation from the rebels. And after bringing the project to success, he even sent the rebels to an area my powers can't reach.

The sultan almost clapped in amazement when he heard the report. That was how perfectly Lloyd did his job. Lloyd, the rebels, the people of Kandahar, and the sultan himself all benefited from his actions. It was that aspect of Lloyd that the sultan liked.

He's not just good at his job or intelligent. He's different from those that learned about the world through books.

His plan would've been impossible for mere bookworms to execute. It could only be done by someone who suffered through the tribulations of life. The sultan's eyes held a glint of desire as they looked at Lloyd. But it soon disappeared to be replaced with a heavy gaze befitting his status as the desert's ruler.

"I see," said the sultan, his voice now sounding like a ruler of the deserts. "The exchange between us was a clear promise and contract. Since you fulfilled your part, it is now my turn. I declare that I will meet the Magentano envoys tomorrow."

"I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty."

"I told you. You should be grateful to Your Majesty in your kingdom, not here."

The sultan then chuckled and told Lloyd to leave now. After Lloyd was gone, the sultan glanced at the place where Lloyd was a moment ago.

"..."

Samarkhan felt bad that Lloyd was leaving. He was regretful seeing Lloyd slip out of his hands like this. So...

Let’s give it one more try.

The sultan nodded to himself slowly, and his eyes gradually reflected determination.

***

The sultan fulfilled his promise the following day. The negotiation took off, and Count Ventura entered the palace with a grim look on his face. The palace was unusually calm and quiet that day. There was something different about its atmosphere, something different from the usual air of somberness. Everyone waited for the results with bated breaths. Only the sultan and the envoy's head entered the room. The others waited in anxiety about what would happen once the room doors opened up. The delegation. The sultan’s officials. The people of Ahinsya. Everyone felt the same except for one person.

“Master Lloyd, I suppose you are not too concerned.”

“Uh-huh.”

Lloyd nodded his head earnestly as if any other reaction was strange. Then he sucked the straw in his mouth hard. Slurp!

The juice of the coconut, which only grew in the nearby regions of Ahinsya, flowed through the straw to enter his mouth. It was sweet and sour. Salty and nutty. Cool and refreshing.

“This is what life’s about!”

The taste was too good not to let out an exclamation. The fruit cost one gold ring to just buy one, and the taste reflected its price. It made sense why even the royal emirs sparingly enjoyed this high-end and exquisite fruity flavor.

If I were to compare, I’d say this tastes similar to fresh, fizzy Coke.

Lloyd couldn’t believe that he could get the taste of such a beverage in this world. He eyed the coconut as his heart overflowed with emotion. Then he licked his lips in regret that he couldn’t have this back in his fiefdom.

“Why should I care about the negotiation?” blurted Lloyd, “I’d rather drink this stuff to my heart’s content before I go back home. Don’t you think so?”

“No, I do not think so.” Javier frowned pathetically at Lloyd. “This negotiation can alter the history of the kingdom. If it goes wrong, a war could break out. So, I say it is only right that you care for it.”

“But what good will it do?” asked Lloyd innocently.

“Excuse me?”

“It’s not like I can butt in this negotiation. And the result is obvious, so what’s the point?”

“How is it obvious?” said Javier as he cocked his head.

Lloyd grinned. “It will go well. Inevitably so.”

“How can you be so certain?”

“The sultan no longer has the reason to wage war.”

It was true. The sultan had been anxious to the bone about his people turning their backs against him due to the drought that plagued the Kandahar region. He had intentionally decided to start a conflict with the Magentano kingdom to shift the public’s attention elsewhere. But now, the situation had changed.

“I found the solution to their drought,” drawled Lloyd, “and though it’s really up to the sultan how things will go down the road, right now, there’s little worry about people turning their back against him. From the sultan’s perspective, there’s no reason to go as far as to wage a diplomatic conflict and war.”

“Then...”

“It’s most likely that he will acknowledge his responsibility for the Monster Domino incident,” said Lloyd.

A brow lifted on Javier’s face. “Then can I ask you one more thing?”

“Yes, what is it?”

“If the conclusion was so obvious to them, there seems to be no reason for the talk to draw out this long. Why do you think it is taking half a day?” asked Javier.

“That, too, is simple.”

The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled further up. “They are probably bargaining. I mean over things like how much liability the sultan will accept, the exact amount of compensation, and whatnot. Moreover, it reflects better on them to do this rather than cut the negotiation short.”

“Reflects better?” asked Javier.

“The sultan’s reputation. If the talk ends too soon, it will leave an impression to the people that the sultan GGed... No, that he easily surrendered,” explained Lloyd, correcting his words. “I wouldn’t be shocked if they’re sipping tea inside after they have already finished adjusting their agreement. That way, as the talk drags out, the sultan’s reputation will improve all the more to the public.”

“Is that so?” asked Javier.

“Yeah. So, as for us, we should just drink more of this.”

Lloyd spoke as he held up the expensive coconut.

“This is super expensive and all on the great and omnipotent sultan. One more thing, we can’t drink this even if we want to once we’re back home. You can ship it there, but I assure you, it’s not going to taste the same.”

“...”

“What are you doing? Come on now. Drink up!” Lloyd urged.

“...”

Taking the coconut Lloyd rashly held out, Javier let out a sigh. He sighed at length again when he saw Lloyd gulping on the coconut juice like a beggar who had gone hungry for months. This young master he served... Sure, the man was smart. But honestly, Javier was ashamed of him when he acted like this, being all materialistic.

Disliking Lloyd’s behaviors, Javier asked, “Can we not have an ordinary meal instead of something like this?”

“Eh?” asked Lloyd as he removed the straw from his mouth.

“It is time for a meal.”

“That’s why I ordered this.”

“...”

“They’re not giving us food today,” informed Lloyd. “I canceled everything and told them to only bring a bunch of this fruit.”

“Why did you do that?” asked Javier in annoyance.

“I told you. You can only drink this here. It’s super expensive.”

“Haah... Seriously...”

Javier could not help but sigh. Eventually, he spoke, giving up.

“Then I shall have only one since I cannot skip my meal.”

He was hungry, and it was time to eat. Though he didn’t particularly want it, Javier grabbed one coconut with the intent to put something in his stomach and have a taste for politeness' sake. Then he put his mouth to the straw and slurped. One sip. Two sips. Three sips. He slurped and slurped again. Before he knew it, the coconut was empty.

“Hey, you finished it in one chug.”

“...”

Lloyd giggled at him. It was only when Javier saw Lloyd’s face what he had done. But it was too late.

“You want one more?”

“...”

“No?” said Lloyd as he looked at the fruit. “Then I’ll have-”

“Give it to me, Master Lloyd.”

Thwack! Javier Asrahan, the historical hero of The Knight of Blood and Iron. He, too, helplessly was a young man in his 20s who couldn’t resist the taste of coke he experienced for the first time in the coconut juice in front of him.

***

The negotiation with the sultan and the envoy ended in the evening.

“It is done. We have succeeded at last.”

Count Ventura entered the reception hall, his face flushed red. The rest of the delegation jumped to their feet.

“How did it go, Your Excellency?” one of them asked.

“You are smiling. Does that mean...” another asked simultaneously.

“Yes, it is right.”

Count Ventura beamed as he turned around and faced everyone.

“The sultan accepted our demands. Every one of them.”

“All of them?”

“Is that true?!”

“Hahaha! Do you not trust me? As I said, it was a complete success. The sultan acknowledged that he is responsible for the Monster Domino incident. Not only that, he has agreed to all our terms for compensation. On top of that, he even offered to cooperate on one more term.”

“What do you mean by that, Your Excellency?”

Everyone’s ears jerked up. It was the same with Lloyd, who was tapping his belly filled with coconuts in the corner of the reception hall.

An additional term? The sultan agreed to it?

That was strange. He could have just accepted his responsibility for the incident and provided compensation. It was strange that he went out of his way to make an offer that the envoys didn’t even ask for.

Why would he do that?

Lloyd was curious, so he inched closer to hear the conversation better. Count Ventura continued to speak.

“Ahaha. Now, do not doubt a single thing I say here. The sultan has even signed an agreement that promises the prevention of incidents like the Monster Domino from reoccurring. Do you see what I mean? The sultan has willingly put aside his authority during the diplomatic negotiation and offered his genuine apology.”

“Oh, oh!” one of them cried out.

“Is that true?!”

The confident announcement of Count Ventura excited the entire members of the delegation. And it probably was the reason why Lloyd, who was observing the scene from a corner, suddenly felt his stomach flip over and the coconuts coming back up.

A prevention agreement? That man did what? He was generous enough to sign that? Hold on. Shoot. Could he be...

A bad feeling gripped Lloyd, sending chills down his spine. At that moment, Lloyd jumped to his feet and rushed off to his room so fast no one could stop him, and at lightning speed, started to pack to flee that very night.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 199: A Cunning Man’s Survival Tactic (2)

Rustle! Crumple! Lloyd’s hands became busy as they chucked clothes, gloves, boots, and bandanas into his bag, as well as some food and a water container. He never spoke a word while he crammed his bag as though he didn’t have a minute to waste. In a ferocious and feverish manner, he engrossed himself in packing.

“What... are you doing?” asked one of the delegations who came over.

Lloyd looked up to catch a glimpse of the one who called him and replied, “As you can see, I’m packing.”

“Packing?” he asked further. “Packing for what?”

“It’s for when I run away tonight,” said Lloyd, pausing for a second.

“Run away...?”

“Yes.”

Rustle, rustle. Crumple, crumple. Lloyd resumed packing after giving his answer. Meanwhile, everyone who was laughing joyfully in the reception hall started to pay attention to Lloyd’s room, which was just adjoined in one corner of the hall.

“Why would you flee in the middle of the night? What do you mean, Lloyd?”

At last, Count Ventura walked over and asked.

Lloyd glanced at the count with a wry smile on his face. “It’s exactly as I said, Your Excellency. What else would I mean by running away?”

“Run away? Run away from here? Tonight?” asked the count again.

“Yes.”

“But why would you do that?”

“That’s because I found a need to do so just now,” answered Lloyd nonchalantly.

Even when he was answering, his hands kept moving. He packed rice oil to use against the desert sun and a blanket to get himself through the freezing night.

“Your Excellency,” Lloyd added, “didn’t you tell everyone earlier that the talk went much better than you expected?”

“I did.”

“That is why.” Lloyd continued to speak. “You said that the sultan admitted his responsibility for the Monster Domino incident, agreed to our demand for compensation, and willfully suggested and signed an agreement to prevent something like this from happening ever again, right?”

“Yes, as we already know,” agreed the count, still not getting Lloyd. “Is that a problem?”

“Yes. But only to me.”

A wry smile appeared on Lloyd again, who was still packing.

“The sultan isn’t a generous man. He’s not a fool anymore. Considering that, he must have an ulterior motive to agree with all our negotiation terms.”

“Wait... Are you saying that what the sultan wants has something to do with you?” asked Count Ventura.

“Yes. I know it’s hard to believe,” dismissed Lloyd.

“No, I believe you. Do elaborate.”

Count Ventura’s eyes grew serious. He now had complete trust in Lloyd’s competence. How else could he not? Without Lloyd, the negotiation would’ve never happened. Their diplomatic success from today would’ve been unimaginable.

And now, these were the words coming from Lloyd, the man behind this stellar accomplishment. The count couldn’t thoughtlessly dismiss his concerns.

“I do not know about the others, but I will believe what you say. Please elaborate for me.”

“Yes, Your Excellency. Thank you for your words.” The wry smile on Lloyd’s face deepened. “This is purely a guess, but I think the sultan is trying to hold me down in this kingdom.”

“Hold you down?”

“That’s right, Your Excellency. The sultan wants me to be his son-in-law.”

“Huh…?” The count seemed unconvinced.

“It is the truth,” emphasized Lloyd, “The sultan already assigned one of his daughters as my guard when I traveled to the Kandahar region.”

“Is that so?” The count lifted his brow.

“It happened, Your Excellency. I said nothing about it because it was a personal matter and something not to disclose so publicly.”

“I see,” the count observed. “What you are saying is that the sultan has agreed to all our conditions because he wanted to make you his son-in-law?”

“I reckon he did.”

“But why?”

“To parade his generosity,” said Lloyd expressionlessly.

“Generosity, huh.”

“All of this,” defended Lloyd, “is my personal thoughts on the matter. The sultan must want to emphasize himself as a virtuous ruler with a big heart. If my guess is right-”

“What would happen?” interrupted the count.

“He will summon me to his palace as soon as the sun rises tomorrow.”

“Is it so he can show off his generosity and virtue to you?”

“Yes. and on top of that, he will try to assign me additional work.”

The count tilted his head for clarification at Lloyd’s words.

“Work? But what if you turn him down?”

“He will pressure me, threatening to overturn the results of today’s negotiation.”

Lloyd’s toneless answer caused the count’s mustache to twitch.

“Overturn the diplomatic agreement over one man? Are you suggesting that the sultan is that covetous of you?” The count’s voice dripped with doubt.

“Well, it is uncomfortable to say it out loud. I know it sounds highly implausible. But the more I think about it, I’m troubled as such an outrageous situation seems to be coming true.”

Now, the wry smile on Lloyd’s face couldn’t get any deeper. He was agitated as the ludicrous scenario in his head was turning into reality. And what was more agitating was that his speculation was aligned with what he saw during his time with the sultan so far.

That sultan was obsessive though he tried to act cool on the outside.

It was the same last night. Lloyd had visited the palace to report to the sultan about the construction of the Qanat, but the latter explicitly expressed his desire to have Lloyd. And now he did what? Unnecessarily decided to be extremely generous during their negotiation?

Perhaps. Maybe. A strong gut feeling that the sultan would summon and pressure Lloyd gripped him hard. He was afraid that the sultan would use their negotiations as blackmail. Take up the job I have for you! Or I'll break the deal once and for all. The fault is yours if that happens. Lloyd was afraid that the sultan would frame and accuse him of something completely outrageous. Should that happen, what could Lloyd possibly do?

I'll have no choice but to accept his terms. That will be the only way for the deal and peace to be maintained. I have to prevent my fiefdom from getting involved in a war.

Once he fell into the sultan's hands...

I'll be trapped. Would the sultan let me goal after one more project? That's a funny joke. He would never. I'll be assigned more work one after another. That's how he plans to trap me here.

If that happened, it was game over for him. He'd be stuck in this place, getting seduced by the sultan into being recruited. And give it a few years, he would fool himself that living in this place wasn't so bad. That was how he would end up.

I know this is a baseless hunch, but I always end up being right about these kinds of things.

His past experiences gave him a pretty good intuition, especially from when he lived in a room rental. There were times when he was slightly short on rent because his wage was pushed back. He could only pay a few days after his rent due date. When this happened, Lloyd's course of action was important.

I had to figure out the manager's movement patterns. I even had to sense whether the manager was near based on other people's changes in voice tones or behavior.

The case in point was when he headed to the communal bathroom at the end of the hallway or to the communal kitchen for some ramen. If he failed to catch on to people's gestures and bumped into the manager, he would be scolded for not paying his rent. Then Lloyd had to plead with him to wait a few more days with the saddest expression he could muster. In short, his life experiences had sharpened his senses, and that tingly sense was on alert right now.

Ugh... I hate it.

Lloyd's shoulders trembled as he imagined a future where he was swept up in the sultan's artifice. Quickly shaking off his chills, he spoke.

"So, if the sultan plans on forcing his will on me, then I should respond in the same manner. That is, using the swiftest, simplest, and most efficient method."

"And that is why you are running away in the middle of the night?"

"Yes. After all, my job here is done anyway. Even if I'm wrong and the sultan doesn't look for me, I lose nothing from leaving tonight."

That was equally true. He lost nothing by rushing off. If he was correct, he was outwitting the sultan. If not, he lost nothing.

"As such, Your Excellency, please do me a favor," asked Lloyd.

Thump. Lloyd swiveled around now that he was done packing. Slinging his bag over his shoulder, he flashed a smile at the count, and the latter found himself nodding in spite of himself.

***

The next day, Count Ventura was sent to the palace first thing in the morning. Technically speaking, Lloyd was the one summoned, but the count went on Lloyd's behalf to entertain the sultan.

"Dear Count Ventura, why are you here when I called for someone else?"

The palace was tiled with sleek black marble. The sultan's voice was mixed with wonder and complaint at the same time. Count Ventura swallowed and thought to himself...

That young man from the Frontera family was correct about his prediction.

The count recalled what Lloyd had said the previous night, how the sultan would summon him to the palace the following morning. It appeared that his prediction was on point.

What a smart fellow he is.

A smile escaped the count, and he remembered what Lloyd requested before rushing off.

“The reason I arrived here in response to your order is simple, Your Majesty,” Count Ventura said.

“Simple? Do enlighten me, the head of the Magentano delegation.”

“Oh, yes, Your Majesty. Lloyd Frontera, the man whom you summoned this morning, is currently traveling back home,” politely announced the count.

“What…?”

The sultan paused. Count Ventura continued to speak.

“To be honest, Your Majesty, to everyone’s misfortune, Lloyd Frontera has contracted a serious disease. Judging that it is due to his prolonged stay in a foreign country, it was only right for him to be sent home ahead of everyone else.”

“You do not dare argue that he left to recover at home, are you?”

“Your Majesty, it is with regret to inform you that he was in urgent need of recuperation at home.”

“Do you possibly think that I will believe your excuse?” huffed the sultan.

“It is regretful to say-”

“Forget it. That is enough,” broke in the sultan as he swayed his hand. A bitter smile appeared on the sultan.

Lloyd Frontera. Did he see through my intentions?

It was regretful. He had agreed to most of the terms demanded by the Magentano delegation on purpose and meant to use it as a pretext to assign Lloyd to new projects. According to his plan, he was going to use the deal as blackmail if Lloyd rejected his proposal. The sultan meant to tie him down here under duress and make Lloyd his official.

He predicted my intentions simply by seeing the negotiation results. And he rushed off in the middle of the night using his health as an excuse?

What a sly and sneaky person he was! The sultan couldn't help but smile in bitterness the more he thought about it. At the same time, he raised his white flag and accepted defeat.

I lost. I was defeated. How could I bring back an official of another kingdom when he returned to recover from an illness?

The sultan could summon Lloyd back, but that would be overstepping his authority. He could also put a bounty on the man, but that would be detrimental to his public image. He would become a ruler who prevented a sick man from resting. And what if he went further and threatened to scrap the diplomatic agreement unless this sick man accepted more work? His plans would be made open to the world. Moreover, that would also trouble Lloyd at the same time because taking up his offer would be the same as announcing that Lloyd was against the Magentano kingdom. So, in short, it was risky for both him and Lloyd.

Ha.

Lloyd managed to sabotage his plan by vanishing in thin air during the night. He even made it so no one could gain anything from each other anymore. Lloyd designed a situation wherein no one needed each other.

This is exactly why I cannot stop coveting him.

Dumbfounded, the sultan finally burst into laughter and beckoned Count Ventura to leave. And all alone on the throne, he fell into deep thought about the matter.

I will quietly let you go this time. But do not think you can avoid me forever.

Lloyd Frontera. I am going to make you mine one day. Whether I make you my son-in-law or bestow to you power equal to a prince, I will make use of your abilities to create a foundation that will advance the kingdom for a thousand years. The sultan resolved over and over again. But at this moment, there was something the sultan was completely oblivious of.

Everything became bleak and hazy as he burned with passion to recruit Lloyd. It was only the next day when he realized that his greatest talent had left his presence and set off on a long journey to meet Lloyd.

“What...? Sheherazade? She is gone?”

The girl with the most potential among his children. The daughter was set to become a sword master. The sultan clutched the back of his neck as he took the letter she left for him.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 200: A Cunning Man’s Survival Tactic (3)

The following morning rolled around.

Whew. Goodbye to this place. Finally.

Count Ventura tearfully looked up at the sultan’s palace that had grown on him.

I never expected to stay this long.

It had been almost five months since he arrived here at the order of the queen. At the time, he thought he would negotiate with the sultan in no time. But he realized that wasn’t the case when he set foot on the land. Their reaction was poles apart from what he expected. He was intentionally ignored and deprived of proper treatment. What would have happened if Lloyd, the eldest son of the Frontera family, didn’t take the matter into his own hands?

We would still be far from getting into a negotiation.

His delegation would still be bearing the ongoing ignorance and mistreatment. The deal with the sultan would still be unimaginable. Otherwise, they might have had to return home empty-handed unlike now.

I am relieved. I am truly relieved.

The negotiation was a huge success. If they went back home now, they would be commended by the queen.

And it’s all thanks to Lloyd, that young fellow.

Was Lloyd able to slip out of Ahinsya unharmed? Had he succeeded in safely running away from the sultan last night? The count was anxious for a second. But a chuckle soon escaped him. Seeing that he hadn’t heard anything about the matter, it was safe to assume that Lloyd didn’t get captured, at least. Moreover, judging from the atmosphere of the palace, something bigger must’ve happened than a member of a foreign delegation going missing.

“I heard something happened last night. Is that true?” asked the count expressionlessly.

“Yes, Your Excellency. It appears it is.” A senior envoy nodded. “There was a stir in the palace all morning. So, I quietly asked someone I was acquainted with.”

“What did your acquaintance say?” said the count, interested.

“One of the princesses has gone missing.”

“A daughter of the sultan has gone missing?” emitted the count, his eyes widening.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Was she kidnapped?”

“I do not think so. It seems...”

“That what?” hurried the count, disliking the man’s hesitation.

“She left the palace on her own,” finally finished the man.

“Ha...? Then she ran away from home?”

“That is right, Your Excellency.”

“Huh! Hahaha.”

Count Ventura burst into laughter. A princess who ran away from the sultan’s relentlessly secure palace?

That explains the unsettling mood here.

The count nodded. Truly, the sultan’s palace was different from usual. There was something unsettling about it even when the Magentano delegation was leaving the palace. The sultan didn’t even escort them out, let alone give them a grand farewell.

But it is fine since I did not expect either in the first place.

Plus, the disappearance of the sultan’s daughter had absolutely nothing to do with him and his delegation.

“Let us get going right away.”

Count Ventura led the delegation, leaving the palace at the modest farewell of officials of the palace. Soon, they were out of Ahinsya and took the path back home. Their journey was smooth and safe. They passed the same course of direction and city they used to travel to Ahinsya. Taking only the safest route in the desert, they finally crossed the border. And that night, they joined Lloyd and Javier, who were waiting for them near the border.

“Have you been waiting long?” queried the count, who was glad to see Lloyd.

“Ah, to be honest, yes, quite a bit.”

Lloyd, who was camping beneath the tent set up between the boulders in the wasteland some distance away from the border, shrugged and glanced around in happiness at Count Ventura and his delegation.

“You all safely made it out with no one dying at the hands of the sultan. I am very relieved,” stated Lloyd.

“Hahaha. Yes, that is a relief. You see, unlike someone else, we are not coveted by the sultan.”

“Hmm?” mused Lloyd as he narrowed his eyes. “Your words seem to carry a sting, Your Excellency.”

“How can it not?” said Count Ventura with a smile. “I am being nice now, considering how much you made me sweat...”

“Is that so, Your Excellency?”

“Yes, of course,” assured the count. “Even now, when I think about the sultan’s expression and gaze after he heard that you contracted a disease and returned home... Whew.”

“You must have had a hard time.”

“It was nothing compared to how you rushed off in the middle of the night with barely any preparations,” consoled Count Ventura. “How are you? I hope the trip wasn’t too difficult.”

“Thankfully, it wasn’t bad,” replied Lloyd with a shrug. Then he pointed at Javier with his chin. “It’s thanks to that fellow. The presence of a swordmaster is undeniably useful.”

It was true. The night he decided to leave Ahinsya, the best tool he had packed was Javier. The sword master. If anybody pursued and tried to capture him, Javier was capable of breaking through the siege and escaping by force. And what if he faced a monster in the desert or wilderness?

“That is a fearsome monster in the desert. However, it has become my lunch now.” Lloyd was happy to be able to mumble those words. What was more, the title “Top Gun from the West” he had earned recently was extremely effective.

I can’t experience dehydration under any circumstances. This is true within all desert surfaces and areas with an average annual temperature of 104 °F and above.

Lloyd was skeptical at first and wondered if it would work. However, as he traversed the desert, he soon realized that this was one of the best skills he would have gained, at the very least, for this place.

I wasn’t dehydrated even when I tap-danced under the scorching sun all day.

Javier, who was crossing the desert with Lloyd, didn’t hide his shock from him. Even a sword master like him was gradually getting tired. So, how was Master Lloyd perfectly fine? As Javier shot such a question, Lloyd smugly retorted back with a piece of advice.

“Dude, it’s all about willpower. Your willpower.”

Anyway, thanks to the title, rushing off in the middle of the night turned out to be unexpectedly easy. There wasn’t any problem while they were waiting for the delegation to arrive either.

“Anyway,” Lloyd went on, “I am truly glad to see you all safe and unharmed.”

“The feeling is mutual. Oh, and...”

Count Ventura smiled in satisfaction after pausing.

“I haven’t shown my appreciation for you until now. This comes late, but let me say it at this time. I truly thank you,” confessed the count.

“Oh, thank you, Your Excellency.”

“No, the gratitude is ours. I was wrong to regard you as materialistic at first.”

“Haha. But I am materialistic,” corrected Lloyd without any sense of shame in his voice.

At Lloyd’s banter, the count recoiled and shook his head. “No. You are not. You are our savior. Without you, the negotiation with the sultan would have been impossible. No one among us thought of splurging the Padashar to grab the sultan’s attention. Moreover, the construction you completed after signing a contract with the sultan, the...”

“You mean the Qanat?”

“Yes, the Qanat. I know that was what opened the negotiation table. If your construction wasn’t a success, we could have never even dreamed of negotiating with the sultan.”

The count spoke from his heart. It was true. While Lloyd was gone to the Kandahar region for the Qanat construction, the count initially believed the talk would come through after some months of waiting. But as days passed, he found that wasn’t the case. One month. Two months. Four months. Through his stay in the palace, he was able to understand their intentions and realized that the palatial official’s mocking words to wait a minimum six months couldn’t be taken literally.

Six months? That would’ve been far from enough. I doubt there would’ve been an agreement even if we waited for six years.

The count was confident of it. The sultan had no intention of ever meeting them in the first place. He had despaired when he made this realization. He had cursed himself for his incompetence.

“I saw the prospect of us unable to fulfill the queen’s mission and the negotiation reaching a stalemate. I saw how we would return home without any good news, which would eventually lead to war and... countless young men perishing on the battlefield. My heart was torn in despair. But then you took action.”

Count Ventura gazed at Lloyd before continuing.

“All credit goes to you for the successful negotiation, preventing a war, and saving our young men’s lives.”

“Uh, um, I did it because I didn’t want my fiefdom to be forced into war-”

“That is the same thing,” concluded the count.

“Oh? Okay...”

Count Ventura spoke, emphasizing his words. Lloyd could sense from this that this gentleman had very little room for another person’s opinion. So, Lloyd was flabbergasted by what the count said next.

“I will report your achievement to Her Majesty in great detail when I return to the palace,” announced Count Ventura.

“Please... can you hold back on that...?” Lloyd begged.

“No, this is the only way I can return the favor I received from you.”

“...”

Lloyd sighed at length. I suppose I have another accomplishment under my belt. I hope I don’t get summoned before the queen for this. Lloyd wished direly to himself. Just like that, he joined the delegation and crossed the wilderness and eastern mountain range until he arrived at his home sweet home, the Frontera county. The count and countess welcomed Lloyd with open arms, and they showered him with words of concern.

“My... Are you all right?” queried the countess as she eyed Lloyd up and down.

“Oh, yes, I am.”

“How skinny you have become!” she gasped.

“Um, actually, I put on some weight because of how well I ate,” defended Lloyd. “Just a little.”

“No, no.” Countess Marbella shook her head. “Your cheeks have grown so hollow. What a disaster. Well, come on in. Let us eat first.”

“Um, I already ate while coming down from the range-”

“What do you want to eat?” she asked.

“Oh, wait for a second, are the defectors here? Led by Turtle Neck? His name is Termes-”

“Yes, he is here. Does duck sound good to you?” Countess Marbella wasn’t going to let Lloyd change the subject.

“Um... Then what about the pottery and silk? Have they arrived? I actually shipped some items to come here passing through Cremo. They should arrive at any time now, and-”

“I know nothing about pottery and silk, my dear. Beef sounds good for tonight,” she put in again.

“...”

And just like that, even before Lloyd could rest up from traveling, he had to dine by force. In between the feverish eating, he heard a piece of good news. Julian, his younger brother, graduated from his academy.

“Do not be surprised,” announced the count. “But Julian is second in his graduating class.”

“Really...?”

Lloyd’s eyes widened in genuine surprise at the dinner table when he heard the news the count shared with a beaming smile.

Wow!

Second place at the academy? That was definitely something.

Of course. What’s harder than getting into that academy is graduating there.

Lloyd’s mind flew back to the academy system briefly mentioned in The Knight of Blood and Iron. The academy was notorious for being difficult to graduate from. For example, only about 20 students managed to graduate in a class of 100 students. Moreover, graduation didn’t promise a bright future for them.

Among the graduates, only about the top ten percent are hired as officials in the royal palace. The other graduates need to take the employment exam and compete with ordinary people. But of course, the students receive more incentives than the others.

And here was Julian, graduating second in his class. This guaranteed direct employment in the palace. The South Korean equivalent would be placing second in the level five Public Officer Examination.

This fellow. It looks like he'll be working his head off for the queen.

Lloyd inwardly mourned for his brother because the queen wasn't the type to leave a talent alone. She was a frugal extortionist when it came to talents, and any capable individual was sucked dry for the kingdom. So Julian, who proved his intelligence by graduating second in his academy's class, would be forced to put his nose to the grindstone to the point that he'd suffer from chronic fatigue. But he would be happy to be exploited. After all, that was the reason why he earnestly studied until now.

Lloyd, who was thinking such, asked, "Then is that brat coming back home now?"

"Yes," replied the count. "He says he has time to spend time at home before he gets assigned. He wrote you a letter before he left the capital. Here, read it for yourself," the count said as he handed the letter.

Lloyd read it.

To Lloyd, I graduated, and I got fairly good grades. It's all thanks to you. I was able to give all of myself to my studies. I was able to give my all. And I realized a lot of things the last time I met you after a long while. It was all possible because of you. Thank you. See you soon. Julian, your young brother who wants to be your pride.

"..."

Lloyd carefully studied the letter. He was proud of every black word written on the white paper. It was only a few lines, but he swelled with happiness nonetheless. A part of him even felt an immense sense of contentment. Before he knew it, he had read over the letter five times already.

Graduation, huh.

Lloyd, too, wanted to graduate. He wanted to graduate, pass the exam, and land a job. But he was forced into this world before he saw the fruit of his efforts. Though he couldn't deny that the knowledge he had acquired in his world helped him a lot, a corner of his heart was occupied with a pang of sorrow for being unable to finish his degree.

Well, I know it's not like a diploma will feed me, but still.

South Korea was a tough society, and a piece of paper proving one's completion of studies didn't vouch for a life of success. It was the opposite. It was the ticket to enter the deathly, cut-throat competition. In some ways, it was more ruthless, aggressive, and brutal than this world with its spears and swords. That was what South Korea was like.

But still, I wanted to get a diploma.

Lloyd still felt regretful that he couldn't get one when he had put in great effort to get one. He occasionally pondered on the matter. And now, here came the news of Julian performing beyond any expectations of him and giving the credit to Lloyd. The boy even added a pleasing remark that he wished to become a proud young brother to Lloyd. Lloyd felt grateful and content as he read those words. His heart swelled with pride as though he was the one who had graduated.

That rascal.

I'm going to give him a noogie on his chestnut-like head. Lloyd carefully folded the letter thinking to make sure that it wouldn't get crumpled. Then he carefully put it in his inner pocket.

Later, even when he continued to have his meal and enjoyed reuniting with the count and countess, he had his hand placed on the middle of his chest. And as though the letter was responding to him inside, it rustled. Lloyd swelled with gratitude and joy once again every time it happened. The entire time he couldn't erase the smile off his face.

The count and countess were overwhelmed with happiness to see his son Lloyd being so joyful. They basked at the moment, realizing that their eldest son, who used to be a troublemaker, had grown up to become a reliable pillar to their family. And their second diffident son grew up to work for the palace. But more than their achievements, they were happy that their kids grew up as faithful and healthy individuals. They grinned as though the whole world, no, the whole universe was theirs. So, the two were absolutely ignorant to the fact that an uninvited visitor, who had business with their eldest son, had arrived at the outskirts of the fiefdom.

***

“Whew.”

At last, the tediously long journey has come to an end. And now, I simply have to meet Lloyd Frontera and record his amazing lullaby in my magic orb and go back home. Then I’ll be able to fall asleep again.

The dignified princess of the sultan kingdom. A high-level sword expert plagued by lullaby withdrawal symptoms. Sheherazade’s dark pearly eyes shone as they looked down at the Frontera county sitting at the foot of the eastern mountain range.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 201: A Prison Called Lullaby (1)

“Bibeong!”

The booming alarm in the lake of the eastern mountain range echoed through the land. The morning began in the Frontera county at Bibeong’s voice. Lloyd’s eyes flew open as well.

“Haha.”

His bedroom came into view as soon as he opened them. It was not fancy like the annex hall in the royal palace or the reception hall of the sultan kingdom. But it was cozy and familiar. Lloyd dreadfully missed this bedroom during the last six months of his stay in the sultan’s kingdom.

“Master Lloyd, are you awake?”

As soon as he made the sound, a careful voice spoke from the other end of the door. It, too, was familiar, and he was glad to hear it.

“Yeah, come in.”

The door opened up slowly, and Emily, a maid, poked her head out and beamed at Lloyd.

“I brought you breakfast.”

“Thank you. Have you been waiting long?”

“No, just a little.”

“Oh no,” remarked Lloyd. “You must have waited for a long time.”

“No, I really didn’t wait for long. It is all right,” she hurriedly said.

Lloyd was even happy to smell the breakfast on the tray Emily brought. A light bean stew with shredded chicken, a wheat loaf of bread, two sausages, a soft-boiled egg, a chunk of goat cheese, and a cup of warm milk. It was a modest breakfast for a noble. However, this was Lloyd’s favorite breakfast meal.

This is a buffet compared to my days in the room rental.

Lloyd didn’t like to have an overly fancy breakfast. It placed a burden on his stomach and heart. So, this was just enough.

“Thank you. It looks great,” thanked Lloyd with a smile.

“I’m glad, Young Master. I’ll come to take the dishes once you’re done eating.”

“Yeah.”

“Oh, right.”

Emily stopped when she was about to leave after putting down the tray. She turned Lloyd’s way and beamed at him again.

“It’s a relief that you got back safely.”

“Sure...”

Emily then scooted out of the room before Lloyd could reply. He stared for a moment at the door. Is this what being a popular kid felt like? This feeling of being welcomed by everyone. He didn’t dislike it. No, to be honest, he liked it.

That’s why I love it here.

A smile escaped from Lloyd. Just then, he was hit with a memory of when he first came here. As though he was a monster or an annoying pest, everyone he met gave him a cold gaze. Their gazes from them revealed their disdain and desire to avoid interaction and stay away from him. But now, those gazes changed into a warm, hearty welcome. And who did it? Lloyd himself.

I worked hard until now.

There wasn’t any grand reason behind their change of attitude. It was the fruit of his hard work and endeavor. So, from now on, he wanted to live the rest of his life tasting the sweet fruits of his blood, sweat, and tears.

I can do it.

He had solved countless issues during his time here. He paid off the county’s debt, prevented the Monster Domino effect, accommodated the refugees, prevented an epidemic, raised a generous amount of funds, and avoided war with the sultan kingdom.

All those issues were taken care of. By who? Me. So, it’s time to relax now. Farewell to my sickening days of work. I’m going to spend the rest of my life lazing around like a landlord. I just need to stay clear of the queen. I’ll have to think of a plan to make sure she won’t call me.

Lloyd lifted his fork with his new resolution. He then started to enjoy his modest breakfast, savoring his first day of retirement. In the morning, he went out for a stroll. The warm and bubbly sunlight of the early summer pleased him. On the way, he met a couple of welcoming faces. The rebels of the sultan kingdom, who defected and were now residents of the Frontera fiefdom. Termes and his rebel executives.

“I am glad that everyone arrived safely.”

They shared with him that they had come here about five days earlier and that they managed to safely cross the desert and secretly pass the border at the protection and guidance of Turtle Neck and others, even though the journey was slowed by their families. After that short chat, Lloyd’s first day in retirement continued to go by without a hitch. Whereas his morning was filled with wonderful people, his afternoon was filled with something even better, gift packages.

“What... is all this?”

About a little past lunchtime, dozens of carts trundled into the Frontera fiefdom, all of which were packed with large chests. The carts were so full that it looked like their wheels would pop off. Count Frontera's jaw dropped at the sight. Just then...

"Mister Lloyd Frontera? Are you here?"

A man who was leading the cart in the very front yelled as he stood at the gate. Lloyd rushed at his calling.

"Here! On my way!"

Lloyd swiftly accepted the packages with great excitement. Once he signed the receipt, the workers immediately started to lower the chests off the carts.

"Lloyd, what is all this?" Count Frontera stuttered.

A satisfying smile hung on Lloyd's face. He answered, "My packages. No, the delivery of a valuable shipment."

"Shipment?"

"Yes."

Lloyd nodded and enumerated the items that made the count's ears twitch in disbelief.

"Pottery, silk, carpets, spices, and what else did I order? Anyway, they're all specialty products of Ahinsya, the capital of the sultan kingdom."

"Ahinsya's... specialty products?" stuttered the count.

"Yes."

"Who in the world sent these to us?" There was still a tremor in the count's voice.

"I did," said Lloyd proudly.

"Huh?"

“I sent them here while I was in Ahinsya.”

The smile on Lloyd’s face deepened, and he briefly narrated the story of how he splurged the sultan’s money.

“And so, I hired a cargo ship and commissioned these shipments.”

“To come here after passing through Port Cremo?”

“Yes. Come to think of it, I really made the right choice. I must have picked a good ship. I was worried that the goods wouldn’t arrive on time because of the long distance.”

“...”

Lloyd beamed nonchalantly at the count, who was too dumbstruck to speak. The mountain of shipments was filled with pottery, silk, and other specialty items from the east?

“Then, what do you want me to do?”

The count swallowed as he pulled himself together. Lloyd was quick to reply as though he had been waiting for the question.

“Please look for merchants in the capital, Cremo, Namaran, and other areas nearby. Of course, it doesn’t matter if we can’t sell everything at once.”

“You are right.”

The count nodded. He could see the impressive amount of products with just a glance. Could they all be sold at the same time? He thought it was unlikely.

It would be nice if one buyer could purchase all of this. But even a fairly large merchant won’t have enough money to buy everything.

Moreover, there was a limit to the demand for specialty goods, especially high-end ones. This meant that there was a fixed pool of consumers who could purchase these products. And so, it was impossible to sell them all at once.

“I see what you mean. You can leave this job to your father.”

“Of course. However, it doesn’t matter if we slowly sell everything bit by bit, so please don’t overwork yourself.”

“Very well.”

The count nodded as he patted Lloyd on the shoulder. Lloyd could sense that the count was proud. A smile appeared on his face. He then received the items and asked the Skeleton Corps to stack them up in the storage. That took a whole day.

“Woah. I finally feel alive. Right?”

Lloyd asked behind as he walked out of the storage. Javier, who was silent for the whole day, was there. But strangely, he didn’t answer the question given to him.

“What’s wrong? Did something happen?”

“...”

There was something off about his facial expression. It was the face of a person who stepped on dog poop with their new, expensive shoes that still had their tag on. Javier’s gaze grew mischievous as he looked at Lloyd.

“Tsk. I can tell something happened. Am I right?”

“...”

“What is it?” demanded Lloyd. “Did I do something wrong again?”

“Yes.”

An answer finally. The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose up.

“I did something wrong? What is it this time?” Lloyd questioned with hands in the air.

“...”

“Seeing how you’re still silent, it looks like you’re really upset-”

“Master Lloyd, your lullaby. I did not know it was free.”

Under the yellowing dusk, Javier cocked his head to one side. Rough. And he glowered at Lloyd.

“I believed that your lullaby was an expensive service, considerably so.”

“What do you mean?”

“It is about the woman.” Javier finally got to the point.

“Sheherazade?” queried Lloyd.

“Yes.”

Javier nodded. His glare grew more ferocious.

“Recall the first day we arrived at Kandara. This is what you told me right after you sang a lullaby to Miss Sheherazade. That your lullaby is not free. That I am ignorant of how much you plan to rip her off.”

“Yes, I did,” Lloyd said matter-of-factly.

“Then what is this?”

“What is?”

“You did not make that woman pay for anything.” There was stifled anger in his voice.

“You think so?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes.”

As the two walked, Javier continued to speak bitterly.

“It can’t be that you’re simply counting the help you received from the rebels while she was asleep as her payment?”

“Of course not.”

“Then what did you receive from her?” Javier, walking briskly, demanded an answer.

“Her future.”

“What...?”

The nonchalant remark from Lloyd made Javier pause. Lloyd turned his way with a meaningful smile on his face.

“Let me say this once again. My lullaby? It’s expensive. I’m holding her future as security.”

“What do you mean...?”

Javier tilted his head in confusion, trying to make sense of what he had just heard.

“Do you possibly mean that she will sacrifice her future for your lullaby?” assumed Javier.

“Yeah, roughly.” Lloyd nodded his head. “She has amazing talent. You should know since you fought with her. Do you agree with me?”

“Yes.”

“More precisely, give me your feelings on her skills.”

“She can be a sword master in 20 years.”

“Yes, I think so too.”

Lloyd grinned. It was true. Javier’s judgment was correct, and it was how the novel had described Sheherazade. Her talent was on par with Queen Magentano, and she was set to become a sword master in 20 years.

But she fails to fully develop her talent.

The reason was simple. She died before that happened.

Cornered by the rebels, she fought to protect the sultan until the end. Hoping even in the last moment that her father would acknowledge her. She risked herself even when she could have retreated.

And so, she died in vain and never got the chance to reach her full potential. But now, the story had changed due to the Qanat Lloyd built.

The rebellion is not going to happen anymore. The Qanat solved the drought in the Kandahar region. People are no longer dissatisfied. So, the sultan won’t be surrounded by the rebels anymore, and Sheherazade won’t die protecting her father.

In short, Sheherazade would live. She would live a stable life until she became a sword master in 20 years.

“So.”

Lloyd spoke, his voice full of finality.

“There’s a person who will become a sword master within the next 20 years just across the border in a country that could potentially become our enemy one day. Moreover, she’s the daughter of the sultan. She might wield her sword toward us in the future. Do you think it’s right to leave her as she is?” demanded Lloyd.

“Um...”

“We have to make a move.”

“How?”

“We can bring her over to our side, or nip her potential in the bud if we can’t have her.”

Lloyd’s smile became slightly more vicious.

“Sure, right now, we’re on good terms with the sultan. But there’s no guarantee that will be true in ten or twenty years in the future. The sultan kingdom has the potential to be our enemy. That’s why I sang a lullaby for her every night while I was there.”

“You conditioned her...”

“Oh, did you realize that already?” said Lloyd as his brows lifted up.

“You did the same thing to me,” stated Javier.

“Yes, you are correct.”

Lloyd shrugged, then continued to speak.

“She listened to my lullaby for over four months. During that time, she was able to peacefully sleep at night. But now, my lullaby was suddenly taken away from her. She must be terribly flustered since she can’t sleep anymore.”

It was true. She was probably tormented by the abrupt return of her insomnia.

“She probably regrets ever learning about my lullaby. Why? She knows what she’s missing now. She’s discovered the comfort it brings. So, she can never go back. She’s changed from when she could overcome sleep deprivation with sheer will.”

“You... killed her willpower, which was a weapon that would defeat her sword master syndrome,” concluded Javier.

“Yeah.”

Lloyd nodded as if he was making a declaration. It was true. This principle could be applied to anything. It was hard to tolerate discomfort knowing it could be resolved. Once someone experienced what it was like to own a remote controller, they couldn't live without it when watching TV. A family could be happy with an electric fan until they felt the cool air of an air conditioner. There's no going back. The same was the case for furnaces, cars, elevators, the internet, and smartphones.

That'd be even more accurate in regard to sleep which directly affects the body.

Sheherazade, who was suffering from sword master syndrome, wouldn't be an exception. Previously, she would have endured the constant torture from her insomnia, thinking she had no other choice. She would have gradually increased her swordsmanship level through training amid such a handicap. However, she found out about Lloyd's lullaby and the tremendous comfort it offered.

"So, she can never go back," assured Lloyd. "She won't be able to forcefully push herself like she used to. I mean, she could come close using an extraordinary show of power, but that's going to take a very long time."

"Do you mean that we can expect a delay in her progress as a sword master?" asked Javier.

"Yeah. That's if she doesn't come here."

"Are you serious?"

"Uh-huh."

"Master Lloyd, you are..." Javier paused, holding back.

"Go on. You don't have to hold back," permitted Lloyd.

"..."

The corners of Lloyd's lips rose as he looked at Javier. It was probably his expression that prompted Javier to blurt out the worst insult he knew that had been suppressed inside him until now.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 202: A Prison Called Lullaby (2)

“Master Lloyd.”

“Yeah.”

“Master Lloyd, you... You are truly hardworking.”

“Hmm?”

Lloyd’s eyebrows twitched. Javier’s icy stare grew colder.

“But you are not just hardworking. You are also truly dutiful.”

“Hey?”

Lloyd cocked his head to the side, wondering what was up with Javier. He had given Javier permission to insult him. Javier wasn’t the type of guy to let go of this chance. Could it be that he was sick? In between Lloyd’s thinking, Javier continued to shower him with praise.

“Moreover, you are detailed. Always meticulous and dutiful in your preparation for the future. Not only that, but you also stick to your plan once it is decided.”

“Uh-huh, really?”

“Yes. I feel a sense of devotion watching you. Contrasting other haughty nobles, there is something comforting and familiar about you, especially when you’re covered in dust during construction,” smirked Javier.

“Comforting? Familiar?”

“Yes.”

“Like what?”

“Like a mole cricket,” said Javier with a big smirk on his face.

“...”

“The way you dig dirt so industriously, drill holes so faithfully and flatten the earth so meticulously reminds me of that insect. In particular, when I lay my eyes on your ugly and wiggly bottom as you struggle to shovel up the ground is the spitting image of a mole cricket. Not only that, your bottom smells just the same.”

“Hey, I don’t smell,” defied Lloyd to protect his honor.

“I suppose you do not know this,” continued Javier, not interested in Lloyd’s honor, “but mole crickets eject brown liquid from their bottom, a terribly stenchy one. Have you ever smelled it? The scent is reminiscent of a cross between dog poop and rotten grass, so it is extremely similar to how you like to hold a grudge against people even when things are well over.”

“Hey...” muttered Lloyd.

“What is wrong? Did you not permit me to insult you?”

“Yes, I did.”

“So, I did it. I poured my heart out.”

“You should’ve just broken one of my bones instead,” said Lloyd with a bitter smile on his face.

With a fiercer glare, Javier added, “This insult is kind considering what kind of evil you’re capable of.”

“Well, are you going to hate me more if I tell you that I had no choice?”

Javier didn’t say anything. He merely stared at Lloyd with a piercing gaze.

“Tsk. No need to glare at me so hard.”

“Should I come up with a worse insult?”

“No, spare me, please.”

Lloyd forced out a pained laugh. It appeared that Javier somewhat understood Lloyd didn’t hold any bad intentions. Unlike his sharp remarks, his likeability wasn’t dropping by even a single point.

Well, actually, it’s not like I did a horrible thing to Sheherazade.

It was true. Sure, he did intentionally put a brake on her talent development with his lullaby. He could also admit that it was an unfair method on his part. But from another perspective, Lloyd had saved her life.

She lived because I constructed the Qanat. That has to count for something.

Lloyd shrugged. The favor he bestowed on her was beyond unbelievable for Javier, Sheherazade herself. and so many others in this world.

After all, I changed her future. I changed her destiny of dying after being swept into a rebellion.

However, no one would know the future had changed. Lloyd didn’t particularly mind that.

I should be satisfied with saving someone’s life.

He didn’t need any gratitude. He didn’t even want it. He shackled her with his lullaby, so they were even. That thought granted him peace of mind.

“Anyway,” Lloyd said, “I am looking forward to how she’ll react.”

“React?”

“Her life was greatly affected by my lullaby. So, I expect one of two reactions.”

“One of the two, you say. What are they?”

“She will come to find me here or remain in her kingdom.”

“Wait, do you mean that she will visit here because she cannot forget your lullaby?”

“Yeah,” said Lloyd in regret, licking his lips. “But given that she is nowhere to be seen, it looks like she has chosen the latter.”

“She will overcome the situation by herself, I suppose.”

“Yeah.”

“So,” asked Javier, “are you sorry?”

“No, not really.”

Lloyd grinned. He wouldn’t lose anything because Sheherazade didn’t come here. It didn’t change the fact that she was going to have a massive uphill battle to overcome her sword master syndrome after discovering the comfort of his lullaby. That was going to postpone her from becoming a sword master by about ten years and thereby delay the sultan from gaining more power.

“So nothing to be sorry about,” said Lloyd, “But, you know, no one knows. She might unexpectedly appear right in front of us.”

“Master Lloyd, no way,” Javier remarked with a small gasp.

“Hey, did you already get what I’m trying to say? You’re smart. Your guess is right. The moment she sets foot here, she’s going to work as a piece of high-end construction equipment, I mean, personnel in the Civil Engineering Corps.”

“...”

“I already wrote the employment contract just in case. Very meticulously.”

“...”

Dear heavens, save this poor woman. Javier was speechless. He direly wanted to tell her to run away if she was near the Frontera fiefdom or would be met with the same fate as him. Javier frowned, feeling uncomfortable and uneasy, and saw Lloyd grin at him. Then the two walked side by side as the night wore on. The following morning, Javier’s fears turned into reality.

***

“Bibeong!”

Morning arrived in the Frontera fiefdom. The sun pushed out the fog that carpeted the mountain at night. Count Frontera stretched his shoulder amid the moist air.

“Whew.”

He was tired. It was unexpectedly harder to do something he wasn’t used to. But he couldn’t stop now when he had already started the job. Thinking so, he gripped the trowel and got moving again.

Stab. The earth cracked, and a chunk of weed was pulled out. Beads of sweat dripped along his forehead.

“Whew...”

His legs ached. He wasn’t used to squatting this way, and it was his first time tending to flowers. His knees were sore, and his shoulders were stiff. But he was able to power through upon recalling the promise he made to his wife.

“My, you are feverish. Are you catching a cold? Please don’t overwork yourself tomorrow.”

It was around when they went to bed the night before. The countess didn’t look well. At first, Arcos Frontera thought something bad had happened to her, so he put his hand on her forehead. It was hotter than usual. A mild fever. So, he told her to rest and relax lest her cold worsens. A look of agitation appeared on her face when she heard him.

“No, I can’t,” said the countess feebly.

“Why?”

“Too many weeds have grown in the flower garden. I need to pick them out as soon as I can.”

“But your health matters more than the garden certainly.”

“But...”

“Leave it to me then.”

“What?” Her voice grew a pitch higher.

“I can manage a few days. I will take care of your flower garden for now. Would that give you peace of mind?”

“Dear...”

One of his wife’s only hobbies was taking care of their flower garden at home. It was so precious to her that she didn’t leave the job to maids or servants in the house. There was so much gratitude in her eyes when she heard him talk. Her hands had warmly tightened as they held his hands.

Yes, I made a promise. So, I can’t get careless just because I’m tired.

It was a promise he made to none other than his wife. The world could end, but he had to keep it. He had to exterminate all of these weeds despite his sore knees and shoulders. With that determination, he then gripped the trowel. Along with his awkward trawling, the weeds started to disappear little by little. His mind cleared as he focused. Everything around him began to fade, including his sore knees and shoulders. Instead, his heart swelled with a sense of pride.

Come to think of it, I am truly a happy man.

He really was when he thought about it. The financial crisis that burdened the fiefdom was resolved. The countless number of refugees had settled down. His days were free from worry. And what of his sons?

Lloyd.

A smile of satisfaction appeared on his face as he thought about Lloyd, the ex-troublemaker. He couldn’t forget the time when Lloyd claimed he’d build something called an “ondol” and make money. With a serious air around him, he had requested to borrow some soldiers to use as workers.

That kid, he’s still keeping his promise from then.

In return for his assistance, Lloyd said he’d give up drinking. The count didn’t believe him at first. The boy used to practically jump at the mention of alcohol, even when he was asleep. But, even now, he kept his promise. Not just that. Count Frontera had wondered if he was brought into this world to watch over Lloyd every time he saw how reliable and earnest his oldest son had become.

And Julian.

The same went for his second son. This one never troubled him very much. Always a faithful and wise son. But he had a streak of weakness. So, the count was somewhat concerned about how Julian would overcome this cruel world and how he would make a living when he wasn’t the family heir. There were times the count sighed to himself as the worry dominated his mind. But not anymore. He was ranked second in his academy when he graduated and was on a straight, clear path to becoming a high-level official.

I am... so happy, my sons.

In a blink of an eye, his two sons had grown to become healthy adults. They were ready to spread their wings and live their lives without needing his protection. That made him extremely proud, satisfied, and happy. His shoveling now reflected the strong emotions he felt. He smiled under the early summer sun. Just then, he heard an unexpected sound.

“Stop right there.”

“What business do you have here?”

The sound was coming from the main gate, and the voices belonged to the guards. Whom could it be so early in the morning? The main gate sat near where the count was, so all he had to do was stretch his neck up without having to stand. But the roses that bloomed along the fence blocked his view. He could only see the backs of the guards. The visitor behind the closed gate was covered by roses.

Judging by how the guards are reacting, it does not appear they are talking with a local.

The fiefdom wasn't big. He knew all the people who lived just a couple blocks away. So; the guards' cold attitude only indicated that the visitor was either a refugee or a foreigner.

Oh, well, the guards will take care of it.

Count Frontera scoffed. He couldn't help it. It wasn't his job to entertain every random visitor that came by. Furthermore, he was doing something important right now. He was decorating his wife's precious flower garden. Not only that, he had gotten comfortable being squatted, and getting up or changing his position would make his legs hurt more.

And so, he kept digging with his trowel, remaining mindful of the conversation between the mysterious visitor and the guards.

"Excuse me, is this the Frontera estate?"

Count Frontera cocked his head when he heard the voice of the visitor. It looked like the visitor was a woman, and there was something different about her pronunciation and accent. Not from here. As the count thought so, the guards continued to entertain her.

"Yes, this is the Frontera estate. Please identify your place of origin, status, and purpose of your visit."

"Me?"

"Yes."

"I'm from the sultan kingdom in the east."

"From the sultan kingdom...?"

“Yes.”

“Th-then what is the purpose of your visit?”

“I come to meet the eldest son, Lloyd Frontera.”

“Young Master Lloyd?”

“Yes.”

Her voice was clear and confident. The count stopped his shoveling.

She’s here for Lloyd? From the sultan’s kingdom?

The count cocked his head. A woman from a neighboring kingdom. Here. To meet him. It was unusual for sure. He couldn’t just sit and watch as a spike of curiosity arose in him.

What business does she have with my son to travel all the way here for him?

At last, the count let go of the trowel and got up, supporting his soring knee with his hands. His view elevated as he moved. Over the rose bushes, he finally caught a glimpse of the visitor. Quite tall. Traditional clothes of the sultan’s kingdom. Light brown skin. Sharp nose and confident face. Dark pearly gaze.

“My name is Sheherazade from the sultan’s kingdom that sits in the east,” she divulged confidently. “To tell you about my purpose, I came to meet Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of this estate.”

“May I ask that you reveal your reason for meeting him?”

“Yes.”

The woman nodded. She drew breath to reveal the purpose of her visit. Count Frontera concentrated. At last, she went on in a confident voice.

“I can no longer go to sleep without him.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 203: A Prison Called Lullaby (3)

“Whew...”

Inside the reception room of the Frontera manor, Count Frontera sighed at length, but it didn’t necessarily lighten his heart. Acutely feeling so, he turned to the side and gave a look to his wife.

“What about Lloyd?”

“I called him.”

Countess Frontera answered him through her gaze. And their eyes toward each other slowly moved to the front, where a foreign woman was nonchalantly sitting across from the table.

“Whew...”

He sighed again at the sight of her. Count Frontera mused in agony on the possible things Lloyd did and went through in the sultan’s kingdom for the woman to say those words. And so, the count dearly wished for Lloyd to quickly return home and change this awkward atmosphere. Thankfully, his wish came true soon.

Knock knock knock. Someone knocked on the door. It was Lloyd. At last.

“You wanted to see me?”

“Come on in.”

Count Frontera jumped to his feet and personally opened the door himself, studying his son’s reaction.

“Eh?”

Lloyd stopped as he entered when he saw her. His eyes widened slightly. Count Frontera wondered if it was that of surprise. Or was it because of something else? But soon, the count was able to spot something while observing Lloyd. He caught his son’s faint smile and the words he uttered to himself under his breath.

“I guess this is your final choice.”

“...”

Final? This choice? The count pondered what they could possibly mean. With a mildly anxious heart, he took his seat and asked Lloyd to do the same.

“Have a seat.”

“Yes.”

Lloyd sat on the sofa. But his seating choice was strange. He didn’t choose to sit beside the count or the woman. He sat in between them and looked from one side to the other.

“You must have called for me because of her, right?” wondered Lloyd aloud at the count.

“Yes... I did.”

A sense of relief soon came to the count when he saw how his son was barely shocked or flustered by the woman’s presence. Lloyd didn’t seem to have caused trouble in the sultan’s kingdom.

But I cannot relax just yet.

The count told himself that he knew nothing about what had happened yet. For that reason, he slowly opened his mouth to speak while trying his best not to hurt his son’s feelings.

“The thing is... Um... My dear Lloyd, can you honestly answer your old man’s question?”

“Yes. Of course,” assured Lloyd with an eased expression.

“Then, do you know this woman?”

“Yes, we know each other.”

“Then... did you, um, cause any trouble for her?”

“Trouble?” mused Lloyd. “I can’t say.”

Lloyd then chuckled. He was enjoying breakfast when he was called here out of the blue, but he wasn’t angry. He was rather happy. Sheherazade finally came to him, and now, he could tie the future sword master down to his fiefdom. Satisfaction swelled in him like a farmer staring at a well-ripe harvest. But there was one small thing that he was curious about.

“Did the woman say I caused any trouble for her?”

What could Sheherazade have possibly said? What did she say to make the count and countess fidget in their seats earlier?

She must have said something off.

Sheherazade was sitting calmly. But the count and the countess couldn’t stay still. It looked like they had a concern that was bothering them but couldn’t muster the courage to say it out loud.

Lloyd plastered on the smile of a dutiful son. Then in a reassuring voice, he said, “I think there is a misunderstanding here. Please tell me, and I will clear it out.”

“Hmm...”

The count and countess looked at each other and exchanged a troubled gaze. The latter nudged the count to speak, and he nodded with a look of reluctance. Lloyd thought that the count looked like he had taken a bullet for her. Just when he thought so, the count opened his mouth, his cheeks slightly red.

“Um, how should I say this…? You see, um, this lady here says...”

His face burned red.

“You see, um, she said she can no longer fall asleep without you.”

There. He said it out loud.

My goodness. How embarrassing this is...

Count Frontera lifted the teacup as he nibbled his lips. Countess Frontera held his hand tight and sent a gaze that seemed to say, “Good job, dear.” As for Lloyd...

“Oh, that’s true,” tonelessly admitted Lloyd.

Pfft!

The count spat out the tea, and Lloyd shrugged.

“It is true. She can no longer go to sleep without me. But she left out all the details, so it’s not what you think it is.”

Cough! Cough! “Meaning? What do you mean?” The count spluttered out.

Lloyd handed him a handkerchief and said, “She means my lullaby. You know, right? How I recite a lullaby to Sir Asrahan.”

“...”

They knew about the lullaby. Somewhat. The story of how Javier secretly had miserable insomnia until he was cured by Lloyd’s recital of vast knowledge was a secret shared only with the count and countess. Now that the coughing fit had subsided, the count pointed at Sheherazade.

“Wait, does she have...”

“Yes, something similar to what Sir Asrahan had,” clarified Lloyd.

“Is that why you sang a lullaby to her? Just like you did with Sir Asrahan?”

“Yes. Thanks to me, she was able to sleep soundly at night. But the insomnia must have crept back now that I returned home. Didn’t it?”

Lloyd’s question was directed to Sheherazade, who nodded after staying silent until now.

“You are right.”

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose.

“Then that cheesy and creepy remark about how you can’t sleep without me at night must have been intentional.”

“Of course.”

Sheherazade nodded again and looked straight at Lloyd.

“I figured it was the quickest way to see you.”

Indeed. Sheherazade actually arrived at the Frontera fiefdom the day before. Her plan yesterday was extremely simple. Meet Lloyd as fast as possible and record his lullaby in her expensive magic orb.

I meant to return to Ahinsya straight away after achieving my goal.

Of course, that part, going back to Ahinsya, didn’t change even right now. Her sole focus was on the lullaby. She only needed to obtain that. It wasn’t a particularly difficult task either. She had a magical device that cost as much as a mansion but could record about 20 minutes of sound. And so, it could be used to record Lloyd reciting his lullaby. She only needed to set up a clandestine meeting with Lloyd. Away from everyone’s gaze, her visit would remain secret. It was simple. She would just quietly approach Lloyd to request a recording. However, it turned out she was wrong.

The reality was a bit different.

Sheherazade shook her head as she thought about the previous day. Right after she arrived, she realized that there was one big flaw in her plan.

Javier Asrahan. It was his fault.

That silver-haired knight had stuck to Lloyd all day! So, it was impossible to get close to Lloyd at all. And she couldn't think of a way to outwit the sword master's senses. Heck, the mere act of observing them was risky itself. As such, she scrapped her plan altogether and decided to approach Lloyd head-first. After racking her brain all night, she came to the manor during the early morning and let out an explosive remark that garnered everyone's attention. And here she was, finally meeting Lloyd face-to-face.

"Tsk, what a foul temper you have."

Lloyd's smile became wryer. He turned to the count and countess, who now seemed aware of their misunderstanding. There was a look of ease on their faces as they listened to his conversation.

"So," Lloyd asked Sheherazade, "I suppose you want my lullaby?"

"Yes."

"And you are not thinking of taking me back to your kingdom."

"Of course not."

Sheherazade put on a straight face and fished a plum-sized transparent orb from her pocket.

"This is a magical recording device. It can record about 20 minutes of sound."

"So, you plan on recording my lullaby, huh?" mused Lloyd.

"Yes." Sheherazade nodded and looking straight into Lloyd's eyes, she added, "I am not asking for much. Just 20 minutes. One lullaby is all I want."

"Really?" said Lloyd as he stroked his jaw.

"Yes."

“Hmm, but too bad.”

Lloyd grinned. He slyly cocked his head to the side and spoke.

“Nothing is free in the world.”

“...”

“Did you really think that I would hand over my lullaby for free? How naive of you.”

“But I came all the way here-”

“Come on. I didn’t call you here. Why does it matter to me how long it took you to come here?” huffed Lloyd.

“...”

Sheherazade was speechless. Lloyd made sense, sure. But she wanted to punch his face out of spite. That was when he brought something out of his pocket as he smiled even more nonchalantly. He opened the article up on the table.

“What is it?” asked Sheherazade.

“It’s an employment contract,” informed Lloyd.

“Excuse me?”

Sheherazade couldn’t believe her ears just now. She thought she heard it wrong at first. An employment contract? Why bring that out now? Regardless of her confusion, Lloyd sounded completely nonchalant as he continued to speak.

“I thought you wanted to record my lullaby.” queried Lloyd, almost teasingly. “Isn’t it to improve your sleep? That’s why you traveled this far. Right?”

“Yes, that’s right, but...”

An unsettling feeling swirled in her. She nodded, but her eyes were filled with distrust. Her uneasiness only continued to grow, and just then, Lloyd spitefully started to smile.

“Then you have to pay for it. So, please sign here.”

“...”

No way! She rolled her eyes down, her heart sinking, and studied the contract on the table. Words of despair crawled out of her mouth in spite of herself.

“Enlistment in the Civil Engineering Corps?Participate in various constructions for the Frontera fiefdom and work in compliance with the given regulations? Wait, are you saying I should do this?” asked Sheherazade, shell-shocked.

“Yes,” replied Lloyd matter-of-factly. He nodded and smiled as if she asked an obvious question. “Stay and work here for just five years.”

“...”

“Then I will record your lullaby.”

“...”

What the? Sheherazade gritted her teeth. To this, Lloyd lifted his brows.

“I know,” he went on, “who you are. But think about it. Do you think that you are being forced into something that doesn't suit you? You know that is terribly incorrect.”

“Wrong thinking? How?”

“It can’t be that you think you’re above shoveling and pickaxing, right?”

“Well, that’s...”

“Do you really think so?”

“...”

Sheherazade hurriedly clamped her mouth. Her heart sank. She had not given much thought about the matter. It hardly even crossed her mind. But now, she realized that she vaguely had those thoughts. The contract stated that the unit was mainly tasked with digging the ground for construction. And the suggestion to enlist in that unit meant she’d have to shovel and pickax at the worksite. And who was she? The princess of the sultan kingdom.

That’s ridiculous.

The mere suggestion itself was blatantly offensive and rude. But she couldn’t be forthright about it because of Lloyd’s strange manner of talking.

“Please think about it. Do you think shoveling is too low for you? Is it a job that’s only fit for peasants? You can’t be suggesting that this kind of physical labor should be looked down upon, right?”

“...”

“These are necessary jobs for our livelihoods,” Lloyd said proudly. “A construction cannot be done without a shovel. Without it, there are no paved roads or bridges that allow us to cross rivers. But that’s not all. That sword you hold, your jewels, and so many tools that you enjoy are produced using the minerals unearthed with a shovel and pickax.”

“...”

“Despite all of this, you can’t be saying that this job is beneath you. Right?”

“Of course-”

“Right?”

“No...”

At last, she agreed with Lloyd. All of his words made complete sense. She couldn’t find a way to refute him. But she wasn’t going to sign the contract so easily.

“How about I pay for it instead?” suggested her.

“Excuse me?”

“Instead of signing the contract, I’ll give you money. A generous amount at that. What do you think?”

“I don’t need money,” rejected Lloyd coolly, not even batting an eye.

“...”

“My fiefdom has enough money now. The sultan gave us more than enough along with silk and pieces of pottery.”

“...”

“So, you should sign the contract.”

“...”

Sheherazade stared at the contract with a despairing gaze. In the end, there were two choices for her. Return home and live with insomnia. Or throw away her pride and sign a five-year work contract. She would have to carefully make her decision. Nibbling her lips, she hesitated. Lloyd chuckled.

“All right,” said Lloyd, sensing her hesitation. “It must be difficult to come up with an answer right now. I’ll give you some time to think.”

“You will let me do that?”

“Yes, stay here for a few days as our guest, and think it over.”

“...”

She welcomed the suggestion as she thought it was too cruel of Lloyd to ask for an immediate answer. So, she hurriedly nodded. That marked the beginning of her contemplation. She pondered about it, absolutely engrossed with the choices in front of her, through her stay in the Frontera manor. Even when she ate decent meals, lay against the cushion of a VIP room, and strolled all day around in indecision, she grimaced, a frown never leaving her face.

And so, that must be how it happened. On the fifth day of her stay, she decided to take a stroll farther out as her heart felt heavy with frustration. She was sighing and walking along the solitary path in the woods outside the border of the fiefdom when she bumped into an unexpected figure.

“Eh...?”

The second son of Count Frontera. Sheherazade unexpectedly met Julian Frontera, who was coming back home.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 204: The Unexpected Encounter (1)

Occasionally, there were moments when you were aware that you were in a dream. For example, moments like now when Lloyd was confronted with this unworldly yet vivid entity.

“Are you Lloyd Frontera?”

“...”

Lloyd blinked several times and lifted his head. Is this what it would feel like to talk with a burning Mount Everest? A fiery giant was standing in front of Lloyd. Its whole body was set ablaze with large flames, and from the despairing height near the clouds, it was glowering down at Lloyd with fire-filled eyes.

What kind of dream is this?

But since it’s a dream, I won’t at least die in the hands of that fiery giant, Lloyd told himself. As a sense of relief washed over him, Lloyd relaxed his shoulders.

“Yes, I am Lloyd,” he uttered coolly.

“Liar,” accused the fiery giant.

“...”

“Suho Kim. You thought I wouldn’t be able to see through you?”

“Oh, that’s...”

Lloyd was left speechless for a second. He wondered if the fiery giant was his conscience. Could that be the reason it was trying to take advantage of his guilt and push away the real Lloyd? But thankfully, this did not seem to be the case.

“I am the Master of Hellfire who sees through the core of all souls.” Hellkaros, the Watcher of the 19 Purgatories and the King of Hell, continued its introduction, its voice booming like thunder and rumbling like an earthquake.

“I am also the Master of Giolexius, the knight of hell you defeated.”

“Oh,” yelped Lloyd, “do you mean Hell’s Knight?”

“Indeed.”

Rumble...! Hellkaros, the King of Hell, stooped down like an inclined mountain peak. Lloyd lifted his head up, resisting his desire to flinch his shoulders in fright.

Looking straight at Hellkaros, Lloyd asked, “Is that why you came over to my dream?”

“Yes, you are right,” agreed Hellkaros.

“You’re not going to ask for compensation, are you? We were mutually at fault, and it was actually self-defense.”

“Self-defense...?” mused the King of Hell. “Mutually at fault?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded, and he started to explain in detail.

“Your knight and I were bent on ripping each other apart. So, the winner can’t be blamed for hurting the other. Do you not think so?” argued Lloyd proudly.

“Do you think I am here to quibble about who’s to blame?” scoffed the King of Hell.

“Then why did you come to see me?”

At Lloyd’s question, Hellkaros let out a snort of laughter, hot globs of fire spurting out of its mouth.

“To observe the qualities of a man suitable for Hell.”

“What?”

What nonsense was this now? Lloyd cocked his head, and the King of Hell continued to speak.

“From the moment you fought against Giolexius, I have been watching you. I noticed a quality of yours that sets you apart from the others,” announced Hellkaros.

“What quality is that?”

“You are petty,” the King of Hell began without a second of hesitation. “To an unimaginable level. You are as rancorous, cheap, and spiteful as a mosquito that sucks blood in the middle of the night only to hide from angry humans under their bed.”

“...”

Come on, no need to hurt me with your words! A spike of depression rose in Lloyd. Hell’s King, however, continued to diss him with its fake compliments.

“But more than that, you are careful like a rat who always plans out her escape. Moreover, you are so sly I want to set you as an example to other devils in Hell. There is also the singing. Your singing that drains anyone’s strength the moment they hear you and makes them wish their ears will stop working. That great singing that made even me, the King of Hell, regret living to hear it.”

“What’s wrong with my singing...?” Lloyd’s voice faltered.

“I wanted to play it on repeat 24 hours every day for thousands and thousands of years.”

“Why?”

“That would bring more painful agony to the souls that have fallen to Hell.”

“Wait a minute,” said Lloyd, shaking his head. “You don’t plan to broadcast me in Hell, right?”

“Why wouldn’t I?” The King of Hell shrugged.

“...”

“I am jealous of your talent and voice for singing. Moreover, on top of your singing, you are capable of mocking and persecuting the devils that oppose me. So, how does it sound? Lloyd, no, Suho Kim? How about you trust me and spread out your wings in Hell?”

Wings in Hell...! In Hell...! Hell...!

The thunderous words from Hell’s King rattled the whole space in Lloyd’s dream. It wasn’t a simple shout. Its voice reverberated deep within him, rattling the very core of his soul. Lloyd struggled not to get crushed by the violent sound waves and finally opened his eyes.

“...”

Chirp! Chirp! The early summer morning was filled with singing birds. The white curtain in one corner of Lloyd’s bedroom swayed. A ray of sunlight streamed out and scratched Lloyd on the cheek. He felt the warmth of the sun and thought to himself...

That was one weird dream.

To heck with the King of Hell. And it what? Wanted to broadcast his singing in Hell? That would make the evil souls further writhe in agony.

How frugal it is for a ruler of Hell to want to use me.

Scoff escaped Lloyd as he thought about the dream he had just had. The fact that it felt so real made him feel worse.

There’s no need for a silly dream to be so vivid.

Lloyd shuddered as he rose from his bed. The truth was, he couldn’t push aside the dream entirely. He still remembered the message that popped in front of him right after he took down Hell’s Knight. The following messages had undoubtedly appeared in front of his eyes then.

[The King of Hell is impressed by your tremendous accomplishment. The King of Hell has lost his corps commander but now has his eyes on your skill, tact, and potential.]

“...”

Tsk. Stop thinking. It’s a silly dream and nothing else. Even if the King of Hell is interested in me, there’s no way it’d chase after me for my singing. Lloyd assured himself that such a thing would never happen. Something like that was impossible in real life.

Lloyd loudly forced out a cough. “Hmm! Hmm! Ehem!”

Soon, someone reacted from the other side of the door.

“Master Lloyd, are you awake?”

“Yeah, come on in.”

Emily, beaming with a glow of satisfaction, entered with a tray of breakfast. She was the first to greet Lloyd on most mornings.

“You don’t have to ask, Young Master. I didn’t wait for long today as well,” Emily said preemptively.

“Ah, would you get mad if I told you I wasn’t planning to ask that?” asked Lloyd, his voice dripping with playfulness.

“That depends on how you act, Master Lloyd,” said Emily, amused.

“Understood,” said Lloyd. “I was going to aggressively question you.”

“Hehe. The soup is good today. Please try it.”

“Yes, thank you.”

Lloyd lifted the spoon and thought, to Hell with Hell! I’m going to enjoy this peace for the rest of my life. Resolving such, Lloyd enjoyed every bite of his soup.

Has it been five days now?

Sheherazade. The daughter of the sultan who traveled across the desert to acquire his lullaby. It had been five days since Lloyd demanded she enlist in the Engineering Corps in exchange to record him.

She should have reached a decision now.

Sheherazade seemed to be lost in thought for the past five days. Watching over her, Lloyd figured that she would make a decision soon and also that her choice wouldn’t hurt him regardless of what it was.

It’s obvious. If she chooses to enlist in the Corps, then I’ll have someone who possesses the talent of a sword master on my side. If she rejects my offer and goes back to the sultan’s kingdom, her progression to become a sword master will be significantly delayed.

Lloyd wouldn’t lose anything either way.

What will she decide then?

The soup had cooled to a perfect temperature. Finishing the remaining soup in one big gulp, Lloyd felt a rush of curiosity and anticipation at the same time.

***

“Whew...”

How would she describe her feelings at the moment? Half dumbfounded and half dismayed. That was how Sheherazade defined her emotions. She heaved a big sigh and looked up.

Chirp! Chirp! There were birds flying above the trail in the woods. In between them, she also noticed the clear sky and white clouds of early summer. What a truly beautiful place this is, she marveled to herself.

But staying in this foreign land for five years?

A sense of loss gripped her. Must I go that far to obtain one recording? Must I invest five years of my life in it? And how would my father react if I made such a decision? He would go berserk.

How could he not, considering who she was? The sultan's daughter. The princess of a powerful kingdom. Though, of course, she was the daughter of a concubine and not the queen, and though she was only one of the sultan's dozens of daughters, none of this lessened her princess status in any way. That was why she was frustrated.

How would His Majesty react if I spent five years working in a foreign kingdom's Engineering Corps after leaving Ahinsya without his permission… Whew, I can't even imagine it.

There would certainly be an outburst of chaos. But she couldn't even ascertain how bad it would be, and that was a bigger concern for her.

But I must become a sword master.

This was the most definite way to get acknowledged by her father. Once she became one, everything would change.

It seems worth a try if I consider my time here as an investment toward that goal.

She needed the lullaby. Without it, her insomnia would make her life hellish again and it'd become that much harder to focus on sword training. Her growth would be slowed, putting her far away from the path to becoming a sword master.

Bear my father's wrath and give up five years of my life, or safely go back to Ahinsya and tolerate insomnia? I suppose it boils down to these two choices.

Sheherazade let out another big sigh. Just then, she stopped dead in her tracks. She heard a sigh similar to hers just over a nearby bush.

"Haah..."

"..."

Whom could it be? She wondered to herself. This part of the path was quite remote from the Frontera fiefdom. She heard that residents and hunters didn't travel this far. That was why she decided to take a stroll here. It looked like a good place to have time for herself.

"..."

Sheherazade walked over in that direction and soon found the person who had sighed a moment ago.

A young boy? No, he doesn't look like a child.

Her gaze traveled over the bush, and there was a baby-faced man, whose height was only about 5'6. He had curly orange hair and round freckled cheeks. His eyes looked exceptionally smart but soft like a rabbit's. His short height and small figure made him look even more innocent.

Who is that?

Sheherazade narrowed her eyes. He looked suspicious. There wasn't anyone else except her this deep in the woods, and yet, here was a boy who looked like he could barely throw a punch. It didn't make sense. Furthermore, this boy was surrounded by a luxurious carriage and what seemed like his companion's luggage.

Hmm, what could have happened?

The stranger didn’t appear dangerous at first glance. The boy’s posture and gestures didn’t show any signs of swordsmanship. Just then...

“Master Julian!”

A man came sprinting from the other end, panting and out of breath. Collecting his raspy breath, the man stopped in front of the boy.

“Whew, ha... Have you been waiting for long?” The man breathed heavily in and out.

“No. I’m all right. What happened to the boulder?”

“About that, Young Master, I believe it will be difficult to get rid of it by today.”

The man shook his head as he wiped the sweat on his forehead. The boy, who was called “Julian,” looked dismayed.

“Really? That is a problem.”

“Please forgive us. We are trying our best to clear it out, but...”

“What if I join you?” volunteered Julian with a smile.

“Eh?! Absolutely not! Please do not say that. You do not have to do that for us. How could we dare ask for your help with this kind of work, Master Julian?”

“Um, I’m all right with it,” Julian said in a casual tone. “I would just have to roll my sleeves up, clear the soil, and push the boulder away.”

“T-that is exactly why this job is for us.”

“Is that so...?”

“Yes.”

The man nodded his head resolutely. Julian's shoulders dropped like a dog soaked in the rain.

"I still feel sorry," Julian went on with a contrite look on his face. "If I didn't graduate second in class at the academy, I wouldn't have received this carriage from the palace. We could have simply walked from here if it weren't for this carriage. That would have been less work for you all."

"Haah, not at all. Please do not speak that way." The man swayed his hands. "You graduated with honors, and we are honored and proud to serve someone like you. Moreover, this carriage is a precious one bestowed by the palace. It is also a token of honor given to those who graduate in second place."

"But still, it's just a carriage-"

"Please do not say that. We are really all right. It is tradition for graduates to return home riding a carriage bestowed by the palace if they were given one."

"But no one expected a sudden downpour to destroy the road," Julian argued feebly.

"But it wasn't you, Master Julian, who ruined the path. No need to be so critical of yourself. Sure, the ruined mountain path is muddy, and the boulder that blocked the road is quite sizable, but it is all right. We can clean it up in one day with a bit of effort."

Clapping in realization, Julian said, "How about we send someone to the fiefdom to tell them about this situation? They shouldn't have to go too far."

"That would be unnecessary," the man protested again. "Please think of our pride as well. We can take care of it. That is why we are escorting you."

"How about then I lend a hand-"

"Please wait here comfortably. There is no need to feel sorry for us."

The man grinned in satisfaction. He was covered from head to toe in mud. Despite that, he appeared to be genuinely happy to serve Julian. The conversation between the man and Julian left a strong impression on Sheherazade, who was observing them from a distance.

“...”

As she eavesdropped on their conversation, something came to her mind. During her stay in the manor, she overheard conversations between the maids and servants several times. They were about the second son, Lloyd’s brother. She heard he was quite clever, graduating second in his class at the royal academy. And so, he was set to proudly return home in a few days.

That boy, no, that guy, must be the second young master.

He looked much younger than she imagined him to be. And it seemed he had found himself in a pretty sticky situation.

Indeed, there was a big downpour two days ago.

It had been a while since there was a heavy downpour. And so, a portion of the road seemed to have collapsed in the rain. That was why the carriage from the palace couldn’t pass through.

This might be my chance.

Sheherazade racked her brain. The destroyed mountain path. The boulder was difficult to remove. Julian and the others, all of whom were stuck here because of this. What if she helped him out?

If I did, it would be easier to ask for a recording from that man, Lloyd Frontera. I’d be doing his brother a favor after all.

She would gain an advantage in their negotiation. So certainly, this was a clear opportunity for her.

All right. I will help him out.

Sheherazade weighed her options and rose from the bush and walked over to him conspicuously.

“Excuse me,” she called to Julian.

“Ahhh!” shrieked Julian as he jumped.

“...”

“Y-you got me really good there. Who are you?”

Sheherazade must have come forward too suddenly. Julian’s eyes went wide in sheer fright. Seeing him, Sheherazade thought to herself that the man looked like a fluffy baby bunny.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 205: The Unexpected Encounter (2)

“Excuse me, will that be okay for you?”

Sheherazade swiveled at the worried voice. She looked at Julian’s eyes, which were one spot lower than her own.

“Stay back.”

A weakling who did nothing but play with pens in front of a desk. A uselessly adorable rascal. That was her impression of Julian from afar. Her feelings stayed the same when she first spoke to him later.

I plainly moved out from the bush, but he took notice of me much later and got frightened.

How pathetic, she mused. Had she held any ill intent, he would have been killed without having a chance to fight back. He behaved no differently from then on.

He let me walk all over him.

Panicked, he asked who she was, and she gave a genuine answer. My name is Sheherazade, and I’m a visitor from the sultan’s kingdom residing at the Frontera manor. I bumped into you while I was strolling here and overheard your conversation with your men. So, I’m planning to help you. She quickly voiced her objective without giving Julian any time to respond. Then pinning her gaze onto his eyes, she asked where the boulder was and said she would clear it out.

His reaction after that was more dumbfounding. He pointed to the boulder, his face looking absolutely blank.

How carelessly he behaved! Even when his men stood around in alarm, he didn’t care. Julian simply pointed to the obstructed path, his eyes wide like a surprised bunny.

Is he seriously related to Lloyd Frontera, that annoying manipulator? I find that suspicious.

A shiver ran down her shoulders. Lloyd Frontera. The mere thought of him made her feel frustrated. That was why she had expected Julian to be as annoying as Lloyd. But when they started to talk, she found Julian to be surprisingly boring and ignorant of the real world.

He's a young noble who's good at nothing but studying.

She looked straight into his eyes, thinking so. And she blurted in a monotone, "Farther."

"Oh, yes."

Julian scrambled a few steps back. The men around her shot her a wary look. They were covered up in mud from trying to move the boulder away. They were the ones who escorted Julian here and also knights who ranked as mid-level sword experts.

"..."

But she didn't think much of them. She only cared about moving the boulder for Julian and helping him. That would make acquiring the lullaby from Lloyd much easier. Thinking so, she turned and looked at the boulder.

"..."

It was oval in shape and huge. The shortest side seemed to be over 6.5 feet tall. The longer part seemed to reach over 13 feet tall. It completely blocked the mountain path, which was already narrow in the first place after having been constructed along the flank of a steep slope. The boulder seemed to have rolled off from the top of the hill and landed in the middle of this narrow path.

Whew.

Sheherazade took a deep breath in front of the boulder. With a scimitar in her hand, she sharpened her senses in a relaxed yet elaborate manner. She glared at the target, searched for its weaknesses, and revealed her fangs.

Slash! Her scimitar emitted a deathly glow and slashed one side of the large boulder.

Crash! A fist-sized chunk was sliced off the tip of the boulder.

“...!”

Julian and the knights shot open their eyes in shock. But that was just the beginning.

Clang! Clang! Clang! Sharp, rhythmic sounds endlessly echoed in the air. The outline of Sheherazade’s body grew blurry amidst the glaring streaks of light coming from her sword. At the same time, the boulder started to grow thin near the top. More precisely, it was being cut down into fist-sized chunks.

Thwack! Crash! Crack! The process was similar to carving a sculpture piece by piece or slicing vegetables for fried rice.

“She looks... like she’s chopping a potato...”

One of the knights blankly murmured to himself, and everyone nodded in agreement. This spectacle naturally reminded them of cutting potatoes. Sheherazade’s swordsmanship and strength came as a sheer shock to everyone.

How is this possible?

Everyone was extremely curious. Only highly skilled swordsmen and women could slice through rocks with their swords. It was something only the best among high-level sword experts could succeed in. But slicing into a boulder several times in a row was impossible for even those sword experts. Why? Their swords were not durable enough to allow that.

It’s not surprising at all. In the end, swords are nothing but sharpened metal sticks.

So, striking down on a rock would obviously damage the weapon. It was unrealistic to wish for a sword to remain unharmed after smiting a rock when cutting a piece of leather or a chunk of meat was enough to damage its blade. That was the reason why a sword master's "aura" was considered the most powerful ability they possessed. The skill allowed them to slice through any object without harming their sword. But as for that woman...

She's not using an aura and isn't a sword How... how could her sword remain fine even when it hit the boulder dozens of times?

Everyone gawked at Sheherazade's back in shock and astonishment. Of course, they were ignorant of the fact that she was only one step away from becoming a sword master.

Hmph!

Her eyes grew calmer the more she wielded her scimitar. At the same time, her movements became more precise and focused. Every strike of her sword served a purpose. She used the minimum amount of mana needed to maintain her momentum while wielding the sword.

The moment her scimitar's blade met the surface of the boulder, she concentrated her mana in a flash and ramped up the sword's cutting force. This process was repeated throughout her stormy wielding, her focus never breaking at any point. Previously, it would have been impossible for her to possess this boundless ability to focus. However, it was made possible for her after going through a hellish training with Javier. But she wasn't aware of what she had achieved yet. Right now, she was only focused on the goal of getting rid of the boulder in front of her.

Smph! Spph!

Now, the boulder had been hit with over 200 sword strikes. At last, she gave her final blow when there were only 20 inches of the rock remaining.

Bam! The remaining boulder was neatly cut in half. Sheherazade took her scimitar away, blowing the edge of the blade that had grown hot from friction. Then she put her sword back in its sheath as if nothing had happened and turned to everyone else.

“Will this do?”

She pointed back with her thumb where the boulder once stood. Now, it was only a pile of fist-sized, square rocks. No one, including Julian, could give an easy response. A smile came over Sheherazade’s face.

“Clean it up.”

With that, she coldly turned back. It was only then that the knights came to their senses and started to clean up the debris.

***

The night wore on, and it was like any other day. But not for Sheherazade. She was invited to dinner by Count Frontera for lending Julian a hand earlier in the afternoon.

“Without you, Miss Sheherazade, my youngest son would have been in a lot of trouble. Thank you.”

“Please do not mention it.”

The size of the table was modest for a count. Similarly, the food spread across the table was simple yet well-made. Count Frontera conveyed his gratitude to Sheherazade, and she shook her head and spoke.

“I simply came across a troubled man during my stroll by accident,” she said humbly.

“If someone else was there, they may not have made the same choice as you. Your kind heart and goodwill are what brought this fortunate meeting,” reasoned Count Frontera in a gentle voice.

“...”

His compliment made Sheherazade uncomfortable. Grabbing her fork, she thought to herself how she only helped Julian to get Lloyd's lullaby. So, why was everyone doing this to her?

They're making me uncomfortable.

Actually, she wasn't accustomed to compliments. Her subjects often praised her, sure, but it was rare for her to receive genuine words of compliment and gratitude from people of higher or equal status as her. And so, she felt uncomfortable at this dinner table as if she wore something that didn't fit her body. Furthermore, she couldn't get used to the unexpectedly sweet and heartwarming air around this family.

"My dear son, wasn't the journey too rough on you?" asked Marbella Frontera to Julian.

"Not at all," replied Julian with a smile. "I was treated very well by the knights who escorted me."

"Is that so? They sound like wonderful people," she commented with a genuine smile.

"Yes, Mother. Not only that, like I told you, Miss Sheherazade was of great assistance to us."

"Indeed. Thank you, Miss Sheherazade. Our family has received a great favor from you today." Countess Marbella's eyes were filled with gratitude as they fixed on Sheherazade.

"Oh, is that so..."

Marbella Frontera beamed at Sheherazade, who awkwardly bowed in response. Forking the salad without any words, she focused on the conversation at the table.

"Julian," Arcos Frontera chimed in.

"Yes, Father."

“It must have been hard for you to study alone in a foreign place.”

“Not at all,” replied Julian in a confident tone. “I had everything I needed during my stay there. It is all thanks to Father, Mother, and Lloyd.”

Count Frontera shook his head knowingly, however. “You may say that, but I understand how you really feel as your father. How can I not? I know how upsetting it is to live in a place full of strangers...”

Could it be that he was overwhelmed by his emotions? He suddenly chugged down three glasses of champagne.

“Father...? Are you all right?” Julian spoke with a worried look on his face.

“Haha. I am perfectly fine,” Count Frontera assured him. “I am just very happy. This day couldn’t get any better. How can I not be joyful?”

“Ahaha, y-you are right.”

“That is why.”

The alcohol suddenly made his face flush red, and his eyes became wet as they looked from Lloyd to Julian.

“I am happy,” went on Count Frontera, “that I am your father.”

“Father...” Julian’s voice trembled.

“In all honesty, I do not know how to express my feelings right now. I am proud of you both. There is nothing in this world I am more proud of than you two. Do you think it is because of your success? Since my oldest son is a reputable engineer and my youngest son graduated from the royal academy with honors? That is not it.”

The count tearfully continued to talk.

“I am not happy because you two are successful. I am merely thankful that you two grew up to be healthy and kind adults. I am grateful to be your father even if I don’t deserve the spot. I want to thank fate for giving both of you as my son.”

“Um, Father, I think you are quite drunk-”

“No, I’m not. Julian and Lloyd… I am ready to give you the world even right now. If fate cruelly told me that I needed to roll around for the rest of my life to protect you both, I could roll back and forth thousands, tens of thousands, and billions of times with a smile on my face. If only that would make you two happy. Do you understand?”

“Yes... Father...” A shaft of embarrassment terrorized Julian as he answered.

The same went for Lloyd sitting at his side, and every cell in his body cringed at the count’s remarks. Countess Frontera, who was sitting across from the two, covered her flushed face with her hands, and her gesture seemed to say, “Why did you drink this much when you are a lightweight and when we have a guest?”

However, Sheherazade was inwardly shocked. Was she shocked because she, too, couldn’t take the heartfelt, toe-curling, and emotional speech from the count? No. It was the opposite. She was flooded with envy.

Is this... what family is supposed to be like?

She thought this kind of family only appeared in lofty and innocent fairy tales. She never expected to see one in real life.

This is... so different from mine.

Sheherazade clenched her fists under the table. Just then, the sultan came to her mind.

He was her father, but he was closer to being a merciless ruler. The life she had led so far to get acknowledged by the sultan! How desperately she had to push herself to get the slightest amount of acceptance, acknowledgment, and attention as she grew up among the dozens of princesses and princes!

Not a day went by when she didn’t use her sword. Even when the blisters in her hands burst over and over again and her father never bothered to look in her direction, she never let go of her sword. She lived with a firm conviction that her father would proudly accept and treat her as his daughter only if she became a skilled swordswoman and a sword master.

The same was true right now. The only reason she desperately wanted to acquire the lullaby from Lloyd and become a sword master was to get accepted by her father.

“...”

But this. There was something unfair about this. It turned out that getting accepted by your parents didn’t require you to put in back-breaking effort and soak your pillow in tears every night while comforting yourself that everything was fine.

Do other people not need to put in work to get accepted?

They didn’t. That was normal. That was what an ordinary family was like. Parents liked their children for no reason. That was how family and parent-child relationships worked. However, she never grew up in such a family and only had that realization just now. A pang of resentment and emptiness struck her heart. She felt like her years of struggle were all for nothing.

“...”

What am I? She clenched her fists under the table, shivering. She suddenly felt small. Her shoulders drooped, and her head hung low in meaninglessness.

From then onward, everything around her grew bleak. The food going into her mouth and the conversation she had with the Frontera family became a blur. She finished the meal in a daze and long forgot about striking a new deal with Lloyd, which was her original plan. Once she came back to her room, she sat blankly on the edge of her bed for a long time.

The night wore further on, and the moon and stars shimmered, ignorant of her feelings. As the white moonlight scratched the windowsill, Sheherazade rose as though she was allured by something and started to pack her things.

I’m going back.

She didn’t know why. She felt empty. The effort she put in until now. The acceptance she yearned for from her father. The sword master status she direly wished for. Everything felt meaningless and empty. Now, she didn’t want to think anymore. She wanted to rest for a bit.

I need to leave.

Creak. She slipped out of her room and entered the hallway, which was void of any light. The bleak darkness ahead strangely made her sigh.

“Whew...”

She couldn’t understand why she was sighing. Everything felt too empty and unbearable. She moved forward. With one, two steps, she trudged off to the end of the hallway. Tears started to run down her cheeks onto the floor. Right when she was about to wipe them off with her hand like an idiot...

“Miss Sheherazade...?”

Out of nowhere, Julian’s voice carefully caught her.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 206: A Secret Plan to Stop Forced Labor (1)

“Miss Sheherazade?” Julian asked frightfully.

Julian was quietly sitting on a bench in the hallway because he couldn’t sleep. His home felt oddly unfamiliar for some reason. Also, all sorts of concerns pestered his thoughts. So he came to rest on the hallway bench, just to sit there. The summer night air flowing through the window opposite the bench pleased him, and the soft, distant whirring noise of insects tickled his ears. He stayed there with his eyes closed, feeling refreshed. That was when he heard something. There was a soft creaking from a door, followed by a soft thud of footsteps. And later, he met eyes with Sheherazade, who was looking around the dark hallway lest someone see her or she wakes the others up. Julian’s bunny-like eyes opened in surprise.

“Hmm? What is going on?” asked Julian in a daze.

Julian had blurted out the question in confusion. However, he wondered if it was a dumb one as Sheherazade was coldly staring at him with a leaden face.

“...”

But she didn’t say anything. She simply fixed her toneless eyes on him. Julian wondered if his silly question irritated her. Tensing his neck slightly, he quickly added, “Um, I’m sorry.”

“About... what?” asked Sheherazade at last.

“Excuse me?” Julian asked in surprise.

“What are you sorry about?”

“Oh...”

Sheherazade was still wearing a straight face. Julian was glad that she was now speaking, but he was taken aback by her question. Could it be that she was really angry? But about what? And what was he apologizing for? Julian racked his brain to find a solution, but his clever mind, whose excellent performance as evidenced by his academic achievements, wasn't clicking at the moment for some reason. It grated and squeaked like an unoiled wheel.

"Just. I'm just sorry," Julian spoke after trying to think of a response. He gulped and looked up.

"..."

"For sitting down here, and um, catching you off-guard," added Julian as an afterthought.

Sheherazade didn't speak.

"If I really surprised you there, I apologize. I'm sorry."

"..."

Sheherazade considered her feelings. She was surprised but not angry. And she had nothing to feel sorry for this man and was quizzical about how she should respond to his behavior. Part of her felt flustered, too.

I never expected to bump into him here.

It never crossed her mind. She was too spaced out up until a moment ago and too emotionally drained. Even the sword master syndrome couldn't keep her attention laser-focused on everything. So, she didn't catch his presence.

"Um, hmm, actually, I was having a hard time falling asleep," Julian prattled. "So, I was just getting some fresh air. I never expected you to come out like this... and surprise me... Um, you know, I would have made some noise had I known."

"I knew you were here," tonelessly replied Sheherazade. "I wasn't surprised."

"Really...?"

“Yes.”

For some reason, she lied. Several times even. It was an odd and unsettling situation. This bunny-looking man had the power to make her lie.

“But what is that bag you are carrying-”

“Lunch box,” she immediately muttered.

Scheherazade suddenly felt a rush of heat, and her face burned red. She had given a half-hearted response to just get past the situation. But now that the words had come out of her mouth, she thought it sounded too strange.

Does he… see me as a lady who packs a lunchbox to go out in the middle of the night because she can’t get any sleep?

She hoped that wasn’t true. But this bunny-like man simply believed her outrageous answer.

“Oh, I see,” Julian accepted coolly.

No...

“You must have been very hungry.”

No, it’s not that...

“Actually, I was getting a little hungry myself, hehe.”

I’m not going to share! I mean, don’t believe what I said, she told herself. Julian was beaming so innocently at her that she grew solemn seeing him smile.

“Then I will excuse myself if you don’t have anything else to say.”

She quickly moved past Julian. That had been her plan at least, but she wasn’t able to.

“Um, I actually have something to say...”

“Excuse me...?”

Julian’s words stopped her dead in her tracks. She turned around and found Julian still flashing a smile at her.

“If you are going for a walk, then, shall we walk together?”

“Of course, I refuse-”

“I won’t ask you to share your food with me,” promised Julian.

“...”

“I actually have been wanting to go on a walk. But my vision is a bit poor at night because I’ve spent too much time reading books. So, I often trip over a jagged stone when I walk alone at night.”

“...”

“So, I will just follow you from behind.”

“...”

I should just lose him, she told herself. Sheherazade wordlessly turned around and walked down the hallway. She heard Julian’s footsteps following her. Not minding at all, she passed the main chamber, opened the door, and stepped out into the garden. The footsteps of Julian following behind her grew slightly more hurried. But she didn’t care, regardless. She simply strode across the garden, distanced herself from the annex, and stood in front of the wall.

“Wait, hold on-”

Jump! Ignoring Julian’s voice, she quickly crossed over the wall in one leap.

“...”

Now, he won’t follow me, she said to herself. Feeling relaxed and alone at the same time, she started to walk ahead. Just then...

“Argh...!”

Thump! Julian rolled and fell down to the ground from the wall she had just jumped over.

“Ugh, wait for me,” groaned Julian.

“...”

“This is so painful.” He dusted off his clothes.

“...”

“Do you plan on asking me whether I’m hurt?” he asked as he looked at Sheherazade.

“Not at all...”

Deciding to ignore him again, she was about to turn when an unexpected question stabbed through her heart.

“Are you still... in pain?”

“Excuse me?” Sheherazade broke off. It was he who hurt himself after clumsily jumping over the wall. So, why was he asking whether she was still in pain? Why was he, she wondered to herself, staring at her with eyes full of concern?

“You’ve been like this since earlier.”

Julian’s voice sounded like a whisper and continued to speak carefully.

“At dinner earlier… with my family.”

“...”

“You seemed to be in a lot of pain since then,” Julian said.

“...”

“So, um, actually... Here. Take this.”

Limping to his feet, Julian searched for something in the inner pocket of his vest that he wore over his pajamas and held it out to her. It was a vial.

“It’s digestive medicine. I figured you had an upset stomach... from all the greasy food at our dinner today…” Julian scratched his head. “Um, the medicine is quite effective. However, it’s extremely sour and bitter, so, um, I prepared this for you as well.”

He searched his pocket again, and this time, there were two round red pieces of candy wrapped in wax paper.

“It will be bearable if you suck on this candy right after taking the digestive medicine.”

“...”

Sheherazade stared at him dazedly, as well as the digestive medicine, the candy, and his hands.

He’s bleeding.

His hand was slightly scraped. Probably from the fall a little while ago. It must be quite painful, she thought. But his face didn’t show any signs of pain. He only continued staring at her with eyes full of guilt and concern.

“Pray, are you not a fan of strawberry-flavored candy?” wondered Julian aloud in a careful voice.

Sheherazade didn’t respond. She simply had her eyes pinned on Julian.

“Um, if it’s not that, then, I’m sorry for lying earlier. I honestly did have trouble sleeping and was idling around because of that, but, um, I was more worried about you, Miss Sheherazade...” Julian trailed off, suddenly confessing.

“...”

“So,” he went on, this time more bravely, “I stayed in the annex hallway just in case as I was idling around anyway. I wanted to give you what I prepared if I heard you were awake. Um, and also...”

“Did you tell another lie?”

“Yes...”

His bunny eyes flinched. And with widened eyes, he spoke.

“When I said I wanted to go on a walk and my vision was poor at night...”

“Those were lies as well?”

“Yes...” confessed Julian.

“Was it just to give me this?”

“Mhm... Yes.”

“I see you are very good at making excuses.”

“I’m sorry...”

“It is all right,” she said. “I lied too.”

“Excuse me?”

His eyes grew round again. Sheherazade laughed for the first time that night at seeing his gaze looking up at her.

“I don’t have a lunch box with me,” she said.

“Oh...” he gaped.

“This bag isn’t a lunch box. It’s a travel bag.”

“Wait a minute,” Julian paused. “Are you leaving?”

“I am.”

“...”

“Are you not going to ask me why?”

“Yes, I won’t.” Julian shook his head, and with a gaze that had grown deeper, he looked up at her. “If I do, I might be forcing you to give me an answer. Then you would be reminded of the painful reasons you have, Miss Sheherazade.”

“...”

“I don’t want to do that. Now, take this. Here.”

“...”

The vial that contained the medicine. The wax-paper-wrapped candies. She took them in a daze, and soon, became struck with a thought.

“Hold on...”

She then opened a wax paper wrapper and tossed a piece of candy in her mouth. She opened another one and put it in Julian’s mouth. And she clasped the wax paper and rolled it up, grabbing his hand and pressing his palm with it.

“Ouch...!” Julian agonized.

“Hold on,” she said.

“Ugh, it stings.” Julian scowled.

“Stop pretending. You didn’t even know that you were hurt until now.”

“I didn’t know, yes, but it still stings when you press like that.”

“Stay still.”

Sheherazade couldn’t just leave him like this. The last thing she could do was stop this man’s hand from bleeding. That would lessen the guilt and regret inside of her heart. She pressed Julian’s hand against the paper harder. A look of dismay appeared on his face.

“Um, Miss Sheherazade?”

“Yes.”

“The candy. You shouldn’t have eaten it now.”

“…”

“The medicine is extremely sour and bitter, you see.”

“…”

That’s what he is worried about right now? It was probably because of this thought that she blurted out the following question by impulse.

“Why are you so worried about me?”

“Excuse me?” Julian gaped.

“I am asking why you have been so particularly worried about me since a while ago.”

She was curious and confused. She had to hear his answer to leave without any regrets. That was how strange Julian’s behavior was. He was like a baby bird worrying about its mother, nervously following Sheherazade everywhere she went. There had to be a special reason, she figured. So, she decided to find out. When she heard him speak, Sheherazade stopped breathing for a second.

“No reason.”

“...”

“There is no particular reason. Really, I am just worried,” replied Julian.

“...”

“I just idled around because I was worried about you and brought these for no particular reason... Since you are leaving, I now feel...”

“Sad?” she put in.

“Yes...” confessed Julian.

“Why?”

“I don’t have a reason for this either.”

“...”

No reason. He really had no special reason. Sheherazade bit her lips, tearing up. She had led a hard life until now. Up to this day, people needed a reason to care about her. At first, she couldn’t wrap her head around how Julian could worry for “no reason”. Then she was momentarily confused about how that was even possible. She wondered what those words meant and why they felt so foreign to her. And at last, as she found the answer to both questions, her suppressed resentment melted down the front she put on without a single trace.

“You see, I...”

From then onward, like she was bewitched by something, Sheherazade stopped holding back and expressionlessly shared her life story as though she was talking about someone else. She was still pressing his wounded hand. Her words were toneless, dry, and objective.

Her eyes started to get wet to her dismay. Nonetheless, Julian did nothing but occasionally give a silent nod. He never asked if she was okay or said she went through a lot. He simply met her eyes, quietly standing in front of her, and listened as the night passed by.

By the time the morning rolled around, Sheherazade realized at last that she had been keeping Julian up all night. Her desire to leave this place was now gone. There wasn't any particular reason. She just wanted to stay by Julian's side.

***

Ha! Look at those two. It's nice to be young.

Though it was early summer, the morning was hot, not warm. The season was harsh as it raised the hackles of a pure, innocent single man, Lloyd. With his chin propped against the wooden fence of the manor, he grumbled and gazed in the distance. A man and woman were walking along the pathway under the manor's hill. It was Julian and Sheherazade.

"Hmm."

Lloyd scowled, recalling the events of a few days ago. It was probably about five days ago. The night Julian returned home, gloom hung over Sheherazade's face as she joined their family dinner. It looked like she was about to dash off to her kingdom. But the next day, her face changed altogether.

It was the face of a completely different person. And she started to stick around Julian all day.

What could have happened that night? What could have taken place that explains this happy, romantic atmosphere around them? But Lloyd wasn't curious about it.

That isn't important.

Sure, he was a bit miserable about still being single. But there was something more important than his love life right now.

My retirement plan.

Not just any kind. It was a plan that would deal with the danger that he knew was coming to ruin his retirement.

Of course. If I sit idly like this, I'll never be able to live the life of Riley. The queen won't leave me alone. I'm sure of it.

Lloyd could vouch for it. Looking back, his accomplishments were too great. From solving the financial crisis in his fiefdom to managing physical, administrative, and pathological crises, he performed extraordinary feats that went well beyond everyone's expectations, eventually earning him the queen's complete trust. Lloyd bit his lips as he had the thought.

No. At this rate, I won't be able to live in peace for the remainder of my life. If I let things continue as is, I'll end up like Hwang Hee, the minister who passed away after being exploited by King Sejong for his entire life.

Lloyd didn't want that. He wanted to avoid that fate at all costs. He already did more than enough work up to this point. Now, he wanted to take a break and be promised a peaceful retirement. Thus, live the rest of his life leisurely and relaxing.

To do that, I need to come up with a plan.

Lloyd had a feeling he would need a plan before, but he couldn't think of one. He couldn't devise a good plan until he now saw Julian and Sheherazade happily flirting with each other like two lovebirds. That was when he was hit with the ingenious plan to ensure his beautiful, work-free retirement.

It's doable. As long as everything goes to plan, I can do it. I will be able to come up with a rough idea of how to prevent the queen from treating me like a slave.

Just then, a mischievous smile spilled out of him.

"Mwahaha. So, what I will do is..."

With a greasy smile on his face, Lloyd gazed down at those flirty birds in the path. And he reviewed the broad plan he just came up with.

"I'm going to be your cupid, Julian. Thanks."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 207: A Secret Plan to Stop Forced Labor (2)

A long, long time ago, about 600 years ago, in the land of Joseon ruled by the Great King Sejong, there lived a minister named Hwang Hee. As a praised premier, he was very good at his job and King Sejong cherished him. Along with his favor, the king entrusted many responsibilities to Hwang, who broke his back every time he received more work. His broken back made him want to run away.

So one day, Minister Hwang pleaded to the king. Your Majesty, I wish to spend the rest of my life back home as my body has grown fragile. The merciful King Sejong thus said, “I shall send you my carriage, so come to the palace every morning riding that.” Sometime much later, Minister Hwang entreated the king. Please let me rest as my mother passed away. Please let me use my overdue vacation. Please put me in retirement. Please dismiss me from the palace. Please fire me.

But each time, King Sejong yelled, “No!” Because of that, the praised premier could retire only four months before the passing of King Sejong. What happened after that? He died before he was able to enjoy his life to the fullest. Ah, ah, what a happy, hellish ending!

This story may sound funny to some, but if I really think it through, it isn’t an unrealistic one… at least for me.

Lloyd replayed the story in his head and clenched his fists. Minister Hwang Hee desperately begged to retire. But King Sejong exploited and used every bit of his talent until he passed away. Someone could regard this as a slightly amusing story in the history of Korea. Lloyd thought the same before.

But now, the story wasn’t just an old tale to him. King Sejong and Minister Hwang Hee. Queen Magentano and himself. Unsettlingly, Lloyd felt that his life was dangerously flowing in the same direction as Hwang’s.

I’m not just being emotional.

Lloyd nibbled his lips. Actually, this was a feeling he had since a while ago. A swirl of nervousness sometimes rushed through him, waking him up in his sleep on occasion. He suffered from a nightmare where the queen summoned him to the kingdom and gave him endless work. When in fact, he planned to spend the rest of his life in peace now that he overcame all his challenges and obstacles.

But that nightmare could become reality if I let my guard down. That's the sense I get from the current state of things.

Lloyd licked his lips, his mouth feeling bitter. Ever since he joined the delegation to Ahinsya at the queen's command, a part of his mind started to whisper to him, "This isn't right." The same thing happened when he had gone to meet the queen with Termes to get the latter approved for asylum. That was when he felt confident about it. He'd certainly become the queen's slave or SVC if he did nothing like now.

So, I need a plan.

Lloyd had revealed too much of his capabilities. He had shown skills beyond what was necessary to overcome the financial, physical, and biological crises in his fiefdom, leading him to gain the queen's approval. But it turned out that the queen was the type to exploit talent and believed that the sufferings of competent individuals brought more comfort for the people and more prosperity to the kingdom. So, without a plan in hand, Lloyd would forever be doomed to work. He would have to say goodbye to the life of leisure he desired so badly.

That won't do.

Chills ran down his spine at the thought. He had already worked hard enough in South Korea. Even in this world, he had gone through all sorts of hardship. To him, the fate of working for the rest of his life was equal to capital punishment. That was exactly the reason why Lloyd felt the need for a plan that would save him from the queen's future exploitations. He had spent the past few days racking his brain for a way out.

And it's not like I can protest against her.

Queen Magentano was a ruler with absolute power. Her political power was unrivaled across the kingdom's history, and she was a high-level sword master. It was thanks to her that the kingdom enjoyed immense stability. Lloyd shook his head when his train of thought escalated to revolting against her because he wanted to laze around.

I'm not that desperate.

The chances of failure were high. Even if he succeeded, it would be the same as opening the gate of Hell, bringing more work to him. If he got unlucky, he could become the new king and be stuck handling government affairs for the rest of his life. Lloyd wanted to stay as far away as he could from that kind of situation.

Plus, Queen Magentano has complete trust in me. If I use this well, she could be my biggest supporter until death. So, it's better that she stays on the throne for as long as possible.

Queen Magentano's place on the throne had to remain secure. His goal was to relax and enjoy life under her stable rule. So, there was a need to solidify his footing in a new way, which would grant him a lot of rights without many responsibilities. A political position that would advantage him more than anything. That was what Lloyd had on his mind recently.

But the problem was that I couldn't come up with any ideas. Not until now, that is. Julian, it's all thanks to you.

The corners of Lloyd's lips curved upward. His gaze traveled to the pathway beneath the hill, where Julian and Sheherazade were walking together side by side. Sometimes one went ahead of the other to avoid the searing summer heat. Regardless, the air of awkwardness was still strong between them. The wheels in Lloyd's head started to turn at the sight, and finally, he found a plan to stop the queen from exploiting him.

Okay, it's doable. I think I can do it.

Lloyd saw a glimpse of hope. A chance for success. It was worth a try. Once he succeeded, the queen would have greater difficulty attempting to burden him with more work. Heck, the atmosphere would even turn awkward, at least if she did try. At this point, a mischievous smile appeared on his face.

So, I think I should owe you something this time.

Now that he had a plan, it was better for Lloyd to get started right away instead of procrastinating. That night, Lloyd started to execute his plan to actualize his grand scheme. His first target was Julian.

***

“Whew...”

A helpless sigh came out of him. But Julian didn’t know why. He couldn’t understand why he kept sighing during dinner and why he didn’t enjoy eating at home after he finally returned.

I really don’t know.

Julian softly shook his head. His mind grew restless for some reason. Even during dinner while talking with his parents. Even when he was having grilled duck, his favorite. Something kept pestering his heart. His heart thumped without any reason, only to feel stifled. Then he would start smiling without meaning to. As a result, he couldn’t even tell what he was eating right now. To put it simply, he was...

“You feel like you’re going nuts, right?”

Flinch! It was right after he slipped out to the hallway after the meal, leaving his half-full plate and putting on an awkward smile at his worried parents. Julian shuddered at the voice that came from the side. He was surprised as he was just wondering whether he had lost it. It was like his thoughts were read aloud. Taken aback, Julian turned to the voice.

“Lloyd...?”

Lloyd was standing there, stroking his chin and glancing at him with a strange gaze.

“Wh-what are you saying? I’ve lost it?”

“I didn’t say you were,” denied Lloyd brazenly.

“What?”

“I was just asking whether you were having that thought about yourself,” clarified Lloyd in a matter-of-fact voice.

“Um...”

Lloyd’s nonchalant response put Julian at a loss for words.

“No, it’s not that,” hurried Julian, who suddenly felt exposed. “It’s really nothing. I’m fine. My stomach feels a bit unwell. That’s all.”

“Really?”

“Yeah,” swallowed Julian.

“Really?” Lloyd sent another meaningful gaze.

“Uh-huh.”

“Is it indigestion? Should I prick your finger?”

“Eh?”

Prick my finger? How?

Julian lifted his head and found an ever-so-suggestive smile on his brother’s face.

“It’s simple,” explained Lloyd, motioning his hands. “Tie your thumb with a thread and poke the area near the root of the nail in one stab! When dark blood starts to gush out, loosen the thread and rub your back. Works like a charm. Your stomach will feel much better.”

“...”

“Wanna try it out?” Lloyd waggled his brows.

“N-no, thanks.”

Stab his finger with a needle? Draw out dark blood? Julian instinctively shook his head, and he turned toward his room.

“I am fine,” refused Julian. “I don’t want that.”

“Really?”

“Yep,” said Julian, and he started to walk off.

But Lloyd continued to follow Julian. Why is Lloyd following me? I feel restless as it is and want to be alone, Julian told himself. But his brother continued to follow him, disregarding his feelings. What was more, Lloyd started to ramble again.

“Julian, I’m your brother. I know,” Lloyd remarked.

“Wh-what?”

“I know what you are thinking.”

“What... am I thinking?” muttered Julian.

“You feel like you’re in a strange mood, right?”

“Not really.”

Julian hurried his steps, but to his dismay, Lloyd walked faster to match his pace. To his greater dismay, Lloyd was able to directly pinpoint his inner thoughts.

“And yet, you don’t know why you’re feeling this way,” stated Lloyd.

“...”

It was true. He had been restless all evening. He couldn’t figure out why no matter how hard he thought. Helpless, he started to even feel worse. And here was Lloyd, speaking as though he could see through him. At last, Julian stopped and glanced up at Lloyd with a serious gaze.

“Lloyd,” he muttered hesitantly. “Actually, something has been bugging my mind.”

“Yeah, tell me,” Lloyd said.

“You’re right. I feel really strange.”

“Great,” Lloyd complimented. “Are you admitting your state of mind now? This is a great start. Should we walk more calmly?”

“Oh, yeah,” Julian replied to his older brother.

Lloyd had become so reliable unlike when he was a delinquent. His sweet and gentle voice. His face says, “I get you.” Julian completely lowered his guard, and he started to share the feelings in his heart as he strolled along the pathway in front of the manor with Lloyd.

“To be honest,” Julian began. “I’ve been feeling slightly off since this evening. But I can’t figure out why I’m like this.”

“You can’t?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Then let’s slow down for a second. Think back to late afternoon today. Tell me exactly when you started to feel weird.”

“When?”

“Yeah.”

“Hmm...” Julian started to think back. “Um... You see... I strolled with Miss Sheherazade in the afternoon.”

“Okay.”

“We talked a lot.”

“About what?”

“How she grew up. The difficulties she has with sword training. The reason behind the desert’s beauty. Stuff like that. It was nice listening to her. And...” Julian trailed off.

“And what?”

“...”

Julian paused. An epiphany struck him. He knew now.

“I think I’ve started to feel this way ever since I came back alone from the stroll with Miss Sheherazade.”

“Is that so?”

“Yeah.” Julian nodded, giving Lloyd more confirmation. “That’s right. I really think it is. Ever since then, I’ve been feeling restless, weird, and-”

“Empty,” Lloyd broke in. “Am I right?”

“Yeah. How did you know?”

Julian was amazed. He was amazed at how Lloyd was able to point out his feelings with perfect accuracy. As though he was begging for an answer, Julian gazed at Lloyd, who grinned. And Lloyd spoke as if the answer to his younger brother’s question was obvious.

“You’re experiencing your first love.”

“What...?”

“First love,” said Lloyd again. “Don’t you know what that is?”

“Um, I know what it is,” replied Julian curtly.

“Then good. That’s what you’re going through.”

“Me?” gaped Julian.

“Yeah.”

“First love,” said Julian again.

“Uh-huh.”

“With Miss Sheherazade?”

“Probably?”

“...”

Julian shut his mouth. The sheer shock of realizing his feelings made him freeze. He fell into a daze, looking back at himself to see if Lloyd was really right. He even stopped breathing and dryly swallowed. Lloyd chuckled as he looked at Julian.

I knew I was right.

Lloyd was right about what he saw. Julian and Sheherazade were strolling earlier this afternoon. He could see right through them. The two looked like a typical pair of lovebirds in the early stages of dating.

How could I not tell? I’ve seen this sight more times than I can count.

Lloyd was once a university student in South Korea. Though he was a civil engineering major where girls were thin on the ground, he saw many couples while walking around campus in the spring. Tons of them. His colleagues and friends often dated each other as well.

There were especially a lot of them during my freshman year.

Through the new student get-together, orientation, general assembly, and even blind dates, there were a number of couples that Lloyd saw come together in different ways. Sometimes, there were times he had to drink with a heartbroken friend whose situationship with a girl ended. And, of course, there was the time he himself had a thing with a girl.

Dammit. Had it not been for the coin karaoke.

Lloyd blamed the karaoke in front of the university gate. And he pettily hoped his friend would get athlete's foot for urging them to sing there.

Tsk.

Lloyd immediately suppressed his old memory, and he looked at Julian standing right in front of him.

Yeah, he's in a situationship for sure.

His radar, which was sharpened at his school campus, was right. Julian and Sheherazade had something going on, but it looked like the two were oblivious to their relationship. It made sense.

Of course. They're probably totally novices in this area.

Julian grew up doing nothing but studying. It wasn't much different for Sheherazade.

She likely dedicated her whole life to sword training until now.

Dating was a foreign concept to them as they engrossed themselves in the field of their expertise, that is until they experienced love for the first time. And now, they were set to have a rough path full of mistakes with little emotional intelligence.

But I can't leave them to break up. That would be a waste.

It was a waste for them both and for Lloyd himself. So, he decided to become a Cupid for them. Do a good deed that brings these two lovebirds together. And reap the best benefit of it. With such resolve in his mind,

Lloyd grinned with satisfaction. He then put on a confident face, gaze, and voice. And he started to make the comments he had come prepared.

“You’ll lose Miss Sheherazade if you keep fumbling like this.”

“What...?”

Lose her. Those words prompted Julian’s eyes to widen in surprise. Anxiety filled his eyes so evidently. That made Lloyd smile in a glow of satisfaction. Why? Lloyd was confident that his plan to make their marriage happen would elevate his status where he would be desirable and influential to both the queen and sultan and be able to masterfully two-time them. From then on, Lloyd licked his lips, ready to jump into action.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 208: A Secret Plan to Stop Forced Labor (3)

First love. Much like measles, it was an emotion that blossomed inside everyone at least once in their life. It was also a painful memory for most because they were too clumsy to clutch and reap its final fruits. Lloyd, too, had experienced his first love. Back in his days when stores rented out books, his heart used to pound every time he looked at the part-time worker there. He was confused as to what was happening to him, why his face kept getting red. A clench of dismay rushed through him as he couldn't make sense of his bodily reactions. But strangely and too much of his dismay, he found himself making for the store on his own all the time, each visit causing the same terrible blush on his face and the maddening increase of heartbeat. Even so, he mysteriously ushered himself to the store, as if drawn by something enchanting, and borrowed piles of books he wouldn't read. The reason behind his strange behavior was clarified only much later when the girl quit her job.

Tsk.

Lloyd knew neither her phone number nor her name. They never properly spoke. Just like that, his first love at 14 ended in failure. Lloyd pushed aside his old memory and spoke, looking straight into Julian's eyes.

"You'll lose Miss Sheherazade if you keep fumbling like this."

"What...?"

Julian's eyes widened like a bunny's.

"I'm not joking," Lloyd continued. "You do know why she crossed the desert to come here, right?"

"Oh, I do," Julian replied. "She told me she has something to get from you. That she wants to record your lullaby..."

"What do you think will happen if I give her a recording right now?" Lloyd glanced at him meaningfully.

“Lloyd...?”

“Then she will go back to her kingdom, right?”

“Oh, I... guess?” Julian’s voice trembled.

“What are you going to do about it?” echoed Lloyd heavily.

Now, Lloyd could hear the wheels in Julian’s head turning. His eyes shook when he resumed. “Um, Lloyd, are you really going to do that?”

His gaze seemed to beg, “Please don’t!”

“I don’t know,” Lloyd said in a dry tone. “The decision isn’t mine to make.”

“Then?”

“It’s up to Miss Sheherazade.”

His tone started to sound more nonchalant, as though he knew nothing and didn’t care what decision she made.

“The thing is,” Lloyd continued, “I laid out the choices she had a few days before you arrived. It was either to serve in the Engineering Corps for five years in exchange for the lullaby recording or go back.”

“Then...” Julian mumbled, unsure how to react.

“If she thankfully takes my offer, she will spend about five years here. If not, well, there’s nothing I can do.” Lloyd stressed his last words.

“Th-that’s-”

“You don’t want that to happen, right?” exclaimed Lloyd.

Nod. Julian nodded his head earnestly. Done. I succeeded in coaxing him, Lloyd told himself as he put on a smile that only he would know the reason behind.

“I know, you must hate to see her leave,” cooed Lloyd. “You want to always be with her. But you don’t know what to do about it. Right?”

“Yes...” Julian said, looking up at him with a more desperate gaze. “Lloyd, what should I do?”

“What you should do?”

“Yeah.”

“First, I suggest you observe her feelings.”

“Her feelings?”

“Yeah, this matter involves more than just how you feel.”

It was true. You couldn’t just think about your own feelings. It was important to consider if the object of your affection liked you too. So, Julian had to be considerate of the other party and learn about her feelings as carefully as possible.

That’s what I heard. From who? A classmate of mine.

The thing was, Lloyd never had a girlfriend before. He had never had any experience in that field. Though he was sad that was the case, it hardly mattered right now.

It doesn’t matter even if I don’t have any experience in this. What matters now is helping Julian realize his feelings and coaxing him to take action.

He just needed to gently coax him. And then what? Everything would naturally move forward after that.

Sheherazade must be feeling similar to Julian.

Thinking so, Lloyd tapped Julian’s shoulders.

“It’s nothing too difficult,” Lloyd comforted.“Now, you know what you’re feeling. So, stay true to your heart and take action. Be nicer to her, and when you find a chance, how about showing some courage?”

“Showing some courage?” gasped Julian.

“Uh-huh.”

“Do you mean to tell her how I feel?” gasped Julian again.

“Of course.”

Gulp. Julian’s neck bobbed as he swallowed. The mere thought of the act made him nervous. But then, Lloyd saw in a split second the vague light of determination flashing across Julian’s eyes.

That rascal.

Lloyd desperately suppressed his laughter, swallowing hard. He figured he could leave it here with Julian. Now, it was time to gently coax Sheherazade.

***

“Mwahaha.”

“...”

“Mwahahaha.”

“...”

The next morning, Javier seriously questioned whether his young master was in the right state of mind.

What is happening?

Javier stared at the back of Lloyd’s chestnut-shaped head with a leery gaze. They were taking a morning stroll after eating breakfast, and the man walking ahead of him kept letting out eerie bursts of laughter for some reason.

“Mwahahahaha.”

“...”

At last, unable to hold back any longer, Javier decided to ask. “What are you so happy about?”

Javier’s experiences told him that Lloyd was laughing like that for a reason. Convinced that Lloyd must be brewing up something treacherous, he asked him a question. And just as Javier expected, Lloyd stopped and turned, batting back with a peculiar smile on his face.

“Do I look like I am in your eyes as well?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Do I look happy?”

“Yes.”

“You saw it right,” admitted Lloyd. “I am happy.” And he added, “I think my plan will go very well.”

“Your plan?” asked Javier.

“A man and woman with different backgrounds, paths, and purposes in life will finally become one.”

“Could it be,” Javier mused, “that you are referring to Master Julian and Miss Sheherazade?”

“Hm? How did you know that?” Lloyd raised his brows.

“It would be impossible for me not to know,” Javier said matter-of-factly. “There was something special in their gaze toward each other. It is a look I have seen countless times.”

“You? You’ve seen this look countless times?” said Lloyd with a frown.

“Yes.”

“How?”

“It was very similar to the gaze I receive from women before they hand me a love letter,” Javier said expressionlessly.

“...”

“To give the exact number of times I have received this gaze-”

“Don’t count.”

“860-”

“I said don’t count.”

“...”

Lloyd felt a distinct wave of envy surging in his heart each time he met someone handsome. He was jealous about how they enjoyed so many perks just because they were good-looking. But Lloyd, with a bit of struggle, decided to pull himself together.

“Tsk. Anyway, you were right. It looks like the two will confirm their feelings for each other soon,” huffed Lloyd.

“How?”

“What do you mean ‘how’? I pushed them.”

“You, Master Lloyd?” asked Javier in disbelief.

“Uh-huh.”

Lloyd nodded his head. And he recalled what he had done the previous night.

“I went up to Julian,” narrated Lloyd. “I probed him a little to test the water. And just like I predicted, Julian was completely oblivious to his feelings.”

“Is that why you told him?”

“Yeah, and I did the same to Sheherazade,” divulged Lloyd with a smile.

Yes, he did. Right after encouraging Julian, Lloyd visited Sheherazade, who, at first, raised her guard when the former tried to strike up a conversation. Her attitude was nothing surprising. After all, she had been tricked by Lloyd multiple times already ever since they were Ahinsya. And she was unexpectedly coerced with an employment contract after traveling all the way across the desert to come here.

“She seemed determined to not believe anything I say,” Lloyd recalled.

“But how did you-”

“How did I make her come around?” stated Lloyd.

“Yes.”

Putting a big smile, Lloyd replied, “Well, nothing much. I told her that Julian would leave for the palace soon.”

That was true. All Lloyd needed to do was make them feel more anxious to stay together. And if he had solid evidence to back his claim, his words would become much more impactful. That was the very method Lloyd used against Sheherazade.

“I told her the plain truth,” added Lloyd. “I told her that Julian graduated second in his class, and he’ll soon be assigned a position in the palace. And he’s waiting here at home before he gets his assignment.”

Every word that came out of his mouth was true. Julian was set to return to the capital soon, and he’d become a resident of the capital as a palace official. So obviously, there was no reason for him to stay here, which meant he would grow distant from Sheherazade.

“I threw out a crucial fact that would make her turn toward Julian again. You know, people are always like that. They don’t take any action until they realize that there’s a time limit. That’s when they get all nervous and obsessive.”

It really was true. Even the things people took for granted evolved into something valuable when there was a time limit. For example, this could be seen during a 24-hour sale. A pack of ramen that someone normally didn’t eat would become a necessary purchase if it had a 50% discount for the day. That was the case even with products people didn’t plan to buy. The fear of regret made them eventually justify that they’d want the ramen sometime later and that purchasing it on sale was a smart move.

The same goes for cars. In particular, foreign cars. Sometimes, dealers will spread a rumor during their end-of-year sales that a specific model will be out of production starting next year. And a whole pack of people who’ve always wanted to buy the model but hesitated to flood to the dealer because they don’t want to miss their chance to own one. But come next year, the rumor turns out to be nonsense. They sell the same car all year long without a halt.

This sales method, “Now or Never,” stimulated people’s minds, and what Lloyd did to Sheherazade was similar.

“I told her Julian would stay here for a limited time. Now, she’ll start to think that she doesn’t want to lose him. Then this will naturally lead her to wonder why she’s having that thought.”

“Do you mean that she will realize her feelings in the process?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, I like that you’re a fast thinker,” Lloyd uttered, raising one of his brows.

“And I do not like this side of you, Master Lloyd” Javier’s face straightened. “I wish to ask your reason behind pairing them together. Your intentions can’t be pure, can it?”

“Mhm, of course not.”

Lloyd’s lips curved up, but his smile wasn’t innocent of course.

“I am doing this because I don’t want the queen to walk all over me.”

“Excuse me?”

Javier cocked his head to the side, unable to understand what he was talking about. What does pairing together Master Julian and Miss Sheherazade have anything to do with the queen? Javier felt a flood of curiosity surging in him.

“When the two get married,” Lloyd explained with a wry smile, “the queen won’t be able to treat me like a slave. No, even if it doesn’t go the way I want to, at least the grounds for my ultimate goal will be set.”

“May I ask how?”

“Sure thing. Simply put, when Julian and Sheherazade get married, my family will closely be allied with both the Magentano Royalty and the sultan’s kingdom.”

“Is that not treason?” Javier asked seriously.

“Not at all,” noted Lloyd. “Julian isn’t the eldest in the family. He’s the second son, so he won’t inherit the family estate. Thus, there’s nothing wrong with him marrying the princess of a sultan. Actually, it’s something to welcome at this moment in time.”

“What is that?”

“We just signed the peace treaty with the sultan.” There was confidence in Lloyd’s voice. “The sultan unexpectedly accepted his responsibility for the Monster Domino phenomenon. He paid a hefty compensation and even signed a safeguard agreement. As a result, these two arch-nemeses entered a period of peace.”

“Then,” Javier contributed, “if the second son of the Frontera county, which served as the hub of reconstruction after the Monster Domino tragedy, marries the princess of the sultan, who accepted responsibility for the incident, amid this peaceful era...”

“Their marriage will bring a promise of peace for everyone,” Lloyd finished. “For the royals, the public, and everyone else.”

In other words, their marriage would become an icon of peace. Furthermore, the Frontera fiefdom would become the symbol of peace and restoration. Once that happened, Lloyd would be able to two-time the two kingdoms without being accused of treason and under the blessing of everyone.

Plus, I have a useful title with me.

Lloyd recalled the very first title he had earned. Magentano Carry. The effect of the title enabled him to be absolutely free from receiving doubts of treason during the queen’s reign. In other words, as long as he didn’t act like a complete idiot, he wouldn’t be accused of treason.

“So, Queen Magentano won’t express any complaints though she may feel somewhat upset about the marriage. No, she might even give us more favors in fear of us getting closer to the sultan.”

“And that is how... the queen will not be able to use you like a slave...” Javier postulated.

“Yeah,” said Lloyd brightly. “It’ll look like I’d rush right into the arms of the sultan if she tried to do that.”

“...”

“The sultan will welcome me with open arms. It was me, not Julian, the sultan wanted to be his son-in-law, you know,” reminded Lloyd.

“...”

“And that’s how I will gain the upper hand with these two kingdoms. They will be forced to be more careful with us. Obviously, this will also guarantee a peaceful retirement for myself.” Lloyd smiled victoriously.

“Whew. Master Lloyd... You are really...”

“Really what?”

“Sly. Nasty. I have never met a more cunning swindler than you, Master Lloyd.”

“Sure, thank you.”

Lloyd smiled after revealing the idea inside his head. This was the polished plan he had come up with. The marriage between Julian and Sheherazade would be used to prompt the queen and sultan to win his favor. As long as that happened, he could spend the rest of his life in leisure without needing to grovel at anyone or get called by the queen.

But of course, it’ll take a lot of effort for me to maintain that upper hand.

The final goal? To acquire the right to have autonomy over his labor from the queen. That was his ultimate goal.

I can do it.

Inspecting his plan, Lloyd looked at the manor. The window to Julian’s room was tightly shut. Sheherazade’s window was also shut but with a layer of a curtain drawn. Looking from one to another, Lloyd smiled.

Yes, you two. Think about your feelings. Ponder on them. React to the arrow of realization I pierced in each of you.

The arrows had already been released, hitting their target spot on. So, Lloyd was confident. Julian and Sheherazade would react just the way he hoped they would. And indeed, his expectations were not wrong. Something really did happen deep into that night.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 209: Between an Order and Request (1)

Wahaha. Who knew that things would go this well?

It was a hot summer night. But being a young dragon himself, Solitas didn't mind the heat at all as he sauntered around. Instead, he simply clenched his fists for what he was able to achieve.

I did it. I did it. I finally mastered the wood block.

Solitas recalled what happened earlier in the day. He was wrestling with a wood block like any other day. He sliced, carved, and refined the wood to a size smaller than his nail. He was keeping his mind on the job when he heard a voice beside him.

"That will be enough. Let's move to the next step." It was Corgidus, his teacher.

Solitas wondered when his teacher had approached him and started to watch him work. He had been so focused that he didn't notice Corgidus's presence. But what surprised him more was the unexpected comment that came out of his teacher's mouth. Corgidus let out a snort at him.

"At this point, you can move on from the wood blocks," Corgidus said. "I am more proud of you because I can see that you have put a lot of effort in your own way."

"Th-then..." muttered Solitas, feeling expectant.

"Tomorrow, we will start carving stones."

Corgidus then tapped him on the shoulder twice as though he was complimenting him for a job well done and was proud of his work. Solitas inwardly jumped in sheer joy as he watched his teacher leave after dropping the good news.

I thought I'd never move past working on the wood blocks.

It was true. He himself could see how terrible he was with his hands. Even with the master dwarf as his teacher, he couldn't absorb even one percent of what he was being taught and Corgidus was becoming frustrated with him as well. But Solitas didn't give up.

I can't give up. I need to get married!

He had a grand wish. Getting married. Starting a happy family. He swore early on that he would succeed in this no matter what it took.

So, I didn't give up. It was really tough. Whew...

Solitas wiped the tears off his eyes with his sleeves as he walked along the forest trail. He became overwhelmed with emotions as he looked back on his hard work after coming to this fiefdom as Corgidus's apprentice.

The thing is, these jewel craftsmanship lessons aren't free.

Solitas had to take care of the waste sludge of the main canal once every month. The dung of humans, orcs, and the smelliest of them all, the elves. How self-deprecating it was for him to let out a fiery breath at the enormous pile of dung every month!

But of course, this will continue for the foreseeable future. I will have to take on more endeavors similar to this one. But it's fine. My craftsmanship skills are improving. I just need to work a little harder.

Solitas clenched his fists. He was now set to process stones. Next time, he would be working with metal, and one day, he would employ actual jewels.

Then I'll be able to store a mountain of priceless and beautifully refined jewels just like all the other dragons. I can do it.

If he worked just ten more years, he'd be able to confidently compete in the market for marriage. Solitas allowed his fantasy to develop and thought about the outfit he'd wear to meet his future wife's parents, where their honeymoon would be, the babies they'd have, and how they'd grow old together. Then his reverie naturally evolved to select the candidates for his bride.

Whew. If I really get married, who am I going to marry?

Solitas was curious, so he thought some more.

How many unmarried female dragons around my age are there... Let's see... From what I heard before... about 17 of them in total?

Solitas counted with his fingers, listing the female dragons he could potentially marry. Just then, he recalled one more.

Oh, one more. The daughter of Verkis, the dragon king.

The daughter that resulted from a union between the dragon king and a human woman. She was said to be half dragon and half human. As such, her marriageable age was different from ordinary dragons, and this meant she was also one of his potential partners for marriage. But when his train of thought reached that far, Solitas shook his head.

Ah, forget it. What am I thinking? The daughter of the dragon king? She's way out of my league.

He was entitled to let his imagination take flight, but there was a limit. How could he dare imagine marrying the daughter of the dragon king? There was no chance they would ever meet each other, let alone fall in love. From the start, she was someone he couldn't even lay his eyes on.

So, I'll leave her out of my list. Whew. I hope my candidates stay healthy and safe until I stockpile a hoard of jewels ten years from now. Whoever you are, don't catch a cold, take good care of your skin, and don't get esophagitis from breathing out too much fire.

Just like that, Solitas wished for the well-being of his bridal candidates, one of whom could become his life companion. Resolving to work harder moving forward and get married someday, Solitas took a stroll in the middle of the summer night, satisfied and content. Just then, a suspicious noise interrupted him.

Hmm?

Solitas paused his walk for the first time, and he pricked up his ears and focused on the sound coming ahead of him.

Someone is coming.

Whom could it be at this ungodly hour past midnight? He noticed two people walking toward him. Solitas sharpened his senses a tad, and he scanned the features of the intruder with a vision that transcended human capacity. Then he saw them.

Humans. Two of them. One is a man. The other one is a woman. At this hour? Walking side-by-side? And they are blushing?

Solitas swallowed in spite of himself, and he was able to recognize what they were the moment his eyes laid on them. A couple. Despicable beings. This shameless couple was rubbing salt on the wounded heart of an innocent dragon as they strolled together side by side. However... Solitas couldn’t think of any words to criticize them.

C-crap!

Solitas gritted his teeth. Here he was, breathing out fire and incinerating piles of dung just to get married. He was carving out wood blocks in a dusty studio all day in exchange for his precious labor. Yet, that despicable couple over there was heartily laughing and smiling at each other. Solitas was green with envy. It was unfair. But there wasn’t anything he could say to them.

Shoot! Dammit! I’m going to try harder once I start working on stones tomorrow!

Solitas held back his tears, feeling a shaft of wretchedness, and rushed to the opposite side lest that despicable couple saw him cry. The woman cocked her head to the side.

Hmm? I definitely felt something from a distance. But it disappeared in a flash. What is it?

There was no way of knowing. But it didn't feel like a human. No one could hide their presence that quickly unless they were a sword master.

A bunny, maybe?

Sheherazade let out a sigh. Relatedly, her own bunny was beside her at the moment.

"Um... Is something... wrong?" Julian asked carefully, studying her.

"No, nothing."

Sheherazade quickly shook her head when she heard Julian speak in a concerned tone. She was thankful that the moon wasn't bright tonight. Julian wouldn't be able to notice the blush on her face this way.

Whew... I'm going nuts.

Sheherazade secretly nibbled on her lips. To be honest, she never intended to go on a midnight stroll together. Walking with him wasn't part of her original plan. She never expected it to happen.

I felt trapped inside, so I stepped out to get some fresh air for a bit.

She had confined herself all day in her room, pondering on what Lloyd had told her the night before about how Julian would soon depart for the capital. She spent the whole day stressing over the matter.

I don't understand my feelings.

For some reason, her heart had sunk when she heard Lloyd's words. And his words stayed stuck in her head from then on. She didn't know why, however. At the same time, she was nervous about bumping into Julian with such a disorganized heart. What face should she make in front of him? How should she greet him? It was beyond her. So, she couldn't take a step outside of her room for fear that she would bump into him. The thought of it seemed scary and awkward. She worried that she would do something idiotic in front of him. In the end, she spent the whole day hovering around her small room.

So, that was why I came out to get some fresh air for just a moment.

Since it was past midnight and no one would be around, she stepped out of her room feeling slightly more relaxed. Hence, she never expected to bump right into Julian in the middle of this trail.

"Whew..."

Sheherazade wasn't alone. Julian, too, was taken by surprise. He never imagined her to be out for a stroll at the same time and place as him.

What am I supposed to say? I mean, should I keep walking with her like this?

Julian walked as he thought in his head. Should he come up with an excuse and take another path? The thought crossed his mind for a second, but he soon shook his head.

If I do that, Miss Sheherazade will look at me more strangely.

She might also get upset. Thus, this meant that he should continue walking alongside her.

But what am I supposed to say?

He had to come up with a topic to discuss. But he couldn't get himself to speak. It was because of what Lloyd had told him the other night. He was anxious that the feelings he realized he had for her were one-sided. He couldn't dare recklessly open his mouth in front of her. As they hesitated, they arrived at the end of the trail.

"Oh..." Julian gaped.

In no time, they found themselves standing in front of the manor. Realizing that, Julian hurriedly turned to Sheherazade.

“Miss,” called Julian, his voice diffident.

“Yes?” Sheherazade turned.

“Oh... umm.” There was a heavy silence in between his words.

“Good night,” Sheherazade said first.

“Oh... Okay...”

Julian wanted to tell her good night first. But she had already wheeled around and was walking into the manor. Julian nibbled his lips as he watched her disappear.

***

The night wore on.

It’s strange. I can’t sleep.

He blinked hard, his eyes wide open. Julian, now back in his room, blankly lay on the bed. He wondered why he couldn’t fall asleep. Was it because he couldn’t stop thinking about Sheherazade from their stroll earlier? Was he regretful about not telling her good night first? It was a mystery. No, to be honest, he knew why. It was because of what his brother told him last night. ‘You’ll lose Miss Sheherazade if you keep going like this.’

“...”

What if I really lost her? What if he continued hesitating and acting like a fumbling idiot whenever they met? Would she slip out of his grasp then?

I don’t want that.

No matter how many times he racked his brain, there was only one answer. Julian nibbled his lips. It was fine if he didn’t know what to say to her. It didn’t matter if they didn’t exchange a single word. Or, just strolled together like before and occasionally met each other’s eyes. Even if he couldn’t express these feelings he held, it was all the same.

I miss her.

He suddenly bolted upright in his bed and walked into the hallway full of darkness.

***

It’s strange. I don’t want to sleep.

Her eyes were wide open, and Sheherazade lay down in bed after she got back to her room. She wondered why she wouldn’t fall asleep. Could it be because she kept thinking about Julian from their stroll earlier? Was she bothered by how she had rushed into the manor after giving a hurried farewell, feeling shy and awkward? There was no way of knowing. No, she actually knew. It was because of what Lloyd said to her last night. His words kept pestering her heart. ‘Julian will leave for the capital soon.’

“...”

Julian, the bunny-like man. She wondered when he would leave. She realized she should have asked that question earlier. What if he suddenly left straight away tomorrow morning? What if their stroll from just before was her last chance?

I don’t want that.

No matter how many times she thought about it, there was only one answer. Sheherazade clenched her fists. She didn’t want to send him off to the capital like this. She didn’t want to hopelessly part with him like that. It was fine if they didn’t exchange a single word. It didn’t matter if they just silently strolled together like earlier. She wanted to spend every day with him from now on. And so...

I’m going to do it.

She jumped out of her bed and walked into the dark hallway.

***

Julian walked carefully and slowly yet confidently. He moved past the dark corridor that led to the annex. Taking down the stairs, he made way for the visitor's room with a resolution to knock on her door.

***

Sheherazade walked, too, her steps relentless and confident. She collected her breath, passing the dark corridor that led to the main manor. She went upstairs and stretched her hand out toward a closed door.

***

Knock knock. The noise from the door echoed aloud the corridor. Julian flinched at the sound he made. He was worried that he might be rudely imposing. He corrected himself. Knocking on a lady's room so late at night? This was obviously a mistake.

But...

He missed her. He wanted to see her even if he was imposing. With such thought in mind, he stared at the closed door. Then he knocked again.

***

Creak. The door hinge noisily rang aloud the corridor, and Sheherazade became nervous at the sound. She was worried that she might be rudely imposing. She corrected herself. Knocking on someone's room so late at night? This was obviously a mistake.

But...

She had to do it. That was how much she wanted to be with Julian. With such thought in her head, she stared at the opening door.

"Who is it-"

Could it be that she woke him up? Count Frontera appeared sleepy through the door. As soon as she saw him, Sheherazade dropped down to her knees and blurted the comment she had practiced hundreds of times to herself.

“Your Excellency, please give me your second son. I promise I will make him happy for the rest of his life.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 210: Between an Order and Request (2)

“Ehem. Hmm! Today, as we continue further into this peaceful season of fall and all our crops ripen, I sincerely express my congratulations to the groom, Julian Frontera, and the bride, Sheherazade. Moreover, my congratulations go to the parents of both the groom and bride as today would be impossible without their love and care.”

Count Ventura solemnly gave a speech. He was the officiant of the wedding ceremony and part of the diplomatic delegation dispatched by Queen Magentano. His voice was calm and authoritative, much like a professional diplomat. Silence gradually fell over the garden as he read aloud the declaration of marriage. Everyone’s gaze focused on the bride and groom. Julian and Sheherazade. The two were holding hands as they stood upright facing the officiant. A smile of satisfaction appeared on Lloyd as he gazed at the two.

Woah. I can’t believe this is really happening.

His mind went back to what happened about two months ago. It must have been the day after he acted as Cupid between Julian and Sheherazade. A ruckus erupted out of the manor in the middle of the night. Sheherazade had gone to the count and countess’s bedroom past midnight and made a shocking request as she got down on her knees.

“Your Excellency, please give me your second son.”

Her remark at that time still amazed Lloyd to this day. It was so incredible that he couldn’t help but chuckle. She and Julian had just started becoming more than friends the day before, and the former didn’t even realize her feelings until Lloyd personally went to advise her.

Who would have thought that she would cause this chaos after only one day?

That was something Lloyd failed to foresee. That was how outrageous and unbelievable her actions were. It was something he only thought happened in soap operas. And the aftermath of the incident was equally explosive. The whole manor was turned upside down. Count Frontera, still in pajamas, sank onto the corridor floor, shell-shocked. Counter Frontera clapped her hand over her mouth and froze in place. The startled guards, who found them during their night duty, shouted to see if something happened. It was only afterward that they discovered Sheherazade on the floor.

According to the guards, she was said to have her gaze fixed on the count as she remained on her knees.

She was said to be ready to turn into a statue if Count Frontera didn't permit their marriage. Anyway, the whole fuss woke every servant and maid in the manor. It was the same case for Lloyd, who was summoned by Count and Countess Frontera to join a family meeting before he could even rub the sleep from his eyes. Next, when he got to the count's office, he heard another shocking remark, this time from Julian.

"I feel the same way about her."

One from Sheherazade. Another from Julian. The two relentlessly hurled shocking and stubborn remarks one after another. Despite that, Count Frontera's reaction was nothing like Lloyd had expected. He was not flustered anymore. He was not at a loss for what to do. Seemingly reaching a decision after some careful thinking, he put on a serious gaze and separately asked both Julian and Sheherazade whether they were being sincere.

The two nodded, of course. And that was it.

Count Frontera simply acknowledged them, and he didn't ask any further questions. Instead of asking an unnecessary question, he immediately picked up his pen and carefully formatted two letters directed to two different destinations. One was for the Magentano palace, and the other one was for Ahinsya. Count Frontera informed the two monarchs of the marriage now that he confirmed the feelings of the two people. Without raising any doubts, Count Frontera chose to support and believe in the couple's sincerity. He stepped forward and volunteered to take on the heavy role of asking for permission from the two kingdoms and adjudicating the two parties. From then on, everything moved forward without a hitch.

Of course. Queen Magentano and the sultan have no reason to oppose this marriage.

Their reactions were just as Lloyd expected. Since a peace treaty had been signed, both the royalties welcomed the union and even went further to float it as a symbol of harmony and reconciliation between the two kingdoms. It was because Julian was the second son of the Frontera fiefdom, which had been damaged by the Monster Domino, and Sheherazade was the daughter of the sultan, the culprit behind the incident.

Plus, the sultan was obsessed with having me as his son-in-law. Though he would have preferred me, I'm sure he determined that Julian is a great alternative. From the sultan's perspective, he's the next best option.

Thanks to their union, the Frontera family had become in-laws with the sultan. The sultan would likely try in the future to use this as an excuse to make Lloyd his son-in-law. But of course, Lloyd didn't have any intentions to dance to his tune.

Anyway.

Jostled out of his thoughts, Lloyd looked up. Under the bright fall sun, the wedding ceremony was quickly nearing its end in contrast with the weeks of hard preparation that was put into it.

"Therefore... The two have vowed in front of everyone gathered here today to be together for life. Now, I officially declare them as married before all of you who are watching this blessed ceremony."

Pop! Crackle! Right after the declaration was read aloud, firecrackers went off in several places, petals and tiny papers of various colors flying about. The new bride, Sheherazade, tossed the bouquet, which blasted into the air from the strength of a high-level sword expert. The guests regretfully swallowed as no one could even attempt to catch it. The bouquet flew out of the garden and for several hundreds of yards until it lost its strength and fell on a studio.

Thud. “Eh...?”

Solitas, who was busily processing gravel in a corner of his studio, raised his eyebrows. He was engrossed in his work when a bouquet of flowers flew out of nowhere and hit his work table. It was as if someone had sent him a gift.

“What is this?”

Could it be something from the wedding that was said to be happening today? Was this the famous “bouquet” that he had only heard about? Solitas raised his brows higher.

I’ve heard of this before. I heard that whoever catches a bouquet tossed by a bride will be able to get married. Tsk. Humans, really. They stupidly obsess over groundless superstitions. What, did they think I’d be happy to receive this?

If so, they were correct. Solitas quietly stashed the bouquet under the table, and a mysterious smile hung on his mouth.

Meanwhile, the wedding ended in a success. Julian and Sheherazade hopped into a carriage, their faces blushing red. The sight brought tears of joy to Count and Countess Frontera.

The sultan, who couldn’t come to the wedding in person, joined his daughter using a magic mirror that the delegation held up for him. He experienced a surge of emotions. Sheherazade was his favorite daughter, though he kept that to himself as he had to act cool on the outside. Any thoughtless show of favor on his part could make her the target of envy and hate from her dozens of brothers and sisters. There was a fair chance for her to wind up in a power struggle that results in a feud. And so, he hid his feelings as her father, waiting for Sheherazade to become a sword master who’s strong enough to overcome the envy and slander of her brothers and sisters. Once that day came, when he wouldn’t have to worry about her safety as she could protect herself, he decided to keep her on the side and reveal his true heart. After all, he was a father before a ruler like any other person.

“Hahaha...” The sultan inwardly smiled in contentment.

The guests sent a round of applause as they filled the manor garden. Just like that, the newlyweds went off on their honeymoon with everyone’s blessing.

***

“Whew.”

Once the wedding ceremony was over, Lloyd heaved a big sigh he had been holding for a long time.

I did it.

At last, Julian and Sheherazade were officially married, and they were congratulated and acknowledged by both the queen and the sultan. This was exactly what Lloyd had hoped for.

That rascal.

The carriage, which Julian would be sitting inside as a husband, grew farther away. A satisfied smile appeared on Lloyd’s face. But was it because Julian had become a useful pawn for him? Not entirely.

I... just feel happy.

Originally, Julian should have died already. That was what originally happened in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

The Frontera family goes under, and having no more money to pay his tuition, he gets kicked out of the royal academy.

That day, Julian was killed by a robber while wandering around a back alley in the capital to find a place to sleep. That was the original story in the novel. But now, it’s changed. Julian wasn’t dead. He graduated from the academy with honors and became a husband to a woman he loves. Now, he was happily going on his honeymoon. It was a stark contrast with the miserable, meaningless death he faced in the novel.

And that’s all thanks to me, your big brother, you punk.

The same went for Sheherazade. If it wasn’t for Lloyd, who built the Qanat in the Kandahar region, she would have been swept away in the hands of the rebels and died before her talent could be fully developed. But the story had changed once again. She was alive, needless to say, and also a happy bride on the way to her honeymoon. What was more, she even obtained a recording of Lloyd’s lullaby last night!

Well, she’s now my sister-in-law. Haha.

So, Lloyd concluded that it was only right for Julian and Sheherazade to return the favor they received. From now on, they were to be excellent pawns in his game. Fully basking in overwhelming satisfaction, Lloyd watched the newlyweds’ carriage disappear.

A few seconds later, Lloyd pushed his feelings away. Now wasn’t the time to get emotional. It was time to check how well his plan had been set. Thinking so, Lloyd swiveled away, walking through the crowds of people leaving the garden. Then he greeted Count Ventura who officiated the ceremony.

“It must have not been easy back there, Count Ventura,” Lloyd said as he stood in front of the count.

“Ahh,” gasped Count Ventura in happy surprise, “Why, if it isn’t Lloyd Frontera.”

“Yes, Your Excellency,” greeted Lloyd, “I was too busy to greet you before the ceremony. I hope everything is well with you.”

“Things are going well, of course. And you?”

“I am doing well. It is all thanks to you,” Lloyd replied.

“Haha, your flattery is the same as always.” Count Ventura beamed at Lloyd like he was his lucky charm.

How could he not? The count was able to pull off the negotiation with the sultan thanks to Lloyd and received a huge reward from the queen. But today, they had a more important matter at hand.

“But Count Ventura, do you not have a message for me?” asked Lloyd with a soft smile.

“Excuse me?”

“I know you have one.”

“Haha...” Count Ventura let out a snort and looked at Lloyd in amazement. “Have you caught on already?”

“Well, I have a rough idea.” Lloyd shrugged his shoulders.

It was true. He had seen it coming. Count Ventura, Lloyd figured, would relay Queen Magentano’s true feelings regarding this marriage.

With tension building around his eyes, Lloyd requested, “Then should we go elsewhere? There are too many people here.”

“Yes. Let us do that.”

Lloyd slipped out of the ceremony with the count and entered the manor as they pretended to have a casual conversation. And they sat opposite each other in the reception room where no one would come near.

“Since you seem to have a rough idea of the situation, I won’t beat around the bush,” started Count Ventura. “Your guess is right. There is a message Her Majesty ordered me to specially convey to you.”

After that, he paused before he continued again.

“First, Her Majesty has made no official comment about this marriage. Her Majesty only mumbled something to herself with a scoff.”

“What did she mumble...?”

“She said, ‘Tsk, I have a job for that mole cricket so bring him here.’”

“Her Majesty has a job for me...?” asked Lloyd.

“Indeed.” The count nodded. “Do you remember Cannavaro, the warlock that you captured back in Namaran?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Actually, we have already finished interrogating him, and Her Majesty launched a punitive operation based on his confession. This happened while you were building the Qanat.”

“Punitive operation?” Lloyd said, the words sounding unreal in his ears.

“Yes, and it ended successfully.”

“...”

Lloyd was secretly impressed. The queen lived up to her name. She not only finished interrogating the warlock, but also completely took care of all the other remnants. That was much like her, Lloyd thought to himself.

“But what does the suppression of the remaining followers of the warlock have anything to do with Her Majesty calling for me... Do you know the reason, Your Excellency?” asked Lloyd, unsure.

“I do not know the answer to that question.”

“Then could it be an edict, this calling me to the palace?”

After asking, Lloyd swallowed. Now came the important part. Why the queen wanted him hardly mattered. Her attitude as she called for him was more important. Lloyd had paired Julian and Sheherazade because he didn’t want to be worked to death and wanted to two-time both the queen and sultan. All of this was his attempt to put the idea in her head that Lloyd might get upset and side with the sultan if she treated him poorly. By creating alarm, she would treat him more favorably after feeling a sense of crisis.

This is my chance. And depending on his answer, I can get a sense of how she plans on treating me.

Would he still be treated like a slave? Or, if not, with more courtesy than before? He could make a judgment from her attitude toward him. Thinking so, Lloyd looked at the count. Just then, the latter nodded.

“Edict?” Count Ventura repeated. “No, it is not.”

Now, with a graver and more solemn expression on his face, he added, “Her Majesty has specially advised me to tell you that this message is neither an edict nor a unilateral demand for you to come to the capital.”

“Then, what is it, Your Excellency?” Lloyd’s voice dripped with anticipation.

“She emphasized that it was a courteous and polite ‘request’ from her as your ruling queen.

The moment Lloyd heard him speak, he secretly clenched his fists.

It was a success.

The queen’s unilateral order had now changed into a polite request. Lloyd felt the beginning of a seemingly menial but critical change.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 211: More Precious Than Treasures (1)

“Please do me a favor and hold on for just a little longer everyone.”

Slash! As Queen Magentano murmured to herself, the wooden sword in her hand terrorized the air, as though it was engraving a lightning bolt or slashing into the empty space. Ultimately, it rushed straight ahead and struck the shield of a nearby knight.

Boom! Though it was only a wooden sword strike, a booming noise akin to a fired canon blared out. The blow left a fist-sized dent in the shield made of five layers of metal sheet. The royal knight holding the shield was not left unharmed.

“Argh...!”

He was hurled 26 feet from where he stood along with his crushed shield.

“Urghh...”

The knight writhed in pain like a caterpillar stuck in the sand. He felt his stomach turn and was drained of all his energy. However, he wasn’t upset since there were other victims aside from him.

Thwaaack! Clang! Thwack!

Each time Queen Magentano wielded her wooden sword, several knights shot into the air in all directions like a pinball. Of course, the knights didn’t just defenselessly stand still.

An intermediate commanding knight yelled, “Gather up and form a close formation!”

The roughly 70 knights left in the hall busily moved in unison. 40 of them gathered in close formation, holding out a thick tower shield in front of themselves as they marched forward. The speed at which they moved wasn’t slow, even though they were wearing a few hundred pounds of armor, as every single one of them was a high-level sword expert.

Clack! Click! Clack!

The heavily armored and dense wall of shields pushed against the queen. Meanwhile, the rest of the 30 knights surrounded her, moving like a delicately running cogwheel. Then they lay a heavy, fierce siege from the rear as they quickly changed their bearing and locality in rotation. But soon, they were destroyed. Kaboom!

“Ack!”

The moment Queen Magentano flew open her eyes, the knight that wielded his sword at her was thrown 16 feet in the air.

W-what the...

A look of bewilderment appeared in the knight’s eyes. He was certain that he got her, only to find himself flying in the air by the time he came to his senses. Of course, his sword had escaped from his grasp. He couldn’t even lift his finger from the shock that ran down his whole body. And in the next moment, however, he received a mental shock that hit him harder than the physical blows he received.

Kaboom! Clang! Pow! Clung! Thump!

“...!”

His comrades started to float in the air, too. Everyone was flailing their arms in midair. It was an unseemly sight to behold. They all hung at the same altitude of 16 feet as though the queen had intentionally chosen that height. And each of them gaped wordlessly like a goldfish out of the water and exchanged frightened glances.

“You too?”

“Me too.”

Then came the drop. Bam! Thud! Thump!

“Ack!”

“Eek!”

“Argh!”

Eight knights that were floating in the air hit the ground at almost the same time. Even after that, the queen didn’t stop brandishing her wooden sword.

“I asked you all to do me a favor and hold on a little longer.”

She hurtled toward the close formation of shields, and like a lion pouncing into a flock of sheep, she ripped the formation apart in mere seconds.

Baaam! She threw one blow after another, never striking her sword upward. And yet, the knights that were hit by her sword catapulted into the air. She continued storming forward, and the knights shot upward like a strong gush of fountain water.

“Yet, why can you not carry on? Hm?” the queen calmly scolded.

Slam! Pow! She didn’t even use her aura and only wielded her ordinary wooden sword and natural strength. She merely struck at the most appropriate timing and angle and with just the right amount of strength. But the rest of the royal knights collapsed in front of her, unable to endure the attacks for even a second. The queen moved as if she was using this training to let out her frustrations. Even then, however, the tumultuous emotions reflected in her eyes burned fiercely, and refused to calm down.

Lloyd Frontera.

The name came to her mind as she wielded her wooden sword. She had intended to use his talent for a noble purpose. But now... Ha! She was more dumbstruck the more she thought about him. A part of her was even disgusted.

Is that how much he hates helping me out?

Lloyd was practically an open book to Queen Magentano. She could undoubtedly tell that Lloyd was refusing to use his talent and wanted to rest for the remainder of his life. And the marriage between the Frontera family and the sultan's family must have been pushed forward for that goal of his. She was sure about it.

Lloyd Frontera must have intervened without question.

Queen Magentano didn't even need to look into it. Lloyd must have wanted to two-time her with the sultan using this marriage. The queen was regretful about it. She truly was. But what Lloyd did wasn't a crime per se that granted her the right to lay into him.

It is Julian Frontera, the second son of the Frontera family, who got married. He is not set to inherit the fiefdom.

Moreover, this marriage was the perfect publicity stunt to taut to her people, especially at this juncture.

The marriage happened just in time when the sultan and I struck a peace treaty. The marriage between the second son of the Frontera county, which receives unwavering support from the royal family, and the daughter of the sultan. It's an amazing symbol of friendship between us and the sultan kingdom.

Going beyond just good, one would have wondered if the queen and the sultan had planned for this to happen on purpose. And that was why Queen Magentano gritted her teeth more.

Lloyd must have felt his chance had come. He must have thought he had now earned the chance to befriend the sultan without getting hated. What a sly man he is.

Wham! The wooden sword continued its explosive and emotional dance, and the innocent human punching bags, the royal knights, collapsed to the ground like dominos. Queen Magentano continued her train of thought.

It must probably be because he is chary of staying under my influence. Through this marriage, he is throwing a modest, quite elusive message, a protest, that he can get closer to the sultan if he wishes to and will stick to the latter if I treat him badly. That is why I find him more disgusting but cute.

Grit! She clenched her teeth. Lloyd Frontera. She wanted to kick Lloyd's gut for being detestable. She wanted to harass him the more he struggled to tear himself away from her. She longed to drown him in work the more he fumbled to escape, assign him to lifelong labor and watch him flounder in misery, and watch him wretchedly beg in tears for a break.

"Agh...!"

Boom! A knight was hurled 16 feet away as he clutched his stomach. That was the last of it. Her insolent gaze swept over the surroundings. Not a single knight was standing near her.

"Tsk."

She wanted to stretch her body a little more. Dealing with the knights hadn't even made her break a sweat. Recently, ever since she ramped up her level once more, training with the knights wasn't enough for her. Around the time she was growing dissatisfied...

"Your Majesty, Lloyd Frontera has arrived," an official reported brightly in the corner of a training.

The corners of her lips rolled up ferociously. The timing was perfect. She was enticed by this opportunity to harass Lloyd.

Suppressing the strong desire, she said, "Let him wait."

After dropping the wooden sword, she walked out of the training hall and she took a swig of a glass of cold water. When she passed the long driveway and garden, she spotted Lloyd down on one knee.

“Lloyd Frontera is honored to be in the audience of Her Majesty,” announced Lloyd when he sensed her presence.

“...”

The queen felt a sudden impulse to slap the back of her head as she stared at his brazen actions. He would helplessly fall and roll to the ground. That sight would be exhilarating to watch, she thought to herself. But then, just barely holding back her impulse, she spoke in a formal tone.

“Follow me.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Queen Magentano swiveled and made for the outside of the secondary palace where the training hall stood. She passed the garden that led to the main palace, Lloyd obediently following behind her. He studied her very carefully, and the conversation between them resumed only much later.

“I see. Seeing that you have come here, you have decided to accept my request,” she stated coolly.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd with feigned humility.

“Gratitude, my foot.”

“...”

“I will not,” she went on, “beat around the bush after calling you here when you want to rest. I will cut to the chase. I am sure you are well aware of how I subdued the remnants of the warlock recently, yes?”

“Yes, Your Majesty, I have heard about it.”

Lloyd nodded as if it was true. About four days ago, right after Julian’s wedding ceremony, Count Ventura gave him an update as he shared the queen’s request for him.

So, while I was building the Qanat in the sultan's kingdom... the queen achieved a brilliant feat.

Count Ventura shared that the interrogation of Cannavaro had ended. The man was said to have confessed everything when the palace laid a salvo of mind-altering and truth spells on him. The result was highly satisfactory. From the location, number, and plan of the remnant members, she was able to acquire almost all their classified information.

And she jumped into action right after, I heard.

Queen Magentano didn't even dawdle for a second. As soon as she was done with analyzing the information, she mobilized and led her armed forces to execute the punitive operation, eventually ambushing the enemy's cave like a bolt of lightning without giving them any time to react.

"I am glad that you have heard already," said Queen Magentano as she kept walking. "Then you must know that I slaughtered every single one of them, yes?"

"Certainly, Your Majesty," said Lloyd.

What the queen was saying was true. It was a clear fact that she had wiped out all their souls.

And in the process, she was said to manifest a sword skill that is much stronger than before.

According to Count Ventura, at the last portion of the battle, the queen personally beheaded the leader of the warlocks, showcasing an aura more iridescent than an ordinary sword master in the process. Thanks to her, the forces suffered less damage.

The queen has grown to be stronger than in the novel.

It was a mystery to Lloyd how much stronger she had gotten. But he knew that it was by a considerable increase.

In the novel, she loses an arm and turns into a tyrant.

After she lost her arm, she overlooked training. But now, it was a different story.

I suppose the assassination attempt terribly motivated her.

That thought crossed Lloyd for a second. It didn't seem far-fetched since he always found her coming out of training whenever he requested an audience with the queen after the assassination incident. In short, this meant that she was subjecting herself to intense training every day.

I pity the royal knights.

Those who were involved in the daily training of the queen could have the lowest job satisfaction in the whole kingdom. Lloyd was quite sure of it.

I guess they're the victims of the changes I created in history. Tsk.

Lloyd licked his lips, feeling slightly apologetic toward the royal knights. Meanwhile, the queen continued to speak.

"Anyway, I acquired an unexpected bundle of spoils after subduing the enemies. That is why I called you."

"Are they related to me, Your Majesty?" Lloyd asked, intrigued.

"If I want them to be, they are. After all, I plan on entrusting you with a construction project that will make use of this."

"Construction project... Your Majesty?" Lloyd's voice trembled.

"Indeed." She nodded. "Why? Do you not want to do it?"

"Um..." Lloyd was about to answer when he clamped his mouth shut.

The queen paused her walk before he realized it. She was staring at Lloyd with a fierce gaze, which seemed to say, "You better pick your next words very carefully."

Gulp. As soon as Lloyd saw her gaze, he had a realization.

She is aware of my plans already.

The queen was something indeed. Lloyd realized this once more.

I just sought my chance after observing the countless turn of events.

In the end, he succeeded in pairing Julian and Sheherazade. He was now able to two-time both the queen and sultan without being blamed by the other. And thanks to that, unilateral “orders” from the queen were changed into “requests.” Or so Lloyd thought. But now, he realized...

I guess it’s too early for that right now.

It was too early for him to bluntly reject the queen and express his unwillingness to do the work she requested of him.

It’s the case even if I’m holding the Magentano Carry title.

The title granted a powerful benefit, but it wasn’t absolute. Lloyd’s behavior could alter the valid period of the title, like, for example, right now.

If I upset her now, it’s over.

A powerful hunch came over Lloyd. If he behaved cluelessly and stubbornly, the title “Magentano Carry” that liberated him from any suspicion of treason could be shortened or completely eliminated. As the bad feeling gripped Lloyd, he decided to act like an elusive cockroach that sneaked around a kitchen sink at night. In other words, he immediately changed his attitude and began sincerely groveling at her.

“I, Lloyd Frontera,” said Lloyd in a grave tone, “have been waiting day and night until Your Majesty assigned me to a new project. Please grant me any task of your wish, Your Majesty.”

“Truly?” asked the queen, her voice grave.

“Truly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd, stressing his words.

“Really?”

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“How naturally the eldest son of the Frontera family spews lies out of his mouth.”

“...”

“As if anybody in this world likes to work.”

“Uhm, that is because-”

“Enough. I am aware of your true feelings already.” Her voice was now softer. “What purpose and reason you had when you cajoled your brother into marrying the sultan’s daughter. Thus, I would like to give you a special reminder.”

“...”

Queen Magentano’s eyes held a glint of something mysterious.

“I like you,” the queen revealed. “You please me. Therefore, I will not be careless and incessant toward you. However...”

She looked at him a tad more sharply.

“Do not get too close to my enemy. Do not indiscreetly test my favor. Am I clear?”

“I shall keep that in mind, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd nodded earnestly so much that his upper spines hurt. That was only when her eyes relaxed.

“As I thought, you catch on quickly.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“I do not need your gratitude that you so easily speak of every time you are out of things to say.”

“...”

“Anyway, since you know where I stand, it is now time to reveal my assignment to you. This way.”

Queen Magentano led the way again, and Lloyd followed her. Past the garden, into the main palace, and after numerous corridors and stairs later, they finally arrived. They were at the palatial repository that stored a host of palatial treasures. Queen Magentano smiled meaningfully as she turned and faced Lloyd.

“Are you ready to see the spoils?”

“Yes, I am, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

What could she possibly want to show him? And what job is she planning on entrusting him with? The queen motioned while Lloyd was lost in thought. The royal knight moved and opened the sturdy door, revealing, at last, the spoil stashed inside.

“I order you to create a large garden that will reflect the global power of my palace using that.”

The spoil, which the queen was pointing at with a smile on her face, was no other than piles of bones from a dragon whose body stretched over 655 feet in length. Lloyd recognized this as soon as he laid his eyes on it.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 212: More Precious Than Treasures (2)

Woah. This is just nuts.

Lloyd almost clapped his mouth over with his hand when he looked inside the wide open doors. A pile of dragon bones. A tremendous pile. It was nothing like the dinosaur fossils exhibited for display in museums. Putting the bones all together, much like the museum style, would seem to render a 655 feet tall figure. The skull alone was as large as a city bus. But there was something else that caught Lloyd's attention, and it was neither the size nor the scale of the ginormous dragon bones.

Three horns.

This dead dragon had three horns. Technically speaking, there were originally four, but the one on the left temple had snapped off. So, there were two on the head and one on the right temple. It looked quite familiar.

Of course. I've seen it a sickening amount of times.

That dragon's head and wings appeared in the design with the grim reaper. It was suspicious-looking as it was buried with the undead Mastodons near the Frontera fiefdom. It was thick on the ground in Namaran, where Lloyd had pursued after Cannavaro. And... in the novel as well, it was the pattern the secretive character used beside Queen Magentano the tyrant. The dragon head in the pattern looked just like what Lloyd was seeing right in front of him. It had a broken horn in the left temple and three other upright horns. It was the same as the dragon in the design he saw.

It's like they copy-pasted the dragon.

Lloyd was sure of it. This dead dragon and the design he saw then looked the same.

Confident, Lloyd said, "Your Majesty, I have something that I'm curious about."

“Ask,” allowed the queen. “Yes, Your Majesty. Did Your Majesty say that these dragon bones are the spoils you have acquired after subduing the warlocks?”

“Indeed.” She then let out a chuckle, slightly flashing a bit of pride in her smile. “They had it hidden in the deepest part of their laboratory and fought very hard to protect it.”

“Do you mean the remnants of the warlock, Your Majesty?” asked Lloyd for clarification.

“Yes. They looked like they were trying to protect a precious treasure. I presume it was the variety of potions, strong shamanistic tools, and many other goods that were extracted or processed from these bones. Much like the black jewel you excavated back in Namaran.”

“Do you know about them, Your Majesty?” Lloyd said in a surprised tone.

The queen smiled wryly before saying, “I heard it when Cannavaro confessed. The thing is, the man repeated his words five times even when I did not ask him to. I suppose that is how wretched he felt for being robbed of his stones.”

“...”

“Anyway,” she went on, “I was only able to acquire it after killing the last leader and the rest of the others. In all honesty, I was shocked when I first laid my eyes on this.”

The queen’s eyes held a glint of satisfaction as they fixed on the bones. Lloyd thought it natural.

I mean, we’re talking about dragon bones here.

Dragon bones themselves were high in value and also a powerful source of magic for extracting mana, much like what those dark magicians did. Otherwise, they could be processed to create battle gear. Given their priceless value and rarity, it was only natural for the queen to candidly express her satisfaction with procuring an entire dragon head.

Moreover, the queen may be unaware of this, but if my guess is correct, she just made a remarkable accomplishment by suppressing the dark remnants.

Was it because she merely eradicated the remaining warlocks? Or because she acquired a pile of precious dragon bones? No. From Lloyd's perspective, her feat held more significance and meaning behind it. More precisely, she seemed to have exposed the dark secret that lay hidden in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

I'm almost certain. The horns of the dragon head. The dragon head grim reaper symbol. They're the same. What else could that mean?

It proved that the warlocks were the dark powers that used the symbol and were responsible for burying the Mastodons near the Frontera fiefdom. And... one of them had been a parasite that stuck to the queen in the original novel.

But, wow, it was all resolved with this one incident.

The identity of the parasitic official, who never left the queen's side, was hidden in veils even when part one of the novel ended. Every reader expected this secret to be revealed in the sequel, but it never came out as the author stopped midway.

So, I was quite bothered by it. I couldn't pinpoint who these guys were even after reading the novel. I was afraid that they might suddenly attack me in the future.

But now, the queen had taken care of them in one clean sweep. It felt like a terrible migraine was forever gone and like someone had paid off his debt for him. The more he chewed over the fact, he felt a greater desire to bow down in front of the queen.

She must not know what kind of extraordinary feat she achieved.

Lloyd suppressed his laughter. This was good. The pests were now taken care of. He didn't even have to lift his finger in the process. This incident was akin to a mosquito plunging into the water in a sink and dying on its own without the help of insecticide. The enemy was now gone, and he passionately welcomed this turn of events.

Concluding his thoughts, Lloyd asked, "So, does Your Majesty wish to construct a large garden using these dragon bones?"

"Indeed. I am thinking of assembling the dragon bones to make it look like it's bowing down to a statue across from it."

"By statue, do you mean the statue of Your Majesty?"

"That is right. This is why it is convenient to work with you," she complimented with a nod. "You see through my thoughts without any explanation from me."

The queen smiled in a satisfying manner and continued to speak.

"You may wonder as to why I am using these precious dragon bones to decorate the garden and create a sculpture. Is it simply vanity? No. There is a more important reason."

"Is it," put in Lloyd, "to exhibit the power of the House of Magentano to the outside world, Your Majesty?"

"Did you notice that already?"

"Yes, Your Majesty, a little bit..."

"Your guess is correct." She paused before continuing. "At this juncture in history, is there any power that can fight against me head-on in the Lorasian Continent? No. Is there someone that can dare overpower my military, wealth, or any other area of power? No."

Her voice was proud and equally confident. Lloyd nodded in agreement. It was true. One could objectively and meticulously attempt to go over her words, but one would conclude that it was fairly factual. That was how prosperous the House of Magentano was now. In the 21st century, they would be comparable to Russia in a world without the United States. It wasn't an understatement to say that the Magentano was one step away from becoming a hegemony that ruled over the Lorasian Continent.

Though the sultan's kingdom is its rival, much like China is to the United States.

But they were on good terms now, which meant there was no real threat at this point.

So now, the queen must have judged that the time is ripe to elevate her power once and for all. Consolidate the nobles in the kingdom. Raise her global status. Preemptively botch any other countries' plans to dare challenge her, much like the sultan did with the Monster Domino operation.

The construction would be beneficial in many ways, socially and diplomatically. Come to think of it, Lloyd remembered that a similar instance took place on Earth before.

This happened during the heyday in France when Louis XIV ruled over the country. He mobilized massive funds to advertise the wealth and power of the House of Bourbon. He ordered the expansion and construction of his palace and garden. This eventually became the Versailles. And that part of history was taking place in this world with Queen Magentano. She was revealing her demands with a gaze as solemn as that of Louis XIV.

"I am thinking of expanding the back garden of the main palace," she said, making one of her many demands.

Yes, my dear client.

"Moreover, I want the expansion of the back garden to cover more than 800 hectares, and the path that will be laid out in the garden should be over 12 miles along with a waterway that stretches over 18 miles."

Why, yes, my dear client.

“More than 200,000 beautiful multi-colored trees must be planted, and the main garden area must have the dragon confidently blowing across from my sculpture.”

Why, of course, my dear client.

“There is one more very important aspect.”

Just say the word, my dear client.

“The dragon and my sculpture should be surrounded by a waterway that’s wide enough for 50 people to freely travel by ship. It would be best to show the view of the ship entering through the waterway from the Magena River, and finally wading out into the opposite waterway to exit the garden.”

Please save me, my dear client.

There was no end to her demands and requests. Moreover, they were very detailed. Queen Magentano was the type of client who clearly knew exactly what she wanted.

Haah.

Although Lloyd was burdened by her meticulous demands, he managed to remember every one of them. To some degree, a part of him even welcomed her demands.

This type of client is surprisingly easy to work with.

Just then, Lloyd’s mind traveled back to his laborious days in South Korea. One time, he was called in to work on a private residential house. The owner was a hard client to deal with. But it wasn’t because he maliciously abused Lloyd or used his money and power as leverage against him and the others.

That man was a hesitant, wishy-washy, and indecisive but good-natured man.

Lloyd realized for the first time then that the most frustrating and troubling type of client to work with was the good-natured but indecisive ones who didn't know what they wanted.

I didn't believe it at first, but it really was the case.

The owner was definitely something. At first, he said that anything was fine. As long as it looked good, all was okay. He nicely went along with anything at the initial phase of the renovation. But as the project progressed...

He slowly started to change.

His demands started increasing. He slowly became more ambitious in his vision. Why?

It was because he didn't know what he wanted at the start of the project.

And so, the owner only came to figure out his needs midway.

"Oops! Now that I see it, I'd like the tiles in the first-floor entrance to be gray, not white."

"I'm sorry, but can we do this door in another style? Not this one?"

"I'm seeing it now, and it looks like we should get rid of the shower booth."

Surely, it would have been relatively fine if the project had ended that way. Lloyd and his team did reflect on the changes with a good heart. But the project wasn't finished with such a beautiful ending.

"Oh, seeing it now, I think I like the very first one best. Let's go with the first one."

Eventually, the house had to be redone all over again.

Dammit. Just thinking about it pisses me off. I worked my ass off and gave him what he wanted, and he what?

Stuck in his memory, Lloyd clenched his fists. So, in a way, he felt a rush of relief as he looked at Queen Magentano. At least she wasn't such an indecisive person.

"So, Your Majesty," asked Lloyd for a final go, "Do I simply have to include everything Your Majesty has mentioned in the construction?"

"Indeed. Combine all the elements I mentioned without leaving anything out. Do not worry about the cost and labor as I will provide more than enough. How does that sound, Young Master Frontera?"

"I think it is splendid," replied Lloyd.

"Is that so?"

"Without a doubt, Your Majesty," said Lloyd, hanging his head lower.

"Good. Then I presume you already have a reward in mind?"

"That is also without a doubt, Your Majesty."

"Do tell."

The queen and Lloyd had each other completely figured out. Each knew that either one of them wasn't an easy opponent. So, they didn't need to mince their words. Since the queen had laid out all her requirements, it was naturally time for Lloyd to make his own demands.

Lloyd Frontera. You could have returned home to relax, but instead, agreed to take up a construction project as large as this without putting up a fight. So, I shall grant you one request even if it seems a bit excessive.

Her gaze deepened as it was fixed on Lloyd. She regarded him as a useful talent since he was quick-witted and clever. But now, she felt a sense of discomfort about taking advantage of his capabilities unlike before.

Tsk. I never thought he would dare side with the sultan so shamelessly.

The queen never imagined a day would come when she would have to butter up Lloyd to do a job for her. She licked her lips in bitterness.

Sounding politely, Lloyd said, “With your permission, I shall make my request, Your Majesty.”

Being left with no choice but to work since it was too early to reject her orders, Lloyd decided to get compensated with something very valuable. He would make the best out of the deal. For example, ask for something luxurious as dozens of special full-set armors along with a two-liter bottle of a legendary potion.

“I, Lloyd Frontera, ask for a labor exemption period of ten years once the construction is completed.”

“What...?” The queen’s eyes shook. Her eyebrows were lifted.

It was a request that went beyond her comprehension. Her surprise soon turned into annoyance. Disobedience for the next ten years? Even you cannot dare make such a request! The moment the queen was about to rebuke him for his impertinence, Lloyd quickly added, his voice sounding shameless.

“Should Your Majesty find my request unfavorable, I ask for a large chunk of the dragon bone instead of the ten-year labor exemption.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 213: His Aspiration to Be a Slacker (1)

Viscount Nort. Soon to be 56 years old, he was a landscape architect with an impressive career. He was only a young apprentice when he started to show his talent in gardening. His hands transformed countless wild and ruined gardens into beautiful works of art. He soon rose to become a world-class gardener.

But his career didn't stop there. His focus shifted to civil construction. From simple landscaping, he ventured into designing the actual sites and divisions of land in gardens. Soon enough, he rose to become an unrivaled figure in garden construction and management. His talent alone elevated his status as a peasant to a viscount. As such, it went without saying that the man held great pride in his skills. In particular, he thought he was significantly above a young engineer who had just started to make his name known in the past few years.

Hmm, I suppose this is Lloyd Frontera.

This man was much younger than what was suggested by the rumors. He was practically a child. The queen had shared a few things about him, about how he is the rising star and how he'd join a large, upcoming garden construction. About how he constructed that stunning Lloy-Javi suspension bridge. But really, it never occurred to Viscount Nort that Lloyd would be this young.

He's young enough to be my son.

A flicker of vague dissatisfaction appeared in Viscount Nort's eyes as they watched Lloyd. A youngster that hadn't even turned thirty yet. What was he doing at the same age?

I was making my name as a gardener until I was exposed to design work for the first time. Then I had to work and study for ten more years. But this kid. He what? He's gaining a reputation as a developer at such a young age?

Truth be told, Viscount Nort was a little dumbstruck. He, who was initially a commoner, figured that Lloyd was different from him. Having been born into a noble family, this kid was able to happily study in peace. The viscount felt a surge of distaste, and his voice reflected his displeasure as he introduced himself to Lloyd.

“So, you are the eldest son of the Frontera family?” blurted Viscount Nort.

“Yes, nice to meet you, Viscount Nort. I have heard a lot about you,” replied Lloyd.

“The queen has spoken about me?” asked Viscount Nort, a shade surprised.

“Yes,” Lloyd said, “she said that you are an excellent developer that I should look up to as a role model.”

“Ahem. Hmm!” Viscount Nort cleared his throat. “You flatter me. I, too, heard a bit about you.”

“Is that so?” Lloyd looked at Viscount Nort.

“Yes, I heard you’re talented and quite accomplished.”

“Haha, you are too kind.”

Lloyd plastered a shy smile, and he thought to himself...

This man doesn’t really like me.

For some reason, the viscount was staring at Lloyd with fairly obvious distaste. Just then, Lloyd recalled how the queen had explicitly shared her sentiments with him a moment ago.

***

“What?” asked Queen Magentano. “The dragon bone?”

The queen’s question came out in a snap, and Lloyd clearly caught the flicker of dismay that crossed her eyes, which was replaced with a hearty chuckle.

“What? Ha! My goodness. Lloyd Frontera.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd pretended to not hear her reaction.

“The dragon bone must be what you wanted in the first place, am I correct?”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd quickly bowed. It was true. He was after the dragon bone in the first place. That was why he shook her up with the mention of a ten-year exemption of labor. If she didn’t take it, oh, well. If she did, awesome! Lloyd suggested his initial deal with that thought in mind. The smile on her face became slightly bitter.

“What you want is the dragon bone, but you used the labor exemption to attract my attention,” the queen pointed out in annoyance. “Why do you subtly keep bringing up the latter?”

“I wish to rest, Your Majesty.”

“Ha. And now, you say it out loud.”

“It is my genuine wish, whether it is granted or not, Your Majesty.”

“However,” said the queen in a reminding tone, “I’m sure you’re aware it is an impossible wish for me to grant.”

“Please allow a man to dream, Your Majesty.”

“You are free to dream, yes. Anyway...” The queen went on, her gaze meaningful. “A chunk of dragon bone? Are you aware of how valuable this is when you dare ask for it?”

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd.

Lloyd didn’t even bother to avoid her gaze. He shamelessly responded to her in a heartbeat. “I believe it truly matches the value of the earnest work I do for Your Majesty.”

“Really?” snapped the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Ha. You are brazen.”

“Please forgive my rudeness, Your Majesty.”

“Fine... Just a piece of the tailbone.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“But it cannot be a lot. I will give you a small end piece that won’t be too noticeable.”

“I am overwhelmed-”

“More like underwhelmed, aren’t you?”

Could it be that the queen thought she snubbed him? A mischievous smile appeared on the corners of her mouth. It was a rare sight.

“Even so,” she carried on, “it will be a sizeable chunk that’s as big as a single carriage. You can’t possibly be dissatisfied with that, right?”

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd.

“Good.”

Just like that, the negotiation with the queen ended. A construction contract was signed, and Lloyd was told that he’d be working with Viscount Nort for the project.

“Follow this servant, and you will get to meet him,” the queen instructed. “Since Viscount Nort is a talented man in the field of garden design and management, he will be a helpful partner for you in this project. Oh, and...”

Lloyd was about to give a polite farewell and leave when the queen stopped him.

“Viscount Nort has tremendous pride when it comes to his work and accomplishments,” the queen said as an afterthought. “If possible, please be understanding of that pride of his.”

***

So, this is what she meant.

Lloyd suppressed a wry smile from his face. He was confused about what the queen meant when she said those words. But he understood her now that he was introduced to Viscount Nort.

This man is jealous of me.

Lloyd could feel it. Viscount Nort was visibly displeased with him. His stare seemed to say, “You’re nothing but a spoiled brat who got lucky.”

His snobby attitude didn’t change even afterward.

“Well, anyway, now that I have the chance to work with such a reputable young developer, let me ask you a question. Have you ever designed and constructed a garden all by yourself before?”

“No, I have not,” stated Lloyd expressionlessly.

“Tsk. Is that so?” Viscount Nort frowned.

“Indeed.”

“That will be an issue. I cannot wrap my head around how you earned your great reputation when you have never built a garden before,” grumbled the Viscount.

“It was all luck,” drawled Lloyd.

“That was it? Hmm... Tell me, how many years of experience do you have in construction?”

“Hmm, just a few years.”

“It can’t possibly be less than ten, right?”

“It is.”

“Tsk, tsk, tsk. That is also an issue.” Count Nort clucked his tongue in pity.

“How exactly is it an issue?” asked Lloyd, sounding absolutely unfazed.

“You see, my boy, many years of quality experience is what makes someone stand out on a work site. Am I wrong?” Count Nort spoke as though he was talking to a child.

“You speak the truth,” seconded Lloyd.

“Do you agree with me as well?”

“I do.”

Then as though he finally saw the chance, he snapped, “Then I suppose you have no qualms when I take over the command of this construction project?”

“My, by all means,” replied Lloyd with glee.

“Really?” asked Count Nort in surprise.

“Yes.”

“But, if so, I will be the one who is remembered for constructing this garden.”

“I am aware of that,” Lloyd tonelessly said as he nodded.

“And yet it is all right?”

“My, of course.” Lloyd nodded hard to sound genuine.

Lloyd nodded as if he truly didn’t mind. With a bright, earnest smile, he happily welcomed and accepted Count Nort’s suggestion.

“How can a novice like myself work next to you side by side, Viscount Nort?” asked Lloyd, shaking his head. “It’s nonsense. Don’t you think so?”

“Yes... It is,” replied Count Nort, slightly dazed by Lloyd’s willingness.

“Yes. Viscount Nort, you are wise. What can a novice like myself know? I’m only known for a couple of noteworthy construction projects. My reputation is a bubble soon to burst. The achievements you obtained with persistence and hard work are much more legitimate.”

“Ahem. Hmm!” coughed Count Nort, suppressing his grin. “You definitely... know a thing or two, eh?”

“Oh, not at all,” Lloyd said, waving his hands. “I merely follow along by watching brilliant senior developers like yourself work at construction sites. Do you disagree?”

“Hahahaha!” Count Nort finally erupted in joy. “Is that so?”

“Yes. Honestly, I had planned on bringing this up first and asking you to lead this construction project.”

“Did you now?”

“Yes. If anything, I am sorry that I senselessly made you speak on this matter before I did.”

“Ahem! You do not have to apologize for that...”

“No, no. I am truly sorry. I want to express my sincerity.”

Lloyd then offered his hand. Viscount Nort heartily grabbed it with both of his hands and shook it politely. And Lloyd met the viscount’s eyes, tensing his own to appear genuine. And to top it all off, he groveled, “I am honored to support an excellent man like you, Viscount Nort, for this construction. I kindly ask for your guidance."

"Hahahaha! Well, well, the pleasure is mine. Ahem. Hmm!"

The viscount's face, which was as rough as a piece of sandpaper, melted away like snow in the spring. His chin lifted in pride and satisfaction as Lloyd buttered him up. An irrepressible smile hung on the corners of his wrinkled mouth, and he was slightly embarrassed by his attitude a while ago.

Oh my. I made a mistake. I simply thought he earned his reputation out of pure luck.

Count Nort had regarded Lloyd to be an insolent and impertinent brat. But now, he didn't think that was true. He realized from their conversation that Lloyd was an excellent and humble fellow with good character.

He surprised me.

Count Nort's gaze relaxed. He was a young man who knew how to respect an experienced senior and stay humble in spite of his fame. Count Nort began to see Lloyd in a new light. He had thought of the latter as an immature child just a moment ago, but now, he seemed quite smart. Seeing his thoughtful words and handshake, Count Nort could not believe how polite he was.

"I wish I could always work with someone like you. Hahahaha."

Viscount smiled with a glow of satisfaction. The change in his attitude rendered the same feeling to Lloyd.

Good. Excellent. Operation Moderation was a success.

From the start, Lloyd never planned on letting the queen exploit him. He also didn't want to take on this job in the first place. And here came the viscount eagerly volunteering to supervise and lead the whole project! Lloyd could only welcome him with wide open arms.

There is a saying in the military. Work in moderation. Don't stand out too much.

If you needlessly showed off, you would only be given more responsibilities and work. More often than not, it created hassles that could've been avoided. This was true based on Lloyd's past experiences as well. He remembered the first time he was given a placement. He was anxiously sitting upright at a corporate administration office when a sergeant walked up to him, asking whether Lloyd was really a civil engineering major and any good at shoveling.

Then I foolishly rushed to say that I was.

There wasn't any grand reason for his answer. He simply wanted to earn some brownie points by making a good impression. But unbeknownst to him, he had opened the hellish gates of endless labor.

Dammit. I should have stayed put at that time.

His life in the army wouldn't have been a disastrous wreck full of manual labor had he told a small lie or quietly said that he wasn't good at it. Wretchedly shoving aside his foolish past, Lloyd looked up.

"Yes, please take care of me from now on."

Please work hard on my behalf. In the meantime, I can relax and play around. Lloyd plastered on a sincere smile, and Count Nort, completely unaware of Lloyd's intentions, smiled back. And just like that, Lloyd acquired a hard-working construction robot. The construction robot's abilities were immediately uncovered the following day.

"Hmm," mused Count Nort. "Tell me, are you proficient in surveying?"

"Surveying, Count Nort? I just look over the area with my eyes..." Lloyd broke off.

"Hahaha! You eyeball the survey data?"

"Yes."

Lloyd nodded his head. A look of dismay appeared on the viscount’s face.

“An excellent and reputable developer like you conducts surveys with nothing but your bare eyes? That is a surprise. Then have you never used this survey machine before?”

“Oh, never. For one reason or another...”

Lloyd smiled in embarrassment. He had truthfully never used the survey machine after coming to this world.

Why? I have my surveying skills.

His skill could acquire data much more conveniently and accurately than the machine. Moreover, it could be used in conjunction with his design skill. But there was no way for the viscount to know this.

“Tsk, tsk. That is too bad. I don’t tell just anyone about this, but...” Count Nort motioned his hands to Lloyd. “Come over here for a second. I will specially teach you how to use the survey machine.”

Count Nort held up the surveying machine, which was made of a 4-foot-long supporting pole with a cross-shaped bar at the top. The four corners of the cross-shaped bar had threads and pendulums dangling from them.

“Now, watch how I do it. Erect the supporting pole, and arrange the crossbar. Like this and this. Do you see me?”

“Oh, yes...” murmured Lloyd expressionlessly.

“Then place and balance the pendulums on the four corners... Like this.”

“Okay,” Lloyd said with feigned interest.

“Check whether the pendulums are vertical to the ground. Like this.”

“Yes.”

“Now, take a look here. That way, you can accurately see whether the machine’s line of sight is at a desirable angle. What do you think? Is this not amazing?” asked Count Nort with evident pride in his voice.

“Yes, it is amazing,” seconded Lloyd, feigning his admiration. “I would like to observe you for a little longer.”

“Haha. I suppose I amazed you with my skills.”

“Yes, a little...”

“Then keep on watching and feel from the side how accurate and precise my surveying is.”

“Understood,” Lloyd played along.

Count Nort was as enthusiastic as he was prideful. What did this mean for Lloyd?

If I throw a few cheers and compliments at him, this man jumps for joy and does all the work for me!

It couldn’t get any easier than this. Thanks to him, Lloyd was able to sit back and relax. He was happier now than during any of his past construction projects. At the same time, Lloyd hoped that nothing would change in the meantime and Count Nort would complete the entire construction for him.

Meanwhile, I can enjoy a leisurely lifestyle here in the capital. Then once the construction ends, I’ll take the dragon’s tailbone and return to my fiefdom. Perfect. Just perfect.

It was a fact that everything in this world was better free. Lloyd beamed as though he had just won a coupon for a free year-long vacation at a hotel.

***

“How dare you... What are you going to do with my tailbone?”

Clack. In the deepest part of the national repository that stored the most precious treasures in the Magentano kingdom, something jerked in the vast and opulent space.

Clack... Clack... The movement was not significant. It was subtle enough to be easily missed by the naked eye. But the very entity that clacked was not insignificant. It was the head of a dragon.

“Once I am... done adapting to this new body... Once my soul is settled here... Then...

The dragon recalled the queen that dared to suppress and slay him and the young engineer that groveled at her.

“All of them...”

Clack. The dragon’s head intermittently clacked and pictured a dark, sinister plan.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 214: His Aspiration to Be a Slacker (2)

It's painful and unfair. Just a little more. If only I had a few more days. Then all of my plans would have actualized as planned.

"Alicia... Termina Magentino... You despicable..."

Warlock Targa recalled her despicable face. Her eyes glinted coldly. The knife that pierced his neck was equally fatal and cold. That icy sensation was his final memory before he faced death. It only took one slash to disembody his neck. His head flew up in the air, and left a foul feeling as it rolled around after hitting the ground. In the last few seconds of his remaining life, he had to push aside his emotions and turn to his last resort.

He still remembered it like it was yesterday. Reluctant but absolutely left with no choice, he had to give up his dying flesh and transfer his soul into a giant skeleton. He was enraged, and his whole body still trembled in anger. And so, he resolved to be patient for just a little longer. In a few more months, his revenge would actualize just as he desired.

Once my soul is settled...

Stashed inside the flashy repository, his giant skull minutely clacked as he solidified his dark resolution.

***

"I recall you have never led a garden construction before, right?"

"Yes, for one reason or another," replied Lloyd.

Here we go again, Lloyd thought to himself with an embarrassed smile. Viscount Nort flashed a proud smile.

"It is all right," Viscount Nort comforted him. "there is no need to be embarrassed. Your career is just starting now, so this will serve as a good opportunity for you, won't it?"

“You could not be any more correct,” Lloyd said, “I am counting on you, viscount.”

“Hahaha, is that so? My, I feel like you are using flattery to pawn off your responsibilities on me.”

“Oops, was I too obvious?” Lloyd asked heartily.

“I can see through you, my boy,” cheerfully replied Viscount Nort.

“But I have no other choice. How can I dare compete with you, Viscount Nort, in the field of garden construction?”

“Gosh... Your words are nonsense...”

Viscount Nort flashed a toothy smile, and even though he waved his hands to stop Lloyd, it looked like the viscount was absolutely pleased. This made Lloyd more eager in buttering him up.

“No, no. I mean it. So, I want to make the most out of this opportunity and learn everything I can by observing you execute your design. As you have said, this will be a good experience for me,” stressed Lloyd.

“Ahaha. My boy, I see you are bent on stealing my design technique, aren’t you?” Viscount Nort crossed his arms.

“Isn’t that how everyone improves?” quipped Lloyd.

“Ha, it is truly fascinating. I don’t hate you even when you say those things.”

“No,” Lloyd said as he swayed his hands. “It is all because you are being kind toward me with your endless generosity.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes.”

“Hahaha!”

Viscount Nort continued to cheerfully laugh, and he soon spread wide a bundle of paper on the work table.

“Then will you look at this? I spent some time on the outline of the garden last night.”

“Could it be that you already started with the basic design?” Lloyd asked, incredulous.

“For there is no reason to wait.” Viscount Nort shrugged. “That land, that space where the garden would be put up, seems to plead to me for a beautiful transformation. It wants to reveal its true self to the world.”

“...”

“That is why I enjoy this process although you may disagree. I get overwhelmingly happy through the process of earthing the beauty, balance, and harmony hidden in a neglected piece of land.”

Viscount Nort spoke carefully as he looked at the blueprint. Gazing at his side, Lloyd thought for the first time that this viscount was a charming man.

This person truly loves to design gardens.

The viscount beside Lloyd was different from him, who materialistically accepted and completed jobs for money or another generous form of compensation.

Wow, this means that I can pawn off more work on him now.

I’ve got to toss some more work and praise to him. Then his happiness will probably soar through the roof. And at the same time, I’ll get to slack off. He’s scratching my back, and I’m scratching his. If this isn’t a win-win situation I don’t know what is!

From then onward, Lloyd fawned over Viscount Nort even more shamelessly. And the older man took up the surveying and design with sheer happiness written all over his face. But leaving every bit of the process of the construction to Viscount Nort proved to be impossible about 15 days after the construction took off.

“Whew, this is quite troublesome,” said Viscount Nort in a worrying tone.

“Eh?” Lloyd asked. “Is there something wrong?”

Could it be that Lloyd had mooched off too openly? Had Viscount Nort finally reached the limit of his patience? But when Lloyd carefully asked what it was, to his relief, Viscount Nort was troubled by something else.

“It is because of the waterway construction demanded by Her Majesty.”

“What about it?”

“You see, you remember it too? The Magena River penetrates the capital. Her Majesty instructed us to pull the water from the river and create a waterway in the garden,” Viscount Nort reminded him.

“Yes, she did.”

“And she stressed several times that the waterway must be wide enough for a 50-pax ship to traverse freely and enjoy a view of her sculpture and the dragon skeleton.”

“Yes, I remember it, too,” confirmed Lloyd.

“That is where my trouble comes from. The thing is, hmm, paving the waterway is fine, but...”

Sensing a problem, Lloyd asked, “Is there a problem in the waterway design?”

“The water level difference between the two points, that is, the entry where the river water flows into the garden and the exit where it flows out, are significant.” Viscount Nort scratched his head.

“You must mean that the water current is faster than expected.”

“Exactly. That is what I mean.” Viscount Nort stroked his eyes heavy with fatigue. “The velocity of the moving water is faster than I expected it to be. Of course, we can float a boat on it, but we’ll have to give up on providing a view of the garden at this rate.”

“Hmm,” mused Lloyd, “you are certainly right.”

Lloyd nodded as he looked at the blueprint the viscount was pointing at. Indeed, the water level of the two ends was unexpectedly different.

They almost differ by 82 feet!

So. floating a boat in the waterway would be, to exaggerate a little, like turning a cruise ship into a flume coaster. A beautiful view of the garden? A magnificent sight of the sculpture and dragon skeletons? They wouldn’t even be able to dream of it.

Everyone’s going to be busy getting seasick or distracted from the thrill of a ride equal to kayaking in a rapid stream of the Grand Canyon.

After organizing his thoughts, Lloyd asked, “Then how about extending the length of the waterway?”

That would be the simplest solution. It would be similar to constructing a spiral path along a steep mountain to prevent any accidents from happening. They would gain more control over the velocity of the waterway by expanding its length.

Count Nort shook his head. “It won’t do. I have considered that solution as well.”

“Is there a problem with that method?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes. It is not beautiful.”

“Excuse me?” Lloyd retorted right away.

“The waterway is going to uncontrollably widen. A huge garden like this has a theme for each of its sections. Expanding the waterway would ruin all the themes. So, we cannot use that method."

"Then how about using a double-leaf miter gate?"

"What...?"

Count Nort paused, unable to process the words he just heard. Double-leaf? Miter gate?

"Actually," Lloyd explained as though it was nothing. "It is not a complex concept. May I use your pen?"

"Okay, here you go."

"Thank you," said Lloyd as he took the pen. "To illustrate the basic principle... look here and here. We will shape the waterway to resemble a staircase."

"Hold on. But what about the ship? How is it going to pass the waterway when it is shaped like a stair?"

"That is why we will need a floodgate."

With a grin on his face, Lloyd drew a rough outline of a floodgate.

"The middle part of the waterway, that is, the end of the stair, is where the floodgate will be installed. It will close off the entrance the ship comes through, just like an aquarium."

"And next?"

"We can drain the water in the aquarium."

Lloyd sketched another drawing, this time in the area with a lower water level.

"Once the water drains out of the aquarium, the ship is going to come down along with the water level."

“Yes, indeed.”

“So, when the water level is sufficiently lowered, all we have to do is open the opposing floodgate as well as the one we just opened.”

“Oh...” Viscount Nort’s eyes glimmered. “So the opposing floodgate will become the ‘next flight of stairs’ in the waterway, and lower the water level. Am I right?”

“Yes, that is a precise summary.” Lloyd nodded.

It was actually a simple idea. Build a floodgate, a partition, that would shut the water flow at a particular point in the waterway. Let the ship enter, and close the floodgate, which would make the inside of the floodgate a square aquarium. Then add or drain water to control the water level.

If the ship traveled from a point where the water level was high and heading downward, the water could simply be drained. What about when it was going upward? They could just let the water flow in and balance the water level of both sides of the waterway like so. This way, the floodgate would act as an elevator for the ship, much like the floodgate in Canal Saint Martin in France.

“Of course, we can’t just thoughtlessly build a huge floodgate as it has to be able to bear water pressure. Based on some quick math, I think each floodgate can control about ten feet of water.”

“Then should we install floodgates all throughout the waterway?” asked Viscount Nort.

“Yes,” agreed Lloyd. “That will allow us to maintain the velocity of the current quite well, and let a ship pass through with ease.”

“I agree. Moreover, the passengers admiring the garden on the ship will likely become entranced by the moving floodgate. So, we will simply have to decorate the inside of the floodgate to captivate people’s attention once it opens,” mused the viscount.

“Oh...” gaped Lloyd with admiration. “That is something I haven’t thought about.”

“Really?”

“No, I never did,” Lloyd said. “I really never thought about that. Truly, you are a skilled expert, Viscount Nort.”

“Haha, how humble you are. Hahaha.”

Viscount Nort chuckled aloud, and at the same time, he was amazed. He gazed at Lloyd meaningfully.

This boy. I knew he was being considerate of me.

Actually, Viscount Nort noticed Lloyd’s careful behavior toward him from the first day they met. He was sure the young fellow was hiding his potential and refraining from brusquely acting as though he knew everything. He seemed to be wary of receiving praise from others and constantly lowered himself. It was the same case just now.

A floodgate, huh? I never thought to use that in the garden. But he carefully picked his words to make sure I didn’t feel embarrassed about it.

What was more, he even credited the idea of decorating the floodgate to Visount Nort, acting as though he didn’t think so far ahead. Viscount Nort easily noticed that Lloyd was being considerate.

There is no way a man who thought of building a floodgate here didn’t have that idea. I can tell that he is obviously trying to give credit for the idea and this project overall to me.

Why? There was no way of knowing. But Viscount Nort didn’t hate Lloyd for it. Instead, he was proud of this young man and appreciative for refraining from pompously showing off his skills, which were superior to his own, thereby saving his face. At the same time, Viscount Nort felt a rush of competitiveness against Lloyd.

I should work harder.

Viscount Nort wasn’t an unsightly man who relied on the favors of his juniors in the field. His skills were acquired through years of experience on the job, and his enthusiasm shot through the roof once more.

From that day onward, backed by Viscount Nort’s active guidance and Lloyd’s minimal participation, the construction of the largest garden in the history of the Magentano kingdom took off in full force. The House of Magentano generously supported the garden project and over 5,000 workers were hired. Even the royal magicians rolled up their sleeves, their powerful magic mixing, flipping, and rearranging the soil. Thousands of workers then used their shovels and tools in a fit of sweat. On top of them, Lloyd’s fantastical creatures joined in on the effort.

“Okay, you all. Dig, flip, and remove!”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha! Ggo!”

Ppodong dug the waterway. Bangul ate the dirt pile. Hamang filled the pond after drawing water elsewhere. Ggoming busily moved thousands of trees. And Lloyd even contacted the Frontera fiefdom to bring Bibeong.

“Bibeong!”

Throughout the whole process, Bibeong strove hard to show off his tremendous strength and great perseverance to Bangul by participating in the construction with all his might. As the fantastical creature, whose body size reached over 328 feet, joined the project, the construction speed increased to an incredible level.

Seasons changed. The maple trees reddened. The leaves fell. The branches thinned out. White snowflakes covered them. The year ended with its first snowfall.

With the new year, Javier teased Lloyd for getting older, and Lloyd forced a smile as he tried to look cool. Flowers started to bloom, and one day when the early spring came along with the full blossom of magnolia, “Termina Grand Garden,” which the House of Magentano completed to show off its power to the outside world, was revealed to the world in its completed form for the first time.

A festival was held in the capital that same spring day. It was a grand completion ceremony held in “The Magentano Sanctuary” and “The Queen’s Advance Road.” The latter sat in the center of the garden and the former was at the end of it. The sculpture of the queen stood tall, and a skeleton of a dragon, stretching over 200 yards, humbly bowed down at the sculpture. Everyone at the ceremony let out words of admiration at the amazing magnificence they gave off. And that was the reason why no one sensed the subtle change in the dragon skeleton through the ceremony.

Clack... Softly and minutely, and yet certainly, the skull of the dragon started to move.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 215: The Grand Completion Ceremony (1)

“Okay, ladies and gentlemen, please look over here. If you pull this lever, the main waterline opens up and drains the water.”

Cluck! As he explained, the floodgate official pulled the lever, and the pulley inside the floodgate turned with a metallic noise. The main waterline opened to lower the water level as the water drained out.

“Eh? It’s real! The water is going out!”

“Goodness gracious. What machine is this?!”

The small cruise ship waiting at the floodgate descended as the water level lowered, and the passengers onboard looked around the inner floodgate with marvel in their eyes. The inside looked much like a giant square water tank. Once the water level lowered to reveal the sides, there appeared a host of relievo-styled sculptures. It told the story of a vigorous dragon in the distant past. An acting monarch was elected by the dragons, who in the later years was surrounded by power-hungry, greedy rebels. The whole capital was set ablaze by the war the rebels stirred. One heroic knight appeared at that moment to save the aged monarch and drive the rebels away. People cheered fervently, and he married the princess of the monarch, eventually declaring this land as the capital “Magenta” and starting a new era.

“That... Isn’t that the legend about our kingdom’s founding?”

“That knight appears to be Sir Mikael, the heroic founding king of our kingdom.”

“I am certain it is him from the large flower on the helmet.”

“That flower was symbolic of the promise he made with a dragon in his youth, right?”

“Yes. That is why this flower is still used as the symbol for the throne.”

A piece of the Kingdom’s origin story engraved in the floodgate left a strong impression on the passengers, and their faces swelled with pride at the sight of the unexpected spectacle. They took pride in being the citizens of a kingdom that was growing in prosperity. Their feelings of pride peaked when they were taken to the center of the garden.

“D-dragon...”

“Is that a real dragon skeleton?”

“It looks like it is. Then is that... a sculpture?”

“A sculpture? Where?”

“Right in front of the bowing dragon.”

“Oh... It’s really there!”

“I think that’s Her Majesty.”

“It looks like the dragon is kneeling before her.”

“Spectacular...”

There was a dragon bowing down its head, and Queen Magentano proudly stood right in front of it. The masterpiece struck a balance between stateliness and harmony. The sheer size and power overwhelmed the beholders, and since the waterway was designed to make passengers look up at the sculpture and dragon, the overwhelming sensation left a more dramatic effect. They even felt like they’d become a part of the scene, watching history be made. Their unity in the dramatic moment boosted the passengers' pride in the kingdom.

Still feeling overwhelmed, they got off the dock, which was connected to the venue for the ceremony. The noble passengers attended the ceremony at the height of their pride for the kingdom. Of course, Lloyd, who was also among the bustling nobles, felt the same. His national pride was at its peak too.

How can buffet food be this delicious? Hurray for the House of Magentano! Big hurray for the queen!

The banquet hall sat at The Magentano Sanctuary, located at the center of the garden. It couldn't be any more luxurious. It was even so for Lloyd, whose banquet standards had become considerably high. This one appeared to have reached the peak of luxury.

This is a lot flashier than the time I broke the sultan's bank in Ahinsya.

Truly, all sorts of cuisines were served. Moreover, everything was scrumptious and literally melted on his tongue as it offered his taste buds the wonder of nature, much like the premium-grade beef he used to buy with his meager salary. And the best part? It was all free!

"So Master Lloyd," Javier asked expressionlessly, "Do you like these kinds of food?"

"Yeah, of course," answered Lloyd as he ate a forkful of mouthwatering seafood pasta he didn't know the name of. And he asked back, "Of course I do. It's free. What's not to like?"

"..."

"What are you doing?" Lloyd went on. "Eat up. If you still don't get it, then just put it in your head. In an event like this, food is what you remember."

"I do not-"

"Feel like eating it?" put in Lloyd.

"No."

"But why?" There was genuine curiosity in Lloyd's voice.

"To be honest, I am skeptical about whether it's really necessary to waste so much money on this extravagant food," Javier spoke as he looked at the food stacked high on Lloyd's plate. "It is excessively rare. Unnecessarily high-end. Inefficient and expensive. The money that was spent on your plate of food alone could buy a large amount of rice and bread."

Lloyd noticed the faint glint of complaint in Javier's eyes. He smiled.

"Aha," said Lloyd, "I suppose you mean that giving up a small portion of this extravagant meal could help feed more hungry people in the capital, right?"

"Yes."

"Well," Lloyd said with a nod, "you're not wrong, but what can we do?"

"What do you mean what can we do?" blurted Javier.

"It's not like the food you refuse to eat will be distributed to the people."

"..."

"And we didn't spend our money on this," Lloyd reminded. "This banquet was prepared and hosted by the palace. That is why they prepared food befitting the status of this event."

"But such a luxurious event-"

"Is absolutely necessary," broke in Lloyd.

Javier paused. Lloyd gave a quick scan around the banquet hall.

"Will you look over there?" Lloyd pointed to one area. "They're the nobles from the palace, right?"

"Yes, it appears so."

Pointing to another group this time, Lloyd asked, "Then what about them?"

"They look like foreigners."

“You’re right. Probably ambassadors from nearby nations. Can’t you see?” Lloyd paused before resuming. “Events like these are a necessity, especially right after the completion of a grand and majestic construction funded by the kingdom.”

“Why is that?” Javier asked innocently.

“This place itself is a large, carefully crafted show window.”

Lloyd surveyed the garden thoroughly constructed with sheer magnificence. Javier frowned a little.

“By show window...”

“Yes, all of this is a show.”

“You cannot possibly mean that this is all a show to flaunt our power to foreign kingdoms.”

“Of course it is.” Lloyd grinned. “Do you think anybody can build a garden like this? The mere fact that construction of this size was finished without any difficulty proves our kingdom’s wealth. It’s proof of our overflowing capital, showing the entire world that this kingdom is capable of mobilizing and supporting an equally strong military.”

It was true. In other words, this project was not sham or overly excessive despite what it looked like. It was an indirect and clear yardstick to demonstrate the power of the royal family.

It was historically no different on Earth. The Versaille was similar to the Termina Garden. The Peterhof Palace and Sanssouci Palace commissioned by Peter the Great and Friedrich II, respectively, were also close examples. So, in a way, this was a sort of showcase, a remarkable event that displayed the power and wealth of the royal family both domestically and internationally.

“So, enjoy yourself,” Lloyd suggested. “This event and amount of extravagance is a necessity.”

“Um, but...”

“Oh, wow. Is that the special coconut from Ahinsya?”

Flinch. Javier, who was about to grumble, stopped. The special coconut from Ahinsya. The sweet and sour taste automatically came back to him.

“I got you.” Lloyd smugly smiled.

“...”

“Look at that. I knew you’d chow down once you found something you like,” pointed Lloyd.

“You are wrong,” denied Javier with a defiant look. “I was just tensing my body to hold back a sneeze.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

“Really?” Lloyd waggled his eyebrows.

“Yes.”

“Then can you swear that you will never lay your hands on the coconut even when it’s right in front of you?”

“Of course, I won’t-”

“My, looks like there’s a real one here.”

Lloyd immediately snatched a plate from a passing servant. The plate, in fact, did have a special coconut placed right on top of it. The smile on Lloyd’s face turned more evil.

“Then I will enjoy my drink.”

“...”

Javier’s face froze in a flash. That gave Lloyd another smile but not because he was able to make fun of Javier.

Those reactions just now definitely suit Javier.

A knight who was always sided with the weak. A hero who pursued justice over immediate power. Lloyd suddenly recalled Javier’s appearances throughout the original novel.

Yes. Right. I forgot because he’s with me all the time, but he was always like this.

Javier preferred a conversation in front of a bonfire to a luxurious banquet. He preferred to use the money for an extravagant meal to buy dozens of bread loaves for people in need. He didn’t hesitate to act and didn’t come to regret his decisions. This aspect of his personality remained unchanged even when he became the grandmaster in the novel.

If he really wanted, he could have attained all the power and wealth he wanted. If he really made an effort, he could easily have had his own kingdom.

But Javier didn’t.

He’s really quite the man.

Lloyd picked up the coconut with a grin and held it out to Javier.

“No need to stiffen your face like that. Eat it.”

“...”

“I won’t judge.” Lloyd held it out some more. “Eat it, I tell you.”

“...”

“Hey, eating comes first before swearing,” Lloyd insisted.

“I never swore.” At last, a wry smile appeared on Javier, and he was about to receive the coconut when...

Clack! Crush!

“...!”

An abrupt and blaring noise bellowed, and Lloyd wheeled around in surprise.

“Woah.”

The dragon skeleton that decorated the central garden and was assembled like a dinosaur fossil displayed in museums was now missing a skull, which had fallen to the ground.

What is happening?

Lloyd was flustered. That shouldn’t have been able to fall off so easily. He had overseen the installation himself. An intricate wiring of metal chains and support fixtures tightly held the pieces together.

I suppose it’s good that no one got crushed under it at least?

But for an accident like that to occur during a showcase event. Lloyd clicked his tongue to himself and watched the scene. There was a stir among the people in the hall. Queen Magentano was now up from her seat and giving orders to the people around her. Two people were being summoned to her, and it was the sculptor in charge of installing the sculpture and dragon skeleton and Viscount Nort who oversaw the garden construction.

Whew. My dear viscount is going to have to write a thick report on this one. Lloyd felt pity while watching the back of Count Nort as he restlessly squirmed in front of the queen’s presence. How could he not?

That man was a bit strict but nice to me.

The viscount was willing to do the majority of the design and construction work. Thanks to that, Lloyd could just focus on building the waterway and floodgate. It really made his job easier to do during the entire construction.

Plus, Viscount Nort even cried in overwhelming happiness when the construction ended.

Lloyd recalled how Viscount Nort called it the greatest masterpiece of his life. He had sobbed and wept that he could die happy now as his name would be remembered in the kingdom's history of construction. An accident like this during the completion ceremony was completely unexpected.

Tsk, tsk, tsk. This is why you should never be too willing to bear responsibility.

A part of Lloyd felt sorry for the man, but another part of him was relieved. It really gladdened him that he didn't decide to supervise the whole construction.

"Master Lloyd." Javier tapped Lloyd's shoulder twice as he called.

"Eh?"

"I have something to tell you." Javier's voice was grim.

"What is it?" demanded Lloyd. "Do you want some more coconuts?"

"It is not that," refused Javier. "It's about that dragon skeleton over there."

"The skeleton? What about it?"

"Something feels a bit off."

"..."

Javier's expression and gaze were stern, grim, and serious. The situation felt oddly nostalgic. Lloyd briefly racked his brain and was able to quickly recall why.

Oh, right. It was at Cremo. There was a completion ceremony there too.

That completion ceremony celebrated the completion of the mermaid statue. And the Gigatitan swept over the banquet hall. Javier was the first to sense danger before anyone else. As Lloyd continued thinking, he was gripped with an uneasy feeling.

“What is it now?” blurted Lloyd. “You’re not going to say something’s wrong with the dragon skeleton, are you?”

“Yes, I was about to tell you that.” Javier was dead serious. Lloyd’s heart sank.

Oh, come on! This was why completion ceremonies were the worst. Come to think of it, Lloyd said to himself, it was at the completion ceremony of the suspension bridge when the queen was almost assassinated as well. This was too unlucky for it to be a mere coincidence. Could it be that completion ceremonies were the root of evil? Javier continued to speak as this outrageous thought went on in Lloyd’s head.

“I have been feeling this since a while ago, but the mana in the skeleton is faintly moving.”

“What? The mana is moving?” asked Lloyd in an incredulous tone.

“Yes. Don’t dragon bones naturally hold a small amount of mana?”

“They do, but the mana shouldn’t be flowing. It’s dead.”

“Yes. That was definitely true until just earlier. But right after the skull fell off...”

“It started to flow?” asked Lloyd in an incredulous voice.

“Check it for yourself, Master Lloyd.”

“...”

It dawned on Lloyd that the Asrahan Core Technique was a skill that specialized in mana detection, absorption, and employment. Moreover, Javier was the inventor and leading expert of the technique. So, it was impossible for him to be wrong.

"..."

As the uneasy feeling in his stomach spread out in him, Lloyd rotated his triple circle. Ziiing!

As the Asrahan Core Technique began to work, he could feel the flow of mana around him. He picked up the powerful mana belonging to the queen from the other side and the mana stirring among the people at the unexpected event. There was also a natural one present in the drifting wind. And...

"Dammit."

The moment Lloyd picked up a mana flow in the dragon skeleton, shivers ran down his spine. He was sure of it. Javier was right. There really was mana flowing inside the dragon skeleton. What was more, the flow was getting stronger even while he could feel it. The mana was aggressive and explosive.

Gulp. So, something was behind this. A terrible event that no one expected was about to implode in this location. The moment Lloyd realized it, the moment his bad feeling solidified into conviction...

Dammit! I hate these stupid completion ceremonies!

Lloyd immediately got to his feet without a second of hesitation. It was beyond him what was going to happen. But he had to evacuate people first. He was convinced that he'd regret it otherwise. So, he threw his hand into his inner pocket and brought out Bibeong to send everyone far, far away from the danger they weren't aware of yet.

"Bibeong!" called Lloyd.

“Bibeong?”

“It’s been stifling to forcefully stay small since the construction ended, right?”

“Bibebeong? Bibeong?”

“No, you must have felt stifled, I’m sure. So, eat this.”

“Bibeong?”

Bibeong had been eating a blue sunflower seed every day while he was in the capital. Lloyd held out a red sunflower seed to him.

“Do you trust me?” Lloyd asked.

“Bibeong...?”

“Better yet, do you trust Bangul?”

“Bibeong!”

The mere mention of her name made him nod hard.

“Great,” Lloyd complimented. “Then eat this, and do as I tell you.”

Lloyd fed Bibeong a sunflower seed and hurled him far away where there weren’t any people.

Poof! “Bibeong!”

A 328-foot beaver appeared in a flash, and he let out a roar in one corner of the hall and started to stomp and trample the ground. The effect was immense.

“Arghhh!!”

A piercing shrill of a noble lady became the whistle that caused all the panic-stricken guests to swiftly evacuate, prompting a mass exodus.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 216: The Grand Completion Ceremony (2)

“Arghhh!”

“Wh-what... What is that?!”

“Run! No, move now! Get out of my way!”

The people scrambled, trying to outrun one another. Every single one of them was thrown into a maddening frenzy. The men had their shirt collars fly up as they sprinted, and the women threw off their heels to escape for their lives. Everyone looked to evacuate as quickly as possible, prompting a mass exodus. Bibeong roared at the fleeing group of people.

“Bibeong!”

The loud shout easily made their pace about ten percent faster.

What in the world is that?!

Fear and dismay gripped everyone. They were just at the bouquet simply enjoying the excellent food and aromatic wine, admiring the beautiful grand garden, feeling proud to be invited to the royal celebration, and networking within their social circle. That was all they were doing. Nothing more.

“Bibebeong!”

“...!”

And so, none of them understood or wanted to understand why they had to face this colossal monster in front of them and process what it was doing here.

“You over there! Run faster!”

“Here, take my hand!”

The people ran for their lives, flooding out of the banquet hall in a rush. Everyone ran and grew farther away, and soon enough, silence filled the previously bustling banquet hall. This made Lloyd smile.

Wow, I didn't expect this to work.

Lloyd wasn't sure, to be honest. Even when he brought Bibeong out, he wasn't sure if this would work as many people in the hall knew him.

It's unsurprising since Bibeong joined the garden construction and became a big help. Thanks to it, word spread about him amongst the people in the capital.

It was only a slight exaggeration to say that almost everyone in the capital was aware of Bibeong. The few who weren't would be newborn babies. That was why Lloyd was a bit unsure whether this method would work. He wanted to evacuate people outside the hall, but a part of him had doubts about them running away at the sight of Bibeong. Nonetheless, Lloyd decided to give it a try and hoped that using shock would work.

Honestly, not many people would have come across Bibeong in real life outside of rumors. Moreover, this closely.

It was a lot different to see a giant monster in front of your eyes compared to hearing about one. The difference was even more stark than seeing a skyscraper in a picture and staring at it from the ground level. Why? Bibeong could move and roar, whereas the building couldn't.

The length of his body alone is 328 feet. That's the size of a building. And imagine that kind of giant creature standing up on two legs, roaring and tap-dancing as his belly swings. It's only natural to be frightened and run for your life.

That was the effect Lloyd wished to bring about, and he expected people to run away from a skyscraper-sized, hula-dancing beaver. Even the ones who knew that Bibeong was meek and gentle would do the same.

How can they not? Imagine that there's a domesticated polar bear and it starts loudly roaring in your face. I'd be surprised if I didn't wet my pants. It would scare the wits out of me even if the bear held a coke bottle in their paw.

Anyway, Lloyd's plan worked just as he expected. Most of the guests were thrown into panic and ran for their lives. Soon, the whole hall was emptied, minus some dutiful servants and acrobats. Now, the royal guards started to fill up the space as they shot stern gazes at Lloyd.

"Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Count Arcos Frontera, and his knight better kneel down at once and follow our instructions."

With an authoritative tone and a gaze more commanding than his voice, the royal guard commander spoke tonelessly, and Lloyd suppressed the wry smile that was forming on his face.

He must think I caused a scene.

Lloyd suddenly summoned a fantastical creature in the middle of the ceremony and threw people into chaos and panic by creating a terrorizing scene. Lloyd figured he would face serious punishment for killing the party. Lloyd called Bibeong as he carefully eyed the royal guard commander. He fed him a blue sunflower seed and put him inside his inner pocket. Then Lloyd obeyed the commander's instructions and got down on his knee.

"Looks like she'll come down on us this time," said Lloyd, "that is if nothing happens from now on."

"I did not expect you would bring out Sir Bibeong..." grumbled Javier as he got down on his knee beside Lloyd.

Turning to his side, Lloyd chuckled and said, "I couldn't think of any other way to evacuate everyone."

"Was calmly alerting the queen of the situation not an option for you," reminded Javier.

“But then I would need to receive permission from the queen. And provide an explanation for what we’re dealing with right now and persuade her. It’s too slow. We don’t have time to go through all those steps.”

Right around the time Javier and Lloyd were bickering, someone broke in their conversation.

“Now is the time for you to explain and persuade me.”

It was Queen Magentano. She was standing three steps away from them and looking down at them with an arrogant gaze. Thankfully, there was no resentment or anger in her eyes.

“Lloyd Frontera. I am flustered. The Lloyd I know would not cause this sort of turmoil without a good reason.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“No, explain yourself first before asking for my forgiveness.” Lloyd realized from her firm voice that she didn’t want any formalities. A faint smile appeared in his mouth.

I knew she’d be wise.

Once again, Lloyd felt that the queen was extraordinary. She didn’t jump to conclusions, even amid this kind of situation. She didn’t readily lose her calm or temper either. Instead, she stared at Lloyd with a calm gaze.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd replied quickly with calmness. “I will cut to the chase. I felt an explosive increase of mana flow in the dragon skeleton.”

“You felt a flow of mana?” asked the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“You did when even I couldn’t feel anything?”

“To be exact, it was Sir Asrahan who felt it.”

“...”

Her gaze toward Javier stiffened for a second. Lloyd wondered if it was because she realized that she was still behind Javier. But Lloyd brushed the thought aside as he knew there was something more important right now. The flow of mana inside the dragon skeleton was growing more fierce with every passing second.

“Therefore, I dared to do something unbelievable.”

“Was it to evacuate people as quickly as possible?” asked the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Moreover, I presume you determined that your ruckus would bring the troops to this place. Am I right?”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“It’s too early to forgive you,” said the queen. “I must confirm your words.”

At her order, a senior palatial magician hurried and walked over to the dragon skeleton and pointed his magic wand to it. After a prolonged session of focusing, he detected a flow of mana. Meanwhile, Lloyd was still down on his knee, nibbling his bottom lip.

This feels like I’m waiting to get my test grade back.

But Lloyd was certain that his test would get a perfect score. Unlike the queen, who didn’t own the Asrahan Core Technique, he could detect the flow of mana in the dragon skeleton in real time from a distance.

The flow is slowly getting more fierce.

It was almost like the mana of a living creature who had a pumping heart and pulse, breathed in and out, opened its eyes, and finally moved.

“...”

What if it really started moving? What was he supposed to do? Suddenly, Lloyd was gripped with an uneasy feeling, and he thought for a brief second. If he was right about his hunch, then there was only one course of action for him to take.

I obviously have to run away.

Just then, the setting in the novel hit his mind. Among the undead monsters who came back to life, the novel stated there were two that stood above the rest.

Hell's Knight and Bone Dragon.

The skeleton of the Bone Dragon itself was a mass of mana, and its bones moved using the mana as its source. The novel event mentioned that it was nothing short of a walking disaster.

Javier was the one who said it in the novel when he was still a sword master. That running away is the only way to survive when faced with such a creature. Theoretically, only the grandmaster could fight against the Bone Dragon.

The Knight of Blood and Iron. For some reason, the Bone Dragon was more powerful than any other dragon in this novel. To analogize, if most dragons were considered ordinary humans, the Bone Dragon was a skeleton. Just like how ordinary people could be beaten by the skeletons, most dragons couldn't be left unscathed after a fight with the Bone Dragon. And so, only the strong and powerful warriors among the ordinary dragons could defeat the Bone Dragon. What if this dragon skeleton came back to life and started to move? What if it was Bone Dragon?

I'll run without looking back.

Lloyd resolved to do so. Moreover, he resolved to take Javier, who was kneeling right beside him.

Of course, I should take him. There's no reason for either of us to risk our lives here.

Lloyd knew that he was no hero. He wasn’t like the superheroes that appeared in films. He was just an ordinary person who wanted to retire and enjoy his life. Fighting in combat? He didn’t have it in him. Sure, one thing had led to another, and he came to own the Asrahan Core Technique and manaheart in the process of overcoming some crises. However, he never expected to use them and show off his strength and power to other people.

I can do some self defense. That’s about it.

Moreover, if the enemy he was up against was the Bone Dragon, which only grandmasters could put up a fight against, it was only wise for him to run away for his life. And he wouldn’t feel the slightest amount of guilt about it.

The troops are here. And the queen’s here too.

They existed to protect the kingdom. And so, Lloyd didn’t plan to risk his life when there were people like them.

I pray that I am wrong. Come on.

With his heart in his mouth, Lloyd stared at the palatial magician and the dragon skeleton. Meanwhile, he sharpened the flow of mana in the skeleton.

Please.

The flow grew fiercer.

Haa... Please.

The mana flow became stronger. Lloyd gulped in spite of himself.

Seriously. Stop.

Lloyd begged inwardly that this ruckus would conclude as a false alarm. He didn’t care about being reprimanded by the queen. Lloyd pleaded and begged. Could it be that his prayer worked?

Eh...?

The mana flow suddenly stopped its amplification, and it gradually started to weaken like a Vitcoin graph after its peak or like the housing prices that would plummet the next day

"..."

Lloyd turned to Javier, who was looking at him. Javier nodded. He, too, felt it.

I'm sure of it. The mana is weakening.

Lloyd smiled involuntarily. He could feel it. The mana flow inside the dragon skeleton was sharply calming down as though it was never any different. The palatial magician seemed to have felt it too.

"Your Majesty," announced the magician, "It is true that there was mana flowing inside the skeleton much like what the eldest son of the Frontera family reported. But it is not strong enough for us to worry about it."

"It is nothing to worry about?" asked the queen.

"No, Your Majesty."

Pulling his wand back, the magician replied courteously.

"I have read records of similar instances as this one. To begin with, a dragon bone naturally holds a considerable amount of mana. Therefore, the records said that the mana flows on its own from time to time."

"So, are you saying that the mana flow that you detected does not posit any special danger or abnormality?"

"Yes, Your Majesty, I-"

Wham! Right before he could finish, the foreleg of the dragon crushed down on the magician.

"...!"

A fierce vibration spread across the land, bringing a thick, explosive cloud of dust. The dragon skeleton raised its head amid the dust and let out a roar.

“...!”

It was a silent roar. Without any vocal organs, it could only use mana to let out a roar, but that was exactly why it was so menacing.

Fwoosh! A shockwave of unadulterated mana blasted in all directions, tossing the banquet tables and smashing the podium in a flash. Trees were rooted out, and dishes and wine glasses shattered into thousands of shards. Everything within about 300 yards of distance was swept away by the force.

“Argh!!!”

One of the servants hurtled away with a shout. The guards tried to persist as they bled from the piercing shards of glass. Amid the stormy mana, Queen Magentano flew open her eyes in fright.

This... What... What?!

Her eyes darted toward the Bone Dragon. She couldn’t believe it. She thought it was merely a spoil, a tool that would memorialize her great achievement. But...

It can’t be.

This was not an accident or a coincidence. A shaft of doubt and suspicion arose in her mind. She pieced together all her memories related to the skeleton until now. She had brought the dragon skeleton after suppressing the warlocks and put it up at the center of the capital. Then there was a celebration ceremony. And now, the skeleton was moving and stirring up this entire area. And at last, Bone Dragon was looking down from a towering height. The moment their gazes met, she understood at last.

I was deceived.

She recalled the group of warlocks. An easy win, she thought. A great success. But that was a mistake. A grave mistake. She was arrogant to regard so. As soon as she realized, she leaped high and moved to correct her mistake, her sword already shining bright with a brilliant aura.

Thwack! She charged toward the Bone Dragon's foreleg that was touching the ground. She wielded her sword, her aura turbulently glinting. But it bounced off.

Clang! "...!"

She couldn't scratch let alone split its foreleg in half. Terror filled her eyes. But she didn't allow panic to settle in her heart.

Instead, she calmly shouted, "Lloyd Frontera!"

Lloyd was the first person who foresaw this catastrophe. So, he was the most reliable individual at the moment. He might be able to enlighten her on how to break through this situation. She looked sideways and called out to Lloyd. That was when she realized something.

"..."

She realized that Lloyd was already far away and running faster than anyone else.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 217: What the Queen Carries (1)

Huff! Huff!

Deep breath. Breath in. Breath out. Take a step forward, syncing your breath. Run. Like a gust of wind, the night air brushed his ears. Yes, Lloyd was running at full speed. He was trying to escape.

Dammit. Is this really happening?

Lloyd felt disgusted as he jumped over a waist-high patch of grass. Seriously, completion ceremonies were the problem. It didn't matter if it was perfect, lavish, or grand. Something bad always happened during completion ceremonies.

This is such an uncreative cliche!

Gnashing his teeth, Lloyd threw a glance behind his shoulder, and he saw a towering gray silhouette under the dark night sky. It was the giant dragon skeleton, Bone Dragon. And it was going berserk, making a wordless, mana-charged roar and sweeping the whole area with its long tail and neck. The sight of its bony wings spread out was even eerier, and it was fluttering like a spiderweb engraved into the night sky.

Seriously, how did this happen?

That was the dragon skeleton without a doubt. The queen had said that it was a spoil she had acquired after suppressing the remnants of the warlock. And so, he was even promised a piece of the dragon's tailbone after the construction was over.

Dammit!

At this rate, the whole capital was on the verge of being destroyed. But despite such a predicament, Lloyd didn't feel an iota of duty or lofty eagerness to protect the kingdom.

Of course I won't. Why would I fight against that thing?!

He'd have to risk his life to fight the monster. But there was no chance that he'd win even if he did. Someone could offer him billions of dollars to try, but Lloyd would still turn them down. With such a decision in mind, Lloyd continued rushing forward, but it looked like Javier, who was running at his side, was on a different page than him.

"Master Lloyd," Javier called, "where are we running off to?"

"Outside the garden."

"Then what strategy are you planning to respond with?"

"..."

Lloyd stared at Javier as he continued to run. Javier stared back, sending a gaze that seemed to say, "What's wrong?"

This scoundrel.

Then it occurred to Lloyd that Javier had misunderstood him. Javier must think, Lloyd told himself, that he was running somewhere with a great strategy or solid plan in mind. He must be expecting Lloyd to respond to the situation.

But I'm not that kind of person.

He couldn't be that sort of person. So, he decided to clear their misunderstanding first.

Pulling the corners of his mouth upward, Lloyd retorted, "Respond? Plan? What?"

"Yes," Javier replied.

"Um, if I have to put a name to it... Operation 911?"

"Excuse me?"

“I mean, run for your life.”

“...”

Javier’s face stiffened as he stared at Lloyd. On second thought, his face would be better described as angry rather than stiff.

“Master Lloyd...” His voice was now lower than a while ago. “Why are you always like this?”

“Like what?” asked Lloyd innocently.

“Many people are in danger right now. And yet, you do not hesitate to run away for your own safety, disregarding everyone else’s.”

“Yeah. You’re right.” Lloyd shrugged. And he replied nonchalantly, “Is that bad?”

“...”

“I think we argued over something like this before, right?”

“It was in Cremo,” Javier reminded him.

“You’re right. The Gigatitan.”

“At that time, you were-”

Lloyd interrupted him. “Yeah. I ran away just like now.”

“...”

“Is this really wrong?” Lloyd asked, meaning every word.

People who sacrificed themselves for others during disasters and accidents, like firefighters jumping into the plumes of fire and police officers and citizens helping out to respond to the accident, all deserved respect. They could be said to be the true heroes of this world. But what about Lloyd? He was different from them.

I’m a normal person. These kinds of situations scare me.

To be honest, Lloyd didn’t want to die. He just wanted to enjoy a simple life. He didn’t care to act like a hero or be praised as one. But it seemed that Javier thought otherwise.

“You have not changed at all, Master Lloyd.”

Javier looked Lloyd’s way, and there was disappointment in his eyes. No, it’d be more correct to say it was bitter regret. A bitter smile appeared on Lloyd’s mouth.

“I can’t do anything about it,” Lloyd said. “I’ll always be like this.”

“Do you mean it?” asked Javier.

“Do you think I’m lying to you right now?”

“No. However-”

“However?”

“Then enjoy living on my behalf as well.”

“Eh...?” Lloyd stopped dead in his tracks. He questioned the other man. “What? What do you mean?”

Javier was now wearing a face full of resolution. And he spoke with even more determination and sincerity.

“It was my honor to serve you all this time, Master Lloyd. I hope you safely escape from here.”

“Hey.”

“And please convey my message to Count Frontera that I am grateful for our time until now and to please forgive me for not being able to protect him longer.”

“Hey, you!”

Lloyd was flustered. Why was Javier talking like he was going to die soon? Why was Javier not responding to him? What was that faint, enigmatic smile on his face before he rushed off toward the Bone Dragon without a second glance? Lloyd couldn’t understand anything.

“What was that...? I got goosebumps from listening to him...”

Left alone, Lloyd let out a chuckle. Sure, it was commendable for Javier to head back to prevent a disaster, but was the overly dramatic speech necessary?

It’s no surprise coming from a protagonist in a novel.

That was the problem with fictional protagonists. As if it wasn’t enough to fight for justice, they gave corny speeches that made him wince in embarrassment.

Well, Javier was always like this.

Lloyd threw his gaze at the direction Javier had run off to. Javier was already gone. Lloyd could only see the clear outlines of the Bone Dragon going berserk.

“...”

He’s going to be okay, right? Lloyd brushed off the pang of nervousness and started to run again. He sprinted ahead to escape.

He’s Javier. He’ll be all right. Of course, nothing bad will happen.

Why? He was a sword master who could utilize the Asrahan Core Technique. He was stronger than most other sword masters out there. He was a genius among geniuses, surely to be remembered in history for his incredible strength, swordsmanship, fighting technique, skill application and variety, and ability to improvise. It wouldn’t be easy for something to go wrong with him. He wouldn’t die so easily. It was nearly impossible...

“Ugh. Come on! Why did he have to make me worry with those words!”

Lloyd bellowed, and he stopped running. Swiveling in annoyance, he glowered at the Bone Dragon.

At this rate, Javier will die.

He remembered what Javier said in the novel. The Bone Dragon. Theoretically, only grandmasters could put up a fight against him. But Javier was a simple sword master right now. So, rushing to fight head-on with the dragon would result in his death.

He won’t back down without a fight.

It was a reasonable assumption considering Javier’s personality. No, it was more than likely to be the truth.

If the queen is in danger, he’ll throw himself in harm’s way. And if someone else is in danger, he’ll rush to protect them too.

That was the kind of man Javier was. In the novel and their current life, Javier had remained the same. So, he would be no different this time. And that was exactly why Lloyd thought he’d die this time. He was a bit opposed to it.

“Come on...”

Is this what it felt like to leave a horribly obstinate friend at the scene of an accident? Lloyd turned back, gnashing his teeth. And he made for the opposite way, where the dragon was.

Fine. I’ll go! I’m going! You bastard! I will pull you out of that place, even if I have to drag you out by your ear.

Of course, Lloyd had no intention of fighting the monster. It was just senseless to fight against the Bone Dragon. His plan involved carrying out some gimmicks and finding a chance to get Javier out of there. The latter may censure him for being a coward, but his survival came first. Resolved, Lloyd ran.

“Dammit! That bastard, really!”

***

“Please, Your Majesty. I am sincerely speaking. I beg you to quickly evacuate this scene!”

“No.”

Even though the royal guard commander loyally pleaded with the queen, Queen Magentano dismissed his request.

“If you genuinely wish to save me, you better lower your voice first,” she scolded.

“Oh...” The commander flinched. “Was I too loud, Your Majesty?”

“Yes, to the point that I am glad that the dragon didn’t hear us.”

Queen Magentano slightly moved her head, taking a peek through the thick screen of grass they were hiding behind. The Bone Dragon, unreservedly going berserk under the moon, came into her view. It felt as though no living creature could tame the monster.

The royal guards in charge of watching the banquet hall seemed to be struggling to not get stomped under the bone dragon’s feet. It couldn’t be called a fight or battle. They looked more like a swarm of ants fleeing for their lives from the tongue of an eager anteater. The face of the commander darkened as he observed the sight beside the queen.

“Your Majesty,” the commander said in a worrying tone, “What do you plan to do now?”

“What else?” A fierce smile hung on her mouth. “I have to fight.”

“However...”

“Then do you wish for me to run away in the face of a threat to our kingdom?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty. However-”

“However?”

“Please forgive me for saying this, but it seems appropriate to retreat and recover from battle,” the guard commander pointed out.

“You are not wrong,” she agreed, “but I see it a bit differently.” She paused before continuing to talk. “There is no way of knowing how the Bone Dragon came to be from a pile of dragon bones and started to move nor what trickery the warlocks used on me after I suppressed them. If there is one thing I know, it is that I am relieved the Bone Dragon wreaked havoc in this garden instead of anywhere else.”

“By relieved, what do you mean, Your Majesty?”

“Imagine what would have happened if the monster ran wild in the capital now.”

“Oh...”

The commander’s face turned as pale as a sheet. The Bone Dragon rampaging the capital where there were tens of thousands of citizens? The thought alone sent chills down his spine.

“So, I must make sure that it stays right here,” Queen Magentano went on. “Until the royal troops are prepared for battle and launch an organized counterattack.”

“Do you mean Your Majesty will personally stall for time?”

“Of course.”

Queen Magentano was looking at him now. Her gaze and facial expression reflected a slight disdain for him for asking such an obvious question.

“Who else, if not me, is a sword master? You? All by yourself?”

“If you order me to, I shall-”

“No, you have proven your worth by staying at my side all this time to protect me,” complimented the queen. “Therefore, it is my turn to prove my own worth.”

“Your worth... Your Majesty? There is no need for you to do so. Your existence alone already-”

“A person who wears the crown to protect their kingdom and people. Is that not the definition of a monarch?”

“...”

“I am simply fulfilling my duty.”

“Y-your Majesty!”

“Shh. I said lower your voice,” ordered the queen.”

“Then... May I join the fight alongside your majesty?”

“That will likely be difficult as you are not a sword master.”

“But my duty and calling is to protect you by your side,” insisted the commander.

“Then your calling for today is to protect your guards. At this rate, they will all die.”

Queen Magentano pointed to the garden with her chin. The guards were struggling to avoid getting trampled under the Bone Dragon’s feet. The face of the commander darkened.

“But my duty is to stay by your side before anything else-”

“This is an order.” Queen Magentano’s voice was firm and definitive.

“Your words are my command...” The commander lowered his head.

Grinning, she replied, “Thank you for understanding my words and for protecting me today. Then I will leave everything to you now.”

“Y-your Majesty!”

“What?” she snapped.

“I dare... pray for you to remain safe.”

“I understand. Well then.”

With that, she was gone.

Rustle. Queen Magentano walked out of the grass. Her movements were completely natural as though there was nothing special about her decision. And she pulled out a sword from her waist without giving time for the commander to stop her and emanated a wave of energy with her whole body.

Fwoosh! Her manaheart raged, and an even more fierce wave of energy circled around her. The commotion was no less than the Bone Dragon’s mana roar that had swept the entire banquet hall.

Kaboom! It was rough yet sharp at the same time and as threatening as a wild predator. The powerful energy prompted Bone Dragon to react at once.

“...”

The Bone Dragon stopped its movement. Queen Magentano lowered her sword. The dragon that came back from death. The human monarch protects her kingdom. The gazes of the two met. Queen Magentano’s body trembled just then.

“...”

Certainly, the dragon was nothing to joke about. The moment she met the Bone Dragon’s gaze, shivers ran down her spine as though she was covered with ice water. That was why she chuckled instead and put on a brave face, repeating the following words in her head.

I am not afraid.

She wasn't confident that she would win. She didn't expect to. But it didn't matter to her. Even if she lost and perished, she vowed that she would at least buy enough time for her kingdom and people to be prepared to protect themselves.

That is why.

She walked toward the Bone Dragon once again without a moment of hesitation.

This is my duty

Failure. Death. None of it scared her. She instead glowered at the Bone Dragon with a calm gaze.

I am a queen.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 218: What the Queen Carries (2)

I am a queen.

She lifted her gaze. Under the night sky, the Bone Dragon stood tall like a giant mountain range. An indomitable wall. An impregnable fortress. Could this be what mayfly feels in the presence of a giant?

What a useless worry.

Queen Magentano smiled, and next, she leaped high. Fwoosh!

A second later, there was a crater on the spot she jumped from.

Boom! The Bone Dragon's foreleg stabbed the ground, leaving a destructive hole that was 32 feet deep and 82 feet wide upon impact. Rock debris scattered all over the air.

"Hmph!"

Queen Magentano brandished her sword in the air, her sword aura splitting into hundreds of strands that wrapped around her body. Hundreds of rock shards flew at her at a subsonic speed and clashed with her aura.

Clang! Clang! Clang! Sparks flew off from the hundreds of strands wrapped around her. She then broke through the fiery sparks to hurtle toward the Bone Dragon.

Exhale!

As she let out a rough exhale, her manaheart roared, and at the same time, her sword began to change.

Whoosh! The long sword in her hand cried out like a beast, revealing the fangs it had been hiding. Along with a red flash of light, it released an aura that was nearly ten times larger than its blade. Ultimately, the sword created from the aura had a blade that was about 20 inches wide and 13 feet long.

The destructive aura slammed down like an ax, targeting the foreleg of the dragon.

Clatter! She couldn't even make a scratch on the Bone Dragon's skeleton before. But now, it was different.

I did it!

The sword aura created a third of an inch-long crack. A spurt of dark mana power came out from the slightly dented bone.

It wasn't much but it worked.

Her eyes danced with hope. The situation differed from a while ago when none of her attacks worked against the monster. She managed to leave a dent, even if it was a small one, in the Bone Dragon's foreleg. This meant only one thing. If she fought a little harder. If she fought a little better. Then, she could leave more significant damage.

I'm not asking for anything grand. Just one leg. Then the royal troops will be able to put up a fight afterward. I can do it!

Whoosh! Queen Magentano's manaheart roared more ferociously. Now her movement turned rougher and heavier, much like a muscular predator or beast that could snap their prey's neck in one bite. She shifted all her strength against the ground.

Boom! Anything she touched splintered on contact, rocks broke apart and boulders cracked around her. She aggressively walked forward. And with a strong repulsive force, she jumped, her whole body jetting out like a cannonball. Then she concentrated every bit of her massive strength on her sword aura.

"Arggh!"

Crash! With more brute force than technique, Queen Magentano slammed down on the dragon's wrist bone. She hit, slashed, and jabbed him. Then, she repeated the process more fiercely each time.

Boooom! She hurtled toward him five times, which ensued five consecutive explosive attacks. Now, the dent on its carpal bone was slightly deeper. Just then, the Bone Dragon brushed off its wrist.

"...!"

Thwack! Queen Magentano, who was getting ready for the next attack, was grazed by the dragon's movement, sending her to fly 30 yards away. She barely recovered her balance and managed to land safely on the ground.

"Argh...!"

She dry-heaved right after she hit the ground. It was just a small graze. And she had even softened the impact by blocking the blow with her aura sword. But it nearly killed her.

How can it...

Her eyes trembled. Even now, her stomach was churning, and her manaheart struggled to recover from the blow. She suddenly felt bitter.

I had trained so hard, yet…

She didn't take a proper day of rest ever since someone tried to assassinate her. She obsessively spent everyday pushing herself to extreme limits for the sake of training. It was more strenuous than the time she had trained to rise to the level of a sword master. And it made her strong, all right. She could easily win a fight against her past self and Sir Kyle, the man who betrayed her. And that sense of pride had advanced into conviction when she defeated the remaining warlocks.

I thought I had done enough. But...

But she discovered a new height of power that she could never reach. And that was this indomitable monster, Bone Dragon, and it was looking down at her. A shaft of despair gripped her as she looked back up.

I cannot fight it.

In any case, she thought that she could leave a little damage to the dragon and earn enough time for the royal troops to prepare for battle. After all, it was something only she, a swordmaster, could do. That was why she felt the need to take action and was confident of her success. At least, that had been her thought process.

But I was mistaken.

Grit! Queen Magentano clenched her teeth. And she looked up at the Bone Dragon now charging toward her way. Its mouth was open wide, and she raised her aura sword at it. Just then...

Kaboom! A storm of mana flew in one straight line and hit the side of the Bone Dragon's face.

Boooom! Its head was jerked to the side, and the sudden attack managed to stall its hurtle for a short moment. And at that second, she heard a voice.

"Your Majesty, speed over strength. Aim sideways instead of headfirst. I dare to offer my assistance, Your Majesty."

"...!"

Queen Magentano could see it. There was someone in between the clouds that covered the full moon by half. Someone was hurtling through the air, and he landed on the Bone Dragon's backbone and gave a hard stab. Another destructive explosion. The man allowed the force of the explosion to send him flying away, and soon enough, he landed on the queen's side.

"Please forgive me, Your Majesty, but please move over there."

"...!"

It was Javier Asrahan, the silver-haired knight. He was gesturing with his gaze, and Queen Magentano reacted right away. She charged in the direction Javier was pointing to, and the giant mouth of Bone Dragon chewed the very place she was in a second ago.

Crack!

“...”

She dodged and started to counterattack. With Javier joining her, the moment marked the combined attack of two sword masters, a rare event to see in history.

“Your Majesty,” Javier called.

“Yes.”

“May I say a few words?”

“Yes, but drop the formalities, given our current situation. Be as brief as possible,” ordered the queen as she avoided a string of attacks from the Bone Dragon.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” replied Javier as he ran beside her. “Please don’t hold back and jump as high as you can.”

“How about you?”

“I will be its distraction.”

“Distraction?”

“Meaning I will distract the dragon from attacking you. Excuse me, Your Majesty.”

Fwish! Javier disappeared like the wind, and he was already several feet away from her. A light appeared.

Kaboom! A mana blast appeared like a bolt of lightning and struck the very center of the dragon’s backbone. Although it failed to leave any cracks, it was enough to minutely shake the Bone Dragon’s ginormous body. That alone was enough as it gave a slight stagger to the trajectory of the front leg that was coming down on her.

Wham! Its front leg hit the ground after failing to land on Alicia.

All right. I understand his plan.

A ferocious glow appeared in her eyes when she understood Javier's intent. From that moment on, her giant aura sword leaped like a beast, crisscrossing the front and rear legs of the dragon and leaving a scratch on them. But the Bone Dragon couldn’t attack back because of Javier.

Kaboom! Unlike the queen, who could attack only close by, Javier had the mana blast with him. Each time he held out his sword, the mana blast jetted out dozens of feet through the air, striking the gap between its joints each time. And its giant body staggered each time. The reason was simple. Javier capitalized on the vulnerable joints of the body parts that received the weight of its movement. Javier attacked its opposite elbow and wrist when it wielded its foreleg. When it staggered back, Javier attacked its knees and pelvis. And when it attempted to straighten up, he aimed at the back. Each attack was piercing, and the giant body lost balance and reeled, missing its aim at Queen Magentano by a hair’s breadth.

And then the queen would raise her vigor and charge at it without hesitation. She danced with her aura sword while roaring like a ferocious lioness. Meanwhile, her heart sped up by a notch.

This is working. I can do it.

Her heart pounded in hope. She slowly began to see a chance to win. Bone Dragon looked formidable in every sense of the word when she was alone. It was an undefeatable monster. But now, with Javier, she was able to return the dragon’s punches. At the very least, she was able to do something that could be called a fight.

My attack is working!

Her strike didn’t leave great damage. It only left a third of an inch-long crack. That was even after she used all her strength. But if she hit the same spot a hundred times, the crack would become 40 inches long.

40 inches. That’s all we need. The dragon will eventually collapse from its aggressive moments if I drive a 40-inch hole in its wrists and ankles that hold its massive weight.

The key to fighting a giant mammal was hitting a weight-bearing part of its body. Queen Magentano figured that it would be the same case for Bone Dragon, so she obstinately focused on the wrist connected to its front legs. She threw one blow after another. And finally, she saw a chance for her hopes to turn into reality

A little more. Just a little!

Crash! Slash! Crash! Backed by Javier's support and barely avoiding the Bone Dragon's attack, she whacked the same spot on its body over and over again. Her smile started to grow with her hopes. A faint chance of victory emerged. That was only until Bone Dragon flew high into the air.

Kaboom! Its grand wings spread out without warning. After one rough flap, it was off the ground, right before Queen Magentano could land her hundredth strike. It abruptly swooped into the air. The dragon flew almost 1,000 feet off the ground with a flap of its wings. Queen Megantano lifted her head, her heart swelling with disbelief. It was carefreely flying in the air where she couldn't reach it. And now, it was leisurely looking down at her.

"This cannot be happening..."

She wondered if this was what a colony of ants felt like after failing to capture an eagle with great effort. She wondered if she was in a nightmare.

How am I supposed to fight something like that?

As her gaze darted to the sky and at the Bone Dragon, a despairing sense of helplessness overwhelmed her as if she had been blocked by an impenetrable wall.

***

That's it. Keep on despairing. You will feel helpless... Just like how I was...

The Bone Dragon opened its wings, and as it flew up toward the night sky, it gazed down at Queen Magentano, left on the ground by herself. And the soul in its body, Warlock Targa, thought to himself...

I’m sure I had a similar expression while I was beheaded.

She was looking up at his way, and there was helplessness in her face. It was written with abjection. It was likened to the look of a person in the face of a disastrous natural disaster. That was especially joyful to see for Warlock Targa.

You should be looking at me like that. It’d have been very unfair if I didn’t get to see you making that face.

Targa thought it was unfair. He thought so the moment he was killed in her hands. The warlock was forced to give up on his body in the final moment when his disembodied neck rolled over on the ground. An inevitable choice had to be made. He didn’t want everything to end like this. So, he transferred his soul to the dragon skeleton stored inside the laboratory. It was his last resort or final act of desperation, to put it one way.

He hadn’t had high hopes to begin with. His chance of success was less than ten percent. But it worked. His soul was transferred into the skeleton of the dragon. That was the moment he gave up on being a human. From then, there was a long period of waiting. He used the time to wait for his soul to settle into the dragon skeleton. It took a few months. And finally, the day had come. Today. Targa opened his eyes to a new body, and the result was better, beyond his expectation.

I didn’t expect to hold this much strength.

He turned out to be very strong. Though he wasn’t as powerful as the actual Bone Dragon, a simple imitation was all that he could manifest, still, he was powerful enough to toy the queen like a bug. What was more, he could do so even when he wasn’t used to the body at all!

I’m done warming up now.

Targa smiled ferociously, determined that this was the end of the monotonous attack with forelegs. It was time to get real and toy the queen hard. He focused on the alienating sensation of fluttering the wings. That got his body to fly higher in the air. The grand garden and the palace behind it, the city district, everything felt like a toy, a city of the bugs. And at the same time, he even felt he had become omnipotent. In a word, he felt like he was...

I feel like I've become a god.

He was thrilled. Everything seemed doable. He wanted to crush every creature that stood in his way.

Queen Magentano in particular. How dare you behead me. You will pay the price for your actions. I will slaughter you until you're at the edge of death and make you watch the capital completely collapse in flames.

The soul of the Bone Dragon, Targa, smirked in an evil way. Now, the fluttering of wings felt natural. The time has come to knuckle down and smash things. The time for enjoyment has come. The time to break and kill everything in sight.

Wahaha!

It lowered its giant head and closed its wings for a dive. But when it was about to, an unexpected creature took a nosedive at it first.

"Ggoming!"

Swooosh!

Huh...?

A white form zoomed down through the murky clouds like a bolt of lightning. It was chubby and had wings. A round head and clear eyes. So this was...

A parrotbill?

But it was larger than a human. Its shape felt familiar. Just then, Targa recalled the story he had heard right after their schemes failed in Namaran.

A report from a guy said that there was a man who attacked them on the parrotbill. The man’s name was...

Lloyd Frontera?

Targa remembered. That was when Lloyd yelled as he dove with Ggoming and threw something toward it.

“First, take this!”

Fwish! Something was flying his way. Targa saw an ordinary beaver flying toward his way. He felt flustered.

“...”

What now? What is this Lloyd doing by hurling that beaver in this situation? Right when Targa was dumbstruck...

Boom!

“...”

The beaver suddenly turned gigantic, his body grew to be 328 feet tall. And swaying his merciless belly, Bibeong pulled the dragon into a hug right away.

“Bibeong!”

Eh?!

Bibeong got it in his embrace in mere seconds. And now, Bibeong laid a body-press attack against the Bone Dragon midair 8,200 feet off the ground, pressing it with his 3,000-ton body.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 219: Smack the Head and Run (1)

“Bibeong!”

8,200 feet off the sky of the Magentano palace, Bibeong distantly shouted aloud. Then he grabbed the Bone Dragon’s spine and rib bone. Clench!

The Bone Dragon had nothing but bones left in its body, so Bibeong had plenty of areas to grip. Though his hands couldn’t grip as well as a human’s, the Bone dragon’s entire body was essentially a handle for him.

Eh?

The soul of warlock Targa in the Bone Dragon was flabbergasted.

What is this?

Targa was flustered. And dumbstruck. What just happened? A guy on a parrotbill flitted his way out of the blue and hurled a beaver, which slammed into him after growing 328 feet tall. Anyone would snort at him if he told them this story. Heck, if someone else told him such an outrageous story, Targa would have yelled at them to shut up and cursed the person with black magic. That was how ridiculous the whole thing was to him. But unfortunately, that ludicrous event was happening now. Thus, he was tightly trapped in Bibeong’s grip.

“Bibeobeong!”

Bibeong struggled, tightening his embrace around the Bone Dragon. He leaned against the back of the dragon as he tensed his chubby butt and belly, pressing his wing joint. That severely interrupted its fluttering.

A-Argh! Let me go! Surprised, Targa gave a delayed response. He twisted and turned to wrench Bibeong off of himself. But he was stronger than Targa thought. That was thanks to Bibeong’s weight.

This punk is a lot heavier than I thought!

Targa believed that he would be heavier. The Bone Dragon's body was 656 feet long, which was almost twice the length of Bibeong. So, Targa naturally thought that his weight must be heavier than this beaver. But what he missed was their interior anatomy which was another different story.

Is this beaver heavier than me?

That was when it dawned on Targa. The Bone Dragon had nothing in its body but bones, so it was super scrawny compared to its gigantic size. Moreover, its tail made up a good portion of the length of its body.

Whereas Bibeong, was fat. Chubby buttocks. Flabby belly. Ample cheeks. Every part of him was fat and flabby. On top of that, the muscles that bore the sheer weight of his fats were solid and thick. In short, there was no way for the Bone Dragon, despite its dragon-thick bones, to outweigh Bibeong's limitless fats. Bibeong cuddled the Bone Dragon and pressed its wing joint with his monumental weight and belly fat. That brought a stop to its fluttering. And thus, it began to crash down.

"Bibeong!"

Ackkk!

8,200 feet off the ground. The Bone Dragon turned its long head and attempted to bite Bibeong, who was on its back. Bibeong ducked down and used his giant front teeth to fiercely bite down on its neck bone.

"Bibebeong!"

Gargh!

4,200 feet off the ground. Bone Dragon wielded its whip-like tail and smacked Bibeong's back. Bibeong fought back by whipping with his flat tail, which was wide and flat like a giant roe, the perfect shape to protect his whole body. The Bone Dragon's tail bounced off Bibeong's shield-like tail.

"Bibeong!"

Arggh!

1,640 feet off the ground. Sensing the crash, the Bone Dragon attempted one final attack to turn things around. It tensed its whole body to flip its body upside down. But it didn’t work. There was no other reason for its failure. Bibeong was too fat to be turned over. So the Bone Dragon was pressed toward the ground, slammed in the air by 3,000-ton weight, and plummeted. No brakes or anything.

“Bibebeong!”

Daaammit!!!

“…!”

They hit the ground without a single shout. Everyone who gazed at the whole scene thought for a second that the ground had flipped over. The impending roar, earth tremor, and storm of sand arrived in the next moment.

Kaboom! As 4,000 tons of total weight rammed into the land with massive kinetic energy, the whole ground shook, and shockwaves burst all around, toppling the trees nearby. The royal guards covered their ears to protect their eardrums.

“Get down!”

“Argh...!”

The dusty storm faded sometime later, and the guards staggered to their feet in a coughing fit. Among them was Queen Magentano, whose eyes shone brightly.

“...”

She wasn’t staring at the crash location like the rest of the guards. Instead, her deathly gaze flickered over to the large parrotbill in the air, whose vague outline could be seen through the thick dust.

Lloyd Frontera.

She remembered how he had run for his life when she called. The sight utterly disappointed her. But now, a part of her wondered if he had intentionally run away to do this.

Tsk. What a mysterious fellow he is.

Queen Magentano chuckled. It was a relief nonetheless. She had been utterly clueless about how she should deal with the Bone Dragon. A sense of hopelessness gripped her, but thankfully, Lloyd showed up just in time and did something extraordinary with his fantastical creature.

That large fantastical creature crushed the Bone Dragon all the way in the air.

The queen's gaze moved toward the crash point. She believed that the Bone Dragon couldn't have remained intact after falling down at such a height. No, she even suspected the dragon might have been completely subdued just now. She was starting to become hopeful when...

Ruuumble...!

Something giant rose amid the thick sandy dust. A gray outline of a jagged skeleton appeared. It was the Bone Dragon.

"...!"

Whoosh! A giant tail swept the surface.

"Argh!"

Queen Magentano jumped just in time and closely avoided the attack. But the next one that followed seemed unavoidable. The dragon's gigantic, open wing swung across the whole area. Whoosh!

She clenched her teeth. There was no way to avoid or block the attack.

Then I only have one choice!

Goosebumps rose all over her body as she gripped the sword hilt. She decided to confront the incoming blow head-on. Even if this was her last moment, she resolved to combat valiantly until she died. Thus, she wielded her sword with such determination. But before she could actually do so, someone grabbed the back of her neck and tugged hard.

“Your Majesty!”

Grab!

“...!”

She felt someone grab the back of her neck and heard a voice. Frightened, she withdrew her sword and turned around. Then she saw who it was.

“Lloyd Frontera?”

Lloyd had gripped her collar with one hand while using the other to hold a riding rein. She also spotted the large parrotbill that Lloyd was riding frantically fluttering his wings. Just like that, she was saved in midair by Lloyd and Ggoming.

“Y-Your Majesty! Stop flailing!” Lloyd bellowed, almost threatening to let go of his grip if she continued to struggle.

The queen obeyed his words and relaxed. Her gaze then darted to the gigantic menacing wings that chased toward them. Fwoosh!

My...

Could this be what a fly saw while looking at an incoming fly swatter? The dragon’s huge wing which was the size of a cliff hurtled toward her way, sweeping across her entire range of vision like a broom. The scene itself made her heart drop. But to her relief, she was at the mercy of a mobile creature that could avoid such an attack.

“Ggoming!”

“A little more! Ggoming! Let’s goooo!” yelled Lloyd.

“Ggomiiing!!!”

Ggoming fluttered his wings at a maddening speed, and the explosive acceleration allowed them to distance themselves from the incoming wing. Just then, the parrotbill closed his wings and dove down in a flash, almost touching the ground. Swooosh!

The expansive wing bone passed over her head with a proximity of less than 3 feet. Taking a deep breath as though she was shaking off her shivers, Queen Alicia got back on the parrotbill.

“Your Majesty, are you hurt?” asked Lloyd.

“No. Thank you. I owe you my life.”

“That is a relief,” said Lloyd.

Lloyd really felt that way. He genuinely was relieved that she didn’t die.

It would be troublesome if the queen died.

Queen Magentano was his boss that always had more work to give him. But at the same time, she was his most reliable supporter and contact. She didn’t accuse him of treason for most things and showered his fiefdom with all sorts of assistance.

It’s really not easy to meet and serve a boss like her.

She surely was the ideal ruler to serve, disregarding her tendency to swamp him with work. So, losing her would be a loss for Lloyd. There was no guarantee that the new monarch after her would be favorable to him.

The queen can’t die here. This applies to Javier as well.

Lloyd surveyed the ground as he led Ggoming outside the sphere of the attack. The Bone Dragon was going berserk, whereas Bibeong was staggering, probably due to the body-press attack. Lloyd passed by and pulled on Javier in a flash. But it was too early to be relieved.

Here comes the important part. Speed is critical.

He would run away with the queen and Javier. His first priority was safely escaping. That was the reason Lloyd came here.

“Then let’s go!” yelled Lloyd proudly.

“Where?” the queen asked right away.

Wetting his lips, Lloyd shouted, “To a better battlefield!”

“A new battlefield?” asked the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty. This area is not suitable for a battle since this garden is new, and the palace, city district, and people are nearby!”

When Lloyd gave the remark he had prepared, the queen reacted positively to his relief.

“Lloyd Frontera. Are you worried about the well-being of innocent citizens who could be affected by this affliction?”

“Yes, Your Majesty!”

“Good. You are right. Then do you plan on drawing the monster out of the capital?”

“You are right, Your Majesty!”

“Good. I approve of your plan.”

“I am overwhelmed-”

“There is no time to be overwhelmed. Hurry up,” interrupted the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty!”

Lloyd was relieved that the queen gave her approval. Deciding to make his plan a success, Lloyd grabbed his reins.

“Ggoming!” Lloyd called.

“Ggoming?”

“Let’s gooo!”

“Ggomiming!”

His flight speed increased, and Lloyd threw a glance at the Bone Dragon.

Okay. Everything is going according to plan.

The queen had given her trust. And now, it was time to knuckle down and execute his plan.

That is, for us to run without looking back.

Far away. Far away outside the capital. Farther out. Somewhere very far where a battle could take place. If possible, he intended to fly away for about three days straight.

Fight? Why should we fight that thing? We should just keep running away.

In actuality, Lloyd didn’t plan on fighting against the Bone Dragon head-on. He planned on playing tag with it just like now.

And if possible, I’ll fly outside the border to a place far, far away from the capital. That way the people in the capital and the queen will be safe.

That was his plan. Moreover, if he was lucky, he might be able to take care of the Bone Dragon too. How?

To Gapel. That’s where we should go. I heard that something more formidable than the Bone Dragon lives there.

Just then, the entity that was briefly mentioned in the novel came to his mind. The Gapel region. A seemingly ordinary and small neutral county. However, an extraordinary creature was said to be inhabiting there.

His name was Verkis. He was the Dragon King, if I recall correctly?

Dragon King Verkis. The history book of the Lorasia Continent made a mention of him as the most powerful dragon to ever exist. The novel touched on it as a mere rumor just once, and that was it. That was why Lloyd had forgotten about this matter until now. It was a miracle that he happened to recall this just today.

But that is enough.

Lloyd decided to put his trust in the story in the novel. Dragon King. He was the dragon king, for Pete's sake! Being the king, this mythical dragon would be interested in the affairs of dragons, and he would be a faithful and hardworking figure.

So, taking the Bone Dragon that's running amuck would be the same as taking a zombie or skeleton soldier to a human king. With that, the situation will naturally resolve itself. I mean, he's the Dragon King. He won't sit back and just watch the Bone Dragon go berserk. I presume he'd look sideways and order for the Bone Dragon to be taken care of. Or, maybe, he'd take care of it himself.

Lloyd had a feeling that this king would straighten the situation out.

And I don't care if my plan fails either.

The rumor could be false. It was possible that the Dragon King was not there. But Lloyd concluded that it didn't matter.

Then I can opt for plan B, which is leading the Bone Dragon to an unpopulated area.

That would complete their escape. Of course, the Bone Dragon would return in the future. But they would be better prepared than now as the chase between the dragon and Lloyd toward Gapel would buy them some time to respond.

It takes about three days to fly to Gapel. While we were flying, the news would spread to the capital and throughout the whole kingdom. The sultan kingdom and other nearby nations would hear about it too.

Then everyone would be able to brace themselves and assemble strong forces to fight against the Bone Dragon's invasion. That would be a much more organized response than the queen's solo confrontation with her sword.

That's how I can buy more time. It would also be more advantageous for us by any standard. So, why risk ourselves and fight here? We should obviously leave!

His judgment couldn't be any more reasonable and wiser. Satisfied with his plan, he prompted Ggoming to flutter harder before throwing a glance at the Bone Dragon's side. Lloyd decided that he had to attract its attention so that it would be engulfed in rage and hot on his heels. He needed to make the dragon obstinately pursue him for multiple days on end.

"Javier, your sword, please."

Lloyd borrowed a long sword from Javier and stretched his sword at the Bone Dragon as he flew around it on the ground.

Boom! A triple mana blast came out of the sword, which flew across for several yards and hit the back of the Bone Dragon head.

Clung! The Bone Dragon's skull staggered at the sudden blow.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 220: Smack the Head and Run (2)

Clung! Getting smacked in the back of the head was annoying. The simple sensation of your head bumping into something was distasteful in the first place. And it was particularly the case if that smack reminded you of the moment of your death.

A triple mana blast flew out of nowhere and knocked the Bone Dragon's skull. As it reeled from the impact, Targa gritted his teeth in its body. He had been intoxicated for a second from obtaining the sheer power of the Bone Dragon, feeling as though he became a god. But all of a sudden, his mood turned sour. The moment of his death came to his mind.

It was like this that time...

He had been beheaded. The back of his head landed on the ground with a thud and rolled away. How chilling it was when his head rolled on the ground! Targa desperately wanted to forget that sensation now that he was in his new body. But he couldn't. And he was reminded of it just now because of the bastard who left a sharp blow to his head.

The Bone Dragon lifted its head, and Lloyd came into its view. And when it saw him fly with the parrotbill, it was reminded once again of what happened.

Namaran.

Targa's botched plan in Namaran came to his mind. He had planned to summon Hell's Knight by offering the people there as a sacrifice. One month was enough time for Hell's Knight to wipe out the kingdom and the major cities and forces. But he had failed. And because of who?

That bastard.

It must have been right after his plan failed. He had received a report from an informant he planted in Namaran. It mentioned that someone excavated and stole all his Noctanium, the black stone he processed with the mana extracted from the bone of the Bone Dragon. Moreover, he was told that someone on a parrotbill slaughtered the warlocks on the day of the event. And when Hell's Knight woke up, the same man killed it alongside a knight with silver hair.

Lloyd Frontera.

Targa recalled his name. But Namaran wasn't the only time that the man interfered with his plans.

He also blocked the assassination of the queen.

The poison he used was acquired after an immense struggle on his part. And it had been even more difficult to recruit Sir Kyle, the sword master. When Targa acquired both, he pushed forward with his scheme, convinced his plan was perfect and would bring chaos to the House of Magentano. But it ended in failure. And the fault lay in Lloyd Frontera.

If it weren't for you...

All of his schemes would have succeeded. At least, things wouldn't have ended up in absolute disaster like now. Queen Magentano would have either died or become crippled. Her throne would have toppled, and her control over the kingdom's regions would have weakened. Hell's Knight would have awakened amid that instability, and the 500 undead Mastodons would have caused an uproar near the Frontera fiefdom. Hell's Knight and 500 undead Mastodons. The two would have been enough to wipe out an entire kingdom. On top of that, Targa had one last final touch in mind that would vouch for the success of his aspirations: a plague that turned people into zombies and the cure for it.

If I succeeded...

An innumerable number of people would have been zombified. The curse would have spread like an epidemic, and since it was a curse finished with a special procedure, even the high temple officials' blessing couldn't treat it. The only method of cure was the medicine produced by the mana extracted from the Bone Dragon's bone. In other words, Targa made his plan, so that he’d be the only one who could cure the zombies. He’d emerge as a messiah after the fall of the royal family, the whole region was set aflame, and the whole kingdom became zombified. That was his plan.

If things took place that way...

He could have become the king. An emperor even. But now, it was impossible. He was dead. Though he could run riot, he was no longer a human. And there was no way to go back to being a human.

Now, I’m nothing but a monster.

He had wanted to rise above his position and rule over the world. How he had yearned to be the object of fear and respect! He had dreamed of discarding his discriminating label of warlock and becoming a dictator remembered all throughout history!

But I can’t anymore.

Even if he held the power of a god now, his wish couldn’t be achieved anymore. All his plans failed, and now, he was nothing but a monster.

It’s all because of you.

Fire burned in his eyes as he glared at Lloyd. Murderous desire rose in him. That emotion brought a change to the Bone Dragon. No, it brought a big change to Targa inside the Bone Dragon.

I’m going to kill you. I don’t know about the others, but you’re dead.

Kaboom! The Bone Dragon spread its wings. There was no more awkwardness in its gait or fluttering. The body of the dragon he was in no longer felt unfamiliar, and Targa didn’t even think about taking more time to adapt. He simply decided to fly upward, rip apart, destroy, and chomp down on everything in sight. He’d burn and trample on everything until it became a pile of ash and his rage was quenched.

Boom! Kaboom! The Bone Dragon leaped high. One jump. That alone propelled it 2600 feet off the ground. Then it spread out its wings. The space between its empty joints was set ablaze and harnessed an explosive power with the flaps of its wings.

Thwack! Just once. Its wings fluttered once and pushed on the surrounding air. One flap of its wings, and the air swirled around it. The air was explosively pushed away and compressed, creating a shockwave that sent the dragon's 656-foot body flying straight forward for hundreds of yards.

Fwoosh! The Bone Dragon zoomed forward in a flash, and his large skull became the peak that overlapped the airwave. It overlapped, amplified, and finally exploded in a burst of shock.

Wham! A powerful sonic boom was created as the air condensed around it. The windows of the palace and nearby buildings got shattered. Everyone in the garden covered their ears and collapsed.

"What the... That's nuts!"

Lloyd, too, wanted to collapse. He stared behind, goggle-eyed. The Bone Dragon was hurtling toward him as it neared the distance, and it looked like it was hell-bent on knocking him out!

How can it be so fast?!

Lloyd was gobsmacked. His plan was to run away, and that was why he smacked its nape with the triple mana blast to provoke it to be on his heels. But it never occurred to Lloyd that it would pursue him at a shocking speed and fling itself at him so thoughtlessly and deathly.

Maybe it's the type of dragon that hates getting smacked in the head?

But none of that mattered right now. Because right now, even in that split second of thought, the Bone Dragon flapped its wings once more. A sonic boom commenced as air moved around and water vapors appeared.

Wham! The distance between them became worryingly close.

I'm going to get caught.

Five seconds? Four? No, less than that. What could happen to Lloyd if he got caught?

Well, no point in wondering! It'd be the same as a puppy getting crashed from behind by a fully-speeding tank.

Every bone of his would be broken. Lloyd's eyes trembled when he imagined it. The response he gave was immediate.

"Ggoming! Down!" yelled Lloyd.

"Ggoming!"

Ggoming, too, had been feeling the charge of a dangerous figure from behind, so he immediately closed his wings as soon as he heard Loyd's shout. He then did his specialty in flying, a sudden drop.

"Ggomiming!"

Ggoming lowered his head, shot downward like a nimble sparrow, and let gravity drop him vertically.

Argh!

The headwind blew like a storm, and Lloyd held on as he grabbed the saddle.

Could it still be following me?

Lloyd threw a glance behind.

It's following me...!

The color drained from Lloyd's face. The Bone Dragon was right behind him, its lowered head and closed wings much like Ggoming. It was nimbly swooping down, hot on his heels!

"Come on... Ggoming! Move left!" bawled Lloyd in desperation.

“Ggoming!”

At Lloyd’s urgent yelling, Ggoming turned his head to the left and rotated like a nail screw 720 degrees counterclockwise. And he then swiveled 90 degrees to the left, using the twist as his propulsion. That got him in horizontal flight mode. Right after that, the Bone Dragon did exactly the same and maneuvered exactly the same flight like a swallow with its giant body. What was more, it even stretched its giant neck!

Chomp! The Bone Dragon chomped the very space Ggoming was at a second ago, and its large teeth almost bit his tail.

“Ggoming! Ggomiming!”

Ggoming cried out urgently, hurrying Lloyd to come up with something as he couldn’t do anything more and was just seconds before getting caught.

“I know! I know!”

Lloyd’s forehead broke out in a cold sweat, and he was forced to admit that he had planned it too comfortably on this one.

I made a mistake this time. I should have run away without looking back, without giving a hoot about the others.

Lloyd didn’t care if people hurled insults at him for being a coward. They may call him trash, but Lloyd didn’t care. What mattered more was staying alive.

But, come on! Why did I come back to save Javier and the queen?!

Lloyd regretted the decision he had made ten minutes ago.

Am I really going to die here?

Lloyd was at a loss. He felt dejected. Ggoming was flying to his best, and Ggoming was the best mobile asset Lloyd had. But that Bone Dragon showed no signs of that awkwardness in its movement that was evident a while ago. It was likened to a supersonic fighter jet or a rocket. It was flying at a scary speed, tearing up the whole air. And not with its tremendous body, it boasted outrageous mobility that of a sparrow. No, it was more fitting to say that the Bone Dragon was a skyscraper flying like a dragonfly.

I can't run away from it.

Not a single method to lose this dragon, who was well-skilled in flying, came to Lloyd's mind. The mere possibility of it was hard to imagine. But Lloyd didn't give up.

No. I'm going to die if I give up. So think. Work, my brain!

Lloyd desperately racked his brain as he led Ggoming to perform various acrobatic flights and came close to losing his life at the attack of the Bone Dragon. He didn't want to die here. He had to make it out of here alive, come hell or high water. The desire to live increased when he recalled the comfortable life he had dutifully toiled for in the Frontera fiefdom.

And so, he beat his brains for his life, scavenging every piece of information stashed in his head. The setting of the novel. The history he had changed. The littlest events took place a few months ago. And at last...

Oh, hold on.

Something came up. Lloyd lifted his head and swiveled.

I need to check first!

There was no time to lose. The Bone Dragon was charging at full speed with its giant body. Starting right into the monster, Lloyd inwardly shouted...

Surveying!

He tensed his eyes and glared at the Bone Dragon.

Bzzt!

[Scanning will begin.]

Every part of its body came into view along with the familiar message. But Lloyd didn’t study its whole body.

But I don’t have time for this!

His gaze darted to the lower part of its body. In between the frenzied chase, Lloyd spotted its tail that appeared from time to time. The giant tail was constantly moving left and right to ensure balance in its flight.

So, please...! Come on! Show yourself!

Lloyd’s desperate eyes ran along its tail from the end, from the thinnest part to the middle part that thickened in size. And at last, around one-third of its tail...

Found it!

A ray of hope appeared in Lloyd’s eyes. He found it. He could see it. The chunk of tailbone he was looking for. To be more exact, it was...

A fake tailbone!

The area Lloyd was looking at. A section of its tailbone was different from the rest. To be more exact, it was not a bone. It was granite. Why? The reason was simple.

Because you see, I took the actual bone. That was my payment for working for the queen!

A few months ago, around the time the Termina Garden project took off, he informed the installation expert in charge of the dragon project in advance that the chunk of the tailbone was his and that it must be left aside.

Then I totally forgot about it because I was so busy with the garden and cleaning up today’s mess.

But now that he remembered and checked, the chunk of its tailbone was missing from the skeleton and filled with a rock.

What's more, we used granite to cut the material cost!

Lloyd recalled how the palace wanted to use the expensive backbone of the emperor whale. Though it was not as fancy as the dragon bone, it boasted remarkable strength and was lightweight. But there was one problem.

It was too expensive.

It wasn't just expensive. It was obscenely expensive, the kind that increases the material cost a whopping amount for no useful reason. So Lloyd himself stopped the palace by convincing them that no one was going to study the dragon bone with a magnifying glass. People would go wow on their cruise ship. So what must be done instead was sculpting the rock to have similar color and texture as the dragon bone. The rock needed to be strong just enough to ensure that the skeleton won't fall apart, and granite will do those jobs just fine. He argued and set his foot down.

That was how I lowered the cost of materials!

Though the money came from the palace, he didn't want to waste the money on something unnecessary. That was why he stubbornly protested against the possible squandering of material costs. At that time, it never occurred to Lloyd that it would be this helpful. No, it never, ever occurred to Lloyd that the rock would become the only weakness he could capitalize on. An evil smile appeared on Lloyd's smile.

"Excuse me! I have an idea!" Lloyd yelled at the people behind him. "But you know, we fail, and this will be our graveyard! So! Any last words?!"

"..."

No response came. So, Lloyd turned around and looked back.

Dang. What's wrong with their faces?

The queen and Javier put on overly dramatic faces. They looked like they were ready to die in a grand but daunting battle.

The sight of their faces made Lloyd let out a snort. The two appeared to be extremely tense, and since nothing looked like his words would be deafened out, Lloyd decided to sober them up. That was the only way they'd give their ears to his plan. With a resolved heart and determination, Lloyd prepared a load of truth bombs.

"Then I'll go first!" yelled Lloyd. "Javier! It was fun to be with you, but I hate you! You boast every day that you get a lot of love letters. But you know what? You're single just like me! And Your Majesty! No. Sister!"

"What...? Me?" gaped the queen.

"Yeah, Sister! You too! I hate you a little too! You always excitedly exploit me!"

"Did you dare call me, Sister, just now?" asked the queen defiantly.

"Who cares about that when we're going to die anyway soon?"

"You-"

"Anyway! Now it looks like you all are relaxed a little!"

Lloyd cut off the queen and shouted aloud again.

"From now on, listen to what I say, and please follow me! This one is, you see! We succeed, and we'll be able to live! And forgive me for calling you sister a while ago! And exempt me from labor for ten years! And really, just if... If I catch the Bone Dragon! Give all the bones to me! Do you agree?!"

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 221: Smack the Head and Run (3)

“Do you agree?!”

“What?” The queen’s eyebrow trembled. She doubted if she heard him right.

Bestow all of the dragon bones to him? And not enough with that, exempt him from ten years of labor?

Queen Magentano was dumbstruck and couldn’t believe what she just heard. But there wasn’t any time to argue. She quickly scanned her eyes behind herself.

Chomp! About 10 feet behind her, the Bone Dragon aggressively chomped down its jaw once again. If things went wrong, they would be no different from a beetle that had been crushed by a door hinge. There wasn’t any time to hesitate or think.

Lloyd Frontera, you are using this opportunity to be granted an exorbitant request. But...

Giving everything he wanted was better than getting killed here. The queen made a flash judgment and gave her decision without a second thought.

“All right. I approve,” she spoke aloud.

“Really, Your Majesty?!”

“Indeed.”

“Then do you mean that you shall exempt me from labor for the next ten years and give me all of the dragon bones?” asked Lloyd again.

“Indeed.”

“Duly noted. As a neutral party here, Javier Asrahan will stand as the witness to your words! Do you agree, Your Majesty?”

“I said, I do!” huffed the queen in annoyance.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

Chomp! Once again, the Bone Dragon bit down his jaw in a close distance.

“Then! Please listen carefully to my plan!” Lloyd pointed to the back of the Bone Dragon’s body. “Look over there! You will see that the 19th tailbone is slightly different from the other surrounding parts!”

“The 19th tailbone?”

“Yes, Your Majesty!”

Queen Magentano and Javier’s gaze traveled to the 19th tailbone. But they failed to notice anything different.

“Strange,” the queen remarked. “To me, they all look the same in both shape and material.”

“No, Your Majesty!” Lloyd answered with conviction before making a big confession. “In actuality, Your Majesty! That is not a piece of bone but granite!”

“What...? Granite?”

“Yes, Your Majesty! Do you recall how Your Majesty promised to bestow me a chunk of the dragon’s tailbone?”

“Yes, I do!” answered the queen. “However, did you not report to me that you planned on using the spine of an emperor whale, not granite? You said it was an excellent replacement due to its impressive durability and quality.”

“Your Majesty is correct!”

“But what happened?” Queen Magentano wondered why the fake bone was made of granite, not the backbone of the emperor whale.

“The backbone of the emperor whale was too expensive!” Lloyd yelled another confession.

“...”

“As such, I argued to use granite instead and pushed forward with it!”

“...”

“When we cut and refined the granite, it was exactly the same. It would be difficult to distinguish between the dragon’s tailbone and the granite with the naked eye! Right now, even Your Majesty could not tell the difference between the two! What was more, I thought it was a better option since the granite was one-tenth of the cost of the emperor whale’s backbone!”

“You wouldn’t have dared to embezzle the leftover money, am I right?” shot back the queen at Lloyd.

“Not at all, Your Majesty!”

Lloyd quickly shook his head. He really didn’t pocket the leftover money and simply reduced the price of the construction.

“The dragon skeleton was only meant to be admired from a distance! I judged that it is more efficient to use granite since it looks the same to the naked eye and holds enough durability to support the overall skeleton structure! I believed that the money saved here could be used for a better purpose in the future!”

Lloyd was genuine about this. Though the palace’s finances weren’t his business, he hated wasting money on a construction project. If there was another alternative with the same function, safety, and aesthetics as his initial choice in material, and was a mere one percent of its cost, Lloyd figured that it was more economical to use the cheaper option. That was why he insisted on using the granite and went on with it.

“That is why, Your Majesty! The decision I made back then! It will become the key to destroying this dragon!”

Chomp! About six feet behind, the Bone Dragon chomped down its jaw once again. While their conversation was taking place, Ggoming relentlessly flew up and down. Like a fly desperately trying to lose a giant eagle, Ggoming flew until his wings were drenched in sweat.

“I personally think,” Lloyd went on to shout, “that the 19th prosthetic tailbone is receiving the effects of the mana power that maintains the dragon’s body!”

“I agree. That must explain how it can move with such coordination with the other joints,” seconded the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty. It must also mean that it will be much harder than most other pieces of granite.”

“And yet, it will be weaker compared to the other bones,” said the queen, understanding his point.

“That truly is the case, Your Majesty!” beamed Lloyd. “What is more! If that bone is shattered, the whole tail will snap off and the dragon won’t be able to fly anymore like now!”

What Lloyd said was obvious. The tail wasn’t a decorative one. It was an indispensable organ, more so when it came to flight.

It allows the dragon to maintain balance!

But once the tail was lost, the Bone Dragon would drop after losing balance and wouldn’t be able to fly again, much like an aircraft with a lost tail wing.

Then my original plan to use the dragon king won’t work anymore. So, this is my best option for now. It’s better than getting our heads crushed and becoming one with nature after being caught by the Bone Dragon.

Choose an effective strike instead of immediate death. What comes next can be sketched out later.

Thinking so, Lloyd hurriedly shouted,” Therefore! I will become a bait!”

“You will?” asked the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty!”

The queen’s eyes widened. Javier’s eyebrow trembled.

Lloyd smiled wryly as he looked at both of them. “Who among us can fly better with Ggoming in harmony but me?”

That was a fact.

“Therefore, I will become its bait and draw its attention. Meanwhile, please crush its 19th tailbone.”

Lloyd put his hand into his pocket and brought out Ppodong and Bangul.

“These kids will be your help.”

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

Lloyd fed the red sunflower seed to Ppodong and Bangul, whose eyes were glimmering. And he threw them toward the ground, each of them growing large with a boom and landing safely on the ground.

“Please get down now!” urged Lloyd.

“...”

Even until then, Queen Magentano stared at Lloyd without saying anything. Lloyd smiled, only a corner of his mouth rising.

“Your Majesty, we do not have much time. Please hurry,” urged Lloyd again.

“Then you-”

“Please do not worry about me.”

“No,” she said as she shook her head. “I am not worried about you. I am simply stupefied that you just revealed your usage of the granite in place of the emperor whale’s backbone just now.”

“...”

“Had this not happened, you would have never said anything, right?” pointed out the queen.

“...”

“Technically speaking, that is obviously an act of embezzlement-”

“I pray you to be safe, Your Majesty!”

Urgent, Lloyd reined to flip Ggoming upside down, and the unexpected turn caused the queen and Javier to dangle from their saddle. They then let go of their grips as there was no time for argument.

Ten years of labor exemption? Do you dare think you can slip out of my hands so easily? It is easy to tie you down. I simply have to ask you to choose between the punishment of embezzling or discarding the labor exemption.

But now, survival and preventing that awful disaster in the capital came first. The wry smile on her face vanished as she landed on the ground. And now, her eyes shone with determination. Javier, who landed beside her, nodded. They had a momentary exchange of eyes. That was enough for these two sword masters.

Sprint! Each ran in the opposite direction as they passed through the shrubs, where a fantastical creature waited in each place.

“Sir Ppodong, nice to meet you.”

“Ppodong!”

Javier got on Ppodong’s plump back, and the latter started to zoom off. On the other end of the waterway, the queen met Bangul.

“Is your name Bangul?” the queen asked.

“Bangul!”

“My memory is right,” she said. “I look forward to fighting with you.”

“Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

The queen got on Bangul’s back. And the latter started to gulp the water in the waterway. And she wagged her tail very earnestly. Jingle! Jingle!

She alerted the surrounding with her melodious warning, and the moment she lifted her tail, a massive explosion burst from her buttock.

Gurgle! Rumble!

Bangul quickly digested the water she drank. A large amount of boiling steam jetted out of her like an explosive volcano. Kaboom!

Steam shot out of her with incredible pressure, and Bangul glided through the waterway like a motor banana boat. The queen lifted her sword on top of her.

Lloyd Frontera.

Her gaze moved upward toward the night sky. Ggoming and Lloyd were frantically flying about in a desperate effort to run away from the Bone Dragon that was madly chasing after them.

I do not wish to lose you.

An excellent subject. A reliable worker. But at the same time, a man she was immensely grateful toward. She didn’t wish to lose Lloyd Frontera in a place like this.

Never.

Clench! The back of her hand that gripped the sword tightened. Meanwhile, Javier was making a similar resolution as the queen.

Master Lloyd.

He was sprinting across the garden riding Ppodong, and his gaze was fixed on Lloyd above.

I had no idea that this was your plan, Master Lloyd.

Javier bit his underlip. Once again, he had another misunderstanding. He was wrong to think that Master Lloyd would be someone who ran away in this kind of situation, a pathetic coward who fled to survive all by himself. Javier realized that he was too rash in judging his young master that way.

This happened in Cremo too.

He remembered how he had harshly expressed his disappointment in Master Lloyd, saying he wasn't aware of his rotten character.

It's the same today.

Javier realized that he was the foolish one. Lloyd was the type of man who was always ready to sacrifice himself.

So... I will protect you, so you will not have to sacrifice yourself.

Clench! Javier made a resolve in his heart. He would push aside his own safety if it meant protecting his young master. He wouldn't stand back even at the risk of his own life.

You must remain safe no matter what, Young Master.

Wishing so, Javier encouraged Ppodong to ride faster. Meanwhile, Lloyd was struggling by himself.

Huff! Queen! Javier! Hurry up a little!

Chomp! The Bone Dragon bit down right behind him. Chills ran down Lloyd's spine. One wrong move and he was sure to get crushed.

But... this is still doable!

The queen and Javier left, so that was one less thing for him to worry about. Ggoming's movements became slightly more relaxed.

All right. I just need to keep running away like now!

Thankfully, the Bone Dragon had its eyes on Lloyd and nothing else. It almost felt obsessive. Lloyd wondered if he owed some kind of debt to this dragon.

Argh! So hurry up!

Lloyd wondered how on earth he ended up in this situation, playing tag with the Bone Dragon. But he suppressed the emerging misery inside of him. He sparingly shot out mana blasts, ensuring that the dragon's attention was focused only on him. He urgently worked in unison with Ggoming as they flew. Their flight consisted of quick turns and sudden drops to create a distraction.

Lloyd flew in the opposite direction of its flight at times, gliding over its back and passing through its ribs. Enraged, the Bone Dragon wielded its foreleg and scratched its ribs, missing Lloyd by just a hair's breadth. Lloyd then slipped right through its waist. Their altitude lowered with another drop. At the same time, he shook Ggoming's bag.

Pssh! Multiple bundles of spider webs discharged from his bag, sticking to the dragon's face. Lloyd used that chance to widen their distance, flying lower and gliding over the treetops in the garden. His ears picked up the booming noise that ensued behind him. It was the Bone Dragon hurtling their way with even more speed.

Fwoosh! It propelled its whole body at a shattering speed as if it was trying to cover the entire night sky.

"...!"

Lloyd sensed it. He couldn't avoid the dragon this time. The Bone Dragon sensed it too. So, in other words, this was Lloyd's chance.

“Now!“

Lloyd bawled, his voice sounding like a bolt of lightning. Just then, a volcanic-like explosion burst from the woods below.

Boooom!

There was a cave Ppodong had dug in advance, where Bangul was hiding. Her buttock pointed toward the sky from the cave and produced a volcanic explosion. The heat and ash jetted up in a frenzy and covered the area Lloyd just passed by. This blinded the Bone Dragon’s vision for a second.

...!

The Bone Dragon couldn’t see anything ahead of it. Targa, the soul trapped in the Bone Dragon, was flustered. But his panic was short-lived.

This trick doesn’t work against me!

Targa had the power of the Bone Dragon. He could use its raw strength to penetrate the thick smoke.

Boom! The Bone Dragon’s wings tore across the air, moving faster as it generated shockwaves. At that moment, Targa’s sight and consciousness were glued to the back of Lloyd, faintly visible through the thick smoke. So focused and obsessed he was that he didn’t notice it. He didn’t notice that just outside the thick plume of dark smoke that he was passing through, two sword masters were aiming at its weakness with their sharp blades.

Fwish! Javier launched a mana blast beyond the thick layer of smoke.

Fwoosh! The mana blast split through the air and flew at a supersonic speed to hit the Bone Dragon’s 19th tailbone. Bullseye. It penetrated the bone, creating a 20-inch hole in a split second. Cracks formed around the hole. The Bone Dragon’s whole body shook.

“...!”

Targa panicked. Just then, another sword master immediately launched an attack.

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong, in an impressive show of strength, hurled the queen like a ball, and she was catapulted into the air. Her sword was wrapped in a giant aura.

Slash! Her aura sword pierced the 19th tailbone so perfectly. This tailbone had been struck with the mana blast already and was a fake, granite one at the brilliant decision of Lloyd’s cost-cutting scheme. So, it wasn’t able to hold any longer even if it was protected by the body-maintenance magic of the dragon.

Crack! The 19th tailbone explosively splintered into pieces, and right after that, the dragon’s whole tail fell off its body.

Argh!

Targa yelled in dismay. The Bone Dragon, which was hurtling like a wild boar, lost its balance, and it started to flail and fumble in the air like a crab. And thus, an unstoppable descent began.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 222: An All-Out War (1)

Argh!!

Targa was baffled. It was an abrupt turn of events. The volcanic ash burst from the ground out of nowhere, and he was simply barreling through the plume of smoke when his 19th tailbone was struck twice and shattered to pieces.

What the...!

Targa was incredulous. He possessed the body of the Bone Dragon, which couldn’t receive damage from the aura swords of sword masters. More accurately, that was what he used to believe.

Dammit!

Targa fluttered his wings in desperation, but it was too late. He lost his entire tail as his 19th tailbone was crushed off. As a result, he completely lost his balance.

Argh...!

In spite of himself, his body lurched forward, and he was getting closer to crashing into the ground with every passing second.

…!

Just like that, he rammed into the ground at the same sonic speed he was flying with. The crash created a 2624-foot furrow, shattering the trees, rocks, and everything surrounding it. He collapsed amidst the storm of dust from his fall. But a little later, Targa, the Bone Dragon, moved.

Boom! Propping up its foreleg on the ground, the Bone Dragon hoisted its body.

Wham! But it collapsed to the ground midway up. The reason was simple. The abrupt loss of its tail ruined the dragon's balance.

We did it!

Queen Magentano exclaimed inwardly and clenched her fists as she saw the dragon from a distance. It worked. Lloyd's plan really worked.

That was close.

The queen recalled her moment of anxiety just a second ago. She and Javier had laid a series of attacks in the smoke Bangul produced with her volcanic explosion. In the last moment, she flung her body to strike the 19th tailbone of the dragon with her aura sword. She almost lost grip of her sword from the repulsive power that fired back at her as she struck the dragon's tailbone.

It must have been because of the mana that sustains the body of the Bone Dragon. Its sturdiness was incomparable to slicing through granite.

It wasn't just an ordinary piece of granite. She felt like she was striking down on a metal slab that was 6.5 feet thick. What would have happened if she hadn't undergone stringent training after her assassination attempt?

I'd have failed.

She would have let her sword go after failing to resist the repulsive power during the most critical moment. And the dragon's tailbone wouldn't have been fully destroyed. However, she did it. The draconian training she went through until this point wasn't all for nothing.

"Whew..."

Queen Magentano fixed her grip as she took a breath, and her gaze flicked over to the thick cloud of dust. Javier was there.

"Then should we go finish the dragon once and for all," asked the queen heavily.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Javier replied.

This was their chance. It was likely their only chance. The Bone Dragon couldn’t even stand up after losing its tail. But there was no guarantee that it wouldn’t regain its balance soon.

It’ll adapt if we give it time.

There was no way that the Bone Dragon would forever be unable to stand for thousands of years just because it had no tail. In one hour or even less than that, the dragon would adjust just fine. As such, it had to be finished before then.

“Javier Asrahan,” called the queen. “You and Lloyd Frontera can read the flow of mana, I presume?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“I knew it.”

The queen marveled. Raising the corner of her lips, she asked, “Then I shall ask you one thing. What part of the dragon has the most active mana flow?”

“Its skull, Your Majesty.”

“That is what we must destroy.”

That spot would be its greatest weakness. With luck, they would be able to completely bring it down to its knees. The queen and Javier sped their pace toward the crash location of the dragon.

“With all your strength. In one stroke. As soon as possible.”

“I shall keep that in mind, Your Majesty.”

The large shadow of the Bone Dragon, repeatedly rising and falling, came into view through a thick fog of dust. They gradually ventured closer. Without reservation, they sprinted and leaped toward it.

Jump! The queen jumped first, followed by Javier, and landed on its back. The two sword masters sprinted side by side along the Bone Dragon's backbone toward its skull.

Like a while ago.

The queen threw a glance at Javier. He nodded and increased his speed. Then he jumped off the dragon's back, which was violently flailing like a giant ocean wave. He activated the circles around his pulsating heart, clashed them, and let out a blast after transferring the energy from the fierce clash into his sword. Boom!

The three strands of consecutive mana blasts flew toward the back of the dragon's skull. To be more exact, they charged toward the part that connects the skull and neck. Thwack!

The Bone Dragon flinched along with the explosion. But it was not weak enough to receive any damage. So, Javier prepared more mana blasts. Many, many more. Thwack! Thwack! Thwaaack!

...!

Javier fired. He fired once more. Then again in the same spot. He aimed from different angles but was only after one spot.

Bam! Thud! Thump! Boom! Crack! Since one wasn't enough, Javier fired twice. Thrice. Ten times. 20 times. 30 times. All in the same spot. Of course, the Bone Dragon didn't just sit back and accept the attacks.

Ack!

It writhed its body and moved its long neck. It struggled to avoid the mana blasts hitting the same spot, and in the process, it managed to attempt a counterattack by moving its head a few times. But all of its attempts failed. Javier was too small compared to the Bone Dragon. He was nimble and delicate in his movement. No matter how much it struggled by jerking its neck violently, Javier succeeded in avoiding its blows and firing a mana blast in the same place over and over again. But the Bone Dragon was still unable to stand up on its two feet, so an effective counterattack was nearly impossible. Anyhow, Javier launched a series of unilateral attacks on the dragon. In other words, it was being tortured.

Even Lloyd, who watched the scene in the air, clicked his tongue.

Wow. This is nuts. This is absolutely nuts.

Lloyd admired the sight with his whole heart. He had watched the whole scene from the moment the Bone Dragon crashed into the ground. He meant to wait and see if he should fly away, happy to have wounded the dragon's tail. Or ride the momentum and continue his attacks. But the queen and Javier began to charge first. From then on, Lloyd watched the two sword masters stage a fierce rally against the dragon with slight anxiety. But now seeing the current situation, Lloyd was at ease.

Actually, this makes me pity the Bone Dragon.

That was how tenacious and merciless Javier's attack was. Javier thoroughly practiced the Three Rules of Merciless Beating: Strike the most painful spot, strike the same spot, and strike to no end.

Looks like he'll really defeat the Bone Dragon.

A faint hope appeared in him. The feeling only solidified when he saw the queen bracing for their final blow near Javier who was mercilessly unleashing his attacks.

Is the queen planning on using the giant aura sword she used a while ago?

Its width looked to be over dozens of inches wide and its length well over 13 feet. It was quite literally a giant sword made from a swordmaster's aura.

It was different from an ordinary aura sword.

Normally, an aura sword only had a thin layer of aura covering it like a lightsaber. At best, it would only be about three feet long from the tip of the blade. But the queen's sword was different.

She might be close to becoming a grandmaster.

That thought just popped into his head. Though hers was weaker than the awe-instilling aura Javier created after he became the grandmaster in the novel, it was clear that the queen was getting near that stage.

She must be getting tremendously stronger.

At this rate, Sir Kyle, the previous royal guard commander, wouldn't be able to put up any kind of fight against her. She might even be able to take down two sword masters on her own.

Lloyd then noticed the queen lift her sword. With that, her sword manifested a uniquely large aura sword. Its brute strength contrasted Javier's meticulousness. The aura sword was powerful and massive. It stood over 15 feet tall. It shone menacingly like a weapon made for a siege. On the other hand, the skull of the Bone Dragon was weakened due to Javier's series of mana blasts.

Maybe. Just maybe, she might be able to destroy it.

A faint hope of victory appeared. That was when Lloyd figured he should lend a hand. So, he encouraged Ggoming to fly low and prepared to launch a triple mana blast, determined to fire away should the queen miss her aim. He let Ggoming glide through the air while making his resolve.

The fight beneath him neared in a breath, and Lloyd noticed the queen hurtling toward the dragon, her aura word stretched out. He noticed her zooming off to strike the back of its skull. And then he noticed another scene. He noticed the Bone Dragon strike Javier with its giant tail. Thwack!

"...!" Lloyd saw clearly. It was the tail that had been broken off. The tail that was attached below the crushed 19th tailbone snapped off from its body during the crash. It was left on the ground. But it moved. Without any warning. Suddenly and quickly. It whipped around like a giant chain. In a flash, it slammed into Javier.

"Ah...!"

That was the only sound that came out of Lloyd’s mouth. The scene was too unexpected. Watch out! Look out! Move away! He wasn’t able to give them any warnings. All Lloyd could do was gawk at the unbelievable scene of Javier catapulting hundreds of feet away with a booming sound. Soon afterward, Javier fell. Somewhere outside of Lloyd’s field of vision.

“Oh...”

Lloyd couldn’t believe it. What did he just witness? Was that for real? Javier was fighting tooth and nail just a second ago. He was cornering the Bone Dragon by tenaciously shooting out mana blasts. A little more. Just some more. And Lloyd thought they’d be able to defeat the dragon. He was about to help them.

What happened?

Unbelievable. He refused to believe it.

“Javier!”

His shout came a second late. No, he didn’t remember how he came to be shouting. The moment he shouted, he was already encouraging Ggoming to rush and see if Javier was all right. Hurry up, Ggoming, seriously, hurry up. Ggoming hurried at his words. But he couldn’t fly in Javier’s direction. The Bone Dragon was flying now, fluttering its wings and glowering at Lloyd. With its lost tail restored it was blocking Ggoming’s way.

“...”

No way. Does it know my intentions?

Lloyd could feel it with certainty. The dragon was aware that Javier was a threat, and that was why it was blocking his way, lest Javier get treated and well. That would only be trouble for the creature. But still...

“You see, I have to get to him.”

And in a hurry. Javier was slammed in the face with the dragon’s giant tail. It was different from when he was hit by the Gigatitan in Cremo. Javier was able to skillfully lessen the impact of the blow then. This time, however, he was directly hit and flew hundreds of feet away from the impact. Even if he was strong, that would leave him seriously injured at least. So, he could be in danger of losing his life now. Lloyd had to get to him as soon as possible.

After all, I have the Asrahan Core Technique!

Lloyd could save him as long as he is breathing. He just needed to reverberate Javier's mana circle using the Asrahan Core Technique. That would circulate his mana by force and amplify the natural healing power in his body. This method could bring someone on the brink of death to a less critical state. And bring someone in a moderately critical state to be an averagely ill patient. So, he had to hurry. Now.

"Move!"

Lloyd's bawling came out involuntarily. Was it because Lloyd thought it a great loss to lose Javier? Did he not like the idea of losing his most useful worker and knight? No. Lloyd's heartbeat pounded. To be honest, he was scared.

Javier, you bastard!

Lloyd was scared. He felt a sense of emptiness in a corner of his heart. The scary nervousness ambushed his entire soul. Come to think of it, from the moment he opened his eyes and set foot in this world and met Javier for the first time, he was never away from Javier. What was more, the thought of being forever separated from Javier never crossed his mind. Never. Not even once.

Lloyd never held such a thought. He thought he'd always be with Javier for the rest of his life. Just like now, he thought they'd spend all their time together moving forward. And like they always did, they'd be by each other's side during hard times. Happy moments. Relaxed days. They'd share all these moments as they exchanged insults and corny jokes, growing old as a lazy lord of a fiefdom and his knight. Lloyd always thought so. The thought just came naturally, without much effort from him, much like breathing. Lloyd believed that Javier would always remain by his side as that was how it had been until now.

But I took him for granted.

Lloyd realized that he had been keeping Javier by his side, enjoying his company and treating him as an equal. And now, he was finally able to recognize why.

Javier.

Lloyd finally saw what Javier was. At last. A guard night? Useful construction equipment? Strong sword master? No, more than anything else, he was...

“Move, you bastard. I have to check on my friend.”

Lloyd’s gaze turned heavy and grim as they stared at the menacing Bone Dragon that blocked his way.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 223: An All-Out War (2)

Clank! Lloyd brought out a foldable shovel in the saddle, opened it up, and grabbed it. His heart started to pound.

Can I do it?

Lloyd quickly racked his head. He had to save Javier as soon as possible. The man could be on the brink of death right now. To that end, he couldn't let his emotions rule him.

I must remain rational at times like this.

And calm. Lloyd's gaze cooled down as he pulled himself together. He thought about the situation with great care but also objectively. He formulated a plan in his head. The Bone Dragon was blocking his way, but he needed to get to Javier. After a short deliberation, he quickly came to a decision.

I can do it.

There was no time to waste. He started moving right away.

"Ggoming!" Lloyd called.

"Ggoming!" replied Ggoming as he fluttered his wings. He surged high by pretending to take a left turn. The Bone Dragon fluttered its wings energetically, soaring behind the bird. Meanwhile, Lloyd spoke in Ggoming's ears.

"Ggogming," Lloyd said, "Listen carefully."

"Ggoming?"

"You have an important role right now. You will fly to Javier while I stay here."

"Ggomiming? Ggoming?"

“No, not the other way around. No. I’m staying here. Here.”

“Ggoming?”

“It’s all right. No matter how hard I think, this is our only option. I’ll hold that dragon here. It looks like that dragon is obsessed with me. So, I think I can do a fine job keeping it here. While I do that, you go fly to Javier.”

“Ggomiming?”

“That’s right,” affirmed Lloyd. “To Javier. You saw where he fell, right?”

“Ggoming!” exclaimed Ggoming.

“Good job. Go look for him. He should still be alive. It’s Javier after all. The Knight of Blood and Iron. Once you find him, I want you to take him and-”

“Ggoming?”

“No, don’t bring him here. Go to the city district. Take him to a doctor,” instructed Lloyd.

“Ggomiming?”

“Yes, to a doctor. You heard me right,” stressed Lloyd once again.

“Ggoming...”

“Sure, the best thing would be treating him personally,” Lloyd began to reason in a calm voice. I can use the Asrahan Core Technique to reverberate his circles myself. But I don’t think the situation allows me to do that. That’s why it’s better for a doctor to treat him if I can’t do it myself.”

“Ggoming...”

“That will be enough. It’s Javier. He’ll be able to get better in no time. So, give him first aid and quickly carry him out. Then wait for me near the southern gate of the capital. I’ll run away there.”

“Ggomiming? Ggoming?”

“It’s all right. I don’t have any plans to fight this monster head-on. I’ll buy some time and discretely escape. So, you have nothing to worry about.”

“Ggoming...”

“I’m telling you, it’s fine!” Lloyd assured once again.

Ggoming had become sad without even realizing his feelings. Lloyd put on a smile for him. Actually, he was nervous because he wasn’t sure he could do it. But there was no other option at the moment.

This is the only way to save both Javier and me.

He hated running away alone and wanted to save Javier, his friend. The knight had never left Lloyd’s side after he arrived in this world. So, Lloyd didn’t want to lose him here or give up. That was why.

“Ggoming, I trust you!” yelled Lloyd.

“G-ggoming?!”

Lloyd let go of the saddle at the end of the soar, and his body left Ggoming’s back. Lloyd’s stomach churned with that nausea as he floated in the air just like at the peak of a Viking roller coaster. Then he began to descend.

“G-ggoming!”

The sight of Ggoming shouting in surprise grew distant, and when Lloyd looked down, his vision was filled with the nearing giant of the Bone Dragon. That was only when Lloyd regretted it.

Argh!

As the Bone Dragon filled his sight, Lloyd wondered if this was what ants felt like when they were marching toward a mountain. He had chills coming down his spine. He was scared and questioned if he had made the wrong decision.

Ugh. Are friends really this important?

He suddenly wished he just abandoned Javier and ran away. However, it was too late for regrets. Lloyd focused his mind. He opened up his arms and legs like a leaping frog, landing on one side of the Bone Dragon's horn on its forehead and clasped his arms around the base of it.

Whack!

"Eek...!"

He almost threw up from the impact. But he succeeded in safely sticking himself onto the Bone Dragon's horn.

Like Ggoming's reaction, the Bone Dragon wouldn't have seen this coming.

He had let go of his grip on the saddle without any warning. That was unexpected for Ggoming, so it must be the same for the Bone Dragon that was chasing after them. What was more, the distance between Ggoming and the Bone Dragon was extremely small at that moment.

Otherwise, the dragon would have happily eaten us in one bite.

Truth be told, he had taken a gamble. Regardless, it worked, and that was all that he cared about.

Arggh!

Lloyd embraced the horn with all of his might and tightly held on. The Bone Dragon was roughly swaying its head to shake Lloyd off after belatedly realizing what had happened. Lloyd felt like a fly stuck to a giraffe that was violently headbanging to a 16-beat rhythm.

I'll go down for now!

He would be doomed if this continued. He would fall to the ground or be scratched to death by the dragon's foreleg. Sensing the danger, Lloyd activated an optional skill right away.

Energizer!

Ding dong.

[The skill option of the Asrahan Core Technique, Energizer, has been activated.]

[The triple circle's efficiency has been maximized. You can move for 20 minutes without experiencing fatigue.]

Ziiing! The circles around his heart reacted right away, the three strands rotated with greater vigor. Similar to the endless circulation of mana that was unique to sword masters, the mana amplified in the circle rotated on and on. From the first, second, third, and back to the first one again. The mana circulated as though it was being recycled, energizing his whole body with everlasting vigor. Lloyd used his strength to bear the centrifugal force the Bone Dragon created by swaying its head. Then he climbed down like a clingy sloth.

Okay!

He continued crawling down, avoiding the occasional foreleg scratches with cockroach-like instincts. He then sent a gaze to Ggoming.

Go! Hurry!

Ggoming was flying circles around him in bewilderment. Lloyd gestured at his bird friend to do what he was told. Ggoming nodded and flew away toward the point Javier fell.

Then it's my turn now.

Lloyd decided to buy time, just enough for Ggoming to find Javier and bring him to safety.

Like this!

Lloyd doggedly crawled down, passed the dragon's crown, and got down with its skull, where there was the socket of its eye.

Excuse me, please!

Without any second of hesitation, Lloyd entered the eye socket, crawling through the passage where the dragon's optic nerves would have sat when it was alive. At last, he arrived at the wide cerebral ventricle. Aggressively grabbing the shovel, he swung down.

Clang! Lloyd struck the inner wall of the ventricle with his shovel, but obviously, he couldn't leave any damage, not even a scratch. But it was more than enough to achieve his goal.

…!

Targa, the warlock in the dragon's body, flinched. A metallic noise clanged in his head. He nearly jumped in surprise from how piercing it was.

Y-You!

Targa was flustered and enraged. He desperately wanted to rip Lloyd to pieces. That archenemy of his not only dangled on his horn but had also entered his skull and started noisily drumming the inside of it!

Get out of there now!

Targa yelled and all his bones trembled. But his shout was only said by his soul, so Lloyd didn't hear it. Thus, it was obviously not enough to stop Lloyd.

"Ha, I like your reaction."

One clanging strike. That was enough to make the Bone Dragon twist its whole body. Its reaction was beyond his expectation. An evil smile appeared on Lloyd's mouth. His shovel started to dance in a more energetic fashion.

“Whew! Ha!”

Clang! Clash! Clang! Clang! Clang Clung! Clash!

S-stop...!

As the shovel became more unreserved in its movement, the Bone Dragon started to writhe and twist with more vigor. At last, it stopped fluttering its wings and landed on the ground. It wrestled to remove Lloyd by shaking and scratching its head. But Lloyd’s optional skill was activated, so he was indefatigable. Instead of getting more tired, his shoveling grew more unforgiving.

“Maybe you like the sound of nails on a chalkboard?”

…!

Screeeech! Screeeech! This time, Lloyd roughly scratched the inside of the skull with his shovel, and the Bone Dragon started to move more frantically. Targa couldn’t be any more annoyed by what was happening. But Lloyd, even though he was harassing the dragon, knew that he had to do more.

More. This isn’t enough. More.

The dragon was only momentarily flustered. It would soon get used to the scratching and beating inside its skull.

I’m not doing any real damage to it.

Lloyd was only acting as a mild annoyance to the dragon. And soon, his fears actualized when the Bone Dragon wielded its foreleg.

Boooom! Unable to bear the metallic noise any longer, the Bone Dragon smacked its head with its foreleg, the force containing thousands of tons of weight. Although the impact wasn’t enough to break its head, it was enough to give a painful blow to Lloyd.

“...!”

The thing was, even if you were riding a solid truck or a hard tank, the person inside could feel the impact of a traffic accident. The harder the object the vehicle hit, the greater the blow would be. Lloyd was experiencing just that.

“Argh!!”

The massive impact shook the whole place inside. And Lloyd’s whole body was thrown to the side, like a person in a car accident without a seat belt, and was rammed into the wall on the other end. Then he collapsed to the floor.

“...!”

He struggled to breathe. He couldn’t scream. Instead, drops of blood spluttered out of his mouth.

“Gargh...! Ha...”

Lloyd wondered if his ribs were broken. No, it felt like all the bones inside of his body were broken. He then attempted to get back to his feet, struggling as he crawled and grabbed the shovel that fell out of his hand from the blow. Just then...

Bam! He heard another blaring noise that seemed to break the sky. This time it came from the other end.

“...!”

Lloyd was hurled away once again. This time hitting the other side of the dragon’s skull. The impact knocked him unconscious, and he woke up only a few seconds later.

C-crap.

Lloyd’s whole body shivered as he grabbed the shovel. No, it wasn’t a shiver. It was a spasm. He knew he had to buy some more time, but he was out of strength. He was struggling to stay awake, let alone stand.

This is how you want to play, huh?

It never occurred to Lloyd that the Bone Dragon would smack its own head. Every body part ached as though his bones were getting crushed. He wanted to run away if he could, but it was too late. There was water under the bridge. A decision was made, and he took action. So, he had to see through the end of it. A bitter smile appeared on Lloyd's mouth.

This is why I hated fighting.

But now that it began, he wanted to win. He wanted more than to achieve his initial goal. Now, he wanted to throw a big punch at this dragon.

Like this!

Ding dong.

The moment Lloyd hardened his resolve as he grabbed his shovel, a message that alerted the activation of an optional skill appeared in front of his eyes.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 2: Latent Power Surge has been activated.]

[Your circle amplification rate has increased fivefold for 30 seconds.]

Ziiing! From then on, his three-stranded circles moved, wriggled, and made an uproar. They rose, roared, and went berserk. That explosive power enabled Lloyd to get to his feet. He didn't give a hang whether he was in a critical condition or not.

I have 24 seconds.

Lloyd had enough time. Today, at this moment, he resolved to attempt everything he could within his power. Then he activated the fourth optional skill of the Asrahan Core Technique.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 4: Circle Shift has been activated.]

Lloyd controlled the number of rotations of the frenzied three-stranded circles and adjusted them to an optimal collision ratio before reverberating them.

Ziiing! Is this what it felt like to put a leash on three roaring beasts? Driven by the Circle Shift, the three sections of the circle fought, entangled, collided, and exploded with each other. At that moment, Lloyd aimed the shovel outside of the dragon's eye socket.

Kaboom! The output was five times more amplified than usual, so that was how much greater the collision was. The triple mana blast's explosive power was strengthened by fivefold. Lloyd carefully shot the blast to make sure he wouldn't be swept away by the force released in the small area. The triple mana blast went out, scratching and widening the dragon's optic nerve passage and leaving its eye socket.

More!

One more time.

Kaboom! The triple mana blast that was amplified by fivefold lightly chiseled the bone around the dragon's eye socket. Though the damage was small, it was enough. After all, Lloyd didn't expect to hurt the dragon with the triple mana blast. It was nothing but preparation for the real deal, his true all-out blow. Just then...

Ding dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 2: Latent Power Surge has ended.]

[As the penalty of the optional skill, you are now exhausted.]

A red message filled his vision. Strength left his body like an ebb. The frenzied circle grew suddenly quiet. But Lloyd wasn't flustered. His eyes instead held more malice.

I told you, didn’t I? I told you to move. I’m going to try everything I can today.

So, he did everything he could. And at last, he activated it—the final move that he had planned to use from the start.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 5: Supercharge has been activated.]

[With this option, you can indiscriminately absorb a large amount of mana from your surroundings.]

From then on, Lloyd fell into a trance-like state. His mana circle opened its eyes again, and they were the eyes of a predator. And everything within his range became prey for him to greedily absorb. And, of course, the Bone Dragon’s skull wasn’t an exemption.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 224: New Level (1)

Ziiing! When the Supercharge optional skill was activated at full speed, the three strands of the mana circle rotated quickly, gradually picking up speed and swerving around. The flow of mana rippled like water in a tub, gurgling and swirling down as it was drained. The skill began to absorb all the mana in the air. No, it started to eat it.

Fwoosh! The surrounding air roared with noise, and the dust particles in it thinned out. Even the microorganisms stuck to the dust weren't an exception. The bacteria that swayed around the cilia and the virus that sought the chance to leech in them lost the mana loaded in their molecules and wilted as a result. Of course, the larger targets around Lloyd, like the head of the Bone Dragon, weren't exempted from the blackhole either.

Cruuush! Lloyd was inside the ventricle of the Bone Dragon, and an ominous din rang across the whole space. The dragon's joints clacked as its bones twisted and turned when its mana was usurped away.

Crack! Crush! Crack! The colors of the ventricle changed, and it started to shake as though there was an earthquake. And as if the dragon was writhing in sudden destruction, the whole space that fell within the range of the Supercharge was distorted and abused. This was happening while Lloyd was in a trance, so he didn't notice any change happening. With his eyes closed, he simply plunged everything around him into destruction as he remained still in silence like he was in a cocoon. How did the Bone Dragon react? It simply shook its head as if there was nothing wrong.

What is this?

Warlock Targa murmured in dismay. Lloyd Frontera had been inside his head since earlier, and Targa could sense that the pest was onto something. The nearby mana was being sucked with an intimidating force. That frightened him at first, but just for a second. After that, Targa was unperturbed.

Well, I don't know what he's doing, but he's absorbing mana violently. And quite amazingly.

The Bone Dragon carried far too much mana for him to be scared of what was happening. There was a scary and even stupid amount of mana in its body. So, Targa didn't feel nervous at all, even when Lloyd was absorbing his mana at a fast speed. Unbeknownst to Lloyd, what he was doing right now was the same as bucketing out water in a city-sized lake. That was how much mana the Bone Dragon held.

In short, he's trying to empty a lake with a bucket.

Of course, Lloyd could empty it. But that would require an obscene amount of time. A few years. Or maybe even decades. That was what Lloyd's effort was. A laughable deed from Targa's perspective.

Should I try hitting my head again?

Targa wondered if he should use the same attack he used on Lloyd earlier. But he decided to wait out. With the mana being sucked out of him now, he suspected that his skull was slightly more brittle than usual. It would cause a huge problem if he needlessly launched an attack and created a crack in his skull.

I should wait a little longer.

And just like that, Targa decided to wait.

He won't be able to absorb my mana forever.

That was obvious. Even the most powerful skill was inevitably limited by the threshold of mana the user could take in. Since Targa was once a warlock, he knew this very well. So eventually, the absorption would come to an end soon. He just needed to wait for a bit. That would be enough. Targa's prediction was proven right. Soon, the Supercharge reached its limit.

Ding dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 5: Your Supercharge time is up.]

Ziiing... Inside the Bone Dragon's skull, where Lloyd was sitting now, a message appeared in front of his eyes. The mana circle had calmed now, and the violent rotation slowed, putting an end to the fierce and indiscriminate mana absorption. Lloyd slowly opened his eyes.

"Whew..."

This special sensation that he could feel after using the Supercharge, which he had gotten familiar with, ran through his body as he opened his eyes. He skimmed through the messages that rushed out in front of him.

[The manaheart skill has been upgraded.]

[Skill Name: Manaheart.]

[Stage: Mid-Level Sword Expert Lv. 10]

[Physical Ability Improvement Rate: 1,200%]

[Currently Owned Optional Skills: 1. Shock Neutralizer / 2. Complete Resistance to Poison / 3. Frenzy]

[Required RP to level up: 1,700]

[Your manaheart has experienced exponential growth in a short time by absorbing a large volume of mana of the Bone Dragon. In the process, a small portion of the dragon mana has settled in your manaheart. For this special experience, your skill is awarded new optional skills.]

[Skill Option 4: Half-Human Half-Dragon - By coincidence, a part of your manaheart has come to possess a nature unique to dragonheart. For this, every dragon that meets you will show curiosity instead of hostility. Of course, it is up to you to develop that curiosity into favor.]

Woah. Lloyd was shocked after he finished reading. His manaheart leveled up to own a part of the nature of the dragonheart and make the dragons curious about him as a result. But there was something else that caught his attention.

I'll become a high-level sword expert if I level up my manaheart skill one more time.

Lloyd felt a shaft of panic run all over his body along with anxiety. He was scared that he'd suffer from sword master syndrome once he mistakenly became a high-level sword expert. He'd be an insomniac. But Lloyd brushed the thought away. There was a bigger issue at hand.

What about the Bone Dragon?

What could have happened? Lloyd wondered, thinking that the Supercharge would have knocked out this dragon very well. Lloyd believed that the inside skull would have taken the full blow since the skill ranged over 22 feet.

Then let's head out quickly.

Lloyd quickly jumped to his feet. He knew that the Supercharge wouldn't be enough to end the Bone Dragon in one go no matter how powerful the skill was. But he expected that it would have left a strong blow. A severe migraine. Or a short faint. Anyway, Lloyd figured that he should slip out at this chance.

I didn't expect to defeat the Bone Dragon anyway.

The purpose of this whole thing rested on buying some time for Ggoming to locate Javier and take his badly shaped body to safety. Lloyd's plan served solely that goal.

This is enough.

Lloyd didn't expect anything more. And he didn't want to pick a fight with this monster anymore. So he decided to head out and run away without so much as a glance behind. Resolving such, he attempted to slip out of the ventricle through a hole when a destructive impact swept over his whole body.

Boooom!

“...!”

Could this be what a beetle inside a soft drink felt like while being thrown against a concrete wall?

“Argh!”

With a crushing noise, Lloyd was thrown to the other end of the wall, his whole body rammed into it. For a moment, he felt his bones dislocated, and he even wondered if his inside had spilled out of him. His vision grew dark for a split second. He couldn’t tell which was up, down, left, or right. He lost all senses.

Gargh...! What the!

Lloyd shook his head in panic, and amid his slowly recovering vision, he continued to think.

Is the Bone Dragon perfectly fine... even after being directly hit with the Supercharge?

Chills ran all over his body. Lloyd wanted to deny it wasn’t the case, but he couldn’t. The very same thing that took place a while ago happened just now. The Bone Dragon had inflicted damage on Lloyd by striking its own head. Nothing had changed from then. So...

The Supercharge skill didn’t do anything to harm it.

Everything became dark around him. It was the blow that blinded him a while ago. But now, it was the overwhelming sense of abyss that clouded his vision. Lloyd, however, gritted his teeth in spite of the looming despair. He started to crawl.

Like I would let myself die in here!

He couldn’t die here. He couldn’t die for someone else, that is, buying time to save Javier. It was too unfair.

I didn’t get to laze around to my heart’s content yet.

His life had been full of toil and hardship. He had lived a miserable, lowly life as the bottom inhabitant of the social pyramid in South Korea, living in an impoverished room rental. It was pretty much the same in this world. A pile of crippling debt pressured him from the start, and he had to work his butt off to clear it. He had overcome several life-or-death crises one too many times.

That’s how I turned my fiefdom into a livable place! And all that awaited me was rest and happiness!

Dying in the hands of the Bone Dragon now? That was too unfair, the strong resentful feeling inside him only strengthened his desire to survive.

No. I’m going to live. I’m going to live no matter what! I’ll live!

With a shovel in one hand and raising his nails, Lloyd crawled with utter desperation. He removed himself from the ventricle, passing through the passages of optic nerves, and finally slipped out of the eye socket. The fresh night air rushed into his chest as he breathed.

“I did it...”

Lloyd beamed. Just then, the Bone Dragon smacked its head once more. Bam! Bam!

“...!”

Lloyd snapped open his eyes, and the sheer force helplessly sent him to fly off. If he were a beetle locked inside a thrown can a while ago, now, he felt like an unbuckled driver hurled out of his car as the car collided. Amid the hazy consciousness, Lloyd gawked at the woods speedily passing 500 feet below him as he was flown away into the night sky. A scoff escaped him.

I think I was too... thrifty.

A pang of regret ran through him. RP. CP. He had saved them like a miser.

I should have splurged my RP and become a high-level sword expert.

Had he done so, he might have been able to hold up a little longer than now. He could have avoided this miserable situation where he was thrown to the ground, all helpless and impuissant.

Or CP. I should have used my CP.

Lloyd wished he had used the Ending Spoiler, at least. It'd have then allowed him to brace for this ridiculous final moment of his. He could have predicted today and planned ahead.

I was a fool. I had been too careful.

He felt like a fool for deciding to save the CP because each usage of the Ending Spoiler amplified the points the next time. He had decided to spend it only on occasions he was 100% sure about his bad feelings. Save, and save again. Otherwise, he wouldn't have enough when needed.

I didn't know things would end like this.

His half-hazy gaze moved, and as the gust of cold wind wrapped him, he saw the ground coming close to him at a scary speed. The rocks protruded from the ground here and there, and Lloyd figured that he'd be jellied once he landed there. That, Lloyd told himself, was the spot he'd die. Shivers ran down his spine. He opened his eyes wide, trying hard to be cool about the incoming death. But right before he was nailed to the ground, someone grabbed his belt.

Clack!"Lloyd Frontera! Wake up!"It was the booming voice of the queen. Lloyd felt a massive grip force along with the shout. He answered his savior's calling violently.

"Argh!!!"

Lloyd dry-heaved as the momentum of the fall was broken by the grip, which gave a sudden tightening to his stomach. He felt like he was going to be split in half.

“Wergh! Achew! Arrrgh!”

Lloyd felt a severe pang of pain even though he was only half-conscious. The pain was so great that he couldn’t faint. But thankfully, it allowed him some sense to look around.

“Get on my back, now!”

The Queen?

In no time, he realized that the queen was carrying him on her back and starting to sprint off toward the garden. She jumped over the shrubs and broke the sculptures that stood in her way with her sword. She broke through, breaking everything. A violent race and scattered breathing. Heat transferred to Lloyd from her back, and he even felt her desperation. She was running away with him on her back, away from the Bone Dragon pursuing them. A snort escaped Lloyd just then.

“Your... Majesty.” Each word spilled heavily out of Lloyd’s mouth. “Why... are you saving me?”

“Why, my foot!” The queen bawled. “I am saving you because you will die if I leave you alone! Is it your wish for me to abandon you and run away?”

“Please do not do that...” Lloyd answered with sincerity.

He couldn’t utter words like, “Your safety comes first, Your Majesty. Leave me and run away.” He wouldn’t dare say those. He was afraid that the queen might agree with his meaningless words and leave him saying, “Yes, it hurts me, but you are right.”

I don’t want to die.

Lloyd struggled and lifted his head. Carried on the back of the racing queen, he looked behind. The moon was nowhere to be found. Instead, he saw a giant figure ready to sweep his way. It was the Bone Dragon hot on their heels.

“...”

The queen was slow, Lloyd noticed. At this rate, they would get caught.

“Your Majesty,” called Lloyd.

“What?!” She snapped.

“I entreat you to run faster.”

“I am doing that already!”

“Take my mana, Your Majesty.”

“...!”

Her back flinched for a second when Lloyd placed his hand on her shoulder and squeezed the last bit of mana in him to transfer it to her.

Ding dong.

[You are now exhausted. Therefore, you are under the influence of the Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option 3: Power Saving Mode. Your mana amplification rate is fixed at 25%, and the whole amount of mana you can transfer to someone is limited to 2.5%.]

Ziiing!

It was a mere 2.5%. But that was enough. Even a bit of strength was better than nothing. That would still slightly increase their chances of living.

“By now, the royal forces must be ready to attack,” Lloyd pointed out.

“I know!” retorted Queen Magentano.

“To that way... You should run toward the forces.”

“I am doing that!”

Lloyd encouraged the queen, and she started to race more hurriedly. He wondered why the reality was so harsh in moments like this. Why was that Bone Dragon flying to catch up on them without ever getting tired?

Baaang!

“...!”

A blaring noise roared, and the dust storm blew. Lloyd sensed that the queen stopped in her tracks fast.

“Oh...”

He then heard her collect her raspy breath and mumble. Lloyd lifted up his head too, and there was the Bone Dragon standing in their way like a wall of despair. His gaze met the dragon bending over.

“Ha, haha...”

Laughter escaped him. It was over for real now. He had done everything in his power. Nothing more came to his mind, even when he beat his brain. At that realization, Lloyd burst into fits of laughter. And as he felt her shoulder tensing in fear, as he stared at the giant silhouette of the Bone Dragon coming in his way, Lloyd sensed his last moment. And he forced the corners of his lips to rise amid the terrifying shivers. And he thought to himself...

Javier. I’m going to die here. But you should live, you rascal.

Lloyd inwardly begged Javier to survive with the time he had bought for the latter. Take good care of Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, Bibeong, and Ggoming. And the good Count, Countess, and Julian. Feeling a little bit unfair about this whole thing, Lloyd added that Javier should have a fat belly, balding hair, and athlete’s foot because it would be too unfair if this boy gets to live so well without him.

So...

Lloyd looked up. The Bone Dragon had its mouth wide open now. It was rushing in his way, closing as it neared to eat them up. Its pillar-like fang was fulgurated. Just then, a sword ray shining brighter than the fang appeared in a flash and blocked it.

...!

He didn't make any sounds. There wasn't even time to feel anything. Right when something seemed to have glimmered, Lloyd opened his eyes wide.

Javier?

Out of nowhere, Lloyd saw the back of the silver-haired knight. Javier was standing in front of Lloyd, blocking the latter's way as though Javier was protecting him and fighting against the enemy. And when his long sword let out a force that split into thousands of iridescent auras, something popped into Lloyd's head. The novel. The image in the story. The final level Javier reached. That was...

"Grandmaster?"

The moment Lloyd mumbled, the Bone Dragon was sliced into thousands of pieces.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 225: New Level (2)

Splash! Ten minutes ago. Submerged in the swirling river, Javier was dying. Opening his eyes proved to be a struggle, but when he did, it was all blurry. Nothing could be made out properly. Even the touch on his skin felt strange. Something felt cold, wet, and bubbling.

River water.

Javier thought to himself. Finally, he was somewhat conscious. He figured that he was under the Magena River after being thrown out hundreds of yards away from the fighting scene.

The tail... moved.

The tail had been definitely sliced from its body. Javier was certain that he got the dragon for good when it was immobilized. He was certain that he could defeat it by smashing its skull.

But I let my guard down too much.

He was an idiot for that. His mistake was being convicted of a victory that was yet to be his. It never occurred to him that the snapped tail would move on its own to sweep him away. But Javier soon stopped, believing that he was only giving out excuses. It was time to face reality.

I must go back.

He grew urgent. There was no time to think in here. He had to return and stop the dragon. But... his whole body had lost strength. He couldn’t even lift a finger.

“Cough!”

Brrr! He coughed with great struggle, and the remaining air in his chest bubbled out of his throat. Resultantly, his body plunged further down into the lower portion of the river. Deep down to the very bottom.

“...”

He couldn’t breathe. And as the consciousness he painstakingly clutched onto started to fade, he repeated the names that kept popping up in his mind.

My Lord... And Young Master Lloyd.

Javier vowed to protect them in the face of tribulation and even death. He promised himself to keep them from harm until his last breath. But it looked like he wouldn’t be able to fulfill that promise.

Please forgive me.

Against his will, a scoff escaped him. The vow was grand, but he was not. He was doomed to miserably drown at the bottom of the river. How pathetic, he berated himself. He hated dying this way and leaving Lloyd alone in danger. That is, he wanted to protect his young master. Was it because he was the son of the lord and successor of the fiefdom?

No.

That wasn’t it. It used to be in the past. But now, Javier had somewhat realized that there was another reason. But it wasn’t anything grand. He didn’t want to see Lloyd die or get hurt. He wanted Lloyd to laze around and grow old, much like the wish that the latter expressed from time to time. He wanted to remain as a knight by Lloyd’s side until his wish was achieved. That was it.

So...

He urged his body, begging his system to move. He tensed up his whole body in utter desperation, yelling at his broken arms, legs, and body to move as it was time to get out of this water and go back to fight. He urged, scolded, hurried, and cornered himself. But later, his heart stopped beating.

No...

That was it. His consciousness was cut, and his whole body became limp. The bottom of the river was cold and dark. With his eyes open, sank to the bottom, his body followed the slow current of the water, and just like that, he met his death. As his heart stopped beating, his blood stopped flowing. The flow of blood in the carotid artery to his brain came to a halt. Once his oxygen was cut off, his brain cells screamed, and every cell in his body struggled. His nerves, fasciae, muscles, and marrows begged for oxygen as they insisted they could move some more. This couldn't be the end. They resisted defiantly in the face of the inevitable death. Every fiber in his system begged to keep his body alive. It was a miserable last-ditch effort. A pathetic act of begging. And now that his oxygen supply was cut off, they started to absorb other resources outside of oxygen. Fortunately, there was a good resource. Mana.

Ziiing... Even when his body was dying away, Javier's heart held a large volume of mana. It was the manaheart of a sword master, and the three-strands circle that wrapped it. The traces of voluminous mana circulation remained in his body like a historical record of his past. Then his history recalled his memory. The traces rekindled the circulation and mana thumped in his body.

Ziiing... The circle gradually started to move again. Each organ in the body yearned for mana, and the circle instinctively moved to satisfy the desperate demands. It provided mana to every corner of the body, filling up the depleted blood vessels and stimulating the struggling body.

Ziiing! The circle's rotation stepped up its speed. It squeezed out every mana left in the manaheart to avoid the incoming death. It then amplified and poured out everything it held to all of Javier's body. With that, the manaheart was emptied. And yet, the circle continued to spin, squeezing out more without holding anything back. It continued until even the manaheart itself was gone.

Ziiing! The circle's violent rotation went beyond its limit and melted the manaheart, Javier's manaheart beginning to fade away like cotton candy in the spring and spilled ink, like a sweeping storm. It melted and smeared into all his cells, equipping each with a manaheart. Before this moment, the manaheart was only a large lump sitting in his heart. But now, it was different. He had 60 trillion somatic cells and 60 trillion manahearts. Multiply both, and that was the amount of its resonance. All of the processes formed a network along the blood vessels, its distance reaching over 62,137 miles. It dispersed, disseminated, and amplified without holding anything back. Finally, everything amounted to one big explosion.

"...!"

He was silent. Javier had no time to be aware of anything. He didn't know how his eyes had opened, how he had gotten out of the river. How he'd gotten here. It was a mystery even to him.

Soon, Javier made sense of things. He woke up to find himself out of the river and back on the battlefield. Before he knew it, he had his back against Lloyd and Queen Magentano, with the Bone Dragon hurtling toward them. Gazing up at the dragon, he could see it.

I can feel it plainly.

The blowing wind. The difference in air density. The mana pool loaded in it. The borders of the minute mana whispered. The way his sword should be wielded was engraved in his heart. The place he wanted to focus his strength came into his view. So, he did. He raised his sword and wielded it sideways. So casually. Nothing special. He just wielded his sword the way his heart told him to. And when he opened all of his manahearts, the somatic cells in his whole body reacted. The manaheart as many as the somatic cells burned, creating a resonance that reached infinity. It was then amplified into the three-stranded circle. And just like that, he sliced a portion of the world.

...!

Likewise, there was no sound. The sword ray glinted in the split second he blinked. That was enough.

Slice. Lines formed across the body of the Bone Dragon. One, two, three, five, ten, 100, and 1,962. The 1,962 strands of aura rushed into the air. No, it broke through it with a sharp noise. The body of the Bone Dragon met the same fate.

…!

The Bone Dragon was shattered into thousands of pieces and defenselessly scattered in various directions. Thud! Twang! Boom!

It was like the whole area was struck with a salvo of dice-sized bone pieces. But Javier gave no mind to the dragon anymore. After he put the sword into his ordinary sheath, he turned and checked on the people he had saved.

“Your Majesty, are you well?” asked Javier.

“Y-Yes... As you can see...” murmured Queen Magentano with a dazed look on her face. She couldn’t believe what spectacle she had just witnessed.

What was that just now?

It was beyond her comprehension. The shocking sight was too much for her to understand in mere seconds. But soon, she realized that there was something more important than that.

“Oh, more than that, here.” She spoke as she put down Lloyd she was carrying. And she took a step back.

“Master Lloyd,” called Javier as he approached Lloyd. “Are you awake?”

“Yeah...” Lloyd’s voice was raspy.

“Are you okay, Young Master?”

“Do... I... look okay in your eyes...?” A faint smile appeared on Lloyd’s face.

He was far from okay. Really. Every part of his body was sore and in pain. He felt like he had at least broken a few bones. It looked like he also suffered a concussion. He kept dry-heaving, which was torturing him to no end. It was so severe that he wanted to commend himself for achieving the miracle of not passing out. Even though it was painful, Lloyd was able to put on a smile nonetheless.

This rascal is really something.

The sight of Javier brought a smile to his face. Javier didn't die. He was safe. Completely fine. And that spectacle of taking down the Bone Dragon?

He has done it. He's now a grandmaster.

Lloyd could sense it. Javier's aura was split into thousands of strands when it slashed through the entire space. The Bone Dragon was chopped like pieces of radish in a second. That spectacle was rather familiar in Lloyd's eyes as he had read the novel. That part never failed to overwhelm him, even after reading the same passage many, many times. Thankfully, Lloyd was able to ease his mind.

It's a relief.

Actually, Lloyd had been worrying that Javier's growth was stagnant. He was afraid that by completing the Asrahan Core Technique and teaching Javier about the mana blast, he had taken away his chance for self-growth. Part of him was bothered that his teaching poisoned Javier's growth. But today, he was relieved of that burden right away.

And we've overcome this crisis.

Feeling relieved, Lloyd let out a breath of ease. Meanwhile, Javier placed his hands on Lloyd's shoulders.

Ziiing... Lloyd felt his powerful mana streaming into his body from the shoulders. He even felt Javier kindly spinning the mana circle for him. A comforting mana slowly traveled throughout his body.

Ugh...

He wondered if this was what it felt like to rest after a day of work on a luxury massage chair but not before hitting the sauna and a bowl of warm soup. Lloyd almost moaned but stopped just in time. And soon enough, the emergency treatment was over.

“Whew...”

Lloyd snapped his eyes open. Now feeling light, he sat up. There wasn’t any pain anymore. The parts that he had thought were either broken or fractured had been completely healed. Lloyd turned to face Javier, who treated him.

“Hey, you,” called Lloyd.

“Yes, sir.”

“You’re not expecting me to thank you for what you did, are you?” Lloyd lifted his chin.

“Of course not.”

“Really?” asked Lloyd again, narrowing his eyes.

“Yes,” Javier assured. “You are not that kind of person, after all.”

“You know me well. You were about to tell me that I am a petty, vengeful person and whatnot, weren’t you?”

“You know me well,” said Javier with a smile.

“Yes. I know you very well. I know what you have accomplished too,” hinted Lloyd.

“Did you... figure it out already?” Javier’s voice contained mild disbelief.

“How can I not?” Lloyd scolded and pointed with his chin at the thousands of shattered pieces of the Bone Dragon that lay on the ground. “You just did that with one stroke of your sword. So, how can I not? It was the Bone Dragon, for Pete’s sake.”

“...”

“Anyway, congratulations.”

“Thank you.”

“Thank you?” huffed Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Are you thanking me because you know what I’m congratulating you for?”

“Well, of course, it is because I have become a grand-”

“Grand what?” put in Lloyd.

Javier stopped and said nothing afterward.

“I don’t give a hoot about your grand… whatever that is,” huffed Lloyd. “But hey, I just saw how smoothly you chopped everything into pieces.”

“Excuse me?” Javier retorted.

“You chopped it to pieces. That.” Lloyd chuckled and pointed to the Bone Dragon’s skeleton. “The pieces are all uniform in size with a sleek surface. Very nice. Nice indeed. Now, you’re going to make a fine granite cutter. It’ll be easy to cut them up into thousands of pieces of blocks and tiles, right?”

“...”

“This is what you call ‘mass production’,” Lloyd said proudly. “Standardization. Regularization of size. And flawless quality guarantee. So you just have to slice things like that from now on. I’ll do the selling. The profit will be a ratio of nine to one. Of course, I’m going to have 90 percent of the profit, while you take the ten. Got it?”

“...”

“You’re going to be rich too, man.” Lloyd congratulated.

“Ha...”

Finally, Javier could not repress his laughter anymore. Lloyd was smiling as he tapped his shoulders with force. This young master was making a corny joke right now, and Javier could see from his eyes that Master Lloyd was rejoicing. Not only because he had reached a new level in swordsmanship but also because he was safe. Javier felt pure joy in Lloyd. And the feeling was mutual for Javier.

I am glad that you are safe, Master Lloyd.

There was no need to speak it out loud. Just a silly joke was enough. Javier’s desire to protect Lloyd, and Lloyd’s heart to cherish and worry about Javier. The two understood each other without needing any words, and that was enough. It was enough, even if they outwardly hurled insults at each other.

“Is that so? Then congratulations, too,” said Javier.

“Congratulations? For what?”

“Since you are alive, you can always be made fun of by me whenever you want.”

“Ha,” said Lloyd defiantly. “Are you seriously going to make fun of me for being 30? Do you really think that will have any effect on me?”

“No.” Javier shook his head.

“Then what?”

“30-year-old...”

“Stop it,” Lloyd broke in.

“...virgin.” Javier ignored it and finished it.

“I said, don’t say it.”

Just like that, Lloyd chuckled like a fool and got up with the support of Javier. That was only when things became real to him.

I'm alive.

Javier was helping Lloyd get to his feet, and the Bone Dragon's remains were sprawled all across the area. The unbelievable event started to feel real now. He finally took in that he had gone through a life-or-death experience. That was when he was able to relax a little bit. Just then, unexpected messages appeared in front of him.

Ding dong.

[Your Zombie Domination skill has spotted a new entity that can be dominated.]

[Object: Bone Dragon]

[Status: Critical Condition]

[The Bone Dragon, which is originally strong, is unexpectedly in a critical condition. Therefore, the mana in it is almost depleted. Due to this, the condition to dominate with your basic domination skill has been satisfied temporarily. Moreover, once you succeed in dominating, the object will never be freed without your permission.]

[Would you like to dominate the Bone Dragon?]

[YES / NO]

"..."

Lloyd exclaimed "Jackpot" in his head after reading the messages, and his eyes widened.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 226: What Goes On Inside the Dragon (1)

Dang. I hit the jackpot.

Lloyd's eyes widened. He carefully read the messages that appeared in front of him with an incredulous heart.

The Bone Dragon is dying? It's almost out of HP and suffering from terrible exhaustion as it's depleted of mana. And so, this is saying the condition for my Zombie Domination is satisfied for now.

Lloyd decided to take his chance, so he quickly opened the skill window and floated the details of the Zombie Domination skill in front of his eyes.

Ding dong.

[Skill Name: Zombie Domination]

[Stage: Basic Lv.1]

[You can dominate a set scale of undead soldiers. The undead soldiers under your domination will provide unconditional allegiance and faithfulness to you.]

[Types of undead soldiers you can dominate: zombies and skeletons.]

[The number of undead soldiers you can dominate: 200]

[The current number of undead soldiers under your domination: 200]

[Required RP to level up: 50]

[Current RP: 2,632]

Hmm, the skill details that only the zombies and skeletons can be dominated. But how is it that I can dominate the Bone Dragon now? Wait, does that mean...

Lloyd postulated that it could be because the Bone Dragon was in a critical state, quite literally with its low HP. So, it was close to something like a zombie or skeleton for the time being. That was how he satisfied the Zombie Domination condition. If that was the case, there was no time to lose.

Whatever the reason is, it means that my skill will work. I'd be a fool to miss this chance.

Money on the floor was meant to be taken. A free-tasting sample was to be tasted. Coupons were to be collected. Perhaps, it was a little cheap and pathetic. But that was how Suho Kim survived in South Korea. Lloyd moved right away and activated the Zombie Domination skill, throwing his gaze at the remnants of the Bone Dragon cut up into thousands of pieces. But...

Ding dong.

[Zombie Domination has failed.]

[Error Code: 00A1, Capacity Limit]

[There is no space to accept another undead entity. Either fire an entity you are currently dominating or expand your span of domination.]

Dang. What a novice mistake.

Lloyd scolded himself for being too impatient. Hurriedly, Lloyd opened the skill window.

The sweet reward in front of me was so great, I lost my cool for a second. I can't act like this. Pull yourself together, Lloyd.

He invested his RP, and the result came out right away.

[Skill Level Up!]

[Skill Name: Zombie Domination]

[Stage: Basic Lv. 2]

[Types of undead soldiers you can dominate: zombies and skeletons.]

[The number of undead soldiers you can dominate: 210]

[The current number of undead soldiers under your domination: 200]

[Required RP to level up: 70]

[Current RP: 2,582]

Perfect.

Now, he had enough capacity. Lloyd's gaze moved restlessly toward the Bone Dragon, his eyes containing conviction and greed. He activated the Zombie Domination skill right away, and the reaction came immediately.

Ding dong.

[Zombie Domination skill has been activated.]

[The designated entity, the remains of the Bone Dragon, started to react to the skill.]

[1,963 pieces of its skeleton have been recruited minus one.]

[Among the 1,963 pieces, one piece is resisting the skill.]

Hmm?

Lloyd lifted his brow when he learned that over 1,900 pieces of the Dragon Bone were recruited except for one, and it was under protest.

What is this now?

Lloyd was afraid that his skill would be disabled while he wasted time like this. The mana of the Bone Dragon could recover its health level above that of zombies and skeletons.

Then I won’t meet the condition.

Lloyd’s neck broke out in a cold sweat as the chance to turn the Bone Dragon into his minion seemed to fade away. If that happened, it’d be the same as cooking a delicious pot of soup, only to spill all of it before serving by slipping.

That won’t do.

Lloyd’s eyes hurried. Just in time, a new message popped up.

[Would you like to see the details for the protesting piece?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it’s a yes!

[Loading the details...]

Ding dong.

With a refreshing ding, a wall of information cascaded in front of him, and Lloyd quickly moved his eyes like a person going through the monthly account history of their credit card.

[The piece of the bone that is currently protesting against the Zombie Domination is identified as a parietal bone.]

[As the result of the scanning, a soul leeching in the bone has been detected.]

[The leeching soul is resisting the Zombie Domination.]

[To view the information on the soul, please select “Here.”]

Lloyd selected it without hesitation. And the information on the soul that was protesting to Lloyd’s skill and leeching in the Bone Dragon’s parietal bone was revealed.

Ding dong.

[Leeching Soul]

[Name: Targa]

[Gender: Male]

[Age: 47]

[Occupation: Warlock]

[Height: 5’8]

[Weight: 134 lbs]

[Other information: Low blood pressure, neurotic indigestion, balding hair, salt tooth, sauce pourer, unmarried, forever single, ambitious, leader of the warlock organization, and killed in the hands of Queen Magentano while planning a host of treasonous schemes.]

“...”

Aha, Lloyd exclaimed inwardly. The leader of the warlocks was here. The information on the soul that floated in front of his eyes gave him an insight at last.

This case was like the Trojan Horse.

Lloyd recalled how the queen had suppressed and defeated the warlocks, who perished without even having a second to respond. The suppression was said to be much easier than everyone had expected, and it ended with the queen slicing the head of the leader. But the queen must have missed something in the process.

This warlock must have transferred his soul into the Dragon Bone right before he died.

Just like the Trojan Horse. Just like how the Achaean army hid its elite soldiers in the Trojan's Horse for the ambush, the warlock must have hidden his own soul in the Bone Dragon.

And that was why he was obsessed with me.

Lloyd recalled how the Bone Dragon ran riot and laser-focused on him for some strange reason. He had no idea back then. But now, once the identity of the soul was enlightened, Lloyd understood.

He must've thought I put a brake on his plans in Namaran. Tsk. This is the problem with the villains. They blame others when the fault lies in them.

Lloyd moved his eyes, this time more relaxed. And he continued to read down the messages.

Ding dong.

[The soul living in the parietal bone has been identified.]

[You can eliminate the identified soul at your will.]

[Would you like to eliminate?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes.

There was no reason for hesitation. Lloyd nodded right away. Just then, he heard a faint shout coming from the parietal bone.

"H-hold on!"

Hmm?

The voice seemed to belong to a sly, insufferable old man. Lloyd figured it was Targa. His voice continued shouting in a more hurried tone.

"Hold on! Don't do this! Listen to me!"

“Hello? What did you just say?”

“Yes! Give me a chance!”

“A chance?”

Lloyd snorted as he shrugged his shoulders. And he gave Targa, who was begging in desperation, a belittling laugh.

“Why are you asking me to give you a chance?”

“What...?”

“Ask who’ll judge you, not me.”

“H-hold on!”

Clack. Lloyd selected “YES” without any hesitation. And then came the shouting of Targa, whose scream sounded like a flushing toilet. Unsurprisingly, he was soon met with a joyful message.

[The soul of Warlock Targa living in the parietal bone of the Bone Dragon has been eliminated.]

[Now, all of the 1,963 broken bones of the Bone Dragon are reacting to your Zombie Domination.]

[The Zombie Domination skill has succeeded.]

[The Bone Dragon is now yours.]

Yes! This is what I’m talking about!

It was a success. Lloyd clenched his fists because he now held control over the Bone Dragon. But there was one more process left before actualizing it, and that was the restoration. Thankfully, Lloyd didn’t have to put a lot of effort into it.

[The Bone Dragon attempts to restore its body in accordance with its “Immortal” nature.]

[Its mana inside is gradually being restored.]

[The broken bones are piecing together.]

Crack... Crack... The shattered mass of the Bone Dragon, which was the masterful work of Javier, began to tumble on the ground. It started to absorb the surrounding mana, like the Asrahan Core Technique. And just like that, the Bone Dragon restored itself on its own, putting together all of its broken parts and returning to its original shape. Meanwhile, Lloyd struggled to stop Javier as the latter grabbed his sword again when the bones jerked.

“Wait! Stop!” yelled Lloyd in a rush. “That’s mine now.”

“That... is yours now, Master Lloyd?” asked Javier, his voice breaking in disbelief.

“Uh-huh.”

Javier looked at the dragon and back at Lloyd, his sword pulled out of the sheath just midway. There was curiosity and dismay in his gaze.

“You may have not heard him,” Lloyd hurriedly threw an explanation to convince Javier. “The Bone Dragon just spoke to my heart.”

“What did it tell you? What?”

“The baby of the Skeleton Corps. That is, it wants to enter as the newest member.”

“...”

“You beat it to a pulp,” coolly explained Lloyd, “so it surrendered.”

“Is that true?”

“Sure is. Look.”

Lloyd lifted his one hand, making a thumbs-up gesture and looking at the Bone Dragon. The Bone Dragon in the middle of the restoration reacted and made the same gesture.

“Did you see that?” said Lloyd.

“...”

“I’ll elaborate on the details later on. First, we have to restore it to one piece. Got it?”

“Yes... I see...”

Javier was at a loss for words. The Bone Dragon had been wreaking havoc on everything just a moment ago, and he had ripped the creature into shreds. So, Javier wasn’t easily persuaded when Lloyd said that he recruited the dragon and got it to enlist in the Skeleton Corps. It felt unreal even though he was looking right at it.

But it’s evidently a fact.

Javier could feel it by alternately looking at Lloyd and the Bone Dragon. In just a matter of seconds, its whole body became intact as its broken bones and dislocated joints started to come together. The Bone Dragon was now bowing obediently at Lloyd. What could be his secret? Javier mused. There was no way of knowing. Curiosity, reverence, and confusion appeared in his eyes as he looked at Lloyd. While he was thinking over these things, Lloyd was focusing on the restoration.

Okay, the restoration is going well.

Lest the assembling goes wrong with a missing bone part, Lloyd carefully observed the process as though he was choosing the best pork cut to treat himself or observing the pack of potatoes he selected after much deliberation or selecting the biggest bread in the rack. Lloyd’s eyes shone sharply.

[The Bone Dragon’s body has been restored.]

[The regenerated Bone Dragon now owns a new personality.]

[Its new personality is like a blank page.]

[From now on, the words that you tell will have a significant influence on its new personality.]

Messages cascaded in front of his eyes. Lloyd realized right away that this moment marked the final process and the most crucial moment in having the Bone Dragon under him. Catching on it, Lloyd quickly put on his thinking cap and beat his brain for the things to say. And then, he spoke.

I am Lloyd Frontera, your absolute owner and the most respectable and reliable creature in this world. Moreover, you are a proud member of the Skeleton Corps I manage. You are an excavator that says, "How deep?" when I say, "Dig." You are a crane and so much more. A construction machine is perfect in all ways. So, you enjoy labor all the time. Chores make you happy. And safety comes first. Hurray, big hurray for Master Lloyd. If you get what I'm saying, shoot me a finger heart.

Lloyd sent those strong thoughts to the Bone Dragon as he looked at it. The Bone Dragon reacted immediately.

Rumble...! It lifted its body and spread out its wings. And then, it raised its foreleg in the most polite manner and made a finger heart. At the same time, a refreshing message appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

Ding dong.

[Your Zombie Domination on the Bone Dragon succeeded.]

[From now on, the Bone Dragon will become a faithful worker and dutifully perform all of your commands.]

[The list of your Zombie Domination has been updated.]

[The number of undead soldiers you can dominate: 210]

[The current number of undead soldiers under your domination: 201 (↑1)]

Nice. Super nice!

It was done. The dragon was even officially registered. Thus, the giant Bone Dragon was his minion. After confirming the fact, an acute desire to dance swelled over him. But just then, another unexpected message appeared in front of him.

Ding dong.

[Manaheart Skill Option 4: Half-Human Half-Dragon has been activated.]

[The dragon soul nearby started to show interest in you.]

Eh?

Lloyd wondered what was happening.

A dragon soul is interested in me?

Confusion flashed across his face. The next moment, a voice of the soul recognizable only to Lloyd came from the Bone Dragon, who still was making the “I love you” with its fingers.

“I am the dragon from ancient times... I am Anticus... The original owner of this skeleton... Which is now yours... If you do me a favor... I will report to the Dragon King of your good deed... Please... Help... Me...”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 227: What Goes On Inside the Dragon (2)

“Please... help me...”

Hmm?

Lloyd blinked hard as he heard something strange. It sounded like a vague scream coming from hundreds of yards away. So, he wondered if he had heard it wrong. But that wasn’t the case.

The message appeared just a while ago, I think? It wrote that the option has been activated.

The option pertained to the optional skill, Half-human Half-dragon, added to his manaheart skill, which Lloyd had acquired after using the Supercharge skill inside the dragon head. The option had a simple effect. It would cause dragons to become curious about Lloyd.

It’s not a bad option.

Most dragons were hostile to humans. Like how people grapple their slippers or newspapers at the sight of a cockroach, dragons first thought about ending humans when they saw one. But with this option, Lloyd was spared getting killed without initially being inquired by the dragons. It made him an object of curiosity at first glance. Now, a message appeared stating that this skill had been activated. Lloyd focused on his hearing. Soon, the voice from a moment ago began to sound clearer.

“There... Can you hear me...? I am Anticus... An ancient dragon... I ask for help from the one listening to my voice...”

It’s real.

Lloyd did hear something. The voice continued to speak.

“I am Anticus... An ancient dragon... A member of the great tribe that once conquered the world... I ask help from the one who laid his hands on my bone...

It was clear. Lloyd could postulate to whom this voice belongs.

Could it be that this was the Bone Dragon's voice when it was alive?

It looked like so. Lloyd thought for a second.

Oh, sh... I kind of want to pretend I didn't hear it.

Should I just ignore it and pretend I didn't hear it? Such desire surged from his heart. It looked like helping the dragon out would result in a lot of bothersome work for him.

I don't know what it wants, but I don't want to get involved. I already have a lot on my plate now.

Lloyd gazed around. The Termina Garden. The very garden that used to be splendorous and marvelous. But now, it was likened to a room that housed 30 young children on Christmas night. In short, it was a mess.

I have a feeling that the restoration construction will be a fairly lucrative job.

And the money from the undertaking could be amassed in the storage back in the Frontera fiefdom to be used as his retirement fund. The mere thought of it overwhelmed his heart with a sense of reward. And so, Lloyd made up his mind to ignore the voice and was about to force-shut the Half-Human Half-Dragon option when...

"Oh, you who are listening to my voice... I sincerely request this for your sake... If you do not lend me your helping hand... My noble bones will break down into powder in three years..."

"I am here. I believe you need my help?"

Lloyd reacted at the speed of light, his eyes glimmering. The queen and Javier shot a strange glance at Lloyd, who was talking to himself from their perspectives. But Lloyd couldn't care less about them.

Obviously. The bone is going to turn into powder in three years? The Bone Dragon will be gone? I can't let that happen!

Lloyd hated doing favors when there wasn't any benefit for him. But when the expiration date for the Bone Dragon was going to be three years after all that he had to go through, he had to help out and prevent that from happening. And so, Lloyd replied to the dragon voice, whose voice dripped with joy when it came back.

"Ha... A kind... human, I suppose. Are you not one of the warlocks that abused my bone...?"

"Not at all," assured Lloyd.

"Is that so?"

"Yes. I'm not. On the contrary, I defeated them. Do you know a warlock named Targa?" asked Lloyd.

"I... am aware of the name. He excavated my body... And abused it."

Lloyd sensed violence in its voice. And so, he jumped in and replied, "That villain. I took care of him."

"You did?"

"Yes," assured Lloyd. "Just a short while ago. Wasn't he living in your parietal bone?"

"Seeing as you know that... I believe you are not lying..."

"Yes, that is what I mean."

Since it was the age of self-PR, Lloyd earnestly appealed his accomplishments to the dragon voice. Thankfully, the voice warmed up a little. And evidence of the change soon appeared in front of him.

Fwoosh! The finger heart gesture of the Bone Dragon began to glow, and light gradually floated from the fingertip. The light then created a video in the air.

A film letter?

Lloyd sensed that it was, and he was right. A dragon skinned in green appeared in the video. The horn had the perfectly same shape, and judging from the state of the skin and countless scars, Lloyd postulated that the Bone Dragon was old. The image seemed to show the dragon when it was alive.

“What now...”

Queen Magentano’s eyes widened at the emergence of a dragon video floating high in the air. Hardly minding her, Lloyd focused on the video. The dragon in it opened its mouth and spoke, its voice loud enough for everyone to hear.

“This is the record left by Anticus, the ancient dragon, a fragmented letter kept in a glass tossed in the sea. Moreover, it is a gift and favors for the human who will help me.”

The dragon in the video, Anticus, rolled its ember eyes. And it lowered its body with dignity like a living dragon.

“First, I wish to know the name of one who responded to my voice.”

“I am Lloyd Frontera.”

Lloyd replied fast lest someone spoke for him. Anticus smiled with satisfaction.

“Good. Human Lloyd Frontera. Thank you first for responding to my voice. Are you ready to help me?”

“Um, I first wish to hear your conditions,” said Lloyd.

“Condition?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded before asking back to indicate his confusion as to why it was asking the obvious. “I cannot lend you my helping hand without listening to what it is about, right?”

It was truly what was right and the most obvious. That was what Lloyd thought.

That really is the case. The most troubling question in the world is this: Hey, can you help me? But the person never tells you what their request is about. They just ask for your help and demand an answer before anything else. What the heck, seriously?

Lloyd believed that the proper thing to do when you ask someone for help was to tell them what help you need. Lloyd hated getting tricked into a scheme and suffering from any losses or liabilities.

Even if the Bone Dragon expires in three years, I’d feel this way still.

Lloyd seriously wanted the Bone Dragon to be part of his Skeleton Corps. His heart thumped in immense anticipation at the thought of putting the monster to work. But what if maintaining the dragon’s form required a significant amount of effort from him? What if it came with an unexpectedly great cost? If so, he’d abandon the dragon without hesitation. Lloyd thought it was an obvious choice.

I mean, what other choice is there? How’s that different from buying a high-end car with a loan when you don’t have the money to maintain it?

So, first thing first. Lloyd had to have a clear understanding of what that dragon wanted. Lloyd stared up at Anticus with such desire in his eyes. It appeared that Anticus took the hint.

“Ha.”

A scoff played across its face.

“Yes. You’re right. Technically speaking, I’m the one begging for help. Fine. I shall do what you say. I will elaborate on my request.”

“Yes, I am all yours,” answered Lloyd, his voice happy.

“To cut short, my soul has fallen into the depths of hell.”

“Hell?” uttered Lloyd in mild surprise.

“Indeed.”

“Then how do you explain yourself in this video?”

“This video is really me, but it is not my soul. It is just a letter I drafted right before I was dragged to Hell. A magical letter I threw in the sea that is the world, using my bone as a glass bottle.”

“...”

Hmm. So, the video was just a video letter but with a considerable level of magical artificial intelligence. That was why it was able to mutually interact with another intellectual entity. That was what it seemed, concluded Lloyd.

“Well, anyway, what kind of help do you need when you’re in Hell? It can’t be something like dragging you out of it, right?” Lloyd surmised.

“That is it.”

“What...?” Lloyd said in shock.

“Your guess is right. The warlock and his men that you defeated a while ago used my body for all sorts of evil purposes. My soul was resting when it was cursed and got dragged into Hell. So, I ask you. Please, go to Hell and save my soul.”

“Okay, goodbye.”

Lloyd bowed as soon as he heard Anticus. And he was about to instruct the Bone Dragon to shut this video. He would have done it had Anticus not yelled.

“Wait! You cannot turn down my request, can you?”

“I am.” Lloyd shrugged and turned Anticus’s way. “I’m not foolish enough to go to Hell!”

“But-”

“Absolute bogus,” defied Lloyd. “You see, I have a bright future ahead of me. I have no reason to set my foot on Hell yet, so why should I ride the Hell-bound express train to save you, a complete stranger?”

Lloyd was being frank. Going to Hell and saving a soul? Lloyd wondered if this dragon had lost it the moment he heard its words.

“I mean, it’s not like I’m a hero in a legend or myth or a son of a god. How dare you try to send a perfectly ordinary person to Hell? What are you, a siren? Aren’t you trying to drag me down with you to not suffer alone?” Lloyd huffed in almighty annoyance.

“That is not it!”

“Then I’m sorry, but why don’t you consider it your fate and stay there? I don’t want to go to a place like Hell. What’s more, I don’t know the way there either.”

“I can open up the gate to Hell right now.”

“No, please, I said there’s no need.”

Lloyd was flabbergasted. He had just shot a quick response because he heard that the Bone Dragon would become powder in three years if he didn’t assist it. It never occurred to Lloyd that this Anticus would have such an absurd request. He felt the same as when he opened his door for mail, only to be met by religious people trying to share their beliefs.

Hell-bound?

It was nonsense. He would refuse even if he was given ten dragon skeletons.

If that's the condition, then I'm not going to keep the Bone Dragon. It kind of sucks, but I'll live perfectly fine even without it.

Losing the Bone Dragon would be much more beneficial than being thrown into Hell. Safety came first, more than anything else. That was what Lloyd thought. Just then, Anticus rushed forward and started to speak.

"Wait! If you save my soul, I will provide massive, unimaginable rewards!"

"Excuse me?"

Unimaginable compensation? Massive rewards? Lloyd's ears jerked instinctively the moment he listened.

Shoot. I shouldn't listen to it.

Lloyd deliberated for a second. He then decided to hear it out first. So, he looked up without saying anything. Anticus spluttered in nervousness.

"Did I not say it a while ago? This video is the greatest gift and favor bestowed upon the human who will help me."

"So, what is this great reward?"

"Official support from Dragon King Verkis."

"Excuse me?"

Verkis? The official support from the Dragon King? While Lloyd was thinking about it, Anticus continued to speak.

"If you help me and lead me out toward the path of rest by saving my soul from the pit of Hell, I, Anticus, shall report your good deed to the Dragon King and the bravery filled with goodwill."

"So, you're going to set me up so this Dragon King can fund me?" asked Lloyd.

"Indeed."

“What good is there?” asked Lloyd once again. Here came the important part. Assistance was good, but it had to be specific. He needed to check thoroughly what benefits he’d be getting.

It’s obvious. We go over the benefits of our plans when we sign a contract with a carrier for our phones. Even in supermarkets, people negotiate the accrual rate of their shopping points when they sign up for a membership card. This time, it’s over the Dragon King’s support. So, I should do some math and nitpick what gains I’ll be making in specific terms.

It couldn’t be any more obvious. Lloyd stared at Anticus with a gaze of a picky customer.

“What good is there for you?” Anticus replied in dismay.

“Yes.”

“Hmm, first of all, you will never lack money for your entire life. The dragon cave the Dragon King lives in is filled with more treasures than this world has.”

“Oh, oh,” exclaimed Lloyd in joy. “I like it. And?”

“You will have two lives.”

“Wait, I will be able to resurrect?”

“That is it. The magic of the Dragon King is said to be profound that even the dead can be brought back to life once.”

“And?”

“Those are the main benefits.”

“That’s it?” Lloyd asked to see if there were anything more.

“Who knows? Additional benefits may come depending on how much the Dragon King likes you. But I can promise you one thing.”

“What is it?”

“I can promise you the surest way to safely exit Hell when you help me out and go there.”

“The surest exit?”

“Yes. Just once. I can mark your hand with one disposable magic that can open up the exit gate of Hell anytime, anywhere you want.”

Anticus then stopped talking after listing the benefits of receiving the support of the Dragon King and the way to get out of Hell. Lloyd nibbled his underlip.

Hmm...

He was on the fence.

The Dragon King’s offerings are more appealing than I expected.

It was beyond his expectation. It wasn’t just about gaining a powerful supporter. A bottomless pool of treasure. The ability to resurrect. And if lucky, there were set to be more. Moreover, the Bone Dragon wouldn’t have an expiration date for its usefulness.

Goodness, this is bad. I’m intrigued.

The money and the Bone Dragon weren’t exactly what appealed to him. It was the chance for resurrection. This world was just too harsh for him to live a carefree life. And so, having a chance to resurrect once would bring more stability to his relaxed, happy, and carefree life.

But the condition is going to Hell. Whew.

That part bugged him. But at the same time, there was the minimal safety device, a chance to leave Hell at any time once. The benefits the dragon suggested were too appealing.

Hmm... With these benefits, I don’t think it’s entirely undoable.

Lloyd then threw a glance to the side. Javier was watching the conversation between him and the dragon without saying anything. Javier met the gaze. And he looked at Lloyd suspiciously as if he understood the meaning of Lloyd's glance. Lloyd grinned without a word.

Yes, let's just say that you've become a grandmaster for this purpose.

When Lloyd looked at Javier, he started to be more hopeful. The rough journey to Hell looked somewhat bearable, at least a little, with the grandmaster by his side. They could likely overcome most of the small obstacles that came their way. Lloyd decided to drag Javier down on this, and, at last, he reached a decision.

"Good," Lloyd said, "With a generous heart, I shall help you, Dragon Anticus. But..."

Lloyd's hand moved to point at Javier, who was looking at them with curiosity. And he shamelessly added, "That friend over there must go with me!"

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 228: Along with Money: Hell (1)

“Let me take him with me.”

Whoosh. The wind blew. Lloyd’s fingertip pointed to Javier. The corners of Javier’s ears flinched. To Hell? Together?

I meant to obey his command if Master Lloyd made such a decision.

The image of the dragon that had suddenly appeared. Lloyd who had negotiated with the image. As he listened in to the conversation, Javier believed that he would be with his young master should the latter choose to help the soul of that dragon and descend to Hell. Javier had inwardly resolved so to himself. But now...

I resent him.

Javier decided to drop the matter. It felt like the roots of his soul were thrown into chaos. In a half-defeated way, Javier nodded. A wide grin hung on Lloyd’s mouth.

Whew.

Javier’s eyes narrowed as they moved toward Lloyd. However, Lloyd didn’t care. Lloyd simply gave a big smile to Javier, and his brazen smile seemed to say, “So, you’re not going? You’re going to send me alone? Wow. Javier. I thought better of you.”

“...”

Javier decided to drop the matter. It felt like the roots of his soul were thrown into chaos. In a half-defeated way, Javier nodded. A wide grin hung on Lloyd’s mouth.

“Yes, it looks like this friend agreed. I and this friend will go to Hell to help you. But!” Lloyd paused before continuing for effect. “I want you to vouch for the rewards you promised in return for our assistance.”

“Vouch?” Anticus cocked its head.

“Yes, vouch.” A meaningful smile hung on both sides of his lips. “There’s a vouch between parties even when they’re loaning small amounts of money. We’re helping you out in Hell out of all places by throwing ourselves in harm’s way. Don’t you think we need some kind of guarantee of a reward?”

“But I promised.”

“A verbal promise hardly means much.”

“Are you saying we should draw up a contract then?”

“No, I don’t think it’s going to have any effect on this.”

Lloyd shook his head. It was true. There wasn’t any effectiveness in signing a contract with the video letter the dragon left before it fell to Hell. The soul of that dragon lost nothing by violating the terms in it. Therefore, it had to offer something, a giant loss, if it didn’t fulfill its promises. That was the only promise and guarantee Lloyd could trust.

Thinking such, Lloyd said, “Swear on your soul.” What...?” You’re making a promise anyway, so I want a guarantee of it with the vow of the soul,” suggested Lloyd.

“What are you saying...?”

A look of dismay appeared in the image of Anticus, and the corners of Lloyd’s lips rolled up as he looked at it.

I knew it.

The vow of the soul. He commended himself for bringing it up.

That vow has more weight than a verbal promise.

It was a vow that could only be made once in a dragon’s lifetime on the utmost important matter. And humans didn’t know anything about it. It was exclusive to dragons.

And if one party breaks it, its soul is destroyed. Forever. There's no way to bring it back. Its existence disappears from this world for eternity.

To be more explicit, it'd be like erasing a character in an RPG game.

"Human. How do you know about the vow of the soul?"

Its eyes were now serious. But Lloyd decided to act brazen. How else? I read the novel, Lloyd said to himself.

"But that's not what's important now, is it?" reminded Lloyd.

"That's-"

"Vow or no vow? Answer me."

"..."

"Without that much certainty, I won't budge," Lloyd said, setting his foot down.

Lloyd was being genuine here. There was a lot to gain by making a slave out of the Bone Dragon. The endless treasures and an extra life. But despite such tremendous benefits of being a member of the Dragon King club, it entailed traveling down to Hell. Sure, there was a safety device, an exit from Hell, but it didn't offset all risks. So, he adamantly told himself that he'd not move an inch unless he was given a vouch that was proportional to the risks.

"Whew," sighed Anticus. "Do you really want that vow?"

"Of course."

"Goodness. I never imagined making this vow after my death and to a human at that…"

"Then you can leave it," huffed Lloyd.

"H-hold on!"

“Anything you want to say?” Lloyd said as he lifted his chin.

“Of course I do. I did not say that I would not make that vow.”

“Are you scolding me for being impatient?” frowned Lloyd.

“That is not what I am doing.”

“Then, what is it?”

Lloyd stared at Anticus with the attitude that said, “Take it or leave it since I’ve got nothing to lose.” Eventually, Anticus raised the white flag.

“I will do it.”

“Do you really mean it?” asked Lloyd.

“Since I said that I would do it, the vow has been executed.”

“Awesome.”

Lloyd was happy. It was just like the novel. The vow of the soul took place the moment one uttered the intention to do it. There was no strange chanting, flashing a magic circle, or any other dramatic procedures involved. A vow was literally a vow. A promise was literally a promise. It happened the moment one said it would be done. That was it. And it was actually the scary part as well. The simple words, “I’ll do it,” held the weight of one’s soul as failure to fulfill the promise meant the eradication of their soul. Nonetheless, thanks to that, Lloyd was able to place his full trust in the vow Anticus had just made. Now, the latter’s gaze held warmth toward Lloyd.

“Thank you… for helping me.”

“Please do not mention it. Just make sure to fulfill your vow.”

“Of course. Once my soul is saved with your help, Dragon King Verkis will be your supporter. Now, then, I will open the path of Hell.”

Bzzt! As soon as Anticus was done, sparks buzzed in the air, and a circle portal that was about six and a half feet in diameter appeared in the air. Lloyd saw a glimpse of the scary scene inside with plumes of smoke bursting out of volcanoes. His skin stung from the hot and stuffy air blowing onto him.

“Here, the gate to Hell is open. The other side is Hell.”

“...”

“It is quite hot in there, so be careful. Make sure to be mindful of Satans that roam around Hell. They take joy in deceiving good souls and perverting them.”

“Then,” asked Lloyd, “where is your soul in this place?”

“I do not know.”

“...”

“But I suppose the King of Hell has his hands on my soul.”

“Whew.”

After hearing that much, Lloyd breathed in. Was this really happening? Who would have ever thought that he’d be meeting the King of Hell? Even though the gate to Hell opened right in front of him, Lloyd was still in a daze. But the decision was already made, and Anticus made a vow. And so, success in this job meant...

I will obtain the support of Dragon King Verkis.

The Bone Dragon. Everlasting treasure. Two lives. Add to that...

“Lloyd Frontera. In the end, do you plan on leaving my side like this?”

Lloyd turned and looked at the queen. She had been listening to the conversation with Anticus by his side. And so, she had become somewhat aware of his intentions to accept the dragon's wish. The queen let out a chuckle, and Lloyd bowed courteously to pay his respect.

"Certainly not, Your Majesty."

"Then?"

"Even having the support of the Dragon King, I will never leave your side," assured Lloyd.

"Do you mean you will remain as my subject until the end?"

"Yes, Your Majesty."

"And yet, you are wary of doing the things I ask." There was a slight aghast in her voice.

"That is-"

"I am already aware." The queen's bitter smile deepened. "I have experienced and seen today. And yet, why do you presume that I am ignorant?"

"..."

"Sir Asrahan at your side has completely ascended above the levels of a sword master at last. Although I have no way to ascertain that the feat he performed a moment ago was the level of a grandmaster, it is plain that no troops of mine can easily defeat him," stated Queen Magentano.

"Your Majesty."

"And now, you have the Bone Dragon at your command, correct?"

"That is true, Your Majesty."

"Your knight who rose above the level of a sword master. Your obedient subject, the Bone Dragon. These two alone already signify that the powers of your house have surpassed the throne," stated the queen.

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“It is time that you do not have to ask for forgiveness.”

“Certainly not, Your Majesty. I wish to ask for your forgiveness on and on.” Lloyd insisted before hanging his head down and revealing, “I have told you this before, Your Majesty. I only wish to lead an ordinary and peaceful life in my fiefdom.”

“I am aware.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. As such...” Lloyd paused before speaking. “Dominions and powers do not interest me. All I wish is to relax in peace, so I still need Your Majesty’s support.”

Those words came from his heart. And sure, the queen was right that Javier, the grandmaster, and the Bone Dragon could overpower the House of Magentano. Seriously, he could wage war against any country on the continent. But Lloyd didn’t want to do that.

Why would I do that?

He could live happily without doing so. A happy, laughter-filled life awaited him at the fiefdom, where he was spoiled in many ways. He was free from worrying about being short on cash, rent or transportation fees, or unpaid wages. He was eternally liberated from such a life of agony.

And what? Dominion war? King? There’s no reason for any of that.

Lloyd didn’t want it, either. If he tried, he was certain he’d find himself under a terrorizing amount of work. It guaranteed he’d never be able to live lazing around like a rich landlord.

That won’t do.

So, Lloyd decided to keep things modest. He had to remain a favorable subject of the queen. He would enjoy life under her reliable rule.

To do that, I need her cooperation.

After organizing his thoughts quickly, he looked down. With precise calculations and an honest heart, Lloyd spoke to the queen.

“Therefore, Your Majesty, I shall not reveal Sir Asrahan’s new level and the existence of the Bone Dragon to the outside world. I only ask that Your Majesty treat me as an indolent subject.”

“An indolent subject?” asked the queen for clarification.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“So nominally,” she presumed, “you will be my subject. But you shall refuse all the work I give you.”

“Certainly not, Your Majesty.”

“Then?”

“There is the support and assistance I received from Your Majesty until now. I am a man who not only remembers my enemies but also my saviors.”

“Really?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Really?” she stressed once again.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd with equal emphasis in his voice.

“Hmm. We will see,” said the queen.

“...”

“Anyway, you mean that you have room to interpret my assignment as a favor, that is, depending on what the job is. Your favor. Did I understand it correctly?”

“Truly yes, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd.

“Tsk. You are a smart and impertinent man, but the problem is that I do not hate you.”

Queen Magentano clicked her tongue. She couldn’t help it as she could clearly see through Lloyd’s intentions. His desire was to be a slacker and live a relaxing life despite the massive power he possessed. He was asking for her cooperation to make that a reality.

Well. I should be relieved about it.

She pictured a fictional scenario for a second. What if, really if, Lloyd and his family decided to raise a coup? Would she and the royal family be able to suppress them?

No.

She swiftly drew a conclusion. It was impossible. The Bone Dragon alone required the mobilization of all the forces in the palace. Add to the Bone Dragon, there was Javier, the grandmaster. Her leadership would be destroyed. Her control system would fall apart. The number of remaining troops would mean nothing without any leadership, and they’d eventually scatter away. Thus, that would lead to the fall of the royal troops and the Magentano house.

“...”

Though she only imagined it for a moment, the mere thought made her hair rise. And so, the queen smiled at Lloyd Frontera, who was paying his respect to her. She appreciated him for making the suggestion to remain as her subject.

“All right. I shall grant your request.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

The queen nodded. Lloyd bowed to the ground. A content smile appeared on his lips.

The labor exemption. I finally got it.

His shoulders shivered as he was overcome with emotion. He'd have hula-danced and shouted in joy if no one was here.

As expected of the queen. I had faith in her.

A monarch with a generous and bold heart. A just and principled figure. Lloyd had trusted those qualities of hers. And it was from that faith that he was able to make such a request, and he was spot on.

It's a relief. If the queen was a small-hearted person, then none of this would have worked.

A typical monarch wouldn't be able to sleep at night so well in the knowledge of the subject outpowering the royalty. They might chuckle that everything's fine, but behind their backs, they'd rack their brains to assassinate the subject or find ways to neutralize them. But Queen Magentano wasn't like most monarchs.

She isn't. She'll instead use this opportunity to strengthen her power.

Of course, she would concern herself to develop a deterrence that would prevent Lloyd from getting too ahead. But the deal here was simple. Both Lloyd and the queen had to continue their life without clashing against each other. They would accept each other and co-exist. And to press on this choice to the queen, Lloyd intentionally accepted and joined the Dragon King club in front of her, declaring that he'd be joining hands with a power greater than herself. And now, against that backdrop, he suggested that she never bother him as he wouldn't go berserk but instead respect the queen and live in peace in return. The queen saw his intentions right away and chose to support him. Satisfied with the deal, Lloyd rose and looked at the gate of Hell.

"Whew."

The volcanic ash and lava ground appeared in vague shapes through the thick smoke inside the gate. The sight slightly made him feel more aware of his situation. It was time to go to Hell to become a member of the Dragon King club and be awarded endless treasures, the Bone Dragon's unlimited labor, a live-once-more ticket, and enjoy other benefits. At the same time, all the demons in Hell detected the gaze Lloyd was throwing into the gate. They lifted their heads and grabbed their thumping chests. And they recalled the very title Lloyd was known for all at once in unison.

What?! Sir Frontera, the devilish singer, is making his way here?!

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 229: Along with Money: Hell (2)

Fwoosh! They were in an unknown place inside Hell. Floating in the air, the Hell gate was spinning like an angry beast while spluttering out fire. Suddenly, something else was spluttered out. It was Lloyd and Javier.

“Oops...!”

Lloyd closely managed to recover balance and land safely without crashing down. But he soon winced and withdrew his foot.

“Ouch! It’s hot!”

Sear! The rocks on the ground were soft and half-melted from the heat. Lloyd’s shoes were slightly scorched on the bottom.

Wow.

Coming to terms that he had entered the fiery pits of hell, Lloyd surveyed his surroundings. Just then, the events he had experienced right before his arrival to Hell struck his mind.

***

“Is this it, Lloyd Frontera?” asked the queen. “Do you plan to go to Hell now?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd.

“How heartless of you. I was hoping you would leave after helping me clean up this mess.”

“I will leave Bibeong behind, Your Majesty,” he said.

“Is that so?” asked the queen.

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd then hung his head down without hesitation, which prompted the queen to make a wry smile. There was slight wistfulness in her expression.

She shrugged before adding, “Well. It was the dragon that asked for your help, so it is only sensible that you want to take care of it first. Thankfully, there weren’t many critically injured people or deaths considering the size of the incident.”

It really was the case. Given that the Bone Dragon had torn this place apart, the damage wasn’t substantial. Apart from the royal magician killed by the dragon early on and some royal guards, there was almost no casualty.

“It is all thanks to you,” the queen said.

“That’s-”

“No,” she broke in before Lloyd could finish. “No need to deny my words. It is all thanks to you who shocked the visitors into fleeing by bringing out a giant beaver.”

“...”

“If you hadn’t taken action, countless of them would have wound up in the tragedy and got killed. I truly appreciate you for setting an example and for your valiance,” said the queen.

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk. You and your empty words.”

“...”

“Every time you say these things, my hatred toward you soars through the roof and I wish to send you to Hell. However, through a method different from the one you are about to take.”

“...”

Lloyd smiled awkwardly, hoping to himself that the queen would talk without the sword in her hand. To be honest, Lloyd, too, knew where she was coming from. Lloyd was a reliable, trustworthy, and astute subject who lived without any greedy ambitions. It wasn't easy to come across such a great underling. No, the mere discovery of such a talent was a miracle. And so, she would never want to lose him. That was why the queen felt wistful. She was wistful as Lloyd had grown too strong for her to order him around like before. That was why she was making these sharp jokes.

Haha, but it's kind of ridiculous how I'm calling myself a great talent.

Lloyd thought so because, in the first place, he was just an ordinary guy who had slightly more knowledge of this world than other people here. His astuteness and ability to read the room? Those were helpful only because he was slightly more knowledgeable about the circumstances and future of this world, which he had gotten from reading The Knight of Blood and Iron. And so, Lloyd never overestimated himself. Instead, he resolved to keep a low profile.

I can't become cocky and act recklessly just because things are going a bit smooth for me. That behavior led many people to fall to their demise throughout history.

The same went for him, who now had the Bone Dragon and Javier, a grandmaster, under him. Even though he was on the crest of a wave and held massive power, he could potentially get brutally assassinated against his luck. Such was life. There wasn't any guarantee that it wouldn't happen. And so, Lloyd told himself long before that he must never antagonize the queen. And his mind hadn't changed.

"Your Majesty, I can only come back to your side if I go to Hell through the method of my choice." Lloyd's voice was cool and convincing.

"Is that so...?"

"Yes, Your Majesty," answered Lloyd.

"But you see," reasoned the queen, "even if I behead you, I have a feeling that you will come back to life after tricking the demons in Hell."

“I am overly flattered, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd, lowering his head.

“Are you?” asked the queen, arching her brow.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Your sly behavior keeps making me want to test your words,” she growled playfully.

“...”

“Do not worry,” she said, her voice softening. “I am pulling your leg.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

“If you really do, make sure to come back safely to my side again.”

“I will try my utmost best, Your Majesty.”

Yes, Lloyd wanted to come back. That he was sure about. He didn’t want to stay any longer than he had to in a place like Hell. After their conversation, Lloyd lent his helping hand to the cleanup by bringing Bibeong to the site, who was limping in the wake of the 3,000-ton body-press attack. There was some convincing and coaxing in the process of leaving him to the queen. And then, Lloyd took Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Ggoming in his inner pocket. As for the Bone Dragon, he ordered it to be on standby.

“Quietly hide yourself somewhere nearby.”

Creak? The Bone Dragon cocked its giant head like a large, meek puppy trying to make out its owner’s words. A smile erupted from Lloyd’s mouth.

“The people here won’t react well if they see you. They’ll be terrified. You don’t want that to happen, do you?” asked Lloyd nicely.

Clack! Clack! The Bone Dragon nodded its head earnestly.

Lloyd said, “That is why I want you to hide near the capital until I return from Hell. Away from people’s sight. Better if you submerge yourself in the sea without the presence of any humans.”

Clack!

“It’s all right,” cooed Lloyd, “You’re not going to die. You don’t even breathe, do you?”

Clack!

“If monsters like the Gigatitan try to harass you, just flick them with your foreleg. You’re stronger,” assured Lloyd.

Clack!

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded. “I’ll be back quickly. I promise.”

For some reason, Lloyd got the feeling that the Bone Dragon he acquired from the Zombie Domination skill had a new personality of a giant puppy. Finally relieved by the promise, the Bone Dragon flew up in the direction of the sea north of the capital. As for Lloyd, he roughly cleaned up the mess from the incident and left the rest to the queen.

“I’ll leave now.” With that, he stepped toward the Hell gate and crossed to Hell with Javier.

“Whew...”

He had been lost in his reverie just for a while, and yet, his nose was already prickling.

The whole place reeks of rotten eggs.

There was a pungent, rotten stench that pricked their nostrils. It was the smell of sulfur. Their view was equally unpleasant with volcanos everywhere within Lloyd’s sight. Lava spilled out along the large and small mountain ranges like a milk carton bursting from the side. Grass? Shrubs? Green trees? They did not exist here. The whole sky was gray with smoke. Could it be the reason why?

“Ehem. Ah-choo! Cough!”

It was Javier, who kept coughing beside Lloyd. It seemed that he wasn’t used to the smoky, polluted air. However, Lloyd was completely fine.

Well, this is similar to the air in Seoul.

To be specific, the air was as murky as the streets in Hongdae, Seoul on the days with the highest levels of fine particulate matter.

I went around without a mask then, too, because I had no money for them.

Lloyd had no way of avoiding exposure to air pollution even if it was harmful to his body. Some days were better than others when Lloyd managed to pick up some anti-dust masks from construction sites. But on days he failed to get them, he had to bear the terrible air and bank on having a healthy respiratory system. Thankfully and ironically, his vigorous respiratory training back in South Korea made his alveoli shine and reveal their worth in Hell.

“Tsk. This is enough to make you cough?” Lloyd smirked pitifully at Javier.

“Ehem...!” Javier waved his hands. “That is not! Ah-choo!”

“My, my. I thought you said you’re a grandmaster.”

“...”

“And yet, you can’t handle this?”

“Ah-choo...!”

“Tsk. You’re like a weak indoor plant that’s only ever breathed fresh air.”

“...”

Lloyd smirked. Even if one was a grandmaster, it would take time to adjust to breathing polluted air. He broke out in laughter at the discovery of his single point of superiority over Javier. But that wasn’t his only good news.

Ding Dong!

There was a sudden noise of alert, and unexpected messages cascaded in front of Lloyd's eyes.

[Your title <Top Gun from the West> has been put into effect.]

[You are now in a region with an average annual temperature of 104 degrees Fahrenheit. "Top Gun from the West" has been activated. You will never get dehydrated under any circumstances during your stay here.]

Yay.

Satisfaction danced in Lloyd's eyes when he read his messages.

That explains why I haven't felt overly warm since a while ago.

When he first arrived in Hell earlier, he didn't think it was particularly hot given the volcanoes and magma surrounding him. He didn't sweat much, either. It all turned out to be thanks to his title.

I made the right choice to build the Qanat for the sultan in the desert. Wow. Never did I expect to use my title like this.

Lloyd had no idea that he'd be coming down to Hell back then. He never even imagined he'd come to a monstrous neighborhood that was 104 Fahrenheit year-round. He merely thought he obtained yet another title and moved on. To him, it just meant he'd be safer in desert areas. But now that he was in Hell, there wasn't a better title he could have.

"Hey, are you hot?" asked Lloyd.

"I am fine, ah-choo, ehem!"

"But you're sweating buckets."

"It's bearable," assured Javier.

“Tsk. You’re a weakling.”

“...”

“Seriously, knights these days just don’t have any mental fortitude. Not an ounce of it.” Lloyd shook his head regretfully.

“...”

Lloyd looked inside his inner pocket. “Everyone all right?” he asked.

“Ppo! Bang! Ha! Ggo!” Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Ggoming nodded happily inside his pocket.

“How is the temperature?”

“Ppo! Bang! Ha! Ggo!”

“It’s all right? But Ppodong and Ggoming look a little hot.”

“Ppo! Ggo!”

Like Lloyd observed, Ppodong and Ggoming seemed to be having a tough time as they were covered with fur, unlike Bangul and Hamang whose body was sleek and hairless.

“Then why don’t you guys step outside instead? And Ggoming?”

“Ggoming!” exclaimed Ggoming.

“You take this.”

“Ggomiming!”

He fed a red sunflower seed to him, and he hopped on Ggoming’s back with Javier. As for Ppodong, who was panting from the heat, he got on Lloyd’s shoulder.

“Now, we fly!” ordered Lloyd.

“Ggoming!” exclaimed Ggoming.

Soaring across the sky in Hell, Lloyd was able to look down on the surrounding area. It thankfully allowed him to see the spot he could fly toward.

That must be it.

Beyond the horizon, there stood a strangely shaped volcano. It wasn’t anything like an ordinary mountain. To analogize, it looked like a demonic churro. And that churro-looking mountain was bubbling with lava. At the sight, he suddenly recalled reading a descriptive passage about Hell from the novel.

The novel said that the Castle of Hell, where the King of Hell lives, had an outline of a person writhing in agony. And at the top, the King ruled over every soul that fell in here.

The mountain in the distance perfectly fit that description. And so, there was only one conclusion he could make.

That is the place.

That was where the King of Hell resided. And so, the soul of the ancient dragon Anticus had to be entrapped there.

“Ggoming!” called Lloyd. “Let’s fly there, how about it?”

“Ggomiming! Ming!”

Now that their destination was set, he didn’t have to go on an unnecessary adventure and travel by foot. Thinking so, Lloyd encouraged Ggoming to fly, and the unfamiliar view of Hell sped by beneath them. One hour. Two hours. Three hours. Five hours. And nine hours passed by.

We’ve flown this much, and why does it feel like we’re not getting close?

Lloyd clutched the back of his neck in distress after spending almost half a day flying. They weren’t getting closer to the twisted mountain where the King of Hell was at. No matter how many times Ggoming fluttered his wings, even when Lloyd was sure they were flying toward the mountain and when the ground beneath him sped by, for some strange reason, the mountain was getting closer. Not at all.

This is nuts.

There had to be a reason. A reason why he couldn't get close to the mountain. But Lloyd had no clue. Nothing changed even after he rummaged through the novel's content in his head. He couldn't recall any mention of a phenomenon like this one. Just when he was feeling a bit hopeless, he spotted something.

Hmm?

Lloyd, who was gazing around in dismay, spotted something within his vision. And he called Javier behind him and said, "Hey, Javier. Your vision is better than mine, right?"

"Yes, probably," answered Javier casually.

"Then do you see that?" Lloyd pointed to an area on the ground.

Knitting his brows, Javier focused his gaze there. "I see it. It looks like a human."

"Right? And am I correctly seeing that the person's skin is a little off?"

"Yes, you are correct. Their skin is bright red like the color of blood. And their head... has a horn on it."

"A horn?" Lloyd cocked his head as if he hadn't caught that.

Javier replied, "I am sure of it. There is a horn jutting out of them."

"Then that means-"

"It is a demon, a demon living in Hell," Javier finished.

“You’re absolutely right. Bingo. What perfect timing. I just needed to ask for some directions,” said Lloyd.

“Wait, do you plan on approaching the demon?” Javier frowned.

“Of course. I have a grandmaster with me, so why should I be afraid of that demon?”

After giving a nonchalant response, Lloyd told Ggoming to fly down toward the demon in their distant view. Like a driver asking a passerby for directions after circling around in a strange place, so naturally, Lloyd got Ggoming to land near a demon.

“Hey!”

The demon flinched in surprise at the sudden landing of a creature and called. Lloyd then put on a benevolent smile toward it and said, “You better answer me what I’m about to ask, or else you’ll practice filial piety to your parents.”

“...!”

The demon’s eyes burned in rage when it heard a blessing from a complete stranger.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter: 230 Along with Money: Hell (3)

The main gate of Hell. Underneath the sky blackened with smoke, two pillars of blazing fire shot up, and a long passage led in between them. At the end of it, there was a skull that was as big as a mountain. It was the home of the King of Hell, as well as the center of the land, the Hell Castle. Demon Pagenti, a resident of Hell, smiled evilly as it pointed to the castle.

“That is not the Hell Castle,” Pagenti said.

“Yeah? All your words are lies, aren’t they? You rotten piece of a bastard,” Lloyd scolded.

“Hehe, did you think I’d thank you if you told me that?”

“Who cares if you thank me or not?”

“Hahaha, is that so?”

Demon Pagenti blurted out rude remarks one after another. However, contrasting its words, it cordially bowed to Lloyd. How could it not? The day before, when it met Lloyd for the first time, it was beaten up to a pulp. It could never forget what happened the other day.

It hurt like hell, dammit!

Pagenti was simply going its way, hungry after lazing around in the magma sauna, its home. It had come out of its home to pester and eat lost souls nearby. That was when a large parrotbill landed beside it and the human riding the bird suddenly gave the demon a blessing.

What was it he said? That I would have to practice filial piety toward my parents if I don’t answer his question properly?

This was a blessing that anyone in Hell would deplore and lament as soon as they heard it, the kind that insulted a demon’s personality to the core.

Practice filial piety to my parents?!

What kind of life did one have to live to be able to spit out such awful words? And did Pagenti seem like an easy enough target for Lloyd to give such a blessing without a second thought? Demon Pagenti burned in rage and revealed its fangs right there, rightfully so as a resident of Hell. It jumped at Lloyd with determination to exterminate the rude man and throw him alive into the flaming pits of Hell. But before it could succeed, the demon was slammed across its cheeks. A clear and melodious sound rang across the whole world.

Wham! The metal shovel struck down at lightning speed. Pagenti found its head jerking to the side when the flat shovel head whacked it. That was it for Pagenti. The whole world grew dark, and it passed out. When the demon opened its eyes, it found its attacker, Lloyd, grinning at it.

"Hello?"

"Wh-what's…"

Pagenti was about to ask what just happened, but before it could do so, the shovel struck down once more. Wham!

Once again, a clear, melodious sound rang aloud and the world darkened. That was when it started. Pagenti woke up. Lloyd grinned. And before Pagenti had the time to say anything, it received another strike. This pattern repeated ten more times. And on the 11th strike, Pagenti finally made a realization. So, it bowed down flat on the ground as soon as it woke up.

"Please forgive me. Stop it, please!" Pagenti begged earnestly. But Lloyd simply grinned with a glow of satisfaction.

"Then let's end it with one last strike!"

"...!"

There couldn't be anyone more heinous than this person, thought the demon. Even after Pagenti's sincere begging, Lloyd's shovel continued to fly toward it. When Pagenti felt its head get shoved to the side by another blow, amid losing consciousness, it felt a shaft of despair and thought inwardly that it had been a while since it met such a deeply evil individual. He was truly a respectable man. The demon teared up in sincere admiration. And so, when Pagenti opened its eyes again, it was already prepared to pledge its loyalty to Lloyd. From that moment, Pagenti became Lloyd's dutiful tour guide.

"Hahaha, do you plan on flying to the twisted mountain, Master Lloyd?"

"Mhm," drawled Lloyd.

"My, how wise you are. Yes, that's right. That's the Hell Castle."

"Is it? If that's not the castle, I'll fry you in magma as a reward. How does that sound?" growled Lloyd.

"Please don't."

"Then? Where is it?"

"The truth is, that twisted mountain... Haah, it's a mirage." At last, Pagenti revealed.

"Tsk. My suspicion was correct. Then there's got to be the real one somewhere, right?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes."

"Where is it?"

"..."

"Do you want to die?"

"To be honest, the Hell Castle is at... Over the lava lake... Blah blah blah... Past the western ash pile... Yada yada... Over the skeleton bin... That's where it is."

“Wow. And you planned on lying, pretending you don’t know?”

“Yes.”

“Was it worth it?”

“Yes.”

“How about now that you spilled the truth?”

“I am in agony...”

“Tsk. It must be just so hard to tell the truth.”

“Yes...” Pagenti replied, choking up.

“It’s okay. Cheer up, you bastard. Once you’re done guiding me around, I’ll insult you as a reward.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“Of course.”

And so, the conversation took off in such a manner for the past day, and Pagenti finally succeeded in guiding them to the real Hell Castle.

Wow, not lying for a day was an ordeal.

Of course, Pagenti did lie at times. But it told the truth more often than not, making Pagenti feel a pang of guilt in its conscience. But it held up because it was no other than Lloyd, the notorious “Hell’s Singer.” He was the very person who destroyed the eardrums of Sir Giolexius the commander of the 1st Corps. And guiding this heinous man would bring honor to three generations of its family. Demon Pagenti turned around to look at Lloyd, feeling a sense of pride.

“Um, since my guide ends here-”

“Are you asking for an insult?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes!”

Demon Pagentani’s eyes glimmered. An insult from the Lloyd? Pagentani wished to permanently ingrain his words in its ears or frame them on a wall. But Lloyd destroyed Pagentani’s excitement in one moment.

“I don’t want to,” dismissed Lloyd.

“Excuse me...?” Pagenti’s eyes widened.

“Wait, did you expect me to keep my promise?” Lloyd taunted.

“Ha, t-that means-”

“The promise I made with you means less to me than a chewed-up piece of gum.”

“Oh! Oh! Oh!” exclaimed Pagentani.

“Did you get it...?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes...”

“Then piss off. I don’t want you in my sight.”

“Thank you so much!” Demon Pagentani ran away, its face beaming with a smile.

Lloyd sighed as he looked at the back of it.

Goodness, demons...

Being insulted enthralled them. And being lied to along with it, had them rolling on the ground in excitement.

Seriously, they’d love internet forums in Korea.

It was a haven for slander and insults. The very place where users put down each other on a regular basis and threw insults at one’s personality. Though the atmosphere was different for each website, users' trash-talking and humiliating people was generally a daily occurrence across Korean social media. But here in this place called Hell, it seemed everyone would be able to easily adjust to the internet.

Well, anyway,

Lloyd stared at the main gate of Hell Castle with a shrug. He had finally arrived here after taking advantage of one demon. So now...

"You cannot be meeting the King of Hell like this," interrupted Javier, who had been silently following behind Lloyd all this time.

Lloyd turned and looked at Javier, his face saying, "Why bother to ask something so obvious?"

"I am," Lloyd spoke with a grin.

But Javier's face stiffened. "I believe your plan is too dangerous and careless."

"Dangerous and careless?" Lloyd cocked his head to the side. "Why?"

"He is the King of Hell."

Lloyd, however, ignored him and moved toward the entrance. He soon pointed out, "The King rules over Hell. We have no way of knowing what power he holds. Therefore, your safety is in question. That is, even if I cultivated a new level of power."

"Do you mean you're nervous even though you're now a grandmaster?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes," Javier admitted without any bit of shame in his voice.

"And that's because you don't know what kind of person he is?"

"Yes."

“In that case, it’s fine,” assured Lloyd.

“Excuse me?”

Javier flinched. Lloyd shrugged.

“You may not know this, but the King of Hell is the least dangerous fellow in all of Hell.”

“I am not sure what you mean...”

“Don’t worry about it. I have a plan, so just relax and follow me.”

Lloyd chuckled in spite of himself. The thing was, he could always summon an exit gate from Hell if things really got dangerous and transport them back to the Lorasian continent. He could return to his ordinary life and give up on this mission without any regret. There wasn’t much pressure on him. So, Lloyd relentlessly walked forward without any hesitation as he entered the main castle, as though he was strolling around the Frontera manor. Just then, a passage from the novel naturally came to him.

There was a mention of the King of Hell in The Knight of Blood and Iron.

The King of Hell. The ruler of Hell. The commander ruling over all Hell’s Knights. Most would envision him to look so destructive when they hear those titles. But in reality, he was very different. Lloyd continued to walk as he recalled that part, and he made his entrance to the main palace of Hell Castle.

Since Lloyd wasn’t a soul yet but a living person with flesh, he was a stranger in this realm of the world. So his appearance brought surprised murmurs from the guards, who whispered to themselves if that man was indeed the master singer Lloyd Frontera. Lloyd ignored and continued to stride to the center of the castle, finally toward the throne of the King of Hell. Lloyd paid his respect to the king, who was sitting on a throne that looked much like an office chair. And the desk was wide but bare, without any decorations. Piles of paper took up the desk, and the king looked like he’d soon drown under the paper heaps. Pale and fatigued, the king fidgeted his rimmed glasses and muttered as he looked at the one paying respect to him. There was annoyance in his gesture.

“Haah, what now when I’m so busy...?” the King of Hell murmured.

The King of Hell. The one who could see through the core of anyone’s soul. The master of karma, and the watcher of the 19th purgatory. He was Hellkaros, the King of Hell.

“Haah,” grumbled Hellkaros, “For what reason have you barged in here when I am swamped with an endless amount of work? Can you not see that I have been unable to get off work for the past 670,000 years?”

“Please forgive me, the ruler of Hell,” said Lloyd respectfully. “Lloyd Frontera from the ground pays his respects to the king.”

“Respect, my foot. Suho Kim. We’ve met, haven’t we?”

The King of Hell’s question stung Lloyd, who flinched when he heard his real name. And Lloyd cast a glance at Javier to check for any change in the latter’s expression. Thankfully, it looked like Javier didn’t know yet the real meaning of “Suho Kim.” Trying to look natural and undisturbed, Lloyd looked up at the king.

“Yes, we have met,” answered Lloyd. “You appeared in my dream.”

It was true. The giant in fire. This king had once appeared in Lloyd’s dream in all of his stateliness. He had considered it a lively silly dream back then, but now, it turned out that the dream was real.

“I am truly guilty for paying a visit to you amid this time when you are busy giving verdicts in Hell. May I then get to business right away?”

“Of course. Hurry up.”

The King of Hell swayed his hands as if he couldn’t be bothered. All this while his gaze went back to the paper, his one hand grasping the pen and signing documents. With his other hand, he was flipping the papers as he even stamped them. Yes. This was the real image and essence of the King of Hell.

He's a workaholic. A judge that judges hundreds, billions, and trillions of dead souls. He's piled under a mountain of work, so he punished the others only with formal documents and the rule of law.

Just then, Lloyd recalled a part in The Knight of Blood and Iron that spoke about the essence of the King of Hell. He was said to never take part in direct combat. And he killed no entity. Documents and judgments. Those two weapons were the only ones he wielded to determine the fate of the others.

In other words, the work that required any use of force was left to Hell's Knights and their corps, while he glued himself to the desk of never-reducing paper works to exact judgment on people. That was what the novel said about the King of Hell. And so, he had the least chance of posing any harm to Lloyd so long he wasn't set for an official judgment in Hell. There was zero chance of offending the king during the conversation and dying or getting hurt. And so, literally speaking, this king was the safest brother here. That was the reason why Lloyd was able to maintain such composure about meeting the king.

Really, the scarier one is Hell's Knight, not the King of Hell.

But there was Javier to save Lloyd from Hell's Knight, for Javier has become a grandmaster. So long five or six Hell's Knights don't jump at him at once, he'd be able to put up a fight. But if things really seemed like Javier would be outnumbered and cornered in danger, Lloyd could always use the exit gate out of Hell and run away to the ground. He had done the math and concluded that he'd be safe even if he went to Hell. And it was primarily due to that conclusion and conviction that made Lloyd accept Anticus's request.

And so, now that he had met the King of Hell at last, it was time to go back home after finishing his business quickly. Go back home, get an audience with the Dragon King Verkis, and enjoy the benefits of being in the Dragon

King club. Resolving such determination in his mind, Lloyd wet his lips and spoke aloud the clever comment he had prepared for this moment.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 231: Hell Express 666 (1)

“Tell me, don’t you wish to get off work?”

The moment Lloyd uttered those words, the King of Hell put a sudden halt to his pen that had been moving at lightning speed.

“What?” The King of Hell shot a cynical glare toward Lloyd. He wondered if this was what it would look like if ice could glare.

But Lloyd wasn’t intimidated. After all, he saw this response coming.

Of course. He’s been working overtime for 670,000 years. How else would he answer whether he wants to go home?

His response was obvious.

“It goes without saying that I do,” huffed the king. “Why are you asking such an obvious question?”

Hellkaros’s voice was rough and on edge, and he had a face that said, “You kidding me?” Lloyd saw it as a good sign. This was better than a while ago when he simply buried his face in paperwork without giving a single glance to Lloyd. At least right now, he had the chance to strike a deal.

“I think I can help you with that,” Lloyd responded.

“Help me?” Hellkaros frowned. “You?”

“Yes.”

“How?”

“I will tell you once you give me the promise to release the soul of dragon Anticus who is under your confinement right now.”

And with that, Lloyd clamped his mouth shut, staring only at the king with a meaningful gaze. Their eyes locked, and a moment later...

“Ha.” King Hellkaros scoffed before saying, “Are you striking a deal with me?”

“Yes, I am.”

“How dare you. What are you thinking?”

“I heard that you are after extreme efficiency and fairness in all things, My Lord.”

“You did?” asked the king.

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded his head. It was true. He did hear about the king. Where? In the novel.

There was a brief mention of him. The book wrote that the King of Hell uses the rule of law to punish the dead. But he started to chase after efficiency as his work became overwhelmingly hectic. And so...

The king demanded a fair cost for everything. Nothing was free for him. In order to receive a favor from him, you had to pay the proper price.

Just perfect. I like how he thinks. How can I not? Life is all about give and take in the first place.

There were no such things like free lunch or charity. King Hellkaros was similar to Lloyd in that sense. And so, throughout his travel to meet the king, Lloyd placed himself in the king’s shoes. How would the king react when Lloyd suggested releasing the soul of the dragon? Thinking from the king’s perspective, the answer came immediately.

I’d scoff, saying that the dragon can’t be freed without a cost. This would prompt the suggesting party to plead and beg me to name a price for the dragon’s release. I can’t do that. If I did, then the king would have the upper hand right from the beginning.

If possible, it was best to begin all negotiations by making the other party plead. That was a good way to get a strong start in the war of negotiation. Lloyd thought of it as a fight for dominance. And so, he was able to devise a strategy customized just for the King of Hell, who was chronically overworked. Lloyd first caught the king's attention by throwing a bait; in other words, he mentioned there was a way for him to get off work. And taking advantage of the moment, he subtly brought up his request by saying he would tell him how he could get off work if he released dragon Anticus.

"How does that sound?" asked Lloyd. "If you give me your promise, I will be able to tell you my secret method."

"..."

Lloyd flashed a grin, and the king frowned, his brows forming a wrinkle in the forehead. Lloyd Frontera, no, Suho Kim truly was a nasty person with his cunning and sly ways. Hellkaros had felt that way the last time the latter eliminated Sir Giolexius, that is, Hell's Knight. But at the same time, Lloyd became more desirable to the king the longer he watched him.

Should I just make him take my place?

At first, the plan was to make him sing and become the speaker for Hell's broadcast since his terrible singing seemed suitable to punish the dead in purgatory. That was why he made an effort and used his precious time to appear in Lloyd's dream. But now, Hellkaros's had a slight change of heart. If only he could, he wanted to throw every bit of his responsibility onto Lloyd's plate. He appeared more than competent enough in his job to allow Hellkaros to rest for tens of thousands of years.

But he soon shook his head. It was realistically impossible. In order for his dream to materialize, he would have to renounce his position to this human. Or, grant him enough power to serve as his substitute. Neither of those two options was very appealing.

Well, the dragon's soul has the same worth as a rare goldfish ornament to me.

As such, he would just feel slightly regretful about letting the dragon go. There wouldn’t be any significant loss for him. And then what would he get in return? He would be able to get off work and get back his life in the evening.

Gulp. The King of Hell swallowed involuntarily. He would be liberated from his mountain of paperwork. He could throw away his stifling necktie. He could leisurely enjoy a glass of highly acidic juice as he bathed in a volcanic hot spring. After he refreshed himself, he could relax in bed and catch up on the novels, legends, and other tales he missed in the last 670,000 years. At this point in his train of thought, he had found his answer.

Though a part of him was slighted because this Suho seemed to know his needs very well, the suggestion was a very appealing one. And so, at last, the king made a decision.

“All right. I promise.”

“Truly, My Lord?” Lloyd beamed.

“Indeed. I promise to release the soul of Anticus. So, tell me. Tell me the secret to getting off work and away from all my responsibilities.”

“Your Majesty has to trust me with one construction project. That’s all,” Lloyd answered.

“Construction?”

“Yes.”

The king’s grimace deepened. A smile appeared on Lloyd’s mouth.

My plan worked.

Lloyd secretly clenched his fists. Just as he expected, the King of Hell showed a positive response.

I knew this would work. In the end, this exchange is a win for both of us.

The King of Hell could work less and enjoy his evenings when he was off duty. As for Lloyd, he would eventually obtain the funding of Dragon King Verkis, endless treasures, and an extra life by freeing Anticus's soul from Hell.

All of this can happen if I successfully complete one construction project.

Lloyd licked his lips. The sweet life he had dutifully built in his fiefdom would be free from ruin with endless treasures. And he'd be able to enjoy himself more as he'd have one more shot in life. His dream of becoming a happy, carefree bum would come true.

With such ambition in his head, Lloyd spoke, "Let me ask you one question, My King. Is there anyone in Hell who can replace your position as a judge?"

"No, there isn't."

"Then are you unable to get off work because you have too much on your plate?" asked Lloyd.

"No, it is not that." The King of Hell shook his head. "I am the King of Hell and the judge of the deceased. Since I hold the power to bestow judgments on fallen souls, it does not make sense that I cannot get off work because there is too much. I can go home regardless of if I have dozens, hundreds, or even trillions of souls left to judge for the day."

Truly, it was almost impossible to count the number of judgments the King of Hell made in one day. The number of souls from deceased humans only represented a portion of the total number. Along with humans, all the animals and microorganisms on earth also had souls in their own special way. And the souls of these unicellular organisms and bacteria reached astronomical amounts. An astronomical number. Why? 40% of bacteria in the bottom of the ocean were killed by bacteriophage in the sea every day.

"Judging them is easy," the king continued to speak. "Their simple souls don't possess the same flaws as humans. So unlike the complicated human souls that are either sent to Heaven or Hell, these creatures don't require much deliberation. I just need to lump together all their souls for the day and shove them into the Door of Resurrection, which sits at the edge of Hell. To do that, I just need to confer one judgment. However...”

The King of Hell, who lifted his pen, smiled bitterly.

“The problem is transferring the souls from this castle to the very edge of Hell. Wait, did you hear about this on your way here?” asked Hellkaros.

“Yes, I did, to be honest.”

Lloyd nodded. It was true. He heard from Pagenti, the demon Lloyd had thrashed to get to this castle.

“I heard that there’s a huge number of souls that need to be transported, but the road isn’t paved properly yet. I heard that the road cannot be paved because of the lava boiling across the land.”

“Yes, you are right. That is the reason why I am tied to this desk. To be more correct, it is because I supervise it,” corrected the king.

“You are busy because you are setting the transportation route, which changes every day depending on the road conditions.”

The King of Hell heaved a sigh. Since roads melted in lava every day, the transportation route had to be changed accordingly. He had to oversee it in real time and inspect it. His back broke, setting a new transportation route every day, every hour. Nothing changed even when he entrusted the job to the demons under him.

“I get reports almost every minute from the demons in the field pulling the carriage of the souls. Reports that the transportation route is blocked. That it melted in the lava. That the carriage can’t be passed. That a new path must be recommended. But when I do that, a similar report comes up a few minutes later. And then I have to open a new route again. Do you know how many demons are working to drive the carriage? 800,000.”

Lloyd couldn’t say anything. So he kept listening.“It’s a terribly onerous job,” the king went on. “800,00 demons clamor and make reports and demand almost every minute. Plus, the only one who can exert strong control over the demons in Hell is me. No one else. And do you know what happens if I fall behind on my work and the carriage gets delayed? Catastrophe. No questions about that.”

“By that, you mean-”

“If I fail to put the souls of the bacteria in the Door of Resurrection, most of them won’t be able to resurrect when they support the entire ecosystem on this planet. Cell division will stop. More will die, while those coming to life will be few. The microbial food chain will completely break down. Can you guess what the aftermath will be?”

“Well, the entire planet will face massive extinction, I suppose,” postulated Lloyd.

“That’s exactly right. And that is why I’ve been working nonstop for 670,000 years.”

“Um,” mused Lloyd, “then how were things 670,000 years ago?”

“How else? The same as now.”

“The same?”

“My predecessor worked just like I did.”

“Do you mean there was a king before you?” asked Lloyd, slightly befuddled.

“Yes. The previous King of Hell. He eventually committed suicide after struggling with depression from being unable to go home for 38 billion years.”

“...”

Lloyd had no words to say. The smile on the King’s face grew much more bitter.

“That’s what is at stake when you declare that you can solve this problem. So, what project is this? What construction project can solve this awful transportation issue?”

The king’s voice seemed to be laden with bitterness and resentment. Lloyd shuddered at the question.

Woah. I heard that there was an issue transporting souls from Pagenti, but this is...

As the problem was brought to the table, it turned out to be much more serious and risky than Lloyd expected. It was about a delivery system that carried the fate of an entire planet. Well, that didn’t matter to Lloyd. He had tried to find a solution the moment he speculated what the issue was. On his journey to this castle, he searched for and found a solution.

“To dare to tell you the answer, Your Majesty...” Lloyd paused. He then looked up, looking straight into the king. “Why don’t you put up a railroad?”

“A railroad?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded his head.

The king narrowed his eyes. “Railroad? An object that exists in the world of Suho Kim.”

“Oh, yes...” murmured Lloyd, shuddering. The constant mention of his real name agitated him because he kept minding Javier beside him. Lloyd feared that Javier would grow suspicious. But he shook off his feelings of agitation as his attention was needed on more important matters. He was in the process of negotiating with the King of Hell over a construction project. Furthermore, it was almost time for a decision to be made from their negotiation.

Focus.

Lloyd collected his breath. Now was the crucial moment. He had to effectively inform the King of Hell in detail about the ups of putting up a railroad in Hell and how it will solve the soul transportation issue. No, he had to brainwash the king. Really well.

Whew, this is a presentation. Yes. A presentation before a professor.

Every presentation began by hooking the attention of the audience. That required a strong, creative name to gain traction. Finally, having determined his strategy, Lloyd lifted his head. He looked straight into the king's eyes with a confident gaze.

"Allow me to introduce the 'Hell Express 666' project."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 232: Hell Express 666 (2)

The history of the railroad was long. Surprisingly long. Similar to the endless connection of cars in a long train, the history of the railroad was much longer than what people would expect.

It really is. If I date back to the earliest history of railroads, it starts all the way from 600 BC.

Around 600 BC, there was a carriage road on the coast of Corinth, Greece. There was something different about this road compared to most others. The ground on the road had two furrows along it, and the distance between the furrows was identical to the size of carriage wheels. Thus, this road possessed the distinguishing feature of railroads with wheels that traveled along a line of designated tracks.

That's not all. There are other similar cases.

There was another similar case around 400 AD in the Eastern Roman Empire. What was more, a track with buried furrows was even discovered far east of the Eurasia Continent in Ancient China.

It was the Warring State period. The tracks were used to mobilize large crates of supply during these endless days of war. It was also found that each country's tracks had different sizes of wheels to prevent any enemies from using them when they invaded their land.

Just like that, humanity discovered the basic principle behind railroads in their early years of history. When these rudimentary railroad designs met the ripples of industrialization, the modern railroad came about to alter the history of human civilization altogether.

It's the advance guard of industrialization. And the impetus that enabled development along with the large-scale manufacturing industry. It also served as the foundation for war. Railroads can be found anywhere throughout history.

It was true. Humanity enjoyed all sorts of transportation methods, such as cars, ships, airplanes, and many others, but nothing came close to being as efficient as the trains. Cars? Try driving around Seoul, and go figure. For long travel across large towns or cities, most people would prefer taking a subway over a bus. In fact, one would be able to fully experience the comfort of a train by taking a train ride from Seoul to Busan. What about ships?

It can transport large numbers of crates at once. That's a clear advantage. However, a ship is limited by how it can't move without water.

And so, ships couldn't be used as the main method of transportation within a country's border.

The same goes for planes.

First off, it was too expensive. And due to the weight-sensitive nature of airplanes' landing and take-off, it was impossible to carry a lot of cargo at once. Plus, it was vulnerable to storms and other inclement weather conditions. Thus, each transportation method had its ups and downs. However, trains were...

In terms of efficiency, it's almost perfect.

That was what Lloyd believed. Trains could carry large amounts of cargo at once similar to ships. Traffic was not a concern for trains, unlike cars. Trains also didn't stop just because the weather was bad like planes. To top it all off, it was affordable, precise, and massive. These were all large advantages for trains.

"However, the initial costs of building a railroad and its infrastructure are costly, so it's a matter of whether you can afford the price," explained Lloyd.

"Do you mean the price to construct what you called a railroad?" asked the King of Hell.

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded and plastered a confident smile. “But I’m sure the Hell Castle won’t have any problem shouldering the cost.”

“You are right, but...” The king knitted his brows slightly. “Railroad. Efficient transportation. I understand everything. But how do you plan on setting it up here?”

“Do you ask,” Lloyd mused, “because of the flowing lava?”

“Indeed.” The frown on the king’s face deepened. “You said it. The railroad involves processing steel and laying them down on the ground. But the tracks will likely melt before long on the grounds of hell filled with pockets of lava everywhere.”

“Yes, that is certain.” Lloyd’s voice didn’t shake a bit.

“Then you have a plan?”

“Of course.”

“Tell me.”

“It’s a business secret.”

“Not because you lack confidence?”

“If you can’t believe me, then you don’t have to entrust this job with me.”

“...”

The King of Hell, Hellkaros, stared down at Lloyd, trying to make sense of the human in front of him.

Suho Kim.

Hellkaros could see through the core of someone’s soul, so he was somewhat aware of Lloyd’s real identity. At least he knew that Suho Kim belonged to another world and ended up here for some inexplicable reason. So, Hellkaros regarded Suho as a laughable and absurd figure. But at the same time, he was intrigued. Why? While it was laughable that Lloyd was running wild when he was just a soul from another world buttressing the affairs of this world and making such bold conditions for him, it was interesting to hear about this railroad. His interest was piqued.

What he explained... can solve the problem here in Hell.

The King of Hell thought about it. The advantages and disadvantages of the railroad. The issues those advantages could solve.

It's possible. That is if what he said is true.

A train would be formed by lining up hundreds of carts. And to generate power for the train, he simply needed to connect pulleys and levers to the wheels, assigning dozens of demons to push and pull the lever by taking shifts. It'd be like rowing a boat, only with levers. The train would move using the demons' strength.

That would allow me to reduce the number of demons I need while transporting souls. Even with just 8000 demons, I would be able to transport a similar number of souls as now using 80,000 demons.

Hellkaros earnestly did the math. Transporting souls would require much fewer demons. And the leftover demons could maintain the railroad. Even so, there'd still be those who had no work to do.

Then they can assist with my work.

Hell Castle had a plethora of menial jobs inside it. Assisting with the king's judgments. Organizing records of the good and bad deeds of souls. Distributing queue numbers to the souls waiting to be judged. Dividing souls bound for Hell, Heaven, and Purgatory after their verdict.

I'll give those chores to them all. My own workload will also get substantially lighter. I won't have to continually find a new transportation route for those idiotic demons with a reliable railroad. If that happens...

He would be liberated from every single one of his miscellaneous chores. All that was left for him to do was sentence dead souls, a basic task for him. And that meant...

I can get off work.

Thump! Hellkaros's heartbeat vigorously sped up. He could go home. After 670,000 years. Away from his sickening work. He could finally activate the door lock to his house, which still had a protective film on. He could finally open the door to his house, remove his dress shoes, dip himself in a warm lava bath, and binge-watch TV shows with his mana-powered marble. HellTube. Hellflix. Hellcha. Hellver Series.

I've never spent a day of my life like that before.

Gulp. The mere thought of it made his heart thump. It was exhilarating and thrilling to just think about it. And there was one more benefit to this. Liberation from anxiety. A sense of crippling anxiety gripped Hellkaros that he might meet the same fate as his predecessor, who ended his own life from depression after overworking for 3.8 billion years. And there was the despair that such fate was unavoidable. All these years, such feelings haunted him. But now, the dark cloud of anxiety and despair that shrouded his heart for the longest time started to thin out. That was probably why Hellkaros stared at Lloyd differently and why he put on a content smile, unlike a while ago.

"I like that."

"Yes, so that means-"

"Suho Kim, I will trust you and leave the railroad construction to you," announced Hellkaros.

"Thank you!" Lloyd hung his head down. He always welcomed new clients. And now, it was time to...

"Time to sign the construction contract?" Hellkaros asked first.

“My, that would make me the happiest man in the world,” said Lloyd as he smiled and rubbed his hands, inwardly praising the king. He indeed was the icon of fair judgment and negotiation. Lloyd admired how the king first suggested writing a contract even when he didn’t say anything.

This kind of client is so convenient to work with.

Satisfied, Lloyd said, “Oh, there is one thing I must ask of you.”

“Ask of me?”

“Yes, and it’s something essential I need from you for this project.”

“What is it?” asked Hellkaros.

“It’s simple. Please spread the news throughout the land that Lloyd Frontera will be singing at the edge of Hell,” revealed Lloyd.

“Hmm, that won’t be difficult to do. You say this is essential for the construction?”

“Yes, it’s essential to make the construction run smoothly. In the first place, I doubt you have any plans to set aside a group of demon workers for me.”

“That is obvious. The obedient ones are already transporting souls. The others are as good as trash, slacking off and threatening to end their lives should they be put to work. Could you possibly be thinking of trying to use them?”

“Yes, that is what I intend to do.”

“Then I see. I shall send a public announcement throughout Hell,” Hellkaros promised.

“Thank you.”

Everything after that took place smoothly. Lloyd drew up the construction contract like usual. The job was laying the railroad in the areas Hellkaros requested. Then Hellkaros was to release the soul of Anticus after the construction. Those were the terms written in the contract. Since the terms were simple, there weren't any adjustments to make. Once the two checked the content of the contract, each signed and took one copy. That was it.

"Good," said Hellkaros with a smile. "I am glad that we made a final contract, at least. I wasted at least 20 minutes listening to your explanation on the railroad and signing this contract."

"By waste, you mean-"

"That is how long the carriage has been delayed," explained Hellkaros nonchalantly. "And how long the propagation of the microorganisms on earth has been delayed."

"..."

"Let us say the chance for grand extinction on earth has increased by one percent due to the broken microbial ecosystem."

"Eeek," gasped Lloyd.

"It's nothing to be surprised about. Okay, so the contract is made, so I will send you to the construction site right away."

"To the site?"

"Yes. I will get you there right away as you will be wasting time on your travels otherwise."

The King of Hell gestured, and a red ripple appeared. It soon spread and wrapped Lloyd and Javier's bodies.

"You will find yourself at the edge of Hell," explained Hellkaros. "Construct the railroad from there until you get here. Well then, I shall see you again when the railroad is finished."

And with that...

Zap!

“...!”

The red ripple that engulfed them beamed and flashed like an explosion. Everything around them became dark. Lloyd felt like his whole body was floating in the air. After his stomach churned for a moment, he felt his feet touch the strange ground. Thwack!

“Woah.”

Lloyd blinked hard. His whole surrounding had changed after some quick thrashing. The Hell Castle had disappeared from his view along with the King of Hell. To be exact...

“I suppose this is the edge of Hell the king spoke of,” said Javier.

“Yes, I agree.”

Lloyd felt a small rush of relief when he heard Javier beside him.

The king must have transported us here. After all, Hell is his territory.

Lloyd surveyed straight ahead. The ash-covered plain was devoid of even a strand of grass. There was sulfur-scented smoke rising from scattered spots. Lloyd also spotted a lava pond still soft and unhardened. The scenery was Hell itself, desolate and barren. But the opposing side was slightly different.

“I guess this is the edge of Hell,” Lloyd said.

“It appears so, indeed,” Javier seconded.

Lloyd watched the landscape of the edge of Hell. It was an open cliff whose depth couldn’t be measured. There was nothing but a dark void ahead.

I can’t even imagine what would happen if I fell down there.

Lloyd shivered, taking 30 steps back from the cliff, as he resolved to never fall from it. Just then, he heard Javier speak.

“Master Lloyd, I have a question.”

“A question?” Lloyd looked at Javier.

“Yes.”

“What is it?”

“Who is Suho Kim?”

“Cough...! Ergh!” Lloyd spluttered, choking on his own saliva.

“Are you okay, Young Master?” Javier asked with a frown.

“Ah, yeah. My throat got dry. It’s the air here. Terrible.”

“...”

Lloyd feigned and half-joked. But Javier didn’t smile.

“I kept thinking about it, and yet, it is still strange. The king a while ago. The king kept addressing you with a strange name, ‘Suho Kim.’” Javier looked at Lloyd with a curious face.

“Oh, that?” said Lloyd, stressing his voice to sound calm.

“Yes.”

“I know, right? That was just strange. Don’t you think so?” Lloyd said with equal, feigned curiosity in his voice.

“Yes, you clearly have a name. Lloyd Frontera. Then I suppose you are unaware of what that address means to you?”

“Of course, I don’t. How would I know? Well, it’s probably a nickname used in Hell or something,” speculated Lloyd. And he shrugged.

“Is that so?” Javier asked dully.

“Yeah, like I said.”

“I see.”

“Probably?”

Lloyd then plastered a grin, making sure that the corners of his lips didn’t shiver awkwardly and that his thumping heart wouldn’t give him away. He pretended to be ignorant and made an effort to look calm. At the same time, he also didn’t forget to bash the king inwardly.

Shoot. That was close. That King of Hell is so evil. Why did he have to call me by my real name? Goodness.

Lloyd decided that he should meet the king alone next time. Thankfully, Javier had another subject to discuss.

“By the way, I have one more question.”

“What again?”

“How on earth do you plan on constructing a railroad here?”

Javier pointed at the vast land covered with thick volcanic ash and stagnated with lava. The whole place boiled at a massively hot temperature.

“I, too, heard about the railroad when you explained it to the king. So, I have some understanding now. The crux of it was to put up a line of tracks that fit the size of a train’s wheels.”

“You’re right,” agreed Lloyd.

“But now that I see this place, I wonder if the railroad will be safe.”

“Oh, you are right about that, too. It’s truly reasonable that you ask it. Go on.”

“Yes, if we install the railroads made of steel, I think the road will melt because of the heat here. It will become malleable as it melts, and that means the trains will not be able to travel properly,” theorized Javier seriously.

“You are right. Plus, the ground for laying out the railroads will be pretty unstable because there’s lava everywhere,” added Lloyd on top of Javier’s explanation.

Javier frowned. “Then how on earth do you plan on going about the construction?”

“I have a plan.” Lloyd’s assurance, however, meant nothing to Javier.

“Wait, do you plan on scamming against the King of Hell?”

“Whaaat? Scamming the King of Hell?” gasped Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“How little do you think of me?” Lloyd asked with a smile.

Javier, on the other hand, looked grim. He reeled off, “A sly cheat. You are also cheap and rude. Sometimes, I wonder if a pathetic crook who does nothing but scheme like yourself can even be called a human being. Personally speaking.”

“...”

“Am I wrong?” Javier’s face looked innocent.

“You might as well just break one of my bones, you know.” Lloyd shook his head.

“I cannot let that happen,” Javier said defiantly. “Breaking your leg is an act of mutiny and violence.”

“Just so you know, there is this called ‘verbal violence.’”

“That seems to be the field of your expertise,” pointed out Javier.

“My, my. What an absurd remark against my young and innocent soul.”

“I do not know anything about being innocent or fresh, but I do know that you are so lucky with women.”

“Lucky with women? Me?” Lloyd looked at Javier with curiosity.

“Yes.”

“What are you saying?”

“No, sorry, Master Lloyd. I mean out of luck.”

“...”

“Anyway, I see you have a plan for how to build the railroad here.”

“Hey, don’t change the subject after beating me up with your words.”

“But I want to.” Javier shrugged.

“Woah.”

“Can I not change the subject?”

“Fine. Let’s change it. Sure. Haah.”

Lloyd broke into laughter. It was clear to Lloyd that Javier was enjoying this moment, and not enough with that, it was clear that he had not only gotten comfortable serving Lloyd but learned how to enjoy himself doing it.

Dammit. And it’s not like I can strike him.

Lloyd decided inwardly to revenge him hundreds of times more severely someday. He then shifted his focus to the matter at hand.

“So, I guess you want to know how the railroad will be built here?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes, I am.”

“Well, it’s simple.” Lloyd grinned. “First, we need to rally the tens of thousands of unemployed demons living all across Hell,” Lloyd then added, revealing the first step of the plan to build the Hell Express 666.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 233: Demons Must Be Abused (1)

“What? Master Singer Lloyd Frontera is at the center of Hell?”

About ten demons were relaxing in a lava bath in the capital region near the Hell Castle. Among them, one demon created more stress for its parents today as usual. Another one was the cause behind the deepening wrinkles of its parents. The gathered demons placed an immense burden on their parents through various acts of evil. Normally, they boasted about their depravities and exploits to each other, but today was a bit different. There was a more refreshing topic for them to discuss.

“Lloyd Frontera?”

“Wait, the rumored man of Hell’s Singer?”

“I heard Sir Giolexius passed out listening to his singing.”

“Hahaha. How could he not?” The one-horned demon, who brought the news to the group, grinned. “You all felt it. How the gate of Hell opened up.”

“Oh, yes, I did.”

“Then you must have felt that very man we are praising set his foot inside Hell.”

“That I did, too. But you’re saying he’s at the center of Hell?”

“Yeah.” The one-horned demon nodded. “I guess you’re slow to the news? The King of Hell announced it this morning.”

“Is that actually true?”

“Of course.”

“Really?”

“Do you really think I’d lie about an announcement from the king?”

“Well. You wouldn’t.”

“Of course not. So, trust me.”

“Good. I will trust you. So, let’s go hear the master sing! To the edge of Hell!”

“But I just said that Lloyd Frontera is at the center of Hell,” the one-horned demon corrected.

“That’s why we’re heading to the edge.”

“Why?”

“Think in my shoes. Will you trust every word you say if you were me?”

“...”

“Let’s go! To the end!”

All of the demons chilling in the lava bath jumped to their feet and set on the journey to the edge after packing up. But this instance didn’t take place only here. All sorts of demons learned about Lloyd’s news near the castle, on the side of a nameless volcano, and in Purgatory. And everyone began to travel to the end of Hell with one purpose in mind.

He is said to be the master in singing. And everyone praises him. So I’ve got to check how awful his singing is. And if his singing is even slightly different from the rumor...

The demons vowed to hurl insults at him. Nitpick even the slightest fault. Lay into him to the point he’d want to die. They resolved to destroy Lloyd’s reputation as the master of singing because he was better than all of them for no reason. A man unqualified like him must be brought to the ground to make them feel better even a little. They decided to pull his hair and make him fall.

Wahaha. Get ready.

The demons evilly waited for the opportunity to come. Lloyd Frontera? Hell's voice? The singer of the century? Their stomachs flipped every time they heard those rumors. They couldn't wrap their heads around why a man, who seemed to be mediocre just like them, should be respected and praised. They were much better than a puny man like Frontera. It was just evident that this moronic world didn't recognize their talents. All they needed was one chance, and they could be more famous than this Lloyd. That was the only explanation behind their misfortune and lack of fame. Some day, they'd rise above their current position and show their true talents. But first, it required dragging down this undeservingly respected man and making one thing right in their idiotic world. All of them had the same thought, each engulfed by a wave of jealousy, competitiveness, and envy. Over 30,000 unemployed demons rushed to the end of Hell.

When Javier saw the spectacle of demons gathering around, he gasped, "Is... this why you asked the King of Hell to cooperate?"

"Yeah, of course." Lloyd nodded.

"Did you see this from the start?"

"Yeah, of course."

Standing on top of a sharp rock, Lloyd shrugged as he looked down at the 30,000 demons assembled below the rock.

Perfect.

This was beyond his expectation. It was a great success. He smiled satisfyingly like a farmer during harvest season, as he looked at the crowd.

"Think about it," Lloyd continued, "where are we?"

"Hell."

"How do you think demons would react when they hear the news of a famous and acclaimed man?"

“Did you think they’d be jealous and envious?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, you are correct.” Lloyd chuckled. “I figured that they’d run down here to slander me. The result is this.”

Lloyd pointed at the plain.

Woooo! 30,000 demons responded when they saw Lloyd’s gesture. Their rough cry filled the plain. First, they yelled out whatever they wanted until sometime later, their shouts evolved into one unified cry.

“Sing a song! Now!”

Their urge was threatening, and their gaze was hostile. The energy in the demon crowd grew fiercer. Lloyd smiled meaningfully as he looked at them from above. He cupped his hands together and pressed them to his mouth. Then activated the Asrahan Core Technique. The sound of his dry cough was amplified about ten times louder than normal through his hand trumpet and rang aloud across the plain.

“Hmm! Hmm! Ehem!”

The moment the noise hit their ears, the loud clamoring in the plain deafened as every demon shut their mouth. Tens of thousands of gazes focused on Lloyd. They waited in anticipation for Lloyd to sing and hoped to nitpick his skill. When their desire and anticipation reached their peak, Lloyd put on a mischievous smile.

“Come on, did you guys gather here because you thought I’d sing for you?”

“...!”

Everyone flinched. Lloyd continued to speak in a nonchalant manner.

“But I don’t want to sing for you!”

“...”

“Why should I do that?” Lloyd raised his hands, his palms looking up.

“...”

“Any strong reason why I should sing for you?” Lloyd’s voice was now brazen.

“That’s nonsense!” One of the one-horned demons yelled, provoked. “We traveled all the way to this place! To hear you sing!”

“Sure, but so?”

“And you won’t sing? That’s not making any sense!” The demon cried out again.

“Oh, yes, it does.”

“What...?”

“Why should I sing just because you all gathered here?” Lloyd asked back with a smug smile.

“B-but still!” the same demon replied, not knowing what to say. “The King of Hell made the announcement that you’ll sing here!”

“Yeah. But I just canceled it.”

“...”

“You guys are so pathetic for gathering up here just to hear a song that won’t help your life at all. Don’t you think so? Everyone must have a lot of free time.”

‘“...”

“And besides, did I make a promise that I’d do it?” defended Lloyd. “No, I didn’t. So, why are you demanding for me to sing? I decide whether I want to sing or not. That’s my decision. Don’t you agree?”

“...”

“So, I’m not singing,” announced Lloyd.

“No! But still!”

“You think this is unfair?”

“Of course!” One of them yelped.

“Then let’s just say I scammed you all.”

“...”

“Oh, wait, will that make you feel worse?”

“...”

Rage boiled in their hearts. They glared up at Lloyd, their gaze holding a glint of anger. If they could, they wanted to rip this human into pieces. But that wasn’t possible because of the silver-haired knight by his side, who had taken down the commander of the 1st Corps, Hell’s Knight. Come at him, and ordinary demons like them would get slaughtered even if there were thousands or tens of thousands of them. Knowing this, Lloyd laughed at the demons shaking in anger.

“Is there something else I can help everyone with? Or can you all just not bring yourself to leave? I’m going to leave now to do something much more important than entertaining this crowd here. If you have a problem with it, then fight me. Or else, piss off to where you came from and honor your parents.”

“...”

The demons silently seethed in anger. Leaving them alone, Lloyd walked down to the other end of the rock. Javier, who was waiting for him down here, frowned at Lloyd. His face showed signs of concern, which was unlike him.

“Um, Master Lloyd.”

“Eh? Why?”

“You rallied the demons in one place with the cooperation of the King of Hell,” he reminded, his voice still concerned.

“Yeah, uh-huh.” Lloyd nodded, picking up his ears.

“Then why did you treat them like that?”

“Hm?”

“We are not getting anything by treating them so heartlessly and coldly.”

“You think so?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes, I thought... that you would win their hearts with that awful singing of yours.”

“Then I’d use them as my workers?”

“Yes, so I am worried.”

“What are you worried about?”

“That they would hold hostile feelings against you and try to disturb our work.”

“Yeah, they definitely will.” Lloyd clapped his hands.

“Excuse me?”

“I said, they will definitely do it.”

“Then why did you still-”

“Do what I did?” put in Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“So that they’d disturb my work. That’s how I’ll get things moving.”

“Excuse me?”

“There’s no time to explain. Let’s get to work. Follow me.”

Lloyd motioned to Javier, who was still in a state of confusion. He took them to an area near the edge of Hell that he had eyed in advance. It was an open space with a boiling lava pond on one side.

“Okay, time to shovel.”

Thwack! Lloyd handed over a foldable shovel after bringing it out from his backpack. And he grabbed another one. Javier cocked his head to the side.

“Are you going to dig here?” asked Javier.

“Yes.”

“But for what?”

“Hunting.”

“Excuse me?”

“Hoards of hunting game will barge in this place for a few days.”

“Hunting-”

“Don’t worry about it. The hunting games will provide us with the key material for this project.”

“...”

Javier stared at Lloyd with a strange gaze, thinking to himself that Lloyd was truly a mysterious man he couldn’t understand. He even wanted to look into this young master’s head if he could. The smile Lloyd made as he looked at Javier was equally mysterious. It was as if he had already foreseen the future.

“Don’t look at me like that.”

“...”

“I’m not a prophet, and none of my ancestors were a fortuneteller. What I’m doing purely came from racking my head and thinking ahead.”

“...”

“So, come and dig now.”

“Yes.”

Javier couldn’t put a finger on what was going on and what was to happen. But he could suppose one thing.

Master Lloyd must know a lot more about Hell than other people.

Javier had the thought on his way to meet the King of Hell and saw Lloyd conversing with him. And right now, he could feel Master Lloyd knew something about Hell that no one else did.

But...

Whatever that was, he decided to trust his young master. At least he wasn’t the type of person to harm others. He held a history of devoting himself to the fiefdom and the people around him. So, Javier decided to trust him once more and dutifully followed his instructions.

“Do I have to dig according to the construction guideline?”

“Of course.”

Bzzt! In no time, the Construction Guideline was marked on the ground in detail. From that moment, Javier and Lloyd dug over and over again without ever getting exhausted. Javier’s dug with the power of a grandmaster. On top of the two, Ppodong and Hamang joined their efforts, so they were able to dig up a massive cave in only a few hours. Overall, the cave was shaped like a large gourd. The diameter of the opening was about 32 feet, and the slope of the passage that led from the opening was about 60 degrees in angle. At the end of the passage, which extended about 320 feet, sat a huge room. The depth, width, and height were 262, 656, and 164 feet, respectively. Lloyd then built a cozy tub at the center of the room and filled it up with the help of Hamang.

“Hamang! Hamamang!”

Slurp! As luck would have it, there was a boiling hot spring nearby, and Hamang gulped the hot spring as he blew on it as if he was drinking a cup of hot coffee. Then he carried the water from the hot spring into the tub. When it was done, Ggoming was next to take action.

“Ggoming,” called Lloyd.

“Ggoming?”

“Do you like taking baths?”

“Ggoming!”

“I see, you don’t like them very much.”

“Ggomiming!”

“Hmm, but you know what? I’ve been seeing fleas in your feathers lately.”

“Ggoming?”

“You should wash yourself, right?”

“G-ggoming!”

“Yes, good. Thank you for making a good choice. Time to dive in. ”

“Ggoming...!”

Splash! Ggoming jumped into the hot spring. At first, he seemed to loathe it, but when the water soaked his body, the muscles around his face relaxed in ease.

“Ggo, Ggomiming...”

“Are you enjoying yourself?” asked Lloyd.

“Ggomiming...”

“Good, I’m glad. Since you like it so much, let’s leave you in there for around ten hours.”

“Ggoming...?”

“That’s how we can make a good stock.”

“...”

From then on, Ggoming stayed in the hot spring for ten consecutive hours. The water didn’t even get cold as the ground was full of heat. As a result, his prolonged stay in the water caused his feet to unreservedly swell. And soon, thanks to Ggoming’s sacrifice, the hot spring water turned into parrotbill stock.

“Ehem, that smells good.”

Lloyd carefully scooped the hot spring water, making sure that he didn’t spill a single drop. Then he sprayed it all around the entrance and passage of the cave. At last, Lloyd smiled with a glow of satisfaction, revealing all of his teeth.

“Whew, it’s done.”

A cave instead of a glass bottle trap. Parrotbill stock instead of chicken stock for bait. With that, everything was all set. He was ready to acquire a bulk of essential materials for the construction in one go. This special material that didn’t melt or bend under the lava was meant to stabilize and support the surface of the railway’s subbase and was used to build rails and ties on top of the layer at the same time. Now, the time had come to hunt lava centipedes who would bring countless pissed-off demons to where he was.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 234: Demons Must Be Abused (2)

Fwoooosh! Hiss! 200 legs rippled and whisked the lava, and the centipede went up to the ground and made its long body move forward.

Splash! A giant lava centipede came out of the lava lake. Its body was 98 feet long and about 3 feet wide. Truly, this centipede was a huge one, and its temper was extremely foul.

Swish! Hiss! It let out a deathly sound the moment it set foot on the ground, ready to bite and rip apart anything bothersome in sight with its huge jaw. However, contrary to the angry centipede, the demon on the centipede's back grinned in contentment.

Wahaha. This is what I'm talking about!

The one-horned demon flashed an evil smile, and a surge of conviction rose in its heart.

"A thick shell that can't be melted by the hottest lava! A jaw that can penetrate the sturdiest of armor! And the strength to crush a boulder in one stomp! We have gathered 30,000 creatures who possess all these features! Mwahaha!" the demon cried out triumphantly.

"Wahahahaha!" another joined in its cry.

"Die, Lloyd Frontera!"

"Let's end him, the master singer!"

"Hell's Singer? I will give you a taste of Hell!"

"Arghh!!"

At the one-horned demon's shout, the rest of the 30,000 demons followed suit, and 30,000 centipedes beneath them hissed. 30,000 demons and lava centipedes. They created a stately atmosphere as they charged forward. The entire lava pond turned black as they marched, crushing and flattening the basalt boulders with their movements. All the creatures of Hell whose homes resided in their pathway hid themselves in fear.

It made sense. Demons were undoubtedly an unnerving force, but the lava centipedes were ghastly creatures, predators in the ecosystem of Hell. Their shell was so thick and hard that not even hot lava could melt it down. And their body reached from 65 to 98 feet in length. On top of everything, no creature in the lava pond could dare put up a fight against them due to their foul temper. Yet the demons had gathered up 30,000 of these horrifying predators. It wasn't an understatement to say they had brought with them the entire centipede population to Hell.

But I don't care!

The one-horned demon leading at the front of the march of 30,000 centipedes thought to itself.

He insulted us! How dare he insult us demons when he's just a human!

Its fist violently shivered at that thought. The demon felt a pang of shame. It had tried to nitpick the human and leave a dent in his reputation as the master singer. It had rushed to the edge of the Hell full of anticipation and dreams. But when it got there, the demon realized Lloyd had tricked all of them, asking why he must sing for the crowd. And he even acknowledged his hustling, bestowing a blessing for them to honor their parents instead of wasting their time with him.

That was more insulting!

Insulted. Humiliated. The mockery was something it could never forget. It wanted revenge. That was why it cooperated with the other demons and spent over 15 days rallying together all the lava centipedes in hell!

"What do we want?!" the one-horned demon roared.

"To humiliate Lloyd Frontera!"

“Or give him death!”

“Let’s end him!”

The one-horned demon cried out first, and 29,999 demons answered in unison. All the demons were convinced of one thing.

We’ll win this fight! No matter what!

After all, the legion of 30,000 lava centipedes was more than enough to take Lloyd down, even if he had that extremely powerful knight standing next to him.

Even Hell’s Knight, who commands the Corps in Hell, can only fight about 1,000 centipedes by itself!

That was the case for Giolexius, better known as Hell’s Knight, whom Lloyd and Javier defeated. Giolexius was the commander of the 1st Corps, which meant it was considerably stronger than the other knights in Hell. There was one time it faced 1300 lava centipedes by itself. That was its limit. Given that, 30,000 lava centipedes would easily destroy them, even if Lloyd Frontera sang an awful song and Javier Asrahan wielded his powerful sword.

Hahaha. Even if they had taken down Hell’s Knight, they’re still humans in the end. How strong could they possibly get during that short time? There will be no mercy for them. I’ll sit back and enjoy the show as those bugs beg for their lives!

Kaboom! At last, the 30,00 demons and lava centipedes arrived at the edge of Hell, and their eyes eagerly searched for the despicable human who caused them great humiliation. But...

“Where is he?”

Lloyd was missing from the scene. They scoured the area and searched for him in every direction around them. They even poked their heads into volcano craters, and yet, Lloyd Frontera was still nowhere to be found.

“Could it be that he ran away?” One of them postulated.

“No way!”

They were feeling flustered when...

Hiss? All of the lava centipedes flinched and shuddered in unison. Soon, they jerked their heads up and shook their antennas.

“Eh? What are they doing?”

The one-horned demon cocked its head. It considered the centipede’s behavior insignificant at first. But that turned out to be untrue. Gradually, the centipedes stopped listening. They began to ignore all of the demon’s orders and move on their own.

“Eh?! Eh?” The demon squealed.

It yelped at one of them to stop, but it was no use. In no time, the centipede dashed toward one direction with its antenna moving in alert, as though a tasty prey was waiting there. It aggressively charged forward in full force. Swish! Swoosh!

“Eek? Ack! What’s wrong with you?!”

The one-horned demon was flustered. But the situation didn’t end there. All the other centipedes nearby were the same, escaping the demon’s control and dashing toward a single place. The reason behind their sudden change was simple. A mouthwateringly appetizing scent was coming from this specific direction.

Hiss! Their antennas trembled in sheer excitement but didn’t know why. It was that smell. The scrumptious smell stimulated their instincts. It was like the smell of chicken stock! As soon as the scent enamored their noses, their whole body quivered. They yearned to soak themselves in this smell! Thus, they dashed in search of the slowly intensifying aroma, crossing a plain of volcanic ash and crushing any boulders in their way until they discovered a cave.

Hiss! They were certain. The rich aroma of stock was coming from a deep underground cave in this direction. The voices of the demons that were leading the centipedes fell on deaf ears.

“Hey! Stop! I said, stop! Hey!”

Hiss! They made for the cave right away, ignoring the demons’ yelling. As they crawled further down, their antennas became captivated by the aroma of stock that intensified the deeper they went in. In response, they ran forward in a frenzy. There was no way for them to stop. And finally, the moment they entered the innermost part of the cave, something came into view.

“Ggoming?”

It was a giant parrobill taking a bath, the bird’s feathers seemingly expanded from soaking in the water for several long hours. Besides the bird, there was a human who grinned as he scooped the hot bath water into a bucket.

“See? I told you they’d come.” The centipedes looked toward where the human directed his words, and they saw a silver-haired knight sitting down without a trace of surprise in his gaze. He was simply staring back at them with keen eyes like a butcher looking at a new slab of meat. Then they saw his hands move slowly. He was sharpening a sword on a whetstone.

Hiss...? The centipedes shuddered at the unexpected turn of events.

***

The hunt was a success. All 30,000 centipedes were taken care of, and every one of the 30,000 demons was captured. He used a very systematic process to make this happen.

Hiss? The moment the lava centipede at the very front flinched, Javier’s sword flashed in the air. With that, the centipede’s final fate was set in stone.

Slash! Scores of aura strands enveloped the bug's entire body, immediately cutting and dissecting its back, stomach, antenna, and legs in equal parts. The inside of the shell was chopped up into a smaller size that was easily transportable. This whole process took only an exact 0.2 seconds. By the time the rays of aura subsided, the lava centipede was neatly diced into pieces and ready to be put away. As for the one-horned demon on its back, Lloyd took care of it. He only needed to say one thing.

"Lower your stupid head."

"Yes, Master Lloyd."

Drop! Reading the room in a flash, the demon pelted to the corner and shoved its head against the ground, hands behind its back. It cried while consoling itself that at least the horn jutting from its forehead made it easier to find balance while its head was pressed into the ground. Meanwhile, the hunt continued.

Hiss?! When the next centipede entered the cave, drawn inside by the smell of parrotbill stock...

Slashh! Javier's aura flashed in the air without fail.

Thwop! The remaining demon dropped its head to the ground just like the first one. Meanwhile, Ppodong became busy with moving the centipede shells and soft tissue pieces expertly dismembered by Javier to ensure the cave would remain clean and the hunt would go on smoothly. He transferred the centipede remains to the exit opposite the entrance. And just like that, the hunt continued for the rest of the day. The demons outside tried to stop the centipedes when they figured out what was going on, but it was no use. Completely blinded by the intoxicating aroma of parrotbill stock, the bugs bolted right into Lloyd's trap without any care.

They entered the trap one after another, and Javier cut into them in consecutive order. Through this process, it took them a total of eight days to complete their hunt. All 30,000 centipedes were methodically dismembered into equal-sized pieces and put away. Their remains were stored in Lloyd's makeshift supply warehouse. Every single one of the 30,000 demons was captured alive, and they all kneeled across the vast plain of volcanic ash.

“Mwhahahaha.”

“...”

“Hahaha. Mwhahahahaha.”

“...”

Lloyd’s eerie laughter filled the land. The demons swallowed dryly as they heard the ominous noise coming from him.

What’s going to happen to us now?

Everyone was filled with anxiety. It was understandable, considering the demons never imagined that the 30,000 lava centipedes they had ambitiously rallied would powerlessly get sliced into pieces. They didn’t foresee that Lloyd would set such a trap for them either. The fact that the silver-haired knight with him had risen above the status of a sword master was an even greater surprise to them. Not a single one of the demons ever thought they would be captured alive as they were currently.

Ha. My life as a demon. I should’ve led a trashier life.

The one-horned demon heaved a big sigh. It would’ve lived a more evil life had it known that this was how everything would end. It should have committed more wrongdoings without leaving behind any regrets instead of doing a half-assed job. But life was short and regret always came too late.

“Hey, you there,” called Lloyd.

Step. Lloyd approached the one-horned demon, and he looked down at it.

“I heard you incited all of these guys to move,” added Lloyd.

“...”

The one-horned demon kept its head low.

“So, isn’t it only right for you to be punished?” Lloyd spoke with a slightly raised voice.

“...”

Punish me or do whatever you want. You’re going to eventually kill me anyway. Why keep wasting your breath? The demon waited for its incoming death. But what Lloyd said afterward caught it by slight surprise.

“From now on, you won’t be able to die even if you want to. I’ll abuse you until you beg me to kill you instead.”

“Excuse me...?” the demon gasped and lifted its head in sheer confusion. Then it saw. It saw the smile of an evil employer who was hell-bent on abusing his workers in the most merciless and cruel way possible.

“Excuse me, my ass,” Lloyd huffed. “You’re going to work. I’m holding you captive right now.”

“...”

“So, you guys are my slaves from now on. Do you not understand what’s happening?”

“Um... then...”

“Yeah, ask your question,” allowed Lloyd.

“Are you not going to kill us?” the demon asked hopefully.

“Why would I kill you?” Lloyd tilted his head and beamed, wondering why on earth it was asking such a foolish question. “Don’t you agree that it’s a loss for me if I kill those I can abuse to near death?”

“...”

“So, why would I kill you? I can’t be bothered to, and it’s unnecessary.” Lloyd shook his head.

“...”

“If you have a death wish, then die from overwork. That’ll be the only way you can die from this moment onward.”

“...”

Kill me now instead, thought the one-horned demon as a shiver went down its shoulders. However, Lloyd’s smile was completely devoid of mercy, and correspondingly, there wasn’t an employment contract between them either.

I’m dealing with demons here.

Obviously, Lloyd wouldn’t be creating a contract. There also wouldn’t be any proper treatment or wages given to the workers. The reason was simple.

These guys are quite literally demons. If I treat them with kindness, they’ll take advantage of me. That’s the way of life in Hell.

Being kind caused more harm than good. Following the rules brought trouble to your door. Those were the rules of thumb in Hell. And since Lloyd was in Hell, he decided to do what demons do. He vowed to try his best to adhere to local customs this time around.

And my plan worked perfectly.

It wasn’t just a simple success. It was a grand success. Spreading a rumor through the King of Hell. Humiliating the demons after they gathered around him. Lloyd expected them to react poorly to his plan.

It’s just the nature of demons. They always pay back their grudges. And if the one that brought their wrath is someone superior to them, there’s no way they’d just let them off without a fight.

Lloyd predicted that they would pour all their efforts and resources into getting revenge. His prediction was on point. The demons rushed here with the strongest creature they could control in Hell, the lava centipede.

The lava centipede made a short appearance in the novel.

As the name suggested, these centipedes lived in lava ponds. And so, their shells didn't melt in lavas. Not only that but since their shells were big and pleasing to look at, Lloyd believed they would become a key material in building the railroad tracks.

Moreover, there are 30,000 of them. This will be enough.

The foundation for the railroad. The railroad bed is on top of the foundation. And the railroad tie and rail that will be installed along the bed. Lloyd was able to obtain every material required to build those from the centipede. As luck would have it, he held plenty of experience when it came to catching centipedes. Where? In the military. How? By becoming a dutiful SCV of the administrative NCO.

Ha. Thinking about it pisses me off to this day.

At that time, the NCO was interested in healthy foods, and that could probably explain the two-week centipede hunt. He had to become a hunting specialist when the sergeant heard about the health benefits of drinking alcohol infused with centipedes.

I learned from that experience. Pour chicken stock into a plastic bottle, and just wait until the centipedes crawl into it. Then zap! Seriously, I was like a ginseng digger or a pest controller.

Anyway, thanks to his experience, Lloyd was able to successfully catch and kill lava centipedes and acquire 30,000 demon slaves. As he delved more into his accomplishment, the corners of his lips rose into an evil smirk.

"By the way, just to clarify, the stuff about safety first and whatnot? You can forget it. And obviously, there's no wage or additional stipend. Got it? If you have a problem, try breaking through Javier's watch and run away," Lloyd growled.

“…”

The one-horned demon and the others thought inwardly that this human was quite charming, in the sense that he was evil.

Ugh... I can’t fall for him... But he’s respectable!

Now, as Lloyd treated the demons, he was transformed into an unprecedentedly evil employer. And before he knew it, 30,000 demons were deeply impressed by his merciless attitude.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 235: Demons Must Be Abused (3)

Hell strangely reminded Lloyd of Seoul. It was especially so now as Lloyd flew around the area on Ggoming's back.

Survey.

[Scanning will begin.]

Lloyd's gaze traveled down, and beneath the wide-spread Ggoming's wings, he saw the whole land span out.

"..."

Of course, Hell was different from Seoul. There were active volcanos erupting everywhere with pools of ketchup-like lava spilled out of their sides. The air surrounding him was full of heat. One glance around and the whole landscape didn't have any resemblance to the capital of Korea.

Yet, there is one similarity. It's that it's hard to breathe.

Volcanic ash flew everywhere in the air, reminding Lloyd of Seoul's fine dust. And the musty scent of sulfur reminded him of the gas from a car engine exhaust. But then, of course, this place was 30, 40, or possibly 50 times more deadly and pungent than Seoul.

But it's making me a bit nostalgic.

Lloyd wondered whether the woman in the first-floor gimbap restaurant in his room rental was doing well. Was the manager, who used to pick on him from time to time but took care of him, still struggling to pass the civil service examination?

Ah. Stop thinking about it.

Any further thoughts would just bring strange emotions to him. He wondered if he was starting to lose it as he was romanticizing this terrible place with a twinge of nostalgia. Pulling himself together, Lloyd focused on surveying.

The terrain of the land isn't too rough to my relief, ignoring the lava.

He was currently surveying a plain here. The topography of Hell was surprisingly sleek. There weren't any excessively steep or jagged mountains. It was hard to find sharp cliffs and basins as well. Instead, the most common terrain was a flatland abundant with volcanic ash.

It must be due to all the volcanic activity.

There wasn't any time for the mountains to become taller. The volcanoes erupted and crumbled as soon as they showed signs of growing. The basins and valleys, even if they existed, were quickly filled with lava and volcanic ash. Because of these reasons, the overall terrain was flat. It seemed the construction would go fairly smoothly, thanks to it.

We don't have to dig any tunnels through mountains to lay the railroad or bridges over the valleys.

Just one straight railroad on the flatland. But what about hundreds of lava ponds intermittently spread throughout the whole place?

Just have to evade them with skill.

Just like that, Lloyd surveyed the flatland of Hell, never forgetting to look 16 feet underground as well. He meticulously studied the areas with relatively lesser volcanic ash and without lava influx. And he connected them in one route, which extended gradually from the edge of Hell to the Hell Castle, reaching 68 miles in total. And then he came back to the edge and arrived at the camp where he imprisoned the demon slaves.

Haah.

Lloyd hopped off Ggoming's back and shook his head. He had missed sleep for three days straight, having to tightly tense his eyes and focus on surveying with the help of the Asrahan Core Technique. Although he was able to acquire the data for the entire route of the railroad, Lloyd felt a heavy weight of fatigue as if his eyes were soaked in cement.

“You are here,” said Javier when he saw Lloyd.

“I am here. Can I have some water?”

“Here it is.”

Lloyd gulped down the lukewarm hot spring water Javier held out. Just then, he became curious.

“Hey.”

“Yes.” Javier looked at Lloyd.

“I hope you didn’t desperately sit out here all day until I came back.”

“Please do not say such chilling words,” snapped Javier with a slight frown. “Of course, I did not.”

“Then how did you come out knowing I arrived?”

“I just felt it,” Javier replied.

“You felt it?” Lloyd arched his brow.

“Yes, since about five minutes ago.”

“Could you mean...”

“Yes, you are most likely right,” affirmed Javier. “I heard Sir Ggoming’s fluttering his wings.”

“...”

“That is how I realized you returned and thus came out to escort you.”

“...”

“Why are you not saying anything?” Javier’s gaze was fixed on Lloyd. He was confused.

“...”

“Master Lloyd?” Javier called.

“Yeah,” Lloyd blurted, blinking.

“What are you doing? You are staring at me without saying anything.”

“Oh, did you not hear my voice?”

“Excuse me?” Javier retorted.

“I was mumbling something very softly. I was badmouthing you.”

This time, it was Javier who didn’t respond.

“You didn’t hear what I said, right?”

“I do not wish to know what you said about me. However...”

“However what?” hurried Lloyd.

“At the very least, I know that those ill-spoken words contain your envy toward me.”

“What did you say?”

“I am taller than you,” stated Javier with a smug.

“...”

“And as for my face? There’s no comparison between us.”

“...”

“Swordsmanship, too.”

“...”

“Moreover, I am a better singer than you.”

“Wait!” Javier’s provocation invited Lloyd to stop him right there. “But I’ve never seen you sing before up to now.”

“No matter what, even if I lose my vocal cords or sing with my toenail, I am confident that I can sing better than you.”

“...”

And Javier smirked, looking straight into Lloyd’s eyes.

“...”

What is this feeling? Lloyd wondered. He felt like he just fired a plastic bullet, only to be shot back with an explosive cannonball. Lloyd shook off this growing feeling of shame with a wry laugh.

“Well, anyway, how were the demons while I was gone?” Lloyd asked, regaining composure.

“They were relatively well-mannered.”

“Really?” That was a surprise, Lloyd thought as he chuckled. “I expected them to come up with all sorts of tricks and schemes to get out of here.”

“Of course,” affirmed Javier, “they tried the very first day you left to survey.”

“They did?”

“Yes, there was one that tried to sneak out of the camp, and another attempted to raise a riot by stirring up the other demons.”

“So?” Lloyd asked. “Were you able to suppress them all?”

“Yes.”

“You didn’t kill them, did you?”

“No. However...” A faint smile spread across Javier’s face. “I had a little fun with them.”

“You had fun with them?” Lloyd lifted his brows.

“Yes, I had been curious about what style of swordsmanship was popular in Hell.”

“...”

“I was very curious, but not anymore.”

“...”

What a terrifying and dreadful bastard. Lloyd inwardly paid tribute to the demons who became Javier’s training partners and were endlessly abused.

“Good job,” Lloyd sincerely encouraged Javier, “Keep abusing them.”

“Are you serious?”

“Of course I am. Set the order right when you have the chance.”

Javier seemed pleased to hear that. “For how long should I do it?”

“Until I am done with designing, and we start the construction.”

“Understood.”

From that day onward, Lloyd busied himself with designing while Javier focused on abusing the demons. As days progressed, the planning sheet for design became jam-packed with construction plans. And the demons were put to intense training at Javier’s command. This prompted the demons to make an earnest prayer in their hearts.

Ha... Ha! Whew! Ha... Please finish the construction design or whatever it is faster!

At Javier’s command, they rolled forward. And rolled backward. When they moved the wrong way, they were forced into a fierce one-on-one sword fight with the grandmaster.

And so, Lloyd gradually completed his design as the demons sweated buckets from their raid training. He then drew up an overall track plan and conducted a field survey following what he wrote. After drawing the track plan on a 1/50,000 scale, he worked on the cross-section plan after cutting the track every 164 feet. Lastly, he conducted the conclusion survey, and the final process, and then drew another track plan. This time, it was 1/1,000 in scale. That was the basic design process, and it was comparatively simple as the train wouldn’t stop at any station.

I’m done.

After organizing the cross-sectional track plan in 65 feet intervals, he smiled contently. The design was finally finished, but it wasn’t the time to celebrate. With the completed plan, it was time to jumpstart the construction. So, Lloyd knuckled down with the railroad construction, and his evil instinct as an employer shined out of him.

“Over there! Group 11! I can see your shovel! Group 13! Didn’t I tell you to dig up a new lava path before the day is over?! Group 14! Why are you taking a break when I never permitted you one?”

This construction project involved building a roadbed at the edge of Hell. A roadbed was a sort of passage that was built for railroads to be laid out on. It was a common sight to see trains traveling on slightly elevated ground instead of ordinary land. That was a roadbed, to put it simply.

Roadbeds are important. They serve as the basis for all railroads and should be well-built. That way, a railroad can stay stable and won’t get waterlogged or sink down.

Lloyd chose to use sand piles for most of the roadbeds. It was an inevitable choice given the lava-filled environment of Hell.

It’s an obvious choice. There’s no way to know when the lava will overflow.

Of course, the centipede shells that would be used for the railroad didn’t melt. But as for the ground underneath, that was another problem.

To give a description, this area is similar to a swamp. The difference is the flowing lava in the ground, which is much stickier than water.

What would happen if the lava flowed over the railroad? It could lose a rail or tie from the lateral pressure as a result. Even if that didn’t happen by pure luck, the lava covering the railroad could also become a problem by solidifying. In any case, an uncontrolled lava flow would wreak havoc and halt the train operation.

So, the roadbed has to be sufficiently elevated.

Lloyd elevated the bed as high as he could to ensure that it would prevent most flows of lava from reaching the railroad. To his relief, Lloyd had plenty of material to build the bed. The volcanic ash was piled all around the area.

“Hey! I can see your shovels! What did I tell you about flattening volcanic ash with your shovels?” bawled Lloyd.

“Spray on the hot spring water until it gets sticky. Then tap down!”

The demons in the construction site yelled in unison.

“You told us to tap as fast as we can until our shovels turn into a blur!”

“Yes, that’s right!” Lloyd cried out. “I told you. Tap! Tap!”

“Yes!”

“Then why am I seeing shovels?”

The demons didn’t know what to say to that.

“Tap until your shovels can’t be seen!” screamed Lloyd. “Tap until your eyelashes and nose hairs sway! Tap down until your shoulders fall off!”

“Yes, Master!” The demons yelled. Everyone was on the verge of collapsing from exhaustion. But Lloyd didn’t give any mercy to them. No, the more tired they became, Lloyd pushed them to work even harder. Of course, they didn’t get to get off work either.

Huff, huff! “H-help me...”

“Argh... I am thirsty... I want a glass of strawberry lava juice...”

“Uh... When did we start working?”

“About ten days ago, I think...”

“And we never took a single break? Is this for real?”

“It’s real... I think...”

“Just kill us now.”

“Eh, die alone, leave me out of it...”

“What did you say?”

The demons, at times, lamented their own misfortune. Otherwise, they let off steam by lashing out at each other. But all of them worked diligently, following Lloyd's instructions without any complaint. Why?

“Whew, but you know that human, Lloyd Frontera. I feel a bit drawn to him the more time I spend experiencing his evilness.”

“What?” a demon gasped. “Are you nuts?”

“Come on. That’s the truth. Who would have known he’d work us so hard like this?”

“Well, that’s true, but-”

“Hey, that’s why you’re not even trying to run away.”

“Hey!” the accused demon shouted defensively. “I tried once and almost got killed!”

“So what? It’s not like you to stop after just one near-death escape.”

“...”

“See? You do have a good impression of him.”

“What do you mean? I made a good impression? On him?”

“Yeah.”

“What impression?”

Lloyd’s fan arched his brows. “You want to learn his evil and sly ways of life. Like I do.”

“...”

“Ha... To be honest, I don’t want to do this. Dammit, I’m a demon for Pete’s sake. I hate admiring a human’s evilness and pettiness and wanting to learn from him. But…” The grumbling demon heaved a sigh, “I still have to learn. A great demon is always prepared to learn.”

“Wow, that was a long excuse,” accused its comrade.

“You can say I’m making an excuse, but I don’t care. As long as I can become a demon that properly dishonors their parents.”

“...”

“Eh, what’s the point of this conversation? Let’s shovel now. Whew! Crap!”

“You’re right. Crap!”

Similarly, most demons knew in their hearts that Lloyd was prettier, slyer, eviler, and more stubborn than themselves. And so, they all decided to learn from this opportunity and stay by Lloyd’s side doing construction work for as long as possible. They would observe, study, reflect on, and copy his actions to become a more wicked demon. Their hearts burned with the desire to develop themselves and gave all to their shoveling.

“Hey!” shouted Lloyd. “Stop chatting and use that energy to shovel!”

Encouraged by Lloyd’s merciless nagging and frightened by Javier’s watch, they constructed roadbeds one section after another. About three months later, a sturdy 68-mile-long bed was built from the edge of Hell. The number of slopes and curves was kept minimal. Each car wasn’t meant to travel on more than three elevated slopes, and each slope was to be less than 1.8 miles long. Everything was designed in accordance with Lloyd’s careful and deliberate plan.

Good.

In no time, the 68-mile roadbed started to show its final outline. Lloyd clenched his fists as he looked down at it from the sky. The construction was going better than he expected. It was all thanks to the hard work of 30,000 demons, all of whom almost never slacked off. Interestingly, these demons were more cooperative when he treated them harshly and without any show of mercy.

Perverts.

Lloyd landed Ggoming, smiling wryly. His smile widened with a streak of greater satisfaction when he knuckled down to inspect the bed constructed today.

It’s flawless.

It was near perfection, precisely meeting all of his size and durability requirements.

The project will hopefully continue as it is now. Once the bed is completed, it’ll be time to build the tracks.

Then the construction would be over. Next, he would simply inform the King of Hell how to maintain and operate the railroad before receiving his payment. With that, he'd finally be able to liberate the soul of Anticus.

Then I'll be able to obtain Dragon King Verkis's support.

A lifetime warranty for the Bone Dragon. A promise of endless treasure. Even one extra life on top of everything. It all culminated to create the perfect conditions for him to enjoy and experience the best of life.

So, let's work harder to end the construction in a success.

Calming his pounding heart, Lloyd rounded off the bed inspection. And in his excitement, he didn't see the desolate-looking ghost wandering near the flatland—where Hell's first railroad was being constructed—as it looked at Lloyd in sheer panic.

What the heck? That's... me?!

The lost ghost. The former hooligan of the Frontera barony. The man whose body was suddenly stolen without warning one day. The dead soul who became a resident in Hell. The ghost of Lloyd Frontera's eyes snapped open when he looked at Lloyd.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 236: The Pleading Hooligan (1)

Lloyd Frontera, the hooligan, was a mess. His personality. Behavior. Attitude. Not a single attribute of his was worthy of praise. He destroyed himself and those around him, slacking off and behaving recklessly at any given chance. He was always preoccupied with his thoughts about the Frontera fiefdom, a boring and hideous province. He pitied his fate of being born and rotting away in such a place. And so, he was always angry. He was enraged by the lack of his family's status and his unfulfilled greed. The anger, disappointment, and frustration inside the young master were taken out on everyone around him. He hurled insults at maids and physically assaulted servants. He mistreated his parents and the rest of the family.

And he drank. Getting intoxicated made him feel good. It was the only source of consolation in his life. So, the young master kept drinking more. That day was no different. He drank himself into a stupor at the pub. As he continued drinking, he felt a shaft of rage.

What happened after was unclear. Did he destroy everything? He vaguely recalled toppling over, throwing around, and stomping on the tables, chairs, and everything else he could lay his eyes on. The pub owner seemed to have teared up, choking in his tears to please stop while he was at it. But he must have wrenched the man off. How that man shuddered and flinched in fear when Lloyd tossed a glare and lifted his fist high! How entertaining the sight of that useless man was! Just like that, as Lloyd walked back home, he giggled as the scene replayed in his head. And then, when he got home, he flung himself into bed and fell asleep. That was his last memory. The last memory he had inside his physical body.

And afterward... That bastard...

The ghost of Hooligan Lloyd blinked, his eyes shaking. And he tossed his vacant gaze to the sky, where his flesh was. He couldn't forget the morning of that day. How could he forget? The moment he became the ghost against his will? The moment when the very bastard that stole his body woke up and got out of bed?

...

On that very morning, the bastard skillfully struck up a conversation with Javier like everything was normal. As if it wasn’t enough to steal his body, the man even pretended to be him. The sight flipped his lid. No, actually, Ghost Lloyd was scared. Flustered and afraid. The young master couldn’t wrap his head around why his body was stolen and he became a ghost. There was nothing he could understand or do about it.

Yes. He was powerless. But he wanted to get his body back. So, he stuck next to the thief 24/7, never leaving his side as the thief slept, ate, and whatnot. Ghost Lloyd resorted to every attempt to get his body back. He yearned to drive away the fraud who was pretending to be him and restore his possession. But it was impossible. All his attempts failed. It was a fruitless endeavor even when the fraud passed out after defeating the Gigatitan in Cremo and waking up to reunite with his parents.

...

Ghost Lloyd was certain that he’d succeed when the fraud was in an unconscious, vegetative state. But even then, it was a failure. Not enough with that, he had to watch the fraud hug his parents who had run up to him in tears. He despaired seeing their concerned expression and eyes full of worry for the fraud’s wellbeing as their fingers trembled.

...

He felt dismayed, hopeless, defeated... and regretful for his crooked ways of life. That was when Ghost Lloyd realized. There was no excuse for him. Throughout the year, he glued himself to the thief of his body, and Ghost Lloyd saw how the latter worked. How earnest and desperate the man was. How purposeful his actions were. Ghost Lloyd was able to observe him for longer and more closely than anyone else. And so, he couldn’t make an excuse even when he wanted to.

I... lived blaming everything on my poor family status.

But he was different. The man possessed the same body as him, along with his family's low status and crippling debt. But he acted like it was nothing and even as if he had gotten lucky with these conditions. He desperately worked hard to make money, so much so that Ghost Lloyd wondered if such an endeavor was possible for a human. Sometimes, the fraud put himself in harm's way, changing the reputation Ghost Lloyd had tanked to the bottom by being a wretched hooligan.

Ghost Lloyd knew that all of these accomplishments would be unimaginable for him. He couldn't give out any excuse because he saw it with his own eyes. So, he accepted defeat. As he saw his parents hug the fake Lloyd in tears, he thought to himself that it was all for the better, that his body was stolen, and that there was nothing else he could do. And just like that, he left and came to the underworld, mixing in with the dead. Then he fell to Hell and went to the Hell Castle, only to be kicked out without receiving a sentence. The reason was simple.

I'm neither dead nor living.

His body was still alive, although taken away, so he wasn't dead. However, he wasn't alive either, as he didn't possess a living body. In other words, he was a spiritual refugee, a ghost without a home country. A buoying ghost that was neither living nor dead. A ghost that didn't belong to any world. That was what he was. And so, from then on, he lived and spent his time in the corner of Hell since that was the only way. He was scared of demons, as his soul would be exterminated if they got to him. So, Ghost Lloyd lived in apprehension, fearing that he might be seen by demons.

For how long? There was no way of knowing. Hell didn't have changing seasons. Thus, he simply hid every day to survive, bearing every moment in Hell. But he didn't have many regrets as he regarded his current life as a fitting punishment for his crooked ways in the past. But now? For the first time, he regretted the decision to come down to Hell as he saw fake Lloyd standing in front of his eyes.

I gave up my body to him. Yet, that idiot already died and came here?!

This place was Hell, and Ghost Lloyd saw his thief here! Too soon!

That scumbag!

Ghost Lloyd teared up, a sudden onrush of regret washing through him. He shouldn't have given up his body too soon. Eventually, his patience snapped.

"Hey!" shouted Ghost Lloyd and rushed toward Lloyd. "Since you're already dead, it's time to die in my hands now, you scumbag!"

Ghost Lloyd ran up to Lloyd and threw a punch. Lloyd felt flustered.

"What is this...?" Lloyd was inspecting the roadbed, and when a dead soul appeared out of nowhere and wielded a fist, he wondered if it had lost its mind.

How dare a mere dead soul attack me when even demons cower in my presence?

Swish. Lloyd easily shifted his feet. Normally, he just chose to avoid fighting. But he, too, was on the verge of being a high-level sword expert, which meant that he could easily dodge the fist of a dead soul. Launching a counterattack was easy for him as well.

Thwack! Lloyd stretched out his hand after avoiding the attack.

Slap! Slap! Slap!

Lloyd slapped the dead soul, whose face jerked to the side along with a sharp sound. But that wasn't the end of his attack.

Thwack! When the dead reeled, Lloyd used his shoulder to push the former's back as he hugged its knees. And he pulled, letting his weight pin on the dead.

"Eh?! Eh?"

When Ghost Lloyd fell to the ground, Lloyd immediately worked to push the ghost's stomach with his right knee while his left leg and his right hand pressed down on both of its legs. And with his left hand, he clenched its throat. Hooligan Lloyd was completely suppressed.

Woah. What is this now?

Lloyd let out a snort after suppressing Ghost Lloyd without breaking a sweat, wondering if it was a resident in Hell that was against the indiscriminate development of the railroad. Did he need to act as an evil corporate developer again? Lloyd entertained this silly thought for a while before getting a proper look at the dead soul's face. But when he checked its face properly, he flinched.

"Hmm?" Lloyd gasped and added, "Lloyd. Frontera?"

"Did you finally notice me, you bastard?"

"..."

It was really Lloyd Frontera. Though he was having trouble accepting the sudden turn of events, the dead soul glowering at him as it flailed under his weight was the hooligan, Lloyd Frontera. His face had somewhat faded away and even became half-transparent. However, the living Lloyd instantly recognized by instinct who it was.

What is happening? How am I supposed to react to this?

For a second, Lloyd was completely thrown off balance. Meeting the hooligan Lloyd Frontera was the very last thing he expected to happen. He wasn't merely surprised. Lloyd felt as if he was caught red-handed in a crime. It was understandable considering that he was meeting the very person he unintentionally stole his body from. The ghost was the source of guilt for Lloyd. But soon enough, he pulled himself together. There was no need to be flustered. First, he had to figure out what was going on. He collected his thoughts and fixed his expression before speaking.

"Why are you here?" blurted Lloyd.

"That's my question, you bastard," Ghost Lloyd shot back.

Of course. The Ghost Lloyd didn’t give a kind response. Instead, its gaze turned hostile.

“How did you die and come here so early?”

“Me?” asked Lloyd with a frown. “Are you asking if I’m dead?”

“Yes.”

“I’m not dead at all.”

That was when it struck him that Ghost Lloyd had misunderstood what happened.

“I’m not dead,” blurted Lloyd.

“What?”

“I said I’m not dead.”

“Cut the bullcrap. Then why are you here in Hell if you aren’t dead?!”

“I was asked by a dragon to come here, and I’m building something for the King of Hell. I’m working here,” said Lloyd matter-of-factly.

“Eh...?”

“Yes. Consider it a business trip.”

“...”

Confusion rushed through Ghost Lloyd. Asked by a dragon? Building something for the King of Hell? A silly question came out of its mouth against its will.

“You. What in the world have you been doing with my body?”

“Nothing much. Just been trying to live diligently.”

“...”

“Then why are you here?” asked Lloyd this time.

“What do you mean, why?” snapped Ghost Lloyd. “It’s because of you! I was living an ordinary life until you did this to me! Got it?” His nostrils flared.

From then on, Ghost Lloyd screeched and screamed, sharing the story beginning from the day its body was taken away. It complained, protested, and shouted. It mourned its berating life in anger, pleading, and begging.

“So please... help me. Come on! I don’t want to be here. I’m sick of being neither dead nor living. Please... Get me revived or something!”

“...”

“It’s because of you. I’m neither dead nor living because you took away my body. So why should you be the only one living a good life? Come on! What did I do wrong?”

“...”

“Take responsibility for what you did! Do something for me!”

“Whew...”

Lloyd heaved a sigh he had been holding in. Hooligan Lloyd was still pinned to the ground, and Lloyd slightly pitied the guy after he heard the former’s story.

He’s become a soul that’s neither dead nor living.

So, Ghost Lloyd didn’t belong either in the outside world or the underworld. Living Lloyd never knew that it’d be roaming around in such a state.

It’s in a completely stateless condition.

Lloyd grasped the current situation after organizing his thoughts. He was flustered. Sure, he pitied Hooligan Lloyd and felt bad for it. But...

“How am I supposed to help you? Do you have any ideas?” Lloyd’s voice was now soft.

“That’s for you to find out!” shrieked Ghost Lloyd.

“...”

“That’s what my servants and maids did for me at home! I didn’t have to say it out loud. They all worked and did things for me! Don’t you think that’s the obvious thing to do?!”

“No, it’s not.”

Another sigh came out of Lloyd’s mouth. Sure, he sorely felt bad for Hooligan Lloyd, but he figured that the latter hadn’t gotten rid of its foul nature.

“First, listen to me carefully.”

Lloyd looked straight into Hooligan Lloyd’s eyes.

“First of all, you are asking me for a favor. So, don’t shout or throw a tantrum. You are not a baby.”

“...”

“Two. Let’s decide our nicknames.”

“What?”

“Nicknames. Don’t you know what that is?”

“I know, of course. But why should I do that? I’m Lloyd. You’re a fake,” Hooligan Lloyd protested.

“But I’m Lloyd, too.”

“Bullcrap! You’re nothing but a fake.”

“Then do you plan on keeping calling me a fake?”

“Of course.”

“Then I won’t help you.” Lloyd shook his head resolutely.

“What?”

“It’s offensive.”

“...”

Hooligan Lloyd swallowed, and that was when it hit Ghost Lloyd.

Right. I forgot he was a spiteful and petty bastard.

That was what Ghost Lloyd had observed from watching this fake for almost a year. And after having a conversation with him, it could even more clearly sense how petty the other was. Forcefully hiding the dismay in its voice, it asked, “T-then what are you saying we should do?”

“Let’s do rock scissors paper. The winner will be called Lloyd. The loser is Frontera. How’s that?”

“That doesn’t make any-”

“Rock...” put in Lloyd.

“Hey, you out of your mind?”

“If you don’t play, you lose. Paper, scissors...”

“Oh, come on!”

“Shoot!”

Swoosh! Two Lloyds held out their hands. Lloyd chose scissors. Hooligan Lloyd chose paper. A satisfied smile played across the former's face.

"Great. Since I won, I'll be called Lloyd."

"Wow. This is nuts. It wasn't enough with my body; you're stealing my name too?"

"At least I'm calling you by your last name, Frontera."

"Dammit. Then let me go now," muttered Frontera. Lloyd's gaze turned wistful as he watched Frontera.

Haah. I feel quite sorry for him.

It wasn't on purpose that he took this man's body. He never intended to in the first place. The event was a mere accident. But it was undeniably true that the unintended incident had completely changed his and the hooligan's destinies.

I've been on a winning streak while this bastard turned into a ghost. Tsk.

Though nothing was by design, Lloyd still felt apologetic. But, of course, it wasn't just 100% guilt. There were things that he thought he should be credited for.

The thing is, had I not taken away his body... He'd have died in the corner of a pub about 15 months after...

That was the destiny Lloyd Frontera met in the novel, something that would have happened without a doubt if his body was not taken away. But it wasn't only Lloyd who was slated to meet a tragic death.

The baron, baroness, and Julian too.

The entire family was set to either kill themselves or get killed. That would have happened had it not been for himself. And so, technically speaking, he was a savior to the family of Lloyd Frontera.

Haah. I kind of want to call it even.

That was Lloyd's honest thought. He wondered if it was necessary to help out this hooligan. Despite that, he was bothered. A part of him was pricked with guilt and so was his conscience. So, Lloyd felt that he couldn't just ignore the issue, particularly when he thought of the count and countess, who were always kind to him.

I pretended to be their son all along. So, if I overlook the trouble their real son is facing and turn a blind eye, then I'd be doing an injustice to them.

When his thoughts reached there, he was able to make a decision.

"Hey, Frontera," Lloyd called, "Listen carefully. I get what you're going through and what you want. But right now, I'm not in the place to help you right away."

"What? You scumbag, I'm going-"

"Stop cursing," Lloyd put in, "and listen to me until I finish. I'm swamped with work right now. The construction for the King of Hell is in full swing. So, let me just wrap up what I'm doing first. Neither of us knows how I can help you anyway." Lloyd looked at Frontera meaningfully.

"You are right, but..."

"That's why I'll try to search for ways to help you while I'm finishing the construction. Okay? So, get in my inner pocket and stay quiet."

"In your inner pocket?" Frontera asked in confusion.

"Yeah." Lloyd chuckled. "You can become smaller since you're a ghost, right?"

"I could if you let me go."

"So, shrink yourself and stay in my pocket for the time being."

"Why should I do that?"

“I’m giving you the chance to be safe until I’m done with this construction. Or what, do you want the demons to get you and be exterminated?”

“…”

“You now get why I’m making this suggestion?”

“Haah. Dammit.” I get it. So let this go first,” grumbled Frontera.

Lloyd freed Frontera, who downsized his own form. Lloyd introduced Frontera to his friends in his inner pocket.

“Hey, Ppodong. Bangul. Hamang. Ggoming. This is Frontera. Don’t hit or pester him. But be nice, okay?”

“Ppo? Bang? Ha? Ggo?”

Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Ggoming were enjoying a nap in Lloyd’s inner pocket. The four fantastical creatures widened their eyes at the sight of Frontera, who largely possessed the same appearance as Lloyd. The ghost sparked their curiosity. What about Frontera? He was flabbergasted.

“Ack!!! What are these fur balls?!” yelped Frontera.

“Well, they’re your friends for now. You said you stuck by me for a year or so. Then you should have seen all of them except maybe Ggoming,” drawled Lloyd.

“Hey!” shouted Ghost Lloyd. “What does that have to do with anything? Why do I have to be with these things!”

“Don’t like it? What, you want me to chuck you to the demons then?”

“…”

“That’s worse, right?”

“…”

“Then be nice and get along. Don’t make them hate you for no reason.”

Lloyd then smiled in a meaningful way because it looked like they were already disliking Frontera. The four of them were glowering at Frontera for calling them “these things” a while ago. But Lloyd paid no attention to it.

“Okay, time to go in.”

“H-hold on!”

“Closing the button now.”

“Hey!” Boing! Lloyd shoved Frontera into his inner pocket and closed the button. Later, he heard a ruffling noise coming from his pocket. It looked like the four of them were very friendly.

Haah. I bought some time for now.

Lloyd sighed at length. To be honest, he didn’t have any idea how he could help out the ghost.

But at least I didn’t make any promises. I just said I’d search for ways I could help.

That was his escape. In case he fails to give any help, he can always say, “I tried, but I couldn’t find ways to help you out.”

And for the time being, it’s better to keep him hidden. That way, Javier won’t find out about him.

Javier didn’t have any suspicions about Lloyd’s identity. So, what would happen if he saw the ghost of Lloyd Frontera, the real one? What if he learns the truth? Lloyd couldn’t imagine what his reaction would be. As such, he decided it would be best to keep Frontera hidden for now. Right then...

“Master Lloyd? Why are you sighing so heavily?”

Right when he thought so, Javier’s voice came close behind him without any warning. It happened much too unexpectedly for Lloyd. His heart jumped out of his chest at Javier’s sudden question.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 237: The Pleading Hooligan (2)

“Master Lloyd? Why are you sighing so heavily?”

The sound of Javier’s voice came much too abruptly, catching Lloyd by sheer surprise.

“...!”

Was this what people meant when they said their hearts jumped out of their chests? Lloyd flinched but tried hard not to show it. He bit his lips involuntarily, held his breath for a moment while darting his eyes, and racked his brain for something to say. Then he turned around, thinking about how relieving it was that Javier didn’t see his expression as he approached him from behind. Lloyd chuckled.

“How can I not?” Lloyd grumbled as he pointed to the roadbed construction site. “Do you see that? The roadbed there? It’s driving me up the wall, really.”

“Is there something wrong?”

“Yes, there is. The upper part of the bed. It’s a big mess. Seriously, I warned them so many times not to build it like that. Those demons never listen,” sighed Lloyd, shaking his head.

Javier observed the area. “Hmm, it looks fine to me.”

“I see a lot of problems even if it looks fine to you. If the bed and rail are left in this state, everything’s going to completely warp later on.”

“Is that so?”

“Yeah, I should call the demons and fix it up again. For Pete’s sake. I can’t trust them with anything like this.”

“You must miss Sir Bayern,” Javier said.

“Mhm, I do, along with the Engineering and Skeleton Corps as well.”

Lloyd’s smile turned rueful. Even though he brought up the topic to change the conversation, he did miss Sir Bayern and the Engineering and Skeleton Corps in his fiefdom. After all, he had undergone countless construction projects with them. They were seasoned, experienced workers whom Lloyd could trust to do quality work.

“But what are you doing here?” finally asked Lloyd.

“I think it is time for you to eat.”

“Please tell me that we’re not having grilled lava centipede belly for dinner again.”

“Unfortunately, that is on our menu for tonight as well.”

“Is that really our best option?” asked Lloyd accusingly.

“Indeed. It is the only meal we can cook with what is available here.”

“But,” reasoned Lloyd, “what about steaming it? Or frying it even?”

“There isn’t enough water to cook with steam, and there is no flour to coat the meat.”

“Then what about eating it raw?”

“Eating it raw?” Javier frowned.

“Yeah, like soy sauce marinated raw crabs... Anyway, I mean just raw.”

“Do you truly want to eat it raw?”

“No...”

Lloyd let out a sigh. Three months had passed since the construction took off. And all this time, he had eaten a sickening amount of centipede meat. It was virtually the only food they had in this place. The meat was quite juicy at first, but the mere smell of it made his stomach turn now.

“Still, nothing can be done about it. Let’s go.”

Lloyd started to walk while letting out another big sigh. He moved one step ahead of Javier. A faint smile appeared on his face unbeknownst to the knight, and his heart felt lighter.

Whew. That went well.

It was a challenge, but he managed to change the subject of their conversation. By the looks of it, it didn’t seem like Javier noticed anything.

It’d have been a serious headache if Javier caught me.

Lloyd stroked his chest, feeling the bulge of his inner pocket. Hooligan Frontera’s ghost was there. Lloyd’s heart had jumped out of his chest, fearing that Javier had heard their scuffle. But as he changed their conversation topic and quietly observed, Javier seemed to not have seen anything. This realization, at last, calmed his heart which was pounding in panic. His steps grew slightly lighter, whereas Javier’s gaze grew heavier.

There’s something strange about Master Lloyd.

Javier knew his young master wasn’t the type to grumble over food. At least, he wasn’t after giving up his hooligan ways. He never refused food, even when the given offer was plain or unpleasant. The man wasn’t picky when it came to food, nor did he get sick of anything. Even if he was served the same dish for ten consecutive days, or even a month straight, he still ate without a word of complaint. Perhaps he had some complaints, but his young master never voiced them out loud. The man ate like he had been starved for years and seemed to fully understand the preciousness of food. But just now...

He blatantly said that he was tired of eating centipede meat.

The man was without complaint in the morning but suddenly threw a fit over their repetitive meals during dinner. It was only natural that Javier regarded his behavior as strange.

Moreover, the way he was talking to himself earlier was definitely strange.

Javier shot a meaningful gaze toward Lloyd, who was walking ahead of him. Though he didn't say anything, he had heard Lloyd talk to himself right before he approached him.

It was like he was murmuring to himself. No, it seemed as though there were two Master Lloyds conversing with each other.

It was hard to believe, but he did feel that way. The din that came from the nearby volcano deafened his hearing, so he couldn't catch the details. But Javier caught on to the tone and atmosphere of the conversation.

It felt like Master Lloyd was talking with another Master Lloyd. What is stranger is that… I heard two different tones of voice in the conversation.

Lloyd's self-talk sounded more like two people conversing or even quarreling with each other in the same voice.

Not only that, one of the two sounded... much like the old Master Lloyd.

It really did. One was using the very tone his young master used as a hooligan before he started leading a proper life. In other words, the chatter Javier accidentally overheard sounded like a quarrel between Master Lloyd of the present and the past.

"..."

Javier considered if Master Lloyd was bipolar.

No. It doesn't seem that way.

Javier softly shook his head. There weren't any signs in Lloyd that indicated such. This made Javier feel more confused.

Furthermore, the King of Hell addressed him with a strange name. Suho Kim. What could that mean?

Lloyd had retorted that he knew nothing about it. But Javier begged to differ.

Master Lloyd seems to know something.

But whatever that was, it looked like his young master wasn't revealing it. The longer he stayed by the latter's side, the feeling just grew stronger.

Right. From long ago, there was always more than one strange thing about him.

To be exact, it was a few years ago when he changed, that is, around the time he suddenly undertook the construction of ondol. That truly marked the change in him. A completely different person. At that time, Javier regarded the change to be mysterious but not so bad. After all, the hopeless hooligan had become dutiful and hardworking in one day. Everyone, including Javier, welcomed the change in Lloyd. But what about now? Javier felt a mild pang of nervousness over the possibility that he'd go back to his old hooligan ways. The man had a record of a complete change, so there wasn't any guarantee that he wouldn't change again. Javier was more nervous because of that.

Master Lloyd, I wish to protect the current hardworking version of you.

Though Javier nitpicked Lloyd for being a petty and sneaky person, the former thought that the present Lloyd was incomparably better than the hooligan Lloyd from before. Deep down in his heart, Javier knew that he could sincerely trust and follow his young master. That made him all the more anxious.

What should I do... if Master Lloyd goes back to his old ways?

Javier had no idea. He could only pray that such a thing would never happen and bring misfortune to everyone. With that thought, he simply made a resolve.

I do not know how I can help out, but I will do everything to protect your current self.

Javier's eyes held a glint of firm determination as they gazed at Lloyd, who was walking ahead of him.

***

The railroad construction continued, so there wasn't any immediate way to seek ways to help out Hooligan Frontera. And so, Lloyd focused on the construction at hand, the 68-mile railroad bed from the edge of Hell to the Hell Castle entering the last phase. During the construction, Lloyd abused and exploited 30,000 demons in a more efficient manner. The secret was simple. He needed to do his best to act as an evil developer.

"Everyone already expected this, right? Get ready to pull an all-nighter!"

A bonus stipend for working overnight? There was obviously none. What about welfare benefits for working in a poor environment? That was non-existent as well. Lloyd maliciously exploited the others to no end, never letting them get off work. And when it seemed like their productivity went down, Lloyd summoned everyone and lashed out at them, grilling them to do better.

"Okay," shouted Lloyd, "Repeat after me! I am tired and slow because I lack passion and tenacity!"

"Passion! Tenacity!"

"Speak louder!" boomed Lloyd.

"PASSIOOON! TENACITYYY!"

"Okay! Work harder with that energy!" proclaimed Lloyd with a glow of satisfaction

"Eek...!" one of the demons cried out. "But it's too hard and tiring!"

"Shut up! Demons are supposed to be in pain and tired!"

Of course, all of this went without saying that it stood entirely opposite to Lloyd's usual philosophy. Hard work was to be met with fair compensation. Dangerous tasks were to be guided with safety measures and hazard pay. And everything was to be included in the labor contract. This was all that Lloyd normally believed because he hoped that none of his awful experiences on construction sites in the past would happen in his own field. He didn't want there to be any sorrow, mortification, or extortion of wages for his workers. But right now, the situation was completely different.

I'm in Hell!

Hell turned out to be a fanciful place. Had he treated the human workers in the same fashion he treated the demons, the entire construction site would have been flipped upside down, and a massive ruckus would have occurred. But this place was poles apart. The harsher he treated the demons, the more they enjoyed it! The greater the burden on their shoulders, the happier they became! The more Lloyd disregarded their welfare and whatnot, the closer they floated to cloud nine!

They seem like perverted nutcases. It's almost disturbing at this point.

The demons reacted in such a way that the thought just came naturally. So, in short, demons in this world thought lowly of the others who treated them in a meek and reasonable manner.

This goes really against my site rules, but I have no choice. I'm trying to adapt by operating the construction site in accordance with the customs here.

Silencing the bothersome voices of his conscience and telling himself countless times that it was fine, Lloyd continued exploiting the demons. Thankfully, however, that sped things up, and the construction of the railroad bed was finished swiftly. And once he was done, he advanced to constructing tracks right away.

It doesn't have to be grand or complicated. Just good enough for the train transporting the souls to travel north and south at a smooth speed.

There wasn’t any need to construct a complicated or flashy train like those in South Korea. He just needed one that possessed basic functions.

First, we should work on the ballast that will support the tracks on the bed.

Lloyd opted to go for the most traditional option, which was a carpet of gravel to build the ballast.

The gravel on the ground creates friction and absorbs some of the shock and vibration. It’s easy to construct, and the structure itself is simple.

The downsides were that the train created dust as it traveled and was high-maintenance. But he didn’t care.

Dust is not a problem since I’m in Hell, and there are plenty of demons to help with maintenance anyway. So, all’s good.

Currently, over 800,000 demons were mobilized to transport dead souls through carts. And so, once the train was ready to go, many demons were set to be unemployed. The maintenance of the train tracks would solve this massive unemployment issue.

Haah. Let’s get to work! Work!

Laying the gravel was a walk in the park. Hell was full of rocks. All sorts of rocks, which came about as the pyroclastic materials cooled down, scattered all about the area. Lloyd scraped and saved them and laid everything flat on the 86-mile railroad bed. And then, he constructed the ties and rails. His method of construction wasn’t necessarily modern. Sure, he could obviously install the Alternative System, an anti-dust prevention device widely used in developed countries like Germany, the United States, South Korea, and Switzerland.

But I don’t necessarily have to.

It went without saying that modern techniques were useful. The train created less vibration or noise when it traveled. But here, this sort of technique unnecessarily complicated the construction and delayed its completion.

And besides, the train will be carrying demons and souls, so who cares about their travel experience?

It wasn't Lloyd's problem, and so he opted to use the comparatively old and simple "STEDEF" method.

It's the oldest and simplest method I've studied.

The STEDEF track was invented in France in 1964, and it was widely used in the early days of train-building in South Korea. For instance, it was utilized for subway lines one through four in Seoul city.

"Lay the tie! Then put the rails! Then secure the locks! Follow the Construction Guideline!"

The ties were laid horizontally on the ballast to fasten the rails and distribute the weight. To make those, Lloyd used the centipede legs he had obtained by a large volume by disintegrating the lava centipede and tying them by fours. That resulted in a firm, solid tie. And the rails were installed on the centipede-leg-ties.

And centipede shells were used to create the rails, which the train would directly touch as it moved. Who made it? Javier. How? With the blinding aura he obtained after rising to become a grandmaster.

Slash! One wielding of his sword rendered dozens of aura rays. These rays pounced on the dead centipedes and quickly dismantled their shells in a flash. All the corpses were cut up and perfectly processed with such precision that it made Lloyd's hair stand. Then he carpeted the rails on the ties.

Next, the centipede antennas were used as the lock. Much like tying a cable tie, the ballast was looped through a hole under the rails. Then the ties and rails were fastened to the ballast.

“Ppodong! Step on it!”

“Ppodong!”

Ppodong, who had gotten giant after eating the red sunflower seed, jumped in excitement, his chubby belly and buttock dancing up and down. He stepped on the ties and rails with all of his weight, the booming and blaring sound of thumping and thwacking ringing across the whole place all day. But Lloyd gave no hoot to the din. The reason was simple. This place was Hell.

Why should I care if it’s noisy when no human lives here?

He didn’t have to worry about causing trouble for people nearby with noise or dust during construction. And so, the construction was advancing smoothly. But there was something Lloyd was unaware of. It was about the very noise he didn’t pay any attention to since he was in Hell and it was unpopulated with humans. He was ignorant that the noise was starting to put the construction site in danger.

“Grr! Noisy!” Under the lava lake near the construction site, there was a creature quietly getting some sleep. But now, it was boiling in anger because of the unexpected construction din, much like the ill-mannered neighbor throwing a party at night.

“Grr!” It deliberated whether it should come up and kill everyone. It was the most dangerous and violent creature in the wilderness of Hell. The Lava Giant opened its eyes, feeling a burning anger to destroy everything in sight.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 238: Noise Pollution Complaint (1)

“Grrr! Brrr!”

A vast lava lake sat about 1.8 miles off the construction site. It was a peaceful, sticky, and commonplace lake in Hell. But today, something was slightly different. It was boiling with intensity and fierceness that weren’t there before. The reason was simple.

“Grrr!” The Lava Giant slumbering in the bottom of the lava lake tossed and turned, clamping its ears with its hands in irritation. How could it not? It was asleep for the last 20,000 years, and it wanted to sleep for at least 100,000 years more because it would then be able to recharge a bit. That seemed like a satisfactory amount of good sleep. But the reality was cruel for the Lava Giant.

Boom! Thuuump! For the past few days, its senses had been assaulted by blaring noises and annoying vibrations, and the Lava Giant could not figure out where the sounds were coming from. It was too lazy to even try making sense of them and get up to check them out. So, the giant just let it be, thinking the distractions were just a passing ruckus and would soon disappear. It would be best to ignore the disturbances and fall back asleep. But as time progressed, it started to feel its initial thoughts had been wrong.

Boom! Boom! The vibrations lasted for 24 hours, terrorizing the giant every moment of the day. Something kept drumming the lava lake and pierced the giant’s ears as it slept at the bottom.

“Grrr!”

Its eyelashes trembled in annoyance, and its gigantic hands that covered its ears tensed up.

At every thumping, the giant knitted its brows. At every noise that got under its skin, the face of the giant darkened. And at last, it had enough. It ran out of patience.

“Grr! Grrrr!”

The moment its last strand of patience snapped, the Lava Giant opened its eyes and gradually rose, bringing a change in the lake. The stagnant pool of bubbling lava started to absorb into its entire body, becoming a part of the giant. Its already ginormous body started to swell and at last...

“Grrrrrr! Gargh!!”

Once the Lava Giant sucked every drop of the lava in the lake, it rose and stood, its whole body stretching 656 feet in length, and it shot an enraged glare at the plain full of volcanic ash toward the origin of the pestering din and vibration.

“Grrr!”

Since the giant was 656 feet tall and there weren’t any mountains or hills near the area, the giant had a clear vision of the volcanic ash mound stretching horizontally in a straight line, about 1.6 miles away. Thousands of demons were busily moving while grouped together around the mound. The sight set off the giant.

“Grrr!”

It was crystal clear that these demons had been the ones creating all the recent commotions while they built that tall mound for whatever unknown reason. The solution? It was simple.

“I’ll kill them all, grr!”

That was the solution. Kill every demon. Then they wouldn’t make a fuss anymore. The whole place would quiet down again, and it could happily fall asleep again. Resolved, the giant took a step forward.

Boooom! The whole ground shook as it took a step forward with its 104-foot-long blazing foot. Since it had been a while since the giant last walked, it moved slowly until it became more comfortable with its steps. Soon, the giant’s gait slowly became more aggressive until it reflected all the unhidden rage inside of it.

Thwaaack! The giant ran. Sprinted. Hurtled. Like a storm. Like an earthquake. It reached the 1.6-mile distance in great strides, approaching the construction site with a violent roar and destructive ground tremor. And without a hint of hesitation or concession, it jumped high and trampled on the railroad with all of its weight.

Kaboom! The rails and ties the demons toiled hard for smashed to pieces, and the bed splintered to little bits. One leaping and trampling. About 260 feet of the bed was destroyed without any trace. The same went for the demons.

“Wh-what the?”

“Aaack!!”

“Get down!”

Dozens of demons flew across the air in various directions like bullets, collapsing to the ground and bleeding blue. They screamed as they grasped their wounds. However, those able to voice their pain were the lucky ones compared to the roughly 20 demons who were turned to dust after being trampled without warning.

“I-It’s the Lava Giant!!”

One of the demons that made sense of things screeched aloud. The demons flailing amid the abrupt destruction and demolition stopped dead in their tracks, all of them blanching at the same time in realization.

“The Lava Giant?”

Chills ran down their spines. The Lava Giant was a terrorizing creature that was incomparably strong to the lava centipedes that they had mastered over. There was no one who could stop the Lava Giant except the King of Hell.

What’s the Lava Giant doing here?!

According to stories, their parents had told when they were young, the Lava Giant came out of slumber only once every hundreds of thousands of years. The last time it went berserk was said to be 20,000 years ago. And so, there was supposed to be an obscene amount of time before it went rampant again.

“S-Somebody!” muttered a demon in a panic-stricken voice. “Somebody go report to the King of Hell!”

“Acck! I want to go too!”

“Me too! But the Hell Castle! It’s too far!”

“Then hide! Run!”

Disheartened, the demons threw their tools away and scurried for their lives, hiding or running far away. But there was one thing they didn’t know. It was that the Lava Giant could capture all their movements with its two eyes from a height of 656 feet. Soon, it unleashed a flood of unspeakable violence.

Wham! The Lava Giant softly stomped the ground. Ten demons that chose to hide in the rocks became crushed between them and turned into powder. Those who chose to run away weren’t safe either.

Whoosh! Booom! This time, the gigantic foot of the Lava Giant moved sideways like a broom, sweeping the ground with a swish. That simple gesture covered hundreds of feet. Dozens of demons were killed by the blow like a colony of ants.

“Please! Ack! Save me!”

The demons dashed and ran for their lives, all yelping and running in every direction. But the Lava Giant was merciless. It believed that it could only peacefully sleep when it killed every single demon who had caused a commotion and awakened it. Thinking so, it jumped into action. It trampled, thrashed, hurtled, and blew out air that was thousands of degrees hot onto everything nearby. The demons were killed in groups like swarms of fruit flies being exterminated with pesticides. The whole land was mixed with violent noises and hurried screams, which were then combined with savage roars and painful screeching. However, unfortunately, they failed to run away because, in the first place, the construction had taken off in a vast open plain. There was no hiding place nor escape route.

“Grr! Grr!”

The Lava Giant grew more fierce, and now, it looked like the giant was having fun massacring the demons. But had it not been for Javier, who stood in its way, the giant would not have stopped the slaughter until thousands more were killed.

“Grr?”

The giant was enjoying its killing spree when it suddenly paused attacking at the sight of a mysterious creature.

“Grrr...?”

A stranger with an ant-like silhouette appeared out of nowhere. It seemed slightly smaller than even the smallest demons. But this creature’s face was amazingly intriguing. Its skin wasn’t red. And instead of a horn on its head, there was silvery fur. The creature dared to look up back at him with its blue eyes. And so, the Lava Giant thought...

“Grrr!”

What a strange-looking demon! What would it feel like to smash that with my palm? The giant didn’t hesitate.

Fwoosh! The giant acted and struck Javier with its giant palm, and just then, his sword shone.

Fwish! Without any other noise or fancy rays of light, the long sword briefly flashed in the air and stirred the space with unbelievably mediocre skill. But next, the giant saw the horrible scene of its palm getting sliced into dozens of pieces. Thwack!

“Grr...!”

Dozens of aura strands bloomed along the path his sword swung in. It then engulfed the space like a brilliant net and slayed the giant’s hand into dozens of pieces. The arm, leg, and upper torso weren’t an exception.

“G-grr!”

Thwack! Pow! Thwamp! Its upper torso was sliced into hundreds of pieces, lava gushing out of the wound like blood. And then... everything coagulated back again.

“Grr!”

Whoosh! The chopped upper torso was restored in a snap. The giant rose as if it wasn’t damaged at all. And with a nonchalant gaze, it bent down toward Javier. Javier’s brows quaked. His sword moved once again.

Thwaaack! His sword once again sliced its upper torso, slaying and cutting. But each time, the giant came back to its original shape. Unharmed, it roared.

“Grrragh!”

Lloyd, who was watching the sight from afar, swallowed.

Shoot. What is that?

He was 984 feet off the ground on Ggoming’s back, and he clenched his fists, recalling the sight a while ago. He and Javier were cleaning up the site just a few miles from the place of the incident. He was in a super mood because the job had gone well for the day, and the tracks were functioning very smoothly. That was when a sinister din came, the kind one you hear when a volcano erupts. He turned, saw the whole scene, and wanted to deny what he was seeing.

That giant was raising hell.

Since the construction site was mostly done on a flatland, it granted Lloyd the whole view of the violent giant even a few miles away. From the moment he learned what was happening, he led Ggoming to fly at the utmost speed and saw Javier jumping off to the ground first and stopping the giant with his stormy aura. And he also saw the monster casually restoring its shape.

I think this situation is a bit hopeless.

Lloyd looked below as he nibbled his lips. The Lava Giant and Javier were in a fierce battle, spewing lava.

Slash! Swoosh!

Dozens of aura strands flashed each time Javier moved, and the giant's body was sectioned into hundreds of pieces. But only to be pieced back together.

It's like slicing water with a knife.

Except that the giant wasn't water but more like a boiling soup or curry. Truly, the body of the Lava Giant was like soup or curry. And so, Javier's powerful and perfect aura didn't do any damage. No matter how many times he sliced and cut, its mushy body just went back together. It was like slicing a hot soup or curry. No damage could be done.

This isn't a matter of strength.

Lloyd frowned, his forehead wrinkling.

Javier's strong. He's a grandmaster. And the Lava Giant is getting beaten so badly that it can't even lay its hands on Javier. Still, things are bad even with those conditions. So, this is a matter of quality.

Repeatedly trying to slice into soup that couldn't be sliced. Vigorously wielding a kitchen knife even if it wasn't possible. That summed up the whole fight. In short, Javier was at a laughably bad disadvantage. He even thought that this was the fight that Javier could never win in the first place.

Ha...

Lloyd’s shoulders trembled and racked his brain after heaving a heavy sigh. He analyzed the situation, predicted results, and calculated the best outcome.

It can’t go on like this. We’re stuck. Javier can’t win. Never. The same goes for me. My mana blast and Supercharge won’t work. I don’t know how and where the Lava Giant came from, but if it keeps going berserk like this, the whole construction will go down the drain.

Lloyd accepted this. He didn’t overestimate his abilities. When he objectively judged the situation, he found it to be awfully despairing. But Lloyd didn’t give up. No, he didn’t want to give up.

What if I move the construction site? It sucks to just throw away everything we’ve been building here... But what if I build a new railroad on a different route?

The construction can resume, he thought. Though all the efforts spent in this one would be wasted, though he seriously teared up at the thought of the time and effort poured into surveying, designing, and constructing Lloyd wondered if a new start was the answer. A vague ray of hope appeared amid the blinding darkness. Just then, the Lava Giant roared aloud as it was getting beaten to a pulp.

“Garrrr! I will kill you all! With my rancor for not being able to fall asleep at your commotion! I will kill you all! That strange mound! I will follow you all even to the end of Hell and break everything!”

“...”

The moment Lloyd heard its roar, he thought he was screwed.

The monster was running amok because the noise from the construction site pissed it off? And so what? That strange mound? It’s going to follow us until the end and destroy everything?

Lloyd’s legs gave way. What else could it mean? Now that the construction and commotion had enraged the giant, it was bent on interfering and breaking everything, even if it required following to the end of Hell.

Ha. What even is my life?

His eyes were wet as he started to acutely feel his three months of work going down the drain. But he couldn’t think of another way to stop the giant.

I’m seriously stuck.

The solution to stop the Lava Giant didn’t come to him at all. Team up with Javier? Nothing seemed to change, even if he did. Mobilizing the fantastical creatures looked the same. So, this was a hopeless affair, and it was useless and moot to hold on to it. So the conclusion was...

Cutting it off is the fastest way to minimize my loss.

Lloyd sighed at length. He pulled himself together, telling himself that he should accept defeat this time. He led Ggoming to fly lower.

“Hey!” shouted Lloyd at Javier. “Dude! Let’s run away!”

Lloyd didn’t even wait for his response. This construction was a flop and no doubt about that. He could try out and build a new construction railroad somewhere else, but the Lava Giant would eventually arrive and turn things upside down like now. Constructing anything would be an impossibility. Holding on to it would only waste time without any fruit. And so, Lloyd, who decided to bear the loss, lifted his left hand and concentrated his mind. His mind went to the magic mark in his left hand, which Anticus had explained about the safety measure before he got here.

Was this how I can open the exit from Hell? I think.

Then he activated the Asrahan Core Technique and concentrated the mana on his left hand. It started to tickle, and a magic circle, which was marked in the left hand like a transparent tattoo, flashed to shoot out a strand of mana in the air.

Ziiing! Clash! Slash! The strand of mana created a circle in the air, and with a crackle, the circle widened to 16 feet in diameter. This was the Hell gate Anticus had provided Lloyd to escape out of Hell. It was the only passage that connected the realms between Hell and the human world where the Lorasia continent was. As he opened it up, Lloyd thought to himself...

I think the dragon said that the area in my world that connects to Hell gate is random. I pray that it's near the Frontera fiefdom.

Lloyd was exhausted now. The construction in Hell was on the brink of failure, and the contract with the Hell of King was over. And he won't be able to release the soul of the ancient dragon, and it'd be impossible to attain membership in the Dragon King club. He was drained. Empty. Now, Lloyd just wanted to rest.

Right. Like I'd be able to enjoy the assistance from the Dragon King and two lives. I should just take good care of my one life and live well in comfort.

Lloyd decided that he should be content with what he has now. Stop now, and rest up. And so, now that he was escaping out of Hell, he wished that he'd arrive at a place near his fiefdom to get home and take a break even a tiny second faster. Wishing to enjoy a carefree, peaceful, and comfortable life a tiny bit earlier, Lloyd stared at the Hell gate. At the same time, the gate was completed.

Spark! Whoosh! A spark crackled. Wind from the human world blew through the gate. The wind felt like 14 Fahrenheit.

Whoosh!

Eek...?

The gust of freezing wind blew so suddenly that Lloyd hugged his clothes tighter.

What the heck?

Feeling dismayed, Lloyd tossed his glance to the other end of the gate. He then saw the scene inside the Hell gate.

That's...

There was a sea. But not just any kind of sea. The whole water was frosty with a sheet of slushy ice on top. And there were glaciers floating around. So, that was...

A polar region?

Lloyd had opened the Hell gate in his desperate attempt to run away. When Lloyd made sense of the scene...

"Grrr! Achew!" For the first time, the Lava Giant, which was going berserk, sneezed helplessly as its whole body gave a terrible shiver.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 239: Noise Pollution Complaint (2)

“Grrr! Achoo!”

The Lava Giant gave a hard tremble, and it belched a terrible sneeze as it bent over. Its lava snot spewed in all directions and burned the land. Seeing that, Lloyd thought to himself...

Eh? Come on... It is so rude to sneeze without a mask... Wait, that’s not what’s important. Is the Lava Giant vulnerable to cold?

Lloyd received a feeling as if a bell tolled in his head with a clear ding. The Hell gate had been opened to provide an escape for Lloyd, but it had to be connected to the polar region out of all the places in the world of the living. However, this thankfully brought a gust of biting wind through the gate and caused the Lava Giant to pitifully shiver in front of it. It hugged around its arms in pity, constantly sneezing and slouching its neck.

“Grr! Achoo! Grr! Ichoo! Grr! Watchoo!”

At the sight, Lloyd became curious. But curiosity soon turned into suspicion, which evolved into a possibility. Then that started to shine in his head as a vague hope.

It could work. Let’s first check it out!

Lloyd held up the shovel in Ggoming’s saddle and activated his two circles lightly. Causing them to collide, he stretched out a shovel at the same time. Kaboom!

The mana blast jetted out dozens of feet from the shovel and hit one shoulder of the shivering Lava Giant. Thwack!

“Grr!”

The Lava Giant shot a glare at him. Lloyd immediately raised Ggoming’s reins in fear and soared high in the air to dodge the giant’s attack. Then he observed the giant’s shoulder that was hit with his mana blast.

Please... I hope my guess is right.

Desire and hope filled Lloyd’s eyes. If he was right, he really believed that he could defeat the Lava Giant, and the railroad construction didn’t have to be abandoned. All of his efforts poured into this place didn’t have to go down the drain.

So, please!

Lloyd’s desire-filled gaze pricked the shoulders of the giant. Meanwhile, its shoulder slowly started to regenerate.

“Grr!”

Reminiscent of boiling curry, its shoulder was made of bubbling lava. The hole, which was about 25 inches wide and 9.8 feet deep, was easily restored despite the hit from the mana blast. But the restoration speed was...

It has gotten slower!

Lloyd’s eyes glimmered. He was certain. The speed had slowed down. Though it was just a small hole, way smaller than the damage taken by Javier’s blow, the restoration took place slower than the first one. It was clear. Lloyd thought he knew why.

The wind from the polar region has cooled its body down.

That was the reason. It was actually a simple principle. It was easy to think of it as a boiling pot of curry. Hot curry was impossible to bore a hole or slice into when it was boiling. The holes would be easily filled again regardless of how many times you sliced or stabbed it.

But what would happen if the curry was cold?

It thickened. Solidified. Anybody who refrigerated curry in a plastic container before would easily understand what was happening.

Hardened curry can be sliced with a knife or bore a hole!

The lava appeared to be the same. Lloyd figured that once the temperature dropped and the lava solidified, the giant wouldn't be able to quickly restore itself like now.

I can do it. This is doable. How lucky am I!

Gliding through the gust of biting wind that started to swirl through Hell's sky, Lloyd stared at the Hell gate with eyes full of tears.

Ah, my good-luck charm!

At this moment, the Hell gate looked like the most precious piece of treasure in his eyes. He had just opened it in order to escape. Thus, it never occurred to him that it would connect to the polar region and grant him hope for victory.

"Okay, time to knuckle down! Ggoming!" called Lloyd.

"Ggoming!" exclaimed Ggoming.

"Let's get down first!"

"Ggomiming!"

Ggoming flew lower against the wind, and just when he thought he was in Javier's earshot, Lloyd shouted, "Javier!"

Javier responded to the shout by throwing a glance at Lloyd about 200 yards away.

"There! Above you! Do you see the Hell gate in the air?"

Javier nodded. Infusing his voice with more mana, Lloyd boomed, "There! The cold air is coming out now! The giant is growing cold because of that! I think! We can defeat it!"

Javier nodded again. He, too, had been feeling the same way.

It’s all because of the Hell gate Master Lloyd has opened up.

Javier saw the Lava Giant shivering against the cold wind, and it was clear that the freezing wind was the cause as Lloyd shouted to him just then. In that case, the giant wouldn’t be able to heal as fast as it did a while ago.

I must play my part here without any mistakes.

Javier remembered how Lloyd had come to Hell because of his trust in him. So, he could not let Master Lloyd down. He had to get the job done, even if it was dangerous. Javier believed that was his primary duty while escorting his young master through Hell, to begin with.

Grab! Veins bulged on the back of his hand that grabbed the sword. From that moment, Javier’s offense started to become fiercer.

Slash! Without any mercy or hesitation, with nothing but conviction, Javier slashed and slayed on repeat. With only one target in mind, his sword cut, slashed, and sliced into every part of the Lava Giant’s body.

“Grrr! Achoo! Grrr! Grr!”

The Lava Giant had been flabbergasted by the sudden freezing coldness. And now, the giant was at a loss in front of Javier’s attacks which were growing more brutal by the second. Its whole body was sliced and slashed by the aura, but it regenerated the wounds nonetheless. Its regeneration speed, however, gradually slowed down as the cold winds cooled its temperature. Eventually, the giant realized that it could die if the current situation continued. It didn’t think it would remain intact if the silver-haired knight struck down on its cold and hardened body. As such, it arrived at one conclusion.

“See you next time! Achoo! Grrrr!”

The giant wheeled around as it received dozens of aura slashes, openly exposing its back to Javier. And it started to run as it limped.

“Eh? Could it be?!” Lloyd mumbled as he watched the scene from the sky. Just then, he was gripped with an ominous feeling. The feeling brewed in him, strong and thick like a broth that had been cooking for ten years And soon, his premonition turned into reality.”

Stomp! Stomp! Stomp!

“That bastard! It’s getting away!” Lloyd shrieked. And it really was. The Lava Giant was bolting away as the situation was becoming unfavorable for it.

What kind of monster does that?

Lloyd almost grabbed the back of his neck in stress. How could he not? That monster appeared out of the blue and ransacked the whole construction scene and ignored Lloyd’s effort to stop it. Yet, now it was running away right when it was put in a slightly disadvantageous position?

“Don’t lose it!” Lloyd’s shout grew more hurried, but it wasn’t simply because he was nettled by the giant’s opportunistic behavior.

If we lose the giant now, the construction is really over!

Lloyd was certain of it. If he lost the Lava Giant now and failed to stop it once and for all, he may never get a chance to catch it again in the future.

I don’t know about the others, but I’m sure of that. Without a doubt. I’ll never get another opportunity to kill it, if not now!

The reason was simple. The Hell gate that he had just opened up could only bring in a limited amount of wind. Those sharp winds couldn’t go very far out.

Of course. The wind may be freezing cold, but it’s coming through a hole only a few dozen feet wide. But Hell is so vast compared to that!

To analogize, this was the same as installing an air conditioner only good for a small room in a giant mansion.

In that case, it's only cool at the very front of the air conditioner. It quickly gets hot once you move away from it by even a little.

Just then, Lloyd recalled his life in South Korea, particularly the searing days of summer. It went without saying that his room didn't have an air conditioner. It'd be a luxury for him, given that his room was the oldest and cheapest one in the market. And so, on days when the heat was deadly and unbearable, he used to head to nearby banks and residence centers to get some cool air for free.

But it wasn't a heavenly place. The people there used the lowest setting on the air conditioner to reduce their electricity bill. How cheap!

The bank was large, but the air conditioner was quite weak. And so, Lloyd had to stay right in front of the air conditioner to get the cool air. Thanks to this valuable experience, he was able to see through the Lava Giant right away.

It knows that the cold air will disappear as soon as it moves away from this area!

The giant knew that it had to get away from this place, far from the Hell gate until the cold winds became warm again. Soon afterward, its body would run hot again and wouldn't receive any damage from being attacked. Its invincible body would be back.

I'm sure that is the giant's line of thought. But what if things do develop according to its plan? I'll neither be able to kill it nor put a stop to it. The construction project extends outside this area after all. The railroad stretches 86 miles long!

In other words, if it slipped away today and decided in the future to continue disrupting construction, there was a chance for the giant to wreak havoc at any time when it was outside the reach of the winds coming from the Hell gate. This meant that he and Javier's efforts to stop it would be meaningless.

I can open the Hell gate only once. Nowhere else. I can keep this gate opened like this, but I can't open additional gates.

And so, the Lava Giant must be caught here. The first step in achieving that goal was stopping it from running.

"Get it!" Lloyd shouted with a pleading heart. "Attack its legs first!"

Lloyd picked up the shovel and urged Ggoming to fly. From that moment, Lloyd launched a series of attacks on the Lava Giant in the sky while Javier did so from the ground. Lloyd ceaselessly used the triple mana blast, striking the giant's knees and shins. Javier joined his efforts and slashed and swung down on its lower torso over and over again. Each time it was attacked, blood-like lava dripped and burst out from its two legs. And soon, it started to limp from losing heat, which slowed down its regeneration. But...

"Grr! Grrr!"

Lava Giant couldn't be stopped. Even when its limping grew much more evident and dragging more explicit, the Lava Giant moved its two feet without ever stopping, each big step taking itself far away from the Hell gate. At the same time, Lloyd's face darkened.

Shoot!

The giant couldn't be resisted. It couldn't be pinned to the ground. Even with the bluster of freezing wind from the polar region, it was impossible to freeze the inside of that huge lava lump. Only the outside was being cooled, so countless thrashings and piercings and slayings had no effect. Just some delay, but the regeneration didn't stop. Realizing that the corners of Lloyd's eyes teared up a little.

The giant is too big. I need a giant, a big one, to stop it with force in moments like these. That would be just perfect. Oh, I wish I had Bibeong with me!

A bitter pang of regret filled Lloyd’s heart as he thought that things would be different if Bibeong was here.

Bibeong is 328 feet tall. He’s also chubby and heavy.

Though the Lava Giant was twice bigger than him, it seemed plausible for Bibeong to hang on its legs and drag it down when it had such a bad limp. But that was a meaningless fantasy, and he knew that.

I shouldn’t have lent Bibeong to the queen for free. You idiot!

If he could, Lloyd wanted to go back to four months ago, clutch his collar, and shout at himself to either keep Bibeong or ask for a high rental fee. In particular, to not give anything for free even family members didn’t lend each other things for free. Lloyd wanted to yell into the ears of his past self at the top of his lungs.

Dammit. Dammit!

The construction seemed to end with a debacle because he had thoughtlessly lent Bibeong like a fool. Now, the strand of hope that had appeared in front of his eyes was ripped apart. His three months’ worth of efforts were about to go down the drain. He was about to fail in rescuing the dragon's soul and obtaining the Dragon King’s support.

Why did you have to lend him for free, Lloyd?!

His eyes were wet now because he regretted his decision too sordidly. Meanwhile, the Lava Giant continued to make a run, still limping. Even though Javier was still throwing auras with greater ferocity, the Lava Giant didn’t cease its run.

“Ha...”

Lloyd had seen a faint ray of hope when the Hell gate opened with a flurry of cold wind. But now, there really was no other method. He had to admit that. He let out a sigh.

Lloyd stared at the back of the Lava Giant, feeling helpless and empty like when someone else snatched the last Buy 1 Get 1 Free noodle pack left in the supermarket. And so, it was unbeknownst to Lloyd that he held another solution, a hopeful one. In the Arctic Sea not so far off from the Hell gate, the Bone Dragon, the youngest recruit in the Skeleton Corps, was there. It was there, dutifully following Lloyd's order to stay low in the Arctic Sea when it sensed Lloyd's presence. Clack!

It's Lloyd! This is the smell of Master Lloyd!

Splash! Like a puppy that smelled the owner after a long time, the Bone Dragon was tickled pink. And it threw its head out of the water with a splash and discovered the Hell gate overhead.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 240: Noise Pollution Complaint (3)

Northern sea. Three days ago, the Bone Dragon had arrived at the bitter cold polar region where there was only ice, biting wind, and waves. It was there to fulfill the order of its master, Lloyd.

Lay low in the northern sea of the capital for a while.

The assignment had become the Bone Dragon's sole point of focus. Lloyd was the first master it served after being dominated by the Zombie Domination skill, and so, the Bone Dragon loved its master, Lloyd. It yearned to be praised, and that required complying with his orders. So, it flew north day and night until a sea appeared. It was satisfied for a split second until it realized it shouldn't be content. The sea stretched north without an end in sight.

Clack! North. North and only north. To the most northern part. Lloyd had told the Bone Dragon to hide in the northern sea. It believed that it would be lavished with praise once it traveled far north of this world.

With that thought, a sense of excitement rushed through the Bone Dragon. It started to put more force into its fluttering wings. Toward the north, it flew on and on in almost religious zeal until the dragon finally arrived at the sea of the polar region, which sat far north of the planet.

Clack! The Bone Dragon shook its large skull as soon as it arrived at the destination and studied the planet's magnetic field with the magnetite laden in its horn. Thanks to that, it confirmed in satisfaction that it was in the far north. This meant that Lloyd would shower the dragon with praise as long as it quietly stayed hidden in there. Filled with satisfaction and conviction, the Bone Dragon dove into the sea, breaking several feet of ice and enjoying a cold bath. But its original plan turned out to be quite a challenge as the neighbors were very cold to the newcomer.

Gaargh!

The first resident of the sea that took action was the Gigatitan. It boasted a body length of 295 feet and a weight of 2,500 tons. And it also possessed a shock-absorbing shell. The Gigatitan was a sea monster with a formidable physique. However, in the presence of the Bone Dragon, it was nothing but a pestering lobster.

Clack! Flick! The Bone Dragon sent a flick at the Gigatitan, who scurried away in fear for its life with just one blow. And the dragon felt a wave of boundless trust for Lloyd, realizing the greatness of its master once again from the stately battle.

“If monsters like the Gigatitan try to harass you, just flick them with your foreleg. You’re stronger.”

Master Lloyd had assured it so, and his words turned out to be true. This excited the Bone Dragon even more, which marked the beginning of its ruthless attacks against the northern sea monsters that tried to pick a fight with the newcomer trespassing on their territory. The emperor whale that was as big as the gigatitan yet faster, the ginormous shark Teralodon that had a charming set of straight teeth, and the strongest predator of the sea, Kraken. They were all beaten with a light flick from the dragon. And sooner or later, the most powerful predators at the top of the underwater ecosystem appeared. The Mermaid Corps.

“We can no longer sit and watch the monster guided by evil magic defile the sea! My dear sisters!”

“Streamline with flexibility and force!”

“Dolphin kick without any hesitation or restraint!”

“Sisters, advance!”

The mermaids were indeed powerful. It wasn’t possible for them to not be strong. This was especially true looking at the swimmers on the earth. Michael Phelps, the best swimmer in the world who held eight Olympic gold medals, was told to undergo six hours of hectic training each day. And such hellish training was done for six days every week.

But what about the mermaids? They swam for 24 hours! Seven days a week! Swimming was a way of life for them, a part of their identity. And so, their bodies were a weapon in every sense of the word.

They owned a physique that made a sturdy Olympian look like a child in comparison. Their shoulders were as wide as the Pacific Ocean, their pecs were thick enough to bounce off meteors, their abs were so defined that one could literally use them as a washboard, and their veins were so vivid that they looked like worms. They were swimmers who spent their entire lives going through extreme and hardcore training under the ocean. Furthermore, there were 1,000 of those terrifying mermaids.

They had enough strength to easily dismember most Gigatitans in three parts—their head, chest, and stomach—in under 30 seconds. But how did the Bone Dragon react when it was faced with the charging Mermaid Corps? It was in high spirits.

Clack! Clack!

The mermaids were too fast for the dragon to flick them. When it was lucky and managed to strike, they simply endured the pain with the thick shield of their muscles and got back on their feet. There was considerable force behind their strikes. However, their attack only made for a relaxing and rejuvenating massage for the dragon’s tense bones and joints after its long flight here. The mermaids also had great endurance. Their impressive lung capacity was what allowed them to prolong the battle for three days straight without losing momentum.

Thanks to them, the Bone Dragon wasn’t ever bored during those three days after it arrived at the polar region. I was happy and felt fulfilled. The dragon wished it could share this joy with its Master.

However, it knew that was impossible since Lloyd was in Hell. The Bone Dragon thought that was a pity. That could be why the dragon felt elated when it suddenly sensed Lloyd’s mana nearby.

Clack! At first, the Bone Dragon thought it was dreaming. But no, it undoubtedly sensed Lloyd’s mana. The mutual location tracking feature of the Zombie Domination skill had been deactivated ever since Lloyd went to Hell, but it had started to work again. So, the Bone Dragon could tell that its master was near!

Clack! Clack! Splash! The Bone Dragon snapped its head up, tossing its glance toward the sky above the sea where Lloyd's mana was coming from. Then it saw the 16-foot tall Hell gate hanging in the air about 328 feet from the sea and felt the heat of Hell flowing out from it. In addition, it sensed the region's time zone starting to adjust to that of Hell. The moment the Bone Dragon perceived the adjustment, it was convinced that Lloyd was on the other end of the Hell gate.

Kaboom! In sheer onrush of joy, the Bone Dragon flung itself high from the sea, wagging its pelvis and shaking off the mermaids glued to it. Then it made its way toward the Hell gate. However, it failed to enter inside.

Thump! The Bone Dragon was too big to pass through the Hell gate, which was only 16 feet in diameter. But it wasn't flustered as there was another way to get to the other end.

Claaack! The Bone Dragon took apart all its joints, from its large skull to its pelvis. And after that, it lined the bones up in the air, leading each one to pass through the Hell gate like a railroad car. Afterward, it flew into Hell without hesitation and pieced back its body again.

Claaack! Clack! Clack! Once it was done with the assembly, it surveyed the area. The landscape of this place was poles apart from the polar region it was a while ago. In a flash, it located Lloyd.

Clack! The Bone Dragon spotted Lloyd flying low on the parrotbill, so it zoomed off at an explosive speed toward him and landed nearby. With a banging, crushing sound, the Bone Dragon wagged its tail, even flipping over and revealing its belly to show its happiness. It waited earnestly for Lloyd to praise it.

But instead, Lloyd cried out, "Hey! Let's skip the pleasantries since we're short on time! If you're here, do what you came here for! Catch that thing!"

Creak? The Bone Dragon cocked its head to the side in confusion and tried to make sense of Lloyd's lukewarm response to its happy greeting. No, Master Lloyd had shouted at it as if he was in a panic. The Bone Dragon wanted to know why he was acting like that, so it turned to the direction where he was pointing at. And there, the Bone Dragon spotted the Lava Giant stomping away. Just then, the Bone Dragon's eyes were filled with rage.

Clack! It's because of that giant. That giant stirred Lloyd into a panic. That giant prevented it from getting a warm welcome from Lloyd. Therefore, that giant must be destroyed!

Claaack! Enraged, the Bone Dragon leaped from the ground, flying across hundreds of feet in one leap and landing right in front of the Lava Giant. And it grabbed its enemy.

Boooom! The Bone Dragon and the Lava Giant. The two monsters with similar physiques collided. For the first time, the unstoppable escapade of the Lava Giant came to a pause.

"Grrrrr? Grr?"

The Lava Giant's eyes widened when the Bone Dragon suddenly appeared and grabbed it. Confusion rushed through its mind, and it wanted to wrench off the other's grip. However, the giant couldn't.

"Grrragh! Grr-!"

So, the Lava Giant breathed out lava fire at the head of the Bone Dragon and clutched the ribs of its intruder with a boiling-hot lava grip. The Lava Giant expected its opponent to panic at the heat, but that was incorrect. The dragon didn't react to the heat at all, and the reason was very simple. Quite literally, the dragon was nothing but bones. As a result, the hot lava felt more like a heated blanket to the creature.

Claaack! The Bone Dragon showed greater strength, causing the Lava Giant to slowly step back in alarm.

Watching the situation, Lloyd yelled, “Good! Keep pushing it!”

Lloyd inwardly exclaimed in joy. The Bone Dragon showed up just in time and stopped the Lava Giant from getting away. Lloyd’s eyes were full of pride and affection as they gazed at the youngest member of the Skeleton Corps.

My precious little boy!

Truth be told, Lloyd never expected the Bone Dragon to show up. Why would he? About four months ago, right before he crossed over to Hell, he had ordered the Bone Dragon to hide in the northern sea of the capital. It never occurred to Lloyd that the dragon would take his order so seriously and hide all the way in the polar region.

But then I could feel that lovable dragon of mine approaching me.

He felt so from the mutual location tracking feature available in the Zombie Domination skill, which he had used to recruit the Bone Dragon. He sensed it was nearby, moving closer to him. Lloyd was overjoyed. And so now, it was time to finish off the Lava Giant that ruined his construction site.

“Javier! Let’s go!”

It was time for an all-out attack. While the Bone Dragon was holding on to the giant and causing its body to cool near the Hell gate, Lloyd had to finish off the Lava Giant.

If his plan succeeded, he could complete the construction and reap the massive rewards of his months of hard work. With that mindset, Lloyd grabbed the shovel and urged Ggoming to fly. He coordinated with Javier on the ground, hurtling toward the Lava Giant right then and laying a series of attacks without holding back on anything.

Kaboom! Starting with the mana blast and the triple mana blast, Lloyd aimed at the giant’s knees, ankles, back, and other joints. He even aimed at its most private area, although it was a bit of a low blow. The Lava Giant was shaken and flinched. Of course, its wounds regenerated soon enough as the lava hadn't completely fooled yet. However, Lloyd didn't care.

If hitting isn't enough, then I just have to keep going until it is!

Lloyd decided to tie the giant to the ground until the lava grew completely cold. To that end, he had to give everything to hitting the monster even though it seemed hopeless. He needed to slash, pierce, and damage the giant as much as possible. That was the only way to ensure the arctic wind blowing through the Hell gate would cool its body.

Duh! When you're drinking hot broth, you don't just stare at it until it cools down! You whisk it with a spoon and blow at it!

The same principle applied here. He would create holes into its body with the mana blast, and Javier's aura would add more of them. Jab, penetrate, slash. And as its whole body became damaged, the hot lava inside it would naturally be exposed to the cold wind. The heat would then escape faster. But Lloyd didn't stop there. He instead used every means possible to steal the heat from the giant's body. One method he used involved Hamang.

"Hamang!" Lloyd called earnestly. "It's always hot here, right?"

"Hamang?"

"How would you like to drink ice water?"

"Hamang!"

"Then go and spray it here!"

Lloyd threw Hamang to the other end of the Hell gate. More specifically, he was thrown across the air into the polar region from Hell. Hamang plunged into the Arctic Sea and started to drink salty water to his heart's content.

"Hamang! Hamamamang!" Sluuurp! Swoosh! His body grew 229 feet tall in a wink. Next, he spewed the water downward.

"Humu-mung!"

Thwack! The violent water stream sent Hamang 328 feet off the ground, and he instantly changed the direction of the water jet toward the Lava Giant visible through the Hell gate.

Swaaa! The gush of icy water passed the Hell gate in a straight line, like tap water jetting out of a hose. In return, this forced the giant, who was exposed to the arctic winds while being held in place by the Bone Dragon, to take a freezing shower on top of everything.

“Grrrr! Achoo!”

The giant’s sneezing grew worse. And its temperature started to drop at a faster speed amid the thick volume of vapor.

“Don’t stop! Keep going!” Lloyd encouraged more earnestly.

Javier’s attack grew fiercer. Hamang continued to shoot water on repeat. The Bone Dragon took hold of the giant with more tenacity. The body of the Lava Giant cooled at a faster speed. This slowed down the damage regeneration speed.

And its movement started to grow duller. As though it was freezing up by the merciless coldness, the giant’s boiling red skin started to thicken and turn black. The inside shown between the cracks started to blacken a little by little as well. And just when Lloyd judged that it was hardened enough, Lloyd bawled.

“Now!“

At Lloyd’s shouting, the Bone Dragon pushed the giant, which caused it to stagger back. When the distance between the two increased for the first time, Javier rushed in between.

Swoosh! With his feet on the land made of volcanic ash, cutting through the heat, he coldly passed an eye over the Lava Giant.

...!

Silently, hundreds of aura strands swept over the Lava Giant without giving it any time to think. And next, welcoming messages started to pour down in front of Lloyd.

Ding Dong!

[You have appropriately made use of your wisdom, unexpected luck, and trustworthy allies. Thanks to that, you have succeeded in destroying the living disaster of Hell, the Lava Giant Dunkleos.]

[For this miraculous battle, you are awarded a legendary title.]

[You have earned a new title.]

[A new title <Frozen Hands, Frozen Feet> has been created.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 241: Hell Express Ticket (1)

[A new title <Frozen Hands, Frozen Feet> has been created.]

Eek?!

Lloyd swallowed as he looked at the message floating in front of his eyes. His glance flicked over to the Lava Giant that was being chopped into hundreds of pieces.

“Grrrr!”

The giant let out a shriek before it died. Its cry grew faint until it was heard no more. Instead, the thudding sound of rocks hitting the ground reverberated in the air. Boom! Crash! Thump!

The searing hot rocks were half-solidified. It looked like they could no longer be fused back together.

They’ve cooled down too much for that.

Lloyd clenched his fists. Javier’s sword deeply pierced into the giant’s body when it was sufficiently cooled. With that, the giant had finally been defeated. The message that appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes proved it.

Let’s see.

Collecting his breath, Lloyd read the message.

[Frozen Hands, Frozen Feet]

[Title Level: Scary Story]

The Lava Giant is scary. The Lava Giant is hot. The Lava Giant is violent. So shh. You can never anger the giant. That is what we believed in. The King of Hell is busy. Hell’s Knights hate doing rough work. We never dared to call them, so we just got beaten up. We thought staying low was the answer in life. But it wasn’t. There was always a way.

Lloyd Frontera, that human. I never expected that human to start this. Wonder what it is? Let's close the door first if you want to hear it. The cold wind is blowing... A-achoo!

[Compliment Effect: You have played a critical role in destroying the most dangerous and violent creature in Hell, the Lava Giant. Thousands of demons clearly saw your feat, and this heroic tale will spread across Hell. Thanks to that, you will be feared and respected by the demons equal to Hell's Knight. Moreover, you will not suffer from hypothermia in cold climates and will not freeze to death.]

[Title Region: All Hell regions. All areas whose annual average climate is 32 °F and below.]

[Active Period of Title: 120 Years (Human world)/ 100,000 Years (Hell)]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 6]

[Current CP: 1,142]

Wow.

A smile hung from one ear to the other, and Lloyd couldn't suppress it.

This title has an amazing effect too.

Lloyd could sense the power of this new title the moment he saw it.

First, about the part where I'll be feared and respected like Hell's Knights by the demons of Hell. This is going to help me out considerably in the remaining construction moving forward.

The railroad construction had been a challenge because it was taking place in the special environment of Hell, relying on special laborers, the demons. Ensuring that the construction went smoothly was a hellish job.

How could it not? The lava makes the ground unstable all the time, and the demons are an infamously unruly bunch. Ha… Just thinking about this is making me go bald from stress.

It was a burden he had been carrying alone for the past three months. Among the existing difficulties, the issue that gave Lloyd the hardest time was controlling the demons. They were extremely disobedient.

Without Javier's constant surveillance, 20,000 of the 30,000 demons would have run away already.

Demons, in the first place, were impossible to correct. So, he could only use force to put them to work. The problem was that doing so put a burden on him.

As soon as I pay less attention to the construction site, I will lose my authority over them right away.

Then the construction field would quickly descend into chaos. At worst, it would become a complete disaster. There were similar instances in South Korea very rarely where construction went down in flames. Lloyd had seen it himself and heard about it too.

But now, that concern is off my shoulders.

In the hierarchy of Hell, the Hell's Knights were right beneath the King of Hell. Thanks to the title, Lloyd now held equal authority as the knights. And he looked forward to having a proportionately easier time controlling the demons.

Plus, there's the immunity to hypothermia and freezing to death. This is another awesome effect.

This effect wasn't useful in Hell, where the whole place boiled with heat. But if he ever traveled to a numbingly cold region? The effect would be extremely useful.

I learned this from direct experience when I came down to Hell.

The title he had obtained by building the Qanat back in the sultan's kingdom came to his mind. "The Top Gun from the West." This new title had a similar effect to that one.

The effect that prevents me from getting dehydrated in desert regions with an annual climate of 104 °F and above.

Lloyd was able to survive in Hell all this time because of that effect. He could stay here in comfort even when Javier was sweating bullets from the suffocating heat. The effect he had acquired proved to be extremely useful in this place, at least. And what about the effect he had acquired from this new title?

You never know. I might visit a cold region sometime in my life.

Therefore, the more effects like these he had, the better off he was. Similar to accumulating antibodies from a vaccine, hoarding titles always helped in the long run. Lloyd then closed the message with immense happiness. But earning a new title wasn't the only thing that filled his heart with satisfaction.

I can resume the construction now.

It had been a laborious three months to get to this point. The roadbed had just been completed, and he was in the middle of working on the ties. In other words, the construction was soon to be over in a month or two. Now that the threat of his efforts going down in flames was solved, he could continue working in peace. His pounding heart calmed down a little. Relieved, Lloyd rushed to Javier first.

"Hey," Lloyd called, "are you all right?"

"Yes, thankfully." Javier was catching his raspy breath, with the debris of the giant all scattered around him. His whole body was soaked with sweat. It made sense.

Even though there was cold air coming out from the Hell gate, he ran around and fought against the Lava Giant in this place filled with fire and smoke. Thankfully, he doesn't look like he's hurt anywhere.

Lloyd studied Javier with concern filling his gaze. However, he spoke in contrary to those feelings of his.

"Are you hot?" blurted Lloyd.

"Yes, a little..." gasped Javier.

"Tsk. You're a weakling." Lloyd shook his head.

"..."

"Who cares if you're a grandmaster and can shoot auras? This much heat is enough to make you get soaked in sweat. Am I wrong?" Lloyd smirked and lashed out at Javier.

Javier removed a sweaty strand of hair stuck on his forehead. "I may be sweating a lot, but come to think of it, I think I am in a better state than you."

"Excuse me?" shrilled Lloyd. "You are in a better state than me?"

"Yes."

"How?"

"Even when I am soaked in sweat and covered with ash, I am better looking than you at your cleanest, Master Lloyd. "

"..."

"I feel thrilled whenever I realize this fact," gloated Javier with a smug "It never gets old. Nothing is better than being handsome."

Lloyd inwardly wished for all disgustingly beautiful people to get hemorrhoids. He wondered if this was what it felt like to fire a tiny bullet with a slingshot while giggling, only to be shot back with a 14-ton GBU-57

MOP. Blinking back bitter tears, Lloyd cried, “Hey, you think this is the time to prattle?”

Javier said nothing, dumbstruck.

“Can’t you see that the construction is a mess? We have to hurry and take care of it. You don’t have time to just sit back and catch your breath. Come on.”

Still, Javier stared at Lloyd without saying anything.

“Come on! Move it. Hurry,” urged Lloyd.

“...”

Lloyd forced Javier to stand up while he was catching his breath. He heartlessly pushed the knight’s back and started cleaning up the site. Even then, the faint smile hanging on his mouth didn’t disappear. To Lloyd's relief, the unexpected crisis had been overcome, and Javier was safe. That alone was enough for him. Now, it was time to clean up the site.

***

The construction field was cleaned up in no time. Though more than a thousand demons had died, which Lloyd was apologetic and hurting for, and about 300 yards of the roadbed were destroyed by the Lava Giant’s stomping, most of the demons had survived. So, the bed was able to be quickly restored. Moreover, the team gained a giant crane, no, an additional member. It was the Bone Dragon.

Clack! Creak! The Bone Dragon, who joined the team late, worked harder than anyone else. It unwaveringly abided by the rule for the undead to not receive any wages or breaks. If there was one thing the dragon aspired to gain from working, it was praise from Lloyd.

“Hey?”

Clack!

“Can you scoop out the lava pooled over there?” Lloyd pointed to an area.

Clack!

“Good. Good job. Now, let’s fill the hole you left behind with volcanic ash. Make sure to thoroughly flatten it out with your feet.”

Clack! Creak!

“My, good boy! As a reward, I’ll give you a name. How about Draggy?”

Clack! Creak!

The Bone Dragon was more motivated to work now that it was named as a reward. Thanks to its zealous attitude, the other fantastical creatures were motivated as well.

“Ppo, Bang, Ha, Ggo!”

Just a few months ago, all of them fought tooth and nail against the Bone Dragon. But what about now? They still did, but not for the same reason. They weren’t very happy about the Bone Dragon, the new recruit in their group, getting all the spotlight in the construction field and even receiving a new name. A fierce sense of competition burned inside them. They resolved to show off their true skills and worked with inextinguishable zeal to reclaim their glory.

“Ppodong! Ppododong!”

Ppodong engrossed himself in cleaning up the leftover soil from where the roadbed was constructed. He blew on the hot volcanic ash and put them inside his cheeks, moving as quickly as he could. At the same time, Bangul knuckled down to produce rebars.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

Even if this place was hot, there were still areas that required the usage of rebars. One instance of this was in attaching the abutment between the rails made of centipede shells. Similar to melted silicone from a silicone gun, the rebars held different materials together. As for Hamang, he played his part to the best of his ability as well.

“Humung! Humu-mung!”

Splash! Hamang guzzled the hot spring water in various places of Hell to his heart’s content, and he soon became a 229-foot tall giant roller. Rolling around the construction site, he flattened the areas that needed his contribution. Ggoming also worked hard every day, the same as the rest of the others.

“Hey, Ggoming! Let’s gooo!” said Lloyd.

“Ggoming!” exclaimed Ggoming.

Ggoming flew around the construction site carrying Lloyd until his wings developed a heat rash. The demons joined the momentum and labored in the construction site with greater earnestness. Lloyd now held the same amount of authority as Hell’s Knight, and the demons listened to all of his commands regardless of how menial a chore was. And so, thanks to everyone’s zealous contribution, the construction field was restored in a blink of an eye. The tie construction picked up speed as well, progressing at a scary pace.

The gravel ballast was laid out tightly, and a transverse sleeper was chosen as the method to lay the tie to distribute the weight of the train and maintain the gauge of a track. Next, the standard-length rail, 82 feet in length, was processed from the centipede shells and tucked in the ground. They were then bonded as if they were welded like melted rebars. The last part of the construction was the platform. That, too, wasn’t particularly complicated or difficult to complete.

In the first place, I only need to create two stations. One at the Hell Castle and the other at the edge of Hell.

The starting point and destination. He could only fashion two stations at both ends. Lloyd decided to simplify the structure of the stations to guarantee swift construction and easy maintenance.

It doesn’t have to be complicated. I just need to lay rails on two sides and place a concrete platform in the middle of them. It’s not like the train will hold any fussy passengers. It just needs to conveniently transport a large number of souls.

Lloyd thus focused his efforts on maximizing the space in the platform. The space needed to be vast, so the demons wouldn’t get caught in traffic as they loaded and unloaded innumerable souls. A massive amount of rebars and volcanic ash concrete were utilized. Accordingly, the demons poured their blood, sweat, and tears into the project without ever leaving the work site.

It took one whole month to finish the platform. And finally, 984-foot long and 328-foot wide platforms were built at both ends, one in the Hell Castle and another in the edge of Hell. Lloyd had proposed the project “Hell Express 666” to the King of Hell five months ago. This moment marked the completion of the very first railroad in Hell, which stretched 86 miles long.

“Finally... It’s done!”

“Waaah!”

“We’re free!”

“We can go home now!”

“I can slack off and worry my parents!’

“Hurray!”

The day the railroad was constructed, there was no one happier than the demons working out on the field. Did they feel proud for completing a construction that would be remembered throughout Hell’s history? Not at all.

They simply teared up in joy, moved by the sole fact that they were liberated from enslavement. They could now go back to their life as good-for-nothing bums. Of course, they didn’t forget to request a reward for their efforts, and they selected the one-horned demon to represent them to strike a negotiation with Lloyd.

“Master Lloyd! I have something to tell you,” the one-horned demon said.

“What is it?”

“Don’t you think we worked back-breakingly hard up to this point?”

“Oh, did you?” Lloyd picked his ear.

“Yes! So, we ask to be compensated! Please give us our proper wages!”

“Not happening. Scram.” Lloyd flicked his finger.

“Thank you so much!”

Just like that, the negotiation was over. The other demons who received the news nodded in sheer admiration. They resolved in their hearts that they would be like Lloyd and become an evil employer when they had the chance to exploit other demons. Then each of them went back to their hometown. It was only then that Lloyd isolated himself and built something.

Clang! Twang! Clang!

Right after all the demons went back home, in the corner of a desolated platform on the edge of Hell, Lloyd held up the hammer and a chisel. He carved out a volcanic rock he had gotten from someplace, hammering and chiseling. The shape was simple and rough without any delicate calligraphy. He simply pounded and carved out the words he had been keeping to himself.

<This memorial stone is for all the demons who sacrificed themselves to build the Hell Express.>

It was a memorial stone that paid tribute to the demons who died during the Lava Giant’s ambush.

I think this will suffice.

Lloyd stared at the completed stone with a wistful look. He erected this only now because he was afraid to receive comments and gazes of disappointment from the demons who would judge his kind character.

Still, this puts me at ease.

Sure, they were demons. But they had died tragically while they were working for him. So, he wanted to mourn and pay tribute, at least in this manner, even if this was only to satisfy his guilt. Lloyd thought this was the least he could do for them. After he finished building the secret memorial stone, he made his way toward the Hell Castle. It was time to receive his payment for the construction from the King of Hell.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 242: Hell Express Ticket (2)

“Master Lloyd, may I ask you one question?” It was Javier.

“Sure. Go ahead,” said Lloyd, giving him the green light.

“Why are you going alone?”

“Do you mean to the Hell Castle?”

“Yes.” Javier nodded as he darted his gaze at Lloyd, who was on Ggoming’s back. “I wonder if there is anything for me to do here all alone.”

“You bet there is. Why shouldn’t there be?” A smile spread across Lloyd’s face. “You have to protect this place while I’m away to report to the King of Hell. You never know with life. Another Lava Giant might come to raise hell like the last time. And the railroad we busted our guts to build could get destroyed. Am I wrong?”

“As I thought, is that your reason?” Javier’s eyes relaxed.

“What do you mean?”

“I was afraid you were abandoning me here.”

“The heck? Are you serious?”

“Yes,” Javier said firmly. “You are fully capable of doing so at any point in time.”

“Who do you see me as?” A frown appeared on Lloyd’s forehead.

“A sly, cheap, and petty person.”

“I see you even have… a list,” stated Lloyd.

“It’s convenient that way. Anyway...” Javier shrugged and gave a grin, which was a rare thing for him. “I will then hold down the fort here and protect this place as you ordered. Have a safe trip.”

“Ah, yes. And if I happen to abandon you, make sure to find your way home.”

“Find my way home? How-”

“You have that.”

Lloyd pointed at the sky with a smirk. The Hell gate was still in the sky. Lloyd continued to speak.

“That thing is not going to close anyway. The cold wind blowing out of it will lower the temperature around this area, which is good for us. It means that the lava will harden faster, stabilizing the railroad and ground with it. So, I intend to keep the gate open.”

“Wait then-”

“Yes, you’re right,” Lloyd interrupted. “Why would I abandon you? If something happens, you could always cross over the Hell gate. Then you’d be able to easily escape from here. Sure, it’s going to be chilly because it’s the polar region on the other side, but a grandmaster can’t possibly die while shivering from the mere cold, right?”

“...”

“So, you can swim from there to the Frontera fiefdom. Wow, give me a round of applause.”

“...”

“Ehem,” Lloyd cleared his throat as he saw Javier say nothing.

“...”

“Sorry, I was just kidding.”

“I clearly felt your sincerity,” Javier said at last.

“Fine. You got me.”

“I also realized that your apology was a joke.”

“Tsk. You’re too needlessly sharp.”

“Thank you. Now, hurry back from your trip.”

“Okay.”

Lloyd made Ggoming take off, and he quietly flew in silence for a while. It was only when they grew fairly distant from the edge of Hell that he let out a breath of relief.

“Haah. I did it.”

Lloyd meant that he succeeded in leaving Javier and taking a lone trip to the Hell Castle.

I was worried that he’d be stubborn about going with me for safety reasons.

Surprisingly, the man didn’t insist on doing that. It was a relief, and the reason was simple. Lloyd didn’t feel like going to the Hell Castle with him.

I have to meet the King of Hell. But the king keeps calling me Suho Kim.

That made Lloyd uncomfortable and nervous. Javier wasn’t a dull person, so he’d naturally get curious about the strange nickname the king had for him.

I want to avoid that kind of situation at all costs.

At worst, his true identity could be blown. How would Javier react if that happened? How would he treat him? Lloyd wondered but couldn’t imagine it in his head. That made him even more nervous and reluctant.

Anyway, I’m glad to go see the King of Hell alone without him.

The thought lightened his heart a little. Just then, something wiggled in his chest, and there came a grumbling voice.

“Hey... No one’s around you, right? Can’t you at least let me out during these kinds of moments?”

It was Frontera who had been hiding in Lloyd’s inner pocket. Ghost Frontera was grumbling. Lloyd shook his head.

“No. You can’t.”

“Why not?!”

“I can’t be bothered.”

“What?”

“If I get you out, you’re going to get all whiny and clingy. Am I wrong?”

“Hey, t-that’s-”

“I’m right. So, I’m not letting you out. You’re noisy and pesky,” firmly said Lloyd.

“Ha. So what, you’re going to keep me locked in here, you bastard?” Its voice was high now.

“It sounds a bit wrong to say that I’m locking you. Let’s say that I’m protecting you.”

“That’s the same thing! Eek! Argh!”

Lloyd suddenly felt something tumble and scuffle inside his inner pocket, and at last, his button popped open with Ghost Frontera sticking its head out.

“Whew! Ugh. I could barely breathe inside, seriously!” said Ghost Frontera in an accusing voice.

“...”

“Bastard. There’s no need to straighten your face like that. I’m not getting out. I’ll just stick my head out like this. Is this not allowed, either? Huh?”

“Haah...” sighed Lloyd.

“I’m the one who wants to sigh, punk. Think about it. It’s been already a month since I’ve been imprisoned in your inner pocket, crushed under Ppodong or those other things.”

“Must have been warm, comfy, and fluffy.”

“Nice, my ass.”

“...”

“All I want is to get some fresh air for the first time in a month, and you won’t even let me do that? Can you still call yourself a human being?”

“Yeah. I am a human. And you’re a ghost.”

“...”

“You were about to curse, weren’t you?” asked Lloyd, already knowing what Frontera would say.

“Of course.”

“Did you stop your reflexes because you were about to insult your parents by accident?”

“Dammit. I despise you.”

“Thank you. Thank you for hating me.”

“...”

Ghost Frontera clamped its mouth shut. Lloyd, who caused it to shut its mouth, enjoyed the satisfying silence. After a long silence, Frontera opened its mouth first.

“Hey, you fake,” called Frontera.

“…”

“Hey?” It called again.

“…”

“Oh, come on. Answer me now.”

“I can’t unless you call my name,” Lloyd replied in a relaxed voice.

“Hey, Lloyd. Happy now?” blurted Frontera with a frown.

“Sure. What do you want?”

“It’s about how you’ll help me.”

Ghost Frontera had been watching the outside scenery with its arms propped on the opening of Lloyd’s inner pocket. When Lloyd looked down, it had a surprisingly serious and grim gaze. He realized why it decided to stick its head out by force after silently remaining in his pocket for a month. It was to discuss this topic with him.

Does Frontera think that it’s my turn to help it since my construction is over? Or is it nervous because I might leave Hell like this?

Probably both. That must be the reason why Ghost Frontera insisted on having a conversation.

“What happened with that? You said you’d look around.”

The question wasn’t one he welcomed. Actually, it was a hard question for him. So, Lloyd replied with feigned nonchalance, “I haven’t found anything yet.”

“What? Still?”

“Yeah.”

“Why?”

Lloyd noticed its brows slightly knitting together. He crinkled its nose as well.

Tsk. This is why I didn’t feel comfortable talking with this dude.

Lloyd felt strangely indebted to Ghost Frontera, and that was the reason why he couldn’t dismiss its whining. Lloyd was annoyed and didn’t want to deal with it. But at the same time, he was apologetic toward Frontera. And so, he didn’t know how to react.

“I just couldn’t find a way to help you. Really.” he replied with the least amount of emotion possible in his voice.

“You couldn’t find a way?”

“Yeah.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.”

“Isn’t it more like you didn’t try to find one?”

“...”

Its questions started to feel like a nail. And its interrogating questions continued to come.

“Hey, be frank with me. You don’t have any intent to help me out, right?”

“Hey, come on. It’s not like that-”

“But it’s the truth.”

“…”

“Did you even try?” accused Frontera.

Lloyd seemed slightly offended. “I’m trying to think of ways to help!”

“Liar.”

“What?” Lloyd’s frown deepened.

“You think I don’t know?” Ghost’s voice dripped with rancor. “Thinking, my ass. You aren’t even bothering to think about this. You’ve been too preoccupied with thinking about how to construct the railroad or whatever it was the King of Hell told you to build. Am I wrong?”

“Hey.”

“Do you think I’ve been goofing around in your pocket for the past month? I was listening and brainstorming. Can you bastard honestly say that you ever thought about helping me for even a second?”

“Hey, watch your words.” Lloyd gritted his teeth. “You think it’s easy to help you out? In all seriousness, you don’t know how I can either. Still, I’m willing to find a way for me to. Do you really think that’s going to happen in a month? Really?”

“Ha. You and your silver tongue. I hear nothing but excuses.”

“What? Excuses?”

“Yeah. Excuses.” Ghost Frontera smirked in derision. “You think I don’t know what your plan is?”

“My plan?”

“To stall for time by saying you’re taking care of urgent matters first. And later, apologize, saying that you just can’t find any way to help me out. Then abandon me. That’s your plan.”

“...”

“First, you steal a happy man’s life, as well as his family and everything. And now, you’re playing with the ghost. Ha. You scumbag. You’re a despicable thief.”

“Hey.”

“What? Speak up if you have something to say.”

“Don’t talk that way. What does it change?”

“Nothing. That’s why I’m doing this,” said Frontera.

“What?” Lloyd’s frown deepened.

Ghost Frontera’s smirk deepened. “You won’t help me. I know, you bastard.”

“Ha... Seriously. Are you going to keep treating me like a criminal?”

“Of course. Can you even make any excuses for yourself?”

“I really wasn’t going to say this, but...” Lloyd, unable to hold any longer, spoke the very thing he’d been keeping to himself. “You were destined to die a year and a half later even if you didn’t lose your body. Did you know that?”

“What?” A scowl appeared on Ghost Frontera’s face.

“The pub where you made a scene every day. You were fated to vomit blood in the corner and die there.”

“Bastard! What are you talking about?!”

“Want me to go on?”

“...”

Ghost Frontera shut its mouth while Lloyd opened his, and the latter continued to speak the words he dared not tell anyone. The downfall of the Frontera barony in the novel. The tragic end of Lloyd, his parents, and his brother Julian. Lloyd narrated the story without any emotion, and Ghost Frontera intently listened without saying anything all the while. When Lloyd finished sharing the story, Ghost Frontera burst out in bitter laughter.

“Ha! So what? You want me to believe that?”

“...”

“Fine,” Ghost Frontera went on, “I’ll be generous, and let’s say that I do. But so what? You scumbag. You want me to bow down because you changed my family’s fate? Should I praise you? Is that what you want? Huh?”

“Praise, my foot. I don’t have any high expectations for you,” denied Lloyd.

“Then what are you trying to say?”

“I’m just stating the truth. You’re directly involved, so you should know about it.”

Lloyd’s voice was sharp as a knife. He was getting tired of arguing with the ghost.

“Fine,” Lloyd went on, “you might be right. I am a thief. You can curse me out all you want. Even now, to be honest, I don’t know how to help you. I’m at a complete loss. But is that so wrong of me?”

“...”

“Sure, if you say that it’s wrong, then I am wrong. I’ll be the bad guy here if I don’t help you out. But do you know what’s going to happen in that case? I’ll be the bad guy but still manage to live a good life without consequences. Then what, do you want me to die then? That isn’t it, either. I can’t think of anything else for me to do. “

“...”

“I really don’t know,” Lloyd’s voice was now tired. “I tried in my own way. Look what I’ve achieved ever since I got in your body. And yet, if you keep blaming me, I really don’t know what to do anymore. Do you understand?”

“Sure, since I was going to die anyway, I should be thankful that you let my family live in exchange for taking my body, right?”

“Hey, that’s not what I mean.”

“Bullshit. To me, it’s the same thing.”

“What are you...”

Lloyd was about to refute but stopped short when he cast a glance at the ghost. Ghost Frontera was crying.

“Yeah. I was set to die anyway. But you know what? If I did die, like you said, a year and a half later, bleeding in the corner of the pub, then I’d have been able to get judged here in Hell.”

“...”

“Yeah. If I did die, then I’d have been punished in Hell. I would have been able to hope for reincarnation after enduring my time here. But look at me now. What am I? Why am I like this? I no longer belong in the outside world or the underworld. I’m just a ghost, drifting around forever without any hope of reincarnation.”

“Hey...”

“Forget it. Sorry for pathetically whining at you bastard. Just do your job and scram.”

With that, Ghost Frontera carefully made its way back into his pocket. It never stuck out its head or pleaded to be let out. Lloyd tried to talk, but it didn’t answer.

“...”

He had no clue what to say in his current situation. Lloyd simply heaved a sigh with mixed emotions. He tried to focus on flying as he silently stroked Ggoming's feathers with a nonchalant face. And soon, the uncomfortable flight came to an end as they arrived at the Hell Castle. Past the familiar entrance, he went into the king's office.

"Lloyd Frontera is honored to be in the audience of the rightful King of Hell."

Lloyd paid his respect to the King of Hell. His office hadn't changed since the last time he visited. It had a large desk chair and an even bigger work desk with a mountain of documents on top. And even the King's quick glance at him as he took care of a breathtaking amount of tasks was the same.

"Are you here? State your request before anything else."

His weary attitude from being overworked was also no different. Holding back a wry smile, Lloyd replied, "Yes, I have completed the railroad construction you assigned to me previously."

"Is that so?"

"Yes, my lord."

"As far as I know, you also took down the Lava Giant."

"Yes, I did."

"It must have been tough."

"Yes," Javier said firmly. Thank you for your acknowledgment."

"Ha. I see you aren't even trying to feign modesty?"

"For there is no need for it."

"Is that so? Anyway, I see. Thanks to you, I was able to learn quite a lot about railroad construction," said Hellkaros.

“Wait, have you been watching the whole construction?” Lloyd lifted his brow.

“Of course.”

The King of Hell put his pen and paper down. His gaze glimmered through the rimmed glasses.

“I’ve understood the basic principles. Thanks to that, I think I have gotten an idea of how we should maintain the tracks.”

“Will you be all right without separate instructions?”

“Well, I would appreciate it if you offered a more detailed explanation. Your award for it should be sufficient as well,” said Hellkaros.

“Reward?” He didn’t expect to hear that.

“You give, and you take.”

The king’s answer was so nonchalant. Lloyd secretly clenched his fists.

As expected of the King of Hell.

The king hated free charity and preferred to live by the “give and take” principle. The king continued to speak.

“Suho Kim. If you tell me how I can manage the railroad, then I will give you one pass for the Hell Express.”

“The pass to use the Hell Express, my king?” Lloyd was slightly dazed.

“Yes.” The king nodded. “If you use this pass, if you die in the future or are sentenced to Purgatory because of your sins, you will be able to use Hell Express once no matter what.”

“You mean...”

“It means you can enter the Door of Reincarnation at the edge of Hell riding the train.”

“Woah.”

Lloyd unconsciously swallowed. How could he not? He realized the true meaning of the reward, this one pass to use the train.

It’s essentially a free ticket out of Hell, isn’t it?

This meant that any evil person or a soul bound to be in pain locked up in the Purgatory of Hell could go to the edge of Hell via the train and enter the Door of Reincarnation. In other words, one-time unconditional immunity to punishment and reincarnation.

It’s... awesome.

Lloyd’s heart thumped very fast when he thought how he’d secured a good time not only when he was alive but also when he was dead. The unexpectedly better reward made his fists clench, and Lloyd was glad that he’d decided to come down here. Just then, he flinched. Something came to his mind.

“...”

Lloyd’s attitude changed. His clenched fists relaxed, and the thumping heart grew calm. And his face looked deliberative. The change in his attitude was so evident that even the King of Hell noticed and became curious.

“Suho Kim, what is wrong? Do you have an issue with my reward?”

The King of Hell cocked his head to the side, curious whether Lloyd didn’t like the Hell Express ticket. Lloyd slowly lifted his gaze, and with a contemplative look on his face, he replied, “Oh, it is not that. I have no issue with regard to your reward. However...”

“However, what?”

“I have a question.”

“What is it?”

“This thing...” Lloyd slowly took his breath, organizing his thoughts in his head. Getting rid of greed in his heart, he resolved and asked, “This ticket you are planning to give me... Can a wandering ghost reincarnate with it?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 243: Those Who Left, Those Who Stayed (1)

“This ticket you are planning to give me... Can a wandering ghost reincarnate if it uses this?”

“What is that?”

Lloyd’s question was unexpected. The King of Hell scowled before saying, “Indeed, it can. It can reincarnate. The pass was made to grant that privilege in the first place. But why do you ask?”

“Actually...” mumbled Lloyd before making the confession. “There is a ghost I would like to help.”

“A ghost you would like to help?” replied the King of Hell. “I wonder if it’s the one I am thinking of.”

“Do you have a guess for who it is?”

“Of course,” the King of Hell chuckled and laughed. “Suho Kim. You are about to help the ghost of Lloyd Frontera, who started to wander around Hell after you have taken your body. Is my assumption wrong?”

“No, you are right.”

Lloyd conceded without a fight. This matter required him to gain the king’s permission anyway. It wasn’t something for him to hide in the first place. He continued to speak.

“Your assumption is right. I wish to give this train ticket to the ghost.”

“Why?” asked the King of Hell with curiosity in his voice.

“Excuse me?”

“You must have a reason. You see, the ticket I am bestowing you is an extremely valuable gift. It offers the tremendous benefit of being unconditionally exempt from punishment in Hell. Even if you have committed hundreds of unforgivable crimes, you can avoid being punished in Hell and attain a new life. I am sure you know the value of it."

"Yes, I am aware."

"And yet, you plan on giving such an incredible gift to the ghost? Why?" demanded the king.

"Because..."

Lloyd sucked in his breath and reflected on himself. Honestly, he couldn't pinpoint the reason himself. He simply followed his heart to make a decision, albeit a bit impulsively. It was a mystery to him even after he thought over his decision and reflected on himself.

"I don't know," said Lloyd at last.

"What? You do not know?" The king lifted his brow.

"Yes."

Laughter escaped Lloyd as he answered. He really didn't know the reason. But his heart was relieved when the decision was made. He wondered if he had lost his mind and just gave a chuckle instead.

"I really don't know. I just made the decision to do so. It is that simple. Ah, of course, I do think it is a waste. As you see, there are tears in my eyes." Lloyd approached closer.

"Hmm... Well..." the King of Hell observed. "You aren't lying."

"Yes, I do think I'm wasting this opportunity, and I ask myself why I am doing this. But even more strangely, I have no thoughts of changing my decision."

"Suho Kim. You are more foolish than you look."

"Yes," answered Lloyd with a sigh. "I think I am. But now, my heart is at ease due to my stupidity at the moment."

“Is that so?”

“Yes.”

It was truly a strange thing. He was giving away a tremendous gift without anything in return. Yet, his heart was light and filled with relief. And even though he said it was a wasted opportunity or whatever, truthfully speaking, he didn’t feel that way.

Tsk. It’s not because that hooligan Frontera made me weak, or because I feel guilty. I’m doing this because I’m tired of its whining. It is beyond annoying to hear Frontera whining, insisting, and begging for me to take responsibility and help out.

Lloyd thought this was an opportunity for him to get rid of one less burden of his. It was the cost of getting rid of this pesky burden. This was an investment. So, he concluded that he wasn’t being a fool. He was doing this for Arcos and Marbella Frontera. Lloyd reiterated these thoughts in his head and pulled himself together.

A bitter smile appeared on the King of Hell’s face. But his eyes grew soft.

Suho Kim.

The king concluded that Lloyd was a sly but not an evil person. His sly character was merely a result of trying to survive in extreme poverty.

I want him.

Lloyd was normally a stout-hearted man. However, in critical moments, he didn’t lose the humanity in him while also making sure to receive his proper dues. And so, the more the king saw of Lloyd, the more he wanted him.

This human. If he dies and ends up in Hell, I might as well just hire him and put him to work.

It looked like he wouldn’t need to share much of his authority with Lloyd. It seemed giving him discretionary power to act freely on his own would be enough. Delegating him that kind of power alone would...

He’d work the Knights and demons to death, just like he did while constructing the railroad.

The King of Hell was impressed with how Lloyd put 30,000 demons to work and wondered if this was what it felt like to be a grandfather who had a clever grandchild.

I will make you work under me once you die.

The King of Hell resolved his plan to scout Lloyd in the future and bent over before he spoke.

“Suho Kim. Are you really going to give up your Hell Express ticket for reincarnation to Ghost Frontera?”

“Yes, I will, my lord,” said Lloyd without any second of hesitation.

“Good. I think highly of your decision.”

“Thank you.”

“Do not be.”

The King of Hell smiled with a glow of satisfaction. Lloyd didn’t need the reincarnation ticket anyway since he would be mindlessly working next to him later on. Hiding his true motive, the king held out a piece of paper to Lloyd, the man in charge of the future in Hell.

“This pass bears my signature. Present it, and no one in Hell will ever stop you at the Door of Reincarnation,” instructed the King of Hell.

“Thank you.”

“Then, can the train be operated now?” asked the King of Hell.

“Oh, I just have to run a final test drive.”

“A test drive? Get it done quickly. I wish to get off work for the first time in 670,000 years.”

“Yes, my king.”

After paying his respect to the king, Lloyd removed himself from the office and headed to the Hell Express station at the Hell Castle. A prototype train, which was created for the test run, was there.

Woah. They built this better than I expected.

Lloyd had separately ordered the construction of the train while he focused on the construction of the railroad. Its structure was very primitive and simple. The massive carts that the demons used were connected in one line and their wheels were modified to fit the rails. Then bones and tarps were laid on top to protect everything from volcanic ash and flame sparks.

The train even utilized a manual engine. It moved by having eight demons at the very front car industriously pressing its lever and generating power through the pulley. And when the demons grew tired, another eight on standby would take their place.

So, the train adopted a bionic and eco-friendly power generation method, utilizing a total of 24 demons that were grouped by eight. That was the stateliness of the Hell Express. In other words, the Hell Express existed for the sole purpose of transporting souls to the edge of Hell.

“Don’t expect a comfortable ride from this.”

“…”

Inside the modified cabin that used to be a giant cart, Lloyd sank down on the floor and grinned. He was staring at the ghost of Frontera sitting across from him. It was back to its original size. But the latter wasn’t speaking.

“Seriously? Are you still sulking?” Lloyd lifted his brow.

“…”

“What? Why? What? Don’t look at me like that. Speak.”

“…”

Ghost Frontera didn’t speak. But its gaze at Lloyd was distinctly different from a while ago. There wasn’t anger, resentment, frustration, or any of the negative emotions that played across its eyes as it blew off steam at Lloyd.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose slightly. “Hey, you’re grateful but embarrassed for getting angry at me earlier, right?”

“...”

“I can see you flinching in guilt.”

“Oh, tsk... Come on.”

“If you’re thankful, just say it. Don’t curse me out.”

“Who says I’m grateful?” snapped Ghost Frontera.

“Really?”

“Of course. Grateful for what? You surprised me.”

“Ha,” Lloyd heaved lightly. “I guess I really took you by surprise.”

“How can I not, you bastard? You just did something unthinkable and-”

“Touched your heart?” put in Lloyd with a smirk.

“Touched, my ass.”

“More like your personality is ass.”

“So what? You got a problem with that?”

“No, I’m relieved. I won’t have to see you anymore.”

“The feeling is mutual, scumbag.”

“So, are you happy?”

“Of course.

Ghost Frontera chuckled. Lloyd put on the same smile. Meanwhile, the train started to run for the first time, a test run that would be remembered throughout Hell’s history.

Thump! Clunk! Clank! Thump! The cabin shook terribly. There was a blaring din and vibration that hurt his buttocks. But Lloyd didn’t feel too uncomfortable since the feeling was familiar to him.

Well, this is similar to the army truck I used to ride in the military.

The rattling that felt like it was about to break his pelvis. The chaotic ringing noise. This train ride was as comfortable as the truck used in the military, which made the men in uniform feel like loads of cartons. Putting on a relaxed smile, Lloyd stared at Ghost Frontera.

“Hey, tell me if you feel motion sick.”

“Why?”

“I’ll remove the tarp. That way, you can stick your head out and vomit.”

“I might as well just kick you out of the tarp,” growled Ghost Frontera.

“Did you forget already how I beat you up after you tried to do that?”

“No, I didn’t, bastard,” huffed Ghost Frontera.

“Then let’s just go reincarnate like a good boy. Anyway, how do you feel? What does it feel like to be the passenger of this monumental train?”

“Well, nothing much.” Ghost Frontera roughly scratched its jaw. “I want to get a drink. It’s been a while.”

“A drink?” repeated Lloyd.

“Yeah.”

“Have you not been drinking?”

“Of course. How do you expect me to drink when I’m like this?”

“Well, you have a point.”

A chuckle escaped because it looked like he had just asked a silly question. Ghost Frontera did the same and chuckled.

“Then let me ask you a question as well.”

“What is it?”

“You came from another world, right?”

“Uh-huh. You knew?”

“Of course. I stuck to your side for over a year to get my body back. How could I not?”

“Well, it does make sense now that you mention it.”

“Do you have any unfinished business in your world?”

“Nothing really.”

“You’re a heartless bastard. Don’t you miss your family back there?”

“No. My parents all passed away.”

Ghost Frontera paused for a second before saying, “They say your family is always with you as long as they’re in your heart. Cheer up, scumbag.”

“What are you saying?” Lloyd frowned with a smile.

“Forget it. What about my parents? Are they well?”

“Of course. They are as healthy as a horse.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd stared at Ghost Frontera. Then he continued in honesty, “Come to think of it, I’m relaying this news late. The Frontera family is no longer a barony.”

“What? What do you mean?”

“It’s a county now.”

“Whaaat?” Ghost Frontera’s eyes widened.

“Surprising, right? I’m surprised, too. Anyway, the count has resumed his hobby recently too.”

“Wood carving?”

“Uh-huh. There are a bunch of wooden sculptures in the study already.”

“Then what about Mother’s garden?”

“It’s still there. Oh, it has doubled in size. But I’m slightly worried about the count’s back and knees.”

“What’s up with that old man’s back and knees?”

“He’s helping out with the gardening. He insists on crouching and giving a hand when he’s not used to the work.”

“Tsk. I guess the man is still senseless as always.”

“Aren’t you going to ask about Julian?”

“Don’t have to. He’s a smart kid, so I’m sure he’s doing well on his own.”

“Correct. He recently got married.”

Cough!

“I’m serious,” Lloyd stressed when he saw doubt flash across Ghost Frontera’s face.

“Really?”

“Yeah.”

“With whom?”

“The daughter of a sultan in the east. She’s a high-level sword expert, so she’s really good at fighting. It would be quite a sight if they got into a fight.”

“Julian will be beaten to death.”

“Probably?”

“...”

Lloyd and Ghost Frontera. The two paid tribute to Julian for a second as they imagined Julian having an imaginary quarrel with his wife. And then they both burst into a chuckle at the same time.

“So, what do you want to be reincarnated as?”

“Me?”

“Yeah.”

“I don’t know. This is all too sudden. Well, if I have to choose...”

“What?”

“A whale.”

“A whale?”

“Yeah. A whale.” Ghost Frontera nodded. “I’ve spent far too much time in Hell, and it’s flipping hot here. So, I want to be plunged in cold water.”

“Then you don’t have to be a whale. You could be a sardine. Or an anchovy,” pointed Lloyd.

“Those are easy to hunt and kill, you little jerk.”

“Oh, is that so?”

“Obviously. Anyway, I just wish to live freely. So, I’d hate to be born as a human again. I think it’d be stifling.”

“I guess you won’t be able to have your beloved drinks if you’re born as a whale.”

“Oh, tsk. Come on. You better be ready if I am reincarnated as a dragon.”

“Even if that happens, I’ll be dead from old age by the time you are fully grown.”

“...”

“Heh.”

“Haah. This bastard, seriously.”

“Seriously what?”

“Thank you for keeping your promise, bastard.”

“Aren’t your words a bit late,” Lloyd threw a snide remark.

“Who cares?”

They laughed again. In a terribly rattling train, against the backdrop of a slowly passing Hell scenery, Lloyd and Ghost Frontera both laughed. And Lloyd felt a part of his heart growing lighter.

A burdensome weight he didn’t know he was carrying started to grow light. The weight was guilt. The crime of pushing away Frontera from his own body, no matter how unintentional it was. The guilt of hiding the truth and parading around as the real Lloyd. He had even felt like a cuckoo bird inside a nest it didn't belong to until then.

"So, I will take good care of the count and countess. I'm sorry."

"Forget it, you bastard."

"And I plan on revealing the truth in the future. That is, about you and me."

"I said I get it, bastard."

"Whew, sorry. I just felt weird all of a sudden."

"Ha." Lloyd smiled bitterly while Ghost Frontera smiled and blinked back the tears. The latter thought Lloyd might as well not make it cry if he was apologetic. The train slowly rattled its way, and beside the adjoining car was Javier, the knight of the Frontera family, quietly listening to Lloyd and Frontera's conversation.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 244: Those Who Left, Those Who Stayed (2)

Clunk... Clunk... The train leisurely clunked its way along the rail, and the outside scenery passed by at a slow pace. Inside one of the cars, Javier, the knight of the Frontera County, was sitting with his arms folded against his chest. With his head down, he bit his lips. But his gaze wasn’t darted toward the ground.

He was intently staring at the side wall, where the voices of two people were coming from. Voices kept coming. Extremely familiar voices. Both belonged to Lloyd Frontera. And as Javier heard them, he was able to realize something, at last. The question he had asked at times but never mentioned aloud. The curiosity that constantly surged in him but he never spoke aloud of. And even the suspicions that shot through him, which he chose to bottle down. But now, he knew. He had the answer to everything.

The real and the fake.

The victim and the thief.

The self-indulgent and the hardworking.

The degenerate and the constructive.

The despicable and the respectable.

Javier finally understood that they were two different individuals, and no one else was aware of it. He was enlightened at last.

Master Lloyd.

Javier bit his lips until they were white. Yet, he had no idea which Lloyd he just inwardly called. He was truly lost about it. Was it the real Lloyd Frontera who lived as a hooligan? Or the fake Lloyd Frontera who lifted his family from misery with hard work and dedication? Javier was absolutely unsure which one he called for, served, and wished to stay beside. He was filled with anguish.

Should he slash down on him instead? Make the fake Lloyd pay for his sins? In principle, that seemed to be the right choice. A deathly desire flashed across Javier's eyes for a split second. But soon enough, it disappeared much more quickly than it appeared. He shook his head hard.

No.

That didn't seem like the right judgment in any case. Was it because he liked the fake version of Lloyd Frontera? No. He wasn't foolish enough to involve his personal feelings in a matter like this. Currently, he was judging the new situation at hand based on one criterion.

Count Arcos Frontera, the very person Javier had pledged his lifelong allegiance to. Javier considered how his decision would affect and harm his lord. He wondered which choice would be in the best interest for him. That was the only criteria with which he strove to judge this situation. He coldly evaluated the situation, excluding most of his emotions in the process. And the cold nature of his evaluation made his decision all the more painful.

Please forgive me, Master Lloyd.

Javier made up his mind to give up Ghost Frontera and spare the fake Lloyd. It was an inevitable choice. It appeared so as he heard the conversation between the two Lloyds.

It appears the real Lloyd has become a ghost.

He figured that his former young master was as good as dead. It seemed that any attempt to retrieve his body would be useless. In other words, there was no way for the real Lloyd, the hooligan, to be brought back to life. What would happen if he killed the fake Lloyd now as punishment? It would only lead to terrible results.

The situation won't get any better. No, it'll get even worse.

Whatever the truth was, whoever had taken over Lloyd's body, the fake one had been acting as the real one in the most confident and natural manner up to this point. No, he had behaved in an incomparably exemplary manner and saved the family from the pit of destruction. So, killing the fake young master wouldn’t do any good for the family. It would be like losing a giant pillar holding up an entire building. Javier knew that without the fake Lloyd, his lord’s family would be back on the track of destruction.

This is the only way.

It really was the case, realistically. Who was the one that received the trust from Queen Magentano? Technically speaking, it wasn’t Count Frontera, his lord, but Lloyd, the fake. And who had billed the Lacona viscounty for water? And who was maintaining their water system? That would also be the fake young master. And what about Bibeong, who stops monsters from the opposite side of the eastern mountain range from invading his fiefdom? Bibeong, too, was a fantastical creature under the command of the fake Lloyd.

On top of everything, the fiefdom’s ondol and coal mine, the maintenance and repair of the apartment complex for the refugees, and Dragon Solitas in charge of treating the sludge... Fake Lloyd was at the center of countless businesses and projects. What then would happen if the fake Lloyd disappeared? Nothing in the Frontera fiefdom would function properly.

“...”

It was impossible for him not to admit it at this point. Even though the living Lloyd was evidently a sham, he was better than the real one. No, he had become an indispensable figure in the fiefdom. Javier loosened his grip on his sword. Of course, this conclusion didn’t settle all of his concerns and distress. There was still a big concern left in his mind.

Should I then report this to the lord?

The decision he made here wasn’t final, and it definitely wasn’t definitive. It was only a temporary judgment on whether he should kill the fake Lloyd right now. The final decision, however, had to be made by Count Frontera. And so, Javier was on the fence.

It is clearly proper for me to inform the lord right away.

But somehow, he didn’t feel like doing so. Though keeping it under his hat could be a form of betrayal and he was aware of this with absolute certainty, Javier was hesitant about telling the truth. But he couldn’t understand why. The answer soon came to him when he could hear the two Lloyds’ conversing once again.

“So, I will take good care of the count and countess. I’m sorry.”

“Forget it, bastard.”

“And I plan on revealing the truth in the future. That is, about you and me.”

“...”

Once again, Javier bit his lips. And he wondered what the imposter was planning with those words. Why in the world was he speaking that way while making Javier’s heart soften?

Is it right to give him a chance... for now?

Javier felt the sincerity in the fake Lloyd’s remarks. It could be a lie, but Javier wanted to trust the former. He wanted to trust that the fake Lloyd felt genuine guilt toward Count Arcos and Count Marbella and would come clean someday. So, it was only right for Javier to wait.

“...”

Javier wondered to himself if he had lost it. He suppressed the thought that crossed his mind for a second. At least the fake young master didn’t turn a blind eye to the real one. The former gave a helping hand to the real Lloyd, who had become a wandering ghost. The former had the decency to be apologetic and take responsibility for his wrongdoings. So, Javier thought that he should wait and observe. At the very least, it was only right to give a chance for the person directly involved in the situation to reveal the truth.

I am sorry, my lord.

Javier closed his eyes, hoping that his judgment would not harm the Frontera family. He struggled to suppress the confusion and dismay surging inside his heart. Amid his internal conflict, the train dutifully moved forward with a dull sound. It traveled consistently, slowly, and efficiently until it arrived on the platform at the edge of Hell, the final station.

“Whew.”

Lloyd got down from the train, and he massaged his butt. Just like he expected, the train ride was similar to his experience on the army truck, but he couldn’t bring himself to feel nostalgic about it. His butt was quite sore, and even his back ached.

In other words, this is a hellish train ride.

Lloyd smiled wryly, telling himself that this was good enough since the train was constructed for the purpose of transporting souls in the first place. Moreover, the comfort of the ride wasn’t what mattered. There was something significantly more important that required more of his care.

Javier couldn’t be nearby here, right?

Lloyd carefully looked around the moment he got down from the platform, fearing Javier would be near and see the ghost of Frontera. He prudently surveyed the surrounding area, his heart beating much like the time he stole some money from his mother’s purse. After much surveillance, he was put at ease.

Looks like he isn’t here.

Lloyd had instructed Javier to guard this area when he headed to Hell Castle to report to the King of Hell. Could it be that he had gone to the bathroom? Or was he taking a nap after growing tired of waiting? Whatever the reason was, Lloyd felt a rush of relief when Javier was nowhere to be found in the vast, open area of the station.

Now is my chance.

Javier could come back if he dawdled around. The situation would get complicated if Javier saw Ghost Frontera. In the worst-case scenario, he might see Lloyd as a criminal and attack him. Lloyd wiped the sweat off his forehead and hurried Ghost Frontera.

“Hey, hurry up and get out. Quickly,” urged Lloyd.

“Oh, tsk. Stop pushing me.”

“I’m not pushing you. I’m just asking you to move quickly.”

“What, you telling me to reincarnate fast now that your business with me is over?” grumbled Ghost Frontera.

“Come on! It’s not that.”

“What a coward. Are you scared that Javier might find out?”

“Haah. You are right.”

“Fine. Let’s hurry. I never liked that jerk anyway. I don’t want to bump into him.”

“You don’t like him?”

“No.” Ghost Frontera nodded at Lloyd’s question. And in the most obvious tone, Ghost Frontera retorted, “It’s not fair for a human to look like that. I hate him. I feel like life is cheating me whenever I see him, and it pisses me off. I’ve been in a bad mood ever since my father put that bastard on my side to guard me.”

“You too...?” Lloyd gaped as though he just met a comrade.

“Me too,” seconded Ghost Frontera wistfully.

“Dammit.”

For a second, a sense of camaraderie swelled in their hearts as the two berated the good-looking guys. And then they hurried up again toward the Door of Reincarnation that stood at the end of the platform. This location was chosen by design to ensure that the transported souls could enter the door through the platform as soon as they got off the train.

“Whew.”

Could it be that Ghost Frontera was jittery to stand in front of the door? Or was its heart getting the flutters in its stomach as it was about to say goodbye to its wandering life? Ghost Frontera collected its breath for a while before turning Lloyd’s way and chuckling.

“I’ll be going then.”

“Okay.”

They didn’t exchange any special goodbyes or touching words of farewell. No, in the first place, there wasn’t a need for any of it. Ghost Frontera and Lloyd knew this very well. So, they just waved their hands at each other, much like a couple parting ways at night after spending a relaxed day together and knowing they’d meet each other again the following day despite their half-hearted goodbye. Similarly, the two bid each other farewell without making a fuss in an ordinary manner. But before the final step into the Door of Reincarnation, Ghost Frontera turned and looked in Lloyd's way.

“…”

Its lips trembled very softly as though it was whispering. Lloyd couldn’t make out its words. That was it. Ghost Frontera was gone.

“…”

Lloyd gawked at the door. For some reason, his heart was perturbed. Words fell short of describing the feeling. So he just gave a soft sigh and turned, trudging back to the train and hopping onboard. And he collapsed to the ground that was rattling and stared at the area opposite of him.

It was the spot chatty Ghost Frontera had sat a moment ago. But now, only the tarp was fluttering against the wind. And the train started to move, clunking much like a while ago at a slow and consistent pace. The scenery of Hell moved just the same, and all the while, Lloyd didn’t say anything. He remained seated still and thought to himself that Hell wasn’t a good place. The air was hot, and the volcanic ash stung his eyes. Lloyd rubbed his eyes several times with his sleeve. Later, once the long journey to the Hell Castle came to an end, Lloyd got down to be welcomed by someone he was glad to see.

“Eh...? Javier?”

“Did you arrive just now, Master Lloyd.”

“What are you doing here?” asked Lloyd, feeling dazed to find Javier here. He had told the latter to stay at the other station. So what was he doing here?

While Lloyd remained confused, Javier smiled and said, “I came here because I was nervous.”

“Nervous?”

“Yes.”

“About what?”

“About you abandoning me for good,” said Javier, “That is why I ran all the way here until I discovered that you went to check on the train.”

“So, have you been waiting until I got here?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.”

“Ha... You must have not liked the idea of swimming from the polar region to the Frontera fiefdom.”

“I did not,” Javier said as he nodded. “I was against it, but now that I am seeing you here, I am starting to change my mind.”

“Change your mind? How?”

“That I’d rather avoid seeing your face in any case.”

“...”

“It was a joke.”

“No, you sounded pretty serious.”

“Did you see through me?”

“Probably?” Lloyd scoffed.

Lloyd was relieved. Javier had done something unilaterally, so he couldn’t have seen the ghost of Frontera at the edge of Hell. The latter had come to escort, which forced Lloyd to feign a forced smile and exchange a silly joke. It was a relief, truly.

“Then let’s go. I have to give the report about the result of the test to the king.”

“Understood.”

Lloyd walked ahead of Javier, his heart slightly lighter than a second ago. Javier started at the back of Lloyd with a meaningful gaze.

“...”

Javier was relieved that Lloyd bought his hasty lie, so he was able to treat him like usual and exchange silly banter with him. He was truly glad that he could turn a blind eye to the eyes of fake Lloyd, which were slightly swollen.

Master Lloyd. May you have a peaceful and happy new life.

Javier prayed from the bottom of his heart. The real and the fake. The victim and the thief. The self-indulgent and the hardworking. The former master and the present master. He wished that both of them would have a peaceful and happy future and that every day left in their lives will be peaceful and warm. The one who left and the one who stayed. Javier prayed in his heart for both of them. And without a word, he followed Lloyd.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 245: For the Dragon King's Support (1)

After a preparation period of one month and four months of construction, it all resulted in the first-ever railroad in Hell. The report on Hell Express 666 was stellar.

"So, there were no issues during the test drive?" asked the King of Hell.

"Yes, my lord."

Lloyd had entered the Hell Castle a while ago after finishing the test run and politely knelt down before the king.

"After inspecting the overall operation for the last time, the average speed of the train on a stable drive was about 21 mph. Therefore, it will take about seven hours for a train to transport the souls from here to the edge of Hell.

"Seven hours, huh," mused Hellkaros.

"That includes the time it takes to load and unload all the souls."

"Good," replied Hellkaros with a smile. "Then I can construct more of the trains you tested today."

"That is right, my lord," said Lloyd, "Moreover, I constructed the drains so the lava will seep out around the bed without overflowing and damaging the tracks."

"A drain, I see."

"From now on, the remaining demons should be placed in even intervals to carefully observe the amount of lava flowing nearby, check for clogged drains, and study the state of the tracks."

"Then they can conduct repairs when a problem arises?" asked the king.

"Indeed."

“Hmm, then what if something unmanageable occurs?”

“...”

“Can I summon you then?” suggested the king.

Instead of answering right away, Lloyd looked up at the King of Hell, feeling slightly bitter. If only he could, Lloyd wanted to grab the king by his collar and shout, “You are an awful client!” for asking whether he would travel down here again to conduct a repair. But Lloyd decided to opt for a more constructive method to make the most out of this situation.

Plastering a salesman's smile on his face, Lloyd said, “Of course, but with a fee.”

“You are heartless,” blurted the king.

“We did not have an agreement on free follow-up maintenance when we signed the contract. Plus, you do not enjoy receiving free services,” pointed Lloyd.

“Hmm. You are right, yet...”

“As long as you offer sufficient compensation, I will answer your calling.”

“Sufficient compensation, huh.”

“Yes.”

“Are you suggesting that what’s considered sufficient will differ based on the situation at hand?”

Lloyd didn’t answer on purpose.

“You are,” said the king, getting his message.

“It cannot be helped as our circumstances and market prices fluctuate every day.”

Lloyd didn’t deny the king’s comment as it was unnecessary. He simply laughed it off without shame, but it wasn’t to dismiss the king’s request. It was his desperate effort to prevent receiving any unreasonable demands or calls from him.

Obviously! What would happen if I agreed to repair the track in advance? That king would call me anytime he wants or needs me!

Lloyd could already envision it in his head. The king would call him for simple repairs involving bad tracks, a clunky train, overflows of mana, or unstable beds. It was obvious that the king would summon Lloyd for tasks that he could solve on his own by examining the issue and putting the demons to work for a bit.

Why would he still call me then? Because that’s convenient for him!

What would happen if Lloyd provided the after-service once, twice, and so on? What would happen if his continued favors became the norm? He’d eventually become an official pushover, the kind that responds to every summon. That would be how the king viewed him. Lloyd wished to prevent that from happening.

Of course. I’ll be busy enjoying a comfortable and relaxing life in retirement. Why should I take a business trip to Hell?

He had been able to exonerate himself from being a mindless construction robot for the queen after the longest time. If he wasn’t careful, he was at risk of becoming one in Hell. Sensing the impending crisis, Lloyd made a frantic effort.

“That’s why I apologize, but I cannot be readily available to come here at any time. I have other work to do,” said Lloyd.

“You mean I would need to compensate you for coming down here despite your busy schedule?”

“Yes.”

“But then it will be your choice to decide whether you will come down here based on the compensation I offer. Am I right?”

“I apologize again, but that is right.”

“Hmm.”

The King of Hell sent a meaningful gaze, and Lloyd endeavored to keep smiling as he felt a pang of guilt in his heart.

Wait a second. The king isn’t going to sentence me to life imprisonment in Hell in the future just because he’s offended or anything, right? That can’t possibly be his decision.

Of course, it was not. It was impossible. The king was the fairest man in Hell who only made rational judgments without letting his personal feelings get in the way. That quality of the king was what Lloyd banked on while exhibiting such shameless behavior. Soon, Lloyd’s gamble was proven to be a success.

“Good. Although a part of me finds you despicable, it looks like the one who is holding all the cards in this matter is you, Suho Kim.”

“Thank you for seeing it that way...”

Lloyd sighed in relief. Thankfully, it worked, and Lloyd was able to be saved from being summoned to Hell for continuous maintenance. He could now turn down repair requests without worry. And so, Lloyd was able to receive his payment with a heart full of satisfaction.

“Now, it is time for me to pay you for the construction. Let me check the terms and agreements in the contract. Let’s see,” the King of Hell said before reading the contract. “It was to release the soul of Dragon Anticus locked up in Hell.”

“Yes, it was,” agreed Lloyd.

“Good. I will give you your compensation right away.”

Hellkaros swished his pen a few times, and he held out a paper at a demon, which hurried off with the paper. When it returned, it held a fist-sized half-opaque marble in its hand. The King of Hell handed the marble to Lloyd.

“Here. Take this.”

“Could this be the soul of Anticus?”

“To be more exact, it is a plate that temporarily holds the soul of the dragon,” explained the king.

When Lloyd peered into the marble, he did see something slightly move inside. Lloyd figured it was the soul of Anticus.

“The moment you put your mana into the marble, you will be able to release the soul right away,” the King of Hell further explained. “You would be freeing it once and for all. But do not think of doing that here. If you do, the soul will become trapped in Hell again.”

“You mean I should open the lid when I get home, so to say.”

“Indeed.”

“I see. Thank you.”

Lloyd took the soul-containing marble with care and put it in his backpack. And then, he suddenly looked up at the king. The question that had been taking up a corner of his heart but which he never dared show came to his mind.

“Oh, excuse me. Can I ask you something?”

“What is it?”

“Do you know why I possessed the body of Lloyd Frontera?”

All these times, from the very start to this moment, Lloyd wanted to know. He was curious. But the King of Hell shook his head as soon as the question was uttered.

“No, I do not know.”

“Is that so...”

“However, I can only tell you that this is a rare occurrence that happens once every hundreds of years.”

“Do you mean the way my soul crossed into another world?”

“Yes. The dimensions are not completely separate from each other after all. Though they appear distant, they’re able to influence one another due to the giant halo that envelops them.”

“Oh, yes...”

“I presume that the interruption of the gravity force that took place between the halo of dimension was affected by a fluctuation of mana. Much like how energy-filled particles from the sea of Dirac trigger the process of pair production.”

“Oh, yes, yes...”

“Do you comprehend what I am saying?”

“Please forgive me...” said Lloyd in almost a whisper.

“Tsk.”

Lloyd wondered why he was feeling guilty.

The King of Hell smiled bitterly. “But Suho Kim, you are not asking about something that someone else in your place would easily want to know.”

“My king?” asked Lloyd, taken back. “What could you mean?”

“I am talking about your body in your original world.”

“...”

Lloyd shut his mouth. He was curious, sure, but...

“I am curious,” Lloyd replied. “But I do not really want to find out.”

“Why is that?”

“It will not affect me in any way even if I found out.”

Lloyd’s smile turned bitter. It was true. Sure, he was curious, but he didn’t want to know. Nothing was going to change now, even if he did. It’d only satisfy his curiosity and nothing else. No, to be really honest, he was reluctant.

I’ve had enough of my past.

His memories of the past were overshadowed by the immense hardship he faced, no matter how hard he tried to romanticize them. So, some intermittent recollection of his past was enough. He didn’t need to go the extra mile and find out what happened to his body in his world. And besides, he never wanted to go back. Could it be that the King of Hell noticed his feelings? The king gave a chuckle.

“Is that so? I see.”

“Thank you. I just need to know if my body is alive.”

“It is alive. Happy?”

“Yes,” Lloyd replied, “That is enough.”

Lloyd didn’t necessarily want to learn in detail how his body was doing when his soul crossed into this world. It was enough to know that it was doing well.

“I suppose it is time for you to leave,” said the king, “I will then open the Hell gate for you to arrive where you left to come here.”

“Do you mean the Termina Garden in the Magenta capital?”

“Yes.”

Bzzt! At one simple gesture of the king, the Hell gate opened up at once. Through the gate, Lloyd saw a glimpse of the dim night of the garden, which was still a mess.

“Time moves differently in this world with the human world. Your five months here is only about five days in the human world,” explained the king. “Do go back now.”

“Thank you, my king.”

A sense of relief rushed through Lloyd. He was afraid that he would need to use the Hell gate that led to the polar region, the one he had opened up to beat the Lava Giant. However, thanks to the kindness of the King of Hell, he was saved from venturing through the polar region.

“Then I shall prepare a few things and go back right away.”

Lloyd hurried, telling himself that he must return before the king changed his mind. After giving a deep bow, he moved and brought Javier, fantastical creatures, and the Bone Dragon, all awaiting outside Hell Castle. Then they all passed the Hell gate. Lloyd stepped in first with his fantastical creatures. Next was Javier, followed by the Bone Dragon, who took apart its joints. Once they crossed inside, they were welcomed back with the night breeze of the human world.

“Whew...”

It was cold. Though it wasn’t winter, the brush of the ordinary wind chilled his skin as he was used to the heat from Hell. But he didn’t have the time to revel in the fresh air and grass on the ground as he had to immediately scan the surroundings as soon as the gate closed. To his relief, it was late at night. No one was around.

Lloyd called, “Draggy?”

Clack!

The Bone Dragon, or Draggy, responded in its dissembled state.

Lloyd said, “Since people will panic if they find out about you here, hide somewhere. Over there. That’s east.”

Creak!

“Keep flying, and you’ll see a giant mountain range. That’s called the eastern mountain range. Hang around there for a while. Be friendly with the orcs if you bump into them.”

Creak?

“Good boy. If you behave, I’ll introduce you to your friends in the Skeleton Corps. Okay, off you go.”

Creak!

Dragonny gave a firm answer and flew toward the east, and it was only when it was gone that Lloyd was relieved.

“Whew.”

That was when the fresh wind of the human world finally felt real to him. He had spent almost five months in Hell, but that was only five days in this world. That comforted Lloyd a little.

I’ll turn 30 next year. Haah...

But that was delayed by a few months, thanks to the different rates of time in the two worlds. The catastrophe of becoming 30 had been delayed by a few months. Moreover, he had returned from Hell, safe and unharmed.

Now, it’s time to claim my rewards.

He hadn’t taken a trip down to Hell for no reason. There was something he could gain from it. An undeniably beneficial reward. That was the sole reason for his travel. And the time had come now to receive his award for traveling to Hell.

I’ve got lots of mess to clean up. Like the garden showcase that ended up in a disaster because of the Bone Dragon. Or saving the face of the queen. But I’ll push those issues aside for now since it’s not related to me.

If he did, it would just be unnecessary meddling on his part. He could offer his help when he had the time and resources. The job belonged to the queen and the palace. So, Lloyd resolved to prioritize himself.

“Okay, let’s go first,” said Lloyd.

“Where are we going?”

Javier seemed joyful to be back from Hell. He looked bright and happy as he took in fresh air.

“Somewhere dim and shady.”

“...”

“Somewhere inconspicuous. We should release the soul of the dragon.”

That was the only way to attain membership for the Dragon King’s support. It was the most important task, something that had to be done as long as they were alive even if the world collapsed.

Lloyd hurried his steps, slipping out of the still-messy Termina Garden. Then he and Javier passed the city district and the Llojavi suspension bridge, jumping over the wall of the capital with ease into the remote, unpopulated woods. He soon settled in an appropriately vacant lot.

“No one’s around, right?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes. Aside from the twelve rabbits, one fox who has her eyes on one of them, two owls, and other small animals, no one is here,” Javier reeled off.

“Good.”

Since Javier was a grandmaster, he could be trusted. With his confirmation, Lloyd brought the marble out of his pocket and activated the Asrahan Core Technique. Then he inserted his amplified mana into the marble.

Fwoosh! A flash appeared in the half-opaque marble. With that, the creature coiled up inside opened its eyes, and rushed out of the marble. And without giving any time for Lloyd to say anything, it shot up like a shooting star into the night sky. And then, with one more flash, it became a star in the Milky Way and disappeared.

Whoosh. The flurry of cold wind blew to dishevel his hair. Lloyd waited for a second, rolling his eyes and glancing at the sky where the ancient dragon just flew up and back at the empty marble in his hand. He found himself gulping.

It can't be.

Did that dragon do a bunk without a word of gratitude or the provision of the promised reward?

No way. No.

The dragon had made a vow that its soul would vanish if it failed to fulfill its promise. However, he wondered if the dragon still ran away and broke their promise as soon as it was freed.

But... this is concerning...

There weren't any words of appreciation or a cheesy, grandiose celebration for him. With one big flash, the dragon disappeared into the sky. Now, Lloyd was left with nothing but the cool breeze blowing at him. He couldn't help but feel anxious, wondering if this was what it felt like to be scammed by a second-hand dealer.

"Master Lloyd." Right when Lloyd was about to entertain those thoughts, he heard Javier call him with two taps on his shoulder.

"It looks like we have an unexpected guest."

A guest?

Lloyd wondered what Javier could mean. The latter said back there that no one was around. So, how did this guest get here? Lloyd turned to the side Javier was pointing at. Then he found out. There really was an unexpected visitor. He was...

The Dragon King?

Goggled-eyed, Lloyd stared at the Dragon King.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 246: For the Dragon King’s Support (2)

The dragon king?

Lloyd’s eyes widened when he saw the figure. He was sure. There was no one around up until a moment ago. Javier had verified that himself. But now, someone was here. No, not someone. It was an animal. To be more exact, it was a lion larger than an elephant. And its claws, which were revealed between its front paws, looked menacing. Its magnificent mane gave off a majestic atmosphere, and it had bat wings and scorpion tails. But contrary to all, its belly was so chubby that Lloyd wanted to give it a touch to its fluffy and comfy texture. Anyway, based on its physical features, this creature could only be...

The manticore?

As soon as Lloyd uttered the name of the monster that emerged in front of him, the manticore opened its mouth and said, “Corong?”

“...”

“Cororong! Corong!”

“...”

Lloyd wondered what this monster was saying. Wait, could it be that it was growling? Or was it trying to start a conversation? Nonetheless, Lloyd didn’t show any outward reaction to the manticore’s roaring or greeting. He neither flinched in fear nor took a step back. His face didn’t show any hint of surprise or dismay. However, deep inside, he was flustered. But he repressed his emotions, determined to reveal nothing, controlled his facial expression, and tensed his muscles. The rationale behind his forced nonchalance was simple.

You never know with life. What if this manticore turns out to be Dragon King Verkis?

Such a thought crossed his mind, and he thought it was very likely.

Dragons can perform powerful magic. It's said that they can even morph into other races.

What this meant was that dragons were capable of shapeshifting into monsters as well. That was why Lloyd couldn't rashly show any reaction.

Duh! What if Dragon King Verkis came here with that appearance because of some weird kink of his? Shouting my dismay out loud or reacting with shock will kill my chance to leave a good impression on him!

That scandalous event was the last thing he wanted to see. He had taken a trip to Hell to earn the support of the dragon king, constructing his butt off for months in sweltering heat. And here he was, at last, in the presence of the king. Lloyd did not want a momentary mistake to ruin his first impression.

That can never happen. The dragon king must become my number one supporter.

An extra life. Endless treasure. Other additional rewards on top of everything. The dragon king was the very benefactor that would add one final, luxurious touch to Lloyd's opulent retirement. And so, he detested the thought of leaving a bad impression on him.

"Hmm! Ehem!" Lloyd cleared his throat. "Javier, I want you to politely wait."

Lloyd stopped Javier first, fearing that the latter might pull out his sword like a clueless fool. After that, he politely folded his hands and looked up at the manticore in the most respectful manner, his eyes glimmering and shining. Could it be that his tactic to be courteous worked? The Manticore's face started to soften as it gazed at Lloyd, and it stood up on its hind legs, lifted its chubby body, and motioned with its front paws.

"Cororog? Corong! Cororong!"

“...”

“Corong! Cororong!”

“Ahaha...” mumbled Lloyd. “Okay, yes...”

“Cororog? Corong! Corong!”

“Hmm, is that so? Ahaha...”

An awkward smile spread across Lloyd’s face. Javier inched closer to Lloyd and whispered, “Master Lloyd.”

“What, why?” replied Lloyd with slight annoyance.

“Do you understand what the manticore is saying?”

“No.”

“Then-”

“Shut your mouth first,” growled Lloyd under his breath. “You’re not the only one going bonkers over this.”

Lloyd wiped the cold sweat off him. This manticore was different from other fantastical creatures such as Ppodong. Lloyd couldn’t make the slightest sense of what the chubby lion wanted from him with its growling or motioning.

Goodness. What is this old, hairless creature saying?!

Just then, Lloyd wanted to burst into tears. If only he could, he wanted to give a hard pinch to its pinkish belly, which was splotchy with hair loss, until something hit him.

Wait, hold on.

Come to think of it, there were a few creatures that were briefly mentioned in the novel. Dragon King Verkis. And the five evil creatures that served him.

I remember. Verkis was said to have them at his side.

Lloyd couldn’t recall everything about the five creatures. But he did manage to remember that a 26-feet long manticore was the leader among them.

Is this the creature mentioned in the novel?

Lloyd looked up at the manticore, his eyes now filled with wonder. His suspicion that it could be the creature he read about soon turned into conviction. If that was the case, he needed to confirm the truth before anything else.

“Excuse me,” Lloyd asked in a careful voice. “Are you here because Dragon King Verkis sent you?”

“Corong!”

The manticore nodded with a big smile on its face, and it started to gesture with more earnestness as though Lloyd could finally understand its words.

“Cororong! Corong? Corong!”

“Oh, wait, please gesture a bit more slowly...”

“Corong? Cororong! Corong!”

“Okay, so, you’re here to run an errand for Dragon King Verkis?” asked Lloyd.

“Cororong! Corong!”

“Oh, so you’re here to take me.”

“Corong!”

The manticore nodded again. And then, it gave its chubby butt to Lloyd and flopped to the ground before glancing at Lloyd and motioning toward its back with its jaw.

“Cororong!”

“You want me to ride on your back...?” Lloyd questioned with hesitation in his voice.

“Corong!”

“...”

It appeared so. Lloyd and Javier exchanged glances.

Javier nodded. “I will protect you if something happens.”

The manticore was evidently a powerful creature. A single angry manticore possessed the strength to wipe out one entire corps of elite human soldiers. Though it was as big as Ppodong, it easily transcended the latter in terms of combat power. Plus, a manticore as old as this one had to be a seasoned fighter on the battlefield. If Lloyd didn’t have Javier by his side, he’d have been left to pray that he wouldn’t be eaten up.

I’m glad that this fellow is on my side.

A sense of relief swelled over Lloyd and, trusting Javier, he hopped on the back of the manticore.

“Eh, um, please fly safely.”

“Corong!”

The manticore gave a snort as if there was nothing to worry about. And thus, a frenzied race began. Kaboom!

“Eek!!”

They grew far from the ground in a split second, and the view of their surroundings passed by them with overwhelming speed. Lloyd was able to avoid being thrown off to the ground by reflexively grabbing onto the creature's mane. It was only then that he was able to make out what was happening.

What kind of speed is this?!

The manticore was unbelievably fast. Lloyd was used to riding Ppodong and flying on Ggoming's back. However, the manticore was much faster than those two. It was so fast that the headwind blowing against his face made it difficult to breathe.

Argh!!

Fwoosh! The violent flurry of headwind blew against him, and his facial muscles and skin crumpled from the force. Even the air traveling into his nostrils felt like an invading enemy, making him feel they were being expanded three or four times wider. Lloyd had to cast his head down to breathe out. And as he could finally breathe, Lloyd started to grow excited.

What about Javier?

A thought popped into Lloyd's head. This was a golden opportunity. The powerful gust of headwind blowing against his facial muscle and skin had to be making Javier put on an ugly face too. Lloyd felt his heart race at the thought.

Oh, I wish I had a smartphone right now!

That way, he would be able to take a picture of Javier's funny face and keep it for eternity. He was regretful he couldn't but nonetheless excited about what he'd witness soon. Then Lloyd threw a glance toward Javier, only to find the knight looking perfectly fine and normal.

"Why are you looking at me like that, Young Master?" asked Javier calmly.

"Eh...?"

“For some reason, your eyes are much more sparkly than usual.”

“...”

Lloyd was left utterly speechless. Javier’s face was perfectly fine! It was completely normal despite the strong headwinds. He didn’t even have a single eyelash fluttering out of place.

This is not fair!

Lloyd inwardly screamed in disbelief. But could it be that Javier figured out what was happening? He scoffed at Lloyd.

“It looks like you are curious why my face is fine, unlike yours,” said Javier.

“...”

“Well, it is because I am a grandmaster,” added Javier matter-of-factly.

“...”

“I am currently using mana. Just in time, actually, as I was recently experimenting with how I can increase my body’s level of resistance against foreign forces. According to my calculation, it seems I can increase my skin's strength, elasticity, and sturdiness to that of metal. Like now.”

“It makes no sense,” Lloyd uttered, incredulous.

“It makes perfect sense.”

“How?!”

“Like this.”

Whoosh... Javier raised his hand. He straightened his index finger and stirred the air. Then a strand of brilliant aura appeared from the tip of his finger, which then drew an image in the air. But the image looked strange. It was a human face. A terribly ugly one. It looked like someone had stuffed their head inside a stocking and was propelled dozens of feet in the air. Lloyd scowled.

“What is this wrinkly half-formed face?”

“This is what you look like now, Master Lloyd.”

“...”

“I am serious,” Javier went on, “You look extremely memorable. Avant-garde, even, I must say. Your face is usually plain, nothing much to enjoy. But now, with all the terrible crumpling, scrunching, and wrinkling from the wind, you are presenting a forever unforgettable sight to every beholder of your face, even with just a quick glance.”

A pang of shock left Lloyd speechless.

“How to describe this image…” Javier continued, his voice filled with delight. “It is a reinterpretation of the human face. Extremely powerful and dynamic, yet its asymmetrical uniqueness and singularity are clearly visible. This disharmony creates a multidimensional appearance that is completely outside the standard human face. It is remarkable. I feel your face is the new exemplar of asymmetry.”

“...”

Please, stop praising my face as if you’re viewing modern art. Despite the desire to say that thought out loud, Lloyd couldn’t do it. The manticore changed its direction, and the wind threw another hit to his face right before he could speak, causing a devastating tremble on his lips. He couldn’t fight back even though he wanted to. So, he was left to hold back his tears and promise himself to return this humiliation someday. Meanwhile, Javier continued to speak with a serious look on his face.

“Anyway,” Javier said, “what really is outrageous is the speed of this manticore.”

“Eh... Umph... Yes, I agree with you,” Lloyd replied, ducking his head to avoid the wind.

“It looks like the Dragon King Verkis has cast a special magic on this creature,” Javier said.

“Right?”

“Yes.”

It probably was the case. Sure, the manticore could be a powerful creature. But this speed simply just transcended the limits of biology.

Seriously, the dragon king is definitely something.

What would it feel like to be born like this? What good did this king do in his past life to be born with a silver spoon in his mouth and such outrageous powers?

Would it be enough to have saved a kingdom around a hundred times in your past life?

Lloyd was green with envy. As his thoughts dwelled on such, the snapshots of his surroundings changed in seconds, the mound suddenly becoming a river, which soon became a field and wilderness. Past several villages and cities and passing over the lake and valley, the manticore finally climbed up the foot of a mountain until a giant cave came into view.

A dragon’s cave, I suppose?

Gaffel is a neutral and autonomous city. Lloyd recalled how a dragon’s mountain sat there, in which Dragon King Verkis quietly resided. What stood right ahead of Lloyd seemed to be the very dragon’s cave in that mountain.

“Corong!”

The manticore continued its race toward the cave and passed through the well-polished and complicated passages. Lloyd’s eyes grew serious as he studied them.

I knew it.

It was the dragon cave. Even though he couldn’t see thoroughly because everything was passing by in seconds, he noticed that the architecture was remarkable.

This entire place was built by carving and digging out the inside of a mountain. The rock foundation that makes up the mountain was used as the exterior of this dungeon.

Lloyd wondered how much capital and labor he would need if he had to deal with a project of this size. Chills ran down his spine just at the thought of it. Even with the surveying and design skills and the assistance of the fantastical creatures, a project with such an enormous demand, that is, to utilize this gigantic mountain itself as construction material, would require at least ten years.

No, I won’t be able to do it in even ten years. This is seriously no joke.

At the sight of the dungeon, Lloyd felt in his bones the sheer power of this dragon king. It wasn’t to be compared to the dungeon of Solitas, who matured only recently. That was how overwhelming this place was, and that was why Lloyd’s heart raced.

And the creator of that is going to become my ally.

In life, there are a few elements that must be cherished. A heartwarming family. Enough wealth to live by. Connections you could always rely on. And right now, Lloyd was about to acquire the last element, the best of the best connection. He had the heartwarming Frontera family. And he held enough wealth in the Frontera fiefdom. On top of those two, the support from Dragon King Verkis. Lloyd was just seconds away from setting up his life in luxurious retirement.

Lalalala! Wahahaha!

The humming came out naturally. It didn’t stop even when the manticore stopped and when he got off its back. He even did a joyful tap dance when his feet touched the ground. And he was led into the deepest part of the cave.

“Cororong! Corong!”

When he turned to the last corner, an empty cave welcomed his arrival. The length and width appeared to be several miles. The ceiling, too, was inconceivably high. There was more than enough space for several 656-foot dragons to do a full-court basketball game. Moreover, all kinds of treasure carpeted the whole area.

But despite the vast space and the overwhelming number of treasures that filled up the space, Lloyd didn’t bat an eye.

He couldn’t help it due to the sofa sitting randomly in the center of the cave with someone on it. The sight entranced Lloyd so ferociously that he couldn’t see anything else around him. It was the dragon king. Did the former grab Lloyd’s attention with a kingly charisma? Or with an oppressive dignity? Not at all.

What is this homebody doing here...?

Much like a father lazing around on a sofa over a weekend baseball game, the dragon king was lying on the sofa, as if he was a part of it. Lloyd couldn’t tell what was the sofa or the dragon king. That was Lloyd’s first impression of Dragon King Verkis.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 247: The Sluggard’s Inner Thoughts (1)

A sluggard. In this world, sluggards come in various types. Case in point: there was Yeongjin, who only ate delivery food because he couldn’t be bothered to cook. And there was Daho, who only grilled one side of meat because he couldn’t be bothered to flip it with tongs. And there was the sluggish Sarin, who stayed all day in the house because removing sunblock before going to bed would just be too much work. And manager Park, the man who only parked outside buildings but never under a basement parking lot because the few steps to the elevator were just too far. As such, Lloyd was assured that he had more than his share of experience with sluggards back in Korea.

But now, his pride was falling apart. Why? Because the very first thought that crossed his mind upon seeing Dragon King Verkis at the center of the cave was...

What the heck is this wretched-looking homebody?

The thought just came to him. This sluggard was on a level of laziness that Lloyd had never seen before. He couldn’t help thinking otherwise. The king was lying flat on the sofa as if he was a part of it. Despite the fact that a human visitor came to his home and that this human was supposed to receive his support, the king didn’t rise. No, he didn’t even turn his head.

Swish. Instead, the king flickered his idle eye by point two centimeters over. And after a second of gazing...

Close.

Why is he going back to sleep?!

Lloyd exclaimed inwardly, completely flustered at what was happening. It never occurred to him that the dragon king would be a sluggard. Who would have imagined that the king would drift back to sleep without even saying a greeting? Lloyd expected the king to look stately and dominating as he was the dragon king, the ruler reigning over every dragon in the world.

What should I do? Should I wake him up? Introduce myself? Maybe he will wake up to the sound.

Such a thought crossed his mind for a second, but he shook his head in resignation.

No, I think I'm rushing into things by waking him up.

His instinct told him so. Would the dragon king get on his feet and greet Lloyd just because the latter introduced himself and woke up the former? Would the king finally welcome Lloyd and remark on bestowing the promised awards in all of his stateliness?

No, I don't think that would be the case.

Lloyd shook his head again. He received the feeling that the dragon king was far from normal. If the king was the type to welcome Lloyd after being woken up, he wouldn't have fallen back asleep at the sight of the visitor in the first place.

Tsk. What should I do then?

Lloyd licked his lips in dismay. His job in Hell was done, and the only thing left was to receive his rewards. That was why he had come all the way here. And Dragon King Verkis, who was supposed to reward him, was irresponsibly asleep.

"Javier," called Lloyd.

"Yes, Master Lloyd."

"I think we should wait first."

Lloyd made a decision. He would act in discretion and refrain from waking the king up. If he let himself become blinded by the reward, he could ruin everything by behaving recklessly. It would be like dropping a plate of fresh food on the ground.

Trying to keep his voice to a bare minimum, Lloyd whispered, “So, you should stay far away from here.”

“What about you?” asked Javier.

“Me? Well. I’ll have to dance to his tune.”

“By that, what do you mean?”

“I have a plan,” assured Lloyd. “So just keep quiet first.”

Lloyd motioned with his hands and sent Javier far away. Then he tiptoed toward the sleeping king as quietly and discreetly as possible and studied the latter. A sense of conviction and envy surged in Lloyd’s heart.

He’s really living like an unemployed hermit, spending all of his days lazing around. And yet, he’s the richest fellow in the world. Ha... Crap. I’m jealous.

A landlord. An individual whose properties were beyond enough to sustain their life. An individual who could idle around in the corner of a room scratching their feet while still making money. An individual who could live comfortably without any grand goals or passions in life. The life of an unemployed landlord was Lloyd’s dream life. Lloyd sensed that his role model was right in front of him.

I’m jealous. I’m dying of jealousy.

His stomach churned as he looked at the sleeping Dragon King Verkis. His heart thumped, and his lower abdomen ached. Was it all because of jealousy? Envy? No.

My gosh. He must be the brother I never had that I can look up to for the rest of my life.

Lloyd believed that life was all about making good friends, that is, those who liked to show off, splurge their money, and buy you food. Lloyd believed he should keep these kinds of friends by his side and treat them kindly to ensure they wouldn't go anywhere else. Flattery and praise were tools made for this purpose.

Service. Consideration. Respect. All of these precious and heartwarming universal values existed in the universe for moments like these. So, Lloyd collected his thoughts and picked up the high-end silk blanket lying around him, softly and gently putting it over Verkis.

My, my good friend. You might catch a cold if you sleep without anything to cover you.

Lloyd flashed a wide smile as though he was staring at a sleeping gold nugget or lucky charm. His acts of kindness didn't end there. Like a cockroach roaming around a kitchen sink at 2 AM, he slowly wandered around with caution until he found an item of his desire, a glass made of gold, which he used to draw spring water flowing around the area. And he also found a large peacock-feather fan with which he started fanning. When a soft breeze pleasingly tickled Verkis, his face started to appear more relaxed. At the same time, a content smile bloomed on Lloyd's face.

Perfect. It feels amazing to run a fan on its weakest setting while sleeping on a couch with a blanket over you. I guess it's the same for humans and dragons.

Lloyd recalled his experience. A long time ago, that is, before his family suffered from financial hardship, Lloyd lived in an ordinary apartment complex that had a leather sofa meant to fit three people at once. It was fluffy and comfortable. Nothing was more comfortable than lying there and watching TV. It wasn't entirely without any downside, however.

Since it was made out of leather, I started to sweat when I lay down for a long time.

That was the case even after placing down cushions. As he lay down, it grew hotter and hotter as the leather touching his body absorbed heat. When that happened, he, without fail, brought out an electric fan and wrapped himself with a thin blanket while he let a light breeze cool him. That experience couldn’t be any more heavenly.

That will be the same for both humans and dragons.

As luck had it, the dragon king was idly lazing around on a leather sofa. This sight made Lloyd remember his time in South Korea, and he presented the king with a secret trick he frequently used back then. Unsurprisingly, the result was very successful.

Snore...

Could it be that the dragon king was feeling more relaxed? He started to snore aloud, which brought a smile to Lloyd’s face. But Lloyd was unaware of something. It was that Verkis, despite his snoring, was observing him.

What is that?

Dragon King Verkis thought to himself while half-asleep. While he snored at ease and regarded this human being pesky, he glanced at the human fanning at him.

This is my first time encountering a fellow like him.

This human had earned the right to his support. But he wasn’t the first one to win it. Several had come to him in the last hundreds of years, but they all gave up and returned empty-handed and without any support. The reason was simple. Verkis simply ignored them.

Why? I couldn’t be bothered.

Dealing with humans was a tedious job. It involved rising up from a sofa just to entertain a menial human being, which required him to move his back, body joints, and muscles. His arms also needed to touch the sofa, and his shoulder needed to be tensed. Even more, he had to lift his head and open his eyes to focus them on the human. As though that wasn’t enough, he had to chat. That involved unnecessary moving of his mouth.

He despised all of it. It was all a chore. He couldn’t stand the thought of wasting several seconds of his life as a dragon to needlessly move. Instead, he could use the time to let his muscles and red blood cells rest. It would make his heart ache to waste his life that way. It would hurt him. And so, Verkis ignored all his visitors. He simply kept sleeping without opening his eyes. Surprisingly, however, this pesky problem of his resolved on its own when he did.

All the visitors became flustered at first. But then they would start to beg and throw a fit before eventually turning back.

The candidates set to obtain his support had behaved all the same. First, they were caught off-guard by his absence of a reaction. One even got fidgety and tried to wake him up. But Verkis shut his senses completely to them. Then most started to beg and get clingy. Dear dragon king, please open your eyes. Do not turn your eyes against me. Wake up, soldier. And yet, Verkis kept sleeping, persistently ignoring their pleas. Afterward, their subsequent reaction was anger.

They burst with anger when they realized they were being ignored. Why? Most of the humans had a great sense of pride.

Normally, earning the right to receive support from Dragon King Verkis involved accomplishing something massively grand. Something that was beyond human capacity, like saving a dragon, for example. In the first place, the achievement wasn’t something any ordinary human could accomplish, so humans with such feats were far from ordinary. They were the heroes of the world. Swordsman beyond human limits. The most powerful magician. The cleric once considered the saint of the world. Or even a conqueror the world will remember. Each and every single one of them who came here to attain the right to receive support from the king was worthy of making into human epic tales. But they all failed to achieve what they came here for.

Their pride was just too strong.

A faint smile spread across Verkis’s face. These heroes swelled with pride and ego due to their great achievements that would certainly be remembered in history. With that in mind, it wasn't hard to imagine their reaction to being blatantly and persistently disregard for the first time in their lives inside the very dragon cave that they waltzed into with anticipation of amazing rewards. It crushed them.

They couldn't handle it.

At first, they begged in tears. Later on, they whined that even a dragon king shouldn't behave this way and treat them with such disregard. They angrily cried out that it was a violation of their promise. Eventually, they went back after a few days, months, or even years of Verkis continuing to ignore them in his sleep.

Of course, he was upbraided by his wife for it. She gave him an earful that he shouldn't be doing this again. The visitors had traveled far and long and didn't deserve such harsh treatment. Why are you not fulfilling the Dragon King support system your mother and sister painstakingly strove to create? It wasn't right for him to laze around like this. What happened to the promise he made before getting married to become hard-working? She berated him for giving her an empty, short-lasting promise. His wife's scolding lasted for months.

Well, it's still okay.

Verkis grinned inwardly. It was amusing to hear his wife scold him and made him feel happy. The sound of her chattering couldn't please him enough. And so, ignoring the visitors was a good thing. He was saved from entertaining them against his will, and it invited nice scolding from his wife. Thus, killing two birds with one stone. So, Verkis believed it would be the same for this human visitor, who just arrived with a foolish smile on his face. Lloyd must have come in excitement to receive his support. That Verkis's first thought when he saw the human. The man was no different from the other human heroes he had seen. As such, all he had to do was treat him the same way as the rest. He was quite convinced up until a second ago.

Who is this man?

Verkis was starting to become speechless.

He's helping me fall asleep instead?

Yes. This human who just entered the cave. This man wasn't throwing a tantrum or begging or making formal and polite remarks to wake him up from his slumber. Instead of those, this one put a blanket over him and fanned him instead of saying anything. There was more.

He even got me a glass of water. Is that for me to drink when I wake up?

It appeared so. The way Verkis looked at Lloyd changed slightly.

Ha. This fellow. I like him.

Lloyd was different from all the other human visitors he encountered. Verkis liked Lloyd because it looked like he wouldn't bother him too much. So he was able to fall asleep more comfortably.

Okay. I like him. This is your reward. I'll unintentionally ignore you instead of doing it on purpose.

Verkis made up his mind to fall asleep for real. This was something he hardly did to anybody. And so, he thought that Lloyd should consider this an honor of a lifetime. Verkis shut his half-closed eyes all the way with a sense of immense satisfaction and fell asleep, determined to sleep for a few years.

Snore... Aphew...

His entire body relaxed, and he plunged into dreamland. The king thought that the human fanning him would be gone by the time he woke up. If so, he would let out a big yawn after opening his eyes and kiss his wife after receiving another scolding from her.

Verkis set up a solid sleep plan. Of course, even when he drifted into a deep sleep, he didn't worry a single bit. He wasn't worried at all about a rancorous human attacking him while he was asleep. In the first place, no attack could hurt him. Even if a supernova explosion occurred right in front of his face, he would only get a small scrape that stung his nose and nothing more.

No creature in this world was capable of hurting him. Verkis went back to sleep with complete peace of mind. And so, he was entirely clueless. He was completely unaware of what outrageous plan Lloyd, who had been politely serving him, was about to put in place.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 248: The Sluggard’s Inner Thoughts (2)

Snore... Phew...

The dragon cave. This was the home of Dragon King Verkis, and it was a divine place worshiped by all dragons. Its vast space in the dungeon could accommodate a full-court basketball game played by ten gigantic dragons. And through that very space rang the snoring noise of Dragon King Verkis. He was extremely comfortable in his current position fused together to the couch with the soft blanket the human had put on him. Moreover, there was a fresh freeze from the human’s fanning. It couldn’t get any more restful than this. Verkis’s eyes shut on their own, leading him into dreamland. And just like that, Verkis fell into a deep slumber. This made the corners of Lloyd’s lips pull up.

Whew, it’s done.

Lloyd put on a rewarding smile on his face, having succeeded in putting the sluggard to sleep. He then cast a quick glance to Verkis who was in a comatose state. And to make sure that the latter was completely knocked out, Lloyd waved his hands before the king’s face. As expected, he received no reaction, and instead...

Phewww! Snore...

His breathing grew more relaxed. It had happened. Verkis was fully asleep. With that conviction, Lloyd tiptoed away from him.

Javier, who had been observing Lloyd since a while ago, asked, “Master Lloyd, what did you do?”

“What do you think?” Lloyd grinned at Javier. “I helped the dragon king fall asleep.”

“I saw that myself, so I know that,” replied Javier, whose face grew suspicious. “I am asking what you are up to by putting him to sleep.”

“Two things,” replied Lloyd with a shrug.

“Two things?”

“Yeah,” said Lloyd. “One is not upsetting the king. I could feel it the moment I saw him. Did you see it, too? How he fell right back to sleep without giving a single greeting even when he saw us.”

“Yes, I have seen it.”

“Right?”

“Yes, he reminded me of your previous self.”

“What?” Lloyd raised his brow, surprised by what he just heard.

Javier’s face straightened. “I mean how it used to be impossible to wake up after a night of drinking.”

Having never expected Javier to say this, Lloyd was left speechless.

“I am not sure if you remember,” continued Javier, “but that is exactly what you were like. You refused to get out of bed. The more I tried to wake you up, the more upset you’d get and hurl insults as well as physical objects at me.”

“...”

“Now that I think about those days, I can understand your intentions at the moment. I agree with you. It would be very upsetting to wake someone up by force when they wish to get some more sleep.”

“...”

Lloyd wasn’t sure whether what he just heard was a compliment or another unrestrained insult from Javier. Whatever it was, he felt a slight sense of resentment and a bit wronged.

Dammit. The Lloyd you saw then wasn’t me, you bastard.

But no one in this world, including Javier, would be aware of this. The truth was only known to him and only for him to know. These false accusations were something he had to accept for the rest of his life. When he thought so, he was able to plaster a shameless face and give a snort.

“Tsk. You never pull your punches while insulting someone. Anyway, as you say, I intend to not upset the dragon king before anything else,” admitted Lloyd, his voice sounding slightly bitter.

“Then what is the second one?”

“Having fun.”

“Excuse me...?” Javier’s eyes widened a shade.

“Didn’t you hear me? I’m going to have fun.”

“Wait, here?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd earnestly nodded as if there was no other way around it. He then continued, “Think about it. The dragon king called for us, even sent us the manticore, and said nothing when he saw us in here. What could that mean? It means we’re officially an invited guest here, don’t you think?”

“You are right, but...” Javier protested feebly.

“We should have fun as invited guests here,” reasoned Lloyd. “The dragon king is out like a light, and we can’t force him to wake up. And it’s not like he’s going to be asleep for years. So, we should enjoy ourselves while we wait.”

Javier caught the excitement in Lloyd’s voice. He then asked, “Then what are you going to do to have fun?”

“Laze around.”

The corners of Lloyd’s lips pulled up. To laze around like an unemployed bum. It was something that Lloyd wanted to try all his life. And watching the dragon king slumbering on his couch like that only reinforced Lloyd's desire. That was how exhausted he was.

"To be honest," Lloyd said, "I want to get some rest. Think about it. How long have I been working?"

"Um, almost five months from Hell, and..."

"And before I headed down to Hell, I worked on the construction of the Termina Garden for about six months for the queen, right?"

"Yes."

"Right? So, know that you're looking at a person who worked for almost a year straight without a single break," said Lloyd.

"How diligent of you."

"I don't want that sort of compliment."

"How restless you have been."

"Yes, you're right. That is why I'm doing this." Lloyd pointed to the inside of the spacious empty cave. "This is more like a long-awaited vacation for us. Who can reach me when I'm in here, right?"

It was true. In a way, this was the safest place in the whole world since this was the place resided by the dragon king. So no one would dare venture their way here or come to call Lloyd. This place offered absolute freedom and rest, free from anyone's interruption. So from then onward, Lloyd had the run of the whole cave and went all out in enjoying his break. It was a vacation, a kind of hocance. What was more, there was a resting area that was on par with a five-star hotel. Believe it or not, that area was the royal castle. And there were two of them.

"It looks like... These castles have been plucked out from somewhere," observed Lloyd.

Two royal castles sat in the corner of the cave, and he was flabbergasted at first when he spotted them during his adventure around the cave. No matter how he looked at it, from the left and right, the structure in front of him was the royal castle. But something was off about its lower half.

There are signs that it has been ripped, no, plucked off.

Lloyd was sure. The supporting structure of the entire castle, along with a portion of its lower foundation, had been ripped apart to be transferred here. Just then, Lloyd recalled an old memory.

Right. The novel mentioned this. I think it was around the time the royal capital Magenta had a different name. There was a foolish king who lost two royal castles to a dragon. And I had a conversation about this with the messenger the first time I went to the capital.

He remembered now. The story was something he definitely heard about before. And now, it turned out...

The dragon that plucked the castle is Dragon King Verkis!

The situation became clear to Lloyd at last. Dragon King Verkis had plucked out the royal castle like a radish on a field and brought it all the way here.

Then he used it as decoration for his house.

Lloyd felt dazed for some reason, but he immediately shook it off. Since they were already here, Lloyd figured that he should take a good look inside. And soon, he noticed something.

The inside is a lot more well-kept than I imagined!

It was a surprise. The whole castle shone with gloss as though somebody had cleaned it this morning. Not a single speck of dust could be found throughout the palace. And what was more, even the bed in every room was dry and fluffy!

Hahaha. This is amazing.

Lloyd made a decision. If not now, he would never get a chance to sleep on a king's bed. So he hurried and settled in the king's bedroom, ready to enjoy his vacation to the fullest.

The cave, moreover, held plenty of food. Around the center of the vast empty cave, there extended spiderweb-like passages that grew sweet potatoes underneath their dirt. The sweet potatoes were tremendously large, the same size as a basketball.

"Hey, let's grill it," suggested Lloyd to Javier.

"..."

"What are you doing?" hurried Lloyd when he saw Javier staying wordless. "Start a fire."

"..."

Lloyd had just walked over carrying five giant sweet potatoes in his arms, and Javier stared at him, completely dazed and speechless.

Javier asked, "They look like valuable produce from the dragon cave. Are we allowed to grill them without permission?"

"Yeah, probably," replied Lloyd nonchalantly.

"How do you know?"

"I asked the manticore," replied Lloyd, maintaining the same tone of nonchalance.

Indeed, he did. Fearing that getting sweet potatoes could invite the wrath of Verkis, Lloyd went up to the manticore just to make sure. And he asked matter-of-factly if he could eat some of the sweet potatoes lying around the area.

The manticore gave a very chill "YES."

"Corong! That was how it answered," Lloyd explained.

“Are you sure that was an affirmation?” asked Javier dubiously.

“Yup. The manticore nodded as it coronged.”

“And that counts as receiving permission?”

“Of course,” replied Lloyd as he placed down the sweet potatoes. “And I even introduced it to Ppodong to show my gratitude.”

“Sir Ppodong?”

“Yeah. The manticore cocked its head at first. But when it saw Ppodong grow large after eating the red sunflower seed, it was very welcoming.”

Javier mused, “I see. Indeed, the two are fairly similar in size.”

“It appears so. Thankfully, Ppodong got along with the manticore pretty quickly.”

“So, are they playing right now?”

“Yeah,” said Lloyd, “Probably playing tag. Anyway, when are you going to start the fire?”

“...”

“Hurry up now. I’m starving.”

“...”

And just like that, the hero, who saved the world in the original novel, was degraded into becoming a sweet potato griller with a face full of soot. Like so, in the next few days, Lloyd idly lazed around, making up for all the days he spent being overworked and exhausted. He was relaxed, happy, and content. On the other hand, Javier observed Lloyd with a strange gaze.

“...”

Ten days had passed since they came to this cave, and Javier started to have a realization. The Lloyd in front of him wasn’t real. He was a man from another world.

That was why he suddenly seemed to behave like a different person.

Javier recalled one morning a few years back. Lloyd had thrown a nasty drunken fit the night before. But when the following morning rolled around, he acted like a completely different person. It was strange, but Javier let it slide because the change was rather welcoming.

Now I know. The meaning behind the name he was called by the King of Hell, Suho Kim.

Suho Kim. Javier figured that it must be the name of fake Lloyd back in his world. So, the unexpected actions and mysterious knowledge of construction displayed by this man until now must have been a product of his own world. At last, he was able to get some clarification. Javier finally understood what happened. On the one hand, he also became curious.

That fake Master Lloyd... How would he react if he knows that I know? Would he act shamelessly like he always does? Or would he get scared? How should I react when such a day comes?

There wasn’t any way of knowing. However, one thing was clear.

As long as you don’t change from now, I will protect you by your side until the end.

Faint warmth filled Javier’s gaze as it fixed on Lloyd. But when the latter noticed Javier’s gaze, he cocked his head to the side and asked, “Hey, what’s on your mind right now?”

“Excuse me?” Javier replied, taken aback.

“You just gave me a really cheesy look.”

“...”

“Tell me honestly,” Lloyd went on, “You’re hiding that you’ve found something tastier than sweet potatoes, right?”

“Not at all,” replied Javier, feeling relieved.

“Really?”

“Yes,” assured Javier again and chuckled, thinking to himself that there actually was something he was currently hiding but planned to keep hiding his secret for the time being.

Lloyd chuckled too and said, “Then hurry up and grill the sweet potatoes. I’m hungry.”

“Understood.”

With that, Javier started to busy himself with roasting the sweet potatoes, and another day passed by as the two enjoyed their long-awaited vacation. At the same hour, in the corner of the cave, Verkis, who was happily sleeping, felt a sense of crisis and flew open his eyes.

♣

“Eek..?!”

Dragon King Verkis opened his eyes, but was it because his sleeping position was uncomfortable? Or because Lloyd stopped fanning a cool breeze over him? No. The sofa was comfortable even without a cool breeze. The reason why he abruptly woke up after feeling a sense of crisis was simple.

This is bad. I’ve forgotten the most important thing.

Verkis recalled the promise he had been forgetting all this time, the promise he had made with his lovely wife.

I promised to contact her every day...!

But it slipped his mind completely, and he never made any calls. Since when?

I don't know. How long did I doze off?

Verkis searched his memory for the last time he wasn't half-asleep. That very day, his wife had gone out to the world with his mother dragon for a trip.

She told me that they'd be traveling for about a year and reiterated that I should call her every morning.

It was homework, in a way. But it had slipped his mind altogether. Verkis felt his heart tighten in nervousness. So, he immediately raised his hand and created a magic circle in the air to activate advanced communication magic that allowed him to contact her wherever she was.

Swaa....! The magic circle rotated in the air and tracked her coordinates before attempting connection. Then it failed.

Crash! The communication magic circle then vanished in thin air. The connection was lost. Verkis knew why this happened.

"She... rejected my call."

This was bad, really bad. His wife was sulking now.

What should I do?

Verkis racked his brain. His wife was an angel, so she never became upset over anything. But given that his call was denied, it appeared that she was really angry this time. Verkis wondered how he should fix this situation.

Should I run to her right now and beg for forgiveness? No. That's too much work.

He didn't want to fly such a long journey. That demanded a lot of muscle movement. And he would even have to use space teleportation which would require him to activate a large amount of mana. That was too much work.

What should I do then?

Verkis deliberated how he could appease his wife with minimal effort.

“Ugh... Think. Think...”

Verkis wrapped his head with his hands, racking his brain fiercely. Just then, while Verkis was lost in his deliberation, someone approached him from behind and spoke.

“My, dear Dragon King!” The man’s voice dripped with shamelessness. “Pray, do tell me, is there something bothering you?”

The voice belonged to Lloyd, who ran all the way here the moment he realized that the king had woken up. He then politely rubbed his hands together to make sure that he was making a good first impression before audaciously offering several words of flattery to him. And he plastered the smile of a fraudulent insurance salesman on his face as he gazed at Verkis.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 249: Becoming the Dragon King's Alarm (1)

"My, dear Dragon King!" The man's voice dripped with shamelessness. "Pray, do tell me, is there something bothering you? Or a problem on your mind?"

"..."

A voice suddenly tickled his ears. Dragon King Verkis turned and found a human standing there, rubbing his hands and tightly smiling in a friendly manner. Verkis cocked his head.

"What are you?" blurted Verkis.

"Excuse me?"

"Who are you to stand here right now in front of me-"

"Oh, I am Lloyd Frontera," broke in Lloyd. "It is nice to meet you. I was brought here by a manticore as I have somehow become eligible to receive your sponsorship by some unexpected turn of events. Do you not remember? I even put on a blanket over you and fanned you a few days ago. Oh, and this."

"..."

"I brought water just in case you were thirsty after waking up. Try drinking this refreshing cup of cold water first."

"..."

Verkis stared at Lloyd with a strange gaze, trying to make sense of him. And soon, he started to recall what had happened.

Right. This fellow crawled into my dungeon a few days ago.

Verkis remembered that this man, who attained the right to receive his sponsorship, got here with the help of the manticore. It had been 150 years since he last saw a visitor, but he couldn’t bother entertaining him. The mere act of talking to a human being was bothersome, and so was shifting his eyes to get a look at him. Thus, Verkis fell back to sleep, much like he did to the few heroes who had set foot here. If he slept and ignored him, this human would leave on his own like the others. Thinking that he would eventually give up on receiving his sponsorship, Verkis fell into a sound slumber.

But it turned out that giving up must have been the last thing on this human’s mind. And it didn’t seem like he would beg like the other heroes, who had pleaded for their rewards and for the king to keep his promise. Lloyd didn’t straightforwardly demand anything from him either. Instead of begging and clinging to him, this groveling human offered to help.

Verkis swallowed his smile and took the glass of water. After drinking, he said, “You? Me? Help out?”

“Yes, my lord,” replied Lloyd.

“How? Do you plan to lend an ear to me or something like that?”

“My, if I could help you out by listening, then I’m ready to lend you an ear a hundred times over.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded earnestly, sensing that this was a golden opportunity.

I was getting a shade jittery about when the dragon king would wake up, but thankfully, the opportunity came earlier than I imagined.

Even when Lloyd was enjoying his vacation in the cave for the past few days, he didn’t feel completely at peace. In fact, he had kept his eyes and ears open for the dragon king at all times. Even when he was goofing around on the king’s bed, looking around the area set up with traps in the cave, and roasting sweet potatoes to ease his hunger, Lloyd was on full alert in order to avoid missing any movements from the dragon king. And so, a part of him had started to grow worried.

It seemed like the dragon king was going to sleep longer than I expected.

At first, Lloyd believed that the king wouldn't sleep for more than a few days. But as time progressed, he realized that wasn't the case. The king looked like he was going to sleep a few months straight. So, Lloyd was on the fence about whether to wait some more or figure out another way.

Thankfully, the dragon king woke up by himself at a great time. My, how thankful I am.

What was more, Verkis didn't just wake up. It looked like something was terribly bothering his mind. This was a golden opportunity that would be difficult to come across again. Thinking so, Lloyd hurriedly decided to take action.

"I am ready to listen to whatever it is that is bothering you, my king. Am I troubled by this? Not at all. Why would I feel troubled? This world is all about helping each other! We should all treat one another with kindness!That is the beautiful future we should work toward."

"..."

"Please forgive me," apologized Lloyd when he noticed Verkis was being silent. "I got carried away."

"Let's move on. So, you are willing to hear out my concern, is that right?" Verkis asked.

"Yes."

"Then are you married?"

"Excuse me?" Lloyd's brow lifted.

"I said, are you married?" reiterated Verkis.

“No, I am not.”

“Then are you in a relationship?”

“No,” replied Lloyd.

“Have you ever been in one up to this point?”

“No...”

“What kind of life have you been living?” huffed Verkis.

“...”

Come on, Dragon King. There’s no need to hurt me with your words, said Lloyd to himself, trying to hold back the tears starting to well in his eyes. But Verkis was cruel and merciless.

“You’re not married, and you never had a girlfriend. I doubt that you will be a good listener. You wouldn’t know the struggles of a married man,” dismissed Verkis.

“Oh! I know a little,” exclaimed Lloyd.

“How?”

“I used to lend an ear to my dad all the time. By that, I mean whenever my mother was upset.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

“Hmm, I suppose you can help me a little to solve this emergency crisis of my sulking sweetheart,” mused Verkis.

“What do you mean by sweetheart?”

“My wife.”

“Your wife... Oh, the dragon queen?”

“Yes.”

“Please speak. I am all ears.”

Lloyd then got down on his knees, bringing his body slightly toward Verkis. And he even wiggled his ears by moving the muscles behind his head to persuade the dragon king of his desire to hear about his problem. This attitude of his touched the latter’s heart.

“Tsk... It’s simple. My sweetheart is upset.”

“She is?”

“Yes.”

“What happened...?”

“She went on a trip with my mother and daughter.”

“Your mother and daughter?”

“Yeah,” Verkis went on to explain. “You wouldn’t know this, but she is extremely diligent. Beyond what you can imagine. For hundreds of years of her life here, she has never missed a day of cooking or cleaning.”

“Oh,” said Lloyd, understanding the situation. “Could that be the reason why your mother took your wife on a trip?”

“Oh? Correct. You’re quite clever.”

“I made a rough guess.”

“Anyway, you’re right. My mother felt sorry seeing my wife do nothing but housework and thought she was living too diligently to enjoy life. So, she suggested getting some fresh air together. And just like that, Mother took off, telling me that they’d be traveling for just a year.”

“Your mother has taken your wife?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.” Verkis nodded his head. “So, I was left here all alone. You know, this is an opportunity.”

“That is true. It is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. You can do whatever you want to do all by yourself. And laze around,” seconded Lloyd.

“That’s exactly right. I see you aren’t completely clueless.”

“Ahaha.”

“Anyway, so I planned on sleeping to my heart’s content, but it turned out my wife knew what was going on in my head already. So, she gave me some homework.”

“Homework? What was it?” Lloyd was intrigued.

“She wanted me to call her every morning.”

“...”

“In verbatim, she said, ‘My dear husband, for the first time, I will be going around the world away from your side. As such, I am truly worried about you, who will be left alone all those days. So, I wish for you to call me every morning and tell me how you are.’”

“Ahahaha... How sweet,” mumbled Lloyd uncertainly.

“But scary,” Verkis added.

“Yes, it is.”

Lloyd seconded without any hesitation. When he thought about it, there was something scary about those gentle and sweet-sounding words.

Really, it’s the gentle suggestions that are truly scary.

Lloyd’s mind flew back to the days when he lived in South Korea, particularly the times when his father got grilled by his mother. And Lloyd noticed that Dragon King Verkis had an expression that was similar to his father’s during those past occasions.

“I will never understand.” Verkis shook his head. “Call her every morning? What kind of lifestyle in this world does one, no, a dragon need to wake up every morning on their own? Is that even possible?”

“Oh, that’s a challenge to all the humans of this world as well,” agreed Lloyd gravely.

“Is that true? I’m not the strange one here, right?”

“You’re not.” Lloyd playfully agreed with Verkis again, pointing out the crux of the latter’s concern. “Wait, have you not called her at all in the meantime?”

“No.”

“How long has it been?”

“I’m not exactly sure, but I believe it’s been about a month.”

“Did you try today...?”

“Of course I did. I tried through communication magic but failed.”

“It can’t be.” Lloyd gaped.

“You catch on quickly.”

“She denied your call. Am I right?”

“Yes. So, help me out here. How can I overcome this emergency crisis?”

“...”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut, wondering how he should help out and what benefit he might be able to get out of it. He analyzed the situation, calculating it all piece-by-piece. He did the math for what his potential gains and losses were. And at last, a conclusion was reached.

“Um, I would like to ask one thing... Visiting the dragon queen is something you are not considering, right?” asked Lloyd carefully.

“Of course not. She’ll lash out at me if I go there now.”

“Right.”

Verkis couldn’t be any more right. Recklessly approaching a sulking wife was the same as asking for death. So, the dragon king had to appease her before he could go see her, and that was his main point of concern. How would he be able to soothe her anger? Thankfully, Lloyd had an answer.

With confidence, Lloyd said, “Then come to my fiefdom.”

“What?” Verkis tilted his head. “Me? You want me to come to your fiefdom?”

“Yes.”

“That sounds cumbersome. But why?”

“That way I can give you a wake-up call every morning,” explained Lloyd.

“A wake-up call?”

“Yes.”

Now came the crucial part. Lloyd licked his lips before putting on a sweeter and gentler smile on his face. And he spoke in a voice that said, “You can trust me.”

“Think about it, my king,” explained Lloyd, “You said it earlier. What kind of lifestyle does a dragon need to wake up on his own?”

“Yes, I did.”

“I agree with you. There is nothing more difficult and agonizing than waking up on your own every morning. But what if you have someone to wake you up?”

“Someone to wake me up? Are you suggesting you would wake me up?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded confidently, and in an honest, trustworthy, and credible voice, he said, “I will wake you up every morning at the same hour, so you can call your wife.”

“Hmm, but what if she doesn’t answer?”

“You should keep trying nonetheless.”

“Will it work?”

“It will,” replied Lloyd with equal confidence. “The dragon queen is enraged because your promise to call her every day was broken. The events of the past cannot be changed, and your fault will not be erased. But as everything is with life, your realization that it’s too late is the earliest time to take corrective action. So, you should dutifully contact her every morning from now on.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yes, and of course, she will ignore your call a few times. But what do you think will happen if you keep calling her? Eventually, she will come around. Why? You will be showing her how remorseful you feel, even if you can’t reach her.”

“Hmm. That sounds logical,” replied Verkis, accepting Lloyd’s suggestion.

“Yes, and I am here to help you out.”

“So, you will wake me up every morning?”

“Yes, all you need to do is laze, no, sleep all day until I wake you up to contact your wife.”

“After that will I be able to sleep for the rest of the day until you wake me up the next morning?”

“Exactly, what is more...” Lloyd paused before speaking. “Think how pleased she will be when she learns that you stepped out of this cave.”

“And that’s why you’re insisting we go to your fiefdom,” postulated Verkis, nodding.

“Yes, exactly.”

Lloyd smiled, swelling with confidence. A satisfied smile appeared on Verkis’s mouth as well.

Good.

Verkis and Lloyd. The dragon king and the sly human. Both of them had the same thought in their heads.

This fellow is quite useful!

Verkis’s eyes blossomed with hope as he looked at Lloyd. His suggestion was good even when the king thought about it again. There wasn’t much he needed to do other than just sleep like usual until the boy woke him up when it was time to call his wife. The human had seemingly solved his biggest problem after being left alone in the dragon cave.

That manticore of mine is reluctant to wake me up from sleep. It’s still afraid of me.

But that thorny issue was about to be solved very soon. And it didn’t look like he was losing anything from the deal. Content, Verkis shot a glance toward Lloyd.

“So, you must be expecting something big in return,” stated Verkis.

“Yes.”

“You won’t even pretend to be modest?” Verkis was slightly dumbstruck.

“What would be the point of that considering you’ve already seen through me?” Lloyd dared to say. “That would only bother you into saying a few more words.”

“Wow. I like your way of thinking.”

“Thank you, my lord.”

“Fine. I’ll give it to you.”

“Come again?” Lloyd paused, and just then, Verkis flicked his fingers. Snap!

“Done. An additional life and access to this cave. I gave it all to you.”

“What...?”

“Those were the benefits that have been promised to come with my sponsorship. I just gave them to you. All of it,” Verkis said dully.

“All of it?”

Lloyd was dazed. With just a flick of his finger, he gave him all of the promised rewards? Lloyd couldn’t believe it.

“What? Did you expect to see something sparkle or flash? Hm? I can’t be bothered to add those unnecessary showy effects,” said Verkis as he wrinkled his brow.

“I-is that so?”

“Of course. From now on, you have free access to this cave. You won’t trigger any of the traps. So, you can take whatever trinket you want from here. Plus, as for the additional life...” Verkis stroked his jaw.

“Yes,” replied Lloyd with a gulp.

“There isn’t a way for me to immediately verify this all to you,” finally said Verkis. “Hmm, or you could die right now. Want to try?”

“No...”

“All right, good thinking.” Verkis nodded. “Moreover, I’m sure you’ve also factored in the rewards you’d be getting by serving me in your fiefdom, right?”

“Yes.”

“At least pretend to be embarrassed if you’ve been caught.”

“Ahaha.”

Lloyd smiled in embarrassment. What Verkis just pointed out was true. Lloyd would be serving the former at least for a year, and this time would grant him the opportunity to curry even more favor from the king. He would dance to his tune and earn a little more brownie points from him. Lloyd figured that his connection with Verkis would come to be helpful for the rest of his life.

I mean, he’s the dragon king. The richest bum in the whole world!

Once again, Lloyd told himself that he had to keep this man by his side. He would serve Verkis as his great role model and ally even if it required Lloyd to pander to him. His life would be greatly enriched by building a constructive and close relationship with him

Plus, there isn’t any hard work involved for me to help the king like this.

He just needed to wake the king up every morning. That was easier than taking a dog out for a walk.

And in return, I’m building a connection with the dragon king. I should jump to take this chance come hell or high water

.

With only one gram of effort, he earned an equivalent of 1,000 tons in gains. Lloyd wasn’t the type to miss out on such a reward.

“So, can I escort you now, my king?” suggested Lloyd.

“Are you going to carry me on your back?”

“That way, you will be free from the tedious job of walking.”

“I like you. You’re my type of guy. But what you just suggested is creepy, so leave it. Let’s just teleport.”

“Yes, duly noted.”

Lloyd agreed right away, and Verkis prepared to teleport. The sly human and lazy dragon king. The two’s interests were perfectly aligned at this very moment. And Javier watched everything that was happening by their side. He thought to himself...

That fraud.

Javier wondered if this man, Suho Kim, used to be a scammer in his world and asked himself if he was wasting his energy to protect such a con man. Amid the growing sense of resentment, he started packing nonetheless to get ready to return to his fiefdom. And just like that, the two humans and the dragon king were set to depart for the Frontera fiefdom.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 250: Becoming the Dragon King’s Alarm (2)

Frontera fiefdom. The province that sat at the far east of the Magentano Kingdom. Originally, it was a shabby, good-for-nothing boondocks, but recently, it had been reborn as the hottest hub for development in the whole kingdom. Even today, its coal mine produced plumes of dark smoke, and the ondol laid out on house floors warmed up the carpets. There was also the arable land that evolved from the Maritz Wetland, the terraced fields, the water system that ran constantly to produce clean water, the generous apartment complex, and the water sewage system for human wastes, no other fiefdom in the entire kingdom with such advanced technologies.

Furthermore, the Frontera fiefdom received a generous amount of funding from the royal palace. There were plenty of supplies for reconstruction arriving on a monthly basis. It was similar to having thousands of tons worth of food delivered for free every month. There was more. The water bill from the Lacona viscounty. The slope stabilization maintenance fee from the Namaran fiefdom. All of it was an excellent source of financial capital.

And moreover... haa. We received more Elensia sap from the elf village this month too. It’s amazing how we can obtain one whole bottle of such precious sap in exchange for just 30 bags of coal. Lloyd told me to store it in the warehouse as soon as it arrived, right?

Count Arcos Frontera recalled what Lloyd had said and busied himself.

Psh! Fwoosh! Thwack! The trowel moved busily at the hard-working hands of the count, and each time, the weeds that tried to take residence in the manor’s garden disappeared. Count Arcos’s heart grew lighter with it.

“Whew.”

The fiefdom had everything it could possibly need. Its future was solid, and on top of it, the count’s two sons were dutifully moving forward to build their own future. As the owner of the fiefdom and head of the family, Count Frontera couldn’t be any more satisfied.

“Isn’t that true, my love?” Count Arcos asked.

“Come again?” Countess Marbella cocked her head at the question, stopping her job with the trowel. “What do you mean by that, honey?”

“Just. I am happy with how light and warm my heart feels. The weather is nice. Speaking of, what do you say we go horseback riding in the afternoon?”

“You are not suggesting we should race, are you?” asked Countess Marbella.

“Of course not. Let’s ride together with one of us in the front and back. Pressed close to each other,” suggested Count Arcos with a smile.

“My dear, how you make me blush.” Countess Marbella turned away.

“Hahaha, do you feel shy?”

“No, it is not that.”

“Then?”

“Only that I cannot believe you brought up such a pleasant suggestion just now,” she looked down as she said.

“Hahaha!”

The two then erupted into a hearty burst of laughter. Though they were squatting down with their hands muddied from working on the garden, the sensation of the dirt gave them joy. And even the sun looked particularly bright and beautiful today. Just like that, under the cozy sunlight, both looked around before they brought their lips close. Just then, all of a sudden, a magic circle appeared in the air beside the flower garden. Bzzt! Swaa!

“Eek...?”

“My!”

The two jumped back right before their lips touched. However, they were still holding each other's hands as they stared at the magic circle, which disappeared a second later until it was replaced with three people and a giant lump.

"Whoa..."

Lloyd staggered as he stepped on the ground after the teleport magic circle vanished.

Ugh. I feel sick.

Up until a moment ago, Lloyd was at the center of the dragon cave when Verkis flicked his finger. One snap and everything drastically changed. A mana wave enveloped the whole surrounding, floating his body. All sorts of lights shimmered around him. But they only lasted for a second. By the time his feet touched the ground, the entire scenery around him had been altered. Instead of the inside of the vast cave, the warm and familiar garden of his manor came into Lloyd's view. And then he also saw two welcoming faces of people who fell to the ground by surprise at his appearance.

"L-Lloyd?"

The faces he was welcomed to see belonged to Count and Countess Frontera, and both murmured his name in unison. Thankfully, Lloyd was able to grasp the situation right away.

So, we teleported from the cave to the Frontera manor in one flicking motion.

Truly, the magic of the dragon was impressive. Lloyd bowed toward the count and countess and said, "I am here. I must have surprised you quite a bit."

"Um... Y-yes, but... Who is that? And the lion?" Count Arcos pointed at Dragon King Verkis and the manticore.

Lloyd’s wry smile deepened. “Very important guests of ours. I will give you an explanation later. It is more important for me to hurry and escort them inside first. Excuse me for a moment, please.”

Lloyd sensed that this wasn’t the time to dawdle explaining the whole situation to them. And he was right. The look on Dragon King Verkis’s face was slowly changing as he stood beside Lloyd.

He’s signaling that he wants to go to sleep right now!

Half-shut eyes. Unfocused pupils. Drooped shoulders. Hunched back. Slow hands and legs. It looked like Verkis could sleep for a whole day right here if Lloyd put down a blanket on the dirt ground.

No. I brought the dragon king here. I have to provide him with a good place to sleep. That’s how I’ll be able to have more bargaining power in the future.

Lloyd grew impatient as he feared that Verkis might collapse to the ground right this moment. After quibbling a few words to the count and countess, Lloyd said as he nearly pushed Verkis, “Excuse me, my king?”

“Mhm...” replied Verkis dully.

“Thank you for the magic. Please follow me.”

“Must I have to follow you...” mumbled Verkis.

“Argh! Eek, no, you can’t fall asleep here!”

“I’m sleepy...”

“It’s not very far!”

Lloyd helped Verkis hurriedly as if he was helping out an injured comrade on a battlefield, almost carrying the king with his body. And then, he took Verkis to the annex building for guests and threw him onto the bed.

“Okay, then I’ll wake you up in the morning! Please sleep well!” yelled Lloyd.

Snore...

Another crisis was overcome by that. Lloyd was able to breathe in relief at last. And then he went back to the count and countess, who were still recovering from surprise at the whole event, and explained everything from the beginning.

“So...” Count Arcos gulped before continuing. “The guest a while ago... is the king of all dragons?”

“Yes, that is a precise summary,” conceded Lloyd.

“And we will be serving such a great figure? For a whole year?”

“Yes. That’s what has been decided somehow,” replied Lloyd.

“Is there any request he particularly asked of us?”

“Um, there is.”

“What is it?” Count Frontera gulped.

“We need to wake him up once a day in the morning,” answered Lloyd.

“Wake him up?”

“Yes, he told me that he needs to contact his wife, the dragon queen, every morning. As I told you a while ago, that’s how I came to bring him here.”

“Hahaha...” Count Arcos burst into laughter. Even though he tried to suppress it, he couldn’t.

How did my son grow to be so...?

Count Arcos wondered how his son had grown to be so capable. He looked at Lloyd with a gaze filled with awe. It had become commonplace for Lloyd to be summoned by the queen for an assignment, and as if that wasn't enough, he just arrived at the manor with none other than the dragon king. Now, Lloyd held connections not only with the queen of a kingdom but also with the king of all dragons.

Perhaps, I will become a father to a son that will be remembered by history.

Such a thought flashed Count Frontera's mind. But there was one thing the count was oblivious of. Lloyd had another king in his network on top of the human queen and dragon king. It was the King of Hell. But Lloyd didn't bother to tell the count and countess about him.

I mean, it's Hell. It's quite literally the underworld. He's going to get worried if I tell him that I've been there.

On one hand, it was pretty uncomfortable to share that story. After all, Lloyd had met the real Lloyd in Hell and helped the latter stop wandering and reincarnate. Sure, he could leave out that part of the story, but doing so made him uncomfortable as if his head was being wretched with his voice of conscience. So, he decided the story about the real Lloyd should be revealed in the future. When an appropriate opportunity arose, he would bring it up. Even if it invited rebuke and resentment from the count and countess, Lloyd was determined to come clean about the whole truth.

But now's not the time for that.

First, he had a lot of work to take care of. And so, Lloyd excluded the part about his trip to Hell while he narrated the whole story to Count and Countess Frontera. And naturally, the story flowed to another subject, which was first brought up by Count Frontera, who said, "By the way, that lion... is that a new friend you have summoned like Sir Ppodong?"

Count Frontera was intrigued by the manticore that was sniffing the flowers in the garden. Lloyd smiled and said, "Oh, no, it's not that. It's a manticore, one of Dragon King Verkis loyal servants. And that is why it came along with us."

“Hmm, I see,” said both Count and Countess Frontera as they nodded without showing any other reaction. The guards, servants, maids, and villagers reacted similarly to them when they saw the manticore.

“Eh? There’s a giant lion I’ve never seen before.”

“It’s extremely big and fat!”

“It’s as big as Sir Ppodong!”

“Mom! I want to touch its belly!”

In short, the people in this region weren’t terrified by the sheer size and stateliness of the manticore. The rationale was simple. They already had plenty of experience with Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Bibeong. Moreover, they had endless encounters with all sorts of evil monsters during the Monster Domino incident. Bluntly put, the villagers had all been through hell and back, so in their eyes, the legendary manticore was nothing but a big, chubby lion with a pink belly or a fat cat. Regardless, the Manticore happily enjoyed the welcoming reactions of people toward it.

“Dad! I want to ride that!”

“Cororong!”

“It says you can!”

In the next few days, the manticore immediately became a fluffy ride and an insect-collecting friend for the kids of the Frontera fiefdom. While all of this was happening, Lloyd became fairly busy himself as there was a sizable pile of work for him to take care of.

There’s the water pipe that repeatedly froze and thawed throughout the winter. And I should check on the water system in the Maritz Wetland and the retaining walls in the terrace fields. We’ve accumulated a fair bit of ondol maintenance requests. Plus, the safety check for the coal mine and maintenance of the water pipes in the main sewage needs to get done. Wow. This is nuts.

He had been away for too long. Count Arcos had tried hard in his own way, as did Sir Bayern, the Engineering Corps, and the Skeleton Corps, but there was an inevitable difference in the inspection directly led by Lloyd in terms of quality and meticulousness.

Well, it's all right since I won't be going away like before anymore.

He could say goodbye to leaving the fiefdom and working for any outsiders. His days of going out of the fiefdom and earning money to save his family, protect Frontera fiefdom, and make money for retirement were over. There wasn't any need for it anymore. All of his obstacles had been overcome. Right now, what awaited Lloyd was basking in the goodness of life and lazing around for his remaining days.

And so this will be my last time putting this much effort into repair and inspection.

Down the road, maintenance would only take a little effort since he'd stay near the fiefdom. He would just need to maintain and protect his golden goose, the fiefdom. When Lloyd had this thought, the fatigue in his body disappeared, pushing him to work harder. Meanwhile, he also didn't forget to wake Verkis up every morning. It turned out that acting as an alarm for the dragon king was not an easy job.

"Um, my great king," called Lloyd.

"……."

"It's time to wake up," said Lloyd again.

Snore...

"Um, don't you need to call the dragon queen?"

"Eh... Later..." mumbled the groggy dragon king.

"Later? Do you want me to wake you up later?" replied Lloyd.

"Mhm..."

“When do you want me to wake you up?”

“Tomorrow...”

“...”

Lloyd was dumbstruck and didn’t like what the dragon king was saying. It turned out Verkis was even less of a morning fellow than Lloyd thought. So, left without any choice, he made a last-ditch effort.

Please forgive me, Dragon King Verkis. You have brought this onto yourself. Ehem! Lloyd cleared his throat and started to sing in a clear voice.

“Dear, dear Dragon King! Sleepy, sleepy Dragon King! Chicken, chicken, don’t cry! You might wake up the dragon king!”

The song was destructive. It sounded like a wake-up call from Hell. It deafened the eardrum of its listener and successfully opened the gates of Hell. It was so painful and sharp it made the listeners feel like they had acid smeared in their eardrums. As such, Dragon King Verkis became completely awake.

“Do you... want me to punch you right in the stomach and make you return to mother nature?” growled Verkis, visibly annoyed.

“Ehem! Ehem! Please forgive me,” apologized Lloyd.

“Or do you want to become a speck of dioxin in this wretched world?”

“Please, f-forgive me. But still!”

“Still?”

“I thought I should still make sure you keep your promise to call the dragon queen.”

“Tsk. Is that why you sang that awful song on purpose?”

“No,” denied Lloyd.

“Then?”

“I sang to the best of my ability.”

“That’s your best?” said Verkis in shock.

“Yes, my lord.”

“I’m sorry...”

“Ehem...”

Anyway, Lloyd managed to act as an alarm for the dragon king every morning. Soon, he was able to attain certainty.

Finally, I really did it.

He really did everything. His goal was to spend the rest of his life in a peaceful province without any hard work or complicated affairs. This was the reason why Lloyd worked so hard and overcame countless obstacles. At times, he felt hopeless but always jumped back on his feet again. He breathlessly raced forward without giving up, and finally, he achieved the goal.

The fiefdom was absolutely safe and held heaps of capital. He had no more future concerns. And the truth about the real Lloyd would be revealed to the count and countess soon. After clearing the emotional debt he owed to them, there would be no more storms to break through. Lloyd was dwelling on these thoughts in this bedroom. And now, he took a deep breath. It was late at night, with no one to call for him. He composed his heart amid the tranquility.

This will be the last time I check.

He had achieved everything he wanted in life. There was nothing to worry about anymore. Would he really be able to die in peace after living a life of relaxation? Or would there be more unexpected events and incidents? Lloyd opened the skill window to check his future and activated a skill he hadn’t used in a while.

Clack.

[Skill Name: Ending Spoiler]

[Skill Feature: Absolute Authority]

[Required CP: 80 (Third)]

[You can take a peek at the portion of the ending scene that will unfold in this story by spending some of CP. It may have a happy or sad ending.]

The familiar skill description spanned. Lloyd took a deep breath.

Let's take a look.

Lloyd selected the activate button at the bottom of the skill window.

[Skill Name: Would you like to use the Ending Spoiler?]

[Required RP: 80 (Third)]

[Current CP: 1,192]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a YES.

Ding dong.

[Skill Name: Ending Spoiler has been activated.]

[You have used 80 CP.]

[Current CP: 1,112]

The skill activation message cascaded in front of him. From then on...

Crackle...! Time around him terribly slowed until it finally stopped. The window curtain swaying against the spring wind, the flower petals blowing in the air all stopped as though they were pegged in a wall called time. And just like it always did, the space ahead of Lloyd swayed until it opened a round blue passage.

Let's go.

Lloyd walked into the passage, and everything in his vision was enveloped by light.

Fwoosh! Lloyd cast his glance at the new scenery spanning in front of him. And then he was appalled by what he saw.

What... is this?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 251: Third Ending Spoiler (1)

What... is this?

Lloyd tightened the muscles around his eyes to open them wide but failed. It was obvious why he couldn’t do it. He was watching the ending spoiler for himself, and only his consciousness entered his body nearing its death. As such, he couldn’t freely move his future body. He was merely a direct observer, watching the future unfold before his eyes.

His gaze landed on an old note, the cover of which was unfamiliar, titled “The Records of Lloyd Frontera.” It was a journal.

I’m keeping a journal?

Lloyd curiously tilted his head in wonder as he had never had a habit of journaling. The only times he jotted down in a diary were when his elementary school teacher gave it as an assignment and when he was forced to keep one in the army.

That hasn’t changed. I don’t journal.

Could it be that he picked up the habit in the future? How accustomed could he have become that he would continue to do it in the face of death?

Still, I don’t think this is a bad thing.

Lloyd chuckled. He was surprised at first at the unexpected scene. But on second thought, this wasn’t a bad sight to see. He actually quite liked what he saw.

The fact I’d keep a journal just goes to show how relaxed and sweet my life must have become.

He must have been stuck in a groove. Bored. That must be how peaceful and problem-free his life was. Otherwise, there was no chance he’d cultivate a journaling habit. Lloyd felt relieved at that thought. But that relief was short-lived, cracked and interrupted by a cough from his future self.

Cough! Cough! Spurt! Lloyd erupted into a terrible coughing fit, drops of dark blood splattering onto his diary. He raised his quivering hand and wiped them off the paper with his ragged and muddied sleeve.

Eh? Hold on.

Lloyd's heart sank.

What's wrong with my sleeve?

His gaze hurried toward his sleeve, wiping the blood off his journal. It was originally a brightly colored shirt, but now, it was covered in gray and yellow stains, making him wonder when it was last washed. Plus, the fabric was completely frayed and the button on it had long fallen off.

What the heck? Why do my clothes look like this when I should be living a comfortable life?

Something was wrong. His heart started to pound. He didn't want to believe it, but a sense of nervousness started to grip him, and his gaze hurried once more.

Hold on. What about my hand?

Just then, he recalled the second time he used the Ending Spoiler option. Since he was only an observer who peeked through the future with the eyes of his future self, Lloyd couldn't get a good look at his appearance unless he was standing in front of a mirror. As such, the most convenient method for him to check his age was by looking at his hands.

A-and my hands?

Lloyd looked down at his hands inside the sleeves. And his heart sank once again.

I have no... wrinkles.

His hands were smooth. They were slightly rough but had no wrinkles. He couldn’t spot any dark spots that came with old age either.

So, I’m not dying of old age. What is going on here?

Nervous, Lloyd decided to keep watching and observe the situation. Meanwhile, his future self picked up a pen once he stopped coughing and opened his journal with trembling hands. This moment granted Lloyd the opportunity to peek at the writing inside.

Flip.

[This is the first time I have chosen to write in a journal. I am sad. The count got into an accident. He was simply enjoying horseback riding like usual. He was riding through a path he often enjoyed taking. Who would’ve imagined that a weasel would appear and surprise the horse into suddenly jumping? Who would’ve imagined the count would fall off and hit a tree branch on the neck? The physician says we should wait and see, but... I’m not so sure. I’m just sad.]

Flip.

[The count woke up after a day. He says he can’t feel anything below his neck. But he forced a smile and tried to calm everyone down. He said that he was fine. That it doesn’t hurt because he can’t feel anything. That he’s comfortable since he’s on his back all day. He flashed a bright smile. And those were his last words. Right now, the countess is quietly weeping in secret. To be honest, I want to cry too. However, I should go out and comfort her first.]

Lloyd glanced at the journal, feeling utterly incredulous. The pages of his journal turned one after another.

[The countess doesn’t talk anymore. She doesn’t say a word. She no longer smiles and tends to her garden. I picked up the trowel for her lest the overlooked flowers wilt. I hope the freesias bloom beautifully this year and lessen her grief.]

Flip.

[The freesias have bloomed pretty. But the countess can’t see them. In the morning, I knew that something was wrong when I heard Emily scream. No one would have thought that the kitchen once filled with everyone’s laughter would be where she passed. No one knew until last night. Could it be that she missed the count, who passed away before her? I must call Julian. He should be in the capital. Now, our manor, once warm, feels cold and desolate.]

Flip.

[Julian isn’t responding to me. I can’t arrange the funeral for the countess until he arrives. I suppose he’s hurrying back home now instead of spending time sending me a response like he did when the count fell ill. I sent Ggoming, so he should be here soon. That’s what I hope at least.]

Flip.

[There’s a response. But it was bad news. Not from Julian. But by Sheherazade. She wailed that she shouldn’t have left the house. That she shouldn’t have left Julian alone. She said she never knew robbers would break in. No, had she gone home earlier, she’d have found him and taken him for treatment. Her letter breaking the bad news was filled with guilt and resentment. I feel numb. I can’t believe it. Julian was stabbed by a robber when he was alone in his house. This feels like a lie. I hope it’s all a lie.]

Flip.

[I don’t even know what I’ve been doing for the last month. In all honesty, I still feel numb. But I’m forcing myself to pick up a pen to leave a record of what is happening. After I held a funeral for the countess, I went to the capital and held a funeral for Julian as well. I wonder if I’ve become desensitized after going through a series of sad and tragic events. I don’t know. Now, this whole thing feels strange. The death of the count and countess, followed by Julian’s death. Is it weird that I think these situations are very similar to the novel? Something feels wrong. I’m nervous.]

What the heck? What is this?

Lloyd gritted his teeth, his gaze moving faster. He struggled to catch every word in the pages that slowly flipped one after another.

[It looks like the ominous feeling I had wasn't baseless. I received a call from the royal palace. So I went and had an audience with the queen, but something felt wrong. Something was unnatural about the way she moved her left arm. After sending everyone away, I asked her carefully if there was something wrong with her left arm. She smiled bitterly, which confirmed my suspicions. Then I was hit with something at that very moment. The Knight of Blood and Iron. The attempt to assassinate the queen. The arm that had been sliced off was her left arm.]

Flip.

[I'm now in the fiefdom. It's been a while. I tirelessly comforted Sheherazade while I was in the capital. I had a feeling that something would happen to her as well if my hunch was right. I pray that nothing will happen to her. I sincerely hope that my hunch is wrong.]

Flip.

[My heart is heavy. Shiloh and Meatloaf. The loan sharks that burdened my family. I received news that they've been murdered. A small scuffle went wrong, and they got stabbed in the neck. My heart sank when I heard the news. The count and countess. Julian. The two loan sharks. All of them were the people that died in the early part of the novel.]

Flip.

[The last few months have been a nervous ride. Thankfully, there weren't any other major incidents or mishaps. But I feel desolate and nervous. I keep thinking about drinking these days. I shouldn't act like this.]

Flip.

[A war broke out in the south. It’s nothing big—just a regional war. Well, that probably isn’t something I need to worry about. I should send a letter to Sheherazade and suggest that she move here.]

Flip.

[I haven’t received a response from her. Something’s off. I’m nervous.]

Flip.

[I received news about her. A notice stating that Sheherazade was killed in action. That was only when I was able to learn what happened. It turns out she volunteered for the war in the south the moment it broke out. Was it to vent off her steam after losing Julian? It’s said that Sheherazade recklessly charged ahead at the very frontline. At one point, she was desperately fighting after becoming isolated in enemy territory. That was said to be the last time she was seen. Now... I don’t know. The destinies I’ve changed with my hard work while living in this world. And the people who were able to avoid death because of my efforts. Each and every one of them is leaving my side one by one.]

Dammit.

Lloyd shivered in shock, but the pages kept flipping with more news of death. The sultan’s death after accidentally falling off from a height at a festival. Orc Arosh’s whole body became paralyzed from getting injured during a hunt. Even Lady Namaran, the leader of the Namaran fiefdom, got into an accident. She slipped on a busy city road with a steep slope and got crushed under a carriage. Her death was instantaneous.

What is this? Is fate pulling a prank on us?

Lloyd was dumbstruck. Did all of these things really happen? They were unbelievable, dumbfounding, and also disturbing at the same time. This was as he could see there was a commonality between all the incidents.

All of them die or get into an accident in the novel, but their destinies changed when I stepped into this world and saved them.

But every single one of them died similarly to the story in the novel.

What about me?

Just then, he remembered how Lloyd died in the novel. He became terribly sick from his heavy drinking and died in the corner of a pub, coughing out blood.

It can't be.

Now, the journal was on its last page. Lloyd's heart tensed as he looked at it. Meanwhile, at last, the future Lloyd shakily moved his hand to painstakingly fill up the last page with crooked letters.

[Now, I don't know. I don't know how this happened. Should I have stayed away from alcohol? No, I failed to protect anyone. The pain was unbearable. Now, I just want to... rest. I don't know about a life of luxury anymore. My extra life? That turned out to be real. I came back alive a few days ago, but look at me now. Everything's a struggle. I'm fatigued and worn out. It seems that fate isn't something you can escape after all. What was it all for? I am really...]

At that moment...

"Cough...! Argh! Gargh! Arggh!"

His whole body convulsed vehemently as he wrote. He coughed like he was about to spit out his soul. But instead of his soul, something else shot out. Spurt!

'...!'

Blood. A flood of dark blood came out of his mouth. It covered the entire page of the journal he was writing in.

Crash! Then he fell off the chair, and it was only then that the present Lloyd was able to see the room. It was a familiar place. A shabby room on the second floor of a bar in the fiefdom.

“Master Lloyd!”

Someone rushed into the room, and his silver hair was visible in between Lloyd’s fading vision.

“Javi...er.”

Javier’s panicked gestures toward him. That was the end.

Fwoosh! Everything darkened, and Lloyd felt his body float in the air for a moment. And he opened his eyes.

“...”

Swish. The curtain that had been frozen in place resumed swaying against the night air. That sight gave Lloyd a slight shiver. It was only when he turned and saw the window that he realized what happened.

I’m back.

The Ending Spoiler was over, and he was in his bedroom at the present time. But his heart continued to pound, refusing to calm down.

What did I just see?

He couldn’t believe it. But at the same time, he had to believe it.

The Ending Spoiler had never lied to him before. It was all thanks to this skill option that he could block the locust swarm’s attack during the Monster Domino incident and prevent a cholera outbreak when the fiefdom saw an influx of refugees coming in. So what he saw had to be true this time as well. Lloyd began falling into despair.

Those incidents weren’t merely coincidental.

Seated on the edge of the bed, Lloyd struggled to calm his breath while organizing his thoughts on the future events he read about in the journal.

I only saw a glimpse of it, but the count gets injured while horse-riding three years from now.

That marked the beginning of incidents. At first, Lloyd thought of it as an unfortunate accident, but that proved to be false as he continued reading the journal.

It can't be a coincidence. What I read was far too sinister to just be mere accidents. Only those who were supposed to die in the novel but got saved by me started to die. As if someone cherry-picked them.

Worse, their manner of death shown in the Ending Spoiler was almost identical to the way they died in the original novel. It was the same case with Queen Magentano, whose left arm became paralyzed for an inexplicable reason.

While she loses an arm in the novel, her arm gets paralyzed here.

Given that the queen was a sword master, a paralyzed arm was the same as not having one. And what about him?

Those series of events sent me into a state of depression and made me look for alcohol. Then I got sick until I died wretchedly in the corner of a bar...

He died while vomiting a flood of blood from his mouth. Ultimately, he was set to meet the same ending as the character Lloyd Frontera.

Shoot. This is unbelievable.

Lloyd couldn't help but curse. Could it be that fate was playing a joke on him? Or did this mean that fate wasn't something he could change in the end? If so, was this an issue that couldn't be solved at all?

No, I don't think that's the case.

Lloyd shook his head. Whether this was a cruel joke from fate or an inescapable reality, he figured that he had to try something first. It would be much too regrettable for him to give up so early.

Duh! I've worked hard to get where I am now!

It was only now that he had finally obtained everything he needed for a life of abundance and was ready to happily live in peace with the resources he collected one by one. But to think he would go through those cursed events. That wasn't something he wanted. If this was how the story was meant to end, Lloyd wanted to grab the author by the collar and pummel him to the ground. And so...

There must be a cause that brings about this scandalous catastrophe. Whether it be destiny or anything else. There has to be a way I can alter or prevent it.

Lloyd pondered. The simplest solution would be to prevent the count from falling off his horse, which was the start of everything. But he shook his head.

No. No matter how I look at it, this isn't just an unfortunate incident. So, that alone will not be enough. Something else will happen to the count even if I stop this one incident. In the end, a series of similar accidents will keep happening one after another.

What if these accidents were the price he had to pay for going against fate? What if fate was interfering now to lead all the events of this world to the original storyline? In other words, Lloyd thought that simply preventing the next incident from occurring wouldn't be enough.

Of course, it could be a simple accident. But what if it isn't? What if something horrible happens due to my lack of preparation? Then it's over. I have to do something. First, I should expect the worst and find the root cause of the situation.

Lloyd reached that conclusion. The answer was simple. He had to find the root cause of all the incidents.

I don't have much time.

Lloyd jumped out of bed and walked into the corridor in the middle of the night. At the same time, a thought started to form in his head. If all the events that took place until now were to overcome the threats toward the Frontera family, from now on, he was embarking on a journey to change his own destiny. Even so, however, he wasn't discouraged.

What else can I do? I just have to go through with it.

Just like a mountain of assignments given by a merciless professor, this couldn't be avoided. It was much like his days in the past when he had to work to make a living while completing all his school assignments. If there was something he had to face and get done, there was one move he made before anything else.

Let's cut down on my sleep first.

Lloyd opted for the simplest and most standard decision he made during the roughest periods of life. If he had homework to finish or if he had to work part-time but lacked time, sacrificing his sleep was the only option. He could gain more time by pulling an all-nighter. From then on, much like the desperate days of his past, Lloyd started to burn the midnight oil in his study. Of course, he grumbled and complained about his life the entire time.

Crap! I wish there was Internet here!

To change the cursed future he got a glimpse of through the Ending Spoiler, Lloyd embarked on a laborious endeavor to search for a solution to change his tragic destiny.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 252: Third Ending Spoiler (2)

Internet, the gigantic network that covered the entire world. It was a convenience that everyone in the 21st century enjoyed, much like breathing. Even at this very moment, there were probably countless people casually opening their laptops or using their smartphones. Some would be doing so to work, to study, or even to just kill time and have fun. The internet was as vast as the Pacific Ocean, storing millions of pieces of information. At any time, it had the power to draw in countless people while unknowingly making them develop turtleneck syndrome. That was what the Internet was. And now, there was one man in the Frontera study who wretchedly missed this convenience of modern civilization on Earth.

“Argh...” Lloyd groaned at length as he rested his chin in his hands, at the same time mechanically opening another book. He lost count of how many books he had read but was sure it was over a hundred.

This is nuts, really.

Lloyd shook his head hard in an effort to shake off his drowsiness. And then he glanced at the pile of books next to him and let out a sigh.

I’ve stayed up all night for the past four days, and there’s still so much left to read.

He seemed to have around 50 more books to read through. Most of them were philosophical books on fate and magic. Some even dealt with astrology, astronomy, spirits, myths, and regional folklore. What was he doing now? Lloyd was devouring every book that could give him a clue to the future he had glimpsed through the Ending Spoiler.

But it’s not like I can skim them.

Indeed he couldn’t. In all honesty, he wanted to roughly skim through all the pages, which was impossible. These books were different from modern South Korean books, which were neatly designed and arranged in clear paragraphs and pages. Back home, writings with poor readability were rejected by customers and didn’t make any sales, whether it was an essay, self-help book, or magazine. And so, every book was designed to provide a hassle-free reading experience.

But the books of this world were very inconsiderate and far from being readable. Since there was no advanced printing technology, the books were transcribed by hand. Some of them were even written in such a tiny font that Lloyd had to use magnifying glasses.

These books are totally inconsiderate of their readers!

What was more, all the books dealt with new topics for him, so he feared that he’d miss a vital piece of information if he skimmed through them. He was practically forced to carefully study all the materials. It was an exhausting job.

Internet. I need the Internet.

Lloyd missed this modern convenience he once enjoyed in South Korea. What would it have been like if the Lorasian Continent had the internet? He would have been able to search up the destiny he had changed and the series of accidents that followed afterward. Or, at least, he would have been able to ask questions on an online forum.

That would have been a thousand times better than burying myself in books for four days straight. I’d have gotten more information or clues about what I wanted to know.

Thump. Lloyd closed the book. He lifted his head, feeling numb.

I know I like to punish myself, but this won’t do.

Ransacking books to find a clue for the explanation behind everyone’s impending misfortunes, which he foresaw through the Ending Spoiler, appeared unwise. He became surer of it when he thought about the internet search system on Earth.

Working my fingers to the bone isn't going to cut it. It'd just be a waste of time.

That was his conclusion after spending four stressful days of research. The reason was simple.

One. There are too many books, and I don't know what information they will hold. So I have to manually read through all of them one by one. But that has proved to be a slow process and takes an absurd amount of time.

Lloyd had spent four whole days stuck in the library except for the times he went outside to wake Verkis. He even tried his surveying skill to see if it worked here, but it didn't. The skill could only find the thickness and width of the paper pages, not the content of the books. As such, he got to work doing nothing but reading for four days straight. However, he was only able to get through about 100 books despite his efforts.

And if I continue what I'm doing now... How much more time will I need?

And what if he continued spending his days reading? It would take 30 days to go through 1,000 books and 300 days to read 10,000 books.

By then, I'd have browsed through all of the relevant materials available in the Central Library in the palace.

But Lloyd was skeptical about investing 300 days in this task.

Will I be able to find key information by spending 300 days reading every single book in the Central Library?

He wasn't sure. What if he found nothing? Then he'd be wasting 300 precious days.

Even if I find any relevant resources or information, there's another problem.

There was more he needed to do on top of looking for relevant resources and information. He had to collect and analyze the gathered materials and cross-check whether the conclusion drawn from them was right. It was only then that he would be able to come up with a solution.

That's the problem. I don't have enough time.

Lloyd recalled the journal he saw through the Ending Spoiler. The count's horseback riding accident was the very first mishap. And that's only three years from now.

I would need to find relevant materials, analyze them, and draw a conclusion. Three years will pass by in a flash while I go through all these steps. That won't do. By the time I have a solution, the accident would have already happened. It'd be too late.

Lloyd shook his head. When he did the math, the answer became clear to him. He would waste far too much time searching for information in books.

I need another method that doesn't require me to go through everything by hand. Oh, how I wish I had access to the internet—the place where I can upload questions for knowledgeable people to answer. It's so convenient.

Wait a second. There is a god-like being who has the answer to everything here too!

Lloyd stopped as he sighed, his eyes flying open. That was right. Come to think of it, there was one. Moreover, they were very close by!

The Dragon King!

Lloyd jumped to his feet.

I was an idiot! I hadn't considered that this entire time. The Dragon King may know something about those incidents.

A possibility appeared, and come to think of it, there was someone else other than Verkis who could possibly answer his questions.

And if I can't get any satisfactory answer from the Dragon King... Then I should ask the King of Hell.

He knew his way to Hell. The Hell gate was still open in the northern region, and he could enter and fly right toward the Hell Castle.

Though, of course, I'll have to pay a fair price to hear a response from the King of Hell.

It was possible the king would demand a fairly high price. So Lloyd decided to ask Verkis first since the latter wouldn't demand payment. Furthermore, it was the perfect time to do so as the sun was about to rise soon.

Afterward, Lloyd took a short nap, resting his head against a book he was reading. Soon, when the sun rose, he jumped up and hurried to the annex, where he woke Verkis as usual. "Um, my king, it's time to wake up."

"Ah..." mumbled Verkis sleepily.

"I will start singing if you don't wake up."

"Hey, I'm awake."

"Congratulations," said Lloyd, "You woke up right away."

Yawn. Verkis half-opened his groggy eyes, still heavy with sleep. And he drew a magic circle in the air and tried to connect to his wife. But the result was the same as the previous day.

Bzzt!

"Ha..."

The same today. She rejected his call. It looked like she was still upset. Thinking she would eventually come around as long as he kept trying, he lay back on the bed.

In any case, I'm done for the day!

The thought excited him. He covered himself with the blanket with an excited heart, but something strange happened.

“Hey... Why are you still here?” Verkis muttered.

Strangely, unlike usual, Lloyd was still in his room. Normally, the man would quietly leave after saying he would return again the next day while Verkis prepared to fall back asleep. But today, he wasn’t doing that. Instead, he was looking at him with a strange gaze.

“Hey, what are you doing?” blurted Verkis again. “Why are you staring at me with a pleading face?”

“Um, may I ask you something?” said Lloyd at last.

“No, you can’t.”

“...”

“I’m off to sleep.” Snore!

“...”

Verkis fell back asleep right after he finished talking. Dumbstruck, Lloyd tried to wake the king but failed. He even audaciously poked the king’s shoulder, danced, and sang like a nutcase. Verkis was unperturbed. However, Lloyd wasn’t willing to give up so easily.

I can’t give up! If I can’t get an answer here, I have to travel all the way down to Hell.

He was hesitant about traveling down to Hell, particularly as Hellkaros wasn’t the type to do anything for free. Lloyd could be forced to pay a huge sum of money to obtain a single piece of information.

If possible, it’d be best if I can get help from the dragon king.

From that morning on, a match began between Lloyd and Verkis.

“Dragon King Verkis!” yelled Lloyd. “I have a question for you!”

“Sure, see you tomorrow.” Snore!

“...”

Verkis happily went back to sleep. And each morning, every time he woke the dragon king, Lloyd persistently asked him a question, never giving up.

“Dragon King Verkis!” yelled Lloyd. “Does altering the original path of fate influence the present time?”

“I have no clue. See you tomorrow.” Snore!

“...”

His question was ignored once again. Regardless, a new day began the next morning.

“Dragon King Verkis!” yelled Lloyd. “I’ve come from another dimension and somehow ended up changing the fate of this world!”

“Oh, did you?” whispered Verkis.

“Yes!”

“All right. See you tomorrow.” Snore!

“...”

A new day arrived once again.

“Dragon King Verkis!” yelled Lloyd. “I’ve learned that tragedy will strike, and all the people who were supposed to be dead in the original novel but survived because of me will be killed!”

“I see. You are very impressive.”

“Thank you so much!”

“Okay. See you tomorrow then.” Snore!

“...”

As expected, the next morning came soon enough.

“Dragon King Verkis!” yelled Lloyd. “Do you remember the questions I’ve been asking you?”

“No, I don’t. See you tomorrow.” Snore!

“...”

And the sun rose each day without fail.

“Dragon King Verkis!” begged Lloyd. “Please give me an answer now!”

“I don’t want to. I’m sleeping. See you tomorrow.” Snore!

“...”

Nature brought yet another morning again.

“Dragon King Verkis!” bawled Lloyd. “If you don’t give me an answer today, then I’ll wake you up with a kiss!”

“You have finally lost it,” Verkis replied as his eyes grew wide.

“Yes, I have!”

“...”

“So could you answer my question please?” begged Lloyd.

“Hm, no. I don’t plan on giving you an answer. Go away now.”

“But you’ve just answered a question from me!”

Lloyd glued himself to the side of the bed and pitifully stared at Verkis in desperation. Verkis was shocked.

Should I kill him?

Verkis considered it for a second and wondered if Lloyd had truly lost it. But he decided not to kill him and sighed at length.

I shouldn't kill him. I'm supposed to receive help from him. I said I'd stay in this fiefdom in return for him waking me up every morning. It was a promise I made.

He couldn't break it. What would happen if he went back on his word? He would risk losing his power as a dragon.

I can't kill him. Should I just shut his mouth with magic? No. Then he won't be able to wake me up properly. Tsk. This is bothersome.

Verkis was extremely bothered by Lloyd, who had been throwing weird questions at him for the past few days. He couldn't get any peskier. But at the same time, Verkis couldn't ignore him indefinitely as it was obvious that Lloyd was hellbent on badgering him without giving up.

I'll just tell him whatever comes to my mind.

Verkis finally figured that Lloyd would eventually call it quits to his incessant questions then. That seemed to be a better scenario. Having reached such a conclusion, Verkis asked, "So you're from another dimension?"

"Yes, I am."

"And this world was a novel in your dimension?"

"Yes, I am telling the truth."

"Okay. You don't need to convince me. In the first place, the dimension you're from is nothing but a piece of hard drive saved in a storage of another dimension."

"Excuse me...?"

"What are you getting surprised for? That's the way it is with dimensions. Anyway, to sum up your questions, you came from another dimension, and you’ve altered the original destiny of this world. Am I right?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“However, the people you saved in that process will all lose their lives at some point in the future. And you want to prevent that from happening. Right?”

“Yes. That is exactly what I mean.”

“Then it’s simple,” Verkis smirked. “Have you ever heard of the phenomenon called ‘The Restoration of Destiny’?”

Even the Dragon King surrendered to Lloyd’s persistence, which had at last earned Llyod a reward equal to getting a question answered on an online forum.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 253: The Restoration Force of Destiny (1)

Altering the path of fate was not an easy task. No, it was almost impossible. Like an overly tight bowstring, no matter how much you attempted to yank and stretch it to change its shape, it returned to its original form as soon as you let your hands go.

“That is the phenomenon called the restoration of destiny,” explained Verkis dully. “That is how tenacious destiny is. And its restoration power is formidable.”

“Is that what it is?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes.” Verkis nodded before elaborating, “For some inexplicable reason, there are rare instances where the path of destiny goes through a drastic change due to external interference like yourself. And destiny exerts great force to restore its original flow of events.”

“So it strives to go back to the way things were supposed to happen.” Lloyd’s face darkened.

“That’s right,” affirmed Verkis. “Did you say in the novel you read, the count, no, the baron and baroness hang themselves due to their crippling debt?”

“Yes...” Lloyd nodded heavily. The baron and the baroness’s death were appallingly similar to the manner in which his parents passed away, the very tragic incident Lloyd never wanted to see but witnessed with his own eyes.

Verkis crinkled his brows slightly. “And you were able to save them with immense effort, only for the count to fall off a horse and break his neck. Furthermore, this also causes the countess to end her own life in grief. That’s the phenomenon of the restoration of destiny. You won’t be able to easily stop these incidents from happening. No, it will be almost impossible to make any changes.”

“Even if I prevent the count from falling off the horse?” Lloyd’s voice sounded more desperate.

“Mhm. You may stop this one incident, but the baron will keep finding himself in absurd situations. For example, he might slip from the tub after that day and break his neck there.”

“...”

“That’s the way things are. You could go out of your way and do everything possible to prevent these incidents, but eventually, everyone will face their original destiny.”

“Then what am I supposed to do to stop destiny?” Lloyd felt dizzy as he heard these words.

“I don’t know,” blurted Verkis nonchalantly.

“Excuse me?” Lloyd’s brow lifted.

“Didn’t you hear me? I don’t know.”

“Wow.” Lloyd gaped.

“How am I supposed to know that? Do I look like a god?”

“But-”

“Are you trying to complain about why I bothered to rattle on about destiny and its restoration when I didn’t have an answer for your question?” accused Verkis with a stinging gaze.

“Yes.”

“Tsk, you don’t even deny it.”

“I am being honest, my lord.”

“Well, but I might have an idea that could work.”

“My lord,” called Lloyd, suddenly changing his attitude. “I’ve truly admired you for a very long time now.”

“...”

“I am being sincere.”

“Ha... Anyway, I don’t know if it’s going to be the solution to the restoration of destiny, but it might offer you a clue. Have you ever heard of the Jewel of Truth from the Mermaid Kingdom?”

“No, I haven’t.” Lloyd shook his head. The Jewel of Truth? He had never heard of it. The novel didn’t mention it, either.

“I heard this,” continued Verkis, “from a mermaid I knew a very long time ago. I was told about something called the Jewel of Truth in the Mermaid Kingdom.”

“Is it possibly something that reveals the truths about this world?”

“Mhm. Something like that. More specifically, it only answers one question.”

“Only one question?”

“Yes. Just one.” Verkis lifted his index finger. “It gives the truth to any question you ask. But here’s the catch. Your question needs to be extremely specific to get an answer.”

“Then...” Lloyd rolled his eyes, pausing and thinking for a second. “If I ask it to tell me how I can stop the restoration of destiny from occurring around me, would that be a specific question?”

“Probably? You will find it out once you get to the Mermaid Kingdom.”

“All right. Then how do I get there?” Lloyd’s voice slightly shook. It was done. He finally found a clue. At one point, he had even fantasized about using the internet in all of his desperation! But now, after poking around, he finally got a useful answer from the Dragon King!

The Jewel of Truth in the Mermaid Kingdom. He's saying I have to go to the Mermaid Kingdom to find that, right?

Hope was rising above the horizon. A vision of hope appeared in his head. He thought that he might be able to resolve this matter much more easily than he expected. That was until he heard Verkis's next words, which shattered his hope to pieces.

"I don't know."

"Excuse me?" Lloyd's brow lifted in dismay.

"I don't know where the Mermaid Kingdom is."

"But you just said you have a mermaid friend-"

"Oh, she died of old age."

"..."

"What was her name? Houhora? That woman used to be the queen of the kingdom. But she died of old age."

"Wait, but you must have kept in touch with her until she passed away."

"We did. Though I mostly just used her to do my work."

"..."

"But that was until she became the queen. She changed the kingdom's location and never told me what it was."

"..."

My Dragon King Verkis! What kind of interpersonal relationship did you have, you sleepyhead? Lloyd wanted to heave a sigh. Lloyd sensed that this was all that he could get from Verkis. The latter didn't know, so what could Lloyd do?

I should back off at this point.

It would be crossing the line to cling to Verkis right now. And sure enough, his eyes were now heavy with sleep.

Okay. I've gotten enough information. It'll only hurt me if I excessively bother him.

One had to know when to step back after they obtained what they wanted. Now was the time, Lloyd sensed. He plastered a smile of a service worker on his face.

"I see. Anyway, thank you. My Dragon King, no, my hero, I sincerely thank you."

"Your hero?" Verkis repeated.

"Oh my, my true thoughts accidentally slipped out-"

"Leaving aside if you're being sincere or not, does this mean that you'll be off to search for the Mermaid Kingdom?"

"It looks like I will be," replied Lloyd.

"Then what about my wake-up call?" Verkis shot back.

"I will turn over that job to one of my subordinates."

"Really? Are any of your subordinates capable of waking me up as well as you?" asked Verkis incredulously.

"Yes, though they can't speak." Lloyd smiled as he thought of the members of the Skeleton Corps.

Turtle Neck, Square Jaw, and Frozen Shoulder. You're going to wake up even if you don't want to when they come here, tap, hula dance, and every morning.

Their bones would crack and creak, and the noise of their breathless dancing would force Verkis up, even if he was the dragon king. Thanks to these folks, Lloyd was able to leave Verkis rest assured.

“You will be properly woken up every morning without a doubt. You have nothing to worry about.”

“Well, if you say so.” Verkis then sprawled on the bed. A satisfied smile hung on his face.

Great. He finally got off my back. What a pesky little fellow.

The past few days came to his mind. How cumbersome this Lloyd Frontera, no, Suho Kim, from another dimension was! As a result, Verkis had to waste a few more minutes being awake even after he was done with his morning duty. He endured the pain of not being able to sleep as soon as he could for several days. That was the reason why he told Lloyd the story of the Jewel of Truth in the Mermaid Kingdom.

Well, if he’s lucky, he’ll find it. He won’t bother me until then, at least.

Just then, an event from hundreds of years ago came to his mind. If he remembered correctly, it was the mermaid Houhorah who told him about the legend in the Mermaid Kingdom.

It was the story about the Jewel of Truth. She said she wasn’t sure whether it really existed because it emerged only once in the far distant past. It made her wonder if it was just a legend or folktale.

So the item was only mentioned briefly as if it was a silly joke. In other words, it was unidentifiable even among the mermaids in the kingdom. Its Korean equivalent would be the Dangun legend of a bear eating garlic and mugwort until it became a human woman.

Lloyd will have a hellish time trying to find the jewel. Even if he can find it, it’s going to take him a long, long time.

The corners of Verkis's lips rolled up maliciously. He wouldn't be bothered by Lloyd as long as the latter was off to locate the jewel. Verkis figured that he would eventually stop needing to call his wife every morning at some point while Lloyd was away.

If so, I'll return back to my cave. There will be no reason to see that human or listen to his whining anymore. This is perfect.

The thought satisfied Verkis to the point that his toes under his blanket wiggled on their own in happiness. Verkis was happy at these thoughts of his, while Lloyd was happy that he had obtained a clue. Both smiled.

Haah, what an annoying fellow.

Haah, what a sleepyhead.

After that, Lloyd left the room, leaving behind the snoring Dragon King, and went to his study to find the location of the Mermaid Kingdom.

I read about it a few days ago.

Lloyd picked up the book of myths and legends once he got back. It was one of the books he had studied a few days earlier as he pulled the all-nighters.

I think I saw something about the kingdom somewhere here. Mermaid... The Mermaid Kingdom... Okay. Here it is.

Thankfully, Lloyd was able to find it quickly.

[Mermaids can dive into even the deepest and roughest part of the sea, and they hide their kingdom with their power in a nearly unreachable place. As such, generally speaking, no one knows where their kingdom sits, and only clues about its whereabouts can be obtained through the words of a few seasoned sailors who voyage through the most violent seas...]

Hmm...

Lloyd rested his chin in his hand, thinking.

The most violent seas?

Lloyd searched his memory. There were countless places mentioned in the novel. Some of them being in oceans and other similar locations. He pieced together, analyzed, and compared this information in his head. Thankfully, he was able to make a conclusion quite easily.

It must be in the north.

Lloyd was certain that it was. For starters, it definitely wasn't in the south. Though quite a large sea sat in the south, it was occupied by a huge continent much like the one on Earth.

The Arctic Ocean is said to have the most violent waters in the Lorasian Continent.

It was the most dangerous and violent ocean on the continent, having waves that sometimes reached over 300 feet in height. He heard that icebergs floated along the terrifying body of water, and this particular ocean was a true nightmare for sailors.

But I was also told there are a few masochists who sail through these violent waters on purpose.

Those individuals in question were whalers hunting for emperor whales. Anyone who caught even one whale would be able to boast about it for the rest of their life. And so, it was rumored that the whalers were hoping to become rich overnight through this method.

And I'm familiar with the home port of the whaling ships.

Their home port was Port Cremo, the place where he had defeated the Gigatitan. From then on, he hurried to leave for the port. The travel preparation was simple. He just had to pack three days' worth of food for his flight to Ggoming and some equipment for sleep, such as a tent and sleeping bag. Of course, he still had the task of convincing the count and countess aside from everything else.

“What? You will be visiting Port Cremo?”

“Yes.”

Clack. Lloyd shared his plan at the dinner table, joined by the count and countess. But, of course, he wasn’t entirely frank about the whole thing. He simply cooked up an excuse that he had to visit Port Cremo for research as he had a new business idea in mind.

Count Frontera looked slightly worried as he heard Lloyd. “But are you sure that will be all right?”

“Come again?”

“You have just come back from the capital. Did you not say then that you were going to take a long break for a while at home?”

“Yes, I did,” Lloyd replied.

“That’s the reason I am worried, Lloyd,” said Count Arcos. “I understand you are a hard-working man, but what is this talk about a new business all of a sudden? Did something happen that you can’t talk to me, your father, about?”

“Oh, no, that’s not it.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd smiled as he ate a forkful of salad. He could faintly feel the concern Count and Countess Frontera had for him. He could feel that he failed to lift the weight of concern from their shoulders.

Well. I wouldn’t believe myself, either. I must look like I’m rushing things for a reason that hasn’t been mentioned.

But Lloyd had no choice right now. Time was too precious for him to spend it lazing around. He had three years before the count got into an accident.

Before that happened, he had to find a way to stop destiny from becoming restored to its original course.

So, please trust me, even though you may be worried right now.

Eventually, both of them pretended to trust Lloyd's cursory response. But they still gazed at Lloyd with concern in their eyes. Lloyd looked at them with warmth in his eyes. He was grateful for them. He wanted to protect them no matter what. It wasn't because he was afraid of being left alone in this world or because he needed them to live a comfortable life. Sure, it could've been like that a long time ago. But now, it wasn't the case, more so after he had helped the real Lloyd reincarnate.

After all, there is something I must reveal to you.

Lloyd vowed that he would come clean in the future someday and repent for his sin. He didn't care if they couldn't forgive him. To him, it was more important to help them live a comfortable life after all the things they had done for him. And he was going to try his best to make that happen.

I wish to never relive that tragedy ever again.

Just then, his life in South Korea came to mind. There was something he direly wanted to erase but couldn't, a memory so painful that it was unforgettable. The day he had to bid farewell to his parents, who chose to end their own lives.

I don't want to experience that here.

At that time, in South Korea, he had been too naive and ignorant of the world and had nothing. He had failed to protect them. But now, he was different.

I can do it.

Lloyd was certain that he could protect them. He wanted to protect them. He never wanted to feel the same sorrow and regret he felt on that particular day ever again.

“I will do my best.”

Lloyd then grinned at them as if everything was all right, and his grin reflected his determination.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 254: The Restoration Force of Destiny (2)

Swoosh! Splash! Below the spring sun, cargo ships arrived as they cut through the splashing waves, and people busily moved on and off the ships. After all this time, Port Cremo was still a bustling scene. It was also more vibrant than the last time Lloyd had come here. He felt a sense of inexplicable emotion at the sight.

“Whew.”

The vibrant scene of the port was all possible due to his success in getting rid of the Gigatitan. As the giant monster vanished, the looming threat over the port had forever disappeared, inviting in ships from all across the world and making the port as energetic as it was in the present moment. Lloyd tightened his fists as he had this thought. Did he do so because he felt a sense of accomplishment? No.

Ugh...! I should have asked for more pay!

He belatedly regretted his decision then. He felt a wave of resentment as bitter as a strong cup of espresso when he recalled his work here a few years ago.

It was a given that the port would be developed once I captured the Gigatitan... But I didn’t know it would be to this extent. I was foolish. Idiotic. Too relaxed. I should have been more forward and asked for a bigger compensation. Or I should have at least insisted on receiving a small portion of the customs tax for this port.

Had he acted thick-skinned and shamelessly asked for more, he would have been rolling in money earlier. What would have happened if he received one percent of the customs tax when the amount of trade occurring grew exponentially? He wouldn’t have had to whine to the queen to fund his fiefdom or worked so hard to make money in Namaran.

My life could have been so much easier! Ugh!

Lloyd wiped the tears that welled up in his eyes like humidity in a basement studio during the rainy season. The scenery of Port Cremo in all of its bustle and hustle under the bright sun. This beautiful sight made him green with envy. Naturally, his steps became more hurried.

“Tsk... Let’s get right into business,” blurted Lloyd.

“Do you plan on requesting an audience with Count Cremo?”

“Yeah, of course,” replied Lloyd after turning around and grinning at Javier following behind him. “Isn’t it a given to first greet the most powerful individual in a particular place wherever you go?”

“Truly, that sounds like the course of action for a sycophant who leeches off those in power,” retorted Javier.

“Ehem. Can’t you call it a daily course of action for ordinary people instead?” suggested Lloyd.

“Well, I have never lived like that before.”

“Wow. That must be nice. I’m jealous,” replied Lloyd sardonically.

“Yes, it is. All of this is thanks to the kindness of the lord. He allowed me to only focus on swordsmanship growing up.”

But what about you? What kind of life did you live in your world? Javier gazed at Lloyd in a meaningful way, and he recalled the things he accidentally heard many mornings before they left the fiefdom. He didn’t mean to listen, but it just happened.

Dragon King Verkis. Master Lloyd said something strange after he woke him up every morning.

At first, when he heard about the possibility of the altered state of destiny returning back to its original course, how this world was a fictional world, and how the people he had saved, including the count and countess and Julian, would pass away after a series of accidents, Javier thought it was all a lie. He believed that Lloyd was saying those strange things to pester Verkis. But he started to think differently as he listened to him every day.

His story was too consistent to be dismissed as gibberish.

Moreover, this Lloyd wasn't real. This man was Suho Kim from another world. And when Javier remembered that, the things he first considered silly started to sound different, particularly about the calamities that would fall on Count and Countess Frontera. It was shocking. It was his first time learning that this world was a fictional story in another dimension. Moreover, in that story, the Frontera barony devastatingly crumbled, and fake Lloyd had been the one to prevent this tragedy from happening.

But then Master Lloyd said that a similar tragedy will strike again. And he has to put a stop to it... That was why he begged the dragon king for a solution.

Javier cast a meaningful gaze toward Lloyd, who was walking ahead of him.

Maybe my choice was not wrong then.

Javier had decided to watch over him even after he learned that the man in front of him was a fraud. There was a time when he agonized about his judgments in this matter. But now, his decision and resolution to observe and protect fake Lloyd appeared to have been the right choice.

That is why I did it. It's why I followed you to Cremo without any fight. It's why I decided to protect you.

If the tragedy in the Frontera family can be stopped, Javier was ready to protect and obey the fake Lloyd and risk all dangers. Just like he has always done up to this point. Much like the thinking when he left the Frontera fiefdom two days ago. Much like the resolution he chewed over throughout the travel by Ggoming. And before he knew it, he was already at the manor of Count Cremo.

"Woah. It's been a while."

Lloyd looked up at the manor with a different emotion than his last memories here. Back then, when he first set foot here, he was struggling as he had yet to pay off his family's debt.

Though it's not like my family is too great now, either.

No, in some sense, he was faced with a greater threat than a mountain of debt. At this rate, three years later, starting with Count Frontera, everyone around him was expected to meet a tragic death one by one. It was imperative for him to find a clue for a solution to stop these incidents from occurring. Resolved, he entered the manor and told the guard who he was and his purpose for a visit. Thankfully, he didn't need to wait long afterward as Count Cremo rushed to leave everything behind and escort Lloyd before anything else.

"My, my, how long has it been!" exclaimed Count Cremo in sheer joy. "The hero of Cremo! The pride of the Cremona region. For what reason have you traveled all the way here for, Lloyd Frontera?"

"Ahaha..."

"Hmm? Why are you chuckling like so?"

"Nothing. It's just that you seemed to have become much more lively than when I last saw you a while ago."

"This is all thanks to you." Count Cremo smiled brightly. "As soon as the Gigatitan was gone, trading ships came to my port in batches! And look who is living the life! Hahaha!"

Thwack! Thwack! Count Cremo tapped Lloyd's back with his steel-like or bear-like hand.

His treating me entirely differently from before.

Lloyd suppressed his smile. On his first visit here, he had to come up with all sorts of gimmicks to win the construction contract. But now, it was different. The success he had with catching the Gigatitan alone elevated his status as the hero of Cremo.

But first, let's focus on the main reason I came here.

Lloyd focused his mind. He wasn't here to be served as an honored guest and show off. As soon as they sat down at a table, Lloyd shared the purpose of his visit to Count Cremo, who was sitting across from him.

"Um, I came here to ask you a favor, Your Excellency."

"Favor? What is it?" replied Count Cremo, intrigued.

"Could you find the most capable whaler in this port for me?" asked Lloyd.

"A whaler? Do you mean those at the whaling ship hunting the emperor whales?"

"Yes, that is what I mean," affirmed Lloyd with a nod. Experienced whalers who sailed in the Arctic Ocean. Only they would be able to give him a clue about the Mermaid Kingdom. Those were the expectations Lloyd held, and he wasn't disappointed.

"I know a few whalers. And some must be lodging at the port just in time. Do you have business with them?" asked Count Cremo.

"Yes, I do, and I would like to meet at their earliest convenience. I have some questions."

"I see. Then I shall set up the meeting. But..." Count Cremo stopped after nodding pleasantly. And he threw a meaningful gaze at Lloyd and said, "My dear hero of Cremo. The pride of the Cremona region. Could you remind me of your age?"

"Excuse me...? My age?" asked Lloyd, dazed.

"You seem to be well past the age to start a family. Tell me, are you not in a hurry?"

“No, I am not,” said Lloyd flatly.

“Really?”

“Yes, truly.”

“Not at all?” insisted Count Cremo once again.

“No. Not at all.”

“Tsk. You do not have to be so adamant.”

“Please forgive me.” Lloyd smiled humbly, realizing that Count Cremo still hadn’t given up on Lloyd. He figured that was the case with many nobles in the kingdom. But he had no plans on accepting their marriage offers.

I’m sorry. I just want to date normally and get married just like everyone else.

Lloyd despised the thought of marrying someone he never met and didn’t love just for the sake of business. And so, he wanted to marry someone from a humble background instead of a noble lady.

Anyway, that’s not important right now.

Having succeeded in evading the pressure from the count, Lloyd left the manor right away. The following day, the message from Count Cremo came that the meeting with the seasoned whaler was set up.

“Allow me to introduce you to him,” motioned Count Cremo. “This is Felipe. He is the most experienced seaman I know and has been the captain of the fastest whaling ship in the Arctic Ocean, Feliconia, for the past 23 years.”

“Nice to meet you. I am Felipe.” As soon as Count Cremo finished his introduction, Captain Felipe offered a handshake to Lloyd.

“Nice to meet you. My name is Lloyd Frontera.”

Lloyd felt that this man's hands were thick, full of callous and rough edges. With one manly handshake, Lloyd instantly knew how many storms Captain Felipe had overcome all these years.

Count Cremo brought an extremely experienced sailor.

Captain Felipe must have squinted a lot to gaze beyond the horizon, Lloyd thought, because tiny wrinkles naturally sat around his eyes. But even his eyes seemed to reveal his abundant experience.

Feeling that this man could be trusted, Lloyd brought out the topic at hand. "Thank you, Your Excellency, for making this meeting possible. I was in need of someone like you, Captain Felipe, as I had a question to ask."

"To me?" Felipe replied. "What could you be so curious about?"

"Tell me, are you well aware of the mermaids?" asked Lloyd.

"Mermaids?"

"Yes," replied Lloyd with a nod. "Certainly, I myself know as much as everybody does. Mermaids are the strongest creatures in the sea. They whiz and swim around the seas with their massive strength and swimming capability, and even the Gigatitan are terrified of their corps."

"Hmm," mused Felipe, "I can tell you know as much as what is possible for a regular person. What more do you want to know?"

"I wish to know the location of the Mermaid Kingdom."

"The Mermaid Kingdom?"

"Yes."

"Why do you want to know?"

"For personal reasons."

“So, you have a business that requires you to go find the Mermaid Kingdom?”

“Yes, do you know where it is?”

“No, I don’t. But I somewhat know a way to find it,” replied Felipe, his eye wrinkles deepening.

Lloyd’s eyes glimmered. “Can you tell me more?”

“Well, that isn’t too difficult,” said Felipe. “Go to the Arctic Ocean. The sea with the coldest winds and waves whose giant floating icebergs intimidate all nearby ships. The deepest area under these waters is where you can find their kingdom.”

“Yikes.” Lloyd found himself clenching his fists. It was done. At last, he came to know it. It should be accurate, given that it’s coming from the old hand in sailing. And so, the only thing left for Lloyd was to call Draggy and get ready to take a dive into the Arctic Ocean. Just then, Felipe spoke and shattered Lloyd’s plan altogether.

“But even if you know the location, you can’t go there.”

“Pardon? What are you talking about?” replied Lloyd, bemused.

“It’s just as I said. Even if you know the location, you can’t just go there.”

“Is it because it’s too deep?”

If the kingdom sat in the deepest part of the sea, that would be slightly problematic. Draggy should be okay, but Lloyd wouldn’t be able to withstand the water pressure. In any case, the Asrahan Core Technique and manaheart had their limitations.

Um, does that mean I should pay a huge sum to get some magic done on me?

Lloyd’s thought was soon interrupted by Felipe, who chuckled and shook his head slowly.

“Too deep, you say... No, the problem is not that simple. This is a matter of gaining permission.”

“Permission?”

“That’s what I heard. That is, from the old-timers when I was still just a newbie. They told me that if I ever bump into a mermaid in the sea, I must ask permission to pass through the sea since the sea is their home. The same goes when you have any business to visit their kingdom, I’ve been told.”

The captain paused for a while until he began again soon.

“Of course, what I’m telling you right now may sound strange. But I can tell you with certainty that you need their permission and recognition before you can go to their kingdom.”

“Um, excuse me, but do you have proof to back you up?” asked Lloyd politely.

“Of course I do. I’ve been there.”

“Wait, to the Mermaid Kingdom?” Lloyd’s voice cracked in surprise.

“Yes. Just once. It was for just a brief moment. It was before I even turned 20, so about 31 years ago. I was cracking and removing the ice stuck in the sides of the ship that day. Then I slipped and fell into the sea. I could feel the freezing cold in an instant.”

“So, what happened?”

“I screamed. But the wind and snowstorm were too strong, so nobody on the ship heard me. Eventually, the ship sailed on without me, and I thought I’d freeze to death. I was scared and despaired. That was the moment when a creature I’ve never seen before appeared in front of me.”

“A mermaid.”

“Yes. They were big. And they stared right at me. They seemed confused about whether I was an intruder or not. Scared, I frantically thought that I must show that I was no intruder. So, I acted out until I succeeded, and under their permission, I was allowed a short visit down to the kingdom with them, where I received treatment and safely made it back to the land."

"Wow. Are you serious?"

"How else am I alive now and be with you now?" chuckled Captain Felipe.

"Wow."

Lloyd was amazed. Truly, this man was a veteran in sailing who experienced all sorts of storms.

I've done it.

Lloyd clenched his fists. The Jewel of Truth that had been mentioned by Dragon King Verkis. It was a legendary artifact among mermaids that could stop the restoration of destiny. At least, it would be able to stop those awful incidents from happening. And that was why he traveled all the way to be here, that is, to find out more about the Mermaid Kingdom.

Awesome.

Lloyd was able to locate a person who had been to the Mermaid Kingdom with one quick search. He felt like he made acquaintance with a tour guide of the Mermaid Kingdom instead of merely obtaining a clue about the place.

"Then..." Lloyd spoke, his voice growing with expectation. "When you met the mermaid in the sea, what did you do to get its recognition?"

"Do you mean the secret behind earning their acceptance?"

"Yes."

Lloyd nodded. At last, he would finally hear the answer he had been searching for. He could go to the Mermaid Kingdom! At that very moment, a strong, fiery ember of hope ignited in his heart. Captain Felipe grinned and gave an answer.

“I sang the mermaid a beautiful melody.”

What the hell did you just say?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 255: Singing with a Genuine Heart (1)

What the hell did you just say?

Lloyd hardly swore. This was true no matter what horrible or sickening situation he was in. It was simply something he didn't like to do. He grumbled to himself instead of cursing. But the moment just now was an exception. As soon as he heard Captain Felpie's serious and gentle words, Lloyd was almost triggered to grab him by the collar and shake him several times. The reason wasn't hard to understand.

Singing? Did you say singing? A beautiful singing voice?!

If there was one skill that he sucked at, it was singing. Lloyd was very good at evaluating himself, so he had a keen perception of his limitations. Singing was a notable weakness of his. He had no expectations for himself to be able to sing a beautiful melody. To him, it was more realistic for a newly-enrolled engineering student to make a semiconductor than for him to sing well.

But what? Sing?

Laughter spilled out of him. He was too dumbfounded. But he couldn't give up like this. The restoration of destiny needed to be stopped, and that required obtaining the legendary jewel rumored to be in the Mermaid Kingdom.

"But, um, must I really have to sing?"

"Hmm?" Captain Felipe cocked his head to the side.

Lloyd stared at him in desperation as if he was grabbing a branch in the river amid the sweeping current or searching for some lifting insoles before going out on a surprise blind date. Banking on his hope, he asked, "Isn't it? Do I have to sing? I should only prove that I'm not an enemy or an intruder. For example, through dancing or whispering."

“Hmm, I don’t know. I have never tried any other method. I was drowning in water at the time and didn’t have time to think. Also, dancing and whispering? Why would you have to resort to such methods? You already have the most foolproof method that has been verified by me, singing.” Captain Felipe shrugged.

“...”

Thinking to himself that this aforementioned verified method wasn’t going to be possible, Lloyd wanted to cry. But he couldn’t abandon hope just yet. So he asked, “Um, then, will any song do?”

“Any song?” There was curiosity and dismay in Captain Felipe’s voice. “What do you mean by that?”

“So, um, I am asking if it’s okay if this friend over here sings instead of me.”

Lloyd pointed to Javier beside him. Captain Felipe’s gaze flickered over to Javier and came back to Lloyd. He shook his head. “I don’t think so.”

“Why not?” whined Lloyd.

“I heard it directly from the mermaid that saved me.”

“What did they say?”

“That it responds to the song personally sung by the one in dire need. So a song sung by someone other than the one who has business with the kingdom will not convince the mermaids,” said Felipe firmly.

“Then, I have to be the one to sing no matter what?”

“That appears to be the case.”

“...”

“What’s wrong? Is there a problem?” asked Captain Felipe.

“...”

Yes, there are a lot of problems. Lloyd smiled as he stared at the captain. It was the smile of someone who has given up on everything.

“I am quite cautious about telling you this,” interrupted Javier on Lloyd’s behalf, “But Master Lloyd cannot sing.”

“He cannot sing?” asked Captain Felipe.

“Yes,” affirmed Javier.

“How bad is it?”

“Have you heard of the rumor back in Namaran, the city of trade?”

“Oh, yes, I have. How the Hell’s Knight made a fuss there.”

“Yes,” acknowledged Javier, “And Hell’s Knight writhed in pain after hearing him sing.”

“Writhed in pain, you say? Why?” Genuine curiosity flashed across Felipe’s face.

“...”

“It cannot be!” A look of shock came on the captain’s face when he realized the meaning of silence.

“Your guess is right,” affirmed Javier.

“Ehem... Hmm!” Captain Felipe cleared his throat. “His singing is so horrible that it can even torment the Hell’s Knight from the underworld?”

“Simply put, the noise of nails scratching on a chalkboard would be more melodious. Otherwise, a parasite living inside your intestine will be better at singing than Master Lloyd.”

“Whew, I see now.”

Stop it, you dimwits... I’m right here. Haah.

Lloyd heaved a long sigh, wiping off the drops of tears starting to form in his eyes. Just then, the captain tapped his shoulder twice and spoke with the most generous and easygoing expression on his face in the world.

“It’s okay. Singing, well… It doesn’t matter if you’re not good at it.”

“Excuse me?”

“It looks like you’ve misunderstood me.” Captain Felipe went on, “When I spoke of melodious singing, I wasn’t referring to a singer with great technique or voice.”

“Then what did you mean?” Lloyd looked at Captain Felipe for understanding.

“Sincerity and genuineness.” The captain’s gaze turned serious. “In fact, I didn’t sing well when I was in the water as well. How could I? Think about it. I was plunged into the icy water, and my voice was rough and coarse after having screamed too many times for the distancing ship to come back. What do you think my singing would’ve sounded like?”

“Um, not very good,” supposed Lloyd.

“You’re right. It was the worst.” Captain Felipe chuckled. “My awful singing wasn’t something a sound mind could bear. The tone was off, and my voice was shaky and off-key. I didn’t expect the mermaid in front of me to like my singing, which was done in a dire state of desperation as there was nothing else I could do.”

“Then I suppose the mermaid thought kindly of your singing nonetheless.”

“Yes,” replied the captain, whose smile deepened. “At first, it cocked its head and stared right at my eyes. That was when I felt it. It was paying attention to my singing, realizing from my desperate cry that I’m no enemy or an intruder.”

“Your sincerity and genuineness were conveyed to the mermaid.”

“That’s exactly it,” replied the captain, tightening his grip on Lloyd’s shoulder. “So, you don’t have to be discouraged just because you can’t sing. That only tells me about your vocal technique. What you need to do here is sing genuinely and sincerely.”

“You are saying that my singing can work well enough.”

“Speaking from experience, yes.”

“Thank you.”

At last, Lloyd was able to smile, and his heart felt lighter. It turned out the captain, who was speaking from experience, was right.

Right. I jumped to the conclusion too fast. It’s a mermaid, not a human. It wouldn’t be strange for them to have different singing criteria than humans. There’s no need to worry right now. I just need to show them my sincerity.

Now, he was confident. This was the first time he ever had that sort of emotion toward his singing. That probably was the reason why he managed to ask the captain the following.

“Um, excuse me, captain,” called Lloyd after seeing Captain Felipe was about to leave.

“Yes? Do you have anything else you would like to ask?”

“Yes. What is your recent schedule for a voyage?”

“My sailing schedule, you mean?”

“Yes. Since we’re talking about this matter anyway, I’d like to make contact with the mermaids in the Arctic Ocean, but if possible, I’d like to receive help from a seasoned sailor like you.”

Lloyd revealed his plan in earnest. He had to go look for the Mermaid Kingdom no matter what, and that required him to go to the Arctic Ocean. If this was the case, he reasoned that it was better to travel via ship cruised by an experienced captain.

I could fly with Ggoming or Draggy for comfort. But I don't think that's what I should do this time.

Ggoming was a parrotbill, so he wasn't suitable for a long-hour flight. Even more, he needed to rest several times a day when things got too tiring for him. But taking a break was impossible in the northern sea.

It's too cold and also vast with no land in sight. There are glaciers, but I don't think that would let us take a proper break.

At the same time, flying with Draggy didn't sound that comfortable.

Sure, it won't get exhausted like Ggoming. But it's too big and intimidating. The mere presence of Draggy alone will be a great threat to the mermaids.

It would wreck the mood around them and ruin everything. What Lloyd needed was to engage with the mermaids with an earnest heart, and taking Draggy would only give the impression that Lloyd was an intruder from the very beginning. Lloyd didn't want that to happen.

"And you will receive a generous payment from me. Could you travel with us?" suggested Lloyd.

"Hmm, does that mean you will pay to reserve the entire ship?"

"Indeed."

"Not to mention, the journey is to the Arctic Ocean. Tsk. Are you asking me this even when you know that it's off-season for hunting emperor whales?"

"And that is exactly why I am pleading even harder."

"Hmm." Captain Felipe pondered. "I shall have to bring back my crew on break at the moment, and the payment should be at least doubled, given there will be more icebergs than usual to make the trip that much more dangerous."

"It is all right," said Lloyd, "I have a lot of money."

“Really?”

“Yes,” said Lloyd as he brought out a bag and put it on the table. The bag made a thick, thudding noise, and the table creaked. Captain’s eyes shook slightly.

“...”

“You can look at what’s inside,” added Lloyd.

“Ehem...!”

Captain glanced and there, inside the bag, were dazzling pieces of jewelry and treasure Lloyd had taken from the dragon cave. The wrinkles around the captain’s eyes, the mark of his turbulent years, wiggled.

“If you’re saying this a retainer, then the total payment will be-”

“Five times more than what’s in the bag,” said Lloyd.

“So are we leaving today?” Captain Felipe didn’t hesitate anymore.

“Thank you, captain.”

And surely, money talked. Everything from that point on proceeded very smoothly, the preparation for the journey was done at lightning speed. The captain had summoned all the crew members on vacation to his ship within one day, and though they grumbled at first, they all hurriedly scrambled to get on board when the captain offered them an exorbitant amount of money.

Similarly, he was easily able to prepare the food and water for the trip, thanks to the help of Count Cremo, who still wanted Lloyd to be his son-in-law. He generously provided everything needed for the expedition as if he was trying to put Lloyd in his debt.

And just like that, Feliconia managed to depart Cremo before sunset and set out on the restless journey toward the Arctic Ocean. The weather was clear, and the wind was gentle. The waves were calm, and the current was stable.

This is a relief. I was worried that I'd get seasick.

A sense of relief rushed through Lloyd. To be honest, he had been on a ship just once when he rode a cruise ship in the Han River during his childhood. So he was slightly worried.

It's been the first time since I've been on the whaling ship. I was so worried that I'd vomit everything I'd eaten.

But thankfully, it didn't happen. The sail was smooth. And finally, on the 20th day of the expedition, Captain Felipe told Lloyd, "We have arrived at the destination."

"This is the place?" asked Lloyd.

"Yes. We're in the Arctic Ocean. Though technically speaking, we are just at the entrance."

Lloyd looked around. The deck was spotlessly clean, and over the ship rails and in between the thick cold air that formed each time he breathed, the dark sea spanned without end. Glaciers floated around here and there, and the whole scenery was typical of the Arctic Ocean documentaries Lloyd had seen on TV.

The captain continued, "So I think you should sing here."

"Really? Sing here?" asked Lloyd, uncertain.

"Yes. I don't know if you can feel it, but there are already mermaids around us. They have been increasing in number after starting to follow us yesterday." The captain glanced at the sea.

"Don't ask me how I know. I can only guess from observing the movement of the birds and sardines. Anyway, a fair number of mermaids are surrounding our ship now. So it's time that we let them know we're not intruders."

"You speak as though we might get attacked otherwise," said Lloyd.

“Precisely.” The captain smiled bitterly. “They are very closed off. It has been decades since they last took me in, and that was only for a short while. And so, it’s time that you appease them with your singing. Otherwise, we’ll be marked as intruders and either get attacked or banished from the ocean.”

“Whew... All right.”

Lloyd glanced at Javier briefly as he listened to the captain. Javier affirmed the latter by slightly giving a nod. The mermaids were indeed enveloping the ship, which he knew based on his acute senses as a grandmaster. So Lloyd knew it was time for him to act.

“Ehem... Hmm!”

Lloyd let out a few dry coughs as he calmed down, and he took a step forward toward the edge of the ship, his heart thumping. The sharp mast stood tall. Lloyd stood on the bow spirit, which was the most conspicuous area for the mermaids down the sea. It was a conducive place to express his genuineness and sincerity through his singing.

Whew.

Lloyd took a deep breath, calming his heart. And he reflected on his honest feelings then.

I want to save everyone. The count. The countess. Julian. Sheherazade. I’d hate to see the queen with a paralyzed arm. And to that end... I have to convey my sincerity to the mermaids here.

Lloyd gazed down at the dark sea. The mermaids must be observing him from there. Lloyd wished his sincerity would be felt so they would no longer be hostile. Lloyd dared to wish so.

Carefully and genuinely, in a trembling voice, he sang. While still lacking technique and in an unstable tone, he instilled sincerity from the bottom of his heart. He hoped and yearned that his honesty would lower their guard and hostility.

Sometime later, the mermaids laid a merciless salvo of attack against the Feliconia Ship.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 256: Singing with a Genuine Heart (2)

Splash! Ice-filled waves crashed down with a gruesome noise and hit the flank of Feliconia, the gigantic whaling ship. The ship, which had overcome countless tribulations and raging storms, staggered. Icy water flooded over the upper part of its poop deck, soaking Captain Felipe in the process.

“Hard over! Port!” yelled Captain Felipe.

“Hard over!” repeated the boatswain, relaying the captain’s instruction to the rowing room beneath the deck. The rowing sailors’ back muscles moved in response like waves of water. As the experienced captain smoothly turned the wheel, the huge ship swerved to the port, and the rowing room yelled in accordance with the changing angle.

“Port! Let fall! Four! Starboard! Give way together! One!”

“Whew! Ha!”

The rowing sailors synchronized their breaths, but the rhythm of their rows started to shift. The portside sailors stroked once every four breaths, while the starboard sailors did so with every breath they took. The different movements of the oars immediately led to a change in the ship's movement. Splaaash!

The front of the ship drastically swerved to the left like a stirring eel, its giant body whipping left and cutting through the surrounding waves. Right after the ship took a sudden left turn, a series of muscular individuals jumped out of the water like dolphins. But they weren’t dolphins. Splash! Plash! Splash!

“Acck!”

“We missed it!”

Their muscular torsos glimmered in the seawater, and below that, they had a fin with scales that brilliantly reflected against the light. They were mermaids. During the split second they jumped above the water, some stared at the Feliconia, shuddering in anger that their majestic attack had failed. But they didn't give up easily. This only marked the beginning of their attack.

"Sisters! Do not lose the intruder!"

"We protect our sea with our own hands!"

"Break the keel in one go!"

Over 500 mermaids charged at the ship as they swayed their fins at full speed from the deepest part of the sea. And they charged forward with sheer strength and tried to ram their bodies into the lower part of the ship.

Crash! Boom! Thump! Although the ship was performing well in its maneuvering, it failed to dodge the violent ambush from the hoard of mermaids. The hull heaved at each of their attacks. An ominous thudding noise came from the ship. The look on Captain Felipe's face paled slightly. But Lloyd's face looked more urgent than that of the captain.

"Wait, captain?!" bawled Lloyd, who was terrified by the sudden shift of the atmosphere right after the mermaids carried out their violent ambush. He almost fell off the bowsprit and dove into the sea.

"Singing! I thought that was enough! I thought being sincere and genuine was enough!" Lloyd screamed at the captain, his voice dripping with sheer bitterness. He had come down and crawled through the deck, which was rocking from the ship's drastic maneuvers and mermaids' attacks.

You said it'd work! You said I only have to sing sincerely with all my heart!

So he did. And with all of his heart. There was seriousness, warmth, and desperation in his singing. He wanted to save the count and countess, Julian, and so many others. He had sung, direly asking for the mermaids to offer him a little help and signaling that he was no enemy or intruder.

“Then why?! Why is this happening?!” ranted Lloyd, still feeling embittered.

Captain Felipe wheeled around at that. “Hey! I told you to sing!” He shot a dumbstruck glance as he busily steered the wheel. “My gracious! Why is this happening, you ask? Can’t you tell? I told you to sing! With all of your heart!”

“Yes, you did!” shouted Lloyd. “That’s why I sang!”

“That... was what you call singing?” Captain Felipe froze and cocked his head to the side as though he was saying, “Are you for real?” And then he started, which was dead serious and grim that Lloyd almost broke down and burst into tears. Unperturbed, the captain went on, “Come on! You should have just sung a normal song instead of making my ears bleed with that awful sound! Why did you even bother with such a poor attempt? Tsk!”

Lloyd was speechless.

“It’s not too late now. How about giving it a proper try this time?” suggested the captain.

Still, Lloyd said nothing.

“Hey! What are you doing?! Stop crying and say something!”

“...”

Lloyd wanted to burst into tears and ask what the captain would do in his place. He was getting beaten to the bone from the verbal attacks coming at him with every passing second. Lloyd forced himself to hold back his tears and changed the subject.

“Tsk! I won’t sing! Let’s just get out of here since it looks like I’ll need to use another method.”

That seemed to be the best option. The singing approach the captain suggested seemed to be a failure since it made them look like a threat instead of opening the mermaids' hearts. So, right now, the best they could do was run away.

Then I'll have to look for another method. Really, if I really have no other choices, I'll bring Draggy and invade the kingdom.

If no method worked. If he couldn't be friends with the mermaids, it seemed he would have to consider using brute force.

But that's my last resort. Right now, escaping this place safely comes first.

Lloyd anxiously observed the situation. It wasn't looking good.

Clang! Crash! Boom! Noises crept up from the bottom of the ship nonstop. It looked like the mermaids were trying to bore a hole in the bottom of the ship by ramming against it, and each attempt created a fierce vibration on impact.

I've got a bad feeling about this.

Lloyd's face slightly darkened. Truly, the situation was bad, and it was going to get worse.

Even though this ship is huge, it won't be able to hold on forever.

The whaling ship was manufactured for the sole purpose of hunting emperor whales. This meant that the ship carried a fair number of oars and a sail that ensured a safe escape from a pod of whales even while transporting hundreds of tons of whale carcasses. The design also gave the ship explosive maneuvering capabilities despite its huge size. Furthermore, since the ship had to endure the frantic effort of whales to break free from a harpoon, it was designed to be incomparably more durable than an ordinary ship.

But we are up against a terrible opponent.

They were up against mermaids. The most powerful creatures in the sea. The aqua tyrant that made even emperor whales tremble in fear. That was what mermaids were.

It is said they're exceptionally strong. Their strength is rumored to equal the strongest of the orc warriors. Moreover, there are hundreds of these creatures coming at us at once... If we allow their attacks to continue, the bottom of the ship will eventually break.

Of course, the ship would last for a while even if there was a hole on the bottom of it. The vehicle was designed to withstand the attacks of emperor whales. It wouldn't sink from a few holes and a bit of flooding.

But what if we get unlucky and the keel snaps?

The keel was the spine of the ship. If it broke, it was over for them. The partition structure of the vehicle that prevented flooding would be useless the moment its keel broke. The real problem was that the mermaids were strong enough to break the keel.

Right now, the ship has just barely been able to avoid any direct attacks on its keel with some impressive maneuvers, but there's no guarantee that this luck will continue.

Lloyd objectively observed the situation. It was bad.

And it's not like we can fight back.

Technically, he could. He could order Bangul to use his volcanic discharge or have Hamang create a whirlpool by absorbing water and spitting it back. Or he and Javier could set off their mana blast into the sea.

But that's too dangerous.

Lloyd shook his head. It was dangerous not to them but to the mermaids.

I need their help. What if I fight back and hurt the mermaids? Then that'd be the end. It'd be a complete deal breaker.

From then on, he'd be their archenemy. Any chance of convincing or persuading them would disappear, much like a cup of instant ramen that had been spilled on the ground.

Then there's only one way left for us.

At last, Lloyd made a decision. He shouted at the captain, "Captain! How long do you think we can continue on like this?"

"Continue on? What do you mean?" replied Captain Felipe aloud.

"I mean, stay in one piece without sinking!"

"If we're lucky, all day!"

"And if we're unlucky?"

"One second!"

"..."

So, in short, the whole thing rested on luck. Gripping himself together, Lloyd said, "Then I'll try to strike a negotiation with them."

"Negotiate? In our current situation?" Captain Felipe asked.

"Yes," replied Lloyd. "Though I don't expect it to work!"

"Are you trying to buy us time?"

"They might employ less attacks on us while they listen to me speak! So, do you understand what to do when I start negotiating with them?"

"I see. Escape instead of evading."

It was vital for them to get out of this sea. Once that happened, there would be fewer glaciers around them, and the ship would be able to move freely without the fear of crashing into one. They would have an increased chance of escaping without harm. Like the experienced sailor he was, Captain Felipe understood Lloyd's intention in a flash and nodded. A satisfied smile appeared on Lloyd's face.

Okay. Let's give it a try.

Lloyd loosened the muscles around his mouth and went down to the ship's poop. And he stuck his body out of the edge, the icy waves breaking in real-time, and he gave a mana-loaded shout down below.

"There! Mermaid sisters! I actually have a question!"

His shouting made its way into the waves, reaching the ears of the mermaids throwing their bodies at the ship.

Lloyd shouted once more, "I know that I upset you all with my strange and terrifying singing, but you see! I'm curious! What can I do to appease your anger?!"

Your anger! Your anger! Your anger...

His yelling spread more ferociously, further and deeper into the sea, at last bringing the mermaids to stop their attacks for a second. Everyone's gaze moved beyond the sea and fixed on Lloyd, whose body was protruding out of the ship. They became livid.

"That's him!" one of the mermaids shouted. "Yes! That's the guy who sang!"

"That wasn't singing! It was a curse that used sound waves!"

"My ears are still bleeding from the noise!"

Every single mermaid's eyes burned with rage, and they soon became hellbent on catching and ending the human in their view. They would sew his mouth shut to make sure that he wouldn't defile the sea with his disgusting singing and screeching ever again. The Mermaid Corps resumed attacking after cementing their spirits with burning anger and determination. Swoosh!

"Eek...?"

Just then, Lloyd spotted one mermaid barreling up below the sea and winding up to punch him. Lloyd fell back in surprise, but it was too late.

Shoot! The fist was coming too quickly at him, and Lloyd saw the massive forearm and shoulder muscles attached behind it. And he also saw the burning eyes of his attacker. It was evidently the eyes of a warrior.

She's going to kill me!

But he couldn't do anything. The fist was flying toward him with unexpectedly great speed and power, and his reaction to it was pathetically slow in comparison. The moment he had this realization, he became certain.

I'm going to get punched.

What would happen if she hit me? Lloyd wondered. He would get a fractured jaw at the very least.

If I'm unlucky, I might have to eat nothing but porridge for the rest of my life.

He didn't want that to happen, but there was nothing he could do. At that moment, all he could do was extract mana from his manaheart and amp up his mana with the Asrahan Core Technique. And as a result, avoid shattering his jaw by slightly raising his defensive capabilities.

Ugh. Please!

Lloyd clamped his eyes shut, hoping that it wouldn't be too painful. Just then...

Baaam! He registered a loud banging noise coming right below his jaw. He opened his eyes in fright. Then he saw.

Javier?

Javier, whom Lloyd didn't notice coming, had his hand outstretched, blocking the punch with his palm.

"Hmph!"

The mermaid became wide-eyed when her punch was blocked. In response, she instantly twirled her body to wield her muscular tail, which was thicker than a log of wood. It swung with a sharp noise, and Lloyd feared that a mere brush would at least break every bone in his body. But it was nothing to Javier.

“It is dangerous. Please step back.”

Javier held out his hand and shoved Lloyd back before projecting his shoulder and bumping against the mermaid tail. The impact sent the mermaid flying back. Whack!

“Ack!”

The muscular mermaid sucked in a breath as she was sent off dozens of feet away. She crashed into the sea but swam down, unharmed from the blow. That was when Javier’s gaze went back to Lloyd.

“Are you all right, Master Lloyd?”

“Um... Yeah...”

Lloyd, who was thrown to the ground, nodded in a daze. He was unconsciously rubbing his jaw, and chills ran down his spine. In all seriousness, it was very dangerous a second ago. He might have gotten badly injured had Javier not intervened.

Dammit.

Lloyd shuddered when his attempt to buy time by negotiating failed.

I need to find a way out by any means possible.

Otherwise, this ship could really sink. He and Javier could escape with Ggoming, but Captain Felipe and his crew would be sacrificed.

I don’t want that.

He shook his head hard, racking his brain to find a solution. The situation continued to worsen nonetheless.

Crash! Clack! Creak! Crack!

As the mermaids flung their bodies at the ship and created a thumping noise, the ship began to gradually make a creaky noise that definitely signaled something worse.

“I fear that the ship is starting to topple by the impact,” said Javier, feeling nervous. Something terrible was about to happen.

I should save Master Lloyd first if the ship sinks.

Master Lloyd must be protected, come hell or high water. Even if he wasn’t the real one, now that he has become the pillar of the family, he was more important than the real one and required the utmost protection. At all costs. Regardless of any unreasonable situations, he shall be protected and guarded. Javier cemented his resolution when...

“Hmm. I’ve got no choice, given the situation. Javier. We need to fish for a bit,” announced Lloyd.

“Pardon? Fish?” Javier tilted his head at Lloyd’s words. Fish? Now? What could he mean? But there was no bait. How? And at last, Javier saw Lloyd hoisting a rope with a shameless smile on his face before the latter nonchalantly gave him an unbelievably absurd demand.

“You’ll have to be the bait. You won’t freeze to death in the water since you’re a grandmaster, right?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 257: The Affairs of the Mermaid Kingdom (1)

“You won’t freeze to death in the water since you’re a grandmaster, right?”

“...”

“Right?” said Lloyd.

“...”

What are you talking about, Master Lloyd? Javier shot an icy glower at Lloyd, understanding immediately what he was about to do.

“You can’t be thinking of using me as bait after suggesting for us to fish out of nowhere, could you, Master Lloyd?”

“Yeah. That’s correct.” Lloyd waggled his brows.

Javier didn’t respond.

“Um, are you happy that you got the answer in one try?”

“...”

I’m not happy. Rather, I wanted to trample you for just a second, Young Master. But Javier couldn’t express his sincere emotion because Lloyd hurriedly explained his plan.

“Hey, even though you may think I’m joking around here, you know this situation is serious, right?”

“I am aware of that.”

“That’s why.” Lloyd’s stare suddenly grew serious. “This won’t do. This ship won’t be able to endure if it continues to be attacked like now. Besides, those mermaids don’t look like they’ll give up any time soon.”

“I agree with you,” seconded Javier seriously.

“So, I need you to get in the water.”

“By being a bait, what plan do you exactly have on your mind?”

“A very scary bait.” Lloyd smiled scarily. “I never meant to fight back, but this won’t do. So, we just need to return one proper blow. One that won’t hurt them but send them the message to back off. You can do that, right?”

“Are you saying we can buy time to escape while they back off from the ship?”

“That’s right. How does it sound?”

“I think I can do that.” Javier nodded. He quickly understood Lloyd’s message. With one powerful and menacing counterattack, he would temporarily draw the mermaids back. In return, their frenzied attacks would be put to a halt and earn them some time.

“Great,” said Lloyd, “And this would be our best option if you can avoid getting hurt in the process.”

“I will try my best, Master Lloyd.”

A faint smile of satisfaction spread across Javier’s face. This was what he liked about fake Lloyd. Though there were times Lloyd acted like a nutcase, the man cared about his safety. However, realizing it wasn’t the time to think about this matter, Javier jumped into action.

“The rope. Please tie it to the mast.”

“Okay.”

Javier tightly tied the rope he received from Lloyd around his waist, and Lloyd tied its other end to the mast. Everything was set.

“Now, I will jump into the sea. The moment I lay a counterattack, please pull up the rope right away.”

“How will I know that you made a counterattack? Will you give me a separate signal?” asked Lloyd.

“No,” replied Javier, “You will know right away without one.”

“How?” Lloyd asked again.

Javier scoffed and then said, “Because I will overturn the sea.”

With that, Javier jumped up to the rail and threw a glance behind at Lloyd before diving in.

Splash! As soon as he plunged into the water, his body became wrapped in bitter cold, and Javier felt an icy sensation that seemed to be freezing his skin, muscles, and blood vessels. But Javier didn’t mind at all. He activated the Asrahan Core Technique to its full limit and reverberated all the manahearts that were woven into the cells of his body. He then ran a sweeping survey across the sea in a ferocious gaze, ready to roar, and noticed hundreds of mermaids rushing toward the ship. Javier was able to predict their incoming trajectory and movements before preparing to send a sweeping blow that would not hurt them but make them retreat.

I only have one chance.

Javier’s eyes shone much brighter than the cold blue sea. He gripped the hilt of his sword, harnessing his power. But soon, before he did anything, all the mermaids froze in place. Could it be that they sensed his dangerous energy with their almost wild instincts? The mermaids all ceased attacking the ship. Instead, with fright in their eyes and astonishment on their faces, they intensely stared at Javier. The latter lifted his brow at their abrupt change.

Did they figure out my plan?

It appeared so, indeed. But Javier didn’t care as he had already identified the location and line of trajectory for every single mermaid at sea. Now, he just had to sweep them hundreds of feet away by drawing his sword. But right when he was about to pull his sword out, one of the mermaids staring at Javier raised her hand. She then pointed at Javier’s face with a slight blush and a trembling voice like a girl who had fallen in love for the first time, she murmured something along with everyone else.

“You pass.”

Swoosh. At once, the sea grew quiet. There weren’t any mermaids aggressively swimming around them anymore. The surrounding glaciers stopped clashing against each other. The only sound was from the quiet waves on the surface of the water. Javier flinched as the sea grew quiet. He grabbed the hilt of the sword he was about to pull. His eyes shone coldly.

“...”

Pass? What were they saying all of a sudden? What kind of trickery was this? Did they predict his counterattack already? Or were they buying time to ambush him later?

I cannot lower my guard.

Javier thought so. But at that moment, one of the mermaids that stopped attacking the ship swam over to Javier. Her manner was extremely careful compared to a while ago. When she was about 15 feet away from him, she asked, “Beautiful human. What is your name?”

“...”

Javier didn’t answer. He couldn’t actually because he wasn’t a mermaid. He didn’t have the ability to talk underwater. Realizing this, the mermaid nodded.

“Oops. I forgot. Humans don’t know how to talk underwater like us. I would like to have a conversation with you. Do you mind if we go above water for a while and talk?”

Javier simply stared without saying anything.

“It is all right. You passed. We won’t attack you.” The mermaid grinned as she opened her palms to Javier.

That wasn’t all. She even gave a strict order to the others.

“Everybody back off.”

With one command, the entire Mermaid Corps withdrew and loosened their siege. This sight relieved Javier a little, so he swam up to the surface without a word.

“Whew...”

Javier breathed out in between the splashing waves. A moment later, the mermaid surfaced as well, finally allowing Javier to take a proper look at the face of the individual who came forward as the representative of the mermaids.

“Nice to meet you. I am the commander of the third underwater guard team of the Mermaid Kingdom.”

“I am Javier Asrahan, a knight serving Count Frontera.”

“Javier Asrahan?”

“Yes,” affirmed Javier.

“Oh! Even your name is pretty.”

“...”

Javier frowned, his forehead wrinkling. The mermaid right in front of him and the others below were all acting the same way. They were blushing as they looked at him. Javier could easily presume why. He was used to this.

“Did you mean that my face has been approved?” asked Javier impassively.

“Oh! How did you know?” exclaimed the mermaid.

“I am familiar with this situation,” Javier nonchalantly spoke as if it was obvious. “I have been at the center of attention everywhere I went throughout my life for my looks, which have been received positively by women. So I am not entirely unfamiliar with this situation. However...” Javier’s gaze slightly grew cold as he looked at the mermaid. “Despite my dashing face, you are the guard who protects this territory. From my understanding, we need your permission and approval to enter your kingdom.”

“Um, you are right,” seconded the mermaid nicely.

“I also heard that you must sing with great sincerity and care to gain approval. Am I correct?”

“Yes, that is roughly correct.”

“But I did not sing, you see,” Javier pointed out, fixing his gaze on her.

“It does not matter,” said the mermaid casually.

“It does not matter...? Wait-”

“Singing is not the only way to touch someone’s heart.”

Javier frowned, not understanding what she was saying.

Reading his face, she added, “What cares about singing when your face already has inspired us to give you our approval?” Her eyes glimmered very brightly as if what she said was obvious.

For some reason, Javier was overwhelmed by her eagerness.

“Then, do I really have permission to enter your kingdom? Just based on my appearance?” asked Javier.

“Of course. Didn’t you see how all my sisters gave their approval?”

“I see... Then could you give me a second?” asked Javier.

“Why? For what?”

“I would like to share the news with my company onboard.”

Javier fleetingly glanced toward the upper deck of the ship, and the mermaid commander shrugged. It was a silent agreement from her.

“I appreciate your kindness. Well then.”

Javier then jumped out of the water and got to the deck of the ship. Conveniently, the captain, crew, and Lloyd were gathered in the area to watch over the situation.

“What the? What happened? Why did they stop attacking when you didn’t even fight back?” asked Lloyd, who came to Javier before anyone else.

Shaking his hair dripping with seawater, Javier replied, “I believe I have attained their approval.”

“You what? You received their permission?” Lloyd frowned.

“Yes,” affirmed Javier.

“How?”

“They said my face had their approval.”

“...”

“Actually,” continued Javier, “When you think about it, it is nothing very surprising. I should have jumped into the water instead of having you sing, Master Lloyd, in the first place. Then the ship would not have been attacked like this.”

“...”

“Anyhow, what a relief it is that I have acquired approval from them in this way at least.”

“Yeah,” Lloyd huffed sarcastically, “It’s such a great relief that you’re handsome. Isn’t it? Hahahaha.”

“Yes. It is a big relief that I was able to prevent a destructive situation brought about by your hopeless singing with my handsome looks.”

“Yeah. What a relief, really. Oh, I’m so happy. Ahaha...”

“Master Lloyd.” Javier stared at Lloyd with a serious look.

“That’s right. What.”

“Please stop crying.”

“Shut up,” blurted Lloyd in denial. “My eyes are just dry from the salty sea breeze.”

“Anyway, you should first talk with the mermaid representative below,” suggested Javier with a smile.

“I was about to,” huffed Lloyd as he wiped his eyes with his sleeve and stuck his body out of the ship railing. When he looked down, he saw the mermaid in question.

Wow. Her muscles are unreal.

Amid the splashing waves, there was a fellow, no young lady, whose body was swaying in the water. Her muscles were nothing to joke about. They were bulky and brawn, and Lloyd realized again something he had felt when he built the mermaid statue in Port Cremo. The mermaid’s muscles appeared to be literal weapons that came from intensely training for 24 hours every day in the water their entire lives.

It’d be a sight to behold if I brought her to a gym alongside Orc Arosh.

The mermaid’s physique seemed to be on par with the orcs, whose bodies Lloyd had examined up close. But now wasn’t the time to admire her muscles. He cleared his throat.

“Hmm! Ehem! How are you? My name is Lloyd Frontera,” announced Lloyd aloud.

The mermaid commander simply stared back at Lloyd. Her eyes were marked with terrible boredom.

“I just heard from my personal knight, Sir Asrahan. I was told, ‘Thanks to your generosity, Sir Asrahan has gained your approval and praise for his beauty.’”

“Yes. And...?” the mermaid retorted.

“First, I would like to express my gratitude for your generous and wise decision.”

Lloyd smiled like a salesman. Could it be that worked? The same smile hung on the mermaid’s face.

“Gratitude?” she puffed. “We should be the grateful ones. We were able to enjoy a view of such an unimaginable beauty like him. It looks like today is our lucky day.”

“My,” replied Lloyd gleefully, “Thank you very much for saying so. Today appears to be a lucky day for us as well.”

“Lucky? What do you mean it is a lucky day for you?”

“Why else? I came to meet someone with such a generous and wise insight,” groveled Lloyd.

“Generous and wise insight, you say? But I just described what is beautiful to be beautiful. Nothing else.”

“Ahaha. Is that so? I see you are honest as well.”

“Who cares. Anyway, what business do you have with us?”

The mermaid commander’s eyes now turned sharp as they looked up at Lloyd.

She continued to speak. “Speaking of, it is slightly strange. We were only touched by Javier Asrahan’s beautiful appearance, and we allowed his visit to the kingdom. So it is a mystery why you would come out and gain our affection. Do you have any business with us?”

“Oh, I definitely have.” Lloyd’s face lit up.

“What is it?”

“As I have said briefly, I receive protection from Javier Asrahan. We came here together.”

“So?”

“Since you allowed his visit to your kingdom, I ask that I come along-”

“No.”

“What...?”

“I said no.” Her rejection was clear-cut and sharp. With a sterner gaze, she asked, “What touched us was the beautiful face of Javier Asrahan. So why should we allow your visit to the kingdom when you have no connection with his appearance?”

“Oh... That’s...” Lloyd gulped dryly.

Come on...

Lloyd was secretly flustered. It never occurred to him that he’d be treated this coldly. At last, he understood what was going on.

She’s discriminating against me for my looks!

It looked like Javier was the only one who was permitted to enter. There didn’t seem to be a great reason for it either.

He’s good-looking. That’s the only reason. Fine. Sorry that I’m not good-looking. Sorry that I look like this! Hmph.

Lloyd was resentful and envious. He began to tear up from his anger directed at all the handsome men in the world. But he couldn't just sit back. He elbowed Javier's side and whispered, "Hey."

"Yes," Javier casually answered when he was called.

"Back me up," whispered Lloyd.

"How should I back you up?"

"Anything. Just make sure that I can visit their kingdom too."

"Understood, Young Master."

Javier nodded and stepped forward out of the railing. Lloyd waited with bated breath for what Javier might say. He prayed that the latter would offer some strong words and persuade the mermaids to give him permission to visit their kingdom.

Please!

While Lloyd prayed so, Javier began to speak.

"Commander? I have a favor to ask you."

"Oh! You do?! What is it?"

Contrary to the conversation with Lloyd a moment ago, her voice was now sweet and gentle as she answered Javier. Even her eyes glimmered. Lloyd gave a snort when he saw the difference in her attitude. Meanwhile, Javier and the mermaid continued to converse.

"I would like for you to approve Master Lloyd's visit to your kingdom," gently said Javier.

"Of course. Since you are asking, I will grant it."

With great ease and as if it was the obvious course of action, the mermaid commander flashed a big grin and nodded.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 258: The Affairs of the Mermaid Kingdom (2)

“Of course. Since you are asking, I will grant it.”

With great ease and as if it was the obvious course of action, the mermaid commander flashed a big grin and nodded.

That’s it?!

That really was it. That concluded Javier’s request and gained the mermaid guard commander’s approval. There was nothing else expected from him. Javier didn’t even have to use flowery words while making his request or provide any explanations. Nor did he have to desperately expound his situation or give a solid promise in return. It was all left unsaid. Even the reaction of the mermaid guard commander was simple, as though that was the way it should be. She didn’t bother saying anything more and skipped the entire negotiation process.

Dammit. I can do my best, but I’ll never compare against a handsome bastard...

Lloyd berated his life as a growing sense of insecurity gripped him. If they used his usual method, he’d have needed to go through the tiring process of making countless plans and preparations in order to gain permission to visit the Mermaid Kingdom. But when Javier took charge, the whole process became unnecessary.

What the heck? What the heck was that? Please help us. Yes, I will help you since it’s coming from you, Sir Asrahan. Tee-hee. And that was it?

Lloyd felt bitter. The very core of his soul was dismayed. He jumped into the sea, received the clam necklace for visitors, which enabled underwater breathing, talking, protection from water pressure, decompression sickness prevention, and defense from cold, and was safely guided into the deep part of the sea. And throughout all of it, he had tears saltier than the sea running down his face while he followed Javier.

Well, still, I got what I wanted at the end of the day.

Even though the process was unexpectedly uglier than he thought as he sorely learned how perfect Javier was down to his pores, Lloyd achieved exactly what he wanted.

At last, I'm entering the Mermaid Kingdom.

Lloyd clenched his fists and looked around. He saw Javier swimming by his side and the dozens of muscular mermaids guarding them, as well as the sunlight streaming down from the surface of the water like a curtain. The scene looked like something from an incredible dream.

Ha. Is this why he said he wants to reincarnate as a whale?

Just then, Lloyd remembered the Ghost Frontera, how he wanted to be born as a whale again and swim freely across the vast sea. Lloyd could understand what he was talking about.

Meanwhile, they ruthlessly ventured into deeper water. Darkness crept in until all the sunlight vanished around them. Their view became completely pitch black. Just then, Javier moved his hand.

Bzzt…! The aura at his fingertip lit their surroundings like a lantern, allowing Lloyd to swim further in the pitch darkness. And after they traveled about 6,500 to 9,800 feet down the water, or maybe deeper than that, they arrived at the Mermaid Kingdom.

An octopus?

The first thing that came into Lloyd's view was a humongous octopus. But not just any kind. The trunk of its body stretched over a few miles long, and he couldn't picture how gigantic its spread-out legs would be. The largest creatures he had seen until now, the Gigatitan, Bibeong, and the Bone Dragon, would look like a sparrow beside this octopus. Now, it was embracing something that looked like grapes.

Is that... an octopus egg?

At first, Lloyd thought it was the octopus egg he had seen in a TV documentary a few times. But upon closer look, he realized it wasn’t.

It’s a city.

Its brood case was completely empty. No, it was filled with countless buildings.

I wonder if each egg acts as a single living quarter.

In other words, the Mermaid Kingdom was structured like a bunch of grapes embraced by a giant octopus. They were hundreds of square feet large and thousands in number. Could it be that it noticed Lloyd’s admiration?

“It’s all right,” said the mermaid guard commander as she neared Lloyd. “The octopus doesn’t bite. It’s the baby of our kingdom.”

“…”

Their baby? How? Lloyd had a lot of things to say, but he kept silent as they were not kind words. Then they slipped by the trunk of the octopus, safely passing its watchful eye that was as big as a football field. And they entered one egg that served as the entrance to the city before passing and crossing dozens of eggs at the guard commander’s guidance.

“This is where our queen resides. And it’s a rule that visitors must greet the queen and state their business here. And Sir Javier Asrahan?”

“Yes,” said Javier.

“Please have a nice stay here,” said the mermaid with much gentleness.

“Thank you.”

“No, I should be the one to thank you. Well then.”

The guard mermaid had been extremely uptight and cold when she addressed Lloyd. But she was sweet and gentle to Javier. Lloyd scoffed at her.

Tsk. Lookism can go to hell!

He wanted to leave the kingdom as soon as he could because of the unfair treatment he received at the very least. Lloyd hurried his steps and trudged into the audience room of the queen. The queen was massive and muscular.

Lloyd bowed and said, “I express my infinite gratitude for granting us permission for today’s visit. My name is Lloyd Frontera, a human, and I am honored to be in your presence, my queen. Moreover, I traveled all the way here in search of the Jewel of Truth rumored to be here in the Mermaid Kingdom.” Lloyd quickly revealed his reason for visiting here and waited for her response.

The Jewel of Truth must be an incredibly precious jewel here too if I follow the words of the dragon king. So it’s likely that they won’t easily give it out or let me use it. They might set some big conditions. For instance, demanding some sort of help for the kingdom or a large payment. I’m sure that’s what will happen.

That probably was the case. Lloyd was certain that he’d have to negotiate.

Here comes the important part. I need to figure out what the queen wants and lacks.

The start of negotiation would begin with understanding the needs of another party and capitalizing on their deficits. This strategy promised big returns while minimizing the price of the exchange. Lloyd was sure he’d be able to pull it off this time as well. So he put his mind into focus and carefully waited for the queen’s reaction. But the queen’s reaction was nothing like he had expected.

“What?” gasped the queen in dismay. “The Jewel of Truth? I did not know there was still someone naive enough to believe in that these days.”

“Excuse me...?”

The unexpected laughter from her made Lloyd lift his head without thinking and meet her gaze. At that moment, he felt the meaning of her wide smirk. There was something strange about her smile.

What's that reaction?

An uneasy feeling gripped Lloyd. That wasn't the reaction he expected.

This feels like seeing a foreign journalist coming to the Incheon airport and revealing his purpose of visiting Korea. To hold the interview with the bear who became a human after eating garlic and mugwort. That's the way the queen is looking at me. She has the same gaze as that Korean person staring at the foreign journalist.

At first, Lloyd denied it. There was no way, he said. But it turned out to be true. He observed her, and she was indeed looking at him like that.

No way... The Jewel of Truth can't be a fictional treasure. It can't really only exist in legends, can it?

Inexplicable anxiety crept up in Lloyd. Legendary objects and treasures existed everywhere across the world in any region. There was Cheonbuin, the three divine items of the Dangun myth, and Gan Jian and Moye from the Warring States Period in China. The Kurikara of the Akalnatha in Buddhism. The Excalibur of King Arthur. The dragon-slaying Ascalon in Christianity. Gungnir of Odin in Northern Europe. Brahmastra of the Indian myth. And there was the case of overpackaged snacks in Korea that appeared to be full but were empty when opened. By and large, all of these legendary items had one commonality. They existed only in the realm of imagination and didn't exist in real life. Even if they did exist, they did so a bazillion years ago. In other words, they were impossible to find.

Gripped with a bad feeling, Lloyd asked, "May I ask a question to the queen of the great merpeople?"

"Ask," allowed the queen.

“What you just told me, my queen, about my naivety for believing in the Jewel of Truth... Did you mean that it existed only in stories?”

“What else?”

Although Lloyd’s question was full of nervousness, the queen gave her answer as if that was obvious. She then chuckled and sent a dumbstruck and pitiful gaze at Lloyd.

“You are right,” she said. “The thing about the Jewel of Truth you wish to find is something that I cannot say does not exist. But if you ask me whether I can find it, well. Instead, I want to ask if you belong in a different time period.”

“You mean...”

“The Jewel of Truth exists only in legends and myths even to us,” she continued.

“Agh.” Lloyd choked on some seawater in shock. His uneasy feeling was right.

Dammit! So, it doesn’t exist in real life?

Lloyd was hopeful until he revealed his visiting reason to the queen. But after seeing her reaction, it appeared that this Jewel of Truth was an item of ancient times.

“Um,” went on Lloyd, “Please allow me one more question. Did it ever exist in real life?”

“Um, maybe?” There was uncertainty in her voice.

“What do you mean?” asked Lloyd.

The queen shrugged. “It should be real, I think. But as I told you, perhaps in the mythical ages.”

“Mythical ages...” mumbled Lloyd.

“A shame, isn’t it? You should have been born earlier if you wanted to find it. Don’t you think?”

“...”

Lloyd was utterly speechless. Hearing her, he realized that it wasn’t just the past. It was far back in the mythical ages. So, when he estimated the period through the chronicle mentioned several times in the novel...

It was at least 10,000 years ago.

Lloyd wanted to pass out. The Korean equivalent was even before the time when Dangun founded the Gojoseon. There was no chance of locating an ancient item that hadn’t been seen by the merpeople at the bottom of this vast sea since the mythical ages.

It’s not like I’m an archeologist or anything similar.

Lloyd heaved a sigh. Everything turned bleak for him.

The queen spoke, her voice regretful. “I am sorry that you had to travel all the way down here for such a hopeless answer. But where did you hear the story about the Jewel of Truth? The story is hardly known by those outside of us.”

“Oh... That’s...” Lloyd lifted his head. Berating the very person who taught him about it, Lloyd replied, “From Dragon King Verkis.”

“The dragon king?” shrilled the queen. “Ha. He should be well enough to know about that. And the truth about how it only exists in myths. It appears that you have been played. Is that right?”

“It seems I was in all respects...” Lloyd smiled bitterly. She was right. He had been played by Verkis.

Verkis must have tricked me, so he can send me away. That way I wouldn't badger him anymore.

Now, Lloyd realized what Verkis did to him. Verkis intentionally gave a cursory, half-hearted answer to get rid of him because he wouldn't stop pestering the former with questions. And since Lloyd had no way of checking the truth of his claim, he traveled all the way down here thinking it was real.

Haah. What should I do now?

Truth be told, Lloyd wanted to fly back to the Frontera fiefdom at this very moment and grab Verkis by the collar and shake him. But he had put too much effort into coming all the way here.

Plus, she didn't say that it was all fake.

Maybe. Perhaps. A trace of it could be discovered. Did he think so because he couldn't move on? It didn't matter. He had to stay here for a few days and dig around before he left this kingdom.

"My queen of the great mermaids. May I be granted one favor?" said Lloyd politely.

"A favor?"

"Yes. May I be permitted to stay a few days here to search for the Jewel of Truth?"

"Hmm."

"Please."

Lloyd looked at her earnestly. The queen looked at her annoyingly. At last, she nodded.

"Well, fine. You won't be harming the kingdom with that request anyway."

"Thank you so much!"

"There is no possibility that you will find anything, but in case you do, it only benefits us. Let me make one thing clear. We will not give assistance to your search. Right now, there's an issue troubling us that needs our attention instead of this miscellaneous matter of yours," said the queen.

"Pardon? An issue?" Lloyd asked again.

The queen frowned. "Yes, something like that. To summarize, the Gate of Hell suddenly appeared in the Arctic Ocean."

"..."

Flinch! The back of Lloyd's neck tightened.

"By any chance, do you know what caused it to open? Did you hear any rumors about it from the human world?"

"No. I didn't."

"Really?"

"Yes." Lloyd's conscience pricked his heart. But he quietly ignored it and nodded at lightning speed. Deciding to shamelessly layer his face with a thick plate of titanium, he spoke.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 259: The Affairs of the Mermaid Kingdom (3)

“It must be very concerning for you that the gates to Hell opened over the sea without any warning,” Lloyd shamelessly said.

The frown on her face deepened. “Concerned? Of course, I am. Furthermore, before that incident happened, the Arctic Ocean was the most peaceful ocean in the whole world.”

“What do you mean by that incident?” inquired Lloyd with curiosity.

“The Bone Dragon invasion.” Her voice sank as though the event still haunted her.

“Eek.”

Lloyd almost shot out a gush of seawater as he breathed then, but he managed to mask his shock by shutting his mouth. The queen continued to speak with a sigh.

“It happened not too long ago. The peaceful sea was thrown into chaos. It was definitely an invasion. An invasion by the Bone Dragon, an unprecedented existence.”

“The Bone Dragon...”

Lloyd gulped dryly. An appearance of the Bone Dragon in the Arctic Ocean. Moreover, it had happened recently. It had to be Draggy. There was no other possibility.

I opened Hell Gate about the time the queen experienced all this. It opened up right here in the sky. And Draggy, who was lingering around the Arctic Ocean, crossed over to Hell through it and helped fight the Lava Giant. It matches. The story matches perfectly.

Lloyd unwittingly shrugged. His conscience was prickling, and a sense of crisis overwhelmed him. He wondered what would happen to him if the queen found out he was responsible for sending Draggy here.

There's no doubt that she would execute me.

He wouldn't be able to get out of here in one piece. It was true regardless of if he was under Javier's protection. Javier wouldn't be able to endure for long without the help of magic in this deep sea. Lloyd became more convinced when he saw the muscular build of the mermaids. Even as Lloyd kept dryly swallowing in anxiety, the queen continued to speak.

"I cannot go over the details, but the Bone Dragon invaded our territory. It even made the Gigatitan and emperor whales run away in chaos."

"So were the Mermaid Corps employed?" Lloyd maintained his cool.

"Of course." Could she be recalling the event of the day? Her gaze grew icy. "We attacked day and night. It was a bloody fight. We were fighting for days when the Hell Gate opened up in the sky."

Lloyd felt a pang of guilt as he listened.

"It appears that our attacks took a toll on the Bone Dragon," she went on. "The moment it saw the gate open, it frantically ran off into the gate."

Lloyd had a lot to say, such as how Draggy only flew into the gate because it was happy to pick his smell, but he zipped his mouth shut.

"Long story short, the gate has remained open in the air after that incident. So, I am troubled as the hot air from Hell constantly flows into this world."

"That... is really problematic." Lloyd smiled wryly. It indeed sounded like a pickle on the queen's part.

The gate is allowing heat to enter here... Hmm. That must have increased the temperature in this area. Now that I think about it, the title I received from Hell didn't even get activated when I got here.

Just then, the title "Frozen Feet, Frozen Hands" he had received from Hell came to his mind.

It activates when I set foot in areas with annual temperatures below 32°F.

But the title didn’t activate when he arrived in the Arctic Ocean. In other words, the annual temperature wasn’t falling below 32°F.

Hmm... I wonder if the Arctic is experiencing an unexpected bout of global warming right now.

Lloyd was troubled. Unwittingly, he’s become a culprit for environmental destruction. But he didn’t know how to fix that.

The King of Hell wants to keep the gate open like it is now.

So the gate was unlikely to close any time soon. It was to remain open as it is for the unforeseeable future. This bout of global warming was expected to last here.

Tsk.

Even though Lloyd didn’t choose this place on purpose, he nonetheless felt apologetic for the polar bears and merpeople in this area. However, he soon fixed the expression on his face.

If she finds out that I did it, I’m dead.

The uproar with Draggy and the Hell Gate. All these incidents were connected with Lloyd, so there wasn’t any good for him to have the queen find that out.

I should try to survive before anything else. I have to be alive to be able to help them out and fix this problem.

And it would be even better if the mermaids somehow solved this problem with the Hell Gate on their own before he did. Thinking so, Lloyd shamelessly justified himself and empathized with the queen.

“Haah,” he sighed, “I understand. You must be very concerned.”

“I am,” said the queen, her voice heavy. “In particular, the glaciers are melting fast. My head is about to explode, hearing the complaints and protests of various creatures. I did not know being a ruler would be this difficult. It would be easier to jump rope with 20 emperor whales for 12 hours straight without breathing.”

“I-is that so...” murmured Lloyd.

“Yes, sincerely. If only I could find the culprit behind this mess. I would lay a hard punch into their gut, taking out all of the stress and anger that has been building inside me.”

Lloyd blanched at the warning, his face going pale as a sheet.

“Why do you look like that?” the queen said after observing Lloyd’s face. “You look pale. Are you still not used to breathing underwater?”

“Nothing. Just for a second... I was...” Lloyd stopped.

“You were what?”

“This is random, but the honeypots I’d left behind at home just came to my mind,” Lloyd said carefully, inwardly thinking that he should enjoy his honey before he passed away. To Lloyd’s relief, it appeared that the queen didn’t catch on.

“Honey? I have heard that it’s a sweet produce made on land. I wish to get a taste of it when I have the chance,” she said. “Anyway, you can go now. I will permit you to go around the kingdom as I have said earlier.”

“Thank you so much!”

Lloyd quickly bowed and disappeared from the queen’s view. He feared she’d start to notice something if he unnecessarily hovered around longer. As soon as he removed himself from her presence, he let out the breath he’d been holding in until now.

“Haah...”

I made it, Lloyd said to himself. Just then, he felt a prickling gaze coming from someone beside him. He turned and stared at Javier with a bitter smile.

“Why are you looking at me like that? You aren’t questioning my conscience or something with that look you’re giving me, right?”

“Why else?” Javier replied, almost in a rebuking tone. “It’s impossible for you to say that you have nothing to do with the Hell Gate’s appearance and Draggy running amok here.”

“Well, you’re right. But what can I do? I have to survive before anything else. Didn’t you see the abs on the queen back there?” Lloyd sighed.

“I did see it.”

“And yet, you have the heart to say that? Must I get crushed by her muscular embrace for you to be satisfied ?”

“Yes.” Javier gave a thumbs up.

“What? Seriously?” said Lloyd, shooting a look at Javier.

“Yes, those are my honest feelings,” Javier announced confidently.

“So, you would really feel better after seeing me get crushed to death?”

“For anyone who abandons their conscience and integrity can only live a life of a coward.”

“Why, yes, thank you. I’ll live a long life as a coward.”

Seeing that Javier wasn’t answering, Lloyd chuckled. “But Master Lloyd.” When Javier spoke again, his face was grim.

“Yeah.”

“Is there really a reason you had to come all the way here to find the supposed Jewel of Truth?” asked Javier.

“Um, maybe?” Lloyd shrugged, and he thought to himself that the moment had finally come.

Okay. Yeah, it’s about time that he starts to ask questions.

Lloyd stole a glance at Javier walking beside him. He couldn’t know. The terrible events that would land on the Frontera family. The death of Count and Countess Frontera and Julian. The utter downfall of the family. This world was going through the same events as the novel.

That’s the effect of the restoration of destiny. Goodness.

Lloyd shuddered in annoyance as he thought about it. He had worked hard to change the dreadful plot at the start of the novel. There was no end to the amount of blood, sweat, and tears he went through until now!

But it will eventually end up being for nothing. That’s all because of the moronic restoration of destiny or whatever it’s called.

Lloyd thought the whole situation was unfair. But he couldn’t sit down and wail about it. He had to do something to prevent this damned catastrophe from happening. He had to find a way to stop it. And that was why he needed to find the Jewel of Truth which held the answer to any question it was asked.

But I can’t tell this man everything.

The original history. The altered storyline. The return of destiny to its initial path. Lloyd would have to uncover his identity to explain it all to Javier, including that he wasn’t the real Lloyd. That he was a fake from another world who took the place of the real person. Everything would need to be revealed.

I can’t do that.

Lloyd shook his head immediately. Now was the time to lie. And there was a perfect lie he had prepared for a situation like this.

“Um, you see, the thing about the Jewel of Truth,” Lloyd said as he licked his lips before pausing. And in a nonchalant voice, he said the remark he had prepared beforehand. “It’s a form of insurance.”

“Insurance...?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd nodded, feigning his conviction. “You know how I’m waking the dragon king up every morning? I heard it from him by chance.”

“That the jewel is here in the kingdom?” inquired Javier.

“Yeah. I heard it’s a powerful jewel.”

“What power does it carry?”

“It has the answer to even the most difficult question in the world.” Lloyd continued to walk as he talked.

“An answer?”

“Yeah. There’s a chance of encountering a difficult problem as you go through life, right? For example, the Monster Domino effect. Do you remember it? The swarm of locusts that chased us.”

“I do remember,” said Javier with a nod.

“There’s no guarantee that such a thing will never happen again.” Lloyd looked straight into Javier’s eyes.

“So, what you are saying is, Master Lloyd, you are looking for the jewel in preparation for a disaster that will fall on the fiefdom?” summed up Javier.

“That’s right. That is exactly right.” Lloyd nodded casually. And he continued to lie. “Life is long. You never know what calamities will come. But what if we have the jewel in our hands before they hit us? I’ll be able to safely overcome them, at least once. So? Don’t you think it’s a pretty good form of insurance?”

“Truly. It is.”

“That’s what I thought,” said Lloyd as he brought his hands to his back.

“Yes,” said Javier.

“But I’m surprised that you’re nodding to what I say without a fight. What’s going on?” Lloyd said with a smile.

With a straight face, Javier looked at Lloyd. “I believe that even the most messed up man can speak something right once in a while.”

“What?” gaped Lloyd.

“So, acknowledging and encouraging the messed-up man when he says the right thing is a beautiful consideration a person like me can show.”

“Woah,” replied Lloyd with utter disbelief.

“This is the first time in a while that I heard you say something right. Good job, Master Lloyd.”

“Wow.” Lloyd stopped walking. “I see you’ve stooped down to attacking people with compliments now.”

“Like I always say,” replied Javier as he followed suit, “I’ve never been violent toward you, Master Lloyd. I do not plan on it in the future, either.”

Lloyd turned and continued to walk. “Tsk. You know, I wouldn’t hate you so much if you didn’t talk back.”

“Thank you for hating me.”

“Then should I keep it up from now on?” asked Lloyd.

“Thank you in advance for that as well.”

“Gratitude comes in advance now?”

“If I could, I wish to offer mine all at once.”

“Do you not want to offer it in parts?”

“Yes. That way I will not have to thank you in the future.”

“Wow! You know what? You be the young master. I’ll be the guard,” Lloyd exclaimed in a high-pitched voice.

“Okay now, Sir Frontera.”

“Hey.” Lloyd looked genuinely offended.

“Please forgive me,” Javier said, backing down immediately.

“Yet, you’re still smiling.”

“Since it was indeed amusing.”

“Fine, if you were pleased. What else can I ask for more,” chuckled Lloyd. And he thought to himself...

Whew.

Javier bought his seemingly believable lie. Lloyd was actually worried that his reasoning, that he was here to find the jewel in preparation for a future disaster, would not be persuasive enough.

But for now, it worked. I’m off the hook for a while.

Lloyd inwardly sighed in relief. Meanwhile, Javier stole a glance at Lloyd with a serious gaze and thought to himself...

It’s a relief.

Javier’s reaction was all an act, but Lloyd bought it. He was actually worried about whether he would be able to hide his knowledge of the whole situation.

But Master Lloyd, no, that fraud doesn’t have a clue that I know. He mustn’t know yet that my reaction was an act, and I’m just playing along to his hardly convincing excuse. I'm off the hook for a while.

Then Javier would be able to protect the fake in relief. And help out what the fake was up to. Just like that, Javier smiled meaningfully. The two then got out of the palace premise and passed through a few strands of passages before entering the city that looked like a giant grape.

Woah. I'm craving salted pollack roe.

The image of the city, thousands and tens of thousands of dozens-foot large eggs stuck to each other, stimulated Lloyd's appetite. The city made him miss the food back home. The salted pollack roe, which was his favorite, was the biggest craving of all.

Whew. Pour a bowl of bibimbap with wild chive soy sauce and throw in some salted pollack roe and top it with perilla oil and sesame seed and seaweed... Wow. I'm going nuts.

A pang of nostalgia assaulted Lloyd's mind, making him salivate. But he knew he had better things to do than space out.

First, I'll look for the jewel.

Lloyd resolved and looked around the city district of the Mermaid Kingdom, his gaze filled with determination. Countless muscular merpeople were swimming around.

One of them must know about the jewel for sure!

Lloyd hoped so. After all, that was the legendary jewel of the kingdom. A mythical item, a precious one, even if that was the item of the past. He figured that they should know one or two things about it.

So, I'll be going around asking as many merpeople as I can. Then I can put all their answers together and find some hope. Or, at least, I'll be able to get a clue as to how I can track the jewel.

That was what Lloyd intended to do. Plus, he was confident. No biggie. A simple task. So, he approached merfolks, brimming with confidence. But sometime later, Lloyd started to receive the same treatment as the cults that go around soliciting people on the streets.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 260: Do You Know About the Jewel? (1)

“Excuse me, have you ever heard of the Jewel of Truth?”

“...”

The 840,928th egg was at the center of the strange but humongous city in the Mermaid Kingdom, composed of hundreds and thousands of eggs. It sat at the deepest part of the Arctic Ocean. The residents of this area, otherwise known as the “Red Egg,” found themselves encountering an eccentric foreigner.

“The Jewel of Truth?” The mermaid who heard the question bulged her pecs, wondering what the heck this human was saying. She stared intensely at the stranger, Lloyd, who awkwardly swam in place before flashing a smile.

“Oh, please don’t think of me strangely,” Lloyd explained. “I just heard an interesting rumor from the human world. I came all the way down here because I heard that there is a remarkable treasure called the Jewel of Truth.”

“Hmph,” puffed the mermaid, “That’s an ancient rumor.”

“Excuse me?”

“That’s such an old story...” The mermaid sent a baffling gaze at Lloyd, and she was already about five gills away from him.

“I only heard of it in passing when I was a child. Sorry.”

“Oh, please wait a minute…!”

The mermaid dashed away from Lloyd before he had any chance to stop her, her gills working faster than earlier.

“Haah,” Lloyd sighed.

This... This feels weird.

Their reactions were slightly different from what he expected. Originally, since the Jewel of Truth was one of the precious jewels of the kingdom and existed in their myths and legends, he assumed that the merpeople would be familiar with it. As such, he anticipated easily getting an answer from any passing merperson.

Of course, I didn't expect all their answers to be useful. I thought that once I put them all together, I'd be able to find some sort of clue or lead. But this is just...

Their reaction was the complete opposite of his expectations. Almost all the merpeople reacted cynically to his question. Some were even...

"Excuse me, do you know anything about the Jewel of Truth?" Lloyd asked a merperson passing by.

"No, I don't. I really don't," the mermaid swayed in irritation.

"Do you really not know?"

"Oh, don't hold me back. I have to swim. It's not like you'll take responsibility if I lose my muscles because you stopped me from swimming."

This kind of blatant disrespect toward him was a common occurrence. In other words, this was...

I'm being treated like those cult members who poach people in public!

Lloyd sighed at length. Surely enough, everyone's reaction told of his existence to them. They acted like they were being held back to answer a useless question in their busy schedule. They blatantly showed their annoyance. Still, even that could be considered a mild reaction compared to others.

"My, Ma'am, where are you so busy going?" Lloyd asked another mermaid.

“Hmm? What’s a human from above water doing here?”

“Oh, well, the thing is, I am looking for a treasure called the Jewel of Truth here. And you appeared at a perfect time. I can’t believe I ran into such a wise-looking mermaid like you. Could you spare me a few minutes to answer a few questions-”

“No,” the mermaid rejected flatly.

“...”

“I’m already going nuts from my aching bones. I don’t give a damn about your questions.”

“Um, but still-”

“Still, my foot. You young, dumb human. You’re a scammer, right?”

“Excuse me?” Lloyd stared, aghast.

“How can the Jewel of Truth exist in our day and age? I’d have entertained you if it was 10,000 years ago when the seasons of fall and winter didn’t exist. You’re bringing up crap that’s older than the dentures of my great, great, great grandmother. It’s not something a human child like you should care about.”

“...”

“So, young man. What are you really up to? What kind of scam are you trying to pull off, asking around about the Jewel of Truth and whatnot?”

“Um...”

“Answer me now!” snarled the old mermaid. “Do you want a spanking from me?!”

Flare! The mermaid grandmother growled menacingly. Though her back was slightly curved, her forearms looked terrorizing. She seemed strong enough to easily snap five quarter dollars in half as her regular morning workout. Lloyd was in dismay.

Haah. I don't know what to tell her.

Lloyd wanted to cry. All this time, he was receiving icy stares from passing merpeople, and some of the elderly nearby even tried to spank Lloyd when he acted in the slightest ill-mannered way.

"Eek! Please forgive me! I am sorry!" Eventually, Lloyd bowed several times and scooted off. And as he caught his breath in the corner of an alley, a surge of bitterness arose in him.

Wow. This is just nuts.

Dumbstruck, a snort escaped him.

This feels like I'm going around Seoul asking people where I could find a wolf pretending to be an old lady in Little Red Riding Hood.

That was how they reacted. The Jewel of Truth of the Mermaid Kingdom. Now, Lloyd could sorely feel what an ancient treasure it was.

Should I give up and go back?

He considered going back home and clinging onto Dragon King Verkis, who had played him. That looked like a better course of action. Another option was traveling to Hell and asking the Hell of King about how he could stop destiny from restoring, even if it came with a price. But he soon shook his head.

No. I went out of my way to come all the way down here!

It was too much of a waste to pack up and go back. He felt that he should stick around for about a day or two longer. If nothing useful was found, then he would go back. From that moment on, he acted more shamelessly as he went around questioning anyone he could find despite the cold treatment and disrespect he received from the merpeople.

“Excuse me? Have you ever heard of the Jewel of Truth?”

“...”

“There! Over there with the awesome biceps! Are you interested in the Jewel of Truth?”

“...”

“Oh, you have the most beautiful gill among the mermaids I’ve seen today. Anyhow, have you ever heard of the Jewel of Truth?”

“...”

Not a single one of them reacted nicely. They all treated him like how Koreans reacted to cult members on the streets. That is, with a gaze that said, “What in the bullcrap are you talking about?” Then walking away after ignoring him. But Lloyd was relentless. He was neither disappointed nor discouraged. The cold disregard and disrespect were something he experienced often back in Korea when he was shabbily dressed and at the bottom of the social pyramid. Experiencing that again was nothing to fuss over at all. It was nothing new. On the contrary, he just became more brazen.

Whatever. If they’re going to regard me as if I’m a cult member, then I might well just act like one.

At last, Lloyd made the decision. Since he couldn’t avoid it, he would go all out. It was time to embody a cult recruiter and draw everyone’s attention.

“Excuse me, ma’am. My, you look so kind! You look like someone who received an immense amount of positive energy from the Jewel of Truth!”

“...”

“Fellow over there? Don’t your shoulders feel heavy or doesn’t your neck feel tense? Goodness, I’m looking at you now, and your ancestors are on your back crying. They’re saying that you should find the Jewel of Truth at all costs.”

“...”

“Hmm, I don’t know if I can tell you this when I’m just seeing you for the first time, but tell me, aren’t you going through a hard time recently? If you receive energy from the Jewel of Truth, everything will go well for you. I don’t usually tell this to people, but I’m making an exception just for you.”

“...”

Of course, despite this change of strategy, the merpeople still showed the same cold reaction. But there was one thing that was now different.

Great. They are gathering around!

Lloyd discretely clenched his fists. Could it be that the rumor about him and his weird ways went out? Could it be that they started to hear about the human nut-job? They were gathering around in groups and whispering as they watched Lloyd. Some scoffed, while some erupted into laughter. The atmosphere of the crowd was that of people watching a fascinating or silly scene. Lloyd, however, felt no shame despite all this.

Great. This is much better than before.

Now, he was starting to grow more hopeful. It wasn’t that they were responding now. It was only that he succeeded in gaining traction and gathering a fairly large audience.

This is a matter of probability, so to speak.

The chances of getting an answer would increase if he could gather hundreds of merpeople at once instead of asking one of them at a time.

Though Javier is embarrassed on my behalf.

Javier had been blushing crimson since a while ago. He couldn’t even lift his head up. Could it be that he was ashamed of Lloyd? Was he trying to signal to everybody that this human was a stranger to him? Whatever the reason was, his shame was evident. He couldn’t get himself to move far away but timidly stayed five steps away from him. Lloyd grinned.

So, the game is on.

From then on, Lloyd talked louder and asked questions about the Jewel of Truth, so that every merperson gathered nearby could hear him. He shamelessly shouted in full force, hoping that any interested merperson would speak out. That was what he was doing when...

“Excuse me, are you really curious about the Jewel of Truth?”

For the first time, a merman came and asked Lloyd a question!

“Eh?” Shocked, Lloyd stared at the merman.

It was a young merman with eye-catching light blue hair. But his looks were a bit unique.

He’s not that muscular for a merman.

Unlike the common muscular build, this merman was different. He had the body of a track athlete, slim. And he was sending a serious gaze at Lloyd.

“Actually, I’ve heard you speaking since a while ago. I mean the questions you’ve been asking other merpeople.”

“You’ve heard my questions?” asked Lloyd in surprise.

“Yes.” The merman nodded slightly. And in a much more serious voice, he said, “So, I would like to have a serious conversation with you about the Jewel of Truth. Do you mind if we move somewhere else? Somewhere less crowded.”

“I’d like that,” Lloyd pleasingly agreed with a nod.

Yes, this was the moment he had been waiting for all this time. He and Javier followed the slim merman. They all swam away until they arrived in a less populated area.

The merman turned and said, “It is nice to meet you. My name is Rotorua.”

“Rotorua?” Lloyd repeated the name instead of greeting himself as he was still in a daze.

“That’s right. My mother got the name from the most famous mermaid of the mythical age. She did so in the hopes that I would retrieve the most precious treasure of that time period, the Jewel of Truth.” Merman Rotorua spoke with a grave look on his face.

Lloyd lifted his brow. “You’re looking for an artifact of the mythical age? The Jewel of Truth?”

“Yes.” Rotorua nodded. “To be honest, my family has devoted all our lives to unearthing the Jewel of Truth for several generations. They have been doing so for thousands of years. But we have not succeeded yet. Then recently I heard the news of a human swimming around asking strange questions.”

“It was about me,” pointed Lloyd.

“That is why I hurriedly swam over here.” A faint smile bloomed Rotorua’s face which had remained serious until then. It manifested the surprise and admiration he felt earlier.

I never expected to meet a human who believes in the Jewel of Truth.

He was more than pleased about it and couldn’t be any happier. The reason for his happiness was simple.

Even the merpeople have nearly forgotten about the Jewel of Truth. However, it’s the most regrettable part of our heritage that we have lost.

Rotorua has believed for the longest time that it must be retrieved. That was why he devoted his whole life searching for it. But he never got any of his folks to cooperate with him. Instead, he was mocked all this time for being unmerman-like. A true merperson did not fuss over the artifact. He was told a proper merperson should care about swimming and building more muscles instead of going out searching for a boring jewel. Rotorua had been lashed out and slapped down all this time. But today, he met someone who was on the same page as him. The Jewel of Truth was something that even merpeople overlooked. Yet, he finally met someone who was as desperate to find the treasure as him! But it was not a merperson but a human! Deeply moved, Rotorua grabbed Lloyd's hands as his shoulders shivered in excitement.

"So, I would like to ask for a favor if it is not too much from a stranger like me."

"What favor?" asked Lloyd.

With his eyes glimmering in sheer earnestness, Rotorua asked, "How about you and I work together to find the Jewel of Truth?"

Rotorua didn't care if his expedition partner wasn't his kind or a different race. That didn't matter as long as he had a companion to search for the jewel with. He was merely happy to work with someone like him. Just then…

"Hmm," mused Lloyd. "I don't know." He cocked his head to the side and sent a doubting gaze at Rotorua before saying, "The thing is, I don't know how much I should trust you."

"What...?" His words flustered Rotorua. This human man was looking for the Jewel of Truth. So Rotorua naturally presumed that his request would be accepted instead of receiving such a snobby and reluctant reaction.

"Is it not?" Lloyd continued to voice out his doubt. "Put yourself in my shoes. The others are busy ignoring me in annoyance, and yet, you came on your own to find me. How should I know whether you have something up your sleeves? Am I supposed to happily take your offer without a second thought?"

"Oh, what are you talking-"

"I'm saying," put in Lloyd, "What if you're a scammer with bad intentions? Don't you think it'd be easy for you to prey on my desperate, innocent heart, which has been tattered after running around for an answer but to no avail?”

“H-hey. I’m not the kind of merperson that preys on someone’s desp-”

“Then prove it,” demanded Lloyd as he gazed into Rotorua’s eyes.

“...”

“You said your family has been searching for the jewel for generations.”

“I did.” Rotorua frowned, trying to make sense of this whole situation. “But what of it-”

“So, prove that you’re not a scammer.”

“How?”

“Well, how else?” Lloyd said, his voice dripping with humdrumness. “It’s easy. Tell me everything about it. I know a lot about it on my part. I’ll cross-check your knowledge with mine, and I’ll be able to judge if you’re scamming me or being genuine.”

“I-is that how much you can’t trust me?”

“Tsk. You know, you’re free to go if you can’t prove yourself.”

Lloyd then wheeled around. At the sight, Rotorua was provoked. But anxiousness soon overcame his anger.

No!

This was nearly his first time meeting someone who was deeply invested in the jewel. He didn’t want to lose this human. Rotorua hurriedly held out his hand and grabbed Lloyd’s shoulder.

“Then you better listen to me carefully. You see, the Jewel of Truth has been passed down since the mythical age of the Mermaid Kingdom...”

From then on, Rotorua began to reel off everything about the jewel, antsy and annoyed at the same time. He missed the evil smile that hung on Lloyd's face as he tried to prove his innocence. It never occurred to him that Lloyd, whose back was against Rotorua, was smiling like a man who succeeded in catching a fish with his bait.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 261: Do You Know the Jewel? (2)

“Are all people on land like this?” grumbled Rotorua as he stomped his feet in frustration. “How can you have so little faith in others? Now open your ears and listen to me. I will prove that I am not lying about the Jewel of Truth.”

“Sure, sure,” drawled Lloyd, his face bored.

Ignoring his curt attitude, Rotorua started speaking, “The Jewel of Truth is not merely a fictional item that exists in legends.”

Lloyd picked his ear. “Sure, so what?”

Rotorua gazed into Lloyd’s eyes. “It certainly existed at one point in time.”

Lloyd picked his ear. “Sure, so what?”

“T-technically speaking,” Rotorua stammered, “It was certainly in the sea during the second mythical age, that is, the time when spring and summer were the only seasons that existed in the world.”

“Hmm. Is that so?” Lloyd made a curious face.

“That is the truth. Undoubtedly.”

After a pause, Lloyd said, “But, um, so?”

“It really did exist at one point,” emphasized Rotorua.

“Um, so?” asked Lloyd again, fidgeting his fingers.

“Hmm, um, but it disappeared later on. No, it collapsed!”

“Hmm, I see,” said Lloyd without looking up.

“…”

A strong yearning to strike Lloyd overwhelmed Rotorua as his face turned red with anger. His fists unconsciously clenched. If only he could. If only it was harmless, he wanted to hammer the back of this spiteful human just once. But Rotorua mustered a miraculous amount of patience and remembered a lesson from his childhood.

Patience. Patience. I just have to be patient. They say that patience is the secret behind cultivating pearls. It is time to exercise patience now.

It was Rotorua's first time meeting someone who was interested in the Jewel of Truth. That person was this human, Lloyd. Thus, Rotorua couldn't ruin this precious opportunity by his momentary feelings of anger. Controlling his tumultuous rage, he spoke.

"Haah... I will cut to the chase. The Jewel of Truth was not a small object."

Lloyd lifted his brows. "If it wasn't, what was it?"

"It was a building," Rotorua paused before continuing for effect. "The Jewel of Truth was a building that was as much of a treasure as even the shiniest pearl under the sea. Huge, magnificent, and majestic. Though, of course, it fell down at the end of the mythical age."

"Hmm," mused Lloyd.

"Do you trust me now?" inquired Rotorua as he expectantly looked straight into Lloyd's eyes.

"Hmm, I'm not sure." Lloyd's tone reflected his hesitation.

Rotorua frowned.

"The Jewel of Truth was not a small object but a building. Well, that's something anyone can think of with a little effort." Lloyd tapped the side of his head.

"I am not lying," protested Rotorua indignantly, "It is real. Based on some of the records my ancestors excavated and after putting together various interpretations and deductions of artifacts, the Jewel of Truth was a building without question. I am sure of it. However, it was not just any building. And it surely was not one that merely looked beautiful on the outside."

"Then," asked Lloyd, "What was it?"

"It was a magic circle."

"A magic circle?"

Rotorua nodded. "Every component of the building, that is, from the foundation to the floor, pillar, and ceiling, everything was magically structured. It was one gigantic magic circle."

"Hmm," mused Lloyd as he stroked his jaw. "So, to sum everything up, the Jewel of Truth was a magic circle in the form of a giant building?"

"Exactly."

A faint hopeful smile appeared on Rotorua's face. Rotorua sensed Lloyd was starting to believe and show interest in his words. His story seemed to be getting through to the man, and at last, Lloyd looked like he trusted him. Rotorua swelled with joy and excitement. From that moment on, he began to reel off in full force, his mouth moving like a tube man in a storm.

"It is said that the foundation, floor, pillars, and roofs have been designed according to the flow of magical power. As such, the entire building resembles something close to an intelligent life form."

"An intelligent life form?" repeated Lloyd. This was a surprise.

"A magical entity that can think, reason, and draw logical reasons on its own."

"Hmm."

Lloyd slightly lifted his brow as he listened. Rotorua's explanation reminded him of a concept he was familiar with back in Korea.

Is this something similar to AI?

Lloyd wondered if that building called the Jewel of Truth, which was just one magic circle, could be...

So it was essentially an AI supercomputer, but one that operates with the power of magic.

The building was a supercomputer, but its operation engine didn't come from science and technology. It was powered by magic. This thought soon shed light on what kind of structure it was to Lloyd. And as he continued to hear Rotorua's explanations, he was able to gain a better understanding of the Jewel of Truth.

"Literally speaking," explained Rotorua, "The Jewel of Truth was a building with magical intelligence. It was astute and wise. It was capable of offering clear answers to even the most complicated questions, which ranged from trivial personal matters to dilemmas of great importance that could change the world. The Jewel of Truth provided the most accurate and wisest answer by considering all the truths and facts. And-"

"But," Lloyd chimed in, stopping Rotorua to deal with an important matter, "You say it collapsed out of the blue and disappeared?"

Rotorua nodded, his eyes downcast. "Yes. According to past records, they say that a terrible catastrophe shook the entire world on the last day of the mythical age, and in the wake of it, all the living souls in existence waged a war of survival against each other. The Jewel of Truth was devastated during this time and..."

"It got destroyed?" Lloyd finished Rotorua's words.

"Probably. It is assumed that this was done by those who feared the jewel would fall into the hands of their enemies."

"No surprise there," said Lloyd as he nodded. Lloyd, too, agreed that an all-knowing magical AI supercomputer could make an extremely functional and intimidating piece of weaponry to any holder. It'd be a source of absolute confidence. And during precarious times when everyone was biting each other to survive, that'd be even more true.

Whoever last used the Jewel of Truth must have destroyed it, so no one else can have it and use it themselves.

Lloyd figured he'd have made a similar choice if he were in the same place. When his train of thought reached that far, Lloyd felt his knees weaken with a sense of emptiness.

Anyway, this means that the Jewel of Truth does not exist in this world anymore.

It didn't exist. The incredible smart building that used to exist during the mythical age. Lloyd could see that it had been a mind-blowing creation at the time but was ultimately destroyed. It was no longer in this world. In other words...

Tsk. All my effort was for nothing.

He had taken a tedious trip down to this kingdom. But for what? To discover a nonexistent item. It looked like he had wasted his time.

"I see. Then I will take my leave now," Lloyd said, ready to take off.

"Hmm? What do you mean?" Rotorua, who had been excitedly talking about the Jewel of Truth, stopped, and he shot an incredulous look at Lloyd. "Didn't you say you can't trust me? But that you would go find the jewel if I convinced you otherwise?"

"Sure," acknowledged Lloyd casually, "I did. But then you just told me it was destroyed."

"I did."

"That's why I'm leaving. What's the point of searching for the destroyed jewel? I won't be able to use it anyway."

It really was the case. According to Rotorua, the Jewel of Truth wasn't just a small device but an awe-inspiring building, a supercomputer magic circle. That was what had collapsed. So what good was there in excavating the remaining pieces? It wouldn't be useful anyway.

“You see, I was searching because I want to use the jewel. But it’s destroyed, you say? And given that it was such an intricate magic circle and building, it’ll need to be perfectly restored for it to operate,” pointed out Lloyd in annoyance.

“T-That’s right,” Rotorua acknowledged.

“Right? Plus, we won’t be able to restore the building since the remnant traces would be thousands and thousands of years old. Am I wrong?”

“On that part, you are wrong,” Rotorua said grimly.

“Excuse me...?” When Lloyd saw Rotorua shake his head very firmly, he lifted his brow. “I’m wrong? Then is there a way to restore the Jewel of Truth?”

“Of course there is.”

“How can you be so certain?” said Lloyd, almost in a demanding tone.

“It’s because there is a blueprint of the jewel.”

“There is a blueprint?”

“Yes.”

“Where is it?” Lloyd’s heart started to pound.

Who would’ve thought? There was a blueprint!

Then he wouldn’t have to scavenge around for the jewel. He only needed to thoroughly go through, analyze, and study the blueprint before constructing the building. But Rotorua’s next words killed his excitement.

“The land where the jewel collapsed. One record says that the blueprint was carved into the land the building once stood on,” replied Rotorua.

Lloyd kept listening without saying anything.

“So we must find the land where the jewel sat. I am hopeful that once we find it, the jewel can be restored to its original state. My ancestors were all just as hopeful as me. That is why we devoted our entire lives to this search for hundreds of generations.”

Tsk. Then we still have to find the site the jewel was at.

Lloyd licked his lips.

But still, I guess it’s a relief that it wasn’t all for nothing?

That seemed to be the case after he listened to Rotorua. Though the jewel was destroyed and long gone, its blueprint could be recovered once the site of the building was found. Therefore, with the blueprint, the jewel could be rebuilt one way or another.

Luckily, construction is one thing that I’m familiar with.

Lloyd started to see a ray of hope, and at the same time, he was glad to have doubted and felt Rotorua out.

This merman told me almost everything he knew after feeling wronged by my suspicions.

Rotorua had reeled off everything he knew, allowing Lloyd to conveniently and happily acquire information about the jewel in a breeze. Simultaneously, he was able to recognize Rotorua’s sincerity.

At the very least, I know he isn’t a scammer.

Rotorua had an embittered look on his face that screamed, “I’m innocent!” but any scammer could easily feign the emotion well enough. So it wasn’t his expression that prompted Lloyd to ascertain Rotorua’s innocence. It was the messages that kept appearing in front of his eyes.

Ding dong.

[Merman Rotorua is feeling anxious and disappointed over your snobby attitude and lack of willingness to trust him.]

[Your likeability with Rotorua has decreased by two points.]

[Current RP with Rotorua: +14]

[Even though your relationship with a major character has slightly worsened, your RP remains unchanged and will not be forfeited.]

[Current RP: 2,482]

See? My likeability status with him has already been activated.

A faint smile spread across Lloyd's face as he looked at the messages. His past experiences confirmed the knowledge that his likeability with another character didn't always reward him with RP. The system opened only when the other party was deeply invested in Lloyd. In other words, the likeability message meant only one thing.

It's proof that he's resolved to win my trust and get close to me.

Such a resolution couldn't be established with lies and wouldn't be harbored by a scammer. The system wouldn't have been activated, either, in the first place. Thanks to this, Lloyd was now able to trust Rotorua.

I was able to get an important confirmation, thanks to my suspicions.

His smile slightly deepened. He was now able to trust Rotorua and work together with him. This was critical for Lloyd. In a situation related to stopping the restoration of destiny, that was even more so the case.

I've got only three years with me. The count will be the first. And then everyone is going to die one by one. Time is running out, and I can't waste any by being deceived and fooled.

It was imperative for Lloyd to work with someone he could completely trust. There couldn't be any time wasted from getting foolishly scammed or deceived, and that was why Lloyd intentionally raised his suspicions. He proceeded with great caution when engaging with Roturua and didn't hide his doubts. He, instead, used his doubts to pressure the merman, which eventually allowed him to confirm the latter's sincerity.

“So, if what you are saying is true, I just need to find the location of the jewel, right?” asked Lloyd meaningfully.

“You are right. That is exactly right.” Rotorua’s face lit up at Lloyd’s question. “Then do you trust me now? Are you going to join me in excavating the jewel?”

“Um, maybe...” responded Lloyd with hesitation.

Disappointment filled Rotorua’s eyes. “What do you mean?”

“I would first like to hear about your excavation method,” said Lloyd, “You said that your family has been working tirelessly for hundreds of generations on this search.”

“That is right.”

“But despite such extensive years, you have not found the land yet.”

“T-that’s right,” Rotorua acknowledged.

“So it’s only natural for me to have some doubts.” Lloyd looked straight into Rotorua’s eyes for emphasis.

“Doubts?”

“What inefficient method has your family been using to fail in finding a piece of land for hundreds of generations?”

“That’s-”

“That’s what?” put in Lloyd.

“We simply dug to the best of our abilities.” Rotorua scratched the back of his head.

“Dug?”

“We simply dug. That’s really all.” Rotorua’s grew red, probably due to Lloyd’s hard stare. “We made a shovel out of clams and dug around. Everyday. Without fail.”

“Wait.” Lloyd gaped, aghast. “You don’t mean you scoured around digging through the bottom of every ocean in the world?”

“Oh, my ancestors did that, but...”

“And now?”

“Through some research, we concluded that the land is near the Arctic Ocean. So we stopped trying to dig up all the oceans in the world.”

“Instead, you’re digging around the seabed here. Alone. Is that right?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd was at a loss for words. Now, he had the answer as to why the merman’s family had failed to find the land even after clinging to this mission their entire lives.

They’re like the epitome of inefficiency.

This entire sea, no, this Arctic Ocean alone was vast, and Rotorua was digging through its ground all by himself? In short, this was a matter of probability. Lloyd found himself clicking his tongue.

“Tsk. That’s why you haven’t found it,” Lloyd commented under his breath.

“What is that?”

“Nothing,” dismissed Lloyd, “Don’t mind what I said. Let’s go then.”

“Go?” said Rotorua, following suit. “But where?”

“To the last site you worked at.”

“Oh, does this mean you will join the excavation?”

“No. I’m not joining.”

“Then what is it?”

“I’ll finish the excavation in a blink of an eye.”

Lloyd smiled confidently as he pushed Rotorua to lead the way. He thought it was time to put an end to this inefficient, dead-end practice of shoveling the seabed. The reason was simple.

Surveying.

Bzzt! As soon as Lloyd arrived at the excavation site, he activated his surveying skill and meticulously examined the surrounding area, covering the entire seabed within his skill range. And just like that, he began to scan the topographical data of the ground up to 16 feet beneath him.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 262: Mermaids Love Jjimjilbangs (1)

[Scanning will begin.]

Lloyd looked at his surroundings along with the message in front of his eyes. Until this moment, Javier's aura was the only source of light in the originally pitch-dark abyss. And it was the only thing that allowed Lloyd to discern what was around him. But when he activated his surveying skill, everything changed.

Crackle...! As though he had put on a pair of infrared night vision goggles, Lloyd's sight turned black and white, granting him a clear view of everything. The hydrothermal vent boiled near him, but apart from that, everything was quiet and calm. That was the view he had of the deep sea floor through his surveying skill. But Lloyd couldn't care less about the majestic scenery of the deep sea.

Like I can bother to admire the scenery of the deep sea when I have the Jewel of Truth to look for!

Lloyd's gaze traveled down to the bottom and got a glimpse of the ground 16 feet below him through his subterranean scanning skill, and he smiled confidently.

Why would I put in the effort to shovel when I have the subterranean scanning skill?

This optional skill allowed him to scan the ground that was 16 feet below him. Lloyd had found the skill to be beneficial for him in several instances throughout the past. With just a brief glance, he could see deep into the ground beneath him. It didn't require any effort from him to analyze the underground structure. Lloyd easily regarded it as the most useful skill in his possession and was confident that would be true for today as well.

I'll be seeing everything, including the seabed. And the Jewel of Truth buried in it will be the same.

Lloyd figured that the skill would cover every corner of the seabed. Sure, it could take one or two months to scan the whole area because of its vast size. But that was thousands of times better than going through the tedious process of hand shoveling. Lloyd was absolutely confident that this was the case. However, exactly a minute later, his conviction started to shake and tremble like the gaze of a person whose last train home left right in front of their eyes.

What's going on? What is this? Why's the mud... so thick?

His eyes darted around in alarm, carefully scanning the ground beneath him. But all he saw was a thick carpet of mud. A large amount of excessively thick mud and dirt. Otherwise, there were only some deep-sea eels wiggling in the mud. As soon as Lloyd saw the dancing eels through his surveying skill, he learned something right away.

Oh, crap. I'm screwed.

The mud was unexpectedly too thick. It was due to the static environment of the deep sea and the build-up of various organic matters and sediments that sprinkled down like snow from the surface.

The mud is thicker than the range of the Subterranean Scanning. Not just here but everywhere. It's all the same.

Lloyd clicked his tongue.

This is no use.

Lloyd had regarded Rotorua as a pathetic man for manually shoveling and grubbing around the sea for the Jewel of Truth. Lloyd regarded himself differently. After all, he had his surveying skill. The subterranean scanning skill would come into use and prove its worth. That was the source of his almighty confidence. But when he arrived and started surveying, he realized his mistake.

Agh... What should I do?

Lloyd was in a fix, indeed. Only the heavens knew where the Jewel of Truth was amid this boundless sea, and the situation was going downhill because the unexpectedly thick mud thicker rendered his skill useless. And now, Rotorua was pressuring him with a series of questions by his side.

“Now that you are here, how do you like it?” asked Rotorua expectantly. “Do you see the chance of finding the lot for the jewel?”

“No.” Lloyd frankly shook his head, suppressing his embarrassment. He wasn’t here to save his face or ego but to prevent the restoration of destiny from destroying everyone. He was here to find the Jewel of Truth.

Plus, I don’t have a lot of time on my hands. The Ending Spoiler told me I have, what, three years? Three years may seem long, but it’s actually short.

Truly, time was flying. It had been well over three years since he entered this world in The Knight of Blood and Iron. The restoration of destiny would begin before he even realized it. As he had that thought, he admitted his mistake without a fight.

“Now that I see it myself, this place is a lot larger than I expected. Plus, the mud is too thick,” pointed Lloyd with remorse.

“I knew it. I knew you would say that.”

“Yes,” agreed Lloyd, “But have you been digging through this thick mud to search for the jewel all by yourself until now?”

“There was no other way.” Rotorua smiled regretfully. “It’s not that my ancestors and I did not consider other methods. The most simple and efficient solution would be getting help from other merpeople. But that’s impossible for us to do regardless of what we know.”

“I see none of the other merpeople agreed to cooperate.” Lloyd understood right away.

“That is what happened.” There was more remorse on Rotorua’s face now. “You should be familiar with the atmosphere of this place after asking around about the jewel. The merpeople here? None of them have any interest in it. They think of it as a distant legend of the past and impossible to find. What's more, the majority thinks it's a waste of time to go out and look for it."

"Is it because they don't feel any inconvenience without it currently?" asked Lloyd.

"Probably. After all, everyone believes swimming and working out is better than wasting their time searching for the Jewel of Truth."

"I see." Lloyd seconded Rotorua. Indisputably, the merpeople had no interest in the jewel.

Persuading them to join their search wasn't going to be plausible.

Tsk. But it's such a waste not to try. The merpeople are muscular nutjobs.

As long as they can be mobilized, they'll be able to shovel all day with their endless endurance.

Lloyd clicked his tongue in remorse. The more he let his imagination fly, the more regretful he became. It would be child's play to dig through and turn over a large portion of the sea floor if Lloyd could mobilize hundreds of merpeople with amazing physiques. With that, the chances of finding the jewel site would jump dramatically.

The chances of that happening are the same as winning a lottery.

It was a simple matter. Having one worker dig through the vast sea compared to having hundreds dig through it. Buying one lottery ticket compared to buying hundreds of them. The latter would promise a bigger chance of winning. Even though there wasn't any guarantee of winning, the chances would shoot up. On top of that, if he convinced Javier to join the effort? The jewel was sure to be found.

I really wish I could get these merpeople to help. Or should I just summon Draggy down here? No. Then they'll find out that I was behind the Draggy incident.

Lloyd shook his head. He couldn’t call Draggy. Also, leaving all the digging to Javier was inefficient.

He could use his manablast on this whole place and remove the mud, but it wouldn’t be as powerful as it is on land. The water pressure is terrible down here.

The water pressure at this depth of water was unbelievable. It was beyond unbelievable. To give a dramatic comparison, imagine what would happen if a nuclear bomb were dropped in the Mariana Trench, the deepest part of the earth, and if the bomb was the RDS-200 Tsar Bomba, the most powerful nuclear bomb in history.

I saw it in a documentary before. Tsar Bomba? That was nothing to joke about. The blast wave from it circled the earth three times with the power of 50 megatons of TNT. Just its mushroom cloud reached 34 miles high into the air.

It wasn’t just that. The shockwave alone swept up and destroyed everything within 1,000 square kilometers. Its discharged energy was destructive enough to even dry up an entire lake. Without exaggeration, the diameter of the fireball’s crater reached over six miles long, and its height touched the boundaries of the troposphere and stratosphere.

But what would happen if I dropped it here? That would yield a very different outcome.

The fireball that was six miles long on land would only be six-tenth of a mile long down here due to the immense water pressure and turbulence that would crush it together. And eventually, the compressed fireball would diminish into a warm radioactive vapor that bubbled up to the surface.

it’d be like a big radioactive fart in the water. That’s just about it. The terrifying Tsar Bomba. It would be crushed into nothing under the water pressure.

That was how immense the water pressure was in the deep sea. As such, Javier's thousands of aura strands wouldn't have its usual capability to sweep across hundreds of yards at once.

Of course, he'll still be able to cover about a few dozen feet. Although that's better than just shoveling by hand, it's not quite enough. It's kind of a waste to completely rely on Javier when there's a whole pool of high-quality workers for this environment like the merpeople!

The merpeople were acclimated to the immense water pressure, and they could easily use their muscles here. That was the type of laborer Lloyd wanted. The chances of finding the jewel's site location would then increase significantly. But persuading them was one big hurdle.

Tsk. But still, there's got to be a way.

The merpeople were too valuable for him to give up on them so easily. From that moment on...

Work! Cerebrum! Think! Frontal lobe!

Lloyd desperately racked his brain. He painstakingly searched for a plan and agonized over finding a solution. Before he knew it, he began pacing back and forth, swimming along the water current close to him. After an unknown amount of time, he suddenly noticed a marginal change in his surroundings.

Hmm?

An unfamiliar scene unfolded in front of his eyes. Pillars shot up from the ground like a chimney, and a jet of water, hot and black, squirted out of them. Deep-sea organisms gathered around the dark water. Soon, Lloyd smelled a whiff of pungent sulfur. This was the place he glanced at from a distance with his skill.

Is that a black smoker hydrothermal vent?

Hydrothermal vents were sort of like a deep-sea hot spring, wherein the water that leaked underground shot back up after being heated with magma.

Tsk. I should avoid them.

It seemed that Lloyd mindlessly swam here while he was lost in thought. Frightened by the smoky smell and heat of the hydrogen sulfide, he hurriedly turned away. Just then...

Hold on. Wait a minute.

Ding! A brilliant idea hit Lloyd, so he stopped and quickly wheeled around to take a good look again at the vents.

“Um, Mister Rotorua?” asked Lloyd. “I have a question.” Lloyd then looked at Rotorua, who had followed the former with concern on his face. “Do joint diseases worsen with old age for merpeople like you?”

“Excuse me?”

“Joint problems,” Lloyd pointed, “Like arthralgia, where your joints remain sore year-round.”

“Well, somewhat... They do,” Rotorua mumbled and nodded. “As you have seen so far, we merpeople have excellent muscles. But because they are so huge, our joints are strained oftentimes. In particular, as this kind of stress accumulates over the years, quite a number of us suffer from joint pain.”

“Is that so? I knew it.”

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose a little. His mind flew back to the time he went around asking merpeople about the Jewel of Truth. Particularly, he recalled the granny mermaid who was exceedingly bothered by Lloyd as if he were a cult member.

That granny mermaid told me that I shouldn’t be pestering her when she’s already going nuts from her sore joints.

Lloyd remembered the way she constantly tapped her shoulders and waist like someone with severe joint pain. When Lloyd thought about it more, the granny wasn't the only one.

The senile and mid-aged mermen were like that too. Out of the countless merpeople that I've stopped, those past puberty all looked like they were sore and in pain somewhere.

Much like sedentary, white-collared office workers and taxi or bus drivers at the wheel. No, more like a retired athlete who strained their body from overtraining, they all habitually massaged and rubbed their aching joints.

Lloyd could speculate and assume that the merpeople's excessive volume of muscle was constantly putting stress on their joints, which was naturally becoming a source of pain for them with age.

My speculation was right. In that case, I have a chance.

Lloyd sensed it. And he followed his intuition to put together everything he knew to form a broader perspective - the merpeople suffering from chronic joint pain, the hydrothermal vent, the countless pieces of information he gathered, and other seemingly irrelevant situations or elements. Lloyd jumbled, assembled, and compounded all everything until they materialized into one business idea. This business would be used for his goal, that is, mobilizing countless merpeople to discover the site of the Jewel of the Truth. Ultimately, it would lead Lloyd to find a way to stop the restoration of destiny.

"I think it'll be a big hit if I open a jjimjilbang here," Lloyd said at last.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 263: Mermaids Love Jjimjilbangs (2)

Jjimjilbang. A popular location that was loved by most Korean people. A space where they could enjoy a tender boiled egg with a sip of ice cold sikhye, a sweet rice beverage, washing away all their prolonged stress and exhaustion. Lloyd, too, had been to a jjimjilbang in South Korea. Just once.

It was around the time I was working nonstop on construction sites.

There was a period when he was blessed with an endless amount of work. He made daily visits to construction sites without taking a single break between them. His daily wages piled high in his bank account, and he was elated. But in return, it took a serious toll on his body.

I didn't have any time to relax and unwind. Even after finishing my work at construction sites, I had to head home and study.

Though he was on leave due to his next semester's tuition fees and was free from the stress of schoolwork, he couldn't sit back and idle away. He had a goal to graduate, get a license, and land a decent job. Then liberate himself from the sickening, heavy financial shackles weighing down on him. And finally, start an ordinary family and live a normal life without any large troubles or worries. That was the ultimate goal he had back in South Korea.

To others, it was an ordinary and modest goal, but to him, it wasn't. He was desperate and despaired over his goal, so he barely rested to that end. He had at least seven nose bleeds every week. Not only that, his nutrition was also quite poor, having relied only on rice, noodle, and kimchi provided by his room rental for free. And thus, it went without saying that his face was yellow as if he had serious jaundice.

And one day, when fatigue was cruelly weighing him down, right before he crawled back home after one of his construction jobs, Lloyd's coworker called him.

"Suho, do you want to go to a jjimjilbang after work if you have no other plans?"

But, of course, Lloyd shook his head and turned down the offer. It was the only choice he had. He was penniless. And going to a jjimjilbang? That was an unimaginable luxury. Thinking that he might as well spend the money on noodles and a few more canned tunas instead, he awkwardly smiled and said he was busy rather than saying he was broke. He was too embarrassed to say the truth. He told his friend to go alone and refused. But his friend said...

“Hey, you’re going to get sick if you keep living like this. I’m paying. We’re going, you bastard.”

Lloyd jumped at the chance. Free! How nice! And when he arrived and saw the place for the first time, his jaw dropped. A red clay room. A diamond seawater room. And there were many other rooms with all sorts of different themes. The whole facility was beyond what Lloyd had expected. And there were the boiled eggs! The savory flavor was more delicious than he could have ever imagined. Lloyd wondered if those eggs were the same as the ones he had always eaten before. And then what about the iced sikhye he drank with the eggs? His eyes welled with tears of happiness as he took his first sweet sip. Having always drank nothing but lukewarm tap water, which only the heavens knew when it was last cleaned, sikhye tasted like nectar blessed by the gods.

Ah, those were good times.

And as he left the jjimjilbang, he resolved to himself that he would frequent this place once every week when he got a job and lived a decent, humane life. Lloyd had made a firm resolve in his heart. But unfortunately, he wasn’t able to keep this promise.

Getting a job? Ha. I was brought here before I could get one.

Lloyd finished off his trip down memory lane with a bitter smile. And he looked beside him. People he newly met. There was Javier, who was lifting his brow like someone out of a beautiful painting. And Rotorua, looking up at Lloyd with his head tilted to the side. The two of them were eyeing him with curiosity in their eyes. Lloyd smiled.

Oh, they must have never heard of a jjimjilbang.

Come to think of it, that was the case. Lloyd cleared his throat.

“Hmm. Ehem. You must have never heard of it until today, right?” asked Lloyd.

“You are correct,” affirmed Rotorua grimly. “Um... What is it about the place that makes you so certain it’ll be a success here? And what does it have anything to do with unearthing the jewel’s site location?”

“Yes.” Lloyd brought his hands together. “To simply answer your two questions, I want to give you a yes.”

“What on earth is a jjimjilbang?”

Lloyd sensed impatience in Rotorua’s voice. “It is a place where you heat your body with hot water or steam.”

“Heat my body?” Rotorua was almost rooted to the spot at the suggestion.

“Oh, of course, but not like how we heat up food.” Lloyd chuckled before he went on with his explanation. “I mean, it’s where you warm up your body but not until you get burned. The heat is supposed to relax your muscles and release tension.”

“Hmm,” mused Rotorua, “I know of something similar to a jjimjilbang. It is not that we merpeople do not enjoy hot massages.”

“Really? That is new.” Lloyd was glad that the concept was familiar.

“Indeed. Though it is illegal.”

“What do you mean illegal?” asked Lloyd, interested.

“Exactly what I mean,” replied Rotorua, “It seems as though you thought of this jjimjilbang after looking at the hydrothermal vent, but actually, we merpeople enjoy secretly getting a massage in these sorts of locations.”

“Secretly?”

“Yes, since it is dangerous.”

“Dangerous, you say...”

“The water over there is too hot,” pointed out Rotorua. “It can be an adequate source of heat at a reasonable distance and good position. However, that is hard to determine.”

Lloyd nodded. “I see what you mean.”

“Right? But the bigger problem is that the water is not very clear.”

“Are you talking about the toxic substance?”

“Toxic substance, you say. That’s probably right. If you drink the water in the area by accident, you start to become dazed, struggle to breathe, and lose consciousness in an instant. So, it is very dangerous.”

“Hmm... I see. It would be extremely dangerous for you to be floating around unconscious with extremely hot water gushing out beside you.”

“Yes. It makes it more than likely for you to get a severe burn. If you are unlucky, you might die. So, that is why it is forbidden to warm yourself at the hydrothermal vent.” Rotorua’s eyes, which were fixed on Lloyd, were filled with doubt. “But do you plan on constructing a facility for that? The queen will not allow it. No, even if she does, it will not be easy to have the merpeople overcome their fear and reluctance. Have you thought about that?”

“Yes, I did.” Lloyd nodded, thinking that it was a simple matter. “That is a good point. But all I need to do is provide an adequate amount of heat control and block the toxic substance from entering the jjimjilbang facility. These two things will be the main focus of this construction project.”

“So, is there a way for us to manage this?”

“Of course,” Lloyd replied confidently. He was certain of it.

Of course. This isn't something I'd joke about or half-ass.

There were no second chances. It was essential to conserve time and energy in the process of discovering the jewel's site location, constructing the jewel with the blueprint, and finally finding a method to stop the restoration of destiny. Only the heavens knew how much more time and effort Lloyd would have to pour in to execute the method he found. Considering this point, he couldn't carelessly handle any of the tasks or processes that needed to be completed.

Do I think the merpeople will welcome my jjimjilbang with open arms and love when I build the facility? I might as well give up on this project with such naive expectations.

Lloyd had carefully thought through his entire plan. The safety measures in the jjimjilbang. The elements that would charm the merpeople, draw them in, and make them fall in love with it. And how he'd use that love to his advantage to achieve his ultimate goal of forcing a work contract onto the merpeople. In no uncertain terms, Lloyd had a plan.

"So," continued Lloyd, "Please lead me."

"Lead you? To where?" Rotorua looked at Lloyd.

"Is there a cave or something like that nearby?" Lloyd asked without answering the question.

"There is."

"How far is it from here?"

"Hmm, around a distance of five Gigatitans."

"Five Gigatitans..." pondered Lloyd, "That would be about 400 yards away."

"That should be about it from your standard measurement. Do you want me to take you there?"

“Yes.”

“...”

Rotorua stared at Lloyd. He thought that this human was a bit unique. No, weird would be a better word to describe him. At first, he had scoured the city, claiming to search for the Jewel of Truth. Eventually, the man excitedly met with him for that purpose. Then he seemed to become suspicious of him. When his suspicions were resolved, Lloyd declared he’d build a jjimjilbang or whatever it was, as if that would solve everything. Furthermore…

Plus, there is the silver-haired man beside him. He has an interesting attitude as well.

Rotorua’s gaze then moved to Javier, whom he pegged to be working for this human named Lloyd. The man wasn’t stopping his master’s actions or asking any questions either. He continued maintaining his stoic composure even after hearing Lloyd’s ridiculous suggestion to build a jjimjilbang. It was as if he had complete trust that everything would work out just by following Lloyd’s plan.

Hmm.

Rotorua gulped. Something didn’t sit right with him, and the thought that these two guys were swindlers crossed his mind. The rumors had it that land humans were sly and cunning creatures who were willing to commit even the most heinous crimes for gold or money.

But...

Rotorua shook his head. It was his first time meeting anyone who was looking for the Jewel of Truth. Moreover, at the same time, he was slightly getting tired of this whole expedition.

I was stuck.

He had devoted over 20 years to this job but found no success. The fear of spending his life meaninglessly digging dirt at the bottom of the sea until he died of old age just like many of his ancestors, including his grandfather and father, suffocated Rotorua at times. He wondered if he'd also eventually pass down the mission of finding the jewel to his son before passing away.

I don't want that.

He was scared and didn't want to lead such a futile life. But if he continued as he was now, that seemed to be his inevitable future. However, he encountered an unexpected source of help today.

I might not find an opportunity like this again.

An explorer looking for the Jewel of Truth other than him. Rotorua decided to put his hopes on this human. Resolved, he nodded at Lloyd and said, "Good. I will take you to the cave. Follow me."

Rotorua led the way. The cave was not very far from where they were.

"Oh." Lloyd's eyes shone as he arrived and admired the cave entrance.

This is nice.

It was much better than what he expected. The entrance was vast, about 22 feet wide and 32 feet high.

What about the inside?

Lloyd entered the cave with the help of Javier's aura to light up the place. The inside turned out to be better.

Wow. This looks like a karaoke room!

The cave stretched 820 feet long. The main corridor at the center extended in an almost straight line from the entrance to the exit, with small and large rooms attached on all sides. The smallest one was about the size of a college dorm. The biggest one was close to the size of a university auditorium.

This is amazing. It's perfect. Just perfect.

Lloyd's heart pounded as he surveyed the inside as the whole space was unbelievably perfect for actualizing his jjimjilbang blueprint.

Looking at what's here, I can say that a chunk of the construction has already been completed. Foundation work? There's hardly much left to do. I'll just smooth out some rough edges, divide the sauna rooms according to their themes, place down pipes for the hydrothermal vents, add some convenience facilities, and et voila!

This construction didn't require much effort from him. From that moment on, Lloyd hit the ground running, going in and out of the cave for four days straight and surveying the inside structure. He simultaneously engrossed himself in surveying the entire place, concentrating on the areas and points that required repairs, reinforcements, and the exit and entrance channel for the hydrothermal vent. Lloyd thought over, planned, and designed every element of the construction. Meanwhile, he excitedly made sure Javier was put to work as well.

"Hey, Javier," called Lloyd.

"What work do you plan on giving me now, Young Master?" grumbled Javier curtly.

"Ha!" puffed Lloyd. "Can you already tell what I want just from hearing your name?"

"You slaved me around too many times." Javier chuckled. "By this time, I cannot tell whether I am your personal guard knight or a practical piece of construction equipment."

"Yeah? You can't tell yet, huh?" quipped Lloyd as he wiggled his brows.

"You couldn't be..." Javier became goggle-eyed. A look of disbelief came over him.

“You are a knight. Have some pride,” said Lloyd as he smiled. “How could I so shamelessly think of you as a piece of construction equipment?”

“Do you... mean it?” said Javier, relaxing his muscles a little.

“Of course I do. You are a knight. Our fiefdom’s most honorable knight, Sir Javier Asrahan.”

“Hmm,” reflected Javier and squinted his eyes.

“What? What? What is it? Why are you glaring like that when I’m being nice.”

“I am wondering whether you are up to something.”

“Up to something?” blurted Lloyd, offended. “I’m not up to anything.”

“Do you really mean it?”

“Of course. Sir Asrahan, what’s wrong? Do you feel embarrassed about being properly treated as a knight? Is that it?”

“That is not it.”

“It’s not, right?”

“No.”

“Then time to get to work.” Lloyd then put his arm around Javier’s shoulders. “Do you remember the hydrothermal vents from earlier? Near them, there should be some long, thin shells that look like bamboo.”

Javier turned and shot Lloyd an I-knew-it look.

“Those are called giant tube worms. Collect as many of their outer shells as you can for me. I just need the ones that are thicker than your thighs. Also, make sure to leave out any of them that are cracked or chipped,” instructed Lloyd.

"..."

Seeing that Javier wasn't reacting to him, Lloyd asked, "By chance, do you not want to do this job, Sir Asrahan?"

Finally, Javier clicked his tongue, lashing out inwardly at Lloyd for sweet-talking him into being treated as a piece of construction equipment.

Haah... You are not even the real Lloyd.

Regretfully licking his bitter lips, he turned, returned to the hydrothermal vent, and buckled down to collect the shells. But not without rage.

While Javier was busy with his task, Lloyd preoccupied himself with constructing the jjimjilbang. For this project, he utilized the water pipe construction method. Since the facility was built in the deep sea, Lloyd employed all the knowledge he had to make sure there wouldn't be any malfunctions. With that resolve, he finished everything from determining the pipe thickness, installing the pipe conduit, employing the water pipe branching method, calculating the area of exposure, and performing the installation method. The veins in his eyes popped out as Lloyd stared at the design blueprint. Each day, Javier became faster and more adept at collecting the giant tube worms' shells. Five days later. And at last.

Great.

Lloyd gazed at the perfected design blueprint with a glow of satisfaction. At last, the moment to lure the merpeople into a labor contract negotiation using an incredible, first-ever construction of a seabed jjimjilbang was nearing.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 264: Mermaids Love Jjimjilbangs (3)

And thus, the seabed jjimjilbang construction began.

“So,” said Lloyd, “From now on, bring the giant tube worms’ secretions.”

“The worms’ secretions?” Javier looked at Lloyd with disgust all over his face.

“Yeah.”

“How much should I bring?”

“As much as you can. Keep it coming until I tell you to stop,” chuckled Lloyd as he held out a conch shell that was incomparably larger than average. It was large enough to fit a human into it.

Taking the conch from Lloyd, Javier sighed, “I see.” He wasn’t entirely happy about it. But he was left with no choice. After all, every single thing the fake Lloyd did ended up being the correct choice, and Javier knew that would probably be the case this time too.

He always does something strange. I cannot wrap my head around his ridiculous orders or bizarre actions. But sometime later, his orders and actions are always revealed to be backed by clear reason and purpose.

That was how Lloyd had been saving the Frontera family up until today. Javier presumed it’d be the same this time as well.

It is beyond me how building a jjimjilbang facility deep down in this water is relevant to stopping the restoration of destiny, but I should just follow his orders. I’ll trust him.

Recalling his previous observations of fake Lloyd until this moment, Javier obediently moved forward and approached the boiling hydrothermal vents.

Shhhh! When he approached the hundreds of worms, they reacted by secreting sticky liquid. Javier immediately held up his conch and filled it up just in time.

This liquid is sticky. I suppose they usually use it to build their houses. It is like glue.

At last, Javier understood, though vaguely, why Lloyd instructed him to collect the giant tube worms' secretions. It was to be used in place of cement. From then onward, Javier filled the conch up and moved it to the construction site, where Lloyd mixed it up with mud. He then slathered the mixture onto the floor, walls, and ceiling of the cave.

Tralalala. Lalala.

Lloyd worked on his giant tube worm cement as he hummed, closely resembling a construction plasterer as he did. And much like one, Lloyd adeptly covered almost the entire cave with cement. Even though it was an immense amount of work for one person, Lloyd's stamina was well beyond that of an average person.

Huff! Hufff! Huffff! His manaheart was already at the level of a mid-level sword expert, and on top of that, he was equipped with a triple circle. As a result, he was a tireless ball of energy that was able to work nonstop. All the while, he didn't forget to secure and lay the pipes that would draw up the hot water from the hydrothermal vents.

"Hey," called Lloyd, "This is enough worm secretion. It's time for something else."

"Should I bring the worms' shells now?" asked Javier.

"Oh! I don't even need to ask anymore."

"I hold a bounty of experiences with you, Master Lloyd." Javier sighed, almost in a grumbling manner. "Survey. Design. Basic construction. Clear the ground, set up the structure, and pour cement. Finish that up. If pipes are necessary, lay them down when it’s around our current time. I roughly know the order of how construction sites are operated now.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes.”

“Wow, good for you,” Lloyd said without bothering to hide his sarcasm. “I’m jealous. You must be happy about it. Congratulations, sincerely.”

Javier gritted his teeth, trying to make sense of how he had wound up here in the seabed for a construction project. An intense wave of dismay and self-hatred crept up from the bottom of his soul. Despite that, however, he didn’t idle and slack off. He dutifully transferred the shells he collected in advance and tidied them up with Lloyd. He cut and refined them into their necessary size, glued them together with cement, and connected them to five hydrothermal vent chimneys.

“Hey! Push!”!

Crack! Lloyd and Javier moved in sync, pushing the pipes while maintaining distance from the vent to avoid getting burned. The pipes fit perfectly and covered the hydrothermal vents.

Brrr! Brrr! The 752 ℉, highly acidic hydrogen sulfide, lead, and iron-enriched seawater traveled into the pipes, and Lloyd activated his survey skill right away.

[Scanning will begin.]

Bzzt! His eyes meticulously surveyed the pipes to ensure they were absolutely free from any leakage of hot water or toxic substance. His eyes shined like they did when he was picking out a cut of Australian sirloin steak on his payday. A moment later, Lloyd sighed in relief.

Great. There aren’t any leaks.

There were no leaks from the hydrothermal vent, the inner area of the jjimjilbang, and even all the way to the cave exit. There wasn't a single leak. The construction was a complete success. From then on, Lloyd cracked down and devoted himself to the construction with greater zeal, starting with laying down the pipes. Most of the pipes received an additional layer of cement to avoid unintentionally having any heat escape from somewhere. Lloyd made sure that the heat would only flow to the rooms inside the facility. With this, a clear change had been made.

Oh! It's gotten hotter.

The temperature inside spiked dramatically. Once that was taken care of, Lloyd moved on to refine and touch the inside of the cave, first building a door out of gigantic clam and crab shells. And then he divided the whole place into rooms with varying themes: a traditional red clay room, a seaweed-filled seawater room, an emerald room filled with glowing plankton glass marvels, a tropical beach room covered in the white sand, a Himalayan glacier room, a spin-dryer room, and an extreme bungee-jump room. Lloyd took extra care to ensure that the merpeople would not get bored. And lastly, he constructed a resting area that was as big as an auditorium, which was set to be the main facility of the jjimjilbang.

So, this would be the place for merpeople to laze around and read comics as they eat boiled eggs.

After 21 days, the construction was finally complete. It was hardly an exaggeration to say it had been done at the speed of lightning.

Haah. What a relief. I was able to finish quickly because there was a cave nearby. I got lucky.

And the inside of the cave was equally impressive. It almost seemed like a gift from mother nature to build a jjimjilbang down here. Lloyd was happy to skip the foundation work that usually took up the most amount of time and energy during construction. As a result, he was able to completely focus on installing and laying down the hydrothermal vents as well as the interior construction work.

Now, it’s time to welcome customers.

Now that the jjimjilbang was completed, it was time to bring the merpeople to the place. This job was entrusted to Rotorua.

“What now? When are the merpeople who promised to be here coming?” asked Lloyd.

“Oh, the thing is...” The night the jjimjilbang construction was finished, Rotorua came to Lloyd with a troubled look on his face. “Um... The thing is, I did receive a promise from some of my acquaintances a few days ago that they will be here as soon as this place opens. They promised, really...”

“But what?” blurted Lloyd, his voice dripping with alarm. “Wait...”

Rotorua looked down.

“They said they will come next time.” Lloyd instantly realized what was going on.

“I am sorry. I have nothing to say for myself.” Rotorua’s shoulders drooped.

Lloyd clicked his tongue.

Tsk, tsk. I had a bad feeling about this, and I was right.

Without a doubt, Rotorua was an outsider who didn’t have many friends. So, Lloyd didn’t hold high expectations of him. Even when Rotorua beamed proudly at Lloyd and boasted to the latter that his acquaintances were coming, Lloyd told himself, “Let’s see.” And sure enough, he was right.

Them saying that they’ll come the next time they can mean they will not come at all. It’s the same as the empty promises people make in Korea to grab a meal with someone soon.

However, Lloyd wasn’t disappointed. He instead tapped Rotorua’s shoulders.

“Don’t worry,” Lloyd comforted. “Do not be too discouraged. I have another plan in mind.”

“Um,” replied Rotorua as he lifted his head and looked at Lloyd. “Did you prepare for this to happen in advance?”

“I sure did.” Lloyd’s voice seemed to indicate that it was only obvious. “The merpeople are not familiar with the concept of a jjimjilbang. This should be their first encounter with one. And not only that, it was constructed by Javier and me, people from the surface. So-”

“You expected that the merpeople would not regard it so positively,” Rotorua broke in.

“Yes,” said Lloyd, “I have been thinking that the only way to gain traction would be to stimulate their curiosity and excitement.”

“Hmm... So, what plan do you have in mind?”

“It’s this one. Hold on.” Lloyd lifted his finger and head to the counter, where he took out two giant lumps. Rotorua had to look closely to make out what they were.

“Is that... the shell of the gigantic lobster and crab?” observed Rotorua.

“Yes, that is right.” Lloyd grinned. “Javier and I will be promoting the jjimjilbang wearing this.”

Javier, who had been listening to the conversation without saying anything, flinched. He then looked at Lloyd as if he was a madman. Lloyd smiled more shamelessly.

“What? What? What is it?”

“...”

“Don’t insult me with your gaze. Speak,” challenged Lloyd.

“Can I insult you with my mouth?” Javier finally asked.

“What’s wrong?” Lloyd picked up the giant, human-sized crab shell. “Is it because I’m going to make you wear this?”

A look of anger appeared on Javier’s face. “I am not a clown, Master Lloyd.”

“Yeah,” acknowledged Lloyd, “I know. You’re a knight.”

“I am. I am a knight as you said. I am glad that you are aware of this fact. So why do you suggest that I, a knight, wear such an unsightly thing?” asked Javier indignantly.

“For the sake of the family you are loyal to?”

Javier frowned in confusion.

“Wear this, and everything will be solved,” promised Lloyd. “The Frontera family will further prosper and even be able to avoid danger. You know, it’s not like we’re doing this for me. I don’t want to do this either.”

Javier merely stared at Lloyd, trying to comprehend where he was getting at.

“But do you know what will happen if you refuse? Oh! That was the moment.” Lloyd suddenly started to talk theatrically, even making hand gestures. “No one knew that this moment marked the beginning of the Frontera family’s downfall. But the circle of tragedy had been turning long before then... You will be hearing a history teacher saying these words 200 years from today.”

“That is just outrageous-”

“All because Sir Asrahan did not cooperate,” Lloyd chimed in, this time with more effect. “He failed to attract the merpeople. The jjimjilbang went under. The jewel couldn’t be found. The family fell. Society collapsed. The villagers plunged into misery.”

“...”

“One boy in the miserable fiefdom was forced to starve all day. His puppy starved together with him. The two tightly embraced each other, only relying on each other’s body heat to get through the cold night. But not a single person came to their aid. And just like that, the boy and the dog slowly but surely drew in their final breaths of air. And right before he died, a drop of tear welled up under his eyes. He whispered to himself, his last whisper sad. Oh, oh... Only if Sir Asrahan had put on the gigantic crab shell...”

“...”

“Hearing those last words, the dog whimpered and licked the boy’s cheeks. But the boy didn’t move. That is when the dog realized that the time had come for him to follow the boy. So, the dog-”

“I will wear it,” Javier huffed, shaking his head.

“All right, good thinking. My little puppy.”

Javier’s face darkened.

“Oops, I made a mistake because you interrupted me in the middle of the story. Ehem. Good thinking, Javier.”

Javier clamped his mouth shut, and Lloyd happily handed over the shell as if he had been waiting for this moment. Javier could not hate the latter enough. But at the same time, he had to admit it.

Ha. It is beyond me what’s going on, but...

It was undeniably true that the fake Lloyd was doing all of this to save the family. As such, actively helping this eccentric madman was the right thing to do, even if his ways were unconventional and absurd. If not, the lord was set to pass away in three years’ time.

“...”

At last, Javier threw away his pride and decided to wear the thing. He put on the shell and inserted his hands into its pincers, which covered half of his torso except for his legs. Meanwhile, Lloyd also threw on a giant lobster shell and went further by wearing a sign he had prepared in advance. The sign had “Grand Opening Event! Free Jjimjilbang Entrance!” written in a large font.

“All right, let’s go,” hurried Lloyd at Javier with his pincers.

“...”

“What are you doing? Come, hurry up and follow me.”

“...”

Lloyd glanced behind his shoulder as he waddled in his lobster costume. Javier, who was behind him, had to desperately fight against his desire to resign on the spot.

Haah. Patience. This is all for the lord and his family.

With that resolution in mind, he waddled over to Lloyd and entered the merpeople’s city. And when they settled in the most crowded area in the egg, Javier heard Lloyd’s enthusiastic shouting to bring in customers.

“Everyone!” bawled Lloyd. “This is a rare opportunity! To celebrate the first-ever jjimjilbang in the Mermaid Kingdom! It’s a completely free event! Don’t you want to safely relax your muscles without having the scent of sulfur assaulting your nose? Don’t your aching joints bother you?! Come over and enjoy yourselves, my dearest customers!” Lloyd clapped and bawled in excitement.

“...”

Javier suddenly felt a shaft of reverence toward Lloyd for being able to scream those words without shame. At the same time, he thought to himself...

I don’t think I’ll be as effective.

Indeed, Javier was right. The ridiculous costume. Lloyd's exaggerated shouts. Sure, they were able to make the merpeople pause their swimming. There was a crowd gathering around them in curiosity. But that was all there was to it.

They are laughing at us.

They were laughing at Lloyd because they were amused by his clownish manners. They were simply giving momentary attention to them as if they were looking at a circus attraction. Not a single merperson in the crowd seemed interested in the jjimjilbang.

What on earth was he thinking...?

No matter how Javier looked at it, this was a hopeless affair. A desperate, unsightly effort. Javier licked his lips regretfully and wondered if he should stop fake Lloyd, so he could at least be saved from the blatant mockery. The moment he had that thought, Lloyd came to Javier's side.

"Plus, if you all come to my jjimjilbang!" Lloyd dramatically shouted and held out his hands and put them on Javier's shoulders. Then he gave a hard tug downward. "You can admire this face as you keep enjoying your treatments!"

Crack! As soon as Lloyd pressed down on Javier's costume, Javier's head broke out of the shell like a pimple popping out of someone's skin. And with that, his face was revealed.

"...!"

And his face had a phenomenal effect on the crowd.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 265: Mermaids Love Jjimjilbangs (4)

You may run away from Hell, but the real Hell awaits you there. Lloyd wasn't the type to believe those kinds of sayings. But that changed when he tried out another part-time job after becoming tired of doing grueling construction work under the hot sun.

That happened on the first day I was out for the mascot costume job!

It was a temp job at a newly opened fried chicken restaurant. Lloyd was asked to distribute ad flyers in a chicken mascot costume. It was during one of the hottest days of the summer when he got a taste of Hell.

I really thought I was going to die.

At first, Lloyd rejoiced. He was away from the typical harsh, grimy construction sites and trying out something else. But his joy and excitement vanished one minute into the job. Under the sun during the hottest days of the summer, he was tasked to go around the streets in a fluffy chicken costume and give out leaflets, all while putting on a charming act. That day, he learned that humans could sweat as much as he did then and the neighborhood kids darting at him in cackles and kicking him were devils. On top of everything, he also learned the cold, hard truth that the world loved nothing more than a handsome face.

Was it Yeongjin? Whew. The name is stuck in my head.

Yeongjin was his coworker at the job. Lloyd met him for the first time that day. But the name could not be erased from his head because of a notably awful incident that occurred on this particular date.

Yeongjin suggested we get a can of soda before we collapse to the ground from heat exhaustion.

Yeongjin said it'd be his treat. Having wanted to rest as well, Lloyd hurried to the convenience store and bought some sports drinks. They sat under a parasol in front of the store to hydrate themselves. When they both removed their costume head, chaos broke loose.

When Yeongjin threw off the costume head, it revealed his gorgeous face... And he brushed his sweat-soaked hair as he chugged his canned drink and wiped the sweat on his pale cheek... Then under his sharp jawline, his Adam's apple bobbed... Which caused a few young female students passing by to scream in shock.

That day, the chicken restaurant raked in money. The first day of business was a slam dunk. What was more, Yeongjin went viral on social media as the "Hongdae Chicken Mascot Man." The last time Lloyd heard, Yeongjin was scouted into some sort of talent agency.

"..."

Handsome guys were so disgustingly unfair. They had it so easy for everything. Lloyd shook his head and shoved the memory deep into his brain before looking up. The lessons Lloyd learned that day were being successfully applied here. As the shell crushed under the pressure of Lloyd's hands and revealed Javier's face, the latter's gorgeousness allured everyone, who screamed in shock.

After all, it only took his face to get permission to enter this kingdom.

Javier was handsome. That was a sufficiently proven fact. Lloyd purposefully set up a scene with some slight nudging. The status quo was poles apart from the days when Lloyd asked the merpeople around about the jewel. Back then, Javier had his face cast down, never looking up even once due to embarrassment, and the merpeople were busy swimming off from Lloyd's unending questions. As such, most of the merpeople didn't get a good look at Javier's face. However, that wasn't the case today. His face was plainly revealed to every merperson gathered around them after Lloyd cracked the shell he was wearing.

The result? Victory. A couple of the merpeople drawn by Javier's face became their first jjimjilbang customers. They entered in confusion at first, looking around, but all came out happy and relaxed. And then they started to spread the news about the facility to the others, how there was this place called a jjimjilbang, how it was the perfect place to relax your muscles and heal your joint pain. And all for free! It was safe even! The stories of the facility traveled surprisingly fast with great detail throughout the city. And six days after the jjimjilbang's opening...

Clamor! Clamor! Everywhere Lloyd looked, the entire jjimjilbang was packed with merpeople. Some were walking as their silky hair danced sideways, and some were relaxing their defined muscles. Some were moving their fins happily, and some were sleeping. All of them were having a fantastic time in their own way. However, that wasn't all.

"Come on! I was first in the line!"

"Liar, liar, pants on fire! I have been standing in line since last night!"

There were constant quarrels outside the jjimjilbang as Lloyd started to limit entry due to overcapacity after too many merpeople came rushing in at once. As such, the merpeople outside often cut in line and fought as they waited to get in.

This is nothing less than incredible.

The corners of his lips rose in contentment. His plan to mobilize the merpeople through the jjimjilbang was a stellar success. So, now...

Time to move on to the next stage.

Lloyd sensed that the time was now. Since he had given the merpeople the heavenly taste of the jjimjilbang, it was time to move on to his next step. That night, Lloyd set up a big sign at the entrance of the jjimjilbang.

***

The following morning rolled around.

"Oh my? What is this?" A granny mermaid rubbed her senile eyes in disbelief. She tilted her muscular neck and stared hard at the sign in front of the jjimjilbang entrance. And the words in it gutted her deeply.

[Jjimjilbang Promotional Event Is Now Over]

[From today, the jjimjilbang will no longer be free. For more information, please read below. Thank you.]

What is happening now?

The granny mermaid clenched her fists reflexively. No more free entrances? A sort of payment was required to use the jjimjilbang, perhaps? There was now a price to treat her entire body with warm water and forget about her aching joints?

What is the payment, then?

The granny mermaid had come here with the resolution to further enjoy the sauna rooms than the day before and treat herself the entire day until night came. As such, the granny mermaid was flustered, to say the least. In one part, she also felt nervous. Calming her nerves, she looked somewhere else.

Look below for more information?

She looked down and found a flat rock that held several rolls of refined seaweed. She picked one up and opened it to find tiny words written on it.

“Jjimjilbang Sign-up Form?” The wrinkles on her forehead deepened. Her eyes quickly moved.

[Seabed Cave Jjimjilbang Sign-up Form]

[This form serves the purpose of ensuring the best and smoothest experience possible for our customers. Please carefully read the terms and conditions before filling out the form.]

Terms and conditions?

The granny mermaid felt an inexplicable sense of anxiety creeping up inside her. Her eyes moved to the terms and conditions.

[Jjimjilbang Membership Terms and Conditions]

(1) Seabed Cave Jjimjilbang (“Jjimjilbang”) is strictly membership-based. Those who are not members will be restricted from entering and patronizing the facility.

(2) The maximum hours the members can patronize the facility is 12 hours every day.

(3) All members must pay a small fee to patronize the jjimjilbang. The small fee will not come in monetary or material form. It shall be in the form of labor in the areas designated by the owner of the jjimjilbang, Lloyd Frontera.

Shut up! Labor? I have to work for Lloyd Frontera and go wherever that land human wants me to! For what? To use the facility?

Fright filled her eyes. At the same time, a crippling sense of anger came over her.

Is this human a madman or what? What does he think about us merpeople?

She was upset. She wouldn’t feel this way if Lloyd had asked for precious shells or pearls. But instead, he was demanding the merpeople to work for him.

What an impertinent human!

She shook her head, affirming her perception of humans once again. Pesky and nosy. Environment destroyers. Her angry eyes quickly moved to continue and read the rest.

(4) The number of labor hours required to use the jjimjilbang will be half of an individual's time spent inside the facility. (For example, if you stayed six hours, you should work three hours.)

(5) Members must labor within two days (48 hours) of using the jjimjilbang. If the members fail to comply within the time frame, they will face one of three restrictions in using the facility.

What? Restrictions in using the facility?

She clicked her tongue. The labor compensation part was already ludicrous enough, and now what? Members will be banned from using the jjimjilbang if they don’t pay up within 48 hours? Nothing was more tyrannical than this.

Fine. I’ll see what restrictions you have set forth.

A glint of righteous anger appeared in her eyes.

(6) Usage restrictions in the event of failure to pay.

① One default: Ban from the jjimjilbang for ten days.

② Two defaults: Ban from the jjimjilbang for 30 days.

③ Three defaults: Loss of membership and the right to sign up again. A permanent ban from the jjimjilbang.

(7) First-come, first-served signup event: The first 100 members to sign up will receive a complimentary 60 hours on us.

The granny mermaid was at a loss for words. So, in short, to sum up the terms and conditions...

I have to work to use the jjimjilbang, and I’ll get three warnings if I don’t. After three strikes, it’s a permanent ban.

She scoffed dryly. The more she thought about it, the more speechless she became. What kind of a human would do such a thing? Worm-like veins in her curved upper torso popped in anger.

“Like hell I would! What a filthy antic! I won’t use it then.”

Rip! The seaweed scroll paper was torn into shreds in her hands, and she turned away. Her pecs bulged out in anger. This reaction was similar to every person that came after her.

“Sure, I love relaxing in a hot sauna... But enough to work for a human?”

“Oh, come on! This clearly shows how he looks down on us merpeople!”

“I know, right? Even though one of them is drop-dead gorgeous and the sauna is very relaxing and comfortable, this is too much. He’s asking for our labor as payment, not pearls? What does he think of us? Does he see us as cheap labor for him to exploit?”

“Nope. I’ll just stop going to his sauna.”

“Me neither. We’ve been fine all along without this jjimjilbang.”

“Yes, indeed. It was never part of our lifestyle anyway. We can live without it just fine.”

“I think so too! Let’s just leave the jjimjilbang as a nice memory of the past!”

Some merpeople felt resentful when they read the signup form. Some were enraged. They enjoyed relaxing their muscles and joints with heat, but this was too much. It was a direct mockery to all merpeople. So, they scoffed, arguing that they’ve been living without the jjimjilbang just fine and that they’ll survive without it well enough. Every one of them agreed and left in a rage, resolving that they would never ever use the facility again. They coldly went away, and that day, not a single one of them signed up. As such, the jjimjilbang became silent for the first time in a while. The red clay room, which once bustled with merpeople, was now still. The seawater room and the tropical beach sand room that the merpeople loved for their familiar charm and exotic vibe, respectively, were only occupied by deep-sea plankton.

“It appears that we have failed.” Javier, unable to hold any longer, crinkled his brow.

“I don’t think so,” disagreed Lloyd, shrugging his shoulders. “Things will change in a few days.”

“How will it change?”

“Wait, and you will see.” Lloyd grinned.

Lloyd was confident. He was confident that even though the merpeople had initially turned away in frustration after reading the membership form, the situation would change in the next few days. So, he simply waited without a hint of doubt in his head. As time passed, the merpeople were still angry, and Lloyd was still confident. One day. Two days. Four days. Six days later. On that sixth day, at last, the merpeople realized. They were forced to admit it. They had to admit that they could not live without the jjimjilbang anymore.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 266: Mermaids Love Jjimjilbangs (5)

Addiction. A state of being so intensely into something that you couldn't stop doing whatever that was. It made quitting extremely difficult. A case in point was smoking, which most people started by taking a drag of a cigarette out of curiosity until it developed into a full-blown addiction that they couldn't stop. In an attempt to take care of their health and quit, they would try the nicotine replacement items, such as gums and inhalers, until those became yet another addiction, this time only more expensive. There were also cryptocurrencies and stocks, wherein people just couldn't wrench their gaze away from their phones, even during meals, because market prices might shoot up. Lastly, there were video and PC games. After three days of not playing, an addict would start seeing the summoner's rift in their dreams. All these examples highlighted what addiction did to people. And the Mermaid Kingdom was no exception.

"Golly, my entire body is sore," grumbled one granny mermaid as she tapped her back with her ripped forearm. Each tap produced a loud thudding noise, much like hitting a drum. A look of dissatisfaction appeared on her face. Her back was in a great deal of pain.

Whew... I did too many dolphin kicks back when I was young! Tsk, tsk.

A wave of regret washed over the old mermaid. There was a time when her skin was tight, her muscles were firm, and she could ram into emperor whales unharmed. She mistakenly thought that her muscles would last forever and her firm, robust body would always remain strong for tens and thousands of years. But over the years, she learned that wasn't the case. Her entire body ached as soon as she hit 60 due to the strain that her gigantic muscles placed on her joints. And now, she was faced with a hellish case of arthritis.

"That sauna was very relaxing," she remarked with a tinge of nostalgia in her voice. "Don't you agree, honey?"

"Hohoho," her husband laughed boisterously. "Well, I was happy to not hear your nagging while you were at the jjimjilbang."

“Dear?” she growled and shot a look at him.

“Hmm?” replied her husband innocently.

“Are you tired of living with me?” Her eyes held a glint of anger.

“Hmm! Hmm! Ehem!” The grandpa merman hurriedly looked away, sensing danger. This deepened the wrinkles on the grandma mermaid’s face.

Whew. I wonder if there is any way the both of us could use a sauna one way or another.

She was wistful. She was happy when she was relaxing at the jjimjilbang. Her sickening joint aches could be forgotten there. But not anymore, to her utmost displeasure.

This is all because of that cheap, cold-hearted land human!

The human that constructed and ran the jjimjilbang. What was his name? Lloyd Frontera? The more her thoughts dwelled on him, the more critical she became of him.

Of course, the jjimjilbang can’t be free. He needs to receive a fee. Of course. But why does it have to be the labor of all things?! Tsk, tsk!

She’d have understood if he wanted pearls or precious clam shells. But no. The payment had to come in the form of labor hours for that human Lloyd. Otherwise, the jjimjilbang was off-limits. That was the reason why she had ripped the seaweed paper containing the terms and conditions of membership and stomped out of the jjimjilbang, foaming at her mouth. But now? Just within a few days, she began to regret her decision.

I thought I could live without it.

She was confident she’d forget the jjimjilbang after a few days and easily move on with life. But now, it turned out that wasn’t the case. Instead of forgetting it, it kept coming back to her. Its vacancy left a hole in her heart that she couldn’t live with.

This won’t do.

The granny mermaid jumped to her feet.

“Honey,” she called, “This won’t do. Stay here for a second.”

“Eh? Where are you going?”

“To the jjimjilbang.”

She herself was unsure what she’d do by going there. However, it didn’t feel right just to stay stuck at home while massaging her aching joints.

But, of course, I am not going to go use the facility and be pulled into his game.

She would just take a quick look around. That was what she’d do. There might be other merpeople like her in the same agony. Those who might be swimming around the jjimjilbang in remorse and regret like her.

I’ll just take a small peek. That’s all.

The granny mermaid was convinced that there would be no one at the jjimjilbang. There was no reason for anyone to be hovering nearby. No one in the kingdom would be as foolish as her. That was what she thought until...

What is this...

Suddenly, she felt a shaft of numbness. It turned out the jjimjilbang area was far from quiet. It was bustling with merpeople! So many merpeople were there! What was more...

“Oh my! Is that you, dear? You’re finally here!” Another granny mermaid, who was passing by with many others, beamed when she saw the old mermaid that had just arrived. They waved their fins, approached her, and rapped her shoulders. They were her friends, who were only a few years younger and would hang out with her often.

“What on earth are you all doing here?” inquired the wistful granny, her voice sharp and edgy.

“Why else?” One of them remarked. “We are here to enjoy the sauna.”

The muscles on her face tensed. “Since when have you been coming here?”

“Us? We’ve been coming here since yesterday.”

The wistful granny mermaid froze, and she didn’t respond.

“Dear?”

“You ungrateful and disloyal bunch of mermaids,” she snarled at last before wheeling around to leave.

“There, there, my dear,” one of them grabbed her. “No need to get upset. Come over here. I will massage your back. No need to pout. It will only leave wrinkles on your pretty lips. Okay?”

With that, the rest of the younger mermaids cackled and chortled as they pushed the angry granny mermaid’s back. The latter feigned her reluctance to enter by grumbling to the group, but her lips were faintly rolled upward. And with that, she processed her membership at lightning speed. Lloyd, who was manning the counter, beamed, his rewarding smile as clear and bright as a jam-packed portion of salted pollack roe.

Mwahaha. Everything is going according to plan.

In no exaggeration, it was a complete success. Lloyd cast his satisfying gaze at the table, which was piled up with a thick pile of sign-up scrolls. And his gaze then moved to the inside of the facility. It was packed with merpeople. Not a single room was vacant. The red clay room. The seawater room and sandy beach room. The extreme bungee-jump room. The merpeople were even competing to get their place. A similar sight to what he saw during the opening event for the jjimjilbang. No. There was one small thing that changed.

“Yo, Javier,” called Lloyd as he tapped the pile of scrolls.

“Yes,” said Javier, who was standing by Lloyd’s side beside the counter.

“Why don’t you go around and check the jjimjilbang rooms?”

“Check what, Master Lloyd?”

“The luminescent coral.” Lloyd’s eyes shone acutely. “There should be a few merpeople who’ve stayed here for six hours now. The luminescence on the coral around their wrist should be faded by now. Ask them if they’re going to charge it or go back home for today.”

“I see. But...” There was a heaviness in his hesitant voice.

“What’s up?”

“Do you plan on using me as a clerk now?”

“Yes.” It took him less than a second to respond.

“...”

“Look at you,” said Lloyd as he amusingly pointed his finger at Javier. “There, you’re doing it again. You’re glaring at me. Come on,” said Lloyd in an almost entreating tone. “It’s just for now. Do you see this? I’m writing a job posting. Free jjimjilbang entry while on call. Merpeople will pounce at this opportunity. Sure, it’ll take time for me to do interviews and look for the most diligent merperson out of the pool. However, I’ll pick someone soon. You got nothing to worry about.”

“Whew... I see, Master Lloyd.”

Javier sighed and started to move around, which caused an eruption of cheers from the merpeople watching him. Everyone had a wristband that contained a lump of glowing, deep-sea coral. It was designed to glow for exactly six hours, and the merpeople were given two choices when the light went out. They could extend their stay for six more hours and fill up the daily 12-hour limit or leave the facility. Those who chose the latter were asked to record their time of stay in their membership log as they left the facility to calculate the number of hours they would need to work.

“Thank you very much for visiting the deep-sea cave jjimjilbang!” shouted Lloyd.

“Not at all.” A mermaid stopped when she heard him and approached Lloyd. “Um, does this mean that I have to do my assigned work within 48 hours, just as the terms and conditions state?”

“Indeed,” Lloyd replied. “That’s exactly right.” She was a young mermaid who had just completed her first-ever sauna visit. Lloyd flashed a big smile at her. “The work site will be announced tomorrow morning, and it will be posted on the bulletin board at the jjimjilbang entrance. You can complete your labor hours according to what is written there.”

“Is there anything I should prepare in advance?” she inquired, her voice sounding anxious.

“All you need to bring is your strong body.”

Lloyd’s answer must have taken her by surprise. “My strong... body?” Her voice trembled.

“Yes. Is there anything else you need?”

“No... I understand now.”

Lloyd smiled benevolently, but the young mermaid felt a clawing sense of nervousness. The following day, the excavation began.

***

“Ehem...!” Lloyd cleared his throat to have attention drawn to himself. “Thank you very much for gathering here to pay for the jjimjilbang. As I have introduced myself before, I am Lloyd Frontera, the owner of the jjimjilbang. But today, I will be your supervisor who oversees the excavation site.”

Among about 120 merpeople gathered at the site in the early morning, one raised their hand.

“Excuse me? Excavation? What do you mean?”

“Exactly as it sounds,” Lloyd explained, “From now on, we will be shoveling to find something in the bottom of the sea.”

“Shoveling?!” the merperson repeated in shock.

“Yes, shoveling.” Lloyd nonchalantly nodded before holding up one of the clam-shell shovels he had prepared by piles in advance. They weren’t the typical shovels used at construction sites on land. They looked like those used for cleaning snow.

“This is the shovel you will be using today,” continued Lloyd, “To dig up the mud in the area I designate for all of you.”

“How will we know where to dig?” One of the gatherers inquired.

“No worries. Look over there.” Lloyd then pointed at one area.

Bzzt! A glowing straight blue line started to appear, following Lloyd’s fingers until each met and connected with one another. About 0.6 miles long and wide, it soon formed a gigantic square. This was the work of the Construction Guideline, one of the optional skills Lloyd had. The merpeople watched in sheer amazement, their eyes growing wide, and wondered if this human was a magician. They murmured among themselves and looked at each other until Lloyd’s voice interrupted them.

“Now, you can see the line I just drew for you at the bottom. Shovel the mud within the square area and get it clean. Oh, but please be careful not to break the shovel. And you must log the hours you worked. Don’t forget. If you forget to log your hours, all your hard work will be good for nothing.”

Gulp. Those last words made the merpeople tense up. Everyone resolved to log their hours of work on the card. They had to log their hours no matter what. And with that, the excavation to find the site of the jewel began.

“Okay, let’s get started!” announced Lloyd with a clap.

“Wooo!!!”

120 merpeople took action with a clam shovel in their hands. Their monstrous physique gave them a tremendous aptitude for shoveling. They swam at a speed that even dolphins couldn’t keep up with. And just like that, they pierced through the mud.

Crack! The clam shovels dug deep into the seabed, and it went in deep, much like how a bull would graze the land.

“Gwoahhh!”

Boooom! When five merpeople scratched the bottom first, a giant hole, 20 inches deep and 9.8 feet wide, appeared. Then the next five followed right away.

“Gwoahhh!”

Boooom! They dug into the same hole one more time. It went in deeper this time. Then another five came to work on the same hole. This process was repeated, the mud turning over at a marvelous speed. Lloyd found himself clenching his fists at the exhilarating sight.

This is nuts! This is totally nuts!

Their shoveling speed went beyond his imagination. Lloyd was always aware of their strength and stamina, but seeing them himself, it turned out they were better. It was like having 120 bulldozers turn over and work on the earth. Of course, Lloyd didn’t just sit back and watch while everything was unfolding.

Surveying!

[Scanning will begin.]

Bzzt!

Lloyd activated his surveying skill toward the seabed the merpeople dug, and it allowed him to look 16 feet underground.

Great. I can see deeper than before.

Since the merpeople were ridding of the thick mud carpet, Lloyd was able to take a look beneath the mud. But he couldn’t find the jewel site right away.

“Okay!” shouted Lloyd. “Let’s work harder! You may be sweating from work today, but you will be sweating at the jjimjilbang tomorrow!”

“Wooo!!!” The merpeople worked more energetically at Lloyd’s encouragement. They dug, dug, and dug until their muscles began to feel fatigued. Naturally, their worn-out muscles started to fill their head with one thing.

Whew, this is tiring. Should I stop by at the jjimjilbang before heading home and relax for just a little bit?

Like that, most merpeople headed back to the jjimjilbang after work instead of heading home. And then they found themselves being welcomed by Lloyd, who was just back at the construction site to supervise the labor. But this time, he was before them as the owner of the jjimjilbang.

“My! Welcome, my dear customers!” beamed Lloyd with a delightful smile on his face.

The merpeople sensed something was wrong but soon pushed away the thought and decided to hit the bath and sauna pronto, relieving their pent-up fatigue after a day of labor. The next day, however, they had to sweat and work again to pay for enjoying the facility the previous day, only for the drudgery at the site to helplessly remind them of the relaxing bath and sauna. And so, they unwound at the jjimjilbang again, which only spelled more gruesome work. Work. Unwind. Work. Unwind. It was an endless cycle. The merpeople finally came to a realization.

What should I do? I can’t... free myself from this vicious cycle!

They relaxed in the jjimjilbang. They toiled until fatigue ushered them back into the facility again. And another toil was due. Yes. This was a vicious cycle, a drug that was impossible to stop! And just like that, while the merpeople were stuck in a cycle of working and going to the jjimjilbang, the construction site ran very smoothly under Lloyd’s command. The number of merpeople he pulled in through his plan increased, and their excavation range grew larger with each passing day. The range for Lloyd’s surveying also expanded just as much. And two months later...

Oh...!

At last, something caught his eye.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 267: Distinguish Yourself (1)

Moments of realization often came without any warning. There were many of these moments throughout history. For instance, when Archimedes shouted, "Eureka!" after discovering the principle of buoyancy, when Galileo Galilei discovered the moons orbiting around Jupiter, or when someone found a 50-dollar bill in their coat after a year. Big and small discoveries emerged at the most unexpected times. And today. Lloyd, too, experienced this same phenomenon.

Oh...?

Lloyd opened his eyes wide. It had been two months since he supervised the construction site. Every day, hundreds of merpeople were mobilized to sweep and search the seabed of the Arctic Ocean. But nothing was found even with Lloyd’s surveying and subterranean scanning skill as they diligently removed countless layers of mud. They couldn’t find a single artifact, let alone the location of the jewel. As he was starting to grow tired, something began to emerge.

It can’t be.

He wasn’t very far from the Mermaid Kingdom, and this location looked nothing special on the outside. It was just a vast plain under the sea. But as soon as the merpeople cleared the mud, his surveying skill caught something beneath the ground.

There’s a stratum, but this looks too sleek. It’s almost like the structure was man-made.

When that realization hit him, Lloyd yelled, “Wait! Everybody stop working!”

The busy shoveling came to a halt. Lloyd removed everyone at the site, and he furrowed his brows, putting his eyes into focus. He carefully walked toward the area where the artificial stratum was. Once he got close, he was able to get a more detailed view.

I’m sure of it. That looks like a stratum, but it’s not that. This is some sort of foundation constructed by man.

About 10 feet below the cleared seabed, there appeared a strange-looking foundation. It had a perfectly square shape as if someone had poured cement on the ground. In particular, the upper area was excessively sleek to the point that it seemed unnatural. So, that could only be...

I think it’s the foundation of a building. But doesn’t seem to be made of rebar concrete. Hmm, I wonder if this is the result of stacking flat and smooth rocks together.

It appeared so. His heart started to race.

He said that the Jewel of Truth was a building.

Perhaps that really could be the foundation of the Jewel of Truth. It seemed that the two months they spent on excavation weren’t meaningless after all.

If we’ve found the location of the jewel’s site, then the most important part is what we do from here on out.

Lloyd’s eyes became focused. And he became more mindful of his movements with the shovel.

Psh! Crack! He dug the seafloor. Heavily at first. But around the time the foundation was about to reveal itself, he moved with even more caution like he was scooping up a grain of rice. And for the final sweep, he used his hands to dust the top portion of the foundation. Sometime later, he finally succeeded in exposing most of the top portion without any damage.

“This is the real one...” murmured Lloyd as he rose.

Lloyd instantly knew now that he could see the foundation up close. This wasn’t a natural formation. It was a foundation built by someone with a clear purpose in mind.

This could be the foundation for the Jewel of Truth.

Lloyd’s eyes became more focused. Now that he confirmed it was a man-made structure, it was time to check whether it was truly a part of the Jewel of Truth.

“Um, Mister Rotorua?” called Lloyd aloud.

“Yeah? Yeah?!” Rotorua, who was nervously observing Lloyd from afar, immediately swam to Lloyd’s side when he was called.

“What do you think this is?” asked Lloyd as he pointed at the ground.

Rotorua observed before he finally said, “I have no idea, but...”

“But what?” hurried Lloyd.

“If this is the one we are looking for, there should be a symbol somewhere on this foundation. The records tell us so.”

“What symbol?”

“One that looks like a starfish with sharp edges.”

“I see.” Lloyd and Rotorua started dusting every surface in search of the symbol. Several minutes later...

I found it!

Indeed, there it was. At the corner of the foundation was a starfish symbol as big as the palm of his hand. Yet to be satisfied with the finding, Lloyd’s gaze continued to move across the surface of the structure.

Of course. There’s more I need to do than just discover the location of the jewel.

Lloyd wasn’t an archeologist. Discovering the Jewel of the Truth site and discussing its academic values and whatnot were entirely irrelevant to Lloyd. What he needed was the Jewel of Truth that could be used immediately, not just its foundation structure.

I have to find the blueprint.

Lloyd turned and said, “Um, Mister Rotorua?”

But when Lloyd turned around, to his surprise, he found Rotorua wailing and crying his heart out.

“Stop crying and look at me,” demanded Lloyd.

Rotorua nodded and tried to control himself, only to give way to overwhelming emotions again. “I... It’s just... I feel overwhelmed...” He sniffled heavily in between his words.

Could it be due to the joy of finding the site of the jewel at last? Rotorua was weeping his heart out as he clapped his face with his hands, like someone who won their first lottery ticket amidst drowning in crippling rent and loans. Lloyd eventually let Rotorua have his moment until he calmed down.

“Ehem. Hmm! I am sorry for the sudden display of emotions,” Rotorua finally said in an embarrassed voice. He wiped his eyes.

“Don’t be,” comforted Lloyd, “I fully understand you. But the thing is, didn’t you say that the blueprint would be here at the site?”

“Oh, I did.”

“Then where is it?”

The blueprint was the most important thing here. Finding the site location was only half of the job. The Jewel of Truth could only be restored to its original shape with a blueprint. Only then could Lloyd ask the jewel about how to stop the restoration of destiny.

Without it, everything would have been a waste.

But there was nothing in sight that remotely looked like a blueprint. Nervousness started to creep up on Lloyd. Rotorua, on the other hand, was unperturbed.

“Oh,” Rotorua said in a casual voice, “The blueprint is here. The record says that it is right here.” He then pointed at the starfish symbol. “The record about the symbol was discovered by one of my ancestors in the sixteenth generation of my family. According to it, the blueprint is said to be hidden in the starfish symbol.”

“In this symbol?” asked Lloyd.

“Yes. All it needs is just some pressure... Let’s see.” Rotorua dropped to a crouch and started to run his hands over the symbol before he pressed the center of it.

Clack.

And then...

Ruuumble! Like a morning alarm, the foundation structure started to vibrate with great force, which caused a resonation in the seawater around them. The tremors gradually traveled farther and farther across the ground.

“Oh, wow.”

Lloyd clenched his fists at the magnificent resonation shaking the entire sea. This grand effect could only mean that he succeeded in finding what he was looking for. An ember of hope was ignited in his heart. But at the same hour, miles away from the excavation site, a mysterious resonation began to occur in the stomach of the Kraken, the gigantic octopus that protected the eggs that contained the whole kingdom.

***

Voooooooo!

“K-Krurung?”

The Kraken was utterly shocked. How could it not? It was in the middle of a peaceful nap, going about its day like usual, when a violent vibration assaulted its stomach.

“Krung? Krurung?”

It was flustered. Its stomach knotted up, but it didn’t know why. It didn’t know that an object was lodged in between the villus of its fifth stomach. The object resonated in line with the vibration of the jewel’s foundation from miles away. The Kraken was utterly clueless about what was happening and seriously dismayed.

“Krururng! Krung! Krung!”

It coughed aloud and even violently shook its body. Still, the forceful and sudden tremors didn’t lessen. No. It only grew more tumultuous. It was a stifling feeling as if its stomach and intestines were tangled in a knot.

“Krurung!”

The Kraken’s screams grew louder. The strong yearning to move violently and writhe up and down rushed over the octopus. That seemed like a good way to alleviate the excruciating and splitting pain inside it. The Kraken deliberated until it reached a conclusion. It must not move mindlessly. Moving the mountainous body that wrapped the eggs of the Mermaid Kingdom would only inflict severe damage to the place. As such, the Kraken frantically struggled to endure the pain.

“K-Krurung!”

It roared. It flexed its stomach to suppress the churning. But later, it reached the point where it couldn’t endure the sensation any longer.

Voooooooo! The resonation in its fifth stomach became fiercer. The vibration was so fierce and terrifying that its desperate will couldn’t contain the octopus any longer.

“Krurung!”

At last, its body, which was over several miles long, convulsed reflexively to the pain. Soon, the eggs that contained the city of the merpeople scattered in all directions after being separated from the octopus’s tentacles that were wrapped around them.

***

Boooom!

“Eh...?” Queen Kiakora stopped dead in her tracks. She was deliberating on the matter of the Hell gate opening up in the sky and ways to solve the problem when the egg that contained the palace was hit with a great force. Thump! Boooom!

“What is happening?”

A look of dismay came over her face. The whole palace tilted to one side. No, she realized that it was not the palace but the whole egg that contained the palace that was thrown off balance. Just then…

“My queen! The outside of the egg! Something terrible has happened!” One of the servants hurriedly swam to her side, and in an urgent voice, she added, “The Kraken! It has started to go berserk!”

“What?!” shrieked the queen. “The Kraken?”

“Yes, Your Majesty! We do not know the cause. It was said that it screamed several times and started to writhe its entire body and go berserk!”

“How could this be happening...?” The queen furrowed her brows. The report was hard to believe. The Kraken was an old friend of her people. It had been with the merpeople for several generations, long before she hatched out of her egg.

The Kraken was hatched on the same day as the most respected queen Houhora and they grew up together. It even fought with us shoulder to shoulder in the expeditionary battle in the desert during our punitive expedition against the dragon, Kaisertus. It has been protecting us ever since then for generations. And now it is going on a rampage?

She couldn’t wrap her head around this. Was it betrayal? A sudden awakening of its wild instincts? That made even less sense.

There must be a reason.

The Kraken would never run amok without a reason. It wasn’t the kind to harm the race this thoughtlessly. Having drawn such a conclusion, the queen ordered in a calm voice, “I see. But since it appears it is not safe here, everyone must evacuate. Now.”

“I will get to it right away, Your Majesty!”

At her command, the servants around her sides and the guards darted out of the palace. They swam faster than they ever had in their entire lives. Once they swam out of the egg, they were able to get a full view of the situation.

“The eggs of the kingdom are...”

They were all scattering away. Like pollack eggs thrown into a fast current of water, hundreds and thousands of eggs that had been held tightly together were being scattered away, each drifting, falling, rolling, and crashing. There was only one cause for this.

“Krurung!”

The Kraken was roaring and going berserk. It was violently wielding its eight legs that used to grip the eggs into one tight case and twisting and turning its body that extended over a few miles long. Its terrible writhing caused the eggs to disperse across the sea and be sucked into a violent current of water.

Whoosh! Just then, one of the eggs was caught in the current hurtled in the queen’s direction. With a diameter of over 650 feet, it was a pretty big one among the city eggs.

“My queen!”

“Duck!” The servants on both of her sides shrilled in panic, but the queen didn’t listen to them. Although she was slightly dazed by the overwhelming and unexpected violence of the Kraken, she soon recovered from her shock.

“Hmph!” She gave a rough snort, and a glint of resolution appeared in her eyes as she glared at the egg flying in her way. Anaconda-thick veins bulged in her forearm, biceps, triceps, and delts, and soon her chest, stomach, and back popped as though an armor was put on her. And she immediately hurtled toward the egg.

“As if I could turn a blind eye and swim away when the land of my people is flying at me!” She opened her arms wide and took the brunt of the egg with her pecs.

Boooom! Having received the full force of the 656-foot egg loaded with buildings, her body was shoved about 320 yards backward. Even so, she kept moving her fins at an explosive speed and with incredible power.

“Argh... Ah... Aaargh!!”

Rumble...! The veins all over her body now thickened like a python, but still, the egg was relentless, doggedly shoving the queen back with its ferocious speed and weight.

“Arggh!”

The queen’s face reddened, and right at the moment when the thought of being crushed to death crossed her mind...

“My queen!”

Suddenly, she heard someone shout beside her. She reflexively looked at her side as her body trembled from head to toe. And then she saw who it was.

“I may not be much, but I will help you!!! Argh!!!”

It was the man from the land. Lloyd Frontera. He was at her side, stopping the egg with both hands. He looked desperate to provide aid to her, and his whole body screamed, “I am going to help you!”

“Human?” she panted, “Why? But you are a foreigner.”

“If you’re asking me why I’m helping out! My answer is that I have no reason!”

“No reason?”

“Yes, Your Majesty! “What reason do you need to help someone in crisis?!” Lloyd yelled louder. His response tugged at her heartstrings. Of course, she was left completely in the dark about one thing. She had no idea that Lloyd was pretending to help by barely touching the egg. She was unaware that Lloyd was faking it. She was clueless that, even amid this unexpected turn of events, Lloyd had a scheme in mind.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 268: Distinguish Yourself (2)

“What reason do you need to help someone in crisis?!”

“...”

Lloyd’s unexpected response surprised Queen Kiakora, and she clamped her mouth shut. She fell into a daze.

This human. Who is he?

Just then, the warnings of the previous generations of queens came to her mind. Do not trust the land humans. They are absolute opportunists. If something involves money or benefits them, they don’t even think twice about betraying their friends and anyone else. But then, at the prospect of another gain, they’ll team up again. They are an incorrigible existence. That was what all of her ancestors had advised.

But this human...

He seemed slightly different from what she was told. Even though they were faced with an extremely precarious situation, this human named Lloyd Frontera immediately rushed and stood by her side to hold up the gigantic egg with her. This situation and undeniable fact brought a flood of emotions to her heart.

“All right. Human Lloyd Frontera. I will accept your help.”

“Thank you so much!” shouted Lloyd, recognizing a slight tremble in the queen’s voice. He wondered if it was because she was straining to use all of her strength or because she was filled with gratitude toward him. Whatever it was, a proud smile hung on Lloyd’s face.

Great. That’s one big crisis avoided. At least for now.

Lloyd quickly stole a glance at the queen. Red-faced. Pumped muscles. She was giving her all to stop this gigantic ball of an egg. Whereas he was...

standing next to her with his arms also outstretched to push against the egg. However, more precisely, he was only pretending as he just touched the egg with his hands and let out groans of struggle. Of course, there was a reason behind Lloyd's actions.

Of course. I don't know what exactly happened, but the monster started to go wild after I discovered the foundation of the jewel. It was at the same time as when the vibrations began.

Just then, Lloyd's mind flew back to the previous events. He finally discovered the foundation of the jewel. Rotorua fidgeted it around to activate the blueprint. It was a success. And then came a rumbling noise and powerful vibration. The water around the foundation fiercely trembled. Lloyd was very certain of it. He had found the Jewel of Truth. He was happy. But his happiness was short-lived.

The Kraken went on a rampage.

Although he was several miles away from the Mermaid Kingdom, Lloyd got a vivid look at the Kraken in a frenzy. It was because of the subtle glow in the eggs that made up the Mermaid Kingdom.

The Kraken roared, and it started to dance as if it was going mad.

In the wake of that, the eggs were crushed into pieces and scattered across the water. The sight was akin to a portion of salted pollack roe falling apart from someone's clumsy attempt at using chopsticks.

And I dashed here as soon as I caught sight of what was happening.

His instinct tingled as soon as he saw the Kraken going rampant. The resonance from activating the foundation of the jewel was related to what was happening at the moment. The timing was too perfect for Lloyd to dismiss it. It was very likely he might be held responsible for the Kraken's savage behavior and the Mermaid Kingdom's possible demise.

It was Rotorua who activated it, but I, too, am responsible since I supervised the job. So I can't turn a blind eye now.

Did he feel a sense of responsibility? Fixing what was wrong? Neither of the two reasons was his reason for helping.

Like I care about taking responsibility! I just don't want to get killed by the queen, who'll for sure throw a punch to my gut once she finds out I'm the one behind this mess!

That scenario was plausible enough. What if a future investigation revealed that the cause behind this chaos was the excavation of the jewel's lot? The merpeople would demand Lloyd to be held liable. If that happened, he'd have no excuses for his guilt.

Obviously, I won't be able to exonerate myself. I was the one who ran the jjimjilbang and mobilized the merpeople to the site. And hundreds of merpeople were there when the jewel was discovered. They'll act as witnesses. This means that I can't bury this incident even if I want to.

So what would happen if things settled down at the current flow of events and the time came to clarify who needed to be held responsible? Lloyd believed justice would be served, and he would take the full blow.

That's why I'm buttering her up in advance! I'll pretend to actively offer my support to resolve this mess and gain some merit! This way, I'll earn some brownie points from her too!

That would minimize the amount of criticism he'd receive down the road and allow him to avoid getting his gut-punched by the queen. And at the least, he wouldn't be banished from the kingdom.

I can't be banished after finally finding the jewel's lot.

He had discovered the jewel after a great length of struggle and couldn't get himself kicked out of this place. When he thought about all the time and effort he'd assiduously invested until now, he had to do something to avoid getting expelled from this kingdom. After making some calculations, Lloyd yelled, "My queen! Please push a little harder! On my count!"

"Argh!" Queen Kiakora groaned. "On your count?!"

“Yes! So, push harder when I tell you! Push!”

“Argh!” Her veins were enlarged.

“Push!”

“Gargh!” Lloyd shouted while pretending to flex his muscles, cheering the queen on. It was similar to the sudden surge of strength that occurred when a personal trainer at a gym supported someone using a bell bar to get in another rep or as if a supernatural force was helping someone lift a 44-lb weight at the gym. The egg started to slow down at last.

Grrrr...

“We’re doing good! A little more! One!” Lloyd bawled.

“Arggh!” she boomed.

“Push!”

“Gargh!!”

Boom!

The queen’s pecs and triceps inflated as if they were ready to burst. And at last, the tyrannous egg stopped, proving once again the monstrous strength and majestic nature of the queen, the leader of the incredibly ripped race of merpeople.

“Ha... Ha...” panted Lloyd, wiping his forehead for effect. “Your Majesty, are you all right?”

“Of course,” replied the queen as she looked back at Lloyd. Her face was still red. She placed her pot-like rough hand on Lloyd’s shoulder. “I was this close to being crushed into the ground. Thank you. It could have been dangerous without your help.”

“Whew!” panted Lloyd still. “Do not be, Your Majesty. I merely supported you with my small amount of strength.” Lloyd pretended to collect his breath. It was a relief.

One egg was stopped. Moreover, it appeared that the queen hadn’t seen through him.

Great. I earned some brownie points from her for now.

But he needed much more. Much more brownie points, and more good impressions. That would be the only way he could use the jewel without getting lashed out by the merpeople.

That means I’ll have to accomplish something greater to solve this problem.

Lloyd’s calm gaze raked over the Kraken. Its trunk was so large, it was impossible to determine the size. Similarly, its legs were much too thick and long to estimate the measurements.

“Krururung!”

At another roar, the whole sea shook. Each time it twisted its body, more eggs bounced off in all directions. Lloyd felt a pang of remorse that was as bitter as a cup of espresso.

This chaos looks impossible to resolve.

That was how different the scale of the commotion was. And yet, the courage among the merpeople was also on a level beyond Lloyd’s expectations.

“Sisters! Rise!”

“Sister! Take my hand!”

“Brother! Trust me and grab me tight!”

Every merperson acted with composure, despite that they were unexpectedly thrown into this unprecedented commotion by the Kraken, the guardian of their city. They weren’t in a state of terror. Instead, they took charge of the situation, uniting as one.

“Everyone! I’m sure we all saw the example set by the queen! Let us follow her lead!”

“Wooo!!!”

Hundreds of merpeople teamed up to save the flying eggs and rescued the merpeople floundering inside them. The rescued individuals recuperated soon and joined in on the ongoing effort. And within 30 minutes, the merpeople safely managed to save thousands of eggs and their residential areas, placing all of them at the bottom of the sea. Then they encircled the frenzied Kraken together. However, they didn’t resort to violence right away.

Of course! The Kraken is our friend!

Even though its anomalous behavior damaged their houses and scattered tens of thousands of eggs, which translates to back-breaking labor and exorbitant money for reconstruction, the merpeople regarded the sea monster as their friend. They believed that this was an honest mistake and that there must be a reason behind its troubling behavior. And so, they agreed that it had to be appeased first. They gathered around, and in the most genuine manner, they sang, forming a choir of merpeople. Their melody softly caressed the sea and comforted the Kraken. Lloyd, who was seeing this, became keenly aware of one thing.

“They can’t sing, either!” Lloyd yelled, which came out inadvertently. He thought it was unfair.

What the heck! Their tune and rhythm are completely wrong! They didn’t have any right to judge me for being a bad singer!

Truly, their singing was horrendous. If they were brought to karaoke in South Korea, they would have enough energy to make the tambourines and flashing lights in the room seem dull. Anyone listening to them would want to divert their attention toward something else, such as a leaflet, remote controller, or a poster with the top song chart on the wall. But before Lloyd could voice out his bitterness, he was interrupted by the queen.

“They cannot sing, huh?” mused Queen Kiakora. “To your human ears, does our singing sound bad?”

“Oh, eh? That’s...” mumbled Lloyd, rebuking himself for forgetting the queen nearby.

“But you just shouted that they cannot.” Her gaze bore into Lloyd.

“Ahaha,” Lloyd quickly worked on his face to hide his emotion. “To be honest, I said so because I felt a sense of camaraderie.”

The queen cocked her head to the side. “Camaraderie?”

“I, too, am considered tone-deaf in my world.”

“Are you now?” Her tone indicated she wasn’t very convinced.

“Yes,” said Lloyd with a nod.

“But you seemed very upset a moment ago.”

“Yes. I couldn’t help but remember the judgmental gazes I received from others in the past...” Lloyd observed her face, and before the queen could say anything, he butt in as he pointed at the Kraken. “Oh, look! It looks like the singing isn’t comforting the monster!”

It was true. At first, the song seemed to calm the monster down, but that was only for a second.

“Krurung! Krung!”

Could it be that something else was bothering the monster? It twisted its body like a snake and roared, this time moving even more uncontrollably than before. The mermaid queen’s face darkened.

“The Kraken... refused our request for reconciliation.”

Could she be feeling the same rejection you feel when your trusted friend refuses to handshake you? There was sadness in her hard and stern gaze.

“Human Lloyd Frontera, step back.” Her voice was cold and emotionless.

“Pardon? What do you plan on doing?” asked Lloyd.

“Plan, my foot. Now that the Kraken has refused, we must fight.”

“Fight? With that thing?”

“Yes,” the queen replied with a wistful look on her face. “Our friend is going mad. We tried to reason with it, but that didn’t work. What should come next?”

“Um,” observed Lloyd, “Roll up your sleeves and suppress it?”

“Yes. That is my plan.”

Fwipp! As soon as she was done talking, she moved her fin for some powerful dolphin kicks, creating a whirling storm around that sucked everything, including Lloyd.

Ack!

It felt as though he was being thrown into a dryer. Lloyd was only able to recover his position after Javier came to the rescue. Meanwhile, the queen was already miles away from him.

“Kru-rururung! Krung!” Its roar terrorized the deep sea.

The Mermaid Corps formed a file to fight against their friend. In minutes, the Kraken and the Mermaid Corps, who both used to be friends, were about to clash. Why? All because Lloyd had activated the foundation of the jewel. But he wasn’t the type to feel guilty about it. To be technically correct, he didn’t have the time to feel guilty.

It can’t let a fight develop like this. If the jewel’s foundation gets destroyed... Then I’m screwed!

Lloyd became a bundle of nerves as he imagined it happening in his head. He knew that this concern was very likely to happen.

The jewel's foundation is just a few miles away from where we're at.

It wasn't actually that close, at least from Lloyd's perspective. But from the Kraken's perspective, it sure was.

The Kraken can reach the lot by outstretching just one of its legs just like when someone reaches for the TV remote control in front of them from their sofa.

With just one stretch of its leg, it would be able to touch the jewel's lot. And if that happened, the foundation of the jewel would easily break like a potato chip under a pair of dress shoes. It would get crushed in one blow. And along with it, his solution to find a way to stop the restoration of destiny from plaguing his life would get crushed.

That can't happen!!

Lloyd shook his head as he let his imagination fly.

I have to prevent a clash between them. But what should I do? What am I supposed to do?

Lloyd's clenched fists started to get sweaty. He racked his brain for a solution, going over the events in his head. The Kraken started to go on a rampage after the resonation flew out from the jewel site. And it wouldn't listen to the merpeople's soft words of persuasion and restraint. Now, the Mermaid Corps was seconds away from laying an all-out attack. Seeing them, Lloyd cudgeled his brain, observing the situation for any clues, even a small one. And at that moment...

"Kru-rururung! Krung... Krugh! Krung!"

Tumble! The Kraken's whole body gave a strange, sudden jerk as it roared within the merpeople's net. And then it let out a familiar noise at the end of its roar.

Buuurp!..

"..."

Just then, a thought crossed Lloyd’s mind.

“Wait, did it just burp?”

Ding! A light bulb lit up in his head! The burping, writhing, and commotion. The Kraken’s behaviors started to piece together in his head, and from then on, he had a realization. He saw where the octopus’s legs were tapping itself and the silent gesture it made as it writhed. And the seemingly intentional burping. When he put everything together, he recalled a familiar experience he had. At last, he found the answer.

Hold on. Does the Kraken have an upset stomach?!

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 269: How to Treat an Upset Stomach (1)

An upset stomach. It was a painful experience everyone had at some point in their lives. It came at the most unexpected moments without any warning. Your stomach suddenly churned before making you tap your midsection in a desperate attempt to facilitate digestion and whatnot. Lloyd, too, experienced this before.

It was during a high school field trip. Dammit.

The mere recollection of the event made him shudder. It must have been the first night. He was about to hang out with his friends after dinner when his stomach started to feel weird. At first, he didn't think much about it. But his bowel situation grew worse, making him nauseous and break out in a cold sweat. His clueless friends teased him for getting so pale. That was when Lloyd figured that something was wrong, that he had to do something. But more than that, he wanted to burp.

That was why I looked for a fizzy drink.

He heard that drinking a fizzy drink wasn't a good way to soothe an upset stomach. It could worsen the pain. But Lloyd didn't know this back then. All he wanted was to chug down a drink and let out an almighty burp to relieve his stomach. And as luck would have it, he found a cider in his friend's bag. Popping the lid of the sixteen-ounce bottle, Lloyd guzzled the drink, only to sputter it out.

It was soju.

Soju in a cider bottle. It was one of the contraband goods his friend trafficked away from the teacher's radar. It was too late by the time Lloyd realized. Though he spat the alcohol out, he had taken several sips already. Soju on top of the upset stomach. His first ever drinking. From then on, he felt a clawing sense of nausea in his stomach, as if a nuclear bomb had been dropped there. Lloyd vomited and retched through the night, feeling dizzy and groggy. Thus, the mere recollection of his first-ever school trip brought that sense of despair back to his present self. But thankfully, his moment of recollection didn’t last long, thanks to the question that interrupted his thoughts.

“So, the Kraken is acting up because it has an upset stomach?”

Lloyd was jostled out of his trance when his ears picked up the question, and he looked at the source. The mermaid queen was there. Deep furrows between her brows. And she was staring at Lloyd with a grim and flustered gaze.

“Oh, that’s right,” nodded Lloyd, and it was then he refocused on his present situation. The Kraken had gone rampant. The Mermaid Corps stood by to lay a forcible attack on it. He had been anxious about the possible damages to the jewel foundation. His realization that something was off about the monster. The octopus dry heaved and retched. It even rubbed its stomach with its legs. These were the typical behaviors of a human with an upset stomach.

Once it became clear to Lloyd, he had hurriedly swam to the queen’s and shouted at the latter, who was about to order the merpeople to charge forward. He begged her to wait as the Kraken might be in trouble. They needed to find a solution other than having an armed fight. He stopped her and managed to hold off the attack for some time.

“An upset stomach?” the queen inquired as she stared gravely at Lloyd. “That means it is suffering from indigestion. Is this true?”

“It appears so, indeed,” Lloyd said.

“What is your proof of that?” she demanded.

“I have been watching the Kraken retch while it roared. I also spotted it dry heaving a few times. Furthermore, look at how it rubs its stomach with its legs while writhing and then retches again. This seems like a typical case of an upset stomach, don’t you think?”

“Hmm... I do not know. We don’t get upset stomachs.” The queen pumped her pecs each. “Can you not relieve them with muscular strength?”

“Um,” Lloyd hesitated, “The stomach muscles are involuntary and can’t be moved at will.”

“Who cares?” puffed the queen. “All you need to do is to press your stomach with your abs.”

Lloyd was utterly speechless.

Might as well say that you can use your brain by flexing the muscles on your scalp!

However, Lloyd couldn’t voice his thoughts out loud. It wasn’t really because he was scared of getting punched. Rather, he was rather afraid to see her brazenly answer that it could be done. Her answer would surely make anatomists foam at their mouths. Lloyd shook off his dismay by shaking his head.

“No, haah, anyway,” insisted Lloyd, “I believe this is a case of an upset stomach from what I see. You may not be familiar with it, but humans like us get an upset stomach from time to time.”

“Do you think that the Kraken has an upset stomach based on your experiences?” considered the queen gravely.

“Indeed, that’s correct.”

“Hmm. Is that so?” Thankfully, it appeared that the queen, though still half in doubt, was considering Lloyd’s opinion. This was a golden opportunity, but her doubts could quickly turn into full-blown suspicion.

Sensing it, Lloyd immediately said, “Yes, so it will be better to confirm this possibility first.”

“Check it?”

“Yes. You must confirm first before trying to respond.”

“But how do we confirm it? Do you have a plan in mind?”

“I do.” Lloyd nodded. Surely, there was. He had thought of one before he desperately swam to stop the queen’s order to charge forward. “Is there a food or snack the Kraken likes?”

“Hm, there is. But why do you ask?”

“If you give me that information, you will be able to confirm what is happening.”

“How?” The queen was confused as to where Lloyd was getting at.

“If it does not have an upset stomach, it will still react violently to your snack.”

“And what if it has an upset stomach?” Her gaze grew icy.

Lloyd replied confidently, “At first, it will stop and show interest in your snack as usual. But soon, it will retch and turn away, only to throw another fit.”

“Then,” summarized the queen, “The key is whether it goes on rampant right away or after showing initial interest. Am I right?”

“Yes, that is a precise summary,” conceded Lloyd with a smile.

“Great. Let us do it.”

“Do you plan on trying it yourself, my queen?”

“Who else will do it if not me?” The queen looked down at Lloyd with a relaxed smile unique to the powerful. “Who can get close to the savage Kraken? Me. Who can swim the fastest in this sea and dolphin-kick without being swept away by the current? Me. Lastly, who can best endure the blows from the Kraken? Me.”

The queen pounded her chest muscles as if her answer was obvious. “Should I send out a frail merperson who is weaker than me instead? One of my vulnerable people? Not in a thousand years. I must step forward for a matter like this. That is the responsibility and duty of someone on the throne.”

“Oh? Okay...”

“Or did you mean to test it out yourself?”

“No.” Lloyd blurted at lightning speed. Thankfully, it didn’t look like she thought about sending him there, for she merely chuckled. And then something came out of her pocket.

Noticing that it was a shiny light green marble, Lloyd asked curiously, “What is that?”

“A marine diamond,” replied the queen, her voice completely relaxed.

“I have never heard of it before.”

“If you take a regular diamond to the deepest part of the sea and squeeze in with all your strength for ten days in that terrifying water pressure, it becomes this unique jewel. Even I can only make a few stones a year. That is how exhausting the process is.”

“Th-Then it must be extremely expensive,” commented Lloyd, gulping as he spoke.

“That’s right. It probably is one of the most expensive stones in the world. That is why the Kraken loves it so much.”

“...” Lloyd almost told her that he’d be her Kraken instead of that gigantic octopus head. That was how marvelous the marine diamond was.

“Then I will go confirm what is happening. Everyone! Standby!”

The queen then swam toward the Kraken as it continued throwing a fit.

“...”

Was it in great pain and discomfort? Was the human right about it having an upset stomach? The queen felt apologetic.

If the human is right, then it only means that I, who have spent my entire life by your side, had a harder time understanding you than that mere man.

The queen wondered if she had gotten arrogant as she was always with the Kraken and became used to its presence. Had she failed to notice the agony it was in that even strangers could easily see? What if, out of her ignorance, she tried to suppress her precious friend by force? The queen swam over to the Kraken's side, reflecting on her actions.

"Kru-rururung!"

The Kraken let out a cry, which was now more sorrowful when it felt her near. Their eyes met. She instantly knew.

The Kraken is sorry for all this.

The Kraken's gaze was filled with remorse. At the same time, it was filled with pain and dismay.

Is what the human said really correct?

Biting her bottom lip, she inched closer to the Kraken and held out her palm with the marine diamond on top.

"Kraken? Do you want this? This is your favorite snack," the queen carefully said.

Thump! Thump! She hoped that the human would be right. She prayed that her friend would react the way the human said it would. She yearned direly in her heart. Some seconds later, the Kraken froze.

"Krung?" Sniff! Sniff! Sniff! The octopus stopped its violent fit and brought its head closer to the diamond before smelling it. Some seconds later...

"Krung! Kruru... Blargh! Krung!"

It violently retched, even spitting out a bit of stomach acid. And then it resumed its frenzy.

Whoosh! Because of its gigantic size, a small movement from the Kraken covered a wide distance.

"...!"

The queen closely avoided its leg by dolphin-kicking herself away from the spot. At last, she confirmed Lloyd's suspicion.

Ha... That human was right.

Even on her way here, she had been half in doubt. But upon confirming it herself, he was right. The Kraken showed initial interest in her offering but soon retched. It even burped and spat out stomach acid. The confirmation brought a sense of relief to her heart.

It's a relief. The Kraken had a reason for this behavior.

She couldn't have been more shocked at first. The Kraken had never caused such a commotion like the one today throughout the history of the Mermaid Kingdom. It was always a peaceful and gentle creature. So the entire situation threw her into a pit of confusion. That was until now, when she confirmed the reason for its strange behavior was an upset stomach. This joyful realization lifted the weight of confusion from her shoulders. Now, she only had to devise a solution for the issue, and a ray of hope that this unprecedented situation could be handled appeared. Now that the cause behind the incident was found, she wasn't as helpless anymore.

But...

As the queen fiercely swam away from the Kraken, sadness came to her eyes.

I am sorry, my friend.

She had been ignorant of her friend's pain. Instead, in her dismay, she almost suppressed it with force. A twinge of guilt for not recognizing her friend’s sadness and difficulty gripped her. Simultaneously, she resolved that she would never let the Kraken be in pain again. She was ready to care for and dispel all the suffering it was going through. There wouldn’t be any challenges or hurdles that could stop her from that goal. Come hell or water, she was ready to relieve the pain of her friend.

Whatever the cost is!

Several drops of tears flowed along the current that appeared as the muscular queen swam by. Hiding her reddened eyes, she came back and asked Lloyd, “You saw the Kraken’s reaction, didn’t you?”

“Yes, of course,” answered Lloyd with a nod. The queen now felt a swelling sense of confidence in this human, who used to be nothing but a frail and scrawny figure in her eyes. She used to even feel pity toward him for having to live with such a weak body. But now, it was different. She couldn’t consider him to be any more reliable. The smile on his face. The confident gaze in his eyes. It all exuded a sense of trustworthiness.

“Do you have a solution to relieve its upset stomach?”

“Very well, I do,” Lloyd answered right away as if he had been waiting for her to ask.

The queen’s face lit up, and she thought to herself that he indeed had a plan. Everything was all good. She didn’t have anything to worry about from now on. Her precious friend wouldn’t be in pain anymore, and nothing would ever hurt it again. She was relieved. Confident. At that moment, she heard Lloyd casually state the solution he thought of.

“The best thing to do when you have an upset stomach is to mercilessly prick your fingertip to let the blood out!”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 270: How to Treat an Upset Stomach (2)

“The best thing to do when you have an upset stomach is to mercilessly prick your fingertip to let the blood out!”

“...”

Bubble... A current of cold water swooshed past Lloyd and Queen Kiakora, its bubbles awkwardly drifting upward. The queen burst out laughing.

“Ha!” Dismay came over her. What did she just hear? But her ears were fine. What she just heard was utterly unbelievable. “Prick... a finger?” stammered the queen.

“Yes.” Lloyd confidently nodded. “The thing is, when you’re having an upset stomach, you’ve got to tie your finger and prick it with a needle!”

“And with a needle?!” The queen looked at her finger in greater confusion. “Fingers? I should prick them?”

“Yes,” answered Lloyd casually.

“Will any finger do?”

“No.” Lloyd shook his head. Pointing to the tip of his finger, he gravely said, “Do you see here? This is where the root is. Stab it! Give a prick! Then...”

“Then what?”

“You will see blood. Dark blood.”

“And after that?” Her voice was still filled with doubt.

“Remove the thread from your fingers and rub the back. That will cause it to burp.”

“But the Kraken already burped earlier-”

“It’s different,” Lloyd politely explained. “How do I say it? It’s this deep burp that comes from within.”

Gaping at Lloyd, Queen Kiakora seriously deliberated whether this human being was a quack from the land or a malicious imposter. But she soon shook her head, pushing her bad thoughts away.

No. He was the only one who knew that indigestion was the reason behind this mess.

On top of that, this was coming from a guy who had experience with this matter. The queen decided to believe in him a little more. She would remain skeptical but hear him out. Having decided, she asked, “Okay, let us say that the upset stomach will be gone by... pricking one of its fingers with a needle. But we are talking about the Kraken here. It does not have any hands. Do you plan to prick the ends of its legs?”

“Yes.” Lloyd grinned and continued to speak. “In all honesty, needling your hand in the case of an upset stomach isn’t a medically proven practice. It is just a home remedy, or perhaps, a treatment that triggers the placebo effect.”

“What is the placebo effect?”

“It’s when a treatment doesn’t have any medical effectiveness but rather affects the mind. You psychologically believe something works, and your condition gets healed because of that positive mindset,” explained Lloyd.

“Hold on. Then...”

“That’s right,” Lloyd finished her sentence. “Your Majesty should inform the Kraken beforehand about the effects of needling its legs in the most positive and confident manner possible.”

“So,” summarized the queen. “We need to prick the tips of its legs and hope the placebo effect will help.”

“That is correct.” Lloyd was relieved. The queen seemed to follow exactly what he instructed.

She is out of options, probably.

Since the merpeople were said to never get an upset stomach, Lloyd assumed that they wouldn’t know how painful it was to have an upset stomach.

And they won’t know that refreshing feeling you get in your stomach as it settles when you prick your finger.

Countless people dismissed this fingertip needling as a placebo effect. A host of media outlets and doctors on TV reiterated that it has no actual benefits. But there were quite a number of people in South Korea who experienced its effect, and Lloyd was one of them.

It works for sure. I experienced it myself.

On the first night of his high school trip, the night he accidentally took a swig of soju to relieve his stomach, Lloyd spent the whole night rushing to the bathroom and retching. Unable to ignore him, his friends reported him to their teacher, and even when she recognized the alcoholic smell, she showed a surprising reaction. Instead of lashing out at his friends, she went down to the lobby and brought a thread and needle to prick Lloyd’s finger.

Actually, I had no idea what she was going to do even as she tied up my finger. I thought it was a useless treatment. But it turned out to be effective.

Dark blood streamed out from his finger, and as she loosened the thread, she stroked his back. Then came the deepest and most refreshing burp he ever experienced. At the same time, the big lump in his stomach dissipated. It was a feeling that Lloyd could not forget, even to this day.

So, it might work this time too. No, it has to work.

What would happen if the Kraken commotion continued until it ended in an armed battle with the Mermaid Corps? There was a high chance the jewel lot would be destroyed. Lloyd wished to avoid such mishaps from happening at all costs. Reminding himself of this, he suggested, “To be honest, I am unsure as to which leg we must prick. So, I say we prick them all.”

“All? All eight of them?”

“Yes,” stressed Lloyd, “You will have to tie up all of its eight legs and prick them at the same time when you see my signal.”

“Um...” Queen Kiakora faltered.

“It won’t die. And it’s not like something terrible will happen. Its upset stomach will be much more agonizing and painful than a couple of pricks.”

“Tsk. Fine. Let us give it a try.” Eventually, she conceded to his plan.

Still, his method will be better than suppressing the Kraken.

It’d be the case both for the Kraken and the merpeople. The queen summoned the generals under her command and quickly relayed the operation plan.

“That is all. Like I said, divide yourselves into seventeen units when you start to move. Am I clear?”

“Yes, my queen.”

“However, never put yourselves at risk or push yourselves too hard. When you sense danger, you must command your merpeople to retreat. Got it?”

“Your wish is my command.”

The generals nodded before returning to their respective units. From that moment, the merpeople busily kickstarted their operation. The first one to swim was the queen, who hurtled toward the Kraken as she yelled that help was on the way and endured the treatment even if it was painful. That it would prick for a bit, but it’s all for its sake. She drew the octopus’s attention as she yelled aloud. Meanwhile, the Mermaid Corps jumped into action.

Beep! Beep! A high-frequency sound reminiscent of a whistle blow rang aloud. It was a signal used among the units to communicate with one another. The Corps was subdivided into seventeen units. Up, down, left, and right. East, west, south, and north. The operation took place as each unit moved in several different directions.

“Sisters! Aim for the ends of its legs!”

“Remember! Tie up the tip!”

“Use your hair!”

“Tighten the knot!”

The merpeople plucked a handful of hair before tying and connecting to form eight hair ropes that stretched hundreds of feet. The eight units in charge of the rope swam closer toward the legs of the Kraken.

“Grab tight!”

“Hold it!”

Hundreds of merpeople clutched the tip of the Kraken’s legs, each of them exerting a massive amount of strength to slow its movements. While this happened, the hair ropes were wrapped around the ends of its legs.

“Tie it!”

“Pull!” It formed a knot.

“Kru-rururung!” The Kraken writhed once more at the restrictive feeling. “Krung!”

Like a child struggling to not get his finger pricked, the Kraken roared ferociously and wielded all of its legs. But the merpeople didn’t just stay still and do nothing.

“Needle!” The queen’s command prompted the eight units in charge of the needle to advance. Their needle was the horn of the Gigatitan stored in the weaponry egg.

“Charge!”

Ten merpeople were assigned to each horn, and they swam in full force at a daunting speed. The horn of the Gigatitan glinted sharply and pricked eight legs of the sea monster.

Just then, the queen shouted, “Twist and pull out!”

They needed to give a clean prick but slightly twist the needle as they pulled out so more blood would come out.

Thwack! The giant needle that pierced 6.5 feet deep was pulled out after a twist, incising a slab of the Kraken’s skin. Given its humongous size, however, it wasn’t a serious cut. It was just a little sting.

“Krung!”

The Kraken pulled its legs close to its body, taken aback by the simultaneous stinging pain. The merpeople loosened the rope, and it started to bleed.

Splash! Supposedly, the Kraken’s blood was blue. But now, its color was...

“It’s murky and dark!” One of the merpeople shouted. Every merperson quickly drew back as they observed the Kraken, which was violently wielding its legs. The color of the blood spilling out of them was darker than usual. The sight brought an eruption of cheer from the merpeople.

“We succeeded!”

The operation worked. It was just as the land human said, dark blood would come out of the Kraken after nicking the tips of its legs.

I never thought such an outrageous solution would work.

But the operation was yet to be finished. The Kraken still needed to burp.

Knowing this well, the queen adamantly yelled, “Unit seventeen!”

At her call, unit seventeen instantly took action. They brought over 30 emperor whales that they had hurriedly gathered from a nearby sea.

“Approach!”

The whales swam at the guidance of the merpeople, and though they were a little scared, they approached the Kraken from behind since the request was coming from the merpeople. The whales then clung to the Kraken’s skin. Their bodies, which were often mistaken by humans as the head of an octopus, drew closer to the octopus.

“Rub!”

They diligently rubbed the Kraken with their entire body, caressing its belly and back. The octopus's face relaxed a little.

“K-Krurung...”

Its voice softened, and its eyes relaxed when...

Buuuuurp! The Kraken let out a deep and intense burp that echoed through the area. The clear, ringing sound coming from the orchestra that was its intestinal villi seemed to spread across the entire world.

“It’s over...”

The queen clenched her fists. The plan actually worked. The echoing burp wouldn’t have come out otherwise. The Kraken wouldn’t look as relaxed otherwise.

We did it.

The Kraken should feel more comfortable now. So, the only thing left for them was to comfort their friend and gather up the scattered eggs to rebuild the city. The bottled-up tension finally vanished in the queen’s heart. And beaming brightly, she went back to Lloyd to compliment his great contribution. But she found him still grimacing.

This isn't over yet. It didn't burp enough.

In contrast to the merpeople who were cheering and celebrating their success, Lloyd was frowning. There were deep wrinkles forming between his brows. His gaze on the Kraken was grave. The reason was simple.

Its stomach is still upset.

The merpeople wouldn't know, but he knew because he had used his surveying skill on the monster. He was able to take a look sixteen feet deep into its body, although the Kraken was so large that he still couldn't get past its thick, leathery skin. Nonetheless, Lloyd still observed the octopus's skin movement and blood flow. That was how he knew.

Ever since it's been suffering from an upset stomach, I noticed a mild, irregular convulsion in its skin. And it's still happening right now. The burping stopped the convulsions for a bit, but it's starting again.

Lloyd instantly knew. The operation was yet to be finished.

It worked, sure. But the plan was only about 98% successful.

Lloyd estimated that the leg needling and burping weren't enough to relieve the Kraken's pain due to how severe its indigestion was. Lloyd, thus, decided to take a drastic measure.

Since the pricking and the burping didn't work, I'm left with no other choice. I need to make it vomit.

Time was running out, it seemed. The Kraken was close to being rampant once again. It would be too late by then. It was now or never. There was no time to inform or explain anything to the others. Sensing that, Lloyd immediately threw his hand into his pocket and brought Bangul out.

"Hey, Bangul," said Lloyd to Bangul, who was perched on his palm.

“Bangul?”

“I’m sorry, but I think you should use your volcanic explosion for us.”

“Bba-bangul?”

“Over there. With me on your back. Do you think you can do it?”

“Bangul!” Bangul earnestly nodded, so Lloyd fed her red sunflower seeds and hopped on her back once she grew larger. Bangul began gulping the water and wagged her tail.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

Jingle! Jingle! Her warning rattle rang aloud in the water, and right after that, she raised her tail, discharging a massive explosion. “Bangul!”

Boooom! Volcanic explosion with massive strength. The force sent Bangul away like a rocket, and Lloyd, too, experienced the same thing as he was on her back.

“Argh...!

A terrible current of water hit his face and body. He ducked down as low as he could see and checked his target. His gaze focused on the Kraken, and he zoomed in on the middle of its forehead, which he learned from the surveying skill was the connecting point between its head and stomach. Lloyd pointed toward its direction.

“Hey, Bangul!”

“Bangul!”

“Do you see where I’m pointing at?! Toward the middle part of its forehead! One more time!” shrieked Lloyd as the adrenaline started to pump in him.

“Bba-bangul!”

Boooom! Two volcanic explosions consecutively erupted in the water!

"...!"

Lloyd was thrown at a greater speed, and the water current hit him much harsher. But Lloyd didn't lose his focus. At the final moment, he reversed his shovel, leaped from Bangul's back, and fired the triple manablast.

Kaboom! The third explosion propelled him farther, and he was now a torpedo flying toward the forehead of the Kraken. With that immense speed, he rammed right into its forehead.

Thwack! Lloyd managed to lay an attack right at his desired target, the Kraken's soft and thick forehead. Anatomically, it was the point that adjoins its head and stomach. The human equivalent of it would be the pit of one's stomach. There. That was where the third rocket propulsion landed. The effect of it was impressive.

Blergh! The Kraken convulsed and vomited something in a flash.

Retch! A big lump of emerald sculpture, which resonated at the same frequency as the Jewel of Truth, emerged.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 271: The Aotearoa's Blueprint (1)

Crash! Lloyd's world quaked as the impact immediately threw him into a dizzy stagger. He couldn't tell if he was underwater, on top of land, or up in the sky. Everything was a blur. Lloyd curled up amid the devastating impact, chaos, and confusion. And he behaved just like the first time he let himself get blackout drunk after a night of binge-drinking at his college orientation.

Blergh! He dry-heaved with his empty stomach. It wasn't a surprising response from him.

Ughh... I almost passed out.

Lloyd looked up after just barely being able to suppress his mild concussion and dizzying nausea. He saw a giant silhouette right in front of him. No, it was a mountain, only that it was covered with a thick outer skin instead of rocks, stones, and soil. Its body diameter extended over several miles long and was as vast as Mount Everest. It was the Kraken, the giant octopus, convulsing before Lloyd's eyes and retching like Lloyd was a moment ago.

"Krung! Blergh!"

When he saw the Kraken, a thought crossed his mind.

I've gone mad. Completely mad.

No matter how critical the situation was earlier, he still couldn't believe he rammed into this massive creature. Lloyd was almost certain that he was a madman.

But still, I had my reasons for trying. For one, its skin isn't hard.

Lloyd recalled the trail of events that took place earlier. The operation ended in success after the merpeople pricked all eight of the octopus's giant legs in almost one try and caused dark blood to gush out of them. In response, the Kraken gave a deep and resounding burp.

But the burp wasn't enough. It was about two percent short of what it needed to be.

That was the thing with a sudden, acute upset stomach. It was tenacious. You could take digestive medicine, prick your finger, and then have your back smacked by your mom after she finds out your test scores. Or, you could do a handstand and bow down to your boss after sending a wrong text to them. But it never, ever went away.

The Kraken was in that exact state.

It wasn't enough to prick the Kraken's legs and make it burp. The effect of this plan was only temporary. Lloyd, thus, took action the moment he realized what was happening. Since he had no time to waste, he used the power of two consecutive volcanic explosions from Bangul and his triple manablast, catapulting the attacks between the Kraken's brows. In comparison, this was the same area as the upper abdomen for humans. In other words, what Lloyd did was equivalent to throwing an almighty punch to someone's upper abdomen. And the punch now left the Kraken squirming and emptying everything in its stomach.

Great! See? That's what I'm talking about! Vomiting is the best treatment for an acute case of an upset stomach if pricking your finger doesn't work.

Even though forced vomiting could cause reflux esophagitis, it was a last-ditch effort to treat an upset stomach when nothing else worked. It had to be done even when stomach acid could damage a patient's esophagus as well as teeth and take a serious toll on their stomach.

That was the reason why Lloyd had gone on with it. But prior to doing so, he first scanned the Kraken's upper abdomen to guarantee his own safety and examine how sturdy and firm the area was. He even activated his simulation skill afterward. In other words, Lloyd boldly threw himself into action only after his simulation assured him no serious damage would be done to him. But, of course, Lloyd was not left entirely unharmed.

Argh. I feel nauseous.

Was it a mild concussion? His dizziness and nausea continued to assault him. However, soon, a reward that would easily make up for his pain emerged in front of his eyes.

Ding Dong!

[You have provided excellent treatment for the Kraken's upset stomach with your sharp situational awareness, sound judgment and courageous actions.]

[For this, the treated Kraken and merpeople praise you, and they are extremely impressed by you.]

[You have earned a new title.]

Ohh?!

It was a message Lloyd would never get tired of seeing. Lloyd determined that this issue had been successfully resolved before focusing on his new title and relishing his reward.

[A new title <Upper abdomen! Upper abdomen! Upper abdomen!> has been created.]

[Upper abdomen! Upper abdomen! Upper abdomen!!]

[Title Level: Maritime legend]

[Mother, my stomach feels sick.

Is that so? Give me your stomach, my dear.

But Mother, why?

Your stomach will feel better after a hit.

I feel that it will not just make me comfortable but put me in a permanent state of sleep.

It’s all right, baby. Do not be afraid.

But still, I’m scared it will hurt. I’m scared.

Tsk, tsk. Learn from the Kraken.

What about the Kraken?

It was hit in the stomach and is still well alive.

But still, it doesn’t mean that getting hit won’t hurt.

Then do you want to keep having an upset stomach?

Um... No.

So, bring over your stomach to me.

But, mother! I am scared!

It’s all right, baby. How hard could I possibly even hit, my dear?

Waa... It’s the punch of... Love!

Wham.]

[Compliment Effect: You have resolved the Kraken’s indigestion in one try. The Kraken and thousands of members of the Mermaid Corps clearly witnessed this. For this, your heroic feat will spread throughout all the seas in the world, and getting hit in the upper abdomen will become the go-to method among marine creatures to treat indigestion. Moreover, you have acquired <Underwater Breathing> and <Upper Abdomen Jab>. The former skill allows you to freely breathe underwater, and the latter skill enables you to empty anyone’s stomach in the water with just one jab.]

[Title Region: Any terrain that has a water level of above 20 inches, which includes seas, rivers, lakes, and bathtubs.]

[Active Period of Title: 3,000 Years.]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, the time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 5]

[Current CP: 1,312]

Nice. Super nice.

Lloyd clenched his fists. The title was awesome, just like the others. And it was a confirmation that the Kraken was no longer suffering from an upset stomach. The optional skills he was rewarded were extremely useful too.

Underwater breathing? This means I can freely breathe three-foot below the water without this necklace the merpeople gave me. Of course, the water pressure and temperature will be a different story. But I won't drown, at least. And as for the upper abdomen jab... Um, I suppose it's a useful skill to empty the stomach of someone I don't like.

In any case, Lloyd was able to acquire two ever-so-useful powers.

Okay, I should back off now.

A thought crossed Lloyd's mind that he might face a terrible ending if he hovered around any longer. It was because of the Kraken.

I gave a pretty hard punch to this monster. I mean, it even vomited.

Only the heavens knew what kind of payback the Kraken would unleash against Lloyd in its anger. If it came charging at Lloyd with its body that was the size of Mount Everest, he wasn't confident he could handle that honestly. He wondered if even Javier, who was a grandmaster, could block the octopus. Just then...

Ding Dong!

Lloyd was sneakily watching the Kraken's movement for any chance to escape when a clear ringing noise rang again.

Hmm?

At first, he wasn't sure what he was hearing, so he reflexively moved his gaze to find a set of unexpected messages floating above.

[The Kraken has opened its heart to you.]

[It took you as the true friend for treating its indigestion.]

[The Kraken now considers you as a friend on equal footing.]

[You can now increase your likeability through the Kraken and acquire RP.]

[50 RP has been rewarded for forming a new connection with another creature.]

[Current RP: 2,532]

[Your likeability with the Kraken has increased by 11 points.]

[Current RP with the Kraken: +11]

[You have earned 33 RP by improving your relationship with a character.]

[Current RP: 2,565]

Damn.

His likeability with the Kraken? Lloyd never thought this would be possible. Just then…

"Krung! Krurung!"

The Kraken roared in almighty ferocity under Lloyd's nose, rolling its eyes over to his side. Its eyeballs, Lloyd thought, were scarily huge.

"..."

Have you ever received the gaze of football-field-sized eyeballs? For a second, Lloyd was glad that he could now give a confident "yes" to the question, should it appear in a job interview. If the interviewer further asked what it felt like, then he'd say, "I wet myself within a second." That was how overwhelming this situation was. But could it be that the Kraken recognized Lloyd's feelings? It extended, very carefully and slowly, a leg in his direction.

"..."

Lloyd almost screamed, "I'm sorry! I won't eat octopus legs anymore!" as a giant shadow cast over his head. The second before he gave way to pressure and burst into an inconsequential gibberish, an unexpected object stuck to one of the Kraken's suckers caught his eyes.

A sculpture?

It was an approximately ten-foot-long seahorse sculpture made of glimmering emerald. The sculpture was vibrating terribly, much like a phone buzzing from a misplaced call on a lazy Sunday morning.

That vibration feels familiar. Why is that?

Lloyd thought to himself as he looked at the sculpture.

The foundation site vibrated exactly like that when Mr. Rotorua touched the starfish symbol. And the surrounding seawater resonated with the vibration.

The sculpture appeared to be vibrating similarly to the resonation a while ago. No, its intensity and pattern were almost the same. A theory popped into Lloyd's head.

Wait a minute!

Lloyd immediately asked the Kraken, “Did you vomit this out?”

“Krung!” The Kraken roared.

“Is your stomach all right now that you spat this out?” Lloyd followed up with another question.

“Krurung!” The Kraken nodded, having understood Lloyd’s words. Then it added, “Krurung! Krung! Krurung! Krung!”

The Kraken was saying that it had accidentally engulfed the sculpture about 300 years ago. It was an accidental mistake that occurred when it curiously discovered something glinting in the deep sea. And it had forgotten that this happened as nothing particular took place afterward. Of course, Lloyd didn’t understand any of the things the Kraken was saying. But he was able to make out the meaning behind the octopus's words through its actions.

So, it felt fine after spitting out the sculpture... That’s it. The sculpture was vibrating inside the Kraken, which upset its stomach. That was the cause behind its sudden upset stomach.

The blow sent to its upper abdomen forced the sculpture out, which relieved its stomach pain.

Plus, the vibration in the sculpture is the same as the one from the foundation site. The pattern and the intensity. That could only mean one thing...

The object had much to do with the Jewel of Truth. Convinced, Lloyd asked, “Um, are you showing me this... because you’re giving it to me?”

“Krung!” When the answer came right away, Lloyd immediately snatched the sculpture before the Kraken changed its mind.

Pop! Bzzzt! The sculpture left the sticky sucker and landed in his embrace.

Whew...

Lloyd wondered if this was what it felt like to carry a 10-foot mobile phone put on the highest vibration setting. He struggled to fight the dizziness and nausea surging from his stomach and hurriedly swam his way back to the foundation site.

If my guess is correct, this sculpture should be part of the site of the jewel.

So, it should be placed in its rightful place. Then a secret of some sort had to be revealed. From then on, Lloyd tirelessly swam and left the merpeople gathering up to check on the Kraken. Javier and Rotorua soon joined Lloyd, and all of them went back to the jewel's site. As they approached, the vibration in the sculpture amplified. Bzzzzzz!!!

Ack!!

The concussion was already making him nauseous and dizzy, and the sculpture's vibration was making it all feel worse for him. Lloyd swallowed the bile that kept rising above his throat.

From his side, Javier worryingly asked, "Are you all right, Young Master?"

"Do I look okay in your eyes?" Lloyd's voice dripped with annoyance and exhaustion.

Javier ignored Lloyd's unwelcoming tone as he replied. "Um, you seem fine and not fine at the same time."

"What is that supposed to mean?" snapped Lloyd, frowning.

"It means that I am worried and amused at the same time."

"..."

"Give me your back, please," Javier, who was gloating with his eyes, reached out and placed his hand on Lloyd's back. Is he using the Asrahan Core Technique? Lloyd thought to himself as he felt a warm influx of mana, which traveled through his skin, muscle, spine, nerves, and blood vessels, slowly circling around his whole body until it flowed out to Javier's palm through his back. The mana felt like a warm breath of air on a painful injury. Soon, his dizziness and nausea completely disappeared.

“You should feel better now, Master Lloyd. Your complexion has improved.” Javier grinned. And he added, “Your face is mediocre to begin with, so you should at least have a healthy complexion.”

“Sure... I’m tearing up at your kindness,” replied Lloyd.

“Not at all.”

“Haah. You treated my body, but you’re killing my spirit. It feels great for you, right?”

“Yes, indeed.”

“The heck. You aren’t even trying to deny it.” Lloyd shot a flustered look at Javier.

Javier’s smile grew bigger. “It is enjoyable to watch your flustered expression that appears in moments like this.”

“...”

“You do not have to compensate me for treating you. You amused me well enough.”

“Ha. Hahaha.” Lloyd burst out in laughter. Still, he figured that this was Javier’s way of showing concern.

Anyhow, time to get back to business.

Lloyd then focused on the sculpture in his embrace.

Bzzzzz!! The vibration was much stronger now, and he focused his attention on its intensity.

On my way here, the vibration was consistent in its intensity, but it changed a little now.

The vibration intensity was changing depending on his direction around the jewel lot. This indicated only one thing.

The vibration is getting stronger as we get closer to the spot it should be placed at.

From that moment, Lloyd directed his steps following the vibration of the sculpture, approaching confidently and wading through the current until he found the right location.

This is the spot.

About 20 yards south of the jewel's foundation site, there was a hole that was about 27 inches in diameter. The sculpture's stylobate was shaped exactly like the hole.

Could this be the entrance to the jewel?

It appeared so. Thinking so, Lloyd put down the sculpture.

Swoosh! The bottom smoothly went into the hole, instantly fading the vibration of the jewel and foundation to a stop. From that moment onward...

Crackle...! The sculpture was covered with a glistening light that dizzyingly reflected inside its emerald interior. The light streamed out from the eyes and sketched a three-dimensional painting of light in the water. Elegant lines and surfaces. An elaborate dance of light. Finally, the blueprint of the Jewel of Truth emerged, and Lloyd murmured to himself when he realized it looked surprisingly familiar.

What is that? A pyramid? The Tomb of the General?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 272: The Aotearoa's Blueprint (2)

Pyramid. It was a structure that everyone thought of when hearing about ancient Egypt. It was also the first structure everyone thought of when asked to name an ancient relic. But the pyramid wasn't exclusive to Egypt. There were similar structures across the world, albeit in slightly different time periods.

This is because of the technological limitations at the time. Construction technology hadn't advanced far, and there was an absence of lightweight, strong materials like steel. As a result, buildings were made using rocks, which made them exponentially heavier the larger they were. But since there wasn't any effective technology to stabilize their weight, most buildings in ancient times naturally took the shape of a pyramid.

The pyramid-shaped buildings boasted a wide bottom and pointed top that was relatively narrow and light. These tapered structures had a wide and heavy bottom while their upper portion was narrow and light. This allowed their center of gravity to be extremely low and stable because of the balanced distribution of their substantial weight. As such, pyramids, despite their humongous size, managed to stand tall even after all these years.

Thanks to it, most pyramid structures have been fairly well preserved in several parts of the world. To name a few, there's the Chichén Itzá of Mexico which was built during the Maya civilization, the Aztec pyramid with the stairs, the Ziggurat of Ur, and the Pyramids of Güímar in the Canary Islands of Spain. The tombs of ancient Chinese emperors are also another example. We even have one in South Korea as well. The Tomb of the General.

The Tomb of the General was the most developed stone mound tomb of the Goguryeo Kingdom in ancient times. It was possible that some would accuse him of being a jingoist for calling this structure a pyramid. But clearly and evidently, without an inkling of doubt, the Tomb of the General was some sort of pyramid.

Though, of course, there's a great difference in size between the Egyptian pyramid and the Tomb of the General.

But why did he think of the Tomb of the General now out of all times? Why did his brain associate it with the sight in front of him, which was the blueprint for the Jewel of Truth?

How could I not? The two look very similar.

Lloyd lifted his gaze, taking in the jazzy hologram video of the emerald sculpture he had gone on a great length to place into its rightful place. The video was the blueprint of the Jewel of Truth, but it felt familiar. From any perspective he looked, it was an appropriate mixture of the Tomb of the General and the Pyramid of Egypt.

Kudos to me for joining the traditional architecture club back in college.

Thanks to his club, Lloyd could specifically identify these sorts of historical architectural styles.

Strong rocks are laid out as the foundation. As for the stylobate, is that granite? The top is composed of seven flights of stairs. I also think I see some holding stones. There are even a few raised areas to prevent the bottom of the structure from getting crushed by the weight coming down. Plus, the inner stone chamber is roofed with a ceiling where the stones are set in parallel to each other. It's the typical stone chamber tomb. I guess the chamber isn't meant to hold a corpse but is where the magic circle is activated.

Lloyd's sharp eyes ran a thorough analysis of the blueprint, and the more he looked at it, the more it looked like the Tomb of the General from the Goguryeo time period. Just then, the hologram changed its shape. Crackle...!

Hmm?

Countless dots appeared around the hologram blueprint, most of them as small as a speck of dust or a fruit fly. Upon a closer look, Lloyd noticed that they weren’t dots.

Humans? Merpeople? Orcs?

A countless number of humans and merpeople were fighting, their forces clashing. The orc warriors and elf archers tussled with each other, and the giants ran amok as they swept the surrounding area.

It’s a war.

But this one was different from any ordinary war. It resembled Hell, where hundreds and thousands of forces of different races charged forward to kill each other. Lloyd recognized which war this was as soon as he saw it.

Mr. Rotorua said before that Jewel of Truth used to be the most powerful treasure and weapon during ancient times. Everyone sought to get their hands on it, and a war started. This is that war.

The hologram was playing before Lloyd’s very eyes, and every race was battling against each other in the war that ended the mythical age. Warriors were thrown into a bloody frenzy until a critical blow destroyed the Jewel of Truth. No one could know who the culprit was. Not a single one had the time or sense to notice what happened amidst the constant chaos. Eventually, the Jewel of Truth collapsed, toppling down the stairs and crumbling to pieces. The entire structure, aside from the foundation, was utterly destroyed and reduced to a war trophy.

Everyone is... taking the rubbles of the jewel.

Human knights, orc warriors, elf archers, and giant magicians... They were all competing with each other to collect the rubbles of the jewel as their trophy. That erupted into another conflict. Everyone was filled with tenacity and determination to get their hands on one more piece. The scene reminded Lloyd of a colony of ants assembling around a giant carcass. And with that, the video ended.

Crackle...! The dots, lines, and sides that beautifully hung in the air vanished. Now, there was only dark, murky seawater. Just then...

Ding dong.

A notification alarm dinged in his ears.

Hmm?

Lloyd wondered what the notification was about. Cocking his head, he read the messages starting to appear in front of his eyes.

[You have activated the “Guideline Sculpture to the Jewel of Truth.”]

[You have witnessed the destruction of the Jewel of the Truth from it.]

[In the process, you were able to closely observe the structure of the Jewel of Truth. This experience had a strong effect on your design skill.]

[The blueprint of the Jewel of Truth, the Aotearoa, has been registered in your design skill data.]

What?

Lloyd was taken aback. The Jewel of Truth, the Aotearoa, was registered as part of his design skill? This was something he never expected and was experiencing for the first time.

Until now, it was only possible to upload a blueprint for my design skill if I surveyed or designed one myself.

That was the way it was up to this point. Whether it was an empty piece of land or a building, Lloyd had to personally survey it in detail first before he could utilize its blueprint in his design space. He could only insert a blueprint in his virtual design space after going through the strenuous process of surveying the data of a building while straining his eyes the entire time. Another way to do so was to use all his focus and pull several all-nighters for the drudgery of designing a blueprint that was absolutely error-free. But right now...

Wow!

All he did was view a hologram video one time. And the message appeared to tell him that he could show the jewel blueprint in his design space.

Let's first check it out. The design.

Lloyd activated the skill at once, and the virtual design space visible and recognizable only to him appeared.

Bring out data. The Aotearoa's blueprint.

Will this really work? Lloyd gave it a try. The result came immediately.

[Fetching the "Aotearoa's Blueprint."]

Fwoosh! For a second, the design space brightened until it was marked with a complex array of dots, lines, and surfaces. The sturdy and wide foundation. The tapered top. The blueprint was the same as the Jewel of Truth he saw through the hologram video a moment ago.

This is real. Amazing.

Lloyd found himself clenching his fist. What appeared in his design space was more than a simple illustration.

Zoomed in like this, I can see that everything is included here. The measurements, materials, standard requirements, and compound method. It's all there.

Not just that. The stress distribution, weight, compressive force, axial force, bending moment, strain rate, temperature expansion coefficient, etc. Nearly all information required for the construction was marked there. In other words, it was so impeccable that he could start the reconstruction right away.

I've got enough laborers. The merpeople using the jjimjilbang can work at the reconstruction site. As for the materials and funds, I should ask for the queen. This so-called jewel is an amazing treasure from the mythical age that belongs to the merpeople. Since that's what I'm restoring, I'm sure the queen will provide me with a sufficient amount of aid.

Lloyd swelled with confidence as he thought about it. How he'd prepare and start the reconstruction. The challenges and the solutions. It was all assessed in his head in no time. Moreover, Lloyd was familiar with the structure of the jewel.

It's the Tomb of the General in a pyramid shape. I researched these structures back when I was still active in the club. I'll just need to combine the information from the documents I studied then with the blueprint. This is more than doable.

Thankfully, the pyramid structure wasn't very complex. Sure, precisely allocating the proper distribution of weight would be tricky, but this structure wasn't a highly difficult design to construct for a building.

It's a relief that the Tomb of the General was a part of my home country's history. And that it was built like a pyramid.

The Tomb of the General. Otherwise dubbed as the Pyramid of the East. Certainly, this one was poles apart from the Egyptian counterpart in terms of size. It was as different as a mammoth and a dog. But still, structure-wise, the difference wasn't noticeable. If the Egyptian pyramid was built in the middle of the ancient Korean peninsula...

People might have called it the Brobdingnagian, the giant Tomb of the General. Oh, since Gulliver wasn't written back then, maybe they'd just call it the giant.

Anyway, Lloyd felt that the construction would be smooth sailing, given his encounter with the Tomb of the General, when he noticed a tiny red message subtly floating in the bottom of the blueprint.

Hmm? What's this?

He read the message.

[The Aotearoa's Blueprint]

[Status: Construction not possible. You are missing key materials.]

[In the event you continue the construction without its key materials, the magic circle function, which is the crux of the Jewel of Truth, will be inoperable.]

“Ha... Right. Nothing is ever easy for me.” Lloyd felt growingly bitter after reading the message.

I’m missing key construction materials? The Jewel of Truth will only operate once I obtain them.

What if he built the jewel without its key materials for construction? It would result in a fake imitation that only looked like the Jewel of Truth.

That won’t do.

Lloyd shook his head. He wasn’t trying to restore a cultural artifact here. His goal was to activate the Jewel of Truth and prevent the restoration of destiny from occurring.

Hmm... So, where can I get my hands on these key materials?

Lloyd grumbled to himself as he observed the blueprint, thinking that the answer would be there. And he was right.

What are these areas that have been marked red?

Upon a closer look, some parts of the design were slightly off. Only a few select areas were marked in red.

Let’s see.

Lloyd poked one of the red areas as if he was clicking it. But nothing happened. No information whatsoever popped up.

Is it not meant to be clicked?

Dismayed, Lloyd decided to give every red spot a poke. He continued to poke when the one at the bottom of the design reacted with a click. It was the part about the holding stones of the Tomb of the General.

Ding dong.

[You have selected the first key material for construction, “tauranga.”]

[Do you wish to access information about tauranga?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it’s a yes!

Lloyd nodded earnestly. Just then...

Fwoosh! A new video emerged in front of him as if it was trying to intrude his vision or he was dreaming with his eyes open.

A video recording, maybe?

It looked like one. Lloyd focused on the video.

Boom! Baaang! A large human, no, a giant was landing onto a beach, and it was carrying twelve pieces of rocks in its embrace. Lloyd instantly recognized the rocks.

Those look like the key materials I just saw for the stylobate.

Lloyd recalled how the materials became a form of trophies once the jewel was destroyed. Tauranga, one of the key materials for construction, seemed to be one of them.

A giant, huh.

Lloyd squinted his eyes as he watched the video. In the video, the giant strode off while carrying the tauranga and built a city by the river, decorating its own palace with the same material. For the longest time, the giant ruled over humans as slaves until they waged war for independence. A long period of war, conflict, and struggle ensued. Eventually, the giant was killed.

Then came the world of humans. The leaders destroyed the giant's palace, and the Tauranga that decorated the palace was abandoned at the corner of the city. The city run by humans flourished for a long period of time until an enraged dragon took over the palace, causing the downfall of the imperial family and bringing in a new ruling house. Another palace was then constructed under the new regime with hard work and collaboration. At this point, twelve pieces of taurangas were brought back and used for the palace's foundation. There was no particular reason for this decision except that the aforementioned material was sleek, well-manicured, large, and sturdy. That was all.

In other words, the people under the new imperial regime were completely in the dark about the backstory of the twelve pieces of tauranga. That hardly was surprising. The war was something of the far distant past. It had become a mere legend from the mythical age. And just like that, the twelve pieces of tauranga were utilized to build a new palace. The video ended with the palace standing firm and tall.

"..."

Lloyd remained silent even well after the video ended. Instead of speaking out loud, he merely sighed. Why? Simple. The palace he just saw in the video? The palace that used the twelve taurangas was very familiar to him.

"Ha..." Lloyd sighed at length again. He couldn't help it. Then he grumbled to himself, "Out of all the places... Really? The place holding the tauranga had to be the palace of Queen Magentano. Ha!"

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 273: A Shameless Demand (1)

The City of Magenta. It was the political and economic hub of the Magentano Kingdom and boasted a long, rich history. Right after the great war of the mythical age, the Giant King Oculus erected a palace on this land and enslaved humans until they ousted the giant king by waging a war for independence. And the humans, having succeeded in attaining freedom, built their own kingdom for the first time in human history.

Their city was named “Taliah,” taken from their proud leader. Fast forward many years, the city enjoyed unhindered prosperity until one day, it went crashing down. It was all because of a greedy king who let a dragon take over the palace twice. After its miserable downfall, a new royal family took over the city, and naturally renamed the city “Magenta.” It was around that time the capital’s current landmark, the half-buried egg-shaped palace, was constructed. And today, inside the office of this egg-shaped palace, Queen Alicia Termina Magentano was sighing to herself as she slurped down a raw egg. Crack. Slurp!

“Whew...”

Queen Magentano wiped her wet hair with a towel, drinking the raw egg that her servant brought for her. Yet, the wrinkles on her face didn’t leave. It was because she was frustrated.

Truly, this is a mess.

Grimacing, she gazed at her office desk. There were messy piles of documents strewn all over it. They were the reports on the reconstruction of the Termina Garden wrecked by the Bone Dragon.

Thankfully, the reconstruction went well. It was completed without many issues. The final costs were quite high but not enough to put any burden on the kingdom’s finances. But the problem is...

They hadn’t redeemed all the damage that came from the Bone Dragon’s uproar. In particular, the intangible assets that couldn’t be seen by the eye were what took the biggest hits.

The imperial family has suffered considerable damage to its reputation.

The grand garden had been constructed to flaunt the kingdom’s national prowess to the outside world, so the completion event similarly served the same purpose of exhibiting its grand results. In other words, it was a promotional showcase meant to announce to the world the authority of the House of Magentano. However, the event was a failure. A complete blunder. All because the bones of the dragon installed at the center of the garden moved against everyone’s expectations and ran amok. Everyone in attendance had to run for their lives, and the royal guards were left floundering around. The situation was so terrible that the queen herself had to grab her sword. That, however, wasn’t the worst part.

The worst part is... that we failed to capture the Bone Dragon.

Queen Magentano’s furrow deepened. That day, she failed to suppress the Bone Dragon. No, she did. To be more exact, she failed to announce that to the others, which tanked the reputation of the imperial family and made it an international laughingstock.

We were branded as the imperial family that adorned its capital with a grave threat. The imperial family that failed to properly take down a dangerous enemy. The imperial family that shakily tried to defend itself...

A glint of rage flashed in her eyes. Right after the Bone Dragon incident and when Lloyd and Javier left for Hell, she concentrated all her energy and attention on cleaning up the mess. She commemorated the victims, praised them as heroes and heroines, and accordingly compensated them. She poured an exorbitant amount of money into restoring the demolished garden. Meanwhile, she strove to revive the diminished authority of the imperial family, shedding light on the event by announcing that Lloyd Frontera and Javier Frontera bravely slayed the monster under her leadership. She even strove to clear her name by incorporating the accounts of the royal guard knights that witnessed the event. But the international community was...

They did not believe any of my words.

A bitter smile appeared on her face as she thought so. The world's doubtful reaction wasn't very surprising, however. After all, even if the Bone Dragon was indeed subdued, which was mainly possible due to Javier's contribution, there wasn't any evidence to back up her claim.

Why? Because Lloyd took the Bone Dragon as his subordinate.

If there was a way to exhibit the demolished pieces of the Bone Dragon to the world, things would have been better. But to her misfortune, no evidence was left. And so, the explanations the House of Magentano put out were received with global mockery. Everyone cast doubts on the authority of the House of Magentano, throwing various theories that the Bone Dragon could have simply fled because it got bored after having its share of fun destroying the place. That there should be evidence if the dragon was dead. But there wasn't any evidence. Moreover, the shadow of doubt didn't linger only among foreign countries.

The nobles of our kingdom started gossiping too.

Of course, she hardly worried much about them since her authority over the kingdom was strong and secure. Her legitimacy wasn't going to get impacted by this. Nonetheless, it wasn't exactly a pleasant development.

I must restore the damaged reputation of the imperial family.

Losing authority in an international setting meant several things. One was a reduction in diplomatic influence. From now on, she would experience inconveniences in international rows, clashes of interests, disputes, and negotiations, which all happened quite often. It was as if they were an injured lion getting looked down by a pack of hyenas.

But...

There didn't seem to be a striking solution to restore their international authority. This was the reason why she kept grimacing all day.

“Tsk.” She snatched a towel with annoyance and roughly shook the water off her hair. Despite doing so, her concern wasn’t shaken off.

“...”

She used to feel refreshed after snacking on a raw egg once she finished her sword training session and bath. But these days, this wasn’t the case anymore. Like a puzzle that couldn’t be solved, her unanswerable concern never left her head.

What about restoring the garden and holding another event? That wouldn’t be enough. A reconstruction celebration would change nothing. It would be better if a small-scale military conflict broke out on the border.

That would grant her the opportunity to shift the domestic and international attention elsewhere, and it could restore its diminished authority by showcasing its massive military power.

But that is not right.

The queen despised the idea of sending her innocent soldiers onto a battlefield just to regain the kingdom’s authority. The very purpose of getting it back in the first place was so she could better protect and care for these people of hers. As possible solutions got ticked off in her head one after another, her woes only grew.

After a long time, around the time her wet hair was half-dried, someone interrupted her thoughts. “Your Majesty, there is an individual who has requested a special audience with you.” It was the Lord Chamberlain who spoke from outside of her office.

“Audience with me?” Queen Magentano inquired. “Who is it?”

“It is Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera county, Your Majesty.”

The moment she heard his response, she squeezed her fist without realizing it. But why? Because the name was uncalled for? Because she felt a flash of inexplicable expectation? But before she could find the answer for herself, she blurted out a response. “Let him in.”

“Your words are my command.” The Lord of Chamberlain’s footsteps grew distant. He must be bringing Lloyd to the office, the queen thought.

Queen Magentano propped her chin against her hands as she waited for the unexpected guest to emerge. “Haah.” She didn’t know why she was sighing. Was it from concern? Or surprise? Whatever it was, one thing was certain. She was glad to hear of Lloyd’s visit.

Lloyd Frontera.

A man who was extremely good at reading people. A subject of hers who came to possess greater power than her. A subject of hers, despite his capabilities, that she could strangely be at ease around.

It presumably should be because he and my political interests are aligned.

She was glad that Lloyd wasn’t an ambitious man. That he opted to live a normal life in the province. Apart from the gratitude in her heart, there was also wonder.

What is it that made him come here?

Queen Magentano smacked her lips, thinking to herself that Lloyd was not someone who would act without a clear purpose. And he was even more so not someone who would travel all the way here for nothing.

He only reaches out when there’s something he needs from me. Wait, is this his first time coming to visit me out of his own will?

The queen thought about it, and indeed, she was the one who always called for him first. He usually dragged himself to her with a terrible grimace and fidgeted the entire time, exuding his evident reluctance and annoyance to be summoned as if he was being forced there.

Tsk.

As such, his visiting of his own volition meant he wanted something from her. Otherwise, he'd have never willingly come to her.

What could it be that he wants?

What grand request does he have that prompted him to come here? She became very curious and expectant.

He is a sly man. If he wants something from me, he knows that it won't be free.

He likely had something valuable to negotiate with. Something very helpful to her, she thought.

He is a smart fellow.

In her current state, that is, where she spent every day worrying. It could only mean that Lloyd was ready to negotiate if he was coming here to make a request.

He must have identified what was worrying me and found a way to solve my worries. I'm sure he plans to capitalize on that to ask for help or assistance in return for his help.

It was a simple matter, come to think of it. And like that, Queen Magentano saw through the hidden meaning and intention behind Lloyd's unexpected visit. Around the time her hair was completely dried, she heard from the Lord Chamberlain again.

"Your Majesty, Lloyd Frontera has arrived," the Lord Chamberlain announced.

"Let him in."

The door opened. She saw Lloyd behind it.

"Hail to Her Majesty. I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera County, am honored to be in the audience of the rightful owner of this land."

Lloyd had his head down, revealing the back of his head. For a second, a sudden impulse to smack him instead of greeting him came over her. His head was chestnut-shaped, round, and circular, the kind that evoked the impulse to give it a whack.

"..."

Queen Magentano smothered the senseless impulse in her and focused on looking at Lloyd with a cold gaze. "It has been truly a long time, Lloyd Frontera."

"Yes, Your Majesty. I hope you have been in good health," remarked Lloyd, still bowing.

"Not so much. Unfortunately, since you did not heed my reminder." Her voice was cold, emotionless.

"Your Majesty...?" Lloyd looked up, dazed and befuddled.

Queen Magentano scoffed as she looked straight into his eyes. "You said it yourself before crossing the gate of Hell into the underworld. Do you not remember?"

Lloyd searched his memory. "Before going to Hell, then..."

"How you said that you could only come back to my side if you went to Hell through the method of your choice," reminded the queen.

"Oh..." gaped Lloyd.

"I told you then," went on Queen Magentano, her voice now sounding judgmental. "If you really care for me, make sure to come back to my side unharmed. Do you remember how you responded?"

"That... I will try my best, Your Majesty."

"How confident you sounded."

Lloyd’s face reddened as the memories came back to him. He knew where this was going.

“And yet, why did I have to hear about your pursuits from someone else after you came back from Hell?”

“...”

“I was suddenly given news about you one day. They said you, who disappeared during the Bone Dragon incident, suddenly appeared in your fiefdom.”

“...”

“I believe they said you visited Count Cremo afterward, is that right?”

“...”

“Indeed. I understand. Count Cremo is a big fan of yours.”

“...”

“Answer,” she ordered as the silence was starting to irritate her.

“Please kill me, Your Majesty.” Words broke out of him as he pleaded.

“Are you sure? Do you mean it?”

“N-no,” Lloyd stuttered with evident hesitation in his voice. “Your Majesty, it is not that.”

“Then?”

“I beg your forgiveness for saying these things, but due to several urgent and complicated situations, I could not simply abandon everything and come back to your side at once, Your Majesty.”

“Is that so?” She looked at Lloyd as she raised her brow.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd, stressing his voice. “All the while I was away from Your Majesty, my allegiance toward you never left for even a second.”

“Hmm...” mused Queen Magentano, “I have no way to tell if that is true.”

“That is-”

“However,” she interrupted, “It has been made very clear to me that you have unfortunately made your way first to Count Cremo, not me.”

“T-that’s...” Lloyd’s face turned crimson red.

“How did he welcome you? Did he open a grand ball? If not, that would have been truly problematic. After all, you first visited the count instead of me. Count Cremo must have welcomed you with wide open arms, knowing your devout feelings for him. Am I wrong?”

“Please save me, Your Majesty.” Lloyd dropped to the floor and bowed.

With that, the bitter smile on the queen changed into a satisfied one. And now her eyes subtly danced with amusement and contentment. “This is why I like you.”

“Excuse me...?” Lloyd slightly lifted his head to read her face.

“Never mind,” she said immediately and changed the subject. “Did everything go well in Hell?”

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“Everything is well with you? Are you injured anywhere?”

“As you can see, Your Majesty, I am completely fine, and-”

“And I’m sure that is due to my generosity and support?” said the queen.

“...”

“All right. This is enough small talk. Let us get to business.” Her eyes then grew icy. And she pulled no punches when she went on. “I ask you, Lloyd Frontera, did you request for an audience with me to solve the recent worries on my mind and request a reward in return?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd.

Lloyd didn’t deny her assumptions. Instead, he found this kind of conversation with the queen convenient. There was no beating around the bush. It was straight to the point. And then he recalled the events that happened over a month ago. The foundation of the jewel at the Mermaid Kingdom. The jewel’s blueprint and key materials. The things he must do to attain them.

With those in mind, he replied, “Your Majesty’s estimation is all precise.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“Then do you have an innovative solution to restore the authority of the imperial family that was diminished after the Bone Dragon wreaked havoc on the grand garden celebration?”

“Without a doubt, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd as he nodded. He really did. He had somewhat guessed what would be worrying her and came up with a solution for her concern.

I knew it.

She was right about Lloyd and why he had come here. After all, he was a man who always calculated the gain. If he wasn’t convinced about the results, he wouldn’t have made his way here.

Thanks to his character, I can trust him to do the job.

A sense of relief and confidence flooded her heart. No one was as clever and reliable as Lloyd Frontera. The mere sight of him brimming with confidence made her feel that her problem was solved already. And so...

“Good. If your plan is that certain, I am sure you have already thought of the reward you want from me.” Her voice was now softer.

“That is also without a doubt, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“Tell me in advance what you want.” Queen Magentano resolved to give him whatever he wanted, even if it was out of the line. Hear what he wants in advance since he was a reliable subject set to relieve her quandary. She wanted to cherish him and continue to have him under her wing. Feelings of generosity filled her heart.

And so, Lloyd began to speak rather shamelessly. “My trivial request is very simple, Your Majesty. I would like to request your permission... to pull out your palace from the ground.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 265: A Shameless Demand (2)

“Your Majesty. I ask you to... permit me to pull out your palace from the ground.”

“What...?” Widened eyes. Speechless voice. Lloyd, however, remained calm despite the queen’s reactions. A part of his mind flew back to what happened fifteen days ago.

I, too, was flustered.

It was right after the Kraken’s upset stomach settled down. Lloyd was thrilled about getting his hands on the blueprint for the Aotearoa, the Jewel of Truth, and was about to jump into action until something stopped him.

Then I learned that the key materials for construction are spread out in various parts of the world and have to be collected for the Jewel of Truth to function properly.

The blueprint enlightened Lloyd that tauranga was used to build the stylobates found in Magenta. It was used to build the Palace of Magenta. And that needed to be pulled out.

I abandoned everything there and flew here.

Lloyd recalled treating the Kraken and finding the foundation of the Jewel of Truth, which was thought to be only a legend. This merited him plenty of recognition from the merpeople. He became a star. Everywhere he went, the merpeople cheered, and he was showered with a plethora of gifts. One of them was lifetime access to the Mermaid Kingdom.

In exchange, I had to hand over the jjimjilbang’s operational rights to the queen.

However, Lloyd hardly looked upon it as a loss. In the first place, the jjimjilbang was built to acquire laborers set to be mobilized in the excavation project. But now that he had dug what he wanted, Lloyd was certain that managing its operations, repairs, and maintenance would only slow down his plans. Generously handing over the jjimjilbang amidst the pleasant mood and working on his public image appeared to be more beneficial for him in the future.

After all, Lloyd would need the merpeople's help once he returned for the reconstruction. He'd have to use the merpeople for labor again anyway. So, earning plenty of brownie points from them while he had the chance sounded like a much better choice. That was why he donated the jjimjilbang without any hesitation, inviting explosive applause from the merpeople society at large.

Plus, I've become an honored citizen of the Mermaid Kingdom and earned the right to enter the kingdom without any restrictions for the rest of my life. There's also the magical necklace that protects me under the deep sea and the VVIP membership to jjimjilbang.

That wasn't the end of it. A likeability system was opened between him and the merpeople. He was now capable of earning RP by winning their hearts.

Well, I should say that I've become friends with the entire community of merpeople.

Thanks to the friendship, Lloyd was promised unreserved assistance in his future reconstruction of the Jewel of Truth. And yet, nobody pressured him to give his hand in rebuilding the demolished city. They assured him he could stay out of it since he was an honored guest.

Anyway, I've attained everything I could from there.

Just like that, he left the Mermaid Kingdom and was even escorted out by the queen. Her lightning-fast speed of swimming easily got them from the Arctic Ocean to the sea near Port Cremo, where Lloyd timely reunited with the Feliconia Ship on a nearby shore and paid off his remaining balance for using the ship. Then, he hopped on Ggoming before bidding farewell to the crew and flew all the way to Magenta, where he headed to the palace at once and requested the audience with the queen. Those were the series of events that Lloyd went through for the past fifteen days.

Haah. Tsk. Sure, I made the right call by coming here, but look at how cold her eyes are.

Lloyd felt bitter for some reason. The queen's eyes fixed on Lloyd were filled with burning intensity. At first, they were flustered, but now, she was shooting a stone-cold look at him with a straight face. But Lloyd understood her.

It's the same as randomly coming up to the queen and asking if I could take apart the palace.

Will she grab me by the collar? Or punch me in the gut? Lloyd was starting to feel anxiety creeping up in him when she spoke.

"Whew," sighed Queen Magentano, "You are always like this." She gave a chuckle. "Truly nasty. How do you always fluster me like this every time? But your request. That was not a joke, wasn't it?"

"It was not, Your Majesty," Lloyd answered seriously.

"Do you wish for me to permit you to pull out my palace from the ground?"

"Yes, Your Majesty." Lloyd didn't deny it. This was a critical moment, and the timing was perfect. She wanted to know his intentions.

"Not a common house or building but the palace? I suppose your outrageous request is backed by a reason I shall accept?"

"Yes, of course, Your Majesty."

"Tell me."

Feeling the cold gaze of the queen, Lloyd replied, "The palace was built using the ancient material called tauranga."

"So?"

"I wish to have my hands on the material."

“For what reason do you need it?”

Lloyd paused for a second before speaking. At last, he looked up at the queen with a serious face and said, “Please forgive me for being unable to reveal the purpose in detail. However, I can dare ascertain that you and the royal family shall not be harmed by this.” His answer was solemn and genuine.

Really, I am not trying to harm her or the royal family. It’s rather the opposite. I’m helping them. After all, she’ll be one of the victims of the restoration of destiny.

Just then, the future he glimpsed through the Ending Spoiler came to his mind. The queen’s left arm would become paralyzed. Though it didn’t get cut like in the novel, her arm suffered from paralysis as destiny fell back to its original track, which was just as bad as not having it.

In particular, since she’s a swordmaster, losing one arm is... awful. Nothing could compensate for that.

As such, to prevent the tragedy from happening, he had to attain tauranga, which could only happen if the palace was lifted from the ground. Lloyd bore his heart out to the queen but omitted talking about the restoration of destiny because it’d inevitably lead to a discussion of his identity from South Korea and the novel.

I should be ambiguous about that part while still making sure that she feels my sincerity. I need to create an atmosphere that’ll incline her to trust me.

Lloyd thought so. He believed her. He knew that the queen was way more intelligent than him, who only knew a few more things about the future. He decided to trust her excellent political instinct. And she didn’t disappoint.

“Ha.” She scoffed at last, her smile soon turning bitter. “You really are... a nasty person.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Not at all. I can’t not trust you. Anyway, if you wanted to, there are many ways you could hurt me and the imperial family. You would not even have to go as far as visiting me and making a request like now. How could I not trust your words of assurance?” Queen Magentano spoke, almost in a self-mocking manner. She could only trust him. It was a simple matter.

Lloyd Frontera. He is already powerful enough. Well beyond my sphere of control.

It was really true. The Bone Dragon. Grandmaster Javier. Two of them were loyal to Lloyd. There were more.

The Sand and Steel Orc Tribe.

Queen Magentano remembered the report from her informant. It said that the Frontera family had a blood alliance with the barbarous orc tribe composed of Herculean warriors, which was on her list of potential threats in the eastern wasteland. Tying blood alliance with the orcs meant the Frontera family was part of their family. In other words, the orc tribe coalition across the world would raise their weapons and wage war at the request of the Frontera family.

Bone Dragon. Sir Asrahan. Orc tribe. These three alone allowed the Frontera fiefdom to surpass the power of the royal family already. More than that, if he wanted to, he could establish a new dynasty in a blink of an eye.

Queen Magentano thought that Lloyd wouldn’t have resorted to this complicated method if the latter desired to hurt her or the imperial family. Making the tedious trip down here? Requesting with a cap in hand? None of that was necessary. He just needed to wield his power.

As such, it should be better to trust the intention of his request.

She concluded that giving him full trust was a better way to solidify her relationship with him and politically benefit her and the imperial family. Wrapping up her thoughts, she spoke. “Good. Since I have never doubted your allegiance, I shall continue that pattern this time as well.”

“Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Highness,” Lloyd answered.

“Tsk. You and your gratitude,” tutted the queen, recognizing his repetitive expression. “You only visit me when you want something.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“And you ask for forgiveness when you are out of the things to say.”

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut, feeling exposed.

“But there is no need for the embarrassed look on your face. After all, I heeded to your request of pulling out my perfectly fine palace from the ground. I only ask you to avoid damaging the palace in the process.

“Of course, Your Majesty,” Lloyd promised firmly. “I will carefully carry out the construction so that no unnecessary damage will occur.”

“While the necessary damages will occur, right?” She gave him a sharp look.

Lloyd decided not to respond to her.

“It is all good,” she went on, “I already granted your request, so I can understand that much at least. I shall be announcing to the public that the regular maintenance on the palace will be done with a special method this time.”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” And with that, Lloyd rose and was about to leave when the queen stopped him.

“But first, I believe we have discussed only half of the matter. What do you think?” She looked at him sharply.

“Oh,” said Lloyd, “Do you mean the solution for your worries?”

“Indeed.”

“Do you wish to hear everything in detail right at this moment?” Lloyd pointed his finger to the ground.

“Of course. Continue one.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. If that is the case, may I have permission to whisper it in your ears?”

“Come closer.”

At her permission, Lloyd carefully walked closer to her desk and leaned forward, whispering something very softly into her ears.

“So, the plan is... In order to revive the damage done to the royal family due to the Bone Dragon... A shocking method is called for... Even if officials around you oppose... Everything will be resolved...”

Lloyd spelled out his scheme to the queen, trying to be as detailed as possible. Meanwhile, as she listened, her eyes changed.

“...”

What kind of madman was he? She dazedly stared at him. But not for long. A quick decision was made. “Good. Do as you say.”

“Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd’s confident smile spread around the office.

♣

Fifteen days passed. During these days, the Magentano royal family was busy making preparations for the celebration of the reconstruction of the Termina Garden, which had taken over several months.

“Tsk, tsk. As if this event will change anything,” a foreign ambassador tutted as he arrived at the venue.

“You could not be more right, Hahaha.”

On the night of the ball, carriages carrying diplomatic ambassadors and prominent figures residing in the capital arrived at the garden. The facial expressions of the guests waltzing out of the carriages were subtle. There was a subtle derision on their faces, which was directed to the House of Magentano.

“This is simply between us,” the same ambassador whispered to his aide, “The House of Magentano has been parading their power by increasing their military spending and whatnot, but don’t they seem surprisingly unstable?”

“What do you mean, ambassador?”

“Shh,” ordered the ambassador. “Lower your voice. How long have you been working as my aide?”

“About two years, my lord,” replied the aide.

“Tsk,” he grunted. “That must account for your incomprehension. Listen carefully. If I were Queen Magentano, I would not hold a banquet like this after the incident caused by the bone dragon. I would instead hold a large-scale military parade.”

“A military parade?”

“Yes,” the ambassador nodded, his eyes shining. “What happened during the bone dragon’s commotion? Did you forget how miserably helpless the queen was? Everyone at the banquet clearly saw it. That is why I am saying this. What is the purpose of ramping up military power if she does not plan to use them for an event like this? She ought to boast her strength in front of everyone.”

“Are you saying that she would be able to recover the authority she lost from the previous incident that way?”

“Yes!” The ambassador nodded earnestly. “This banquet will not change anything. And yet, the queen holds the same banquet in the same format as before to reclaim her lost glory. Tsk, tsk. What is the point of possessing great strength? When you cannot even take advantage of it? Do you not agree?”

“Oh, yes. I think so too.”

It wasn’t that the mockery was present only between this ambassador and his aide. Almost every guest present at the banquet was gossiping among themselves about the futility of this event in making things right. It was nothing but another invitation for mockery. They chitchatted and scorned the queen for being ignorant and losing her political sensibilities, most of them doubting and looking down on the House of Magentano for organizing this banquet. Thus, blinded by their arrogance and disdain for the kingdom, they had no clue that deep into the dark woods, the extraordinary and jaw-dropping host of the party was getting ready with Lloyd.

“So,” reminded Lloyd, “You have to do well tonight. Got it?”

Clack! It was the Bone Dragon dressed in a gigantic bow tie and tuxedo. Draggy clacked in grave determination to entertain the guests.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 275: A Special Host (1)

“You have to do well tonight. Got it?”

Clack! Draggy earnestly nodded at his master’s words. Lloyd. The most awesome master in the world. The incomparable, fantabulous commander of the Skeleton Corps. Draggy thought to itself that its master was the best. Oh, how dearly it missed him!

Clack! Creak! Draggy recalled how it had been spending its days as it rubbed the giant bow tie around its neck. The loneliness. The boredom. Draggy was on cloud nine when it met Lloyd back in Hell and extremely excited when it came back to the capital through the Hell gate with him. But its joy and elation last only for a short while. The emotions were banished from its heart when Lloyd requested something.

“Draggy. You’ll cause an uproar if someone sees you, so go hide for now. Head over there. That’s the east direction.”

And then he went on to say...

“Keep flying, and you’ll see a giant mountain range. That’s the eastern mountain range. Hang around there for a while. Be friendly with the orcs if you bump into them. You’re a good boy, Draggy. If you behave, I’ll introduce you to your brothers in the Skeleton Corps. Okay, off you go.”

So, Draggy did exactly that. There was no reason to disobey Lloyd. It flew toward the eastern range and even took a nice bath in a deep lake there. That was when Draggy bumped into the orc tribe. Upon seeing Draggy, the orcs roared and greeted Draggy, and their welcome reminded the dragon of Lloyd’s advice. Determined to be faithful to its master’s order to act friendly around the orcs, Draggy returned with a welcoming roar. This got the orcs to convulse in joy. Their reaction was wild. They crawled on top of its body and pet Draggy with their various types of axes, spears, and hammers. Sometimes, they even tied Draggy’s whole body with ropes and twisted and turned its bones. And since the orcs were strong, their massages were far more refreshing and relaxing than the typical massages or chiropractic treatments from pseudo-experts.

From that moment onward, hanging out at Lake Kapua with the orc warriors became a part of Draggy's daily routine. They were joyful days. But still, the emptiness in the corner of its breastbone lingered, primarily because it missed Lloyd.

Clack! Creak! Despite the great fun it had with the orcs and their refreshing massages, an unquenchable emptiness lingered in its heart. Draggy yearned to spend time with its master. It wanted to play, work, and get complimented. But such an opportunity didn't come because Lloyd didn't call for Draggy, even when he was back at the fiefdom!

Creak! Though Draggy was wistful, it endured because it knew very well why Lloyd wasn't calling or introducing it to its skeleton brothers.

Clack... Draggy believed it was all because it was ugly. Particularly because of its ugly skull. Draggy was convinced that Lloyd's negligence had much to do with his embarrassment of showing it to the world. Whenever such thoughts crossed its mind occasionally, Draggy was terribly discouraged and became envious of handsome creatures whose existence alone wasn't fair. Sad and resentful, Draggy grew tired of playing with the orc warriors. Making up its mind to go astray, it sank to the bottom of the lake and stayed there all day until it, out of the blue, received a signal from Lloyd.

Creak! It immediately rocketed out of the lake as if it was never sulking and fluttered its wings to the location provided by Lloyd's optional skill, Zombie Domination. And it arrived at the capital in a flash and basked in the joy of reuniting with Lloyd. And today, it was given a grand mission.

"Remember! Who's the main character of today's event?" asked Lloyd.

Clack!

"Right!" exclaimed Lloyd. "It's you. So, the success or failure of this event will depend on your performance. That makes you the main character of today. So, tell me, what should you do?"

Creak!

“Okay. You remember it. Follow the script I recited to you a while ago. On my cue, appear at the designated spot doing the pose I told you. Be powerful, dashing, and forceful. And then?”

Clack!

“Good job,” complimented Lloyd, “You do remember. Match the queen’s pace. Got it?”

Creak!

“Awesome. My. You’re a smart boy. Do well here, and you’ll be able to confidently appear in front of other people. You won’t need to hide anymore. So, do your best!”

Clack!

After walking through the whole plan with Draggy one last time, Lloyd headed back to the banquet. Draggy gave an earnest nod as it gazed at the back of Lloyd’s head. If it did well today, it could always be with Lloyd. Resolved, Draggy fixed its clothes, making sure that its bow tie wasn’t crooked and tux was wrinkle-free. Draggy checked over and over again. That was how anxious it was about this job.

Clack...

Draggy was worried that people might get shocked by its looks. Even though Lloyd assured it that it was all fine, Draggy was still worried. A few moments later, Lloyd’s signal came.

Now!

Kaboom! At the signal, Draggy flew up and soared into the night sky, its tuxedo tail fluttering against the wind. It then checked the direction and angle of the full moon before flying to the spot that masked the moon and filled the sky with its silhouette. After finding this spot, Draggy filled the night sky with its body and let out a roar.

...!

The roar was controlled and silent. But its shockwave shook the sky, making everything tremble at the bouquet that was several miles away. The musicians' instruments vibrated. The wine splashed inside their glasses. One of the foreign diplomats disparaging tonight's banquet and the House of Magentano quivered in shock.

"I-It's the Bone Dragon!"

His loud screech and shivering finger pointing to the sky immediately sent a ripple of fear across the banquet. The guests berated their luck. The Bone Dragon had to appear today, the very night Queen Magentano was celebrating the recovery from the previous disaster, and they happened to be here. Everyone felt a twinge of bitterness as well as fear and couldn't stop thinking about how much of a nightmare this was. Furthermore, since the queen failed to subdue the Bone Dragon and was left helpless previously, everyone guessed in despair that they'd end up dead tonight. The Bone Dragon touched down to the ground.

Boooom!

"Ackkk!"

"Run for your lives!"

Draggy's landing brought a terrible tremor to the ground, and as it completely covered the sky by just standing, everyone's heart sank. Terror drained the color from their faces. Dead, I'm dead, they thought. They were frozen in place from shock and couldn't even think of escaping. No one could muster up the courage to run away. Just then, the moonlight shed light on its appearance, and everyone rubbed their eyes in shock.

"Eh...?"

Why is the Bone Dragon dressed in a tux? And what was that bow tie around its neck? Was it a trend among dragons now to eat people while wearing a tux? All sorts of outrageous thoughts dominated their brains when something entirely uncalled for took place.

“My Bone Dragon, the ultimate weapon of destruction and the guardian of the House of Magentano. My faithful servant. Don’t shock everyone here.”

It was Queen Magentano, and she was striding toward the Bone Dragon with only a sword around her. What was more, the sword was still in its sheath, and her gait was so relaxed and confident, as though she was walking toward her servant.

Everyone thought among themselves that this was it for her. This was the end for Queen Magentano, an unwed and childless monarch who had no one to pass down the throne to.

But something strange took place: nothing happened. The Bone Dragon didn’t stomp and kill her, which was something everyone expected to happen. Instead, the dragon lowered its head at her in the utmost polite and careful manner, like a loyal dog bringing its head forward to its master. The dragon lowered its body, propping its jaw against the ground and giving its forehead to the queen, who drew her sword. She then touched the dragon’s temples for a second with it as if she was softly tapping them or like she would to a knight’s shoulder at their ordination.

“I am aware of your feelings,” Queen Magentano said solemnly. “I am aware how you struggled with a sense of guilt and accountability for your commotion last time. I only ask that you pay for your wrongdoing by protecting us instead of writhing in guilt.”

Clack! The Bone Dragon nodded its giant skull. Her mouth formed a faint smile.

“Then, as a proud subject of the House of Magentano and special host of tonight’s banquet, can you provide assurance to the guests?”

Creak! Draggy nodded once again, and its gaze flickered over to the guests, who all flinched when their eyes met. They couldn’t wrap their heads around what was happening. They wondered if they were having a weird, eccentric dream and gulped dryly, feeling delusional and bewitched at the same time.

Then Draggy stood up and brought something out from its tux. Giant signs. They had Lloyd written down on them.

[I won’t hurt you.]

Absolute silence fell over the crowd. Draggy brought out the next sign.

[I won’t bite you.]

Flip!

[I won’t hit you.]

Everyone was relieved to see that. Even so, they feared that a simple sneeze from the dragon would make them die from pain. As they thought so, Draggy flipped to the final sign.

[The Bone Dragon, Draggy, is your friend. ♡]

As silence heavily fell over the place, the Bone Dragon closed the signs and made a heart sign with its forelegs. Then it sat back down like a dog that was ordered to sit, its buttocks against the floor and looking up. It was only then that the people started to make sense of the situation.

“Haha, ha! Hahaha...”

“That is... Ha... This is... Hahaha.”

The heavy silence started to wear off as they started to realize what happened. The Bone Dragon wasn’t here to invade the banquet. It was just an attendee, and what was more, it came at the order of Queen Magentano. So, in other words...

Queen Magentano really did... suppress the Bone Dragon! Is that how it became a follower of hers?

Everyone had jeered at the queen for her incompetent response to the previous commotion and the Bone Dragon. They gloated in joy and even refused to believe her when she refuted that the Bone Dragon had been taken care of after a fierce battle. But no one trusted her and dismissed it as nothing but a pathetic bluff and an excuse to save face. Everyone had regarded her claim as a lie...

But she was telling the truth. She... really suppressed the dragon and took it under her command.

Fright filled their eyes at the realization.

This is nuts! She brought in the Bone Dragon as one of her followers!

What this meant was clear. The Bone Dragon, which was stronger than normal dragons, had been tamed and joined her forces.

There is no country now in the Lorasian Continent that can fight alone against the Magentano Kingdom.

Yes, this moment marked the birth of the Magentano Kingdom as the most powerful kingdom on the continent. They were untouchable.

Gulp. The diplomats swallowed dryly, and a host of thoughts filled their heads, and their eyes moved busily. The expression of mockery was completely gone from their faces. Instead of mockery, there was only a sense of alarm and urgency. They nervously thought about sending a message to their home countries as soon as possible to prevent getting into any conflicts with the House of Magentano at all costs. Seeing this, Lloyd, in the corner of the banquet, grinned as he watched.

Whew. I can almost hear how quickly their eyes are widening.

A burst of laughter escaped Lloyd as his gaze traveled across the dismayed diplomats that used to mock the Royal House of Magentano and the queen. This confirmed something for him. Today’s plan was a victory. Now, Queen Magentano only had to fulfill her promise and make a declaration. Then all plans would be finalized.

Sometime later, Queen Magentano’s gaze swept over the guests at the banquet. She was now the queen of the most powerful kingdom in the Lorasian Continent. She was the Iron Fist Queen, Alicia Termina Magentano.

And she declared, “I hereby announce to everyone gathered at this place.” She then pointed at Lloyd, which immediately attracted attention and caused everyone to focus on him.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 276: A Special Host (2)

“I hereby stand before you to make a declaration in everyone’s presence.” Queen Magetano’s voice boomed, reaching the corners of the banquet hall. Everyone’s gaze followed where she pointed - Lloyd was standing there.

“As I revealed tonight, the Bone Dragon has become a loyal subject of the House of Magentano,” the queen went on. “However, this great achievement is not mine or that of the imperial family. I am here to reveal the praiseworthy individual whose identity has remained hidden from everyone.”

All the top foreign diplomats, nobles, and other prominent figures frowned when they heard this. Each of them started to think carefully about what that could mean. The queen continued.

“The contributors are Lloyd Frontera, whom you are looking at, and his personal guard, Knight Javier Asrahan. The day the Bone Dragon attacked us, these two men bravely took action first, drawing their swords and standing shoulder to shoulder with me on the battlefield.”

Her words meant that the two men had joined her in a fight against the Bone Dragon. Astonishment and awe filled everyone’s eyes.

“Lloyd Frontera, in particular, did not hesitate to risk his life to protect me, and he accomplished the incredible feat of suppressing the Bone Dragon. Thus, I hereby declare…”

Everyone looked from the queen to Lloyd, their ears perked up to catch what the queen had to say.

“Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera county, shall be a meritorious retainer of the House of Magentano. He shall be granted the privilege of legal immunity. He shall not be arrested in dishonor in any event. My judgment, rather than that of other nobles, shall be the sole determiner to decree a punishment for him.”

Everyone at the scene, the foreign diplomats and powerful nobles of the kingdom, gaped in shock as fright filled their eyes. The designation as a meritorious retainer and the right to legal immunity. Both of these were extraordinary.

Their astonishment made sense. The designation was rarely ever given. It was bestowed only to those who accomplished something equal to helping the founding of a nation, restoring power to a deteriorating throne, saving an imperial family from downfall, or preventing the kingdom from destruction. Simply put, only those who saved the kingdom could merit such an appointment.

As such, the authorities vested in those individuals were extremely powerful. The title alone awarded them the treatment equal to a duke or marquess. In addition, a host of other privileges, too many to enumerate, were granted to them. The best had to be the privilege of legal immunity, which immunized them from dishonorable arrests even for grave charges such as treason. And they also received the right to be exempted from the adjudication of nobles. As such, the monarch had to step in for the punishment of meritorious retainers.

This clearly meant one thing. Now, Lloyd was below one person but above everyone. He was the second most powerful figure in the nation apart from the monarch. No one had earned this stature for the past 130 years in the Magentano Kingdom. He was the first.

What's happening...?

The diplomats' heads were now in a muddle. The designation was as breaking news as the subjugation of the Bone Dragon because now, the center of power among the Magentano nobles was about to shift. Such a future seemed to loom over them as they racked their brains on how they ought to format their messages back home. But they weren't the only ones overwhelmed by these thoughts and concerns. The nobles were also troubled.

Haha. Hahaha.

Various emotions gripped them. Lloyd Frontera. He used to be nothing but the eldest son of a noble family in a remote land of the east. A nobody these major nobles paid no attention to and never heard or took an interest in. But this had changed in the past few years.

Starting with the Llo-Javi suspension bridge, he saved the queen from being assassinated. And in the process, news broke out that his personal knight was a sword master. What was more, he prevented the Monster Domino phenomenon from destroying the kingdom's eastern area, accommodating tens and thousands of refugees and giving them new homes. This accomplishment designated his fiefdom as the hub for reconstruction in the east by the queen and elevated his family to the stature of a county. What about now? He was no longer the eldest son of a count. He was now appointed as a meritorious retainer, the first one in 130 years.

I never thought I'd witness this in my lifetime...

The hearts of nobles sincerely loyal to the queen raced in excitement. They internalized their emotions as they clenched their fists. They truly admired and congratulated Lloyd for his honor as a meritorious retainer. However, some of the power-grubbing nobles reacted differently.

How dare that country bumpkin...

They stared at Lloyd coldly but couldn't let their emotions show as the queen made the following declaration.

"Moreover, I proclaim thenceforth that I shall dispatch my loyal Bone Dragon to my faithful servant, Loyd Frontera. The Bone Dragon will reside in Frontera County until I order otherwise. Until then, the Bone Dragon shall support the reconstruction efforts of Frontera county in the east."

"..."

Now, their lips were sealed in sheer fright. Honor, authority, privilege, and now power? Truly, this was overwhelming and shocking. The nobles that used to look down on Lloyd could not even dare think about showing their envy now. Queen Magentano scoffed when she saw everyone's reaction. A faint smile appeared on her lips, and she looked at Lloyd.

It's as I expected. Lloyd Frontera. What a sly and cunning man he is. Everything he said was correct.

Just then, she recalled the conversation that took place 15 days ago when Lloyd visited her office.

"Your Majesty," suggested Lloyd, "I will lend the Bone Dragon to you. So, you will need to declare at the official event that you will lend the Bone Dragon to me."

To this, she replied, "Do you mean I should announce I'm lending you the Bone Dragon that you will lend me?"

"Yes, Your Majesty." Lloyd approached and whispered in her ears with a cunning smile on his face. "I am aware Your Majesty is worried about how you will restore the imperial family's reputation that was damaged from the previous incident with the Bone Dragon. As such, I believe this method is the best way to solve it."

"Do you suggest we reveal the Bone Dragon by opening the same banquet?" Queen Megentano shot an incredulous look.

"That is exactly the case, Your Majesty." Lloyd nodded.

"And assuage those who were left panic-stricken when the Bone Dragon appeared."

"Yes, Your Majesty," said Lloyd affirming once more, "That is my exact point. The kingdom's reputation you are worrying about has been damaged because of the Bone Dragon's uproar. Therefore, all you have to do is show that the Bone Dragon is loyal to you."

"Certainly. That sounds promising." Queen Magentano found herself nodding. Restore her dampened glory by tackling the very source. Nothing could ascertain better results than this. "So, your suggestion to announce that I will be lending the Bone Dragon to you must come from your desire to let it freely roam around people, right?”

“Ahaha... Truly, Your Majesty is the only one who understands me.” Lloyd’s embarrassed smile confirmed one thing for the queen.

Surely, his goal is to live a peaceful life in the province.

At last, Queen Magentano was able to get a vague understanding of what Lloyd was after and why he had come to her.

He came to gain control of the Bone Dragon, but there are currently zero accounts of the Bone Dragon being sighted in the kingdom. In other words, this means that Lloyd had kept the dragon out of everyone’s eyes, probably because he wished to avoid creating suspicion or a scandal.

The Bone Dragon had ransacked the palace and disappeared into thin air. What would happen if the news spreads that the eldest son of the Frontera family masters the Bone Dragon? It’d bring about a wild scandal.

He has been considerate of me, and he plans on remaining unchanged. Up to this point, even now, and in the future as well.

Queen Magentano saw Lloyd in a new light. Right now, Lloyd was advising her to advertise to the world that the Bone Dragon, under Lloyd’s lead, was loyal to her.

Moreover, if I make the declaration that I am lending the Bone Dragon to the Frontera family... Yes. He would be able to have the Bone Dragon around without any hassle while saving my and the royal family’s tainted reputation at the same time.

The solution was beneficial for both of them. Lloyd could put the Bone Dragon to use without being conscious of the prickling stares of people, and she would restore her authority as the queen. Aside from this, there were other potential benefits.

“Hmm, good,” accepted Queen Magentano, smiling at the idea. “I shall take your suggestion. Since everyone outside and inside the kingdom will be more careful around me if things develop as you say.”

“Yes, Your Majesty, that shall be the case,” said Lloyd as he moved back.

“Right. Our reputation suffered horrific damage during the Bone Dragon’s uproar. In the meantime, I’m sure everyone was laughing at us. It must be the case even now. However, if I reveal the Bone Dragon’s loyalty toward us at the banquet, which will happen in fifteen days... Ha. Everyone will think twice about the meaning behind my silence and patience.”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” acknowledged Lloyd. “They will realize that your composed response was a silence filled with strength, the time used to compose a hit list.”

“Yes, indeed.”

It will indeed be the case. She naturally thought so. Even though the actual events would differ from what they advertise, the snickering nobles and diplomats would regard the Magentano House’s silence as intentional. They will think that despite slaying the dragon, the queen had purposefully remained silent and endured all the mockery to assess everyone.

“If events develop that way,” she continued, “No potential enemies inside and outside my kingdom will regard me as an easy target after this.”

“It shall be the case, Your Majesty. Even if an unfavorable or unfortunate incident ever occurs to the imperial family in the future, everyone will have to think twice about their reaction after seeing what will happen.”

“Truly, this event will set an example of our kingdom.”

The House of Magentano would not be looked down on by anyone, and that image was set to bring in a myriad of benefits, including power and political dominance.

Truly, what he said was exactly right.

Jostling out of the conversation with Lloyd in her trance, Queen Magentano gazed through the banquet hall. The frightened and shocked expressions on the faces of top diplomats and nobles were evident. She was satisfied. Their reactions didn't betray her expectations. In particular, the sight of Lloyd's astonishment, which was a rare sight, satisfied her the most.

You requested me to make an announcement about the Bone Dragon. But I have other thoughts. The Bone Dragon was yours to begin with. And yet, you want me to pretend otherwise? That makes me feel like I am your puppet.

As such, she presented Lloyd with a special gift that wasn't mentioned in the deal, adding one more declaration about Lloyd's elevation of stature as the meritorious retainer. And now, Lloyd was throwing a goggle-eyed stare at the queen, who held his gaze with a smile in her eyes. Lloyd could only smile back.

Wow. She got me good this time.

Lloyd once again felt that the queen was an extraordinary person. She wasn't someone to mess with. No, anyone who was careless in dealing with her would face dire consequences. A bitter smile appeared on Lloyd's face.

Woah. I've become a meritorious retainer. Is this for real?

He had never made such a request nor expected it. Thanks to the surprise, he understood something.

The queen is trying to secure me as her political ally.

Lloyd could feel her intentions with every fiber of his being.

She must think my powers surpassed hers. So, instead of keeping me in check, she chose to recruit me to her side.

This decision from the queen couldn't have been an easy one. Normally, kings and queens sought out chances to drag down or kill any powerful individuals under them. But Queen Magentano approached the matter differently by bringing Lloyd onto her side. Her intentions came off even more clearly when he learned of the great privileges granted to meritorious retainers, particularly the right of legal immunity.

The nobles can't hold me in check anymore and only the queen can bestow a lawful judgment on me. This means that she'll bear the political liability and condemnation in the case my family does something wrong. It also means that she won't be willing to let go of me without a fight. Ha. She's a smart queen.

Part of him wondered if the title "Magentano Carry" had a large influence on the queen's decision this time.

Anyway, I've gotten everything I can from the situation.

Whether he became a meritorious retainer or not, his goal remained unchanged.

Once I stop the restoration of destiny, I'll live the rest of my life in my fiefdom in peace.

Lloyd remembered his life plan once again. He made a steadfast resolution: From now on, he shall not be baited by the queen's sweet talks. His life would be that of a rich, unemployed landlord. He carved this resolution into his bones, heart, intestines, and soul. And when the following day came, Lloyd kickstarted his project to lift up the palace from the ground and find the tauranga there.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 277: An Even More Shameless Demand (1)

Lloyd was in the Magenta Palace, which strangely appeared like a giant, half-buried egg. It was structured this way to prevent dragons from lifting it up from the ground. Lloyd was there, carefully inspecting all its nooks and crannies.

Let's see... Survey.

[Scanning will begin.]

Bzzt! Lloyd activated his surveying skill, and various types of information appeared everywhere he could see. There was everything there could be, pieces of information about the structure's design, weight, strength, compound method, etc... He could even see the price of the land because he activated the first optional skill of the surveying skill.

Ding dong.

[Skill Option 1: Land Price Appraisal has been activated.]

[You can appraise the land you measure. (Error rate: +/- 5%)]

Frankly, Lloyd wanted to find out the worth of the palace as it sat at the center of the kingdom. He figured he might as well satisfy his curiosity since he had to run a scan on the palace anyway. The result was jaw-droppingly shocking. He felt a rush of self-hate spread throughout his entire body.

Wooow. I somewhat expected this, but it's obscenely expensive.

His mouth hung open when he saw the price. It was unimaginably, devilishly expensive. The district of Gangnam in central Seoul was nothing compared to this. The value of one corner of the palace was enough to purchase the entire Frontera County and still leave enough money to buy about 1,000 meals.

It’s quite literally priceless.

Come to think of it, such a price made sense. After all, the House of Magentano was currently enjoying its golden days in history. The queen was a mighty sword master, backed by great lords in the province who gave her unwavering allegiance. On top of it all, she now had the Bone Dragon, which just meant another formidable weapon was added to her already stable and strong political and military arsenal.

Though technically, the Bone Dragon is mine.

But people didn’t know that. They thought that the dragon was loyal to the queen. In their knowledge, the Bone Dragon was dispatched to Frontera County because she ordered it to go.

All of these factors contributed to the dramatic hike in the palace’s value. Now, it’s at an overwhelmingly high and unreachable level that even its long-standing enemy, the sultan’s kingdom, will have to submit.

Literally speaking, the Magentano Kingdom was a global hegemony. So, it went without saying that the price of its land had skyrocketed.

Ha... Crap. I’m jealous.

As he continued his thoughts, a pang of envy crept up in him. But he soon shook his head, telling himself that now wasn’t the time to be concerned about trivial matters like the price of land. He urgently needed to find some tauranga, and the Jewel of Truth had to be constructed so that the status quo would continue without the restoration of destiny.

I don’t have much time.

Just then, Lloyd remembered that the count was set to fall off the horse in less than three years. To be more exact, he had two years and seven or eight months, give or take. Someone might say that Lloyd had enough time. It was longer than the required period of mandatory military service in South Korea, after all. But to Lloyd, it didn’t feel long at all.

I doubt I'll be able to retrieve the key materials for construction in time. The construction of the jewel is still left for me to do, and I need to find a way to stop the restoration of destiny after building it. And it'll take more time to execute the solution I find. Really, time isn't on my side.

When Lloyd thought about all the work ahead of him, he could only think about how much time he lacked.

I don't have time to dawdle around here.

So he affirmed his resolution once again. It was to make the most of his time and minimize the amount of trials and errors he went through to save time. And that was the very reason why he was conducting a survey at the moment.

"Are you certain, Young Master, that there's tauranga in this palace?"

"Of course." Lloyd looked at Javier, who was walking by his side as he asked. "So, we have to find it."

"Do you plan on harvesting it once you do?"

"Yeah. Just that. Nothing else." Clean and neat." Lloyd shrugged. "Look, I told the queen I'd lift up the entire palace, but realistically, that would be too wasteful."

"By wasteful, what do you mean?" There was genuine curiosity in Javier's voice.

"The situation will get too complicated. Think about it," said Lloyd, "What do you think will happen if I lift this palace up like I'm pulling radishes? You think it will remain intact?"

"Even I can see that will not be the case," replied Javier calmly.

"Right? It's going to take someone with extraordinary strength to lift up the palace without causing any damage. Even if the Bone Dragon and Bibeong worked together for the job, it wouldn't be enough. Unless Dragon King Verkis comes out to help us."

It was true. Bibeong and the Bone Dragon would only cause serious damage to the palace by doing so. To avoid any damage to the palace, it had to be plucked out in one almighty and clean pull that ensured an equally clean return. The only person Lloyd knew who could do it was Dragon King Verkis.

That sleepy dragon has actually done it twice before. Moreover, I even saw there were two palaces standing tall in his cave as if they were decorations. Those palaces hardly had any damage on them.

But bringing the dragon king here was impossible. As far as Lloyd was concerned, Verkis was the laziest creature in existence, so there was a chance that Lloyd would only invite wrath from the king if he tried to make him move.

“Anyway,” went on Lloyd, “If I lift up the palace and cause damage, I’ll have to make repairs. I already have a mountain of work to do, so I don’t have the time to do repairs. So-”

“Your plan is to locate the tauranga and just take out the area with the pieces of stone,” finished Javier in understanding.

“That’s exactly right. Like popping a pimple.”

That would minimize the damage to the structure. In addition, it would cut down the time needed for construction.

“So, I need to hurry and find the tauranga here. Better if it’s in a spot conducive for us to harvest.”

“But,” pointed out Javier, “It appears that you have already surveyed all the convenient areas to harvest the stone.”

“Yeah, so I’m starting to get sad.”

Lloyd sighed at length. It was just what Javier had said. Lloyd had wished for the tauranga to be found in an easy, harvestable spot. Reasoning that at least one or two pieces of it had to be an easy find, Lloyd checked the roofs first, followed by the ceilings, pillars, and floors. But the stone was nowhere to be found in any of those places. Lloyd was starting to get restless.

Tsk. It's going to be troublesome if I find all of the stone underground or around the palace's foundation.

Lloyd direly wished that wouldn't be the case. Begging and pleading, he tensed his eyes and continued his survey as he scanned every palatial corner for over three days. He even was granted access to secret places and vaults with the generous cooperation of the queen. But even still, tauranga was nowhere to be found. By then, Lloyd's anxiety grew worse, along with his dry, bloodshot eyes. And finally, two more days later, he discovered pieces of tauranga.

"And... it had to be here out of everywhere... Really?" Lloyd heaved a sigh. Once again, he realized that his life never went easily. Why? It was because he had found the tauranga at the far bottom portion of the palace's foundation.

I wouldn't have found it without my optional skill.

Lloyd gazed down below. The chunks of tauranga were in the stone chamber, the lowest underground floor. The humidity was so thick down there that various types of molds fought each other to find more space. To be more exact, Lloyd was studying a giant rock beneath several layers of stones. That was the tauranga that Lloyd had been direly searching for. But its location was extremely, utterly, and seriously problematic.

I'm screwed.

They were inserted in the foundation that supported the weight of the palace. To be more exact, they made up the backbone of the palatial foundation's isolated piers

Okay. I can't just take them out. If I were to compare... Hmm, yeah. Yes, it'd be like taking out and replacing the stakes that hold the entire weight of a skyscraper without toppling it off.

Or it was the same as flicking the bottom of a Jenga tower without toppling it over. In other words, the tauranga here was used as the backbone for the isolated piers in order to support the palace's foundation. The worst thing was that all twelve of them were used separately. What would happen if Lloyd haphazardly pulled them out?

The palace will sink.

Just like a Jenga Tower that topples by wrongfully removing the bottom blocks, the foundation of the palace was set to sink and bring about a disaster. One way to prevent this from happening was to prepare stones that were the same in size and strength as the tauranga used for the pier and throw them in as Lloyd pulled everything out. It would be a quick exchange like replacing a part of a machine. But the process of getting there, as well as the clean-up afterward, appeared to be quite challenging.

Tsk. Should I approach this by digging from the top until the foundation appears? No. That won't do. For starters, each piece of the tauranga is way too big. The smallest piece of the stone looks to be nineteen feet in length. I'll have to turn over the floor here to salvage it out and make a tunnel to move the stone outside. Nah. The job will become too complicated if I do that.

Countless layers of floors, walls, and other structures stood between where he was positioned and outside the palace. Even if Lloyd managed to pull this piece of tauranga out safely, he would have to procure a pathway that was at least nineteen feet long.

Making the pathway isn't the hard part. The job after that is the challenge.

If he were to fix and repair the areas he dug out, it would only add another mountain of tasks to his list and also take a considerable amount of time. Lloyd didn't like that. If he could, he wanted to finish his job in the most efficient and orderly way possible.

I should think it over.

Lloyd got a feeling that the answer could be found in his wide breadth of knowledge. Once he sensed that, he went straight back to his VIP chamber and confined himself for two days in a row. He even skipped singing the lullaby for Javier during this time. He shut himself in his room, looking over various calculations and formulas based on the data he retrieved from surveying. He considered various factors, including the data points he retrieved of the foundation from surveying, the weight each pier held, and the expected changes that would occur to the ground if the tauranga was replaced with something else. Lloyd considered, predicted, prepared, experimented, calculated, and decided.

“Good.”

As soon as a decision was made, he left his room, entered the palace's main building, and requested the audience with the queen to the Lord of the Chamberlain. He was then led to the queen's office without much waiting, and he fell on his knees as soon as he entered and instantly got to business.

“Hail to Her Majesty. I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of Frontera County, am honored to be in the audience of the rightful owner of this land. I requested a meeting as I have an urgent request to make.”

“You have a request? And it is urgent?” asked Queen Magentano.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Queen Magentano frowned a little. It felt like Lloyd had been paying her visits with ease recently, and she got the feeling that his requests had become bolder and more open.

Soon, his arrogance will soar through the roof. Even though he’ll be careful not to cross any boundaries.

Given his cunning temperament, he would never do so. He’ll be insolent, but not to the point he’d cross the line. Doing so will only plunge him into the life he doesn’t want to live.

He will be a king after driving me out or declaring independence.

But that wasn’t the life Lloyd wanted. Laughter escaped her when she thought so.

His goal is to laze and idle around despite his abilities and powers. And yet, he works harder than anyone else in the world. No one will be more amusing and ironic than this man.

Lloyd amazed her. At the same time, she felt sorry for him. Her voice softened slightly more. “I see. You have the right to make a request. What is it?” What kind of outrageous request could he have come with? She felt curious and sorry at the same time.

“Yes, Your Majesty. If I dare may...” It was like Lloyd’s tongue was equipped with a twin-turbo engine. It smashed the gas pedal without hesitation. “I would like to request your assistance in performing what is called the freezing method. This is one of the methods to improve the foundation, and it was first used in the 19th century in the United Kingdom when they excavated a vertical shaft in its mines. It operates by inserting the freezing pipe and injecting -22 Fahrenheit icy liquid into the ground, freezing the moisture in the soil around the pipes like ice cream. After some time, the frozen pillars thicken until they touch each other, forming a giant ice wall. Since icy walls are extremely harder than the soils-”

“Pause there,” Queen Magentano raised her hand.

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd stopped and shamelessly stared at the queen, who held his gaze with a mildly sickening look. And a part of her felt that it’d be better to grant him whatever he wanted instead of hearing him out and bleeding her ears.

At last, she sighed and asked, “So, what is it that you want specifically?”

“Here it is, Your Majesty.”

Swoosh! Lloyd brought a note from his pocket and held it to the queen. And he spoke in a brazen and shameless manner as if he was demanding something back from her.

“I would like Your Majesty to permit me to freely use ‘The Heart of Winter,’ one of the three divine items of the House of Magentano.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 278: An Even More Shameless Demand (2)

The Heart of Winter was a divine marble that held the frigidity of the harshest season of the year. Despite its diameter of one inch, it was a malicious weapon that carried the freezing nature of winter and was one of the three divine items in the House of Magentano. Its power was beyond imaginable. If the frigid energy in the marble was ever released, the entire land around it would be swept with a chilling weather that was worse than the Ice Age. In just a single day, it could freeze over an entire fiefdom. Within ten days, the average temperature of a region as big as the Gyeonggi Province would plummet by twenty degrees. And the harvest for that year, as well as humans and livestock, would be ruined.

*That's what was said in the novel. Because of its destructive power, it was used only twice by the House of Magentano throughout history.*Lloyd recalled the mid-part of the story in the novel, where the Heart of Winter was used for the third time.

Queen Magentano utilizes it after she becomes a tyrant. She uses it to end the riot in the West and set an example of her terrorizing regime. Ultimately, this destroyed five fiefdoms and caused famine and calamity across the western region.

It was nothing short of a disaster. Too many people to count perished in the cold, and eventually, there was a great famine where countless people died of hunger the following year. That was how powerful and destructive the Heart of Winter was.

That should be why the queen is now giving me that look.

A wry smile escaped Lloyd. The queen's gaze wasn't that of fright or anger. It was the opposite. She was giving him a very pitiful look.

"My..." she sighed, her voice dripping with pity. "I should have stopped you when you busted your gut. I am responsible for this."

Lloyd wasn't sure where she was getting at.

“Humans are not livestock. We ought to rest and enjoy ourselves when we can. But you could not. You were always on the go to overcome the disaster in the east and reconstruct it after. That explains it. That is why. Tsk, tsk.”

“...”

“But it is all fine. You are my meritorious retainer. You may sometimes speak like a fool, a madman, or as if you are unwell. Even then, I can understand you. How could I not? How could I not when you ended up in this state after living such a diligent life?”

“Um... Your Majesty...”

“Yes,” the queen put on a benevolent smile, and her voice sounded like she was talking to a child. “Speak up. Speak up, Frontera.”

“Um, first of all,” pointed out Lloyd, “I am not a fool and did not go mad.”

“Of course, that’s what you say. I never heard of a madman who admitted his state of mind out loud.”

“The thing is, Your Majesty, I am completely fine,” Lloyd pressed further.

“Hmm. We will see,” said the queen.

“How can I prove that I am mentally sound to you, Your Majesty?”

“Will you marry me, Lloyd Frontera?”

“Please forgive me, Your Majesty.”

“Tsk, so you are sane.”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.” His wry smile deepened. Moving past the scary question, Lloyd wiped his cold sweat and went on, “I did not lose it, Your Majesty. I am not speaking gibberish, either. This request is being made after a series of precise predictions, calculations, and conclusions.”

“So,” mused the queen, “You wish to borrow the Heart of Winter for the foreseeable future?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“You should be aware of what kind of item that is.”

“Certainly, Your Majesty, and that is why I requested an audience with you.” Lloyd hung his head down. It was true. The Heart of Winter was a divine item owned by the royal family, and it wasn’t something anyone, including the man with unreserved trust from the queen, could easily get his hands on. Lending it would be the same as increasing the queen’s level of support by 100 folds.

Of course. Even the queen can’t unilaterally use the three divine items. It can be used only if the kingdom is on the brink of collapse or if the queen requests to use it. There needs to be a unanimous agreement from the nobles in the House of Peers for anyone to use it.

Of course, there were exceptions. A case in point was when Queen Magentano became a tyrant in the novel.

But that was only possible because she was an evil ruler and did everything she wanted to. She beheaded anyone, be it a noble or a subject, who disagreed with her on the spot. The kingdom was heading toward downfall. But now, the circumstances are different.

The queen was extremely rational, and the kingdom was very stable. The power of the queen and the custom of the nobles were in harmony as they led the national affairs. And so, Queen Magentano wouldn’t even think about unilaterally permitting Lloyd to use the Heart of Winter. So, if Lloyd wanted to use it, he’d have to ask the queen to file a request for its usage to the House of Peers and obtain its agreement.

“Whew. Then you should also know that this puts a political burden on my part,” said Queen Magentano.

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“And yet, you are making this request?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. For there is an imperative need for it.”

“An imperative need, you say. Explain.”

“Yes. If I may, Your Majesty, the Heart of Winter is essential to performing the freezing method I explained to you a couple of minutes ago.”

“Freezing method?” She frowned a little. “Your explanation was too esoteric for me to understand it clearly.”

“To put it simply,” said Lloyd, “the method involves freezing the moisture in the soil by inserting the pipes underground and injecting cold air.”

“Freeze the water in the ground?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. That will allow the ground to harden more than usual.”

“I believe it will. Much like how the soil gets as hard as a rock on wintry mornings. But what do you plan to achieve by freezing the ground?”

Lloyd did not hesitate to answer. “I plan to dig a large cave down the castle, Your Majesty.”

“A cave?” Queen Magentano frowned a little. But Lloyd was relieved. Her frown meant he managed to pique her interest.

Reading the positive atmosphere in the room, he quickly replied, “Yes, Your Majesty. It is to harvest the tauranga I mentioned to you the last time.”

“Right. You said you were looking for the material called tauranga. Are you saying that it is beneath this palace?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. To be more specific, they were used to make the isolated pillars of the foundation that were placed down like tree roots in the ground.”

“Will it not affect the palace if you pull those out?”

“That is where the freezing method comes into the picture.”

“Be more specific.”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Lloyd replied, sensing things were going somewhere. And then he began to rattle off, “Once the ground freezes and becomes more firm than usual, it will allow the vertical shafts I dig under the palace to hold still without falling apart. And it will also give me a bit of time until I replace the pieces of tauranga with a replacement stone.”

What he said was true. The freezing method was first developed in the nineteenth century in the United Kingdom, and it allowed excavations of vertical shafts to be done safely and free from collapse. In modern days, it was a great way to revamp any land by using excavation while protecting the vital structures on them.

So, it’s a perfect method to pull out the pieces of tauranga in the foundation.

The project involved digging vertical and horizontal shafts underneath. But that would inevitably sink the palatial foundation. The freezing method could prevent such from happening. Moreover, it could lower the weight being added to the independent pillars when the Taurangas are replaced. That was what Lloyd was after, and it was the product of countless theories, calculations, simulations, and experiments.

So, please! Queen! Your Majesty! Come on, my dear friend! Just this time!

Lloyd desperately hoped that the queen would happily agree and allow him to use a more convenient method for construction. He looked up at the queen with puppy dog eyes.

“Ha.” Scoff escaped Queen Magentano, and she finally shook her head in defeat. “You are truly incorrigible.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“Tsk. I have not granted your request yet.”

“Forgive my impudence, Your Majesty.”

“Sure. You should be sorry. You are shamelessly making such a burdensome and outrageous request. Yet, you also make it impossible for me to refuse your request.”

“Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Highness.”

“I have not permitted you yet, I said.”

“But Your Majesty, your eyes tell me that you will.”

“You dare to claim to know my intentions?”

“Forgive me, Your Majesty.” Lloyd looked away.

“Tsk. If only I could hit you right now.”

“Your Majesty?” Lloyd immediately looked up.

“Not at all. I whispered my wish out loud, so forget about it. However, I have a question I would like to ask you.”

“I am at your service.” Lloyd hung his head down again.

Queen Magentano asked, “Can you promise me that your project that involves the usage of the Heart of Winter and taking out the tauranga will not harm the imperial family or me?”

“Certainly, Your Majesty,” said Lloyd.

“Good. Then you have my permission.”

“Excuse me...?” Surprised by her immediate approval, Lloyd raised his head. He found her smiling confidently.

“You made a promise, and I shall trust it. Do you need anything more?”

“Certainly not, Your Majesty. However...” said Lloyd, stopping midway.

“However, what?”

“Your immediate approval makes me feel like a bad man...”

“A bad man? That doesn’t sound bad.”

“Excuse me?”

“Never mind. Anyway, you would not have opted to use such a tedious method if your intent was to harm me and the imperial family. I am simply trusting that you have good intentions and won’t go in that direction. So, do leave now. I will persuade the House of Peers.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty.”

At last, he obtained permission from the queen! Lloyd quickly paid his respects, hiding his joy, and left at lightning speed. He was worried that she might change her mind. After he left, Queen Magentano held back her bitter smile.

“Ha.”

Up until a while ago, her office felt like a busy market. But now, it felt desolate and aloof without Lloyd.

“Truly, he is a sly and cunning man.”

She wanted to keep him by her side and put him to the toil for the rest of his life, so she could lay the foundation for the kingdom to last over 1,000 years. But Lloyd didn’t allow himself to be on her palm. And now, it was as good as half losing him as he came to possess powers too great for her to control. Tables have turned now, and she was faced with the danger of being dragged around by him. It was happening at the very moment. She already had a pile of work to take care of, which only grew taller with the addition of Lloyd’s request. It looked like she had a lot to prepare to get a positive consensus from the nobles.

“How dare he put me to work. And yet, he only seeks me when he needs something. He truly is a bad man,” grumbled Queen Magentano.

♣

Ten days passed. It had been a busy time for Lloyd. He had to get ready to freeze the ground. He hired laborers with the help of the queen and put together the materials for the construction. Afterward, he closely measured the spot for the vertical shafts. To get a deeper look, Lloyd mana blasted the ground, selected the areas for the freeze pipes, and designed the plan.

For the queen, the last ten days had been equally busy. She filed a request to use the Heart of Winter for the House of Peers. At first, they expressed dismay because it was for some repairs in the palace. They wondered if it was indeed necessary, even if the repair was urgent and had a direct correlation with the authority of the royal house. They doubted her at first. But as time progressed, the atmosphere of the house changed as each member slowly came around with either persuasion or bribery. The queen's coaxing, flattery, and gifts worked. Eventually, all of them signed the agreement, and a consensus was reached.

At last, the Heart of Winter was transferred to the construction site under the strict management and guard of the royal magicians and knights. Although the marble was a strategic weapon carrying horrifying powers, none of it mattered to Lloyd. He didn't give a rat's ass about its power and danger. It was nothing but a handy tool to freeze the ground. Just like that, the construction to attain the Tauranga began. But Lloyd, Javier, and the other laborers were clueless about something.

Thud! Thud! The Heart of Winter, resting inside a specially designed control chest, was now resonating with Lloyd's heartbeat.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 279: A Lucky Accident (1)

Hmm?

Having arrived at the construction site before anyone else in the morning, Lloyd was getting ready for the day when he felt something strange.

What the heck? What's wrong with my heart?

Something felt off. His heart was racing without any particular trigger, and it strangely felt cold, as though someone threw a scoop of ice cream inside him.

What is this?

It wasn't serious, however. Just faint enough for a dull person to miss it. But Lloyd wasn't dull. He owned the manaheart of an intermediate-level sword expert. He detected even the smallest and faintest changes in his heart.

Strange. This has never happened to me.

Lloyd closed his eyes and examined his heart, focusing on his senses. With that, his pounding chest felt even more clear.

So, it's not my heart... It's the manaheart in my heart moving on its own.

His manaheart was moving the cold mana on its own. But that was only for a moment. Right now, the cold energy was going away.

What was that? Should I ask Javier later?

Since Javier was more of an expert than him when it came to the manaheart or the mana circle, Lloyd decided to ask him after today's job.

I kind of want to ask him immediately if I can.

Except that Lloyd couldn't. He was sorry about it. Javier wasn't with Lloyd. He was training with the queen and set to stay there all day as her sparring partner to help improve her fighting skills.

While I’m asking, I should also get him to inspect my mana circle.

Lloyd put that on his to-do list. The timing was good since he feared that his manaheart skill would increase to a high level and give him sword master syndrome along with horrible insomnia. So, there was a need to get it checked to find out if his manaheart was leveling up without his knowledge.

Insomnia? No, thank you.

His shoulders quivered at the thought, and now, the inexplicable cold sensation in his manaheart was completely gone. A little later, a group of laborers started to arrive at the site one after another.

“You guys are late!” bawled Lloyd when he saw them. “You should come on time to prepare your work tools and join the morning meeting, don’t you think?”

Lloyd’s reproach hastened their steps, and the site immediately bustled with vibrant activities. Lloyd and the laborers began to move around busily. The Heart of Winter inside the control chest did too.

♣

Thump... Thump...

The Winter of Heart was stored in a chest specially designed to control its capacity for construction. And now, it was beating. It was pounding like the heart of a human in the presence of a lover. It was thumping like the person who met their life partner. This resonation was unprecedented and like never before. As it picked up a strange and rare sense of familiarity from a human, it could not help but resonate and vibrate. It aligned its rhythm to the person’s heartbeat.

Its faint ego posited a theory. Perhaps, this was the day its creator, Ice Dragon Tyrannus, had once predicted in the distant past when the Magentano Kingdom was founded. It wondered if Ice Dragon Tyrannus created it and presented it to the founding king, Mikael, for this reason.

Thump...Thump...

It probably was the case, the Heart of Winter thought. This meeting had to be fate, not a coincidence. How could it be otherwise? This was the first time it had ever met a human whose manaheart possessed similar qualities to that of a dragon. The Heart of Winter never imagined that encountering an entity like this would be possible.

Thud... Thud...

The Heart of Winter quietly quivered in the chest and sent a message to the human's manaheart as it shyly resonated.

♣

Ding dong.

Hmm?

Lloyd had been engrossed in the excavation project. He triple-manablasted the ground to dig the vertical shaft, sent Ppodong to expand and flatten it, and assigned laborers to clear the rocks and dirt before plastering its walls with temporary concrete. He also took part in shoveling and even supervised the whole process. As such, he couldn't focus on anything else. But when a message floated in front of his eyes out of the blue, he stopped.

What is this?

He looked at the message with dismay.

[Manaheart Skill Option ④ : Half-Human Half-Dragon has been activated.]

[Your mana, which coincidentally came to possess the same unique quality seen in a dragon's heart, is attracting the attention of a dragon-like creature. This mysterious dragon-like creature is considerably curious about you, and one small encounter will be enough for it to shower you with explosive favor.]

What?

Lloyd wiggled his brow.

A dragon-like creature? Something like that is nearby me? And it's even curious about me?

Lloyd hurriedly looked around, but all he could see were the fantastical creatures like Ppodong, laborers, and royal magicians managing and monitoring the chest of the Heart of Winter.

Is there a dragon among them?

Lloyd soon banished the thought.

The message said a dragon-like creature, not a dragon.

So, there was a creature akin to a dragon. The message confused Lloyd, and he had no clue as to what it meant.

Tsk. Things have been strange since earlier.

Something peculiar has been taking place since this morning. His manaheart produced chilly air out of nowhere, and now, a message appeared to tell him that a dragon-like creature was curious about him. None of this had ever happened to him before.

Could it be the Heart of Winter? I don't think so. It's a magical item, so it can't be related to the dragons. Tsk. Oh, whatever.

Unable to find any answer, Lloyd pushed the thought away and decided to focus on his present task. The vertical shaft construction couldn't be done carelessly, so Lloyd figured he should focus on the site before anything else.

Nothing is more dangerous than losing focus at a construction site.

That was the nature of construction sites. Even if everything looked like it was in place and safe, even if you were a seasoned worker with decades of experience, a moment of lost concentration would lead to an accident. Lloyd had witnessed such unfortunate accidents a few times before.

I've seen smaller accidents that resulted in a back or shoulder incident. Otherwise, I saw a grinder blade bounce off as it cut through a block of wood before. The worst accidents are... Well, it happened to the man whose family was abroad... Tsk. Let's not dwell on it.

Lloyd didn't want to continue his sudden thought as it saddened him. Anyway, his point was that construction sites were filled with danger.

We're excavating the vertical shafts.

He was already digging 32 feet under the ground. The plasterers were dangled in the air as they plastered temp concrete on the walls, like the skyscraper window cleaners and painters. Therefore, it was imperative for Lloyd to keep a close eye on the job because they could get hurt otherwise.

Lloyd had the duty to responsibly supervise the progress, his keen eyes never missing anything. As he spent every day, alert and vigilant, focusing on the job, he soon forgot about the message. The construction developed smoothly, and eventually, the shaft's depth reached 147 feet. Next, Lloyd instructed Javier to bore several horizontal holes, about eleven inches in diameter, beside the vertical shaft toward the palace. By this time, Javier had free control over his manablast. He could determine its length and diameter.

"Carefully and position it correctly," instructed Lloyd. "Follow the angle I marked for you. If you swerve even a little, your mana blast will strike or penetrate the piers of the palace. You know that can't happen, right?"

"Of course."

Kaboom! Each time Javier's sword glinted, it produced hundreds of yards-long horizontal holes that passed beneath the palace foundation. After a few days, dozens of such holes were bored. Next, Lloyd inserted customized metal pipes into some of them and connected one side of each to the refrigerant supply pipe, which was then attached to the Winter of Heart chest. The royal magicians were the ones operating the chest.

Whoosh... Under the magicians' control, the chest reacted and slowly opened up, revealing the Heart of Winter. And it started to emit frigid air, the volume of it kept well under control.

Craaack... Crack! The chilly air produced frost around the chest and the refrigerant supply pipe.

Craaack! The white frost soon spread to the metal pipes at a fast speed and started to harden the moisture inside the soil around the pipes.

Great. Everything's going according to my plan.

Lloyd clenched his fists as he observed the freezing ground with his surveying skill.

The Heart of Winter is really cold. It lives up to its title as a divine treasure of our kingdom.

It wasn't like an ordinary cold freezer. Its temperature was hundreds of degrees in the negative. The amazing part was that Lloyd wasn't employing its full capabilities.

At this rate, I should be able to freeze the entire foundation under the palace within just a few days. Well, theoretically, though, I shouldn't freeze the ground at such rapid speed.

Supposedly, this method was to be conducted slowly due to the way water took up more space when it was frozen. If the ground froze too rapidly, all the moisture in the ground would expand. That would cause the ground to protuberate and considerably damage the structure.

And so, typically, the ground is frozen over several months, as slowly as possible, while ensuring that the protuberation is as controlled as possible. So, it's only done in construction sites that have enough time and space.

But time was a luxury to Lloyd. He didn’t have several months to waste, so he opted for the slightly drastic measure, which was inserting only a handful of pipes for freezing among all the holes Javier had dug.

I left the rest of them empty. That will prevent the ground from being uplifted. The vacant holes will cover the expanded size.

Lloyd did the calculation already. The vacant holes will make up for the holes that will expand once frozen. Thanks to this clever idea, he could freeze the entire palace ground within a few days, and there wasn’t much elevation in the ground. Once Lloyd checked that all was good, he moved on to the next part of the construction.

“Okay!” shouted Lloyd. “Bangul will chomp up the dirt first, followed by Ppodong, who will flatten the ground and follow behind. The rest of you guys will transfer the rocks and dirt. Blacksmiths! What did I tell you to make out of Bangul’s rebars?”

“Rebar fixtures!”

“Yes, indeed. I am sure you’ve familiarized yourselves with the measurements.”

Everyone got to work. Now, they started to dig a horizontal tunnel from the vertical shaft they had dug before, heading toward the palace. As for this, Lloyd utilized the shield method, which he once used to construct the bituminous coal mine back in his fiefdom. This time, however, it was more developed and larger in scale. Everyone became one and energetically excavated the horizontal tunnel, which was designed to be about twenty feet in diameter.

In the process, Lloyd frequently made use of the rebar supports to prevent the tunnel from collapsing, and afterward, he inserted lock bolts on all sides and plastered concrete on them. The concrete played the same role as the short concrete in the New Austrian Tunnelling Method (NATM) by being the additional layer to the tunnel inside. Moreover, the ground around the tunnel was extremely stable because it was frozen. The ice and soil naturally supported the weight surrounding the tunnel. This was also one of the core principles of NATM. Lloyd's careful consideration and application design created a synergy and ensured the tunnel excavation was smooth sailing. The tunnel's distance increased as a result.

Five days. Ten days. 15 days. Time passed and the tunnel finally reached its destination: 16 feet below the isolated piers where the tauranga was. There, Lloyd altered the direction of the excavation.

This time, we're going upward.

Now, it was time to dig upward from the bottom to the top until they would be able to take out the tauranga from the side of the pillars. Everyone became one in boring the upward tunnel, clearing all the stones and rocks, and flattening and reinforcing the vertical passage. The tunnel moved upward along the isolated piers. And just like that, everyone believed the construction would occur without any accidents. It was stable in everyone's eyes. But on the same morning they started this part of the project, an accident took place. An obstacle nobody foresaw. A lucky accident that would become a key stepping stone to Lloyd's future development.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 280: A Lucky Accident (2)

Cesare Di Bergamo, a low-ranking royal magician, was born with a silver spoon in his mouth. Everything used to go well for him. He was born into the family of Marquess Bergamo, who had raised top royal magicians for several generations. He was the fifth son of the family and grew up with host privileges around him. As the rightful son of a noble family set to lead the kingdom and manage many under him, Cesare received an elite education, and his life lacked nothing. As a result, when he became ten, he almost mastered all the basic theories of magic, which earned him the title of a genius.

That was when it hit Cesare. He was a special being. A dignified and important person. He deserved special treatment from others. From then on, he didn't view anyone below him as a human being. They were merely a bunch of subservient vermin, bugs that would lick his shoes at his command.

With that mindset, he enrolled in the royal academy. He continued to receive special treatment there. After all, he was the fifth son of a family that raised top royal magicians. Moreover, they were distantly related to the imperial family. His sixth grandmother had been a royal princess, which meant that divine royal blood flowed in him. Cesare was untouchable in school. The students, housemasters, and professors didn't dare to treat him badly, and even the president of the academy studied the same year with his father. With power on his shoulder that gave him all sorts of privileges, he ruled the roost in the academy. It only took one word from him to get something done. His grade, the way he was treated. Everything. This confirmed something in him again. He was special. Even in a place where noble sons and daughters came to study, he was special. Anyone below him deserved to be treated like vermin.

As such, Cesare pestered the sons of low-ranking nobles. He had no grand reasons for doing so. It was simply amusing to watch them beg and plead before his nose. And Julian Frontera amused him the most. The petite fellow from a remote eastern province provided him with the greatest entertainment. Unlike the others, who never met him in the eyes after one bullying, Julian's eyes remained alive and spirited. Whatever harassment the vermin received, the next day, he shot back with the same clarity in his eyes. Furthermore, he received good grades at every chance he was given as if he wasn't bullied. To Cesare, Julian was an amusing toy worth destroying to pieces, and so he decided to dial up his bullying by ordering the other lowly students to harass Julian, saying they have to do so until he dies. A hick from a province shouldn't be getting good grades. A man of low birth was better suited to lick his shoes in subservience. The bullying was endless. However, then something happened.

Lloyd Frontera...

The name was stuck in Cesare's head. Lloyd Frontera. The older brother of Julian, his toy. Lloyd ruined everything. After taking Julian out of the academy and buying the trust of the queen by building that weird suspension bridge, the man reported everything to her at the completion event.

He told the queen about Julian's bullies. How those bullies defiled the fair and honorable spirit of the academy. With that came Cesare's downfall. He was the leader of the group of students Lloyd had reported to the queen. The result of this event was merciless. Enraged, the queen expelled Cesare from the academy, and he was forced to keep a low profile in his manor for two years. But those two years felt more like a barless prison.

But what really hurt him was the loss of reputation from high society. He became the black sheep. Even though his status blocked him from more serious punishment, torture, or execution, his honor and future were taken away from him. He was out of the queen's favor. He was stripped of the chance to become a public official and ended up as a laughingstock among the nobles. Even his family looked down on him; his parents never spoke a word to him since the incident. And his brothers and sisters tossed repulsive gazes at him as though he was the embarrassment of the family. Even the servants and maids gossiped behind his back.

How dare you! You're nothing but vermin!

Cesare felt indignant. The treatment he was receiving was unfair. Even when his father pleaded to the queen on his knees for forgiveness, which secured him a low-ranking job as a royal magician, Cesare was terribly embittered about the whole thing. He felt cheated. He was supposed to be special.

Of course! I'm more capable than other magicians! More noble in blood! Yet what? A low-ranking magician?

It was a complete bogus. With his status and power, it was only right for him to be placed as the second most powerful magician from the start. But what happened to Lloyd, who destroyed his life by telling on him to the queen? He was having a streak of success, unbefitting his status!

A meritorious retainer?!

Lloyd was even appointed as a meritorious retainer for suppressing the Bone Dragon. No words came out when Cesare heard the news. No. Even now, he was left speechless.

"Everything all good today?"

It was Lloyd who spoke. Cesare shut his mouth and simply glared at Lloyd with a straight face. Lloyd shrugged back with a faint grin.

"Having a bad morning, I guess? Well, loosen up. Have a good day today," greeted Lloyd nonchalantly.

Cesare couldn't tell if the latter was being brazen or friendly as he greeted him. Lloyd was about to leave the operation room for the Heart of Winter when Cesare spoke as he looked at Lloyd's back.

"Wait, hold on." Quite surprised that he called Lloyd, he impulsively asked, "Do you not know who I am?"

Lloyd turned and stared at Cesare. "I know who you are."

"You do?" Cesare asked in a rude tone.

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded, and in a matter-of-fact voice, he added, “You’re a magician from the palace who manages the Heart of Winter. Hahaha.”

“...”

“Thanks to you, the construction is going smoothly. The Heart of Winter is stably providing cold air. Once this construction is finished, why don’t we have dinner together with everyone else? Have a good day today, then.”

Lloyd innocently greeted him farewell and left the room. Now, Cesare was left alone in the room. There was a flush of uncontrollable rage and shame on his face.

How dare he... not recognize me?

Cesare was utterly dumbfounded. He thought Lloyd would remember and berate him for bullying Julian. But this wasn’t the case.

He doesn’t remember me. It’s all because my life has been ruined, and I’m just a low-ranking magician. On the other hand, things are going superbly for him as a meritorious retainer of the imperial family. How dare he... a mere vermin!

Lloyd did not remember. Even after destroying Cesare’s life, he didn’t recognize him. And as though that was not enough, Lloyd was his superior.

He attained the trust of the queen and became the supervisor for the repair construction of the palace... And I’m here rotting, doing what he tells me to do. Why? Why is that?

Cesare couldn’t wrap his head around it. He was a special person. Someone far too dignified to be rotting down here. He couldn’t erase the thought that something was going wrong with this world. He couldn’t stop thinking that his life was over.

One day, two days, and soon, five days later. His rancor and disappointment increased sizably. And finally, on the day the upward vertical cave construction started, which was the same morning he received another scornful glance from his brothers, Cesare made a decision as he came to work.

I should die.

But not alone. He'd take Lloyd Frontera with him to Hell and ruin his project, even tainting his reputation in the process. He came to work with such a dark resolution in mind and sought for an opportunity all morning and afternoon. And finally, he made his move.

"Eup…?"

Cesare brought out his dagger, plunged it into the back of his colleague in the room, and covered his mouth. His colleague fell to the floor.

I don't have time.

Six royal knights were outside. Even though they were guarding outside and couldn't hear the noise of his colleague falling because the doors were thick, it would be only a matter of time for them to notice that something was going on inside.

Right now.

Cesare chanted to himself his malicious goal of killing everyone, Lloyd Frontera in particular, and stood before the chest that contained the Heart of Winter. The chest required two royal magicians' magic power to control it, but this wasn't an impossible task for him. Although he was only one person without his colleague, Cesare was a talented magician and could somewhat control it on his own.

Argh...!

Cesare upped the capacity of the chest as much as he could. Beyond its limit. To the point of damaging the chest. There was an immediate reaction.

Whoosh...! The chest made an eerie noise as frost swept over the chest at lightning speed. And Cesare, who was standing in front of it, received the blow without exception.

“...!”

Frigid air, now at its lowest possible temperature, swept his whole body, but he tried to endure it. He couldn’t even let out a scream. A few seconds. That was all he could endure in the face of the Heart of Winter that released its maximally frigid air. And finally, a crack appeared in the chest. Cesare smiled. He realized his time had come.

“What is going on here?!”

The knights shouted as they kicked the door open and entered upon sensing suspicious activity inside. At that moment, the chest went off, causing a chilling explosion in the area.

♣

Baaang!

“Eh...?”

Lloyd abruptly raised his head when he sensed a strange vibration. He had been excavating the vertical cave with an intense focus on his work as it was happening from the bottom up unlike before.

What was that?

It had come from somewhere nearby. Cocking his head to the side, Lloyd judged from the strength and echo of the vibration that it came from the cave’s exit.

It was quite strong. But this shouldn’t be happening near the exit area. I installed enough support for it, and the concrete is well-plastered. I inspected everything. Could it be the Rock Burst phenomenon? No. Judging by the state of the ground, there’s no way.

Lloyd shook his head. The Rock Burst phenomenon referred to when rocks burst out from the sides of a tunnel due to the pressure inside it.

It’s similar to how a pimple pops when you squeeze it.

This was a phenomenon that actually took place in Europe during the construction of tunnels in the Alps. Here, rocks with a diameter of up to seven feet were said to have burst out from the tunnel's walls.

But it's not possible here... It can't happen down here. Then what was that noise?

The noise gnawed at Lloyd, more so because he was in a tunnel, which could crumble even at a tiny crack or sink. Everyone would be in danger if that happened.

Something like that happened when I built the mine for bituminous coal. I was locked inside with Javier when I blasted the methane gas to kill the ants.

But today, he wasn't with Javier. The latter was at the palace after being summoned by the queen, just like any other time. He was currently teaching his sword fighting skills as a grandmaster to the queen.

So, it'll be a big problem if something happens when he isn't around.

Lloyd raised his hand, thinking he ought to check it out, and was about to send a stop signal to the team when...

Whoosh... Cold air traveled from the exit through the tunnel.

Hmm?

Lloyd flinched. Something was off.

What? Why is there cold air blowing down here?

The wind was cold, like the one that blows in the early winter morning. The problem with it was that the wind was blowing into the underground tunnel. It was impossible for this to happen. It was supposed to be hotter down in the tunnel since it was underground.

"Everyone, stop! Stand by here!" The moment Lloyd realized how abnormal the cold wind was, he yelled at the laborers before hurrying toward the exit.

It's strange. Really. I should check it out.

An ominous feeling crept in him. The strange tremor. The cold wind. As the bad feeling grew worse, his steps became more hurried. And the air grew colder as he sped more, turning into a biting wintry wind blowing in the Arctic area. By this time, Lloyd was already sprinting.

It looks like something happened with the Heart of Winter or the refrigerant supply pipes.

Even though Lloyd didn't want to admit it, the frost on the tunnel walls and the biting wind scratching his skin confirmed his bad feeling. But he didn't stop. Even when his body was covered with frost and when he could see his cold breath, Lloyd dashed toward the source of the freezing air. Something definitely happened to the Winter of Heart. Do nothing, and everyone down in the tunnel will freeze to death. Something must be done. But first, he wanted to check what was going on.

If something really happened to the Heart of Winter, and if that is what's releasing the icy air... What should I do? Get Bangul to use her explosion through the tunnel? Would the heat storm dissipate the cold air? No. If I do that, the explosion pressure could kill them since it's a confined space here.

Lloyd ran as he racked his brain for a solution. At last, he arrived at the room that stored the Heart of Winter, the site of the horrible explosion. It was just then.

Boom! Even before he had the time to see, the cold storm of the Ice Age swept him. Simultaneously, his title effect was activated.

Ding Dong!

[<Frozen Hands, Frozen Feet> has been activated.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 281: My Responsibility (1)

It's cold, Lloyd thought. A gust of icy wind nipped his skin. He opened his eyes wide and saw a message through the swirling ice storm around him.

[<Frozen Hands, Frozen Feet> has been activated.]

"...!"

[You are now in a region where the annual average temperature is under 32 °F. As such, "Frozen Hands, Frozen Feet" has been activated. You will no longer suffer from hypothermia or freeze to death in cold climates.]

"Emph...!" Lloyd choked as he wrapped his hands around his body and thought fast. He thought about the current situation and the message's meaning. Then he realized a potential danger.

The effect is useful... but it's only protecting me from hypothermia. There's no mention of protecting my skin from frostbite.

The moment he realized it...

Ziiing! Lloyd activated the Asrahan Core Technique and started desperately absorbing heat around him, amplifying it into three-strand circles. After loading it into his manaheart, he received a feeling of warmth throughout his skin, lungs, and eyes. It was only then that he was finally able to stand straight.

Woah. That was dangerous.

Hypothermia and frostbite were two entirely different conditions that could result from the freezing cold. The former described nothing short of freezing to death. The latter meant tissue necrosis in the skin.

So, if I blindly trusted my title and didn't do anything, I'd have been able to survive but with frostbite in my ears and fingers. The sudden exposure to cold air would have dramatically decreased my blood flow, and as a result, my skin tissue would've died because of the lack of oxygen.

This kind of injury from cold, especially on the earflaps, was common among South Korean men while standing guard at the country's border in the military during the middle of winter.

That was close... I'm now saved from getting frostbite and freezing to death. I had no idea the effects could have loopholes. I should be more careful from now on.

Lloyd learned from this experience that he shouldn't blindly trust his title effects. Thinking that in his head, he pulled himself together and looked straight ahead into the rough, swirling storm. At first, his vision was blurry. Everything was vague and hazy. The storm was relentless, and the white snow hellishly blew around him. But when he trudged a few steps forward, his view became clearer.

This is a mess.

The refrigerant room in which the Heart of Winter was stored, protected by thick metal doors and six guard knights, was a mess. The metal doors were crumpled like a soda can and stuck into a corridor wall, along with several sharp shards of ice.

Where's the Heart of Winter?

Lloyd wondered whether the treasure he'd begged to obtain from the queen was safe and whether the people in here were okay. He stepped across the threshold, jittery and anxious, and peered into the room. And he saw...

"Dammit."

Everyone was on the ground and immobile. Two royal magicians and six guard knights were sprawled like mannequins on the floor. But the Heart of Winter was there, fiercely pounding. It was emitting frigid air through the cracks of the broken control chest. In short, it was on a rampage.

I knew that was the problem.

Lloyd's heart pounded. But something was strange. Each time his heart beat, the Heart of Winter squelched and released more cold air.

What the heck? Is it reacting to my Half-Human Half-Dragon skill option?

It appeared so. Lloyd was initially skeptical, but when he took a closer look, that was the case. Plus, it looked like the burst of air it released grew rougher as he neared. It was like a wild beast leaping around in joy to meet its master.

What's going on?

Lloyd bit his bottom lip. Now wasn't the time to investigate. It didn't matter if this object was matching the beat of his heart or reacting to his optional skill. Right now, there was a crisis to solve.

That's a national treasure. How should I compensate for it if it gets destroyed? And what about the laborers inside? Let's think. Think...

Come hell or high water. The situation had to be controlled. He had to do something. Anything. But Lloyd had no clue about how he could silence the out-of-control Heart of Winter. He felt stuck.

I wish Javier was with me.

Lloyd wondered how different things would be if Javier were here. After all, he was a grandmaster who possessed a monstrous manaheart and matching mana capabilities. He was the main protagonist of the original storyline in the novel. But Lloyd knew his wish was futile. Javier wasn't here. He was currently at the palace training with the queen.

I can only take this matter into my own hands.

A thought crossed his mind: this was a battle of time. The longer he let this incident progress, the harder the situation would be to resolve. Just then...

"Argh... Ah..."

Lloyd picked up an ever so faint, agonized groan. It was coming from one of the royal guard knights on the floor.

Eh? Is someone alive?

Lloyd studied the groaning guard in surprise. To his astonishment, the man was breathing, though very faintly. His skin and lips were blue, and his pulse was faint from his severe hypothermia. But he was alive and holding on.

What about the others?

Lloyd jumped to his feet and checked the others. And he uttered, “Almost everyone is alive.”

Except for one person, who was the closest magician to the Heart of Winter, carrying a bloody dagger. The rest of them were breathing but on the brink of death.

It’ll be difficult for all of them to survive if this goes on for much longer.

The realization compelled him to immediately grab the six knights and one magician out to the corridor one by one. He first hoisted up the magician, who appeared to be in the most critical state. The man was bleeding in the back from an injury that looked to be from a dagger. However, the bleeding strangely wasn’t severe, and Lloyd figured it was probably because the wound had frozen during the explosion of frigid air in the room.

It looks like the dead magician stabbed him.

Lloyd frowned, his forehead crinkling, thinking what event could have possibly taken place in here. But he knew now wasn’t the time to dwell on such curiosity.

I’ve got to hurry.

There were people who needed to be saved. Lloyd focused all his efforts on rescuing them without missing a beat, first by carrying the magician on his back and transferring heat into the man’s major organs through the Asrahan Core Technique. And he climbed the vertical shaft toward the cave exit.

“Here! Call a doctor. Quickly!”

Lloyd shouted as he made it out on the ground. Just in time, there was a group of laborers near the exit. They were nervously chatting among themselves about the explosion and the strange gusts of cold air coming from inside the cave.

“Did something happen inside?”

“Yeah. An accident. There is cold air leaking from the Heart of Winter. Call for a doctor immediately.” Lloyd then looked at the leader of the group, who just spoke. “There are more people down there. I’ll get them out. Call a doctor and inform the queen. Get some blankets to warm all the bodies. As many as you can. And this guy over here has a stab wound. Press down against it firmly until a doctor gets here.”

“Yes.” There was nervousness in his eyes.

The rest of the laborers in the group became busy with their tasks. Meanwhile, Lloyd sprinted back to the cave and got down the ladder. He then carried one of the knights in the corridor on his back, dashed away, climbed the ladder, and laid him under the warm sun. He then left the others to care for him and went back in. Lloyd repeated this trip six times. Eventually, Lloyd managed to save everyone. Thankfully, everyone lived, likely due to how the knights were well-trained and strong.

“Ha... Whew...”

Lloyd’s body gave way to exhaustion as soon as he rescued everyone to safety. Calming his breath under the warm early summer sun, he dropped to the soiled ground and threw his head down in between his knees. People were running around in hurry and alarm, and yet, despite the chaos around him, the position offered him a dazing warmth. The sunlight stroking his back couldn’t feel any sweeter. He felt warm, cozy, and relieved. And then he flinched.

What the heck am I doing here? Why am I feeling relieved already? There are twenty guys down there... in the deepest part of the cave.

Gulp. Absentmindedly, Lloyd swallowed dryly. How could they have slipped from his mind? Or was he pretending to have forgotten them?

I told them to be on standby while I go and see what happened. I told them to stay low since it's dangerous. I left them there like that.

Lloyd wondered if the impending arrival of the rescue team and the idea of transferring his responsibility to someone else were the source of his irrational relief as he sat on the warm ground under the sunlight.

Should I be the one to go and save them?

A thought came to him. It'd be too late by the time the rescue team arrived. The frigid air would spread all the way to the end of the cave, and they'd be in danger unless he did something then and there.

They won't stay alive until the rescue team can come.

He had to get down there pronto and get them out. That was the right thing to do. He knew that. But at the same time, he was hesitant. Frankly, he was nervous.

Although I won't die as I have the title... It doesn't mean the icy air won't hurt me. Or that it isn't dangerous.

He just carried seven guys out. That added up to seven roundtrips. Each trip made him feel like his whole body was frozen, no, like he was thrown into an icy field naked in the middle of the winter. His skin, from head to toe, was in intense pain like he was being ripped apart. It was even the case when he had the Asrahan Core Technique activated to its full capacity. Plus...

I'll have to go much further down to get to where the laborers are.

The longer travel time meant getting more exposure to the frigid air, giving him an equal amount of pain. He could end up suffering even with the Asrahan Core Technique. The constant exposure to the air could freeze his ears, face, fingers, and toes until they turned black. His fingers and toes could have to be amputated, like those of the frostbitten hikers of Mount Everest. Even if that didn't happen, his lungs could get injured too. That meant his ability to breathe would be permanently impaired for the rest of his life. All the possibilities he could think of brought him uncertainty and anxiety.

I'm not confident about my safety.

There was a greater chance of his worries coming true. And honestly, Lloyd didn't want that to happen in the slightest.

I'll be disabled for the rest of my life. The rescue team should be coming soon, anyway. Is there really a need for me to risk myself?

It was selfish to think so. Yes, he knew that. But deep down and for just a second, he was hesitant. Nervous. He wasn't a hero in an epic tale nor someone with a strong spirit that couldn't be broken by anything. He was just an ordinary man and wanted to keep it that way for the rest of his life. He was scared.

But at the same time, he was being bugged by a memory from his period of destitution. The days when he was living in a room rental in South Korea and worked tirelessly every day on construction sites. The most wretched, infuriating memory of his from then pestered his mind.

There was a middle-aged man at the construction site he worked at. He and Lloyd bumped into each other a few times at the employment agency and worked as a team from time to time. But Lloyd didn't know the man's name. They weren't very close and merely had some chats over a few meals. Lloyd thought of him as nothing more than just a slightly pitiful older man.

He said he was a goose father.

The man's story went like this: He was a manager in a well-to-do corporation. Financially sound, he sent his daughter to the United States to study along with his wife as he was nervous about sending the former alone. He lived as a goose father for a few years.

But one day, he got laid off. Unable to break the news to his family because he feared worrying them and affecting the child's studies, he endured the pain of his abrupt retirement alone. That was when he switched gear to construction sites. He didn't tell his family about it. Since suddenly starting a business came with the risk of losing his severance pay and he had family members to feed in the US, he started to work in construction sites, drenching himself in sweat, while his severance pay was squirreled away.

How the man laughed while saying that doing physical labor suited him better than being at a desk all day.

He was a good-tempered man despite his pitiful circumstances. His humor involved a lot of dad jokes, to Lloyd's discomfort. However, he was a good man with a bright smile. That was Lloyd's entire impression of him. After all, he was as pitiful as this one. So Lloyd had some compassion for him but thought no more beyond that.

But that same afternoon, the man fell. An accident happened which took away his ability to walk for the rest of his life. Yet how did people react at the construction site? Business continued as usual. As if nothing happened. As if the man was just a broken component being replaced. The site returned to operation as though nothing happened. Lloyd was dumbstruck. He couldn't wrap his head around it.

What really struck me even more dumb was the supervisors at the scene.

In the first place, the construction site had been poorly managed and lacked safety protocols. The accident could have been prevented if proper safety net regulations were put in place. But in spite of that, none of the supervisors were willing to take responsibility for what happened. Instead, the blame was put on the man for being careless. They made pathetic excuses for themselves, giving out all kinds of excuses for their wrongdoings, and merely provided a little money for his medical expenses and compensation pay. No one offered the man a proper apology or reimbursement for the accident. What did Lloyd think after seeing the whole incident unfold?

Dirty. Filthy.

The same emotions he felt that day arose in him again. How enraged and indignant he had felt when the supervisors refused to take responsibility. How wretched and cheated he had felt, even when he wasn't the victim. And now?

I'm just like them.

His last train of thought immediately propelled him to leap to his feet. A pang of repulsion came over him as he recalled how he was mere minutes ago, comfortably perched on the ground under the warm sun while making a preposterous excuse that the rescue team would come and save the workers.

If that's how it is, then I'll be no different than the supervisors I had berated at the time.

He didn't like that. This was his construction site. A job he obtained from the queen. He was responsible for it as the supervisor. And now that an accident took place at his site, even though it wasn't his fault that it happened, it happened. And who was supposed to take responsibility for it?

Me.

Lloyd was the man in charge. At least for this work site, he was. And no one could take his place. No one could take on his responsibility for him.

This is my duty.

Before he knew it, he was running. He rushed into the break room and took all the thin blankets and large-sized overalls inside before running back to the cave entrance. He was about to jump right down when he was stopped by the group leader.

"Master Lloyd? You are not... going down there, are you?"

“I am.” It was obvious that he should. There was no time to dawdle around here. He spat, “Winter blankets. Coats. Get as many as you can. Hurry up. And give an accurate report of the situation to the rescue team once they arrive.”

“I understand your instructions,” the leader reasoned hurriedly, “But it’s going to be dangerous down there. The rescue team will be here soon anyway. What do you plan to achieve by personally going down there alone?”

“What else?”

The decision was already made. Lloyd knew what he had to do. Thinking so, he stared at the group leader and replied in the most nonchalant manner, “I have to save them. Everyone.”

There was nothing left to say and no more time to waste. Just like that, Lloyd jumped into the vertical shaft.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 282: My Responsibility (2)

Fwoosh! A flash of light dropped straight down at lightning speed with a thundering roar. It aimed for his head, but Javier reacted with nonchalance.

His foot took a half step to the side, avoiding the blow by the edge of a knife, and he held out his sheath simultaneously. Swish.

A slow, relaxed stab. It was a simple attack, so common that one would yawn at the sight of it. But Queen Magentano panicked when she received his counterattack.

“Hmph!” Her eyes widened in fright as his sheath dominated her vision.

He’s blocking all the directions around him.

Even though Javier had his sheath extended toward her abdomen, she noticed the various changes to its motion. She felt it. She sensed it. She may attempt another blow, but the sheath would change the path and neutralize her. Thus, her next move should be to retreat and avoid it.

Tsk!

The queen quickly stepped back, pulling her sword back and adding flexibility to it.

Whoosh! Fwish! Her sword glinted as it rotated twice in front of her, and a ray of red aura appeared in its glint. Seven strands of the aura extended like a whip and wrapped Javier’s sheath. No, it almost did but failed.

Slash! The sheath instantly disappeared. The seven strands of the queen’s aura were wrapped around nothing but empty air. Javier’s sheath vanished before she could even respond to its stabbing.

“...!”

Queen Magentano’s eyes trembled for a second. Just then, she heard Javier’s voice from her left.

“Your Majesty’s counterattack against mine was sharp and quick. It was excellent. However, if I may point out a potential point of improvement, You Majesty still has the tendency of overreacting to your opponent’s movements and relying on your technique.”

“Argh!”

She didn’t notice him coming from the side. Astonished, she yanked her aura to the side, and it splashed so powerfully to grind any material in its way. The violence of her aura enveloped Javier’s whole body. And yet, he looked composed. His sheath moved with equal composure.

“It goes the same now, Your Majesty. If I were you...”

Thud! Twang! Boom! His sheath moved smoothly and with ease as if it was just swaying fruit flies away. All seven strands of her aura bounced off at his movement. The more amazing part was that Javier’s sheath was bare. It didn’t have anything that remotely resembled an aura. He went on to instruct, “I would have responded like this, Your Majesty.”

Fwoosh! With that, Javier’s ordinary sheath transformed into a calamity. It was like a sweeping tsunami ready to engulf everything in its proximity.

I’m going to die.

That was what the queen’s instincts told her. She felt frightened. Slicing? Stabbing? Striking? Words fell short of describing his blow. “Pulverize” would be the most fitting word if she had to put a name to it. And yet, she didn’t let herself be intimidated. She instead reacted with greater ferocity.

“Argh...!”

She pulled back the seven strands of her aura and compounded them into one, summoning a giant, sword-shaped aura. She confronted Javier’s sweeping blow head-on, and the two overwhelming powers collided.

Boom! A shock wave swept the whole area. Queen Magentano stood her ground, so desperately and earnestly, to win and save herself from being shoved and flung away. She fully opened her manaheart, squeezing out all the strength in her body, and at last, she managed to endure his attack.

“Excellent, Your Majesty. Once you master the movement of your senses and instincts instead of your techniques, you will be able to progress further.”

The storm subsided. The tsunami disappeared. The chaotic space of oppressive sword auras quietened. And now, with the impact of the auras all gone, she saw Javier grinning with a glow of satisfaction. His sheath was still touching her sword. At that moment, something came to her.

She realized that she would never be able to surpass this man, even if she gave her best throughout her life. She wondered if this was what it felt like to be stuck in the presence of a genius. But she, too, often received compliments for being a genius. Could it be that there was another level of genius among geniuses?

This is too unfair.

A bitter smile appeared on her face. But she didn’t allow herself to wallow in self-hatred and shame.

If I can’t surpass him, then I only have to strive to be like him.

And eventually, her path would appear. She didn’t need to work hard to become better than him. It would be enough for her to focus on taking her own path. That was how she would find life’s answers and destinations that solely belonged to her. As such, now was the time for blood, sweat, and tears. Not comparisons.

“What impudence,” said Queen Magentano. “I will worry about how I will progress further. Focus on keeping a hold of your sheath.”

Clatter! She pushed her sword forward. Javier happily fought back. And at the same time, he was amazed.

Her Majesty has completely surpassed the level of an ordinary sword master.

She wasn't this strong back then when she went up against the Bone Dragon. Recently, as Javier helped her train, he got the feeling that her growth speed was no joke.

People often think that being a sword master is the end goal for all sword users.

No, she had surpassed that. The level of a grandmaster was only a theoretical concept. As such, it was widely believed by the public that a sword master's development couldn't be furthered after this stage. This contributed to the custom of comparing the period of one's sword master status to decide who was stronger. The years of being the sword master and operating the aura sword, people normally decided which sword master was stronger based on them. But the queen... She was different. She was like himself. Beyond the evaluation and consciousness of the public.

She is still developing and at a fairly fast speed, too.

The pure obsession and passion over the sword. The belief that her development translated to the growth of the kingdom's military power. Javier wondered if those were the secrets behind her remarkable advancements.

Then I shall help her as much as I can.

Javier resolved inwardly that he'd help her. He wouldn't change his mind even if she surpassed him. And if she did become stronger than him, he'd gladly congratulate her for it. With such resolution in his head, he parried her sword. Just then...

"..."

A strange sound of an explosion came from somewhere. It came from a distance. Inside the cave. Near the construction site Lloyd was supervising. Confusion rushed through Javier.

Could it be a mana blast?

He thought so at first. Could it be that Master Lloyd used the mana blast? But did he have any reason to bore a hole? But soon, he concluded that couldn’t be it.

It sounded different from a mana blast.

The explosion sounded much stranger, and his senses mysteriously picked up on a cold sensation. Despite the long distance, Javier could feel it without a doubt. There was a strange, destructive flow of mana coming from somewhere. It was strange and also dangerous. Javier immediately withdrew his sheath.

“Forgive me, Your Majesty,” said Javier solemnly to the queen.

“Eh...?”

Thwack! The queen was shoved forward when Javier suddenly pulled away his sheath.

Quickly finding her balance, she said, “Forgive you? What do you mean? For what?”

“I have to make an urgent visit, Your Majesty.”

“Urgent visit?”

“Yes, Your Majesty. It appears that something has happened to Master Lloyd. I will provide a better apology after I return. Please excuse me.”

“Hold on!-”

The queen cried out in a hurry, but Javier was already gone. She was left alone.

“What is this...”

She was flustered. How could he vanish in thin air when the training was going well? Without her permission? But it wasn’t something she’d become angry over. She didn’t even berate Javier’s rudeness. Instead, a look of worry came over her face.

He said that something appeared to have happened to Lloyd.

Could it be that Javier felt something she didn’t? Could it be that his grandmaster-level senses detected there was danger looming over Lloyd?

“Sir Maldini!” Something was wrong. She called the commander of the royal knights. “Declare martial law across the capital within the next hour. All citizens are to stay in their homes or a designated evacuation site. All knights and military forces should be prepared for an emergency alert”

“Your Majesty...?” Sir Maldini, the commander of the royal knights, reacted in a daze, possibly because the order came too suddenly. But the queen paid no attention to his timid response.

“Effective immediately. And as for you, lead the royal guards and get to the excavation site for the palace repair. As quickly as possible.”

Javier had fled immediately with a pale look on his face. That was proof of how serious this matter was. As such, she couldn’t just sit back. Once she uttered the order, she leaped and started to make her way to the construction site.

♣

Whoosh! Lloyd’s body dropped down as if he was on a bungee jump and also relentlessly like a waterfall. He was diving into the bottom of the shaft. His eyes glinted.

Now!

He held up his shovel and stabbed it into the air.

Claaack! The shovel's head sparked as it scratched the wall until his drop speed slightly decreased. And his outstretched hand got a grip of the ladder.

Chuck! Although his shoulder jerked at the sudden weight of his body, he was overall fine. He was able to endure it well enough, and it wasn’t the time to let such a menial pain strain him. He then threw his body into the corridor and started to run as soon as he landed.

“Ha! Ha! Ha!”

The air was frigid. Lloyd could feel his body temperature drop. He wondered how cold this place was. Minus 22? 55? Or worse? He didn’t know. His face and hands felt numb even when he was protecting his skin with the Asrahan Core Technique. In particular, the pain became the worst when he moved past the refrigeration room where the Heart of Winter was.

Arggh!

Is this what it feels like to wrap his whole body with liquid nitrogen? Lloyd ran through the thick cloud of frigid air which was determined to paralyze his body. He went further into the end part of the cave, where the laborers were.

“S-S-S-ir... L-L-Loyd? Wh-what... I-Is going... O-O-On?” The leader of the group, whose face was now pale as a sheet, asked as he stuttered. There was fear on his face. Lloyd felt relieved when he saw him.

Thank goodness.

They were alive. Everyone was holding up somewhat. Lloyd quickly scanned his surroundings and realized the secret behind their survival despite the lethally cold temperature.

It’s because of Ppodong.

Ppodong had all twenty of them in his embrace, protecting them with his size and fluffy hair. It was all thanks to him that they didn’t freeze to death. The same went for Bangul.

“Bangul! Bba-bangul! Bangul!”

Bangul, having no fur to warm her, was tightly stuck to Ppodong as she shivered from head to tail. The sight immediately flooded his heart with remorse.

I’m sorry. I got scared and nervous about coming here for a moment.

He had hesitated for a second. Had second thoughts about coming down here. Apologetic, he encouraged, “Have you been waiting for long? It’s all right. Everything is going to be all right.”

“Ppodong!”

“Bangul!”

“And mister,” Lloyd called the leader of the group. “I’m sure you’re very surprised, but you should know what happened.”

Lloyd briefly walked him through what had happened. A look of shock appeared on the leader of the group. “Are... w-w-we g-going to d-d-die then...?”

“No, that will never happen,” said Lloyd adamantly.

“Tt-then...”

“We have to get out of here. We must hurry. However, we’ll never safely make it past the refrigeration room if we try to go out all at once. So I will carry you one by one.”

“...”

“Don’t worry,” Lloyd comforted. “Don’t look at me like that. Can’t you see how I’m fine despite the fact I came all the way here? Hey, over there. You look the worst out of everyone. Come over here, please. Here, cover yourself with this blanket. And put on the overall. Quickly. I brought the biggest one.”

Lloyd then carried one of the men in Ppodong’s embrace and activated the Asrahan Core Technique at the same time, sharing most of his warmth with the man on his back.

Argh.

As soon as some heat left his body, his skin ached as if they were being lacerated. But Lloyd kept moving.

It's okay. It's just pain. I just have to save enough mana to keep me from getting frostbitten. I won't die. I have my title with me.

He endured his pain with such belief. And hiding his now bluish lips, he smiled at Ppodong.

"Ppodong," called Lloyd.

"P-Ppodong!"

"I'll be right back. Keep embracing them until I come back. Bangul, too."

"Ppodong!"

"Bangul!"

Lloyd jumped into action as he heard their response. There was no time to waste. Stalling any longer would only put them in more serious jeopardy. He needed to hurry.

I can do it!

Lloyd ran. But at the same time, he was sorry that he couldn't use Bangul's Volcanic Explosion.

There's only one way out and in for this cave. If I use the volcanic explosion thoughtlessly, the cave will collapse from the sudden change of pressure. Even if it remains intact, people won't. They'll be receiving the full blow of the explosion in this compact space.

Busted gut. Instant death. As such, Lloyd eliminated the option to use the Volcanic Explosion against the coldness from the list.

This is the only method I've got. It's going to be too late by the time the rescue team gets here.

Lloyd sprinted as he resolved such, passing the refrigerant room. Lloyd could feel that the man was terribly shivering. His back, his arms. The more Lloyd felt him shivering, the more warmth he shared with the man. And this made Lloyd feel colder.

Argh...!

It was as if his whole body was being slashed by a knife. As if his ears were being torn. Even then, he kept running. Past the refrigerant room until he arrived at the bottom of the vertical shaft. He clambered up the tunnel through the ladder, which felt tediously long, and finally walked out to the ground. Lloyd then carefully placed the man down.

"Here! Blankets! Now!"

The men on the ground rushed to the man. Lloyd immediately turned back when he saw them come, leaving the sunlight and throwing himself down to the vertical shaft again. Past the refrigerant room. Into the end of the cave. He carried another man on his back, shared his warmth, and endured the frigid air until he reached the ground again. He passed the man to the others, only to fling himself back into the cold. This process repeated itself.

Three. Four. Five. The longer he withstood the cold, the more lives he saved. And yet, his body started to drain at lightning speed. The Asrahan Core Technique needed to be running in full swing, so he could share the heat and protect the man on his back. Every bit of mana in his manaheart had to be squeezed, so he could give it to the man. That was the only way an ordinary man could survive amid the terrorizing cold. And Lloyd was glad to do it.

But it came with a price. Since he had to give most of his mana to the others, he had to rely solely on his physical muscle and stamina to carry an adult man, run through the stifling cave, and climb the deep vertical shaft. First, he rescued one magician and six knights. Then, the laborers. Lloyd carried, ran, and climbed with big men on his back. In a severe condition that was rougher than the Arctic Ocean.

Huff, huff! “Ha...!”

Soon, the color started to drain from his face. Beads of sweat froze before they could fall to the ground. Even the act of removing those ice particles burdened him. Lloyd bit his lips.

A little more.

He couldn’t give up just because he was tired. This accident took place at the site he was in charge of. So, everyone’s safety was his responsibility. He must be responsible till the end. Lloyd mechanically sprinted again and again with that thought alone. He even used the Energizer and Latent Power Surge, which eventually got him to save 19 men. And now, only one more was left. He was passing the refrigerant room to save the leader, the last man, when he reached his limit.

Just a little more effort is all I need.

But his legs refused to move. Even when the Asrahan Core Technique was still on the energy conservation mode, his stamina had plummeted. His body was fighting against him. His legs didn’t budge.

Dammit. Please. Just a bit more...

Lloyd whacked his thighs, begging them to move just a little more. Just one last. Ppodong and Bangul can be downsized and carried out. Lloyd hit again and again, pleading and praying they would budge. And each time he did so, his heart pounded and thumped.

Boom! Boom!

The rampageous Heart of Winter thumped violently, matching Lloyd’s desperate heartbeat. And now, the Heart of Winter opened its eyes as it felt Lloyd’s existence with greater clarity. A thought crossed its mind. Why not become one with the human?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 283: How to Freeze Time (1)

Whoosh... The Heart of Winter had been created by Ice Dragon Tyrannus sometime long ago and presented to the House of Magentano as a gift. But it always considered itself unfortunate. Possessing overwhelming power and capabilities, it was soon locked inside a corner of the palace's repository, away from the sun, never allowed to enjoy the outside world. As such, it was unhappy. It wanted to be treated like any other ordinary piece of treasure. If that had been the case, it wouldn't have been tortured and imprisoned for tens of thousands of years. But it was in this predicament due to its faint consciousness and self-awareness. It felt stifled, yearned for freedom, and sought its chance. And finally, today, it found one.

Whoosh... Bathump! Bathump! The one-inch marble vibrated at a regular beat in excitement after having found the being that would unlock its shackles and free it to the outside world. This human had been drawing its interest for the past few days as the man held a heart that resembled that of a dragon's. As such, the Heart of Winter was curious and interested in him. And today, its emotions developed into adoration. The man had been enduring the cold gusts of air blowing at him all day, and the sight propelled a greedy thought in the Heart of Winter – Why not become one with that human? As soon as that thought crossed its mind...

Whoosh... It began to emit frigid air with even more vigor than before, sending every bit of it on Lloyd. It meant to subdue Lloyd, dominate his heart, and steal his body. It would borrow his body and attain freedom. The icy storm, so indescribable and cruel, charged toward the man. Thanks to that, Lloyd felt like he was at death's doorstep.

Ackk!!!!

Lloyd panicked. He was exhausted after having moved one magician, six knights, and nineteen burly men out of the cave. The trip out even involved climbing up a 147-foot ladder while carrying each of them on his back.

It was no wonder he was exhausted. He gave almost all his mana to the people he carried on his back through the Asrahan Core Technique, leaving barely enough for him to use. His brute muscle strength and endurance were the only things he could rely on to conduct the rescue, so his wobbly legs were about to give way anytime soon. That was when the situation went south as he was met with a storm of ice.

Dammit! Why is it getting colder?!

A pang of alarm rushed through his heart. His stomach dropped like a heavy pack of ice on the floor. Just then, a thought flashed across his mind. He was going to die if he didn't do anything now.

I can't faint here.

Lloyd bit his lips. Of all the places, he had to be right in front of the refrigeration room. What bad luck. It was the closest place to the rampageous Heart of Winter and the coldest area in the entire whole cave. What if he lost strength, fell to the ground, and passed out here? What would happen?

I'll be done for.

The worst-case scenario flashed through his exhausted mind.

I'll be exposed to the freezing cold while I'm knocked out. I won't die, still. I won't get hypothermia or freeze to death. I have the effect with me. But will I be okay? No. Of course I won't.

His whole body would be frostbitten from the hours of exposure to the icy air. In particular, his face and hands, which were not protected by clothes, would take the biggest hit.

My skin will freeze and be ruined. The same goes for the muscles underneath. And all that tissue will necrotize.

In no exaggeration, his skin would rot. He would be left with comprehensive and serious skin damage. As a result, it would give him permanent, untreatable side effects.

I don't want that.

Lloyd shuddered. He could end up needing his hands chopped off. His face would be completely ruined. In all seriousness, he could really be left to live in hellish pain as he suffered from various side effects from his skin injury if things turned for the worse.

That can't happen.

Lloyd shook his head, striving to pull himself together. But it turned out to be harder than he wanted it to be. His depleted stamina and mana. The Asrahan Core Technique that was in energy conservation mode. None of it could help him. And his consciousness continued to fade until his knees eventually crumpled. He reached out his hands, fighting for his life. He touched the ground. At that moment...

"Ouch...!"

His right palm ached, and when he reflexively flinched, he noticed his palm was red with blood.

"..."

Could it be that he was pierced by an ice shard? However, the pain cleared his mind for a second, and he realized something.

This could be my last chance.

Soon, he was certainly going to lose consciousness again amidst the raging ice storm. He'd fade away until he completely passed out. That wasn't something he could allow to happen.

I need to do something. Anything.

Lloyd made a judgment. He then calculated, predicted, decided, and put it all into action.

Ding dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Supercharge has been activated.]

[You will randomly absorb a large amount of mana from your surroundings.]

Lloyd activated his Supercharge. He clenched his teeth.

This is the best I can do right now.

Lloyd was convinced that the Supercharge skill, which let him absorb mana from his surroundings like a blackhole, would suck in large amounts of the frigid air being emitted by the Heart of Winter.

Then, the cold air that's absorbed will have an effect on my manaheart or my circle. Just as it has until now. Similar to when it stole mana from the queen, undead Mastodons, Hell's Knight, and the Bone Dragon. A new skill option will appear, and it'll give me more parameters to work with.

His new parameters would be helpful for him. No, even if it didn't, he didn't care.

At least, my empty manaheart will be full.

Supercharge. This would get his empty manaheart to restore itself again. And he'd be able to recharge himself and revitalize his worn-out muscles. It would allow him to squeeze out enough strength to save Ppodong, Bangul, and the group leader.

So... Please, work!

Lloyd wished for it with all of his heart. With that wish, his consciousness fell into a trance-like state and faded away as his three-strand mana circle began to roar away. Ziiiiing!

A swirling storm of mana formed around him, and it soon started to devour all the mana nearby. It absorbed everything it could. The concrete floor, the lock bolts, and the rocks surrounding the area. The ice storm was no exception.

Whoosh... At the sudden change of events, the Heart of Winter wondered in shock if the man had finally lost it. It had sent the ice storm to the man to steal his heart, only to have him actively absorb the storm. The Heart of Winter wondered if death was indeed what he wanted. But soon, it learned that wasn't the case.

Bzzt...

It turned out that the human was absorbing and processing the cold air for his own use, digesting the mana loaded in the air and recharging his manaheart.

Bzzt!

The Heart of Winter broke into a fit of laughter. This human was getting more interesting the more it learned about him. At the same time, it pitied him. It was like a giant in the presence of a child trying to defend himself with a toothpick. Even though Lloyd was desperately absorbing the cold air, the amount he was taking in was quite insignificant. It was like trying to scoop up a giant iceberg with a single spoon.

Amused, the Heart of Winter decided to dance to his tune. Let him try as much as he wanted. Let him absorb as much air as his heart desired. It proceeded to produce a much more powerful ice storm. The volume of it easily surpassed what Lloyd could take in. The result was destructive.

Bzzt!! Whoosh... Whoosh! Lloyd's body was soon covered with frost. His skin started to freeze, and his exposed face and hands started to develop frostbite. The cold air that his Supercharge failed to absorb began to damage his skin. It was a devastatingly pitiful fight. No, it wasn't even a fight. It was a futile effort of resistance. A hopeless struggle, a protest that was bound to fail. And just like that, Lloyd's whole body was wrapped together with frost and ice. It was around the time when his lower torso was confined by a pillar of ice that Javier arrived.

"Master Lloyd...?"

Javier, who managed to break through the cold and get to the bottom of the cave, was flabbergasted. He was in the middle of training with the queen when he left her to arrive here. A sense of dread had gripped him the entire time he made his journey. He immediately rushed to the cave after hearing a brief explanation of the situation. He wished and prayed for the fake Lloyd's safety.

"..."

But when he arrived, he found Lloyd half stuck in the ice pillar. He immediately learned what was going on.

It'll be hopeless if this continues.

The Asrahan Core Technique allowed him to see the flow of events that occurred and enabled him to feel the mana absorption in Lloyd. Javier learned that Lloyd was aggressively absorbing mana around him. But there was too much mana for Lloyd to suck in. That was why he was losing and being trapped by the cold air he couldn't absorb.

When Javier realized that, he walked forward without delay into the Supercharge range. And he made himself the target.

Boom! A large volume of mana started to leak from Javier's manaheart from all of his cells. And yet, he didn't mind. He simply responded with his Asrahan Core Technique, reversing the rotation of his three-strand circle and altering the flow of Lloyd's Supercharge. This allowed him to be unaffected by the mana absorption. But Javier didn't stop there.

He took one more step toward Lloyd and reached out and touched Lloyd's shoulder. Closing his eyes, he focused on his manaheart, waking his three-strand mana circle and jumping onto Lloyd's mana circle flow. And just like that, Javier and Lloyd's mana circles were connected, and they started to go wild. Javier's three strands. Lloyd's three strands. Now, there was one six-strand mana circle. It began to rotate, resonate, and amplify. The effect was three times three. In total, the amplification of nine strands. The explosive vitality and overwhelming absorption began to shred, tear, and devour everything.

Ziiing! Now, the absorption had reached a new height of strength. It was the Supercharge of the nine-strand mana circle. Adding to that, Javier took one more step and touched Lloyd’s back, this time connecting his manaheart to Lloyd’s. Lloyd’s intermediate-level manaheart in his chest, and Javier’s grandmaster-level manaheart made of 60 trillion cells. One big lump. Separated into 60 trillion pieces. The two contrasting manahearts synced, linked, and responded until they eventually formed a multi-manaheart system. The new system assisted the nine-strand mana circle. It digested and purified the mana from the Supercharge and made it into his own. One by one. Like filling up an empty barn. Without a single drop of mana missed. Faithfully yet violently. Ferociously but meticulously. It dominated, conquered, and reigned. Meanwhile, Javier thought to himself...

I do not understand you.

His gaze traveled to Lloyd’s back. Lloyd didn’t respond to Javier’s touch and help as he was in a trance. Lloyd. The eldest son of the Frontera family. However, he was a fraud. An intruder from another world. Despite that, he was the sole pillar holding up the family. The only source of hope that could save the count and countess from the impending disaster. It was the reason why Javier was willingly helping him at the moment.

What you think about the family, the lord, and about me. I cannot tell if you are using us. Whether that is why you have been hiding your identity this entire time. I do not know the answer to anything. However...

However... Javier had only one wish.

I hope I won’t come to regret the countless number of times I made the decision to help you in the past and in the present.

Javier focused his mind more. He concentrated every bit of his strength on the mana circle and manaheart now linked with Lloyd. Lloyd, too, instinctively responded to Javier by absorbing and devouring everything. He didn’t care if the Heart of Winter was a divine item or an artifact created by a dragon. He simply absorbed, devoured, possessed, and conquered. And eventually, the Heart of Winter began to lose out to the tyrannous Supercharge.

Whoosh...

The Heart of Winter vibrated with more consistency, intrigued to meet the human capable of suppressing it. This human had been piquing its interest for days now because he carried a heart akin to a dragon's heart. But now, its interest developed into feelings of admiration.

Even though he was receiving help from another person, it was he who was devouring its ice storm. And a new impulse came over it: What about becoming a part of that human? What if it intentionally became a part of him and watched over the world? That sounded feasible. And the man seemed pretty qualified to be its owner. If that was the case, there wasn't any need to be bothered to dominate and pilot the human.

Whoosh... It started to bring out every bit of its essence and push it all toward Lloyd when his absorption was at its peak. It did so to assimilate into his heart, become a part of him, and hopefully experience freedom in the future. It did so as if it was offering a handshake. In an intentional, friendly, polite, and careful manner. Lloyd's manaheart happily took the handshake.

Whoosh... The Heart of Winter. The divine item that held the strength of one season. Lloyd's manaheart, which was marvelously absorbing everything with the grandmaster's help. At that moment, two strange existences turned into one.

Ding dong.

[The Asrahan Core Technique Skill Option ⑤: Your Supercharge time is up.]

Ziiing... Lloyd's violent mana circle calmed down. The ferocious rotation quietened, and the cold air swirling around him was now gone. Every bit of it. And so was the Heart of Winter, the divine item belonging to the royal house. In addition, a new message appeared in front of Lloyd's eyes.

[You have absorbed the Heart of Winter, a divine item that possesses a consciousness.]

[The strength of the winter season inside the item seeped into your manaheart. This experience is having a strong effect on your manaheart skill.]

[A new skill option has been opened.]

[Manaheart Skill Option ⑤: Time Freeze]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 284: How to Freeze Time (2)

“It’s cold. I’ve always hated the cold. But not that there’s any particular reason for it. It’s been like that since I was young. By the way, what was your name? Heart of Winter? I can’t believe you’ve assimilated into me. Why did this have to happen? What for? Aren’t these obvious questions for me to have?”

“It’s hot. I’ve always hated the heat. But not that there’s any grand reason for it. I’ve been like that since I was created. By the way, what was your name? Lloyd Frontera? Now that I’m assimilated, this is going to be harder than I thought. Why do human bodies have to be so hot? Don’t you agree?”

“You make me speechless. I’ve never asked you to assimilate into me. And who gave you permission to whisper inside my unconsciousness? You barged into me, and now you’re yapping? Where are your manners, really? Don’t you see where I’m coming from?”

“You make me speechless, too. Who was it that absorbed everything? I was just a little interested in you. That was all. And yet, you sucked me into your system, and you’re complaining, really? Don’t you see where I’m coming from?”

“You. You’re copying my words. Are you doing it on purpose?”

“You. You’re grumpy. Are you doing it on purpose?”

“Yes, I’m doing this on purpose. Might as well come bearing a gift if you meant to come into me without permission.”

“But I already did.”

“You did?”

“Yeah.”

“Where?”

“Here. Right here. Right now. In front of you.”

“...”

Lloyd opened his eyes. Did he take a nap? Or had he lost track of time for a while? Or...

Did I pass out?

Lloyd blinked. He narrowed his eyes until the focus in his eyes came back, and everything started to be clear. The surroundings around him appeared in his vision. The first thing he saw was the blue sky. It was bright and blinding. Sunlight flooded right into his eyes as if it wanted to grill them.

“Ah, it’s blinding me,” grumbled Lloyd as he frowned and squinted. Then, someone popped into his vision in the corner of the blue sky.

“Master Lloyd, are you awake?” A head. But Lloyd could only see the outlines because of the sunlight. And yet, the man’s head shape alone told of his handsomeness.

“Javier?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd. It is me.” Javier grinned softly. The wind blew to sway his silvery hair, and only then did Lloyd realize he was lying on the ground. And he also noticed the concerned gazes of many people around him. They belonged to the laborers.

“Everyone, you are...” Lloyd hurriedly sat up, which ushered in a terrible pang of dizziness. Javier quickly held out his hand and assisted Lloyd’s back.

“We are outside the cave. You are safe now. So, please rest at ease.”

“...”

Lloyd looked around. It was true. One, two, three, four, and everyone else. Everyone at the site was there. They were gathered under the sun with a thick blanket as they relaxed and drank hot water. Ppodong and Bangul were in his embrace. That was when he realized.

Everyone made it out safely. I'm safe as well.

Lloyd searched for his memory, and the previous events started to come back to him piece by piece.

I was supervising the upward vertical shaft when I heard a strange explosion and vibration. The Heart of Winter, and the ice storm...

And he started to save all the people, carrying them out one at a time. This process was repeated twenty times. He was exhausted and worn out. At the last moment, he made a decision.

Supercharge.

He took the card out. Everything after that was lost in his head. It was not so surprising. That was what the Supercharge did. You fall into a state of stupor. No situations or changes can be felt.

What happened after that?

Lloyd lifted his head and looked back at Javier, who was supporting his back.

"Hey," called Lloyd.

"Yes, Master Lloyd."

"Did you save me?" Lloyd looked at Javier.

"Yes, probably." Javier smiled mysteriously.

"Then what about Ppodong, Bangul, and the group leader at the site? They were the last to leave."

"Hmm, I am not sure." Javier's smile deepened.

What could that answer mean? Lloyd cocked his head to the side. “You’re not so sure? What do you mean by that?”

“It was me who sensed the accident and came to help you before everyone else, but I am not so sure I can say I saved those you just mentioned.” Javier’s smile turned wry. He knew that his answer was ambiguous. But that was the only answer he could give. Why? Simple.

How should I explain the situation? I do not know.

Javier recalled what had happened. Right after he helped Lloyd’s Supercharge and the Heart of Winter melted into Lloyd’s manaheart, Lloyd lost consciousness. But only his consciousness. He was moving, albeit like a sleepwalker or an inebriated man. Lloyd staggered up to his feet and walked into the cave like a zombie.

Unable to believe his eyes, Javier hurriedly followed Lloyd and stopped the latter, saying that they must go up to safety. Lloyd swiveled at Javier, and he spoke, staring right into his eyes.

“But I am the one in charge.”

Javier was flustered. Lloyd continued mumbling to himself like a drunk.

“Someone’s inside. The group leader is there. He came to work at the construction site because he trusted me. So it’s only right that I save him. Don’t you think?”

“But Master Lloyd,” argued Javier, “Then I will go in myself-”

“It has to be me. He’s my responsibility. I am the one in charge. I am the one in charge, Javier.”

“…”

Lloyd couldn’t be talked out of it. He was stubborn. Incorrigible. From then on, Javier silently followed Lloyd into the cave, which was still cold, worrying that the fake Lloyd might fall. On the way, he was granted an audience to fake Lloyd’s soliloquy.

“Everyone is rotten. The site supervisor. The inspecting company. Construction company. Developer. How is that possible? A man fell off. He’d have been saved if the safety net was in place like in the regulation. A man’s spine was smashed, for Pete’s sake. He’s stuck in a wheelchair for life. And no one’s at fault? It’s his fault that he climbed all the way there? To hell with them.”

Javier didn’t say anything. He simply listened.

“Pass the buck, all right. Pass the buck to the innocent. Until the situation gets so convoluted and involves tons of people that no one’s there to hear him out. Drain his mind, and that was when you slipped an envelope into his hand. Oh, and you say what? It’s not my fault, but this is out of courtesy? Wrap it up, this is enough? Wrap it up?! Shoot. Those nut-jobs make me go mad. Even when I’m not the one they’re bothering.”

“...”

“Why are you living like that? That’s not how you should live. But you know what? Life is a stage for the bad guys. That’s not the way it should be. But it is. How much I cursed... the supervisor. He wears an angelic mask. But behind that, he takes bribes. The same goes for the others. I promised myself. I won’t be like them. If I get my license and become in charge, no such thing will happen at my construction site. That’s why I’m doing this.”

“...”

“If I don’t do this, if I avoid this because I’m scared, I’ll be no different than the bastards that I looked down on. And that’s not what I want.”

Master Lloyd... Fake Lloyd. What kind of life did you live? What was your life like in the world I cannot imagine? Javier shook his head. There was no way of knowing or guessing. But one thing was clear. Fake Lloyd’s grumbling and ranting were genuine, and so was his intention to stagger far into the cave.

For some reason, Javier couldn’t get himself to stop Lloyd. Soon, Lloyd arrived at the end of the cave, where he carried the unconscious group leader even when he couldn’t walk properly. Afterward, he downsized Ppodong and Bangul and placed them in his embrace. He then walked out of the cave, climbed up the high ladder, put the man down under the sun, and passed out. That was what Javier saw happen.

“...”

Javier had a sudden thought. This could have been the most genuine side of Lloyd he ever got a glimpse of.

Moreover... Master Lloyd absorbed the Heart of Winter. All of it. Not a single piece was amiss.

Javier sensed it too as he had helped Lloyd while the Supercharge skill was activated. He was able to feel it from the connected manaheart and mana circle. At the end of the Supercharge, the moment his mana absorption went beyond its limit, the Heart of Winter suddenly grew silent. It had absorbed into Lloyd’s manaheart.

Does fake Lloyd know about it?

Half-worried and half-expectant, Javier looked at Lloyd. He wanted to closely study Lloyd as, after all, it was a divine item that he had absorbed. Would he know what repercussions it’d have? Would it be harmful to him? Or greatly benefit him? Javier decided to keep a close eye on Lloyd. But to Javier’s ignorance, Lloyd was well aware of what happened.

Ha... Crap. This is bad.

He ate the Heart of Winter. The thought of it made him gulp.

All I wanted to achieve by using the Supercharge skill was to absorb some energy and fill up on a bit of mana to escape from the place.

It never occurred to Lloyd that he’d devour the Heart of Winter by the whole. He never knew that was even possible.

How could I ever think that was possible? It’s the Heart of Winter. One of the divine items in the House of Magentano. It was an impressive artifact.

But what about his Supercharge? Sure, what I have is a great skill too. After all, I defeated the undead Mastodons and Hell's Knight with it. But it has its clear limits.

Though it was very good at absorbing mana, it had its limits. It couldn't absorb beyond a certain capacity. A case in point was when he used the skill against the Bone Dragon.

At that time, the total volume Draggy carried was just another level... Supercharge? It was like trying to drain a lake with a bucket.

And so, he barely did any damage to Draggy. He thought it'd be the same case this time. He thought it wouldn't be enough to absorb the Heart of Winter since it was a divine item belonging to the royal house. All he expected was to absorb a tiny portion of the cold air being emitted out. That was enough for him. Fill up the empty manaheart, recharge, and save Ppodong, Bangul, and the group leader. That was all he wanted.

But this? Woah. Could it be that the Heart of Winter doesn't have as large of a reserve as I thought?

He couldn't help but think so. It was that outrageous of a situation. Sure, Lloyd was glad. But given the item's unimaginable value, Lloyd was forced to worry about the repercussions.

Tsk. Should I just make excuses? The Heart of Winter ran amok, and it broke. Yeah. That should be more believable to the others. Who would believe me if I told them I absorbed it?

Lloyd then stole a glance at Javier on the side. Could it be that he felt the gaze? Javier turned and faced Lloyd. And to Lloyd's surprise, he whispered, "Master Lloyd, just tell them that it broke."

"Wait... Did you know about the absorption?" Lloyd's voice broke.

"Yes. Thanks to the Asrahan Core Technique, I have been able to feel it. And that is why..." Javier paused and stared right into Lloyd's eyes. Lloyd held his gaze without saying anything. “Since the others do not know that there is such a skill, no one will know as long as we keep our mouths shut.”

Lloyd’s mouth opened slightly in surprise. “But a divine item of the imperial is the one that would be broken. I’m surprised that you would suggest this.”

“Nothing to be surprised, Master Lloyd. My loyalty is to the lord, not the queen.”

“You mean you want to prevent putting the family in a hard place because I absorbed the Heart of Winter, right?”

“I heard nothing. I do not have a clue what you are saying, and I am ignorant of the whole thing.” With that, Javier clamped his mouth shut. Lloyd licked his lips as he stared at Javier.

You know he can be quite playful and cheeky. Anyway, I should just tell the queen that it broke after it went savage. Ugh, but it won’t save me from the chaos that will ensue.

He might have to pay for the damage. If not, at least be liable for the way the construction site was managed. But Lloyd didn’t worry about it too much. The queen was on his side, and everyone was rescued and alive.

Oh, whatever. I saved people. That’s enough. I should be content with that.

That thinking relieved some burden off his heart. And a few seconds later, he received good news. The stabbed royal magician Lloyd had saved before anyone else lived after receiving emergency treatment.

It must be because of the wound that froze.

That must be what stopped the bleeding and saved him. Lloyd was glad. And soon, every part of his body relaxed at ease. That was when something in the corner of his vision caught his attention. It was the skill message notification that had been floating.

What’s this?

His gaze moved.

[A new manaheart skill option is available.]

[Manaheart Skill Option ⑤: Time Freeze]

Time freeze?

Lloyd was confused. The new option was freezing time?

Am I getting this because I absorbed the Heart of Winter?

It appeared so. He opened the description as a sense of excitement crept into him.

Ding dong.

[Skill Option ⑤: Time Freeze - Allows you to freeze the world's passage of time by borrowing the power of the Heart of Winter in your manaheart. The user can designate an area of exception, a no-freeze zone, and the area's range is determined by the user's total volume of mana. Inside the no-freeze zones, time will progress normally.]

[More Information (1): The range of no-freeze zones cannot be changed until the effect is deactivated. You can stop time for up to a period of one year.]

[More Information (2): The effect is deactivated in the event the user goes out of the no-freeze zone.]

[More Information (3): All living creatures (including the user) can freely go around within the no-freeze zone. However, due to the frigid air of the Heart of Winter, they will not age.]

[More Information (4): It costs 3,000 RP every time to activate the option.]

"Damn. This is amazing." Lloyd murmured to himself after reading the detailed information.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 285: How to Freeze Time (3)

“Damn... This is amazing.”

Lloyd murmured involuntarily. It just slipped out. How can it not? Time was fair to everyone. It dutifully flowed onward. But now, Lloyd came to somewhat possess control over it. If the description in front of his eyes was true, he could now take part in the flow of time.

So, I’m using the power of the Heart of Winter in my manaheart. I can freeze time in this world.

This was too much, Lloyd thought to himself. This skill was transcendental. Godly.

But I shouldn’t get too pumped up.

Lloyd got a grip on himself and didn’t allow himself to cheer or get carried away in joy. Instead, he meticulously studied the description, picking at its words, thinking, and looking at it with suspicion.

It’s too good of an optional skill. It’s so amazing it leaves me speechless.

Like everything, if a deal or award sounded too good to be true, it was a trap. There was no such thing as a free lunch in this world. There was no such thing as a giving tree. Lloyd believed that the first thing he should do when someone shoves a much too sweet deal up to his face was to be a skeptic. And that was how he managed to survive all these years. The same thing was happening now.

There wasn’t a time the system message deceived me. But this one’s too good to be true. So, I should be careful, investigate, and confirm it myself.

He shouldn’t be overjoyed. First, he needed to organize his thoughts.

To sum up everything, I can freeze time in this world, but I can designate certain areas to be excluded. If so, time will flow in those areas normally, but no one will age.

The more he chewed it over, the better the option was. But, of course, it came with some restrictions.

Once the skill is activated, time can freeze only up to a year. And it's impossible to change the no-freeze zone until I deactivate the skill. Also, it gets automatically deactivated when I leave the no-freeze area. Plus, using the skill comes with a price. One usage costs me a whopping 3,000 RP.

Lloyd checked how much RP he had.

Hmm... 2,665. It's not quite enough.

He wanted to use the skill and confirm its capabilities right away. But he couldn't. He didn't have enough RP.

Looks like it's time for some RP hunt.

Better yet, Lloyd wondered if there was any opportunity he could explosively up his likeability. He figured he ought to collect more than 3,000 RP, even if it took some toil on his part.

Since it's the most perfect and best thing that ever happened to me.

The mere thought of it made his heart thump in excitement. He couldn't help it even when he tried to calm down. But how could he not? He could come up with millions of ways to use the skill to his advantage.

I can use it for the most urgent matter right now- finding the materials for the Aotearoa and conducting the construction. I didn't have much time left, and it was starting to irk me.

Just then, the Ending Spoiler came to his mind. And the restoration of destiny. Lloyd now had two years and a half until that effing event started to roll. But he had too many tasks to accomplish before then. That was the problem. That was what was gnawing at him.

I've got to collect all the key materials for the jewel's construction in two and a half years. Only the heavens know how long that will take. But will it be over after I find them? No. I've got to build the jewel. What about after? I've got to ask and find a way to stop the restoration of destiny.

He also knew that there was no chance his job would end after getting an answer.

Once I have the solution, I'll get busy again trying to put it all into action.

He had no way of knowing what the solution would look like. But he figured it wouldn't be simple. It was also a mystery how much time it'd take. And yet, despite everything, he only had two and a half years, and the thought had been making him toss and turn in the middle of the night.

But now. I have this spectacular option. From finding the materials to building the jewel... Each time I build something, I should simply freeze time after I designate the work site as a no-freeze area. That way, I'll be able to work while the world's time has been stopped. A few months. A year. It doesn't matter how long the construction will take. Time will be frozen anyway.

It appeared that he'd be able to save an obscene amount of time.

And if all my efforts, all this drudgery ends up futile, and if I can't stop destiny, then I'll just freeze time after designating Frontera County as a no-freeze area. It sounds kind of drastic, but well. I'll be earning one year's worth of time. Meanwhile, I'll have to rack my brain and figure something out. All the while, the world's clock is put on pause.

Yes, it was a drastic method. But it was a good band-aid solution for if he became stuck.

Anyway, having such an option alone is extremely useful.

Lloyd resolved to himself: He would work harder to collect RP. Just then, an unexpected voice pierced his ears.

“Are you fine?”

“Hmm...?” Lloyd was jostled out of his trance, and when he looked up, he saw an outline of a figure looking down at him with the sun behind her back. Wavy short hair. A wry smile on her face.

“Your Majesty.” When Lloyd saw her take three steps further and smile mysteriously, he immediately got down to his knee and said, “Hail to Her Majesty. I, Lloyd Frontera, the eldest son of the Frontera County, am honored to be in the audience of the rightful owner of this-”

“There is no need for formalities in this circumstance. I asked how you are,” she said gravely.

“Your Majesty?” asked Lloyd.

“I am asking if you are hurt.”

“As you can see, Your Majesty, I am completely fine.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd nodded promptly and felt flustered.

Crap. This is bad. I haven’t thought up an excuse yet.

One thing had led to another, and Lloyd inadvertently absorbed the Heart of Winter, which he had borrowed from the queen. It wasn’t any royal treasure. It was a divine item of the imperial family. He still hadn’t thought of a believable excuse as he was busy reading through his new optional skill and thinking of ways to utilize it. He had become too excited, despite his efforts not to, and thus, failed to prepare any excuses yet. He had never expected to face the queen so quickly.

Tsk. What should I tell her?

Lloyd racked his brain. The events that occurred at this scene. The myriad of different circumstances he saw during the accident. His actions and their results. The expected response from the queen and the public. Lloyd recalled, compounded, and predicted every one of these things, running a plethora of scenarios and adjusting his reactions to them. Not too long after, he was ready to make a case for himself in a sly voice and was about to speak when the queen questioned him first.

“Looking at the situation, I assume that the Heart of Winter has been lost. Am I right?”

“Oh, Your Majesty. If I could explain-”

“There’s no need,” the queen interrupted in a gentle voice. “I came here after realizing what had happened.”

“...”

Lloyd stared at the queen. For some reason, he couldn’t get a clear read of her expression or eyes. There was something strange about her tone and expression. Could it be that she was angry?

I’d be angry if someone broke a precious item I’d lent them.

Lloyd then thought that apologizing and begging for her forgiveness seemed to be a better choice to improve his relationship with her. Just then, the queen spoke something that took Lloyd by surprise.

“I have heard,” she said, “From the one of the guard knights you saved. When he opened the door to the refrigeration room, something already happened, and two royal magicians were covered in blood. He said it looked like one stabbed the other.”

Lloyd didn’t say anything.

“I presume that whatever happened between the two magicians accounts for this incident. Although there will be a series of additional investigations, judging from the witnesses of the guard, I can assume that you are not directly liable for it.”

Lloyd’s eyes softened.

“I also heard that,” she went on. “You risked your life saving the magicians and guards. And how you willingly jumped to save the laborers trapped inside the cave. Thus, how could I lash out at you for this?”

“Um, Your Majesty, please forgive me, but...”

“Tell me.”

“Why is it that you favor me to this extent?” There was genuine curiosity in Lloyd’s eyes.

“Are you curious?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.” Lloyd spoke frankly. He was surprised by her response and attitude. Her willingness to exonerate him from this whole mess. The queen chuckled once again.

“I am not favoring you or confirming what you have done is right. I am simply informing you.”

“What is it for, Your Majesty?”

“Consider this an example of the statement you will make when you are under the inquiry of the House of Peers.” Her smile softened. “Since an accident broke out nonetheless on your construction site and resulted in the loss of the royal house’s divine item, this is extremely grave and significant, whatever my personal feelings lay,” said Queen Magentano.

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

“That is why I am doing this. The House of Peers will not let this slide as it had given its consensus to the usage of the Heart of Winter. It is likely that they will soon submit a bill of indictment and petition to the courtroom.”

“Will they, Your Majesty?”

“Yes,” the queen said as she nodded. “Since you are my meritorious retainer and have legal immunity that limits any judgment on you to me, they will file a request to have you stand in front of court.”

“Oh.”

Lloyd saw this coming. He nodded. The queen continued to speak.

“Moreover, I will have to grant the request from the House of Peers. There is no reason for me not to. After all, I should be the one flying into a rage and sending you into the courtroom.”

“But why is it that Your Majesty is not-”

“Are you asking why I am siding with you?”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” affirmed Lloyd.

“I like you.”

“Your Majesty?” Lloyd raised his head, taken aback by her response. She was smiling. He even caught some playfulness in her eyes.

“To me, I find you are much more useful than a divine item I can only use twice or thrice in a span of a few centuries. Whereas you will be of use to me for several decades. Don’t you agree?”

“Um, that is a very direct way to say you’re going to make me work...”

“This is my investment in you as a talent. Don’t you think so?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty,” denied Lloyd.

“Tsk. You do not have to refuse me so cold-heartedly.”

“Consider it a tantrum borne out of guilt for causing trouble, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd cast his head down, genuinely feeling apologetic and grateful at the same time.

She is openly telling me that she’ll cover for me in the future. We’re talking about the loss of a divine item here. Yet, she’s going to overlook it.

Surely, the queen was no ordinary monarch. She was a big-hearted queen. And her outspoken intent to put him to useful work? Lloyd partly understood her greed.

Well. She has been generous to me. She didn't lash out when I sucked her mana with my Supercharge during the assassination attempt against her. Moreover, she's been showering my fiefdom with large amounts of supply aid since the Monster Domino incident. There are also several other instances when I received special treatment from her.

Come to think of it, the queen was his biggest source of help in overcoming the obstacles he had faced until now. But, of course, it didn't mean that he intended to become her servant.

It's not like I've done nothing for her.

He had given and done as much for her as he had received from her. That alone was enough. So, Lloyd decided to happily accept her assistance. He would just return the favor at another time.

"Words fall short of my gratitude to you, Your Majesty," Lloyd expressed sincerely. And he was also grateful that everyone was safe. Now, it was time to clean up the mess.

♣

A few days passed. The construction site was cleaned up in no time. To Lloyd's relief, the cave didn't suffer much damage. The frozen ground wasn't affected, either. It looked like the remaining portion of the construction could resume normal operation without delay. However, something else stopped the construction from resuming. The House of Peers filed a petition against Lloyd, submitting a bill of indictment to hold him responsible for losing the Heart of Winter.

The queen was right.

Things took place as she had expected. She accepted the bill from the House of Peers and announced the date for the trial. Meanwhile, Lloyd enjoyed his rare break as days passed. At last, the day of the trial came.

“Are you ready, Master Lloyd? We should leave now if you do not want to be late.”

“Yes, hold on.” Lloyd stood in front of the mirror. It was the first day of the trial. When Javier insisted they must leave now, he replied, “Hold on a second. Let me just finish my warm-up exercise.”

“What warm-up exercise?” asked Javier.

“Stretching my tongue.” Lloyd knew. In a fierce court battle, his tongue would be his weapon. Smiling mischievously at the mirror, Lloyd licked his lips.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 286: The Defendant's Method of Blackmail (1)

Rattle. Rattle. The carriage shook, but not like the carts drawn around in the markets. Regardless, it still had a rattle as it wasn't a car with a modern suspension device. He could feel even the smallest bump from his buttocks.

Well, it's better than being crammed into a bus during rush hour and getting attacked by the sweaty underarms of the person behind me.

Lloyd smiled faintly as he recalled one of his memories from South Korea for a moment. This was much better than those days. He had a large and soft luxury leather seat all to himself right now. He could comfortably cross his legs and chat with Javier who was sitting across from him.

"Don't you think so, Javier?"

Lloyd's words brought Javier to lift his head. Tearing his gaze away from the papers, Javier stared hard at Lloyd. "What do you mean what I think? By the way, are you not worried?"

"Worried?" Lloyd shot him a quizzical look.

"About today's trial." The bottom of the papers was tapped into an organized bundle. Javier held it out to Lloyd. "You will arrive at the court any minute now, and the trial will commence right after. Will you be all right not reading this in advance?"

"Yes," said Lloyd with confidence. "I am fine."

"Even when this paper details the points that will be mentioned in the courtroom?"

"Uh-huh," affirmed Lloyd again as he nodded. He was sure. He didn't have to read it. "I already have a good idea of what's inside without reading it."

"Hmm." Javier tapped his fingers. "Are you sure?"

“Well, try testing me if you want,” Lloyd said as he sat up straight.

Javier’s eyes narrowed. “Fine. What is the biggest charge the House of Peers has against you?”

“The loss of the Heart of Winter, which is a divine item of the imperial family. They’re demanding that I take responsibility for it since I was in charge of the site where the accident took place.”

“You got that right. One point for you.”

“What was that?” snapped Lloyd. “Are you counting points now?”

“I will continue.”

“Hold on,” stopped Lloyd, holding up his hand.

“Yes?”

“What’s the best possible score?” asked Lloyd.

“100.”

“But that question was worth only one point.”

“It was the easiest and most basic question I have. To be frank, if you don’t even know what the court is charging you with, you might as well jump out of the carriage right this minute.”

“But this carriage is passing a suspension bridge,” Lloyd pointed out in confusion.

“Yes,” sighed Javier with glee, “What a splendid morning to check out the water temperature.” Ignoring the dazed look on Lloyd’s face, Javier continued his test. “Next question. What punishment did the House of Peers demand for you while making their accusation?”

“Strip me of my title as a meritorious retainer.”

“You got that right. Ten points.”

“Oooh!”

“Do not get ahead of yourself. What do they want by stripping you of your status?”

“Obviously,” Lloyd huffed, “They want to take away the privileges I have and taint my reputation. If I’m stripped of my title as a meritorious retainer right after I earn it, it’d leave a huge damage to my reputation. I might as well not have received it in the first place instead. History will remember my name with dishonor.”

“Correct. 30 points. Plus, once your title is gone, they will truly start attacking you.”

“I think so, too. Since I’ll lose the privilege of no-arrest and legal immunity.”

“That is right,” agreed Javier, “Once they arrest you, you will be put in front of the court presided by the House of Peers.”

“Tsk. I guess this country doesn’t have the principle of ne bis in idem.” Lloyd looked out the window.

“What was that?”

Lloyd turned and said, “Nothing. Anyway, it’d be like taking away my shield before stabbing my heart.”

Lloyd could see it already. Despite that, he was not scared in the slightest. But he was worried that the situation could get bothersome for him. Meanwhile, Javier continued with his questions.

“If so, do you have a guess on why they’re so insistent on attacking you?”

“Yeah.” Lloyd nodded. It was so obvious that he didn’t have to read the document to know the answer. “Because I am dashingly handsome.”

“Wrong,” Javier made a repulsive face. “Minus 100 points.”

“...”

“Please answer seriously. We are arriving at the courtroom soon,” pleaded Javier in a serious voice.

“Tsk. Since I’m just a nobody from the countryside. A parvenu in the eyes of the capital nobles. And I’ve got a history of revealing the corruption in the royal academy, which propelled the queen to wield her wrathful power against quite a number of noble children and professors. I imagine a considerable number of families were waiting for a chance to pounce on me.”

“I am relieved that you are aware of it. Then, next question.”

“Hold on. My answer is correct. How many points do I get?”

“None.”

“Why not?” Lloyd’s voice broke.

“Since you gave a completely ludicrous answer before you gave the right one.”

“Hey, if you look closely from various angles, I can pass as handsome-”

“Next question,” Javier immediately put in. “What should you do to effectively refute the accusations the House of Peers will make against you at court?”

“How about kneeling down and begging them to let it go this once?”

“...”

“I’m serious. I’m not lying.”

“Master Lloyd.” Javier stared hard at Lloyd.

“Yeah. What?”

“Are you confident that you can win at court?”

“Of course I do. It’ll be a clean finish. I will trounce them.”

Lloyd had no doubt about it. But before he could spell his plan out to Javier, the carriage came to a stop.

“Looks like we’re here. Let’s go.”

Lloyd immediately opened the carriage door before Javier could scold him, and the royal courtroom appeared in his view. That was the place for today’s trial. Lloyd went in. The trial was ready to start soon. After touching up his clothes, Lloyd received a walk-through of today’s trial from the courtroom administrator. The etiquette and order of speakers in court. And later, the trial commenced.

Woah. What an impressive structure this building has.

Lloyd’s gaze traveled the width of the courtroom as he stood at the defendant’s seat. It was dominating. The place was designed like a miniature baseball stadium, with the defendant’s seat as the batter’s box. That was where Lloyd would sit. To his right was the place of the first baseman. That was the seating for the head of the House of Peers, who will question Lloyd today. On his left, the third baseman, was the place for the legislative officials offering the queen advice regarding the sentence. And the center, the place for the pitcher, was reserved for the queen.

And the rest of the audience will watch the trial from afar, from the spot of the outfielders. Tsk. What’s worse is how the seats are dramatically tiered. Mine is the lowest one.

The defendant's seat was tiered in the lowest. About 10 feet deep. The room was structured with a steep, much like a college lecture hall, so everyone, minus the defendant, looked down at the defendant.

Aha. It's designed to psychologically pressure the defendant. Here, all their crimes and wrongdoings will be spelled out. Their punishments will be discussed while everyone stares down at the defendant. By doing that, the defendant will naturally feel small. With this kind of terrible pressure, anyone's shoulders will droop by reflex.

Lloyd fought hard not to smile. Who cared if the seats were designed this way?

Victory will be mine anyway.

Lloyd decided to get this trial over with, resume his construction project, and harvest the pieces of tauranga as soon as possible. Meanwhile, the queen's declaration of open session was made.

"I hereby declare."

Queen Magentano rose from her seat, and everyone followed suit. Grave silence ruled over the courtroom before being broken by the queen's declaration.

"I openly declare that today's trial, which takes place on the ninth of this month, will discuss his responsibility for the leakage of frigid air of the Heart of Winter at the palatial repair construction site, the loss of the Heart of Winter, and various other matters. But before anything else, I want to express some words of comfort to the royal magicians, guard knights, and laborers who suffered from the accident."

Her gaze raked through the courtroom. And then it stopped on Lloyd.

"First, the defendant."

"Yes, Your Majesty." Lloyd immediately lowered his head.

She asked, "I shall check your identity first. Are you the successor and eldest son of the Frontera family, Lloyd Frontera?"

"Yes, I am, Your Majesty."

“Good. Let it be known that you have the right to deny making statements based on your subjective judgment and to refuse to answer questions throughout the trial. However, there will be no one but you who will be held responsible for how you exercise your rights. Does the defendant understand the meaning of my words?”

“I do, Your Majesty.” Lloyd lowered his head.

“Good. Then. Duke Toscano.” Her gaze moved to Duke Toscano. A short, chubby man who looked like a bulldog gave his respects to the queen. Duke Toscano was the head of the House of Peers.

He’s the one who accused me. Though it wasn’t his sole decision.

Lloyd smiled. The man was a heavyweight who represented the central nobles of the kingdom. He was also related to the imperial family by blood. The queen continued giving her declaration and notice speech.

“Duke Toscano, you shall conduct yourself in the courtroom solely guided by the aim to realize the grave law and justice of the kingdom. Moreover, you shall not involve your personal feelings in the trial, and in the process of proving the charges outlined in the bill of indictment, you are forbidden to ask leading questions that will prompt the defendant to give the answers of your desire and must respect and pursue the process of fair trial. Do you understand the meaning of my words?”

“I do, Your Majesty.”

Duke Toscano bowed politely. The queen’s face froze a little, and a faint glint of concern appeared in her eyes.

Will he be able to exonerate himself from today’s trial?

The more she thought about it, the more worried she became. A sense of doubt filled her heart, mainly because of Duke Toscano. This was the man who submitted the bill of indictment against Lloyd as the head of the House of Peers. And he was set to interrogate Lloyd today.

Duke Toscano is a stubborn fundamentalist.

Much like his bulldog-like appearance, he was an extremely stubborn man. A stickler for rules. He rarely deviated from the routines he had set for himself. And yet, that man was here to charge Lloyd for his crimes. That was the part the queen was worried about the most.

He will not easily let go of Frontera. He will be like a hellbent bulldog who will let go of his bite only if Lloyd's crimes are paid for.

Moreover, he wasn't the only problem. There was something else, too.

The entire House of Peers supports him.

The mere thought of that made her sigh. The thing was, even if she was presiding over the trial today and giving the final verdict, she wasn't in the position to dismiss every charge against Lloyd and side with him.

That is how serious the matter is. One of the divine items of the royal house was lost.

The Heart of Winter was, no doubt, a crucial object. It was the artifact given by Ice Dragon Tyrannus to the founding king, Mikael Magentano. A strategic weapon that held the power of a winter. That was what was lost. Its loss was national, so priceless that it couldn't be translated into value. As such, even if she was the queen and Lloyd was the meritorious retainer, she couldn't cover for him without a clear ground. What was more, the process of how the Heart of Winter came to be used rose as another contending issue.

It can be used only if the kingdom is on the brink of collapse or if the queen requests to use it. It can only be used with unanimous agreement from the nobles in the House of Peers.

As the protocol dictated, Queen Magentano filed a request to use the Heart of Winter. At first, the nobles expressed dismay. The palatial repair didn't constitute a national emergency. That was the initial response of the House of Peers, extremely obvious and reasonable. And so, she met up with each noble to persuade them, sometimes sweet-talking or bribing them, until she reached a consensus. But now, despite the political risk she allowed herself, the item was gone. So, technically speaking, she was slightly responsible for the loss.

Therefore, I cannot stand by Lloyd's side so openly. That will make the House of Peers turn its back on me.

A grimace appeared on her face, the lines of her forehead wrinkling. Even though she was a queen with powerful political power, she couldn't entirely ignore the House of Peers. The national affair went smoothly only if the monarch's leadership harmonized with the cooperation of the House of Peers. That was how her legitimacy could be maintained and also why she was worried.

She was worried that Duke Toscano was dead serious about charging Lloyd for his sins. If so, how should she protect Lloyd without showing her favor? While she was wrapped up in her concern, Duke Toscano rose from his seat to speak.

"My deepest respects to the sacred courtroom and to Her Majesty the Great. I shall start my statement. First, defendant Lloyd Frontera holds the impressive accomplishment of preventing an assassination attempt against the queen, and he is truly a role model for taking in tens and thousands of refugees after protecting his fiefdom from the disaster."

What?!

Queen Magentano couldn't believe her ears. Why was he complimenting Lloyd now? The series of compliments deepened her frown as she tried to figure out what the man was up to. Meanwhile, he continued.

"It does not end there. Lloyd Frontera inspired others by confronting the catastrophe that fell on Namaran without hesitation. He also came before anyone else to help Her Majesty when the Bone Dragon attacked. For his accomplishments, he was appointed as a meritorious retainer of the royal house. But that is not all. Even with the unfortunate accident of the Heart of Winter..."

“...”

Queen Magentano cocked her head to the side. Something was definitely odd here. Even the jury exchanged looks as they whispered among themselves. Unperturbed, Duke Toscano went on to praise Lloyd.

“Even when the divine item went on a rampage... He didn’t cower despite the terrifying situation... Rolled up his sleeves to save the laborers, the precious people of the royal house... He did his best...”

“...”

Could it be that he had lost it? Queen Magentano started to become seriously concerned about him. This whole event was unfolding very differently from what she had in mind.

I doubt he’s gone mad.

Originally, the duke was supposed to accuse, rebuke, and question Lloyd Frontera. That was why he had submitted the bill of indictment and came to this place. So, it was a wonder as he was busy overlooking and complimenting Lloyd from the start.

I cannot wrap my head around this at all.

Could it be that she was dreaming? She seriously considered the thought. That was how dumbfounding and dismaying this situation was for her.

But she wasn’t alone. The jury was as befuddled as her. They all exchanged glances, saying among themselves that the duke was strange today and acting like Lloyd’s lawyer. They whispered and murmured among themselves in confusion.

While the duke went on, a satisfied smile hung on Lloyd’s mouth. And he thought: It was the same for anywhere in the world. Blood, education, and regional connections. Plus, blackmailing and bribing. With all those combined, anything was possible in this world.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 287: The Defendant’s Method of Blackmail (2)

Rattle. Rattle. The carriage shook, but not like the carts drawn around in the markets. Regardless, it still had a rattle as it wasn’t a car with a modern suspension device. However, Lloyd didn’t pay attention to it. His trial had ended successfully. The ruling he received was exactly what he expected.

My blackmailing worked like a charm because they had too much to lose. The head and the other members of the House of Peers.

Lloyd smiled faintly. The event back at the court flashed across his mind. He felt good. Refreshed. Duke Toscano acted exactly the way Lloyd wanted to and accepted all of his demands despite the man’s intractable character. Thanks to that, Lloyd was now on cloud nine while heading back to his chamber, enjoying the expensive, spacious, and velvety leather seat.

“Don’t you think so, Javier?”

When he heard his name, Javier, who was looking out the window, turned and stared at Lloyd. “What about? By the way, what did you do?”

“What? What did I do?” Lloyd asked defensively.

“At today’s trial,” Javier went on, “The more I think about it, it is strange. Duke Toscano had rolled up his sleeves to condemn and charge you for what happened at the construction site.”

“Yeah, he did.”

“So it is beyond my comprehension why he suddenly changed his attitude and advocated for you.”

“Is that why you’re doubting me? Do you think I used some sort of trickery?”

“Yes, Young Master.”

“Come on, trickery? How can you look so relaxed after saying those brazen words,” wailed Lloyd

“Mind you,” Javier raised his voice a little. “You were the one who used such a description.”

Lloyd pretended he didn’t hear him. “Anyway, you’re suggesting that I’ve done something shady under the table that changed the nobles’ attitude. Right?”

“Yes, you are right. Did you really do something shady?”

“Uh-huh.” Lloyd flashed a grin at him. No need to deny it. “I blackmailed him.”

“Blackmailed?” Javier lifted his brow.

“Yeah, I did it right after the day after the House of Peers submitted the bill of indictment.”

“How could you have possibly blackmailed him? You never stepped out of your room.”

“I sent a letter, via Ggoming, to Marquess Bergamo.”

“A letter?”

“Yes.”

Lloyd nodded. Just then, the events of the previous days came to his mind, from the day the Heart of Winter went berserk to the day of cleaning up the mess. He didn’t laze around as the others had thought he did. He was pretending to relax around in bed but did all the work that needed to be done.

I analyzed the accident site. Thankfully, I unconsciously had my design skills on when I arrived at the accident site, allowing me to scan the whole site.

The blown-up refrigerant room. The shattered control chest and passed-out royal magicians and knights. The formation of cracks and scatters, as well as the position and location of the victims. All of the information he had about these events was scanned and saved as a piece of data. This enabled Lloyd to summon the image of the accident in his head in the comfort of his bed and conduct a thorough, slow, and meticulous analysis of the whole situation.

“I found the smoking gun. The fifth son of Marquess Bergamo. He was the only one who died in the accident. I found conclusive evidence that it was his doing.”

“What was it...?” A line of frown appeared in between Javier’s brows.

Lloyd shrugged. “I found the skin of someone’s palm ripped on the cover of the destroyed control chest.”

“The skin of someone’s palm, Young Master?” asked Javier.

“Yeah.”

Lloyd was telling the truth. Indeed, the skin of someone’s entire palm was glued to the chest facade. It was undeniable evidence that pointed to the fifth son of Marquess Bergamo.

“Hey,” went on Lloyd, “Do you know what happens if you stick your tongue against a cold piece of metal in the freezing winter?”

“I know. It sticks to the metal.”

“Right? And what happens if you try to pull it off by force?”

“A terrible idea. Your frozen skin would rip off.”

“That’s exactly right. That’s what seemed to have happened with the piece of skin on the chest.”

“Do you mean... that it belonged to the fifth son of Marquess Bergamo?”

“Yes,” said Lloyd confidently, nodding for emphasis. “I saw it when I arrived at the scene. That royal magician’s hand was bleeding. The blood had frozen because of the cold, but it definitely looked like it had been ripped off.”

This, however, was a lie. Lloyd hadn’t observed anything like that when he got to the scene because he was too out of his mind to catch that sort of small detail. But he nonetheless knew and was 100% sure about it. After all, he was able to look back at the scene in his head for observation and analysis purposes.

“So, what else could it mean other than the magician had put his hand on the control chest, prompted the Heart of Winter to go on a rampage, and then wreak havoc on the place by emitting cold air? That was when his hand got stuck. You know what happened afterward. Boom. The control chest exploded.”

“So,” contributed Javier, “The explosion must have shoved him and forcefully tore his hand away. Hence, the skin of his palm was left stuck on the control chest.”

“Correct.” Lloyd grinned. Javier’s deduction was right. “This evidence was too conclusive. I had circumstantial evidence that he was our guy, not to mention I had the testimonies of the royal knights that he stabbed his colleague, but I didn’t have any direct witnesses.”

“Certainly,” affirmed Javier gravely, “For all we know, the stabbed magician might have framed himself as a victim when he was the one who was at fault.”

“That’s exactly right. It’s not entirely impossible since they’re magicians, although the chances are small. The man could’ve stabbed his own back using magic and blamed it on his colleague.”

“But the ripped piece of skin ruled out the possibility of that.”

“Yeah. I’m telling you. It’s a smoking gun.”

Javier furrowed his brows. “Well then, um, I see. You then sent a threatening letter to Marquess Bergamo that the dirty secret of his son would be put out in the open unless the House of Peers changed its stance. Is my guess correct?”

“Yeah, I say, you’re quite good.” Lloyd flashed a mischievous smile. Javier was right. “What do you think would happen if I disclosed everything, including the smoking gun? The investigative body in the palace will have to conduct another investigation, only this time more focused on the new evidence. The result? The Bergamo family will take every fault. Sure, I won’t be entirely exonerated. I was in charge of the site when the accident happened. But I’ll receive lighter punishment compared to the Bergamo family.”

“I certainly think so. More so now when you have become a hero to the people.”

Javier smiled, remembering that Lloyd had become the hero of the capital in the past few days. Everyone adored him for a simple reason. The eldest son of the count and meritorious retainer of the Magentano imperial family had rolled up his sleeves to save the plebian laborers under him. This heartwarming news spread like wildfire across the capital through the mouths of the laborers and their families as well as other relatives.

“The public opinion has tipped over to your favor, and once it was proven that you are not the direct cause of the accident, your punishment would have been as light as a feather.”

“Yeah,” agreed Lloyd heartily, “Plus, I had the status and privileges of a meritorious retainer of the imperial family. I’d have gotten a small scolding from Her Majesty. A verbal warning. But the marquess? He would’ve caused an uproar.”

“It would have really been so if you revealed the evidence in court.” That was when Javier understood the whole situation. And he thought to himself further that the fake Lloyd was a sly man. A cunning, manipulative, and small-hearted man. But those qualities were what made him great.

Right. If this piece of evidence was revealed, hmm, the Bergamo family wouldn't have been able to avoid a grave punishment as they directly created the cause for the loss of the royal house's divine item. Their sin would be graver than treason. In the worst case, their family could have fallen.

That would not be the only consequence. The sword of reckoning could reach all the noble houses related to the marquess by blood. It was possible that their crime would be considered worse than treason.

The thing is, Marquess Bergamo and Duke Toscano are in-laws. Duke Toscano is the former's father-in-law.

In other words, Duke Toscano was the maternal grandfather of the culprit. The central nobles who had influence over the House of Peers were tightly connected to each other by blood, location, and education. And so, any punishment that was similar to exterminating the family would have affected every noble related to the marquess in varying degrees.

What a dirty method.

Javier couldn't help but smile wryly.

"That is why the head of the House of Peers changed his stance. He looked like he was ready to risk his life for you."

"Well, you could say that."

The same smile hung on Lloyd's face now. His meticulously designed blackmail worked, which was about how they'd be guillotined if he received a guilty sentence. Since the powerful nobles had a lot to lose and were trapped by their social network of connections from education, blood, and region, Lloyd simply had to softly suggest that they would be rewarded in the future so long they did what he demanded. Eventually, thanks to his blackmail and bribery, the trial went how Lloyd wanted it to.

As for the queen, she just had to go along the flow as she was already advocating for Lloyd. So, at the very moment the Duke Toscano unexpectedly rooted for Lloyd, she simply echoed his words in joy.

When Duke Toscano said that Lloyd was a true patriot, Queen Magentano replied that he was right. When he argued that punishing Lloyd would be more damaging than more beneficial, she repeated that he was right.

As for Lloyd himself, he had to only throw some groveling remarks here and there, things like “I will follow the great will of Your Majesty.” And the final verdict: “The loss of the Heart of Winter is painful, but Lloyd holds no substantial responsibility over this incident as the item went into a frenzy due to magical instability, something beyond human control. As such, placing all the responsibility on Lloyd, the imperial family’s meritorious retainer, for this is extremely harsh. Only a small fine will be levied on him for neglecting his work site.” That was the verdict.

“Thanks to that, a slap on the wrist is all I’ve got. And everything went well. Now, time to get to work!”

Indeed. It didn’t mean that Lloyd could rest now just because the trial ended. He still had jobs to do at the site, and it was something that he berated.

I seriously want to grab the author of The Knight of Blood and Iron by the neck and give him a terrible shake for planning out this merciless world.

Lloyd berated his fate of having to live in this kind of world setting instead of an easy, happy-go-lucky one. Fighting back the urge to rant about his life, he continued his work to extract the tauranga in the structure. Since the construction was already in its final stage of nearing the isolated piers of the foundation, it was not done before long. After five days, Lloyd reached his desired point of progression.

Found it!

At last, the isolated piers of the foundation revealed itself. A rectangular piece of tauranga that was about sixteen feet in width and nineteen feet in width was stuck in the middle. By this time, Lloyd started to carefully start his work. Ppodong joined the effort, and so did Javier. The stone was harvested and replaced with another piece of material, and cement was applied for adhesion. This process was repeated twelve times. At last, the moment the twelfth piece of tauranga was harvested safely...

Ding dong.

[You have attained twelve pieces of the tauranga stone, a key material for the Jewel of Truth.]

[You have succeeded in excavating the key material of Aotearoa that was destroyed during the mythical age.]

[This is truly an impressive excavation that will be remembered in history.]

[When the Jewel of Truth is restored, your name will be remembered in history as the excavator who found this key material.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 2,000 RP.]

[Current RP: 4,655]

Eh?

Lloyd received an unexpected achievement notification and a large amount of RP. This was a monumental moment for him as he now had enough RP to use the Time Freeze skill.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 288: The Second Key Construction Material (1)

“Eh...?”

Ice Dragon Tyrannus narrowed his eyes in his cave. The cave sat on the rough land beyond the Arctic Sea, south to the Lorasian Continent.

Just what was that?

Tyrannus could feel that the Heart of Winter had vanished. Though it happened in an ever-so-distant land and the item was old, the dragon felt it nonetheless.

A human absorbed it. But... How is that possible?

Tyrannus cocked his head as he recalled the day he gave the Heart of Winter to a human as a gift. It must have been a few hundred years ago. Mikael Magentano, his friend, paved the path of a new era after being touted as the hero among humans. And just as a good friend would do, Tyrannus presented him with a gift. A marble that was infused with his mana and contained the frigid air of winter.

I remember being extremely excited at that time. I got so preoccupied that I produced an artifact more powerful than I originally designed it to be. So powerful that it even possessed a faint consciousness of its own.

Tyrannus had to suffer from a cold that whole year after manufacturing the artifact. But thanks to its devotion and sacrifice, Tyrannus formed a spiritual connection with the Heart of Winter, which was the reason why he could hear the items’ whispers carried by the wind a few days ago.

“The Heart is free.” With that, it was absorbed into a human. This flustered Tyrannus.

Out of all the many races, it had to assimilate into a human’s manaheart. I didn’t know that was even possible.

Tyrannus became curious. It considered flying over where it happened at once, the impulse to satisfy his curiosity surging in him. But he eventually shook his head.

No. I can't ruin my precious time off like this.

Tyrannus objectively analyzed his situation. He was enjoying a restful break after his wife went on a trip with his daughter-in-law. It was a break that had come for the first time in hundreds of years, so a slightly surprising or intriguing incident wasn't going to make him ruin his precious vacation.

Tsk. Who cares. It's not something that's meant to be absorbed. He's going to have an awful stomachache. I guess they did what they had to do. Live or die, it's their business, not mine. Boom!

Boom! Tyrannus resigned and let its head fall flat on the ground, and soon, the soft snoring filled the cave.

♣

At the same hour in Capital Magentano, astonishment filled Lloyd's eyes.

Dang.

Half flustered and satisfied, he hurriedly scanned the message before his eyes like a starving man who was unexpectedly gifted a bowl of ramen in the middle of the night.

It has been a while since I received an accomplishment notification. And the reward is what? 2,000 RP? This is nuts!

Lloyd didn't believe it at first. He wondered if he mistakenly counted an extra zero. He rubbed his eyes and read it again. Still, it read 2,000 RP. Now, he had 4,655 RP.

Haha. Hahaha.

The corners of his lips crawled up on its own. Lloyd instantly knew what he could do with this reward.

I can now use the Time Freeze skill anytime I want to.

Lloyd now held the power to freeze time anywhere except for a zone of his designation. As long as he was in that area, he could carry on with his activities for a year without getting older. Though it was just a year, it was enough time to finish construction of any size.

That's not it. The achievement message explained that the mere excavation of the key material for the jewel's construction is highly impressive and will be remembered throughout history.

That was how he was able to acquire 2,000 RP in one go. And this meant...

From now on, I can receive somewhat similar RP every time I find a key material for this construction.

2,000 RP for every key material found. 3,000 RP for the Time Freeze skill.

So, let's say that I spend 3,000 RP and freeze time. While the world stands still, I can go on and excavate another key material for construction. That'd give me 2,000 RP again. Wow. I feel like I've earned some sort of cash refund.

Of course, there was a big difference of 1,000 RP for both.

But it's all right. 1,000 RP is a manageable amount.

Sure, it was burdensome, but it wasn't impossible. And because it wasn't impossible, he felt encouraged to push ahead with his future plans.

I can save time by using the Time Freeze skill for all future excavations. That will make it easier for me to stop the restoration of destiny.

The more he calculated and made estimations for the future, the happier his humming became. However, he didn't get lost in the rose-colored future.

"Okay, don't loosen up just yet! This is the dangerous part, so pull yourselves together! Push! Two, three!"

“Ppodong!”

“Argh!!!”

Crush! Lloyd’s energetic shout filled the cave, and at his yell, Ppodong and the laborers exerted their efforts, pushing and pulling the piece of tauranga until it was brought outside. As for getting it out to the ground from the vertical cave, that job fell in the mighty hands of Bibeong.

“Okay! Lift it up!”

“Bibeong!”

Despite how the pieces of tauranga were sixteen ft in width and nineteen ft in length, they were just tiny stones to Bibeong. And so, the twelve pieces of the tauranga were soon brought out to the ground under the sun for the first time after hundreds of years. There was more work for Lloyd that followed after, however.

Of course. Since I bored, dug, and opened the area beneath the palace, it’s time to fill it back up.

In the first place, this construction involved boring a giant tunnel under the palace’s foundation.

If I leave the tunnel untouched, it will collapse over time until the whole foundation sinks.

Then, the palace would also collapse as a result since it sat on top of the foundation. Since that was the last thing Lloyd wanted, he shoved rocks and cement into every crevice of the tunnel and refrigerant room, making sure that they were completely filled. And finally, after ten more days, everything was over. The time has come to leave the capital.

Queen Magentano looked at Lloyd. “You are here to greet me farewell before you leave, am I right?”

“That is correct, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd, bowing his head down.

A wry smile appeared on her face. “Then have you achieved what you came here for?”

“That is also right, Your Majesty,” answered Lloyd.

“Are you not overwhelmed with gratitude?”

“I was just about to add that, Your Majesty.”

“I wouldn’t have hated you at least if you couldn’t talk. And I suppose now is when you’ll ask for my forgiveness.”

Lloyd flinched. “You know me well, Your Majesty...”

“Certainly. Moreover, there is something else.”

“Something else that I need your forgiveness for, Your Majesty?”

“Of course.”

For some reason, he felt that her voice sounded accusatory. “What is that...?”

“Do you still not know?”

Lloyd didn’t know what to say. Here she was suddenly cornering him with her words, but he couldn’t remember what more fault he made. He merely looked up at the queen, who began to click her tongue, which probably was because of his curious gaze.

“Tsk, tsk. A man who only knows about himself and always comes full of empty promises. What a lamentable man you are.”

“Promise, Your Majesty?” Promise? What promise? Lloyd thought to himself as he cocked his head to the side. The wry smile on her face deepened.

“It appears that you have forgotten about your brazen words to me,” reminded the queen. “Do you not remember the conversation we had before the start of the construction and when you came to request for the Heart of Winter? Do you still not recall what I asked and what you replied?”

“Um... Oh. Right...” It all came back to Lloyd.

“I asked you if you could promise me that your project that involved the usage of the Heart of Winter and harvesting tauranga would not harm my imperial family or me. Do you remember what you said?”

“I said, ‘Certainly, Your Majesty…’”

“I am glad that you have not forgotten your words.”

Lloyd’s face turned red in embarrassment.

“At that time, I naively trusted you with my heart and accepted to grant your request. It was your promise, and I chose to trust you. No other words were necessary. But what happened to that promise?”

Lloyd didn’t say anything but looked down in shame.

“Hmm, how should I get compensated for the destroyed item? What compensation should I demand from a shameless man like yourself.”

“Um, hmm, I profusely ask for your forgive-”

“You are not trying to amend your wrongdoing with mere words, aren’t you?”

“Um, hmm, I truly do not know-”

“You cannot be trying to move on by saying you don’t know how to gain my forgiveness, right?”

“T-then, what is it that Your Majesty wants from-”

“You cannot be asking me to spell that out for you either, right?”

“…”

Please save me, my queen. Or just beat me, scold me, or kill me. Lloyd looked up at the queen with a sullen, gloomy face. This softened her smile.

“It is done. I already declared at the court that I shall not penalize you. So, what need is there to rebuke you now?”

“I am aware, but still...”

“Still?”

Lloyd’s resolute eyes shone as they fixed on her. “I will absolutely return this favor one day, Your Majesty.”

“Favor?”

“Yes, Your Majesty.”

Lloyd hung his head down. This time, he was serious. It wasn’t a joke.

She has been taking great care of me.

In hindsight, it was true. She was always there to give help or assistance during critical moments. This time, too, her help was so priceless that it couldn’t be measured in terms of money. One thing led to another, and he even absorbed the divine item that belonged to the imperial family.

Any ordinary ruler would have seen red. No, they might have been losing sleep trying to think of a way to destroy and kill me on the very day I came to possess powers greater than them.”

But Queen Magentano was different. She instead made him a political comrade with a big heart. And even now, she was showering him with generous assistance and help and supporting his dream of being a rich bum. Not only that, but she also nonchalantly let the incident with the Heart of Winter slide. No one could have a bigger heart than her.

“Therefore, Your Majesty, when you find yourself in trouble, I shall be by your side to overcome it together with you.”

Lloyd spoke sincerely. What he said was against his go-to motto, “Remember what they did for you for a second. Remember what they did to you for life.” But could it be that she wasn’t happy with it? She scoffed.

“Hmm, only once?”

“Your Majesty?!” asked Lloyd in surprise.

“Never mind. Well, once, I see. I should be grateful. This single act of gratitude can’t be easy to obtain from a man who only visits when he wants something from me.”

“...”

“Based on your behaviors to this date, I suppose I should be tearing up in gratitude if you keep it in the future.”

Lloyd gaped in shock.

“So, first, I will only receive your gesture. You can leave now.”

“I am overwhelmed with gratitude, Your Majesty,” replied Lloyd.

“Again. There,” she said as she shook her head. “The gratitude you say only when you are stuck.”

“Um, then, what should I say instead, Your Majesty?”

“Instead of showing me your gratitude, show me your sincerity.”

“Sincerity, Your Majesty?”

“Yes.”

“Then how should I do-”

“That is for you to think and find out. Did you not hear my order that you can leave now?”

“Not at all, Your Majesty. I shall leave now.”

“Tsk. This is the only time you pretend to listen.”

“Your Majesty?”

“I was talking to myself. Do not be curious. So long.”

“Yes, Your Majesty. Long live the queen.”

At last... He was free! Lloyd inwardly yelled in joy as he bolted out of her presence at lightning speed. He swooshed out of the palace and got on the back of Draggy, who was already on standby. Javier, Ppodong, Bangul, and Ggoming were already there.

“So, Bibeong, go back to the Frontera fiefdom. And say bye to Bangul.”

“Bi, Bibeong! Bibeong!”

“Bangul! Bba-bangul!”

Bibeong was, unfortunately, too large to be carried around like the rest of his friends. Moreover, since the Termina Garden was well-repaired, he had no reason to stay in the capital. Bibeong and Bangul parted wistfully as they hugged. And soon, Draggy flew up, its hands tightly clenching the twelve pieces of tauranga.

Fwoosh! Crash! Once it soared up, it turned northward, its fierce fluttering leaving a shockwave. At almost a supersonic speed, they headed north. After several hours of flight, they arrived at the Arctic Sea.

There, Lloyd ordered, “Drop!”

Clack! Splash! Draggy dropped the Taurangas from 10,000 feet above. They sank into the sea. Lloyd waited until they hit the water and plunged down to the foundation where the Jewel of Truth would be built. Soon, a welcoming message emerged.

Ding dong.

[You have dropped the twelve pieces of tauranga safely near the foundation of the Jewel of Truth.]

[For this, you now can access information on the Taupo, the second key material for the Jewel of Truth.]

[Would you like to access information on the Taupo now?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a yes.

Lloyd silently nodded. Just then...

Fwoosh! A new video emerged and clouded his vision.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 289: The Second Key Construction Material (2)

Ruuumble...!

Dozens of horses foamed at the mouths, their muscular necks, chests, and bodies sweating in buckets. The shouts and orders to pull harder rang aloud the area, mixed with the knights' commands, laborers' shouts, and stifled neighing. As a dust storm emerged, there was a giant staircase made of stone being carried forward. It wasn't a simple and sleek staircase. The inside of the stairs where the steps of stone met had something resembling a speed bump. The bump had a unique shape. It was designed to connect to the stone beside it. Dozens of horses dragged the staircase along with countless other spoils.

Knights marched on with victorious smiles on their faces after having survived the destructive battlefield and war that marked the end of the mythical age. The procession was making its way toward their home, the land of the humans, when something happened.

Fwish! Stab! An arrow flew and stabbed a knight's forehead. It was followed by a salvo of arrows, all aimed at the horses, knights, and laborers. Chaos descended the land. Screams were heard. Amid the chaos and painful shrieks, the knights prepared for a counterattack in rage. This rage was directed toward themselves for allowing this ambush to happen by lowering their guards and to their enemies for their sneak attack. They flew into a rage and raised their spears and swords, confident that they were unrivaled in the entire continent. There wasn't a single creature who could ever defeat them while they rode their horses. Their confidence was absolute and passionate.

But their beliefs weren't entirely groundless. It was the truth that no creature ever managed to strike them down in a mobile warfare on a plain. There were countless armies and monsters that had been helplessly defeated and died at their hands. And thus, they earned the saying, "one with the horse." Brimming with assurance that victory would come like so many other times, they charged forward. Yet, they faced defeat.

The issue was that they were only described to be one with their horses, whereas their enemies were actually part animal. Their lower torsos were that of a strong, wild horse, and their upper torsos were that of a human body. This perfect bodily combination assured a level of speed and maneuver no cavalry could ever come close to. Rapid acceleration. Rapid stops. Rapid turns. Unrestrained speed control. The half-horse and half-human creatures wreaked havoc, using their spears to stab, kicking with their hind legs, and shooting arrows when they had a chance. And with that, the continent's greatest knights met its doom.

Terrified, the laborers ran for their lives while their enemies celebrated their easy win by stealing the stone staircase. They tied the ropes around the stones with sweat dripping down their body as they galloped toward the vast plain of the northwest.

A long time had passed since then. The world had changed. A new chapter of history had begun, and the story had become a legend. The existence of the staircase had faded away with the passage of time. With that, the video had ended.

Ding dong.

[You have finished accessing the information on the Taupo staircase, the second key material of the Jewel of Truth used to build its staircase.]

[If you wish to watch it again, please select "Replay."]

"Whew." Lloyd exhaled the breath he'd been holding for a while. This video reminded him of the VR experience he had once back in Korea. And so, he was amused and also felt nostalgic thinking about his past.

Ah, I wish I could watch a movie, a drama, or even a MeTube video.

Just then, a desire to watch a film came over him. He wanted to sprawl around on his sofa or floor, binge-watching movies, dramas, and variety shows for several hours as he flipped through different channels. He missed the mere act of mindlessly watching something entertaining. Lloyd became wretchedly nostalgic of it since it was an enjoyment unavailable in this world.

Tsk. The records of the mythical age didn't have to be pretentious by showing me a video. It's just making me want to watch TV.

Lloyd grumbled to himself but didn't forget to mentally go through the contents he had just seen.

The Jewel of Truth. The second key material of the Aotearoa was the stone staircase.

The video featured a giant staircase with distinctive bumps at its end. It was something Lloyd was familiar with.

Suppose tauranga was the material used in building the holding stones for the Tomb of the General. The Taupo would be the first flight of stairs at the far bottom of the Tomb of the General. Its structure and basic principles are very similar.

The more he thought about it, the more it was the case. Since the Tomb of the General was made of blocks of stones, it was gigantic and massive. As such, how to safely distribute the weight was the biggest task he had when it came to building it.

Thus, the holding stones and the first flight of stairs played a big part in managing its weight. The holding stones were placed on all four sides of the Tomb of the General as if they were spalled on. They prevented lateral pressure from centering to the bottom of the building. As for the first flight of stairs...

They, too, had a purpose. Its bump structure is interconnected with the stones next to it. Like putting arms around each other's shoulders. Should I say that it was meant to withhold the weight pressing down from the top and distributing it around? That was how the Tomb of the General managed without its lower structure crumbling under its weight.

The shape of the Taupo in the video held a striking resemblance with the first flight of stairs in the Tomb of the General.

And as for the race that ambushed the knights...

Lloyd, who was still 10,000 feet above the ground on Draggy's back, thought about the ambushers.

Yeah, they're definitely centaurs.

Centaurs were half-human and half-horse creatures. They were equestrian by nature, and the plains were their running ground. They were born to gallop, and at times, gave their lives away for it. They were the creatures that made you wonder how they scratched their backs or stomachs.

Anyway, the centaurs took the second key construction material.

Lloyd sighed at length after reaching the conclusion. The Great War was said to have seen participation from all sorts of races, and now, it was the centaurs. Really?

The setting for this novel sucks.

Lloyd was condemning the author of the novel when he heard Javier's voice.

"Did you see something this time again?"

When Lloyd turned, he found Javier shooting a cold, cynical gaze typical of him.

"Yeah." Lloyd nodded. "I saw a video record."

Lloyd didn't bother to lie about the video. There was no need to. This pertained to the legendary artifact of the mythical age. Getting clues from a magical vision wasn't anything suspicious.

Plus, he won't doubt me if I'm honest with him about these small events.

Lloyd thought that he shouldn't hide it from A to Z and make hardly believable excuses for everything. He believed he ought to be frank about the minor details since he hid his identity from Javier.

That way, Javier won't be skeptical about my important matters. He'll trust me.

And besides, Javier wasn't a slow guy. Lloyd didn't want Javier to find out about him first before he bore his heart out to Count and Countess Frontera. Part of it was because of fear. Lloyd was scared that Javier might point his sword at him for faking his identity and abusing him for all these years once he found out.

And so, Lloyd decided to be shameless. "I've seen the events after the Great War. The knights were ambushed when they were taking the stone staircase, the second key material for this construction, as a spoil of war."

"Ambush? What do you mean?"

"The centaurs attacked the knights and took the staircase from them."

Javier stroked his chin. "Then I suppose our next destination is the Great Plain in the northwest."

"Right," affirmed Lloyd. "That's where we are heading."

Lloyd was glad that the centaurs' habitat was widely known, like the merpeople. They lived in the great plains of the highlands located in the northwest. The climate here was similar to the highlands in Mongolia.

It's cold because it's located inland and sits quite high in altitude. The area is unimaginably cold and dry, making it barely habitable. Farming is difficult there too. Thanks to this, no kingdom covets the land.

It was just a cold and dry neighborhood with barely any arable land whose inhabitants were powerful centaurs. The place was hard to take over, and even if it was taken over, it was barely useful. Thanks to these factors, no one lusted after the land. It was absolutely free from trespassing humans and invading kingdoms. That was how the land managed to solely be used by the centaurs to this day.

“So, let’s go,” urged Lloyd, “Draggy.”

Clack!

Draggy precisely understood Lloyd’s message. It changed its flight direction toward the south and removed itself from the Arctic Sea. Past the northern end of the continent, the scenery beneath Lloyd’s feet started to change. The forests in the tundra and taiga flashed past, the treetops covered with snow. And the giant mountain range stood tall, its height shooting up from the bottom enough to touch Lloyd’s feet. And once they passed several peaks, at last, the highlands as high as 8,200 feet spanned in front of his eyes. It was the Great Plain, the largest highland in the northwest area. Lloyd urged Draggy to land at the entrance.

“Draggy. Play here for a while.”

Creak?

“I’m sorry,” apologized Lloyd. “I fear that the folks in this area will panic when they see you. They might think we’re invading. But don’t cock your head like that. You’re making me feel guilty.”

Claaack!

“No, no. People don’t hate you because you’re ugly. They don’t hate you. Um, so... I don’t know. Just make sure you’re hiding in the woods and hang around here. Got it?”

Clack!

Draggy nodded but not without casting a discouraged look at Lloyd. He smiled apologetically. He felt bad, but there wasn’t anything he could do.

Draggy looks too menacing on the outside. It’ll easily ruin the first encounter we have with the nearby centaurs. I feel bad, but there’s nothing I can do. I should play ball with it next time.

Resolved to appease Draggy in the future, Lloyd went into the vast plain with Javier, both riding on Ppodong's back. After about three or four hours of galloping and enjoying the endless stretch of the plain...

"Something is coming this way."

Javier, who was seated at the back, pointed to one area. Lloyd turned and found several dots dancing on the horizon, coming close toward him. No, it was charging at him. The dots grew in size. Sandstorms raged behind their trails. At last, they came close and surrounded Lloyd and Javier.

"Stop! The stranger should stop at once right now!"

Gallop! Thwack! They circled around Lloyd, and the noise of the galloping footsteps menacingly drummed in his ears. These centaurs were clad in dark-brown armor over their muscular human torso and armed with spears and arrows. Their tail manes on their horse body swayed sideways, and their gazes glimmered icily. These centaurs belonged to the patrol team.

Woah. Look at their muscles beneath their armors.

Lloyd studied the centaurs surrounding him. He counted about twenty in total. Every one of them exuded power and strength. Although they'd be an easy opponent against Javier, Lloyd got the impression that they were stubborn as a mule apart from their actual strength.

Looks like folks in this neighborhood are hostile to humans too.

It looked like they were seconds away from hurling sharp arrows or spears into his heart if he slighted them or ignored their warning.

Well. That should be how they managed to protect their land for hundreds and thousands of years from human invasion.

Lloyd understood them very well and simultaneously found a way to break their stubbornness.

"What will you do?" Javier softly spoke beside him. He was standing in front of Lloyd as if he was preparing for a possible confrontation. Javier's voice was calm.

Lloyd grinned at him. “What do you mean? There’s no need for confrontation.”

Really. There was no need for unnecessary confrontation with the patrol team. He had no reason for it. There was a softer, healthier, and more effective way to sort this out.

“So, excuse me for a second, Javier.” Lloyd slipped in front of Javier.

Swish! Lloyd’s movement immediately brought the twenty spears to glint and aim at him. But Lloyd didn’t even bat an eye. Instead, he casually spoke up, recalling the story he read in the novel, and suggested a method that would win their hearts and access to their land in one go.

“Hello, my name is Lloyd Frontera. I heard that you are the fastest runners on land. I want to see if that’s actually true. Is there anyone here who is faster than me?”

“……!”

This suggestion took them by surprise. It was an explicit provocation and challenge. Everyone’s eyes immediately held a glint of instinct competitiveness. They were offended by the man’s daring challenge. They boasted that they were the reckless runners of the vast plain, the only ones who could so rapidly take off, halt, turn, and freely increase and decrease their speed and change sides. How dare a human challenge us, they thought.

“Fine. I will race you.” The patrol commander came out with ease. Pointing at the small rock and laughing at Lloyd, he said, “Start at the same time. The one who gets to the rock first wins.”

“Awesome.” Lloyd got on Ppodong’s back and stood at the start line with the patrol leader. At last, the signal came.

“Go!”

Gallop! Sprint! Sprint! The centaur and Ppodong raced as they created a dust storm all over the area. And about fifteen seconds later...

Slap! A red speeding ticket, which allowed access to the vast plain, was stuck on Lloyd’s back.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 290: Reckless Driving is Bad (1)

The Grassland of Wind and Stone was the central area of the Great Plain as it was the hometown of all the centaurs. There, residents witnessed a spectacular sight.

“I-It’s a red speeding ticket!” One of the young centaurs shouted. Everyone’s gaze immediately focused on one place. Then they saw.

“It really is. It’s really a red speeding ticket.”

“My goodness...”

“I never imagined I’d see one in my lifetime.”

“But it’s not on one of us but a human.”

“Maybe it’s fake?”

“No, that is not possible. Only the patrol commander protecting the outskirts of the Great Plain can issue that ticket.”

“Hold on,” one gasped. “Does that mean... that human galloped faster than the patrol commander?”

“What else could it mean?” A senile centaur replied.

Everyone gulped at it. And they took another glance at the human with a red ticket on his back. He wasn't ordinary outside. He was a human outsider. And now, he was confidently striding across the village center, flashing a red speeding ticket. The goggled-eyed centaurs gaped as they beheld the scene. Lloyd, who was receiving the awe-filled attention, smiled.

This feels like I’ve become a celebrity.

It really was the case. At first, the centaurs were astonished by the appearance of an outsider. Then their astonishment grew when they saw the red speeding ticket on his back. After some chaotic, confusing, and doubtful moments, they realized that the ticket was real and gazed at Lloyd with admiration. Their manner was similar to the fangirls of VTS when they bumped into their idol.

Of course, it wasn't easy to get this ticket.

Two days ago, Lloyd arrived at the entrance of the plane and was confronted by a patrol group. At that moment, he challenged them to a race by arguing that he was faster than them. The bold suggestion immediately brought the patrol leader to come forth. A drag race was held.

Seven seconds.

Seven seconds after they left the start line, Ppodong came in half a foot earlier than the patrol commander. Ppodong was equivalent to a vehicle with a V-8 5,000 cc natural engine, and the patrol commander burst with admiration toward Ppodong.

It looked like he was going to burst into tears right after he crossed the finish line.

Was it because he was indignant about his defeat? No. It was tears of overwhelming admiration, the kind only a speed-obsessive nut-job would show in the presence of a faster being. And thankfully, Lloyd was able to get a hold of a red speeding ticket.

"There is no insignia more glorious than this red speeding ticket. It was an honor to have galloped with you. May you have a safe and enjoyable stay here..."

And just like that, Lloyd acquired permission from the patrol commander. The speeding ticket was a pass that granted access to anywhere in the Centaurian territory. And the red ticket was the highest honor he could attain. It was quite literally a symbol of glory. This had much to do with the character of the centaurs.

They are wild horses racing through the plains.

And that was why they regarded galloping as the most crucial skill to have, and everyone yearned to be the fastest. Just like how South Korean society idolized one's money-making capacity, the Centaurian society valued the ability to run fast above anything else. The fastest individual was regarded as the most capable, and the slowest individual received pitiful tongue clicks from others. These horse-humans were obsessed with speed.

So, the ability to rapidly start running and stopping is just a basic skill they learn. And their quick turns and boundless control of speed are something they learn when they're young.

What would happen if the centaurs were born in South Korea? They'd overspeed nonstop and violently drive around, changing lanes without a signal until they eventually became an avid collector for speeding and traffic-light-violation tickets. Anyway, due to their propensity, Lloyd received a wide welcome from the five villages he passed through until he arrived at the territory of the Stone and Wind tribe.

I even met a tribal chief who pleaded with me to marry his daughter.

Lloyd had been shocked by the incident, only to be gobsmacked once again when the centaur lady wailed after seeing that Lloyd had two legs instead of four.

The heck with lookism!

Crack! Lloyd pushed his memories of the past two days away from his head. And he walked over to the centaurs who were gazing at him with respect and admiration.

"Um, I just have a question to ask," said Lloyd in a careful voice.

"Yes! Ask anything!"

"Me! Ask me!"

"Mister! I can answer you better!"

At Lloyd’s question, three centaurs, who were each young, female, and middle-aged, battled to answer him first. Lloyd suppressed his smile. “Oh, yes, thank you. But I’m not asking for just one answer. Anyone who can give me an answer is welcome to.”

“Understood! What do you want to know?”

“Me! I’ll answer it for you!”

“Ehem! I said I can answer you properly!”

“Ahaha...” laughed Lloyd awkwardly. “Yes, thank you. The thing is, I’m looking for this stone.”

Flap! Lloyd brought out a piece of paper from his pocket. It was a detailed illustration of the Taupo he had drawn on his way over here.

“The size is about 26, 19, and 3.9 feet, respectively, in width, length, and height. And there’s a unique bump as you can see here at the end. Have you seen a stone like this one around here?”

“Eek! No, I didn’t! I’m sorry!”

“Waa! I want to see it too! I want to say my answer, too!”

“Shucks! I’ll go find it right away! Just wait here!”

Despite everyone’s enthusiastic response, nothing satisfied Lloyd.

Tsk. I suppose it’s been too long since the Taupo was brought here.

Lloyd smacked his lips in bitterness. It was like this at the Mermaid Kingdom as well. No one barely remembered the whereabouts of the Jewel of Truth because too much time had passed.

And it’s not like I can survey the whole area.

Lloyd looked around. There was a seemingly endless stretch of land everywhere he looked. Just like the name of the plain, this land was too vast and expansive. And so, he felt even more stuck.

No. It's too early to tell. I should ask around some more.

Lloyd made the decision. He would continue to ask people around. He asked every centaur he met about the Taupo. And at last, thanks to his efforts, he was able to finally get the answer that interested him.

"Oh! I know what that is! Someone said that the tribal chief head knows all about the old stories!" a kid centaur hurriedly answered. And he pointed his foal horseshoe to the center of the tribe.

"The head of the tribal chief lives there! I will take you there!"

"Oh, sure. That's kind of you."

Lloyd then followed the child centaur. The house of the tribal chief head wasn't anything spectacular. It was like the rest of the centaurs. A typical tent stable. But his appearance was far from typical.

"Welcome, a human with a red speeding ticket. I have been following the stirs among the tribe members." His voice was grave and solemn. But his appearance was a complete contrast to the gravity and seriousness in his tone.

Damn.

Lloyd sucked in his breath as soon as he saw the head chief standing in front of him. Despite his senility, he was extremely muscular, his fur shaved up in a flashy manner. It made his skin look like a tattoo. No, to be more exact...

That's it. The car stickers that car aficionados stick all over their four wheels. Those kinds of decorations. There are even patterns with fire, lightning bolts, and eagles, tigers, or skeletons and hearts! The whole collection, I say.

Without any exaggeration, the head chief's body was a sketchbook of tattoos. From his lower horse torso to his upper human torso, tattoos covered his whole body, excluding his face and nape. And all the piercings in his ears, nose, and lips! The long hair that flowed down him like a hippie's made him give off a free-spirited vibe.

He even got his horseshoe modified. It's sharp and pointy. One kick from that, and I'm going to be diced like a pork cutlet.

In many ways, his appearance was extraordinary, befitting his status as the head chief of the speedy tribes. Thanks to that, Lloyd had to quickly manage his facial expression as he was greeted by the chief.

Hmm... Looks like he lived a wild life in his youth.

But it didn't matter if he was one of the gang members racing around back in his days. Lloyd had a business to take care of. Clearing his throat, Lloyd politely said, "I am honored to be in the presence of the owner of the tribe of the great plain."

"Haha. Not only do you possess such an incredible ticket, but you're also humble on top of it. It's nice to meet you. My name is Cherokan, the head chief that is leading the centaurs."

"Oh, yes."

Head Chief Cherokan welcomed him, and his manners were so open and hospitable without any hint of suspicion or trickery. Encouraged by the chief, Lloyd openly revealed the purpose of his visit.

"Chief," said Lloyd, "Thank you for welcoming me. The thing is, I am here to search for an item called the Taupo."

"Taupo?"

"Yes, it's an object your ancestors brought during the mythical age."

"Um, the mythical age? Are you looking for what was taken from the Jewel of Truth?"

“Oh, yes. That’s exactly it.” Feeling that things are going somewhere fast, Lloyd hopefully said, “Do you happen to know, chief, where the Taupo is at?”

“I do.” Chief Cherokan made a knowing smile.

“Then can you tell me where-”

“Nope.”

“Excuse me?”

“I know, but I cannot tell you.” The rejection was as straightforward as his big-hearted attitude.

Flailing his nostrils, Lloyd uttered, “Why... can’t you tell me?”

“Because I don’t want to.”

For a second, a sudden impulse to grab him by the neck or make him listen by force surged in Lloyd. He had to suppress his desire, however.

Is he playing with me or what? Should I force it out of him? No. Mobilizing Javier or Draggy will do the job, but I might regret it in the future.

Lloyd shook his head and looked back on his experience.

I have to find the key material for the Jewel of Truth. Knowing where it is might not be enough. What if I force things around here and antagonize the entire tribe? What if I can’t get cooperation from them when I need it? I might be in big trouble.

When he set out to find the Jewel of Truth and look for tauranga, the merpeople, and the queen were a massive source of help. Lloyd received a feeling that it might be the same this time.

So, let’s act with discretion. Life is longer than you think, and you never know what will happen. That’s why it’s important to have connections.

Just then, Lloyd recalled his days in room rental. He had no close family or other relatives around him. All of his parent's acquaintances and distant relatives cut him off the moment they learned about their drastic decision. No one offered to help. He had lost all his connections.

And because of their drastic absence, I was able to feel how important social connections are to humans. It's the same now. Once I build a good relationship with the head chief and centaur tribes, it's going to benefit me in some sort of way. Throwing away such a good opportunity isn't a smart choice.

And so, he decided to be on good terms with the chief. Approach things with utmost extra care. Resolved, Lloyd said, "Then, Chief Cherokan..."

"Speak."

"Is there anything you want from me?"

"Finally," blurted the chief, "You are talking. I surely got one. And if you give me what I want, then I should be able to resolve your curiosity."

As I thought, he was saying nothing is free.

It was the same in both the world of humans and centaurs. Meanwhile, Cherokan spoke. "I am hoping you could solve a worry of mine."

"What do you mean?"

"The youth of my race. The children. Their hot-blooded and reckless behavior is giving me a headache."

"Hot-blooded and reckless behavior?"

"Yes," Cherokan sighed softly. "You must be well aware of it. How much my race loves speed. How we worship speed. And so, we race even for marriage proposals. Only the fastest, male or female, can marry the desired partner."

"Um, so?"

“It’s a problem. The over competitiveness is causing too many accidents.

“Um, is it because they are speeding?”

“That’s exactly right. The violent race, things like overspeeding, changing lanes, hostile driving... All these put the lives of themselves and others in a risky situation. That’s why a large number of our youth are getting hurt and becoming disabled.”

“Then...”

“Why not stop them from violently racing each other, you ask?” interrupted Cherokan preemptively. “I can’t. It’s not something you can stop. Running is a part of our instinct. It’s not something to be stopped. That is why I am racking my head here, figuring out a way for the young centaurs to run freely and let their instincts run wild more safely than now.”

“Um, that’s what you were worried about?”

“Yes.” Cherokan nodded.

Lloyd nodded after hearing him. “That’s a simple concern.”

“What? Simple?”

“Yes.”

It really was a simple problem. Lloyd chuckled. The moment he heard his concern, Lloyd immediately came up with the answer he had in mind. “How about putting up a circuit-shaped coliseum for them to race?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 291: Reckless Driving is Bad (2)

“How about putting up a circuit-shaped coliseum for racing?”

“Excuse me?” Head Chief Cherokan cocked his head to the side at the smiling Lloyd. It was a strange and new suggestion. “Coliseum? A circuit for racing? What does that mean?”

“Simply put,” Lloyd explained, “It’s a stadium solely for speed racing.”

“A stadium? It’s a stadium meant to hold a race?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded, thinking that things were going somewhere. The chief was intrigued and expressed his curiosity just enough. Lloyd realized that he should strike when the iron was still hot. And so, he rattled on, “It’s a space reserved for running, and everyone can watch safely as it happens. The participants will be able to gallop without any interruption.”

“Hmm.” Cherokan mused. “A stadium… A space for anyone to run without restraint. Are you saying that is the solution to my problem?”

“Yes, chief.”

“What makes you say that? What’s your argument?” The chief frowned.

Adding another layer of shamelessness to his face, Lloyd said, “Chief, you’ve told me how worried you are about the young centaurs running recklessly around and getting into accidents, big and small, while racing one another to win someone’s hand in marriage.”

“I did.”

“Exactly,” Lloyd said intently. “You’ve also said that you’re sorry to see these accidents killing or disabling those youths who would otherwise have had a bright future ahead of them. So imagine what it would be like if the young centaurs could freely gallop to their heart’s content in a stadium specially designed for running?”

“Hmm, you mean that there would be fewer accidents since they’d only gallop at full speed in a safe, designated area?”

“That’s right, chief.”

Despite Lloyd’s confidence, Cherokan looked hardly convinced. “But you seem to be forgetting something, my friend.”

“What is it, chief?” asked Lloyd.

“As you already know, we’ve lived our whole lives running wherever our hearts desired. Do you truly believe that we would be willing to only race inside a stadium? That won’t happen. Even with a stadium, we will still choose a random location to hold competitions, challenge each other, and race to determine who is faster. It’s just not in our blood to let someone run ahead of us.”

“Yes, I am aware of that, chief,” Lloyd replied. “That’s where the rules come in.”

“Rules?”

“Yes.”

“What rules?” The chief’s eyes sharpened.

Lloyd spoke as if the answer was obvious. “We will set a speed limit in certain locations.”

“Set a speed limit?”

“Yes. It’s simple. We’ll state that they can only trot in village areas, but the meadows are a free racing zone. That would be all the limits they need to comply with.”

“But that’s problematic,” Cherokan insisted.

“Why is that?”

“If meadows have no speed limits, then that renders the stadium unnecessary.”

“You’re right, but that can be solved with one extra regulation.”

“Which is?”

“To designate the coliseum as the only venue for holding marriage-related races.”

“So courtship competitions can only happen there...?”

“That is exactly it.” Lloyd could sense that the chief was starting to come around. It was now time for Lloyd to bring up the crux of the matter. “The most dangerous races are those for someone’s hand in marriage. Was that not the case with you, chief?”

“Hmm... Come to think of it, yes. I think so. It applied to my own proposal. I remember my competitiveness peaked at that age. It was so powerful that it was blinding. I successfully proposed after giving my all to win the race.”

“I figured. That’s also why it’s dangerous.” Lloyd pointed out.

That’s the way it is. It’s the same whether you’re a centaur or human.

A competition for someone’s hand in marriage. Such a race would naturally be fiercer than usual. That was easily understandable if you compared it to bar fights.

I’ve often seen similar instances in my country. Whenever guys start arguing with other guys at another table, all of them surprisingly play nice and try to move on because they don’t want to get into an unnecessary fight. Well, unless you’re a sadist who enjoys violence. However, there are exceptions.

It was when the guys were with girls.

The chances of a simple scuffle developing into something big were significantly higher.

In those situations, men suddenly loved to act tough and masculine before their love interests as they didn't want to appear weak. They yielded less and regarded backing off as defeat, and would ultimately spoil the atmosphere of the bar with their heightened stubbornness and aggression.

It's super childish and ridiculous. But it can't be helped even if they'll obviously regret their behavior in the future.

It occurred surprisingly frequently. At least based on Lloyd's observation.

A real man should maintain reason and deal with the situation tactfully. But that's easier said than done. The centaurs are quite similar. Even the novel mentions that these creatures become the most aggressive during marriage-related matters.

Lloyd recalled the story in the novel. It was a short explanation of the centaurs and how their innate love for speed and racing dramatically spiked when there was a potential marriage at stake. The only thing in their sight was victory and marrying their desired partner. It wasn't uncommon for them to risk their lives.

If you think about it, it actually makes sense. I'd do the same. If I've got a competitor for the girl I want to marry, I'd obviously run like a madman. I wouldn't care what's ahead of me. I'd just run to cross the finish line first without a second thought.

Come hell or high water, the finish line would be the only thing in sight, and he would become blind to his surroundings, endangering himself and others around him.

"So," Lloyd went on, "We'll create a space exclusively for that reckless race for love. We'll build a circuit-style coliseum."

"Do you think that will reduce the number of accidents?"

"I believe it will. After all, the centaurs running at full speed will be separated from the other runners."

It was the same case in a modern society like South Korea. There was a reason why highways existed apart from other roads.

There's a notable example of this in Germany. The Autobahn. The road meant for drivers to speed on.

There were also similar places in South Korea. For instance, there was a circuit located in Inje County of the Gangwon Province.

The furrow between the head chief's eyebrows deepened. Could it be that the chief somewhat understood Lloyd's intention?

"I see what you mean. In short, you want to designate certain areas for different purposes. That's why you're suggesting this coliseum."

"Yes, chief. Inside the village, everyone will have to trot slowly. In the meadow, they can canter or gallop. And only at the coliseum can they recklessly race over love."

Cherokan nodded in understanding. "Good. I believe the number of tragic accidents will decrease if everyone follows these regulations."

"It certainly looks like it."

"Indeed. But... I am doubtful that my centaurs will follow your suggestions." Chief Cherokan's eyes faltered as they fixed on Lloyd. "As excellent as your ideas are, I can't help but think they're unrealistic. The question is whether these instinctive runners would willfully confine themselves and obey all the stifling rules. I personally do not think so."

"You mean they'll choose their right to freely gallop over their own safety."

"Yes." Chief Cherokan nodded. "The desire to gallop and race each other may be something humans will never be able to grasp fully. But that's who we are. We'd rather die than be forbidden to run."

"Hmm." Lloyd stroked his chin.

“So, you can expect no young centaur to ever follow your rules if you designate a no-gallop zone and restrict areas for courtship races. They will ignore or protest with a scoff. That’s how intense their running instinct is.”

“Hmm...”

“Moreover,” Chief Cherokan went on, “This is about tradition. Starting from our earliest ancestors, we’ve lived freely around the land. That’s our traditional way of life. And your recommendations suggest changing that precedent.”

“Hmm...”

“And that is why, even if I like your suggestion, I’m not confident they will take up on it. Everyone will oppose it. There’s no reason for them to follow the rules.”

“Hmmmm...”

“My friend, why are you looking at me strangely?” asked Chief Cherokan.

“Oh, yes,” replied Lloyd. “It’s because I feel like I’m looking at a motorcycle gang that is desperately giving excuses to defend themselves.”

“A motorcycle gang?”

“Yes. Well. Something like that.” A chuckle escaped Lloyd. He couldn’t help it.

It’s like he’s telling me that they can’t help being carefree souls, and it’s not any of my business whether they live or die while running.

That was the impression Lloyd got after hearing Chief Cherokan’s explanation of the nature of centaurs.

Well. A speeding ticket being their glorious symbol already says a lot about them.

Of course, Lloyd couldn’t care less about whether these chronic speeders got killed or injured from recklessly racing. That would have been his normal reaction. But not now.

Chief said he’d tell me where Taupo was if I helped him develop a solution for safety. So I’ve got to create one for them.

Lloyd decided. He would help them improve safety. So he began to rack his brain, going over a list of possible things he could do and how they might be received. Once Lloyd finished doing the math in his head, he looked straight into the chief’s eyes. “How about this, chief? If you’re not confident you could persuade them, then I’ll do it for you.”

“You? You’ll persuade them?”

“Yes.”

“How?”

“You do not need to worry about that. I’ll just ask you one thing. If I get the centaurs to comply with the regulations and build the coliseum, can you promise me you’ll tell me where the Taupo is?”

That was the moment for him to push back. Lloyd’s voice swelled with confidence. Thankfully, it didn’t take a long time until the chief spoke.

“Fine... I promise, if you can persuade everyone to follow the planned regulations.”

“Very well,” Lloyd said. “Let’s take care of this then.”

Flap! Lloyd pulled out a piece of paper from his pocket once the chief nodded. Like a spider detecting food on its web or a python spotting its meal for the day, Lloyd held out a piece of paper without giving any time for Cherokan to react.

“This paper details the promises you’ve just made, chief. So why don’t we draw up two contracts? One for me and another for you.”

“Contracts...?”

“Yes.” Lloyd beamed and spoke nonchalantly. “It’s always better to handle these matters with as much clarity as possible. Oh, don’t get me wrong. I’m not doing this because I can’t trust you, chief. It’s the opposite. What if I go back on my words? These pieces of paper will help us establish healthy and mutual trust.”

“...”

Gulp. Chief Cherokan wondered for a second whether he was in the presence of a scammer. He had spent his whole life living a simple life in the meadows and couldn’t help having such a suspicion. Despite his anxiety, they soon signed and finalized the contract at the speed of light.

“Okay, please write your name here. The date. Your signature. All right. Just stamp right over here.”

“...”

“Oh my, look at that. That was a perfectly placed stamp,” praised Lloyd. “As I thought, you can really assess someone’s disposition by seeing how they sign a contract. I can tell you’re a considerate, meticulous, and cheerful centaur from this. And you’re obviously popular among centaurs, both male and female, because of your thoughtfulness.”

“I-Is that so?” muttered Chief Cherokan.

“Yes. I’m not trying to blow my own trumpet, but I’m a very good judge of character.”

“Ehem! Ehem! Come to think of it, you’re right. Hahaha.”

“Right? I’ve read you correctly, chief.”

“Hahaha! Thank you!”

“Well then, I shall be going now. I’ll come back once I persuade your tribe members.”

Lloyd smiled as he rose up. The contract was signed. It was over. Lloyd bolted out of the place before the nice mood he worked so hard to create turned sour. When he walked out of the stable, he was greeted by Javier who had been waiting nearby.

“Are you done talking to him?” asked Javier.

“Yeah. You heard most of the conversation, right?

“Yes.” Javier nodded as he walked beside Lloyd. “But that is why I am more confused. I cannot understand why you would build a coliseum for them and make the tribe follow the safety regulations.”

“Why? Is it strange?”

“Yes.”

“In what way?”

“As far as I am concerned, I do not think anyone will obey it.”

“Yes, you’re probably right.” Lloyd didn’t hesitate to confirm Javier’s opinion.

Lloyd felt the stinging gaze from Javier. Javier finally asked, “I am probably right? You speak as though you already have an idea what will happen.”

“Yeah,” acknowledged Lloyd. “I do.”

He really did. Lloyd was already aware of how the centaurs would react even before he suggested the coliseum project and safety regulations to the chief.

“Then I suppose you have a secret plan in mind?” asked Javier.

“Uh-huh.”

“May I ask what that is?”

“Yeah. Sure. I’m going to run a safe racing campaign and provoke the entire tribe.”

“Provoke the entire tribe, Young Master?” Javier tilted his head in confusion.

“It means I plan to piss everyone off,” Lloyd said cheerfully.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 292: Reckless Driving is Bad (3)

Four days passed. All the while, a strange rumor went around among the centaurs in the Stone and Wind tribe.

“Honey, did you hear about that human?” a centaur wife asked her husband.

“Human? Who?”

“The one who arrived here a few days ago.”

“Oh, the man with the red speeding ticket?” asked the male centaur. “What was his name? Lloyd Frontera?”

“Yes, that’s right,” she affirmed. “Lloyd Frontera. He told me he’s going to give a lecture.”

“A lecture?”

“Uh-huh.”

“About what?”

“I think it’s an in-depth lecture about speeding or whatever.”

“Are you serious?” He lifted his brow.

“Yes. Honey, you were getting anxious that your hind leg isn’t as strong as it used to be.”

“Hmm, yes,” he acknowledged. “I fear my stamina isn’t as great as before.”

“So…” she said as she clapped her hands. “How about you go and listen to the lecture?”

“Do you think it will help?”

“Of course. You have nothing to lose by attending. While you’re at it, take the kids with you.”

“Why?”

“You should know how important early education is these days,” she said strongly.

“Hm, you know what? You are right,” he agreed. “The man earned a red speeding ticket as a mere human. He must know the secret to getting faster, right?”

“I’m sure he does. I hope our kids become great foals that get red speeding tickets.”

“Of course,” he said. “You are wise, indeed.”

At the same time…

“Boss! We have a situation!” A young centaur charged into a stable.

“What? What is it?” His boss asked in surprise.

“Well, do you remember the human who got a red speeding ticket? He’s giving a lecture.”

“On what?”

“They say it’s going to be about something called speeding!” The young one’s voice sounded frantic.

“Ha...” the boss centaur sighed. “Are you sure?”

“Yes.”

“That’s a big problem.”

“Isn’t it? I’m afraid his galloping method will be similar to ours, and he will teach it to others.”

“I agree. That tactic should remain a secret amongst ourselves.”

“Should we apply for a patent?” asked the young one carefully.

“Hmm... When’s the lecture?”

“The day after tomorrow.”

“Tsk. It’ll be too late by then. We won’t have enough time to get a review,” said the boss.

“Then what do we do?”

“Let’s go to the lecture. We should listen to what that human has to say about this speeding matter.”

“Yes, boss. Do you want us to put our names on the attendance list?”

“Yes, put everyone down.”

“I must have heard wrong. All of the members?” The young centaur was surprised by his boss’s eagerness.

“Of course. The galloping members and the maintenance team as well. Even if his theory is different from ours, I’m sure we can glean one or two lessons from him.”

“Yes, I see, boss.”

A similar conversation also took place among the younger centaurs. The rumor didn’t stop there. It spread further outside of the Stone and Wind tribe and across the plain.

“Chief! The human who received a red speeding ticket from the Stone and Wind tribe is giving a lecture!”

“This is our chance. The human’s theory of speeding must be different from ours, so we’ll no doubt learn something new from him!”

“Let us go!”

“Faster now!”

“Quickly now!”

“Nothing can stop us!”

A total of 21 centaur tribes, including the Rock Wild Grass, Deer Cloud, Mushroom and Creek, and Dew and Stake tribes, all spread across the various parts of the plain, flocked to the news of Lloyd’s lecture. The crowd of centaurs was as thick as the clouds in the sky, and everyone came regardless of their age or gender. There were couples with kids, eldery who claimed to be as healthy as a horse, and foal centaurs who wished to become a champion of reckless racing in the future. Within a few days, the Stone and Wind village was packed with centaurs who came to listen to Lloyd’s lecture.

The following morning rolled around. At last, the lecture titled “What is Speeding?” started.

“Ehem, thank you all for gathering. My name is Lloyd Frontera.”

Lloyd greeted the group of over a thousand centaurs gathered at the meadow near the Stone and Wind village. He slightly shifted to show his back as he spoke with a booming voice charged with mana. His red speeding ticket was proudly stuck behind him. Soft exclamations of admiration spilled among the centaurs.

“It’s real... It’s really the red speeding ticket.”

“It’s glorious to see it with my own eyes.”

“Mother, I’ve never seen anything like that.”

“Make sure to get a good look, sweetie. Promise me you’ll grow up to become a great adult who earns hundreds of those tickets, got it?”

Whisper! Clamor! The awe-filled murmuring filled the area, and the gazes fixed on Lloyd were full of admiration. Lloyd remained silent for a second until the noise subsided.

When everyone seemed to have calmed down, he spoke again. “Yes, nice to meet you. I am the human who received a red speeding ticket. I am sure you have come here because you are curious about the secret behind my running ability. That is right! What do I mean by speeding? From now on, I would like to have a meaningful time with you by having an in-depth discussion about what speeding is. Shall we begin with a round of applause?”

Clap! Clap! Clap! Lloyd was natural on the stage with the centaurs. A smile of contentment appeared on his mouth.

“Yes, clapping makes you feel good, doesn’t it? That’s how important blood circulation is. Now, allow me to start the actual lecture. What is speeding? I am sure that this is a question all of you constantly ask yourself every day without fail. Am I correct?”

Nod! Everyone nodded. It was true. What was speeding? How could they gallop faster? What should they do to race faster than their competitors? Those concerns were on their brain every second of the day. It was something that stayed on their mind for the rest of their lives. Lloyd prepared his lecture being well aware of this fact. With a big, broad smile on his face, he resumed speaking.

“To tell you the conclusion first... Speeding is the most foolish thing you could ever do.”

Everyone’s eyes widened in surprise. Their eyes said, “What are you talking about?!” But Lloyd didn’t stop there and relentlessly continued his lecture.

“Running faster? Sure, it’s good. Refreshing. Exhilarating even. But look. Think about it. Galloping anywhere you please and bragging about your speed... Don’t you think it’s a bit immature and childish?”

“...”

“In the past few days,” Lloyd went on, ignoring their shocked silence. “I’ve seen how many of you behave during my stay here. A lot of you race at full speed, even inside the village. Very recklessly. You all thoughtlessly charge forward regardless of whether you are at a crossroad between stables, an alley between tents, or a play area for young foals. I did witness countless accidents, both big and small. There were also several times an accident almost happened.”

“...”

“Will that do?” Lloyd’s voice was now accusatory. “So what if you can run fast? Your raging speed brings nothing but trouble. It just hurts innocent centaurs and yourselves as well. Do you know what we call someone like that in the human world? A nuisance.”

No one said anything. But the silence was rather cold, and so were the gazes fixed on Lloyd. They were colder than Lloyd expected. A bitter smile appeared on his face as he recalled his days in South Korea.

Korea has more reckless drivers than you’d expect too.

There were quite a lot, actually. It was common for drivers to move forward without stopping at an intersection, even when the pedestrian light turned green. Some even squeezed through crossing pedestrians. On roads without traffic lights, it was common for cars to ignore pedestrians who were on the crosswalk first. Only a handful of cars stopped for people to pass by.

Not only that, a lot of drivers park in no parking zones or near the fire hydrants or pedestrians. It’s more uncommon for people to speed than to not. They only slow down when there are cameras around and hit the gas as soon as they’re cleared. I was guilty of that, too.

Before joining the military and his family went bankrupt, there was a time Lloyd drove his father’s car to Busan after getting his driver’s license. That was when he learned that the 60 mph speed limit on the highways was only for show around cameras. Everyone drove over 70, 80, 90 mph when there was nothing watching them. It was the same even inside cities.

The speed limit of 30 mph was ignored by everyone. But even then, that's on the mild side of things. Most people aren't truly reckless drivers and just go slightly above the speed limit. But some... Ha.

The thought alone prompted Lloyd to sigh. He occasionally encountered a reckless driver. There were some who risked their lives to tailgate him on the road at full speed. Others speedily tailed the car ahead to cross an intersection before the light turned red. There were drivers who even went on a transcontinental journey from one end of the road to the other by incessantly switching lanes. At times, there were people who also threw cigarette butts out their windows. In other instances, there were drivers who honked and turned on their high beams just because the car in the front was moving a little slow.

Those instances were blatant examples of reckless driving.

The problem was that these violations weren't rare. They happened quite often. This reality was shocking. Lloyd couldn't help but wonder what those drivers were thinking inside their car. And Lloyd held the same sentiments now.

The centaurs are similar. They just aren't aware of their recklessness because that's the norm for them. Reckless galloping is a part of their culture. They just can't accept the notion that different areas need to have different speed limits.

Their sole focus was galloping at an outrageous speed. Safety and whatnot were not even a consideration. Lloyd figured that he had to change that. And so, Lloyd started to openly provoke the centaurs.

"If one has common sense and reason and knows how to be considerate of those around them, one would know where it is appropriate to race and where it is now. No one deuces anywhere they please. The same goes for galloping. One must be able to distinguish where to run at full speed and where to restrain themselves. Do you know what we call those who are incapable of doing so?"

"..."

No one gave an answer. Amid the even more frigid silence, Lloyd spoke, his voice ringing clearer.

“Airheads.” Lloyd’s voice slightly turned up to emphasize the word. “That’s the word. Unfortunately, that description fits a lot of your behaviors. You recklessly ran even when there were children around. You galloped across intersections, being inconsiderate of others, and only regretted it once you collided with someone and fell to the ground. What is that? Certainly not the proper way to gallop.”

“Then how do you want us to gallop, two-legged smartass?”

At last, a voice of opposition erupted from the crowd. It belonged to a young centaur who stood out from the rest. He was about 1.2 times bigger than the rest, and his hooves were thick and robust. His muscles moved as if they had been sculpted by an artist. The white, silky fur that covered his whole body was a remarkable sight to behold. Even his face was good-looking.

“Yes,” Lloyd acknowledged him. “Your name is?”

“Komanchi. Three-time champion of this plain.” Komanchi’s voice sounded intimidating and confident.

“A champion? Are you the fastest centaur here?”

“Yes. In addition, I am the future head chief who will lead all the centaurs on this land one day.”

Komanchi then turned his back toward Lloyd. Five red speeding tickets were plastered on his back. He said, “I suppose that is enough of an introduction about me. Anyway, I would like to ask you as you seem to be on the high horse. How does the best galloper with intelligence and thoughtfulness run? I would like to pick your smarty brain on that.”

“I see. That’s a good question. The answer is simple. It is to only race inside designated areas without causing harm to others.” Lloyd held up his hands, palm facing up toward the sky.

“Are you saying that we must limit our right to freely gallop?” Komanchi demanded.

“That is not a right but an act of disturbance.”

“It’s our tradition!” Komanchi protested.

“And a bad one.”

Feeling ever more frustrated, Komanchi growled, “Can you prove that arrogant statement of yours?”

“How do you want me to prove that I am right and take responsibility for my statement?” Lloyd’s voice, on the other hand, was calm.

“Race with me!” Komanchi, all worked up now, thwacked his chest several times. And he bawled, almost declaring, “I don’t think you have any idea about us since you’re a human, but we don’t listen to slowpokes. So prove that you’re faster than us!”

“Hmm, but I already received a red speeding ticket though.” Lloyd pointed to his back.

“That was the work of your hamster, not yours!” Komanchi thrust his finger in the air at Lloyd. “I’ve heard from my cousin, the patrol commander. You did the race while riding a hamster! So I cannot accept that. It’s pathetic. Use your own legs and run with the wind to prove you are a fast runner!”

“You’re saying that you’ll acknowledge my words if I race with you alone and win. Am I correct?”

“That’s right!”

“Mister Komanchi. Are you challenging me now?”

“What else do you think I’m doing?!” screamed Komanchi as he thought to himself that there was simply zero chance for him to lose in the race against the scrawny two-legged slug. Smiling confidently, he was determined to humble this conceited human in front of everyone.

Lloyd, too, flashed a big smile.

That human fell right into my trap! Komanchi thought proudly to himself.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 293: Don’t Look Down on a Human (1)

It was a universally accepted fact and truth that no human, regardless of their abilities or status as a sword master, could outrun centaurs, the natural speeders and supreme cavalries of the plain.

“Are you confident that you will win?”

“Yeah. Of course.” When Javier asked with a worried expression on his face, Lloyd nodded and replied in a nonchalant voice, “That’s why I accepted his challenge. You think I’d have done it otherwise?”

Lloyd stole a glance around the corner of the plain in a section of the Stone and Wind tribe. An impressive number of centaurs were gathered in the distance, murmuring among themselves as they prepared to watch the race that was spontaneously scheduled a moment ago.

Lest the others heard him, Lloyd lowered his voice. “You think I will lose?”

“I do.”

“Wow. You didn’t even think about your answer.”

“It is an obvious and unequivocally true prediction.”

“For me to lose this race?”

“Yes. You are going up against a centaur. Not just anyone at that, but the three-time champion of the Great Plain.” Javier spoke in an unwavering voice. The knight was convinced. “Master Lloyd, I understand that you are on the verge of becoming a high-level sword expert. That will enable you to sprint significantly faster than an ordinary person. And since you are equipped with three mana circles, there will be no human who can outrun you unless they are a sword master.”

“I like where you are going,” said Lloyd. “Continue.”

“Yes, and there’s a reason why I am telling you this. As far as I am concerned, I believe that the champion centaur is able to run faster than a sword master.”

“So I am bound to lose without question?”

“Indeed.”

“How about you?”

“As for myself,” Javier replied, “I am likely faster than this centaur.”

“Woah!” Lloyd remarked heartily. “You’re just bragging about yourself.”

“Is that how you see this conversation?” Javier frowned.

“Yup.”

Javier stared hard at Lloyd.

“What? What? What is it?” Lloyd opened his eyes wider.

“You will certainly lose. I suggest you tell them that you changed your mind.”

“Not happening.” Lloyd shook his head.

“Then do you have a plan?”

“Obviously. I have one. I told you that a while ago. You weren’t listening to me.”

“Well… What is it?”

“If you’re curious, just watch. Shh. He’s coming over here.”

Komanchi, the champion centaur, was approaching Lloyd. The muscles on the horse half of his body bulged as if to signal he was already prepared for the race. Throwing a defiant glance at Lloyd, Komanchi asked, “How are you? Ready for our race?”

“You bet. I am ready.”

“Then I assume you’ve decided on where to set the finish line, the place where you will cry tears of defeat.”

“I did choose the place where I will throw my victory ceremony,” parried Lloyd.

“Where is the finish line?” Komanchi stared at Lloyd, his gaze burning more intensely. Actually, he didn’t like Lloyd from the get-go, ever since he stepped foot in this village.

Hmph! He didn’t earn the speeding ticket with his own legs!

Komanchi heard about the race from his patrol commander, his cousin, who said that Lloyd rode an extremely fast and giant hamster during his race. This pissed Komanchi off.

That’s not fair!

Real men ran with their own legs. That was the true meaning of racing. The only permissible one. Humans loved to talk about how fast they were while being carried on the back of something, but Komanchi didn’t have an iota of intent to acknowledge it as a form of racing. That was why he had come to the lecture and not because he was curious about the content of it. No, not at all.

I came to challenge him to a race!

Komanchi’s plan was to prove before everyone else that the red speeding ticket seen on the human was nothing but a pretentious lie. In particular, he felt a strong desire to humiliate this human. It was his duty as the champion, he believed. And it was also a fitting punishment for the shameful human race that was incapable of sprinting with their own legs.

“So tell me now where the finish line will be. The one challenged to a race has the right to decide where it will take place.”

“Hmm,” observed Lloyd. “I get to choose wherever I want?”

“Certainly. That is our tradition.”

Komanchi lifted his jaw insolently. Since he was the one who threw down the gauntlet, it was only right for Lloyd to choose the racing track. Still, Komanchi couldn’t be any less worried.

I am faster! That is the truth! Wherever he chooses, I will cross the finish line first!

Komanchi was absolutely certain. He couldn’t imagine anything close to defeat. Whatever the course was, wherever the finish line stood, none of them mattered to Komanchi. But a second later, when he finally learned of the finish line, he wasn’t sure if he heard it right.

“Very well,” Lloyd said, “The race will end at the front yard of the border guard commander’s manor, which sits at the southern border of this plain.”

“What...?”

“Let’s run to the front of the manor belonging to the commander who guards the northern border of the Magentano kingdom,” elaborated Lloyd patiently.

Seeing that Komanchi wasn’t saying anything, he added, “Did you not hear me?”

“No,” said Komanchi finally, “I, I did. But...”

“But what?”

“That’s at least 370 miles away from here!”

“I know. So?”

“You want to race all the way there?”

“Yeah.”

“Are you out of your mind?!” shrieked Komanchi.

“No. Is anything wrong?” asked Lloyd.

Komanchi almost yelled out, Of course, there’s something wrong! This is terribly and immensely wrong!

All I wanted was a race. Why is this nut job challenging me to journey across the entire land?

For some reason, Komanchi felt cheated and wanted to protest. But all his dumbstruck mouth could utter was a broken stutter.

Lloyd, flashing a cunning smile on his face, asked, “Do you feel cheated?”

Of course, he did! But Komanchi wasn’t spared the chance to shout his thoughts as Lloyd interrupted him.

“Don’t be so wrapped up in it. Remember. You were the one who told me to decide on the finish line.”

Komanchi gaped silently.

“Besides,” Lloyd went on, “You told me that I have the right to decide since I was the one who was challenged.”

“Yes, that’s right, but—”

“All I am doing is dutifully obeying the beautiful and sacred tradition of the centaurs.”

Komanchi had no comebacks. But he was overcome with a strong desire to throw a hind-leg kick at Lloyd’s smug face. Even though he wanted to protest, Komanchi couldn’t. After all, what the human said was right.

It’s true. He’s following our tradition.

The procedure for a race went like this: The one who took up the gauntlet was given the right to determine the location of the race track and the finish line. The one who threw down the gauntlet had no right to refuse. That was their tradition and sacred rule. These customs and mannerisms dictated the challenger to acquiesce to the terms of a race without complaint.

Come to think of it, he did the same thing when he went up against my cousin.

Just then, Komanchi recalled what his cousin had told him about the race against that human, who challenged him to a race. His cousin, accepting the game, suggested racing to a rock far away from them and gave Lloyd a red speeding ticket after losing.

I was deceived... Who on earth is this man?

Feeling terrified and scared, Komanchi stared at Lloyd, who was still beaming with a happy smile.

It’s as if a thousand serpents live inside his head!

That was it. This human was a schemer with thousands of trickery and chicaneries up his sleeves, only that he never showed it. What was more, he was the type who made sure to play only within the rules!

Tsk... What a deceitful man.

Grit! Komanchi clenched his teeth, realizing he had been completely fooled. But he didn’t allow himself to be flustered. There was something that remained unchanged despite all of the man’s cheeky tactics.

The result of this race will be the same! The ending where I trot out victorious!

This human could resort to using cunning tricks. But he was still hundreds of times faster. He had the upper hand. Thinking so, Komanchi was able to restore his composure.

Finally regaining composure, Komanchi lifted his chin high. “Good. I will accept your decision.”

“Of course, you do,” commented Lloyd. “Okay, so the finish line will be at the front yard of the guard commander’s manor, which sits at the southern border of the plain.”

“...”

Komanchi shook his head roughly, fighting the desire to hurl out an insult. Then he shot a burning glare at Lloyd. “You cannot ride anything until you reach the finish line. And, of course, there are no breaks allowed. We are gallopers and don’t rest until we cross the finish line. So, you are expected to do the same.”

“I expect nothing less,” said Lloyd.

“Moreover, the news of this race will spread across the entire plain. The entire plain will see us race as we pass by each of the villages. So, mark my words.” Komanchi paused before giving a grave warning. “No cheating will be permitted. Hundreds, no, thousands of centaurs will have their eyes on us!”

“Oh, sure. I am aware of that.”

“Then, let us begin.”

“Be my guest.” Lloyd shrugged and stood at the starting line. And he waited for the go sign. And at last...

“Race!”

Boooom! As soon as the go signal was made, Komanchi flung his body forward with force so mighty that he shook the ground. His giant muscles fiercely bulged as his body shot forward.

Gallop! Thwack! Komanchi dashed at lightning speed as he produced a large sandstorm. The ground shook each time his hooves touched the ground. Within five seconds, he was going over 62 mph, a speed befitting his status as a three-time champion of the plain. Lloyd, however...

“Hmph! Hmph! Hmph! Hmph!”

His pace was no different than normal and too relaxed. The ground didn’t shake, or he didn’t charge like a storm. His start was more relaxed and carefree than the race against the patrol commander. The onlooking centaurs frowned as they looked at him and thought...

What’s this pathetic takeoff?

Is that what he considers running?

Is he the same guy who received the red speeding ticket?

Even a newborn foal would be faster than him!

They were gutted. His running was horrendous. The slow stretch of his legs was surely unbecoming of a red-ticketed speedster. The observing centaurs’ eyes held a glint of disappointment.

It looks like the race is over already.

It’s going to be years before he gets to the finish line.

Tsk, tsk, tsk. Poor Komanchi. He has to race all the way to the border of the human kingdom against this pathetic slowpoke. What a drudgery.

That two-legged man isn’t worth racing. He’s helpless.

Everyone shook their heads as they eyed Lloyd with pity. Except for one spectator. Javier.

Fake Master Lloyd. Did you really have to do this to win?

Javier was running as well but keeping a safe distance from Lloyd. He rooted for Lloyd as he jogged, thinking that Lloyd would end up as the winner of this race and the mocking centaurs would be shell-shocked in a few days from now.

Though they'll never be able to foresee it by the looks of the race.

Javier had a hunch and became certain of it. Just like that, he wordlessly followed Lloyd. On the other hand, a large number of centaurs who watched the race at the starting line turned back with the conviction that Komanchi would reach the finish line first as the human was running terribly slow. There was no doubt about it, they believed. Not even bothering to follow the two, everyone gave no more attention to the race and decided to just hear the story from Komanchi once he came back as the winner. Everyone clicked their tongues and scoffed at themselves for being so foolish to have once looked up to the human just because he had a red speeding ticket.

As such, it was beyond their wildest dreams when something happened four days later, something shocking enough to cause the centaurs to tap their foreheads with their hooves.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 294: Don’t Look Down on a Human (2)

Running was an act that every creature relied on to quickly arrive at their desired location. The world teemed with creatures faster than humans, with the exception of some animals such as pandas or sloths. It was rather a difficult job to find those that were slower than humans. And yet, despite their distinctive lack of speed, they were exceptional when it came to running a long distance for a long period of time. Yes, humans were evolved for long-distance running.

“Hmph! Hoo, hoo! Hmph! Hmph! Hoo!”

Lloyd ran southward. He ran endlessly for several hours since he left the starting line. His running speed was extremely fast compared to an average human but shamefully slow compared to centaurs. He was a snail compared to Komanchi, his competitor. But Lloyd didn’t stop. He kept moving his two legs, slow and steady, without giving up. He was certain that this was the surefire way to win.

Yes, this is the greatness of mankind!

Lloyd thought as he adjusted his pace.

This is the advantage humans have. We have the ability to run for a long time. There is no other creature that even comes close to this skill of ours.

It was really the case. With short-distance running, humans fell behind almost all of the other creatures since they only had two legs and were in an upright position that received a lot of wind resistance. Their running speed was clearly limited by their physical characteristics. But long-distance running was a whole different story.

It’s because of our sweat!

Lloyd wiped the sweat off his face. The cool breeze of the highland cooled the drops of sweat on him. In return, this process cooled the heat accumulated in his body from running. His body temperature didn’t rise beyond a certain point, so Lloyd was able to run without stopping.

Additionally, humans are great at conserving their strength!

Having only two legs for propulsion meant less energy consumption. There were only a few muscles used for running, so this allowed for efficient energy management.

“Hmph! Hoo, hoo! Hmph! Hmph! Hoo!”

Thankfully, Lloyd was able to keep running without any breaks, much like some indigenous people or ancient humans such as the homo erectus species who ran hundreds of miles to hunt deer or wild boars. Just like that, Lloyd doggedly worked his two legs to keep charging forward, putting every bodily human feature to best use. Lloyd’s past experiences also became a source of help.

Hoo! Hoo! I am! Actually! Good at long-distance running!

Lloyd recalled the days when he received special swordsmanship training from Javier. The first exercise they did was running. On top of that, physical labor was something he was acutely familiar with as he had to frequent construction sites to make ends meet. There was even an instance when he climbed four flights of stairs carrying bricks on his back.

Compared to that, this is a walk in the park! Hoo! Hoo! A stroll!

Not only that, he had useful skills with him.

Ziiing! The three-stranded mana circle rotated violently with the beating of his heart. During his run, he absorbed a small volume of mana hanging in the air and rotated as well as amplified it. The amplified mana was then shoved into his manaheart, which then worked to distribute top-tier mana back to his muscles.

The mana distribution vitalized his whole body like he drank a refreshing cup of cold water provided by a farmer in the Alps. There were many elements that allowed Lloyd to become a tireless running machine, including his long-distance running abilities as a human, rich experience with physical labor, running skills taught by Javier, and a combination of mana circle and manaheart. Though he wasn't extraordinarily fast, he was an unstoppable, zealous turtle of the Great Plain. As for Komanchi, who was far ahead of Lloyd, he was doing good. At least, that was true in the beginning.

"Ha! Haaa!"

Gallop! Gallop! Gallop! A dust storm exploded under his hooves, and he charged forward like an enraged tornado. He was a wild horse, both literally and figuratively. His aggressive galloping directly contrasted Lloyd's leisurely jog.

Of course! A human can't be faster than me!

From the moment his hooves left the starting line, after three trots, Komanchi distanced himself from his pathetic human competitor. The distance between them only grew afterward. Within five gallops, the human was nothing but a bean-sized figure. At seven, he was a tiny point. At 20, he was invisible. A speck of dust. As Lloyd vanished in his vision, the happier he became.

This is what we call a race! Hmph!

It was refreshing. The touch of the wind. The lively sensation surged in him as he charged across the plain. And the gutted look on his fading opponent.

Komanchi believed he had trounced his opponent. At least on the first day. But only on the first day.

"Ha! Whew! Whew! Haa!"

Gallop! Gallop! One day later, Komanchi's galloping speed slowed down visibly. No, to be technically correct, his slowing pace was noticeable after one hour into the race. There wasn't any complicated reason behind this. The change occurred because Komanchi was hot and tired.

This is... not as easy as I thought! Haah! Whew!

Komanchi clenched his teeth as his whole body began to sweat profusely. His body felt excessively hot like it was set on fire. He feared he'd faint if he continued on as he was. Reluctantly, Komanchi slowed down. That made him feel better.

It's okay. I've already created a large distance between me and that slowpoke.

Komanchi wasn't worried. He thought he had a good amount of time to spare. He had sprinted fast enough at the beginning of the race and covered a large distance. And besides, that human was eerily slow. It would be impossible for Lloyd to catch up with him.

There's no way I'll lose. Never!

Komanchi was confident and convinced. Another day passed.

"Ugh...! Haah! Hoo! Hoo! Argh!"

By this time, Komanchi was walking now. He couldn't even dream of galloping in this state, and even cantering was too much of a struggle.

I'm... drained!

It was too hot. He was scared that his knees would buckle down. His whole body was drained of energy. And as a last-ditch effort, he decided to walk, never stopping and still feeling relieved that he was remaining in the lead. He kept walking southward. The following day...

"Cough! Cough! Achoo! A... choo! Ugh!"

By this time, Komanchi was practically dragging his hooves. There was no more strength left in him. He was seconds before passing out, and just walking was becoming impossible. The blue sky looked yellow in his vision, and he foamed at the mouth. He tried to move, but his knees disobeyed him, as did his ankles. But he showed burning determination, befitting his title as the champion centaur.

I cannot stop now. The finish line must be near. I... am fast! I cannot collapse like this!

Komanchi widened his eyes and clenched his fists. Burning resolution. Now, his mental fortitude was the only fuel that moved his exhausted body. Komanchi dragged his whole body, going at 0.3 mph. Even still, he was rest assured.

Still, I will win! Of course! If I'm this tired right now, then it's obvious how much worse it has to be for that slowpoke! I bet he's already lying flat on the ground completely unconscious!

Komanchi had no doubt about it. There was no other possibility. He believed that the finish line would emerge soon. Afterward, all there was left for him to do after passing the southern border was to meet the human guards and ask them to direct him to their commander's front yard. Komanchi persisted and crawled forward. But the reality was harsher than he hoped it to be.

"Hmph! Hoo, hoo! Hmph! Hmph! Hoo!"

Just then, Komanchi perked up his ears. He suddenly started to pick up regular breathing from behind. And it was nearing.

What's that?

At first, he thought he was hearing things out of sheer exhaustion as he was seconds away from passing out. But it turned out that his ears were right.

"Hmph! Hoo, hoo! Hmph! Hmph! Hoo!"

"Eh...?" His dazed vision caught something past him. The figure was covered in sweat and running very slowly. Komanchi spotted the red speeding ticket on the man's back. It was Lloyd Frontera, his human competitor!

Impossible!

Could it be that he was hallucinating? Or was he dreaming now? Komanchi thought at first. But that wasn't the case. No matter how hard he rubbed his eyes, shook his head, or even stood on his hind legs, the back in front of him belonged to his human competitor.

W-what? What's going on?!

A sense of panic overcame Komanchi. He hurriedly flexed his leg muscles and encouraged himself to run. He was the champion. He could do it. But it was useless.

Drag... Five inches. That was the distance his panic-stricken effort took him.

No. This is a lie. Ugh...

Komanchi tried to exert some more effort. But only in vain. He was completely drained. Eventually, he fell. He couldn't move anymore. And he panted on the ground as the vision around him started to grow dark. Sometime later...

"Goodness. Why are you sleeping here? You'll get sick," uttered Lloyd. He slapped Komanchi's cheek a few times.

Komanchi was awakened by a sharp and sudden sensation on his skin. His eyes flew open.

"It's salt water. Drink this up first and get your energy back."

Komanchi noticed the cup a hand was holding out and the water swaying in it. He soon saw who it was. "Lloyd Frontera?"

"You recognize me," said Lloyd, "I guess you aren't in a critical state. What a relief."

Komanchi stared, dazed.

"Don't stare at me like that. Here. Drink this first."

Komanchi accepted the glass in a daze and drained the cup. The liquid was salty and cool. It was only then that his head started to ache.

“Ack... What... happened?” Komanchi couldn’t make out what was happening. Why am I on the ground when I’m supposed to be racing? And why is he giving me a cup of water? And what is that gaze and expression on his face? Everything was a mystery to Komanchi. But the answer he received from the human was simple.

“What do you mean what happened? The race is over.”

“What?” Komanchi’s voice broke.

“It’s over. The race.”

“...”

“I’m telling you.”

“Th-Then who won-”

“Me. Duh,” interrupted Lloyd.

“...”

“Don’t believe me?”

“Like I could!” reflexively bawled Komanchi at him. “You saw how the race started! How I was wretchedly ahead of you! And it was like that throughout the entire competition!”

“Except that it was me who passed the finish line first,” pointed out Lloyd with a calm expression on his face.

Komanchi felt dizzy.

“If you want proof of it, then take a look at the cup you’re holding.”

Not understanding what Lloyd meant, Komanchi hesitantly studied the glass in his hand. And there, he found an inscription.

[Congratulations on becoming the guard commander for the northern border.]

“Wh-what is this?” Komanchi said in dismay.

The corners of Lloyd’s lips rose as high at Komanchi’s dismay. “I’m glad that you can read the human alphabet. It’s a gift I found at the commander’s desk inside his manor.”

“...”

“No, actually, I borrowed it from the guard commander to prove it to you. You may not know this, but I’m a meritorious retainer of the House of Magentano. When I asked him politely, he even asked if I needed anything more.”

Komanchi didn’t respond to Lloyd. “So I brought a bundle of proof for you. Here’s his rank insignia. Status certificate. Here’s his toothbrush. And here’s a ceremonial sword and family flag from the queen herself. And yes, allow me to introduce the woman over here to you. She’s the commander’s wife.”

“...”

Komanchi dazedly stared at an elegant human woman bowing at him. That was when it became clear to him.

I lost.

This was enough proof. He lost the race. There came from the corner of his brain a screaming voice that said the human had cheated. But Komanchi shook his head and banished the thought.

Deception? No. That’s impossible. My fellow centaurs across the entire plain were watching our race. They saw how we ran. There was no way for him to cheat. Plus, the human was ahead of me before I passed out...

That was when it came to him. Komanchi remembered how that man trudged ahead of him before he passed out. The man’s pace wasn’t fast, and his legs shook from exhaustion. But they didn’t stop moving. It looked like they’d never stopped.

It was real.

Komanchi, being a runner for his whole life, could tell whether one had run faithfully without cheating. And so, Komanchi accepted his defeat.

“I see. I... lost.”

The moment Komanchi accepted his defeat, a new title message popped in front of Lloyd.

Ding dong.

[With tenacity, persistence, and endurance that even turtles would be impressed by, you have won the race against the champion among centaurs.]

[Komanchi, the champion of Klamath, is deeply moved by your tenacity.]

[The story of this impressive race will spread to all corners of the plain through the mouths of Komanchi and its spectators.]

[Centaurs have bestowed you with a new title.]

[A new title <Don’t Look Down on a Human Ever Again> has been created.]

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 295: Don’t Look Down on a Human (3)

Ding dong.

[The centaurs have bestowed you with a new title.]

[A new title <Don’t Look Down on a Human Ever Again> has been created.]

Damn.

The message appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes with a pleasant ding. This was the kind of moment he found most rewarding. It made him feel like he achieved something. Feeling content, he cast his gaze on the compliment’s description.

[Don’t Look Down on a Human Ever Again]

[Title Level: Regional Folktale]

Trot. Trot. There once was a man. He ran in the morning. In the afternoon. In the evening. With his only two legs, he waddled and created a distasteful sight. And he was slow, so slow that even a foal would yawn. But he was faster than four-legged creatures. He ran across the vast plain and reached the territory of the humans. He proved that the one who arrives at the finish line first is faster than the one who runs fast. So, what do you have to do if you wish to run like him? How about you start running southward? Just 372 miles.

[Compliment Effect: With your marvelous show of tenacity and endurance, you have opened a new era of long-distance running to the centaurs. The centaur champion and many others who watched the race genuinely accepted your long-distance running method. Owing to it, your reputation will spread to every corner of the vast plain, and the new running method - running a long distance while saving energy - will be a trend among the young centaurs. Moreover, you have acquired a new passive effect <Fuel

Efficiency> that reduces the energy consumption by half in situations where your heartbeat goes over 140 every minute.]

[Title Region: The Great Plain of Klamath. Any plain ground with a land mass of over 1,000m^2]

[Active Period of Title: 160 Years.]

[A title's powers can be activated for 24 hours in the region for which the compliment was given. Moreover, time and region can expand or shrink depending on your actions.]

[Monthly CP Earned from the Title: 2]

[Current CP: 1,477]

Hahaha.

Lloyd let out a forced laugh after reading through the compliment effect. He couldn't help it. The effect was more than he expected.

This is pretty awesome. I'll be consuming only half of my energy if my heart beats above 140 times a minute when I'm on plain ground with a land mass of over 1,000m^2.

At first glance, the required conditions for activation could seem difficult to meet. However, they were fairly simple demands upon further thought.

Of course. A simple exercise can easily bring your heart rate to 140 beats per minute. Moreover, it's quite common for a plain to possess this kind of land mass.

As such, those conditions weren't exactly hard to meet. They were actually pretty generous. Once those conditions were satisfied, Lloyd would only consume half of the energy he normally did.

This is sweet.

The skill would be useful for any risky or urgent situations. Concluding with that thought, Lloyd looked up at Komanchi, who was lying on the ground in utter exhaustion.

“Please wait here while I go and return the items I borrowed.”

It was time to return everything Lloyd borrowed to prove his victory: The guard commander’s mug cup, rank insignia, certificate, toothbrush, ceremonial sword, family flag, and wife. He summoned Ggoming, fed the red sunflower seed to him, and returned the commander’s things to his wife.

Afterward, he came back to Komanchi and helped him get to his feet and on Ggoming’s back. And he urged Javier, who dutifully joined him throughout the race from behind him, to come on board. The two humans and one centaur were barely able to fit on top of Ggoming’s back. After they returned to the Stone and Wind village, Lloyd announced his victory to everyone.

“After a fierce race, I crossed the finish line first,” announced Lloyd to everyone. “Right?”

“Yes, I accept my defeat. Lloyd won this race,” seconded Komanchi.

Everyone’s eyes widened at the announcement. They all wore a look of disbelief, but Lloyd didn’t care about their dismay. He simply proceeded to claim his reward for victory.

“So, may I please have your attention!”

Lloyd’s commanding voice silenced the murmuring voices of the centaurs, and everyone put all their focus on him.

“Anyway,” Lloyd declared, “The race is over. Yes. Mister Komanchi reigned as the champion of this plain for three years until I emerged and proved to be faster than him.”

The crowd was filled with silence. Amidst it, someone dryly swallowed. Everyone wondered in nervous anticipation what the human had to say.

Lloyd continued, “Yes, I am faster than Mister Komanchi. That means that I am faster than all of you here and any centaur in this world. Now, do you remember what the ex-champion said right before the race began?”

Lloyd smiled meaningfully. At last, everyone’s bad feeling was actualized. “Centaurs never listen to the words of a slowpoke. Right?”

The crowd remained deathly silent.

“Am I correct?”

Still, no one spoke.

“Hmm?” mused Lloyd as he narrowed his eyes. “Are you all sleeping?”

Despite Lloyd’s questions, they all clamped their mouths shut.

“Well, since you’re not answering me, I’ll answer my question then. Mister Komanchi did say those words without a doubt. With that in mind, it is also true that I am faster than everyone here. In conclusion, from now on, you all must obey my orders.”

Ba-dump. Everyone’s heart sank. Lloyd, not giving any mind to their reaction, continued to speak.

“As such, I will enact a few rules. The rules that I tell you now do not apply only to the Stone and Wind tribe. It applies to every centaur who inhabits the Klamath Plain.” Lloyd’s gaze raked over everyone at the lot. His eloquent smile deepened. At last, he made his declaration, and it shocked everyone.

“Rule number one. No more sprinting in the village.”

“What?!”

“Oh, what kind of rule is that?!”

Young centaurs protested aloud as soon they heard Lloyd. But once again, he completely took no notice of them. Even if they did a tumbling or headspin in surprise, they were invisible to the man.

“Rule number two.” Lloyd continued nonchalantly. “From now on, courtship races will only take place in the coliseum, which will be constructed soon.”

This time, no one jumped. But not because they accepted Lloyd’s announcement. They simply understood from Lloyd’s shameless face and adamant voice that there was no room for negotiation. Lloyd wasn’t having a discussion with them. He was making an announcement. This was a notice not a debate. His last words confirmed their thoughts.

“Okay, I will ask you then. Is there anyone who is against my rules?”

No one voiced any objection.

“I knew there wouldn’t be. After all, you all are slower than me.

No one responded once again.

“If you feel wronged, then you can always challenge me and prove that you’re a faster runner.”

Still, no one spoke. This time again, they realized that challenging the man would be useless. The result would be the same as the previous race. The reason was simple.

He’s going to use his right as the challenged individual and choose the most advantageous finish line for himself! It’ll be around 300 miles from here then too!

Everyone shuddered. There could be no other human who was as cunning, conniving, and deceiving enough as him to put their champion centaur in such a terrible state.

On second thought, are all humans like him?

It would be a large problem if that was true. The possibility was horrifying. Everyone shuddered at the thought. Even though they found the whole situation unfair and shudderingly unacceptable, they couldn’t oppose him. They couldn’t think of a way to outrun him. Eventually, everyone reluctantly nodded.

As soon as he convinced everyone, Lloyd zoomed back to the head chief’s stable and announced, “I have persuaded them to follow my rules.”

“You persuaded them?” Chief Cherokan frowned.

“Yes.”

“Really?”

“Certainly,” said Lloyd with a smug.

“Hmm, you see, I also have eyes and ears of my own.”

“Then you should’ve seen and heard it clearly.”

“Tsk... Who knew you would resort to such a sly scheme,” the chief scratched his neck.

“Anyway,” Lloyd said as he ignored the remark, “Everyone agreed to comply with my safety regulations, taking one burden off your shoulders with it, Chief. We’re not just talking about the centaurs in the Wind and Stone tribe but everyone across this plain.”

“Well, I will give you that. That was truly amazing.” Head Chief Cherokan expressed his genuine admiration. The emotion was so intense that he smiled wryly. “I wondered what your plan would be that made you possess so much confidence. However, it never crossed my mind that you would suggest racing across such a stupidly long distance and end up as the winner.”

“Is that so, Chief?”

“Yes, if I’m being honest. Hence, my surprise. Since you kept your promise, it’s time for me to keep mine.”

“Thank you, Chief. Please sign here.”

Flap! Lloyd immediately fished a document out of his embrace at Cherokan’s words.

Cherokan knit his eyebrows. “What is this?”

“It is a construction contract.”

“Construction... contract?”

“Yes.” Lloyd nodded. Licking his lips he said, “Do you remember how we signed the conditional agreement a few days ago? About how you would accept my suggestion and allow the coliseum construction to begin if I persuade your centaurs’?”

“Y-Yes, I did.”

“This contract clarifies all of our contract terms, so to speak.”

“Are you talking about the paper you’re holding out to me?”

“Yes,” replied Lloyd, “Time to keep your promise.”

For a second, Cherokan wondered if all humans were like the one in front of him. Nonetheless, he stamped the new contract, but not without a slight feeling that he had been bewitched. The contract promised that Head Chief Cherokan would teach Lloyd where Taupo was if the latter built a coliseum for them.

“Very well,” Lloyd said as he smiled as bright as his face. “You have made a wise choice.”

“Are you going to start the construction now?”

“Yes, Chief. I should. And as mentioned in the contract, you must assist by providing as much labor and construction materials as possible.”

“I see. I ask that you do a good job with the coliseum or whatever if it’s going to be built.”

“You’ve got nothing to worry about,” assured Lloyd before leaving the stable. It was only then that he was able to breathe out loud.

“Haah...”

He did it. He got the contract for the coliseum project. But he didn’t have any time to relax or recharge.

Recharge, my ass! Time to work!

Lloyd planned to enjoy life. And that could only happen if he had a solid foundation for it, which was the Frontera County for him. The first thing was to stop the restoration of destiny from happening.

As such, there was no time to relax. Lloyd decided that he had to bust his tail until the relaxed life of abundance he always yearned for would actualize. He then immediately proceeded to survey the area. Thankfully, the open land offered a lot of space for him to put up the coliseum. And since it barely rained in the plain, he didn’t have to concern himself with building drains as well.

It was such a great location for construction that he couldn’t help but repeat to himself, “I wish I could construct in a place like this every day!” Anyway, Lloyd didn’t intend to build a coliseum as big as the one in Rome.

It’s not necessary to do that. I just have to create a track where they can sprint without worry. A space that’s separated from their everyday life.

That was the crux of this project. As such, the coliseum he planned to build wouldn’t look like the ones in ancient Rome. Instead, it would look very similar to race car tracks or horse tracks.

So, I have to set aside a vast amount of land for this project. The track needs to be well-built. And this area will be where the audience can spectate...

Apart from those things, Lloyd worked on several other sections of the coliseum, like the waiting and rest areas, as well as the areas for emergency treatment. He ran thousands of different scenarios that could happen during a race and designed the facility accordingly.

The track is the most crucial structure for a racing competition. It's directly related to everyone's safety. But it can't be hard to maintain and should be sturdy enough to be free from damage in the long run.

Lloyd designed the coliseum with a fine-tooth comb and ran countless tests, skipping sleep and focusing on the project. Ten, fifteen days passed. Around the time the bags under his eyes couldn't get any larger, he completed the design for the coliseum.

The next step is to freeze time.

Finally, the time had come. The time had come to use the Time Freeze skill to save the time that would be used for construction.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 296: The Impact of the Coliseum (1)

Everyone had at least one secret. It could be an unspeakable past or an embarrassing mistake. Whatever it was, disclosing a secret was no easy task. And it was even more troublesome if someone's secret was possessing a ridiculous power such as the ability to stop time.

Lloyd, however, mustered courage by pretending as though the thought suddenly popped into his head in the middle of breakfast. He stared intensely at Javier while slurping down his soup. Javier felt the gaze, letting go of his spoon.

“Do you have something to say?” asked Javier as he wiped his mouth with a napkin.

“I do,” replied Lloyd.

“Do you want me to pass you the black pepper?”

“No, nothing like that.” Lloyd shook his head.

“Or the salt?”

“I don’t need salt. Actually…” Lloyd sighed. His voice sounded heavy. “I can stop time.”

Instead of giving any response, Javier decided to say nothing.

“I’m serious,” Lloyd insisted.

Javier studied Lloyd’s face first. “Hmm... You are perfectly awake.”

“I’m telling you!” Lloyd was persistent.

“You are not sleep-talking.”

“This isn’t a joke.”

“The soup is not poisoned either.” Javier looked at his soup.

“I mean it.”

“Your eyes are normal.”

“Hey...”

“All right.”

“What?” Lloyd stopped.

The corners of Javier’s lips rose upward. “I said, all right. I understand that you can stop time.”

“All right with what?”

“What you told me,” Javier explained in a casual voice, “Stopping time.”

“So you believe me?”

“Yes, Young Master.”

Javier’s nonchalant, carefree attitude flustered Lloyd. “H-how? I-I can stop time. Is that easily believable to you?”

“I have no choice but to believe you.”

“Why?”

“There is no other way.” Javier’s gaze fixed on Lloyd. It was serious and grave. “Do you remember, Young Master? The first time you told me you would construct an ondol.”

Lloyd nodded.

“That was when I first started to think you’d lost your mind.”

“Hmm...” Lloyd choked and coughed.

“But strangely,” Javier articulated, “Your actions and plans that I regarded as deranged in the past turned out to benefit the family when they were put into action.” Javier knitted his brows as if he were recollecting an event. “It was the case for the ondol, the waterway, and the mine. Well, there is no need for me to list them all. Everything you have done so far has led to the same result.”

Lloyd squinted his eyes at Javier. “Tsk. And each time, you thought I had gone mad?”

“Yes.” Javier’s response came right away.

“And the more deranged you thought I was, the more right I was about everything?” asked Lloyd, slightly in disbelief.

“Yes.”

“So you still think I am a madman.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

“But thanks to that, you can trust me now?”

“Yes.”

“My, I can’t be more thankful.” Lloyd exhaled, slightly dumbstruck by this revelation.

“You are welcome,” replied Javier with an elegant smile on his face. “You were exactly like this a while ago. With your disheveled morning hair, which looks like a bird’s nest, by the way, you looked straight into my eyes and told me that you could stop time.”

“And I looked like a man who had lost his mind.” Lloyd folded his arms.

“You still do, in fact,” Javier confessed, “It is subtle, but you still do.”

“Oh, yeah?”

“Yes, Young Master. I suppose you got the power after absorbing the Heart of Winter?”

“Uh-huh.” This conversation relieved Lloyd. It looked like Javier was really buying his words. To put an end to the matter, Lloyd quickly added, “How should I say this? I just had a feeling about it ever since I absorbed the Heart of Winter.”

“You mean the ability to stop time?”

“Yeah,” confirmed Lloyd. “All thanks to the Heart of Winter.”

“Have you tried it yet?”

“No.” Lloyd shook his head. “Technically speaking, I can designate a certain area where time will continue flowing.”

“I see.” Javier understood what Lloyd’s plan was. “And you plan on using that power for this construction, is that right?”

“Yes, yes. That’s exactly my point.” Lloyd felt a rush of relief once again. He was scared that Javier might think of him weirdly.

Well, this is a relief. Surely, our trip to Hell really made us closer.

Come to think of it, Lloyd and Javier had been through all kinds of hardships together across the entire world, whether that was in the mountains, up in the sky, under the water, or down in Hell.

Our time together must have made him trust me more than before.

A sense of satisfaction rushed through Lloyd. Their days together and the hardships they had overcome must have contributed to Javier’s trust in him. Despite how Javier grumbled and called Lloyd a madman without hesitation, the knight was the only confidante he could rely on.

Obviously! There’s so much I invested in him! I helped him master the Asrahan Core Technique much earlier than in the original storyline. I’ve taught him how to use the mana blast, helped him sleep, clothed him, and kept him fed! And by helping him sleep, I mean I sang him lullabies to lovingly put him to bed.

Thanks to all his efforts, Javier was now a grandmaster. The difference in his skill level between the original storyline and the current one was as vast as the distance between the sky and land.

And all the credit belongs to me.

Lloyd blew through his nose as he nodded and wondered if this was what a parent felt like watching their child pass the college entrance exam after diligently taking care of them while they studied. Anyway, now that Lloyd had earned Javier's trust, he cranked into action to freeze time.

To avoid creating panicked commotion among the centaurs, Lloyd first visited Cherokan and explained that he would freeze time before kickstarting the construction.

But his confident explanation was met with a subtle gaze that said, "Are you unwell?"

Lloyd simply smiled at the chief. Chief Cherokan clicked his tongue and explained everything to the centaurs without giving him much of a reply.

Two days later, Lloyd stood at the center of the plain with hundreds of centaurs watching him. Then he opened the optional skill window for his manaheart.

Ding dong.

[Skill Option ⑤: Time Freeze - You can freeze time of this world by borrowing the power of the Heart of Winter in your manaheart.]

[Required RP to use the skill: 3,000]

[Current RP: 4,655]

[Would you like to use the Skill Option ⑤: Time Freeze?]

[YES / NO]

Of course, it's a YES.

Lloyd nodded, and there was an immediate reaction.

[Skill Option ⑤: Time Freeze has been activated.]

[You have spent 3,000 RP.]

[Current RP: 1,655]

[From now on, with the power of the Heart of Winter, you can freeze one year's worth of time in this world. In addition, you can designate a no-freeze zone where time continues to flow as normal.]

[The range of the no-freeze zone is determined by the total amount of mana you possess.]

[Current Range: 250km^2]

[Please assign the range of the no-freeze zone.]

Lloyd was relieved that the range was wide enough. He provided the response he had already prepared in advance before activating the skill.

The largest range possible! Ack!!!

Crackle...! Abruptly, a large volume of mana started to slip out from his manaheart. It was as if Lloyd digested seven servings of grilled pork in ten seconds, emptying his stomach in the process. Soon, the mana turned into frigid air and jetted from him toward the sky in a straight line, which spread across the sky until it formed a dome shape. It looked like an umbrella, a giant bubble, or an upside-down bowl of rice. It covered the designated area of land by Lloyd and froze it at a quick speed. Eventually, a wall was created.

Ding dong.

[Time has been frozen.]

[The no-freeze zone cannot be altered until the optional skill is canceled.]

[The option will be deactivated in the event the user steps out of the no-freeze zone.]

[Any being within the range of the no-freeze zone will not age for a year.]

The message pleasantly filled Lloyd's vision. He let out the breath he'd been holding.

Whoa. It worked.

A pang of dizziness crept on him, along with a sensation of coldness. Lloyd grabbed his knees, and his arms and legs began to tremble. It felt like all his strength was leaving his body from head to toe. However, he was filled with a sense of overwhelming satisfaction at the same time.

It worked properly. The whole world has frozen except for this area.

Lloyd could feel that it worked because the Heart of Winter was in his heart. The Time Freeze was a success. Even so, Lloyd didn't sit back and solely rely on his senses.

I should confirm with my own eyes.

Lloyd tensed his trembling legs. He walked forward with a brave face to check if his optional skill was working properly.

Of course. Even if I feel confident about something, it's better to confirm whatever it is with my own eyes. This principle applies the same to construction sites. If a supervisor haphazardly performs a site inspection because everything looks fine on paper, their actions are destined to cause a disaster.

Lloyd had witnessed such incidents quite a few times back in South Korea. The high-ups rarely appeared at construction sites, and on the days they did, they merely gave a perfunctory glance at the site as they were accompanied by a large group of followers. Lloyd rarely saw them learn how the construction was done, keenly examine the work that was done, or get their hands dirty to give a thorough inspection.

It's the same right now. The skill option? Good. Message? It's convenient. But if I half-ass the inspection by relying on them, I'll run into a serious problem that I'll regret causing in the future.

The longer he inspected and examined the site, the better it was. As such, Lloyd was expected to do more than read over a report or message. He would need to use his eyes, ears, and all of his other senses to double or triple-check that everything was in place. With that thought in his head, Lloyd walked several miles and stood in front of the ice barrier created by the Heart of Winter.

Ha... This looks exactly like an upside-down rice bowl made of ice. And it seems I'm trapped inside of it…

The dome-shaped wall of ice was thin, barely half an inch thick, and allowed for a moderate amount of sunlight to come in from the outside. Lloyd took a good look at the scenery beyond the wall. Everything was frozen in place. An eagle hung in the air with its wings spread wide open, and a rabbit was frozen on the ground in a leaping position, trying to escape the eagle. The clump of grass that was flying in the air from her kick was also at a standstill. Everything in his vision had stopped moving.

The sun and clouds weren't an exception. It was as if someone had pressed the pause button on this world. Could it be because of such outrageous scenery in front of them? The centaurs who followed Lloyd murmured to themselves in dismay, chattering that the human's bravado turned out to be justified. The entire world froze aside from them. They nervously tapped their hooves against the ground as they wondered what would happen to them. This made Lloyd smile bitterly.

Tsk. It's too early for them to get nervous.

Lloyd had merely used his Time Freeze skill. There were more shocking events that would happen from then on.

That's obvious. I need big and strong laborers to start the construction off strong.

Therefore, Lloyd summoned the largest laborer he had put on stand-by the other day. Since the two were connected by soul, all Lloyd had to do was tell them inwardly to come over. With that, the laborer would soon arrive. A little later, the centaurs were shocked once again. This time, their surprise came along with the marvelous sound of clacking bones from somewhere in the distance. Clack! Crack! Clack! Crack

The ground shook, and a thick cloud of dust was produced as a giant bone, Draggy, came galloping. Draggy had received the order to put on a friendly appearance for the centaurs before time had frozen. As such, it had plucked its wings, twisted its spine and pelvis, and separated its legs and arms to reassemble itself into a centaur skeleton. However, despite its efforts to appear friendly to the centaurs, everyone shrunk in fright when they saw Draggy charging toward them.

"Ack...! It's a monster!"

"We're being attacked!"

The panic-stricken shrieks of the Stone and Wind tribe centaurs, who were set to receive the most benefit from the coliseum, rang aloud across the plain on the first day of the construction.

♣

Meanwhile, in the far south of the plain belonging to the Stone and Wind tribe, that is, the most southern part of the planet, there was an ice cave in the Antarctic region. It was inhabited by a creature who had been put into a state of astonishment.

"What is this? Why is time not moving?"

Ice Dragon Tyrannus. The very one who gifted the Heart of Winter to the founding king of Magentano in the distant past leaped to his feet when he realized that time had stopped.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 297: The Impact of the Coliseum (2)

“What is this? Why is time not moving?”

Ice Dragon Tyrannus was shocked. He was enjoying his nap, feeling cozy surrounded by the cool air of the cave, when time suddenly stopped around him without affecting him.

What happened? Tyrannus rose.

Grrrr... Rumble!

He dragged his 885-foot-long body, which weighed approximately 10,000 tons, out of the cave.

“...”

The world was at a standstill. The snow falling from the sky hung like a permanent fixture in the air. A deep wrinkle appeared between his eyebrows. At last, he sensed it.

Someone must have used the Heart of Winter.

Indeed, there was something unusual about the frigid air that had spread across the world. He was much too familiar with the mana surrounding him. It belonged to the Heart of Winter.

It must be the Heart of Winter. It’s the only reason I’m unaffected, as I’m the one who created it.

Tyrannus’s furrow deepened.

It must be the doing of that human who absorbed the Heart of Winter.

Tyrannus was upset that the human was carelessly using something that didn’t belong to him.

It’s mine, after all. I made it as a gift for Mikael and his descendants.

The Heart of Winter had been a celebratory gift to the founding king Mikael of the Magentano kingdom. Tyrannus could still remember the overwhelming joy on Mikael's face, as well as his promise of putting the Heart of Winter to good use and his hope that it would strengthen his descendants. Tyrannus had been pleased that he had chosen the right gift.

A stranger who is not Mikael nor one of his descendants absorbed the Heart of Winter, and is using it on his whims?

Tyrannus didn't like what was happening at all. He had to take action.

I should confiscate it.

The moment he decided so...

Boooom! His two legs kicked off from the ground, and two giant wings fluttered against the wind. But he wasn't able to speed up.

Arggh! This must be because time has stopped. I'm slower than usual.

Even though Tyrannus was immune to the frozen state of time since he created the Heart of Winter, he was still subject to some side effects. His movement had slowed down dozens, no, hundreds of times more than usual. His wings were heavier, and his speed of flight was frustratingly slow.

Tsk. I wish I could teleport, but I can't since time has stopped flowing.

The flow of mana in the world had changed with the freezing of time. The coordinate time scale had been bypassed, preventing Tyrannus from teleporting. He had no choice but to fly at a snail's pace.

At this rate, it's going to take a few months to get there.

Tyrannus grumbled again, resolving with hostile determination to teach that human a lesson. He continued to fly in slow motion toward the northwest plain of the Lorasian Continent.

♣

Meanwhile, construction was taking place to build a circuit coliseum at the center of the Klamath Plain, which was the only region unaffected by the frozen state of time.

“Okay, Draggy,” called Lloyd.

Draggy cocked its head to the side.

“Do you see the glowing blue lines?”

Creak! Draggy nodded its head again. It saw the glowing bluish lines and surfaces surrounding the area.

“Good,” Lloyd said. “You just have to dig along those lines and surfaces to flatten them up. What do you think? Do you think you can do it?”

Crack! Draggy nodded once again. It could do the job without a doubt. Though the total area was several square miles of square feet, it was a no-brainer to Draggy.

Boooom! Three or four wielding its tail did the job. In no time, the ground was swept away by its destructive tail, the sight being much like sweeping the ground with a broom.

“Urk! Ahem, excellent,” observed Lloyd.

When the thick cloud of dust cleared, Lloyd nodded with satisfaction and saw that the land was flattened exactly the way the Construction Guideline had outlined. And on top of that, the dense shrubs of grass had all been pulled out.

Haha. There’s a shocking sight for the elves.

Lloyd chuckled as he remembered those groups of plant lovers. Draggy’s extraordinary feat allowed the groundwork of the coliseum to be swiftly completed.

“Next up! Ppodong. Javier,” called Lloyd.

“Ppodong!”

“Yes...” Javier replied with a crestfallen look on his face.

“Off you go!” urged Lloyd as he pointed his finger upward.

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Whew...”

Ppodong darted across the site while Javier went around with an evident look of self-depreciation, the two of them flattening the areas Draggy had missed and filling in the dented areas of land. They carefully completed their task. Next, it was Hamang’s turn.

“All right, Hamang,” said Lloyd with a clap.

“Hamang!” replied Hamang, who inflated himself to a height of 98 feet after absorbing water from nearby creeks.

“Make good use of all the water you took in to grow. You know what I mean, right? Let’s get on with it.”

“Hamamang!”

Rollll! Hamang rolled around the land, which Draggy swept and Ppodong as well as Javier meticulously tidied up, with his weight. All of these tasks took them ten days to complete. Once it was done, it was time for Bangul to work.

“Okay! Bangul. Push!”

“Bangul!”

Jingle! Bangul dutifully ate the dirt on the ground and produced metal rebars. Lloyd and Javier then organized and cut them into equal sizes and laid them out around the racetrack. The purpose of the rebars was to support the concrete that would become a sturdy layer of ground for the racetrack.

The Continuously Reinforced Concrete Pavement (CRCP) method will be used for the grounds of the coliseum's racetrack.

Lloyd had already finished creating the design for this project in advance. The CRCP method boasted a longer service life than any other alternative for it. This meant it was easier and less effort to maintain while also being more cost-effective.

That's why it's widely used on hot, dry, and large pieces of land in places like Texas. It's perfect for a plain such as this one.

There was more. One of the express highways in Korea was built using this same method. It was the Jungbu Expressway.

People really don't know that rebars are placed under the roads they drive on. However, problems arise if a concrete pavement is not reinforced with rebars. That's how important metal rebars are.

The rebars in the concrete pavement were sort of like a frame. It was the best way to prevent small cracks from forming on roads due to temperature and humidity changes in the environment or pressure from driving vehicles.

And that's why I have to be so cautious and careful when I'm installing rebars.

Lloyd installed the cut-out rebars following the direction of the pavement. Of course, this wasn't an easy job, and it was particularly more tedious because he didn't have enough helping hands.

Tsk! I wish the Skeleton Corps was here with me!

Laying the rebars required a special skill set. An advanced one, even.

Of course. The measurement has to be precise. Everything has to be perfectly leveled, and the binding connectors have to be sturdy.

That was the reason why Lloyd couldn't pass the job to the centaurs, whose physiques weren't compatible with this sort of job.

They can’t even scratch their bellies with their arms!

Their physique was perfect for running and running only. Due to their extreme physical features, centaurs couldn’t so much as scratch their bellies or buttocks without the help of a tool. The same problem applied when they needed to pick something up. Their arms were extremely short even when they bent their knees. In other words, they were completely, utterly, and indisputably useless on construction sites. That was why Lloyd couldn’t entrust them to precisely place and bind the rebars together on the ground. It was also why the job fell on him and Javier.

“Whew... after this, I’m going to stop by the Frontera County. I’ll bring the entire Skeleton Corps here on Draggy’s back. With that, I’ll be able to employ a tireless group of laborers without needing to provide them with meals or wages. That would be amazing.”

The Skeleton Corps was the dream team that every evil employer in the world would die to have. They could be put to endless hours of grueling labor without needing to be fed or paid. The thought of exploiting the skeletons brought a smile to his face.

But for now, Javier and I are doomed to do this job.

Just like that, they sweated through the entire day. One day, two days, three days, ten days, fifteen days, thirty days, sixty days, and then ninety days passed. After three months of work, the rebar installation came to an end.

But since the world is at a standstill, I technically didn’t spend a single second on this job.

That was the best part. Next, Lloyd moved on to the next job, which was mixing the aggregates with the cement Lloyd produced during the last three months with the help of Bangul’s Volcanic Explosion. As for the mix proportion, Lloyd looked toward the Jungbu Expressway in South Korea as his point of reference.

The thickest aggregate should be less than 1.2 inches. The slump should be 4.5. The oxygen rate should be 4.5%. The proportion between water and cement should be 42.3%. The fine aggregate percentage should be close to 37.7%.

Lloyd strove to keep the proportion the same. He then combined everything together, dug a pool-sized hole in the ground, poured his mixture, and whisked it with Draggy's tail. Afterward, he paved the road with concrete and flattened it down with the help of Ppodong.

"Hey, Ppodong. Roll!"

"Ppodong!"

Ppodong was fully wrapped in an oiled piece of paper. He then rolled all over the wet concrete road like a paving machine from South Korea. Thanks to his chubby belly that sent enough weight and vibration to the ground, Lloyd could proceed to the next process of construction after the concrete was perfectly flattened. Curing the concrete. The centaurs joined in and showed their capabilities for this task.

"Excuse me," Lloyd gently said, "Did you finish what I asked you to work on the last time?"

"Of course! Here you go." A centaur woman flashed a big smile at Lloyd before leading him to the backyard of the stable. When he arrived, the area in front of him was filled with dozens of rolled-up straw mats with each being about 16 feet in width and 160 feet in length.

"My," the centaur woman said with mild disgust on her face, "The women in the tribe haven't been able to go on a proper run for the past three months because we were so busy weaving these mats. Our fingers are also all swollen."

"Yikes. Thank you so much for your hard work," expressed Lloyd as he bowed.

"No need to. We're doing this for our kids to race in a safe environment."

“I am glad you understand. I will make sure to build a good coliseum for your children.”

“I like the sound of that. Make sure to keep your promise.”

“Yes, I will.”

Lloyd then took the mats and threw them on the wet concrete to cover them. This was to prevent the roads from direct exposure to sunlight.

This is how I can prevent the moisture from evaporating from the concrete too quickly. Otherwise, cracks will develop across the entire pavement and cause a disaster.

While the pavement was drying under its cover, Lloyd waited and used this period of time to rest for the first time in a while. Fifteen days later, the mats were ready to be removed. Once they were removed, a sleek and smooth pavement was revealed. Lloyd then threw two inches of sand on top of the track to protect the centaurs’ hooves from getting damaged by the hard ground.

Some might argue that I could have created the track entirely from sand. But the thing is, a race track with a layer of concrete pavement is completely different than one with just sand.

Once the tracks had a sturdy foundation made of rebars and concrete, there was no need to worry about the ground sinking or shifting. It would remain solid for several decades. Moreover, since he added an additional layer of sand, there would be even less damage from sunlight and temperature changes.

Similarly, a track will last longer and be easier to maintain when it is made with concrete. The only thing that will need to get done after each race is flattening the sand on the track again.

With that, the race track was finished. However, there were more tasks that needed to be done. Lloyd installed fences to separate different tracks and furnished the viewing area for spectators. A stable was also constructed as a waiting and resting area for athletes. These finishing touches took up two more months of construction.

And at last, after about seven months since the time was frozen, a coliseum was built for the first time in Lorasian history. One side was furnished with straight tracks, each extending to 330, 875, and 1640 yards. Beside them was a huge track that ran 2,818 yards north and 1,421 yards south with 19 corners.

I did it...

Lloyd wiped the tears as he looked at the finished coliseum. But he wasn't crying because he was moved.

I'm free now!

Lloyd had to physically participate in this construction throughout all of its processes. He had rolled up his sleeves, dug, flattened, and installed whatever was necessary, sweating buckets every day because the Skeleton Corps wasn't there to help him and the centaurs were useless. Javier, Draggy, and the fantastical creatures were the only sources of help he could rely on. As such, Lloyd sometimes had panic attacks over whether he could finish the construction within a year.

But I did it! In just seven months! I've finished the construction!

This was the last time he'd put himself through a nightmare like this. Next time, he'd make sure to bring the Skeleton Corps. Lloyd suppressed his overwhelming emotions with such a resolution.

As such, he was absolutely clueless that Tyrannus, who departed from his ice cave seven months ago, was about to arrive.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 298: The Impact of the Coliseum (3)

Finally, the circuit coliseum was finished. The tracks varied in distance from very short, short, and middle distance. There was also a more complex track with nineteen different corners. The Head Chief Cherokan tilted his head when he laid his eyes on it.

“Hmm, this is the coliseum you told me about?” There was hesitation in his voice.

“Yes, it is,” replied Lloyd as he folded his arms and nodded.

“Tsk,” Cherokan tutted. “This is one eerie building.”

“Is that so?” Lloyd chuckled to himself but not over the chief’s cynicism. It was rather because his reaction was exactly what was expected.

The chief’s reaction isn’t a surprise at all. Just imagine if he threw a big fuss over this construction, saying, “Ooh! What a fantabulous building!” That’d be even more ridiculous.

Indeed. Modern technology was not always praised in this world, and besides, the centaurs were no fools. As such, they would determine the value of the coliseum themselves.

Thinking so, Lloyd said, “Chief, why don’t you do a test run?”

“What? Me?”

“Yes. As the representative of the centaurs, I believe you should have the honor of being the first to run in the coliseum.”

“Hahahaha.”

“I’m being serious. Please follow me.”

The corners of the chief’s lips rose subtly as Lloyd smoothly buttered him up.

Lloyd capitalized on the change in the chief's attitude and guided him to the track. "There are five different kinds of tracks. Three of them are straight tracks that run 330, 875, or 1640 yards in distance for the purpose of drag racing. The other two are complex tracks that are 2,818 and 1,421 yards long, respectively."

"Hmm, then I shall run the 875-yard track," said Cherokan.

"Excellent choice."

The centaurs' propensity for galloping seemed to never change even as they aged. The chief's eyes turned slightly sharp as soon as his hooves touched the track ground. He soon dashed forward.

"Hiya!"

Gallop! The former champion's acceleration of speed was unbelievable. His hooves crossed the finish line in a flash, leaving only a trail of dust behind him. Soon, he was back at the starting line again. Although, there was an entirely different expression on his face.

"Ha... Hahaha!" laughed Cherokan heartily. "This track is something! I am telling you!"

"Really?"

"Ha! Indeed! Ha! Really! Who would have thought?!" He seemed overwhelmed with happiness. After a minute of content silence, he expressed, "It feels completely different from running on an unmanaged plain where you have to watch out for jagged stones to protect your hooves or spiky bushes to not lose balance after getting caught. In contrast, this track allows you to completely focus on running."

"How did the track feel under your hooves?" asked Lloyd.

"Sublime." The chief raised his thumb. "I thought my hooves were sinking into the sand. But instead, the sand acts as a shock absorber while my hooves still feel supported by the sturdy layer of ground underneath it. This means we can freely propel forward without straining our joints."

"Were you able to race faster then?" further asked Lloyd.

"No doubt about that. Any more questions?" There was a slight annoyance in the chief's voice.

"Excuse me?" Lloyd's tone rose a little at the chief's change of attitude.

"I want to run a little more," Cherokan spoke as he looked around.

"Oh," Lloyd said gleefully. "By all means."

"I'll be back. This time, I'll try the complex race track!"

"..."

All pumped up, the chief galloped off toward the complex race track. His dignified bristles perspired with foamy sweats. The news about his impassioned race at the coliseum spread across all the centaurs of the Stone and Wind tribe.

"Did you hear the news about the head chief?"

"Eh? What about him?"

"I heard he broke his running record that was set during his prime."

"What?! At his age? Really?"

"Yeah. Really."

"How?"

"How else? You know the coliseum built by the human."

"He broke his record running there?"

“That’s what they say.”

“No way.”

“Yes way. Amazing, isn’t it?”

“Let’s try running there too!”

Yearning to break their personal records as well, almost everyone rushed to the coliseum. Lloyd didn’t stop their excitement-fueled visits. For a second, he thought about requesting an entrance fee for the facility but decided against it.

This is a trial period.

Just like how video games used beta tests and how movies had trailers, the tracks had to be trialed for them to prove their value.

The best way to promote the coliseum would be to let the centaurs use it themselves.

To make sure that the coliseum was used by all centaurs across the plain, the facility had to be promoted. As such, Lloyd was rather grateful for the large crowd around the coliseum because he knew that each would go out and share their experiences with it. The tracks were open to everyone without any charge for five days. And on the sixth day, he announced a new rule.

[Starting today, the tracks will run on a reservation system.]

[Minimum reservation number: Two centaurs]

[Reservation eligibility: Participants of courtship races]

[How to reserve: Visit the coliseum management office. Complete your reservation by hoof-stamping the document with your name, date and time of the race, and which track you plan to use.]

[Caution: Switching lanes is not allowed while accelerating from 0 to 60 mph in six seconds or less.]

Even though such a sign was posted at the coliseum entrance, hardly any centaur opposed it. This was because Lloyd had been diligently broadcasting that the coliseum was reserved for marriage proposal competitions. When the following morning rolled around, there was a flood of reservations coming in.

Woah. Is this for real? I mean, what kind of son of a gun divorces their wife and proposes to someone to just run on some tracks?

Lloyd clucked his tongue in dismay. The centaurs were even more obsessed with racing than he originally thought. A number of centaurs divorced their partners to try running on the track, only to propose again to the partner that they divorced. They found adequate opponents to challenge, arranged a race, and reserved a track.

Well, I don't have any interest in their competition over love.

It wasn't any of Lloyd's business anyway. He simply focused on making sure that the rules were strictly adhered to: the courtship race was to take place only in the coliseum, and the designated speed limit was to be observed inside the villages.

Fifteen more days passed. With the compliance of regulations, there came slight changes in the atmosphere in the village. First and foremost, the number of accidents dropped noticeably, and so did the rate of bone fractures and other injuries that occurred during courtship races. This was an amazing change that came from two simple rules: race in tracks and trot in villages.

Furthermore, this proved that the solution Lloyd offered to the chief seven months ago was effective. On top of that, there was one more change that happened within the centaurian society. Their core understanding of racing had been transformed.

“Me and my tribe have come to realize the mindset of a true runner. Only run in areas where you are meant to run and when you can do so without harming yourself and anyone else.”

“Is that so?”

“Indeed.” The chief welcomed Lloyd when he entered the stable at the former’s calling. “It’s all thanks to you,” Cherokan continued, “Everyone’s thoughts have changed because of the coliseum you built. There was also a drastic decrease in the number of injuries that occur during courtship races.”

“I’m not the only one who is due credit. This would not have been impossible without everyone’s cooperation.”

“Haha. You are good at talking. Anyway, it’s time to fulfill my promise to you.”

“You’re planning to tell me where the Taupo is,” said Lloyd.

“Yes.”

The time had come for Lloyd to learn where the Taupo, the second key material for the Jewel of Truth, was located. Lloyd perked up his ears.

The chief said, “The Taupo our ancestors brought in the ancient past was composed of 16 total pieces. And everything is at the peak of the icy mountain in the north of the plain.”

“At the peak of the icy mountain?”

“Yes. I’m sure you’ll be able to find it easily while riding that large skeleton dragon of yours. It stands in a fairly eye-catching spot.”

The chief then held out a scroll. Lloyd opened to find a map illustrating the icy mountain terrains and the location of the Taupo.

“Thank you, chief,” Lloyd said. At that moment...

Ding dong.

An awaited message popped in front of his eyes.

[The centaur race has opened up to you.]

[Centaur tribal chief Cherokan has accepted you as his true friend and ally.]

[The coliseum you constructed led to the development of a new notion and concept of safe racing among the centaur race.]

[Moving forward, they will further improve their safety consciousness until they establish their first-ever set of traffic rules that will become a turning point in centaur history.]

[The laws will be based on the rules you have set forth, and you will be remembered as the greatest contributor toward the development of traffic regulation throughout the history of the centaur race.]

[The centaurs now consider you as a friend on equal footing.]

[You can now increase your likeability through centaurs and acquire RP.]

[100 RP has been rewarded for forming a new connection with another species of creatures.]

[Current RP: 1,755]

Whew...

Lloyd discretely clenched his fists.

I did it.

Lloyd obtained the location of the second key material for construction and established a likeability status with the centaurs as a bonus. It was only then that a sense of reward filled up his heart.

Truly, this was a long journey.

Just then, the events that took place for the past couple of months came to his mind. How he earned the red speeding ticket in the beginning, raced against the champion of the plain, spent seven long months constructing the coliseum, and another month inspecting its efficacy. All of these tedious processes had to be undertaken just for him to learn the location of the Taupo.

Well, technically, not even one second passed after I started the project since I froze time.

What a relief, Lloyd thought, and at the same time, he realized that he had to deactivate his skills.

Since the icy mountain is outside my no-freeze time zone, I should deactivate my skill.

His work here was done. There was no reason to idle around.

“It has been a pleasure, chief,” said Lloyd, “Allow me to give you something extra.”

“Extra?”

“Yes,” answered Lloyd with a smile. Everything had to end in a beautiful manner. Even if he did a stellar job with the construction and earned the centaur’s goodwill, a bad ending was all it took to spoil all his achievements up to this point.

So I should wrap this up nicely. That way, I will be able to ask for his help if I need it in the future.

Life was long, and no one knew what would happen tomorrow. It was right to invest in relationships for the sake of the future. Thinking so, he asked the chief to come closer and explained how to properly maintain the tracks.

“So, do this and that. But if what I am saying doesn’t work, please make a repair request at the Frontera Fiefdom. It’s in the east of the Magentano Kingdom.”

“Frontera Fiefdom?”

“Yes, that’s my home.”

After providing the chief with maintenance instructions for the tracks, Lloyd shook hands with him for the last time and left the stable. He then looked up and saw the ice wall that was shaped like an upside-down rice bowl. There was also the view of the sky, which hadn’t changed in the last eight months. He saw the sun that had also stood still at the center of it as well.

I cannot believe I did this.

Lloyd couldn’t believe it. Feeling dazed, he opened the skill window and got ready to normalize the time. Just then...

Hmm?

Lloyd squinted his eyes.

Something strange... is coming over here.

Something was coming toward the ice wall from the outside. Soon, it folded its wings and body slammed into the ice wall.

Crash! A large crack formed at the ice wall and widened. A giant head came through it. There appeared a white silhouette of a creature that was larger and paler than Draggy and a pair of icy eyes that was glaring right at Lloyd below two horns.

A dragon?

The moment his eyes were filled with fright, the dragon asked a question icily. “Human! You have the Heart of Winter. Am I right?”

“……!”

Lloyd’s heart sank. His shoulders shuddered. The moment Lloyd was confronted with Ice Dragon Tyrannus, who traveled all the way here to confiscate the Heart of Winter, the moment he sensed unexpected danger, Lloyd put on another layer of shamelessness on his face and licked his lips. He naturally put on a straight face and an innocent act that would make one say, “Oops, sorry. My bad. Wrong person.”

“Me? No, I don’t.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 299: Let’s Make a Wager (1)

“Me? No, I don’t.” Lloyd’s blithe voice and shameless words rang aloud in the air. They pierced into the ears of Tyrannus , who was looking down the hole at the top of the ice wall.

“It’s not you?” Tyrannus grimaced. His eyes shone like a raging avalanche. “Are you sure?”

“Quite sure. It’s not me,” Lloyd denied once again.

“Really?”

“Yes,” Lloyd answered without even blinking an eye.

A look of dismay came over Tyrannus’s face. “Hmm. I must have been mistaken. I’m sorry about that.”

“I see. Farewell then.” Lloyd waved his hand.

“Is that how you thought this would go?” Tyrannus sneered.

Boom! Fwoosh! His thundering voice made the hole in the wall expand, and the ice dragon crossed through it. Lloyd got a clear view of his gigantic physique.

This is nuts! He’s so much bigger than Draggy!

Lloyd immediately turned on his surveying skill and scanned the dragon’s entire body flying in his direction. The results made him gulp.

885 feet in height. 10,000 tons in weight.

They were frightening measurements. What was worse was his speed. Despite his sheer size, he was able to land with incredible ease and swiftness.

Boooom! However, despite his soft landing, the impact he caused was far from light. The entire ground shook, followed by the thundering sound of hundreds of exploding dynamites. A gigantic storm of dust emerged at the same time as well.

“Ack!!!”

Lloyd ducked down to avoid getting thrown away by the storm, and then he saw something. He saw the terrifying sight of the Ice Dragon raising his body right before his nose.

“Speak again, human. Tell me that you don’t have the Heart of Winter,” growled Tyrannus.

That was when Lloyd realized something. My plan to feign ignorance failed.

Lloyd’s plan was to feign his ignorance and lie shamelessly. It was possible that the dragon would buy his words and leave him alone. That was the best he could do in this situation.

Of course, it didn’t work. I don’t know the identity of this dragon. However, he must have flown all the way here knowing that I have the Heart of Winter. He must want something from me.

Lloyd guessed as much. The dragon came here with a purpose in mind. And so, denial or deception would not work on him.

He also looks like no ordinary dragon.

Lloyd recounted some events from a while ago. He was about to deactivate his Time Freeze skill when a dragon appeared, and where he emerged from was entirely uncalled for.

The dragon flew here from outside the ice wall where time had ceased to flow.

What was more, he bore a hole in the wall, looked down, and entered inside.

That means the dragon was able to fly here and flap his wings even amidst the frozen state of time. In other words, he wasn't affected by Lloyd's skill. That fact made Lloyd tremble in fear.

This one is on a completely different level from the young dragon, Solitas, that I brought to my fiefdom in the past after much negotiation. I can tell just from his sheer size and immunity against my time freeze skill.

Lloyd concluded that he had to tread carefully. He could mobilize Javier and Draggy if things went sideways and lay an ambush, but...

I want to avoid that if I can.

Lloyd received a strong feeling that it might backfire to regard the dragon as their enemy. He had an unexplainable hunch that the menacing creature wouldn't lose even against a trio made up of a grandmaster, a strong skeleton dragon, and himself. Once he drew such a conclusion...

"My, my," said Lloyd apologetically, "I must have been mistaken." Lloyd put on a nervous smile, rubbed his stiffening hands, and bent over. "Please forgive me. My hearing has been off these days, and your voice was too loud. I thought you said the Heart of Winner. Not the Heart of Winter."

"..."

"Yes, if you meant the Heart of Winter, then I do have it," acknowledged Lloyd.

"Is that so?"

"Yes." Lloyd firmly nodded at the dragon. The best way to create cooperation and leave a good impression on someone was to grovel without showing any sign of reluctance. As such, Lloyd hurriedly glanced toward Javier, who rushed to his side, starting a silent conversation. "Stop there. Don't draw your sword. Don't run, either."

"But Master Lloyd," argued Javier with his gaze.

“Don’t even try to touch your sheath. Slowly walk over to me. Come on. Relax. Don’t glare at the dragon. Smile, you little bastard.”

Understanding Lloyd’s message, Javier nodded. He, too, could feel that the dragon was far from ordinary. But contrary to Lloyd, he realized this fact through his acute senses as a grandmaster and three-strand circles that had reached their maximum potential. Javier felt very clearly that the dragon was ridiculously powerful.

Even if I fight to the best of my abilities, I would only last five minutes.

That would be the limit of his endurance. This was the second time he received this kind of feeling.

I had a similar thought when I first encountered Dragon King Verkis. But this dragon seems slightly weaker than Verkis. Master Lloyd might have some time to run if Draggy and I fight against him with every bit of our strength.

Javier made his resolution as he calmed his nerves. Meanwhile, Lloyd, who this time gestured to Draggy to calm down, looked up at the Ice Dragon.

“Anyhow, if the Heart of Winter is what you are looking for, then I have it with me. But may I ask what the purpose of your visit is?”

“It’s simple. I’m here to take back the Heart of Winter,” announced Tyrannus matter-of-factly.

“Excuse me...?”

“Did you not understand what I said? I’m here to take back the Heart of Winter.”

The corners of Lloyd’s lips crumpled slightly.

Ah, I had a feeling that it’d be this way.

This was a sticky situation. The reason was simple.

“Please forgive me for saying this. But you are correct, I do have the Heart of Winter...”

“So?”

“If I give it to you, I will die.” Lloyd’s voice broke.

“Is that so?”

“Yes. I didn’t mean for this to happen, but the Heart of Winter was absorbed into my manaheart and became a part of it. I can’t disintegrate the two even if I wanted to. If I force it, my manaheart and heart will get destroyed.”

“So?” It looked like Tyrannus wasn’t interested in whether Lloyd died or not.

“So, please forgive me for saying this, but I don’t think I can give it to you...”

“Really?”

“Yes. Moreover, your excellency…”

“It’s Ice Dragon Tyrannus.”

“Oh? I see... Great Ice Dragon Tyrannus. Please forgive me for asking this, but you said you want the Heart of Winter back. Does this mean that it was once yours in the past?”

“No.”

“Then-”

“I’m the one who made it.”

Lloyd’s was out of things to say. Tyrannus’s eyes grew icy.

“I don’t know if you know, but I created the Heart of Winter and gave it to my human friend Mikael Magentano a few hundred years ago when he founded the kingdom.”

Lloyd gaped.

“I still remember the moment,” went on Tyrannus. “How joyful he was. So was I. Even though I suffered a cold from overworking myself to create it, I figured that my gift would provide my friend and his descendants with eternal prosperity.”

“...”

“Yet, you appeared and absorbed the Heart of Winter a few months ago,” snarled Tyrannus.

“D-Did you feel it happen?” Lloyd could feel that things were going very badly for him.

“Yes, I did.”

“...”

“And yet,” continued Tyrannus. “I let you be because I believed that the Heart of Winter followed where destiny guided it. But this wasn’t the case. As if it wasn’t enough for you to absorb the gift, you abused it for your own benefit. Like now.”

Tyrannus scanned the sky with his cold eyes, surveying the ice wall and the frozen scene outside. At last, his stringent gaze came back and fixed on Lloyd.

“The moment I realized it, I figured I shouldn’t let you be. That’s why I flew all the way here to get the Heart of Winter back.”

“Um...”

“Speak if you have something to say.”

“Please, f-forgive me,” Lloyd spoke sulkily. “But as I have told you, I’ll die if I give it to you.”

“So? Does that mean you can’t give it to me?”

“...”

Tyrannus bent over closer to Lloyd. “Do you dare think that I came all the way here to receive your permission?”

At the cross warning, Lloyd’s voice broke further. “N-No, but-”

“I could have decimated all life here, including you, if I wanted to. That way, I would have been saved from this cumbersome conversation and retrieved the Heart of Winter with much more ease.”

“...”

“But I kindly extend mercy by saying only your life will be sacrificed. Do you still feel wronged?”

“Yes.”

“What...?” Tyrannus frowned. “You feel wronged?”

“I do.” Abruptly, Lloyd lifted his chin and stood confidently in spite of the dragon’s icy gaze. He spoke in a clear voice and widened his eyes. But not because he suddenly had a surge of courage or gave up under the immense pressure on him. In fact, he was on cloud nine inside.

Nice. It’s actually a good thing if he came here not to steal the Heart of Winter but to kill me!

This was it. This was it! Right before the dragon could give any reaction, Lloyd immediately and preemptively said, “I am under the sponsorship of the Dragon King.”

“Hmm...?”

“I am the patron of the great king, Dragon King Verkis. That being said, you cannot thoughtlessly kill me. That would be even more improper for a civilized dragon like you, Lord Tyrannus.” Lloyd’s voice turned more lighthearted as he reasoned with him.

This time, Tyrannus was the one left speechless. Lloyd puffed up his chest proudly and flashed a wide smile.

Yes! This is what I’m talking about!

Lloyd exclaimed happily. His heart had dropped when the terrifying dragon demanded him to cough up the Heart of Winter. Lloyd was scared that the divine item would be confiscated from him regardless of his will. But come to think of it, there was a way out.

If I give the Heart of Winter, I’ll die. And if this dragon kills me, he’d be directly opposing a sponsorship of the Dragon King.

If the creature under his nose was a different monster, none of this would have mattered. But since he was a dragon, it did matter. After all, the Dragon King was the representative and leader of every dragon. Even the most reckless, wild dragon would not so thoughtlessly hurt him. That was why Lloyd went for this plan, and it had an immediate effect.

“Is it true that you’re a patron of the Dragon King?” asked Tyrannus.

“It is the truth,” emphasized Lloyd.

“Are you sure?”

“Yes.”

“Let’s see.” The dragon’s gaze on Lloyd changed meaningfully. Something must have been detected. A glow soon appeared in his eyes. “It’s true.”

“Thank you for acknowledging it.” Lloyd was relieved that his random attempt to save himself worked.

“Tsk,” grumbled Tyrannus, “I didn’t know it was a human that received that brat’s support.”

Just then, Lloyd wondered if he had heard it right. “Pardon? A brat...? Do you know the Dragon King?”

“I do.”

“May I ask what your relationship with him is...?”

Lloyd wondered from the address, “brat,” if they were on bad terms. Perhaps that was why Tyrannus was bent on killing him? When Lloyd’s nervous question was spoken aloud, Tyrannus snorted and spoke.

“He’s my enemy.”

“Enemy...?”

“Yes. He’s my son.”

“Eh...?” Lloyd’s mouth slightly opened.

“Verkis is my son.”

“Ahahaha. My, the King of Kings!”

“...”

“I was completely foolish not to have noticed such an honorable being! Allow this menial human to introduce himself to you once more.”

This was a complete surprise for Lloyd. Dragon King Verkis was related to Tyrannus? What was this? A soap opera? Lloyd bowed down to the floor without hesitating as soon as he heard him.

“Are you trying to flatter me?” Tyrannus’s voice signaled that he wasn’t liking the kiss-my-ass at all.

“Yes...”

“Do you think I will let you keep the Heart of Winter if you do that?”

“B-But as I have told you, my life will be-”

“That’s not my problem.” His voice and gaze were now adamant. “Your sponsorship from Verkis is important, but the promise I made to my friend is equally important. Moreover, my promise existed long before your sponsorship did.”

“Yes, so that means-”

“You catch on quickly. I like that. It means that my promise with Mikael has more precedence and significance than yours.”

“...”

“And I cannot even feel a drop of Mikael’s blood in your body. I take it that you are not one of his offspring. Am I right?”

“Right,” Lloyd replied softly.

“Then you do not have the qualification to own the Heart of Winter. You have even less of a right to misuse the Heart of Winter.”

“...”

“So, I shall take it now-”

“Wait!” Lloyd shrieked. “I am a faithful subject of Alicia Termina Magentano, the offspring of the heroic king Mikael!”

“That doesn’t make you a part of his bloodline,” Tyrannus reminded.

A sense of panic rushed through Lloyd.

“Do you have any plans to marry anyone from the royalty?”

“Th-that’s...” Lloyd’s face turned crimson red.

“You do not.”

Thousands of alarms went off in Lloyd's brain.

"Then I will take the Heart of Winter. I hope for you to rest in peace before then. Your death is a pitiful one. But at the same time, it is inevitable, so do not be too sad about it."

"..."

"You won't feel a thing."

Grrrr... A frightening volume of frigid air began to spill out of the dragon, and he easily turned the Heart of Winter into a broken air conditioner. The solemn gusts of wind reflected that his death sentence was non-negotiable.

What should I do?

Lloyd gulped dryly.

Should I fight him together with Javier?

Lloyd quickly stole a glance to the side. He saw Javier's hand getting closer to his sword. Draggy, too, crawled its body to charge at the dragon at any moment. One signal, and they were ready to charge at Tyrannus. But Lloyd shook his head.

No! We can't outpower that thing. We'll all die if we try to fight.

That'd be the worst possible outcome. Javier dying was the absolute worst thing that could happen.

He's the main character of this world.

Lloyd couldn't imagine what this world would be like without its main hero. And besides that, he simply didn't want Javier to sacrifice himself because of him. Surely, the knight wanted to avoid his own death as well.

Think! Rack your brain! There's got to be a way out!

Lloyd desperately racked his brain. The deathly Ice Dragon Tyrannus. Chaotic centaurs. Javier and Draggy are ready to charge. As he looked at everyone, Lloyd pondered what he could do.

He reviewed all the excuses he could use, a variety of different scenarios, and potential outcomes he could think of. Anything. He examined, analyzed, and predicted everything he could until something popped into his head.

Just then, he raised his head. This was it. This was the surefire way to trigger the dragon and bait. Feeling confident that he'd win with no doubt, Lloyd screamed at the top of his lungs at Tyrannus, who was seconds before casting a magic spell at Lloyd.

"Tell me something! Want to see if a punch from me will make you vomit?"

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 300: Let’s Make a Wager (2)

“Tell me something! Want to see if a punch from me will make you vomit?”

Punch...! Punch...! Punch…! Lloyd’s shouts echoed across the plain and pierced into Tyrannus’s ears.

“What?” Flustered, Tyrannus cocked his head. A dumbstruck smile escaped it. “What gibberish are you talking about? Are you asking me whether a punch from you will make me, a dragon, vomit?”

“Yes!” Lloyd shut his eyes and yelled.

“Have you lost your grip on reality out of sheer fright?”

“No!!!”

“I believe you have. But do not be too afraid. It will be painless. Loosen up. Everything will all be over as you slowly lose consciousness like someone drifting into sleep,” appeased Tyrannus.

Fwoosh... Tyrannus was still preparing to cast his magic even as he smirked and cocked his head.

Lloyd hurriedly yelled, “I have not lost my mind! I am serious! Are you avoiding my question because you’re scared?”

Scared...! Scared...! Scared... The shout echoed into Tyrannus’s ears again. A furrow appeared in between his brows.

“Ha!” puffed Tyrannus. “Scared?! Me?”

“Yes! I actually have a very strong punch!”

Lloyd held up his fist and boldly swayed it around. Then he slammed the ground after depositing amplified mana into his fist. A rock on the ground cracked sideways. He confidently stared up at the ice dragon.

“What now? Did you see that?”

“Ha...”

The scoff on Tyrannus’s face deepened. His eyes contained dismay as they looked down on Lloyd. “You struck me by surprise. You are as transparent as a glass. I can see right through you. You just threw a weak punch on purpose to bait me into your game, didn’t you?”

“Yes, that’s right!”

“Do you think your shallow tactic would work on me?”

“Yes!”

“Why is that?”

“Because one way or another, I’m going to lose!”

Lose...! Lose...! Lose...

Lloyd’s shout, which had turned sorrowful, traveled into Tyrannus’s ears again. His eyes were wet with tears. Rubbing his hands and pathetically pleading to Ice Dragon Tyrannus, Lloyd wailed, “The truth is, even my mighty punch will be nothing to you. But please think about it. My death is inevitable in any case, but I’ll be able to die with a little more peace if you entertain my silly bet...”

“Hmm.”

“So, I entreat you, Great Ice Dragon Tyrannus. Could you please grant a dying man’s wish and accept my wager?”

“Tsk,” tutted Tyrannus, “But does the wager really have to be over a punch?”

“Yes. I would like it to be.”

“Why?”

“So that...” Lloyd’s voice broke. “I’ll have something to brag about in the underworld. I’ll be able to say I punched the pit of a dragon’s stomach when I was alive. Please grant this one wish. Think of it as gifting me a brag-worthy experience before you send me to the underworld, would you?”

“...”

“You suddenly appeared to confiscate the Heart of Winter, even when doing so would kill me, and I’ve been holding onto it without any problems until now. I am sure you could at least extend that act of kindness, won’t you?” And now, tears began to roll down from Lloyd’s eyes. They ran down his cheeks and dropped to the ground. His nose started to get wet. But Lloyd didn’t care about his unsightly appearance.

Of course, my words aren’t sincere! How could I be sincere right now?

Lloyd didn’t need any story to brag about in Hell. He only wanted to make it out alive and survive this situation as slaving away on earth was much better than in the underworld. As such, his large drops of tears were all part of an act.

“So, please,” howled Lloyd. “Think about it, Your Excellency. I am an honored patron of the Dragon King. Even though you say you’ll kill me regardless of that fact, don’t you still feel a bit guilty about it? But if we make a wager, you will have a good reason to do it, Lord Tyrannus, I mean, Great Dragon King! Won’t it?”

“Hmm,” observed Tyrannus, “That way, I won’t be thoughtlessly killing a human sponsored by my son, Verkis.”

“That’s exactly right! That would be a completely different story. Why? Because then you would be killing me for a justifiable reason.”

“That does seem true...”

“Doesn’t it, My King? Doesn’t it?”

“Hmm...” Tyrannus mused as he nodded.

Come to think of it, he has a point.

It was true. Tyrannus felt slightly uncomfortable about killing a patron of his son, Dragon King Verkis. It was the case even if he was doing so to confiscate the Heart of Winter.

But it'll be another story once I accept the wager since betting is an act of mutual agreement and promise.

So, even if I kill that man, Tyrannus thought, it will be justified as it had been done under mutual consent. Thus, his reputation wouldn't be damaged in any way.

At last, Tyrannus nodded. "I see. You have a point."

Psssh... Lloyd heaved a sigh of relief when he saw the dragon pause his magic spell. "Thank you for granting the wish of an irrelevant human!" cried Lloyd in a shaky voice as he wiped tears off his face.

"It's nothing."

"I appreciate it from the bottom of my heart!"

"Let's get right to it."

"Yes." Lloyd's voice was lighter now. "I wish to set the rules to the wagers first."

"Rules to the wagers?"

"Yes." Lloyd nodded and reeled off, "A man's life is at stake. Wouldn't it be better to set down the rules so no one will argue about them later?"

"Well, you are right."

"That's why the rules must be determined."

"Well... Suit yourself."

“Thank you. In short, I am going to lay one punch to the pit of your stomach. The exact location will be in your upper abdomen, and you are not allowed to defend yourself in any way.”

“I just have to get punched once?”

“Yes.”

“And what if I’m unharmed?” asked Tyrannus.

“Then you win. But if you vomit, I win.”

“Ha. Vomit? Well, fine.”

“Thank you for your generosity.”

“Don’t thank me. Your punch won’t be enough to make me retch. Anyhow, if I win, I’m taking the Heart of Winter. Happy?”

“Yes. But if I win, I keep the Heart of Winter.”

“I accept. Although, that won’t happen.”

“Well… I can’t disagree with you.” Lloyd sighed with a bitter and wistful gaze.

Slightly feeling pitiful for Lloyd, Tyrannus asked, “Are we doing it here?”

“No. I would like for us to move somewhere else.”

“Move? Why?”

“We are in the village of the centaurs right now.”

“So?”

“If you really throw up against all odds by chance, it’ll be troublesome for the centaurs here.”

“Haha. There is no way I will throw up.”

“I think so, too,” reasoned Lloyd, “But you can never be too careful.”

“Tsk... Fine.”

Tyrannus was struck by surprise once again. The more he conversed with that human, the more flustered he became. But he was willing to grant the dying man’s wish.

He didn’t rudely resist or fight back because he didn’t want to die.

That part about Lloyd pleased Tyrannus. Eventually, he nodded.

“All right. We will move to wherever you desire.”

“Thank you! Thank you!”

“Get moving now.”

“Yes!”

Lloyd clenched his fists and swiveled in a hurry, smothering a smile. He strutted out of the village, past the gazes of the terrified centaurs who were watching him and Tyrannus in their stables.

“Master Lloyd, have you gone mad?” Javier, who immediately came to his side, whispered seriously. “What do you mean you’ll punch the dragon and make him vomit? Do you have a plan in mind?”

“Yeah.”

“You cannot possibly think this is possible.”

“I do. Of course, I do.” Lloyd grinned with a smile. “And I’m going to win this wager.”

“How on earth will you do that?”

“Skillfully.”

Javier was rendered speechless. He tried to make sense of Lloyd’s plan but failed. He was planning to make the dragon vomit by merely punching the pit of his stomach?

Javier’s face clouded with worry. Could it be that Lloyd lost his ability to make proper judgments? And was that the reason why he bet his life on such a hopeless and impossible bet? Javier wondered. Could it be that the sudden appearance of the menacing dragon and his deadly demands propelled him to make a poor decision? Could that be the reason behind his foolish confidence?

“Master Lloyd.” Javier stared at Lloyd with an unsmiling look.

“Yeah. What?”

“This will not do.” Javier’s voice dripped with alarm.

“What won’t?”

“You are making a bad decision here. It’s not too late now. Prepare yourself, Master Lloyd.”

“For what?” Meanwhile, Lloyd’s voice was cheery.

“To run away. I will buy you some time.”

“You plan on fighting that dragon?”

“Yes.”

“Tsk. Don’t even try.”

“But Master Lloyd. Now is your last chance-”

“Do I look like I’ve gone mad?” said Lloyd.

“…”

“Answer me. Do I look like someone who’s lost his mind?”

Javier was about to answer yes when Lloyd spoke first. “Who was it that said he would trust in my seemingly deranged behavior?”

“...”

“You said that,” reminded Lloyd. “Those were your words. It goes the same right now. Do I look like I’ve lost it? In that case, trust me.”

“But Master Lloyd-”

“I’m doing this for a reason.” Lloyd didn’t let Javier finish. “I’ve got a plan. So, do what you have to do when I fail. Got it?”

“...”

“When that happens, I won’t need to be convinced to run for my life. Okay, we’re here.”

Lloyd stopped. They were hundreds of yards away from the Stone and Wind tribe and near the creek that provided drinking water to the centaur tribe.

“Great Tyrannus, this is the place where I wish we complete our wager.”

“Is that so? This doesn’t seem to be a particularly special place.” Tyrannus spoke after surveying around.

“That should be the case. To be honest, I just wanted to prepare myself during my walk here,” confessed Lloyd.

“Is that why you whispered to that silver-haired fellow beside you?”

“Yes, I wanted to at least bid farewell to him.”

The confident smile Lloyd had flashed toward Javier on his way was no longer there. The moment he turned to face the dragon, he put on the saddest face he could pull off to match the I-am-going-to-die-soon and I-don’t-want-to-die energy.

“Please get ready,” Lloyd said as he looked up at the dragon, biting his underlip. His face was slightly pale. “Please stand over there.”

“I will do that.”

Boom! Stomp! Tyrannus got into position.

Lloyd tilted his head a little. “I am really sorry about this, but could you take half a step to your left?”

“Why is that?”

“I fear my punch will not land properly from where you are standing right now. This is my only chance, so I wish to give it my best shot.”

“If you say so,” the dragon snorted, thinking that Lloyd would lose anyway and doing what he was told to. In the process, his left foot went into the creek.

Splash! Even though the creek was relatively deep, going down as low as the waist for the humans, the dragon didn’t care at all because he was gigantic. To him, stepping into a 3-foot-deep creek was the same as a human stepping on a slightly wet bathroom tile.

“Well then, let us begin.”

Grrrr... The dragon stood on his two feet and raised his forearms high in the air, revealing his abdomen toward Lloyd.

“Come at me, human.”

“I know.”

Lloyd nodded. Wearing a determined face, he climbed the dragon’s hind leg like he was hiking, moving past the thigh and stomach until he reached the dragon’s upper abdomen.

“I will punch you now.”

“Be my guest.”

Lloyd raised his right fist and clenched it tight. Then he thrust it ahead. His fist was bare, without being supported by his mana or mana circle rotation. The punch was superbly mediocre. The same went for the sound of its impact.

Bam! A soft thumping sound arose like someone hit a table with their fist. That was it. Ten seconds passed. Nothing consequential took place. The sight drained color from everyone’s faces. Javier gravely grabbed his sheath. Draggy got ready to charge. Tyrannus broke into laughter.

“Okay,” announced Tyrannus, “I accepted to make a wager as you said. Here is the result. To your misfortune, nothing happened to me despite your punch-”

Just then, right before Tyrannus could finish his victory speech...

Ding dong.

[<Upper Abdomen! Upper Abdomen! Upper Abdomen!> has been activated.]

[You have struck the abdomen of someone under 20 inches of water. The condition “Any terrain that has a water level of above 20 inches, which includes seas, rivers, lakes, and bathtubs” has been satisfied.]

[The <Upper Abdomen Jab> that enables you to empty anyone’s stomach with just one jab has been activated.]

A welcoming message appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes. At the same time...

Blerghh!!! Ice Dragon Tyrannus vomited.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 301: Let’s Make a Wager (3)

Ding dong.

[The <Upper Abdomen Jab> that enables you to empty anyone’s stomach with just one jab has been activated.]

The lovely message appeared in front of Lloyd’s eyes. At the same time...

Bergh! Ice Dragon Tyrannus clutched his stomach as he vomited and shivered from head to toe. But he didn’t bend over like the humans do. His whole body lurched backward instead, facing the sky as his stomach gurgled and majestically threw up.

Fwoosh! But what came out from his stomach was a cold and frigid gush of air, and as the blow jetted into the sky. The oxygen and moisture inside froze into snow that started to heavily fall on the ground. It was only then that Tyrannus stopped gagging.

“Urk! Cough! Argh!” groaned Tyrannus.

Everyone was at a loss for words. All the spectators fell into a shell-shocked silence. Javier who was anxiously watching as he grabbed his sheath, Draggy who was anxiously firing up his determination to protect Lloyd, and the terrified centaurs who were observing the scene from a distance became utterly speechless. Was it because of the dragon’s majestic gagging? Or, because of the resulting heavy, artificial snowfall? It was neither.

How is it possible for a human to empty a dragon’s stomach?

When their train of thought reached that point, everyone’s gaze traveled to the same spot where Lloyd was standing with clenched fists.

I did it!

Lloyd exclaimed inwardly. He had taken a risk on this. It turned out he had made the right choice.

It worked. I knew the title effect would work just as it was advertised.

Just then, Lloyd's mind flew back to the title he received back in the Mermaid Kingdom and its effects.

I can empty anyone's stomach if they're in a body of water with a depth of at least twenty inches.

That was what the Upper Abdomen Jab was meant to do. It was what Lloyd had put all his trust in when he daringly suggested his bet and fooled everyone, including Ice Dragon Tyrannus.

I mean, who could have expected this to happen? A human caused a dragon to throw up with a punch? Lloyd would have scoffed if he, too, didn't know about the title effect.

Anyway, it worked. This is what I call a real scam.

Lloyd looked up with a smile on his face and met Tyrannus's gaze that darted down at Lloyd. The latter's gaze was filled with dismay.

"How... did you do it?" muttered Tyrannus as he rubbed his belly.

"Um, I simply did my best," Lloyd replied in an equally but feigned voice of dismay.

"You did what? Your best?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"Do you seriously expect me to believe that?"

"Um," Lloyd said as he cleared his throat. "To be honest, I don't know how else to explain myself." He flashed a troubled smile. There was really no way he could explain the system of title and skill options to the dragon. "I genuinely put in my best effort. I believe that the heavens have allowed this miracle to take place due to my sincerity."

"..."

“I am being sincere, Your Excellency,” pressed Lloyd.

“Really?” asked Tyrannus.

“Yes, really.”

“Truly?”

“Yes, truly.”

“Hmm... There’s something off about your words, but it’s not like I’ve got any other choice given the results.” Tyrannus frowned as he looked down at Lloyd. What kind of leery situation was this? A mere punch from a human made him vomit? Tyrannus couldn’t wrap his head around it.

It’s strange. It’s so strange. He didn’t even put any mana into his punch. And there wasn’t any big impact either.

Tyrannus honestly barely felt anything, even after the impact. Not even a tingle. He was about to announce his triumph when suddenly his stomach knotted up and emptied itself. He shook his head.

I definitely didn’t feel much physical force.

For someone to make him vomit using sheer force, it had to at least be the archangel of Heaven or the King of Hell. Their punches would be the only ones that could bring about the same effect.

Or my wife.

Tyrannus thought of his wife, Fire Dragon Kalidis.

Anyway, this is one strange fellow. There is definitely something about him that I don’t know about.

Therefore, something else other than his powerless punch would have brought about this effect. Tyrannus suddenly became curious and wanted to know the secret. There was no other way of finding that out other than acknowledging his defeat.

“I see...” His gaze on Lloyd softened. “I frankly do not know what kind of scheme you resorted to, but a wager is a wager. Since you managed to empty my stomach, you win. Therefore, you can keep the Heart of Winter.”

“D-Do you really mean it?” Lloyd exclaimed.

“Of course.” A wry smile appeared on Tyrannus’s face. After all, we made a bet, and a bet is a promise.

I could lose my dragon power if I break a promise.

Dragons held the great power to cast magic only with their words, and the powers of their words rested on fulfilling them. Thus, any actions from a dragon that caused them to break a promise made them lose the power of their words. Unreliable words lost their effect, which eventually led to the loss of the power a dragon held in their words.

I cannot lose my dragon power like this.

It never occurred to Tyrannus that he’d lose the bet. The wry smile deepened. “Do I mean it, you ask? Do you think I’d go back on my word?”

“Oh... That’s...” murmured Lloyd as he scratched his head.

“Never mind,” replied Tyrannus, “Anyway, a wager is a wager. Since you won, I won’t confiscate the Heart of Winter from you. But are you sure you are all right with that?”

“Excuse me?”

“If you keep the Heart of Winter, you’ll experience a bad side effect from it.”

“A side effect?” Lloyd cocked his head to the side in mild disbelief. A side effect? Lloyd suddenly had misgivings about the former’s words. But the response that came back to him was a sincere one.

“Since it’s a divine item that produces such strong frigid air, it places a great burden on a human’s heart and manaheart. It might now show now, but over time, your whole body will start to freeze. Slowly, before you even realize it.”

“My body will start to freeze?” Lloyd’s voice was a pitch higher.

“Yeah.” Tyrannus nodded his head. “The mana circulating through your body will fill with cold air, and over time, it will settle in your organs. By the time you notice any symptoms, it will be too late. If I were to compare it to a human disease... Aha. It would be similar to cancer.”

“No way.” Lloyd gulped dryly.

He doesn’t seem to be lying about this.

Lloyd asked, “Is there a way to prevent this side effect from affecting me?”

“Of course, there is. Do you want me to tell you?”

“Yes, please.”

“It’s simple. You just have to absorb a divine item with an opposing nature to the Heart of Winter.”

Lloyd mused, “Would that be to neutralize the cold air with heat?”

“That’s exactly right. Have you ever heard of the Tears of Summer?”

“I did...”

“You’re smart.”

“Ugh...” Lloyd choked up. “Thank you.”

“But why do you look like you’re about to cry?”

“How can I not?” Lloyd replied, holding back his tears and snots. “The Tears of Summer is one of the three divine items belonging to the House of Magentano.”

“Indeed.”

“That’s why I’m tearing up.”

“Why is that?”

“I can’t think of any way to consume it.”

“...”

“Ha...” sighed Lloyd heavily. “It was backbreaking work to clean up the mess that came after absorbing the Heart of Winter. I don’t know how I will butter up the queen to be able to consume something else. And it isn’t like I am asking for an extra scoop of ice cream. What’s wrong with my life, really? Haah.”

Tyrannus didn’t say anything while Lloyd berated his fate at the same moment. Lloyd’s instinct clearly told him that the dragon was telling the truth. In actuality, Lloyd could occasionally feel frigid air seeping from his mana after he came to own the Heart of Winter. The feeling grew particularly stronger when he froze the flow of time. As such, he couldn’t think lightly of the dragon’s warning.

“But Great Dragon Tyrannus,” whimpered Lloyd.

“Do speak.”

“About the side effects. How long do I have?”

“Do you mean how long will it take for you to fully feel the side effect I mentioned?”

“Yes.”

“Five years if fast. Ten if late. Happy?”

“I see,” sighed Lloyd. “That’ll be enough.”

“That’ll be enough? What do you mean?”

“Enough time to find the solution,” said Lloyd, “Right now, there is something more urgent for me to do than absorbing the Summer of Tears.”

“There is something more pressing than stopping the side effect of the Heart of Winter?”

“Yes.”

“I am curious what that could be.”

“It’s not much. I need to search for a couple of important materials for a project.”

“Important materials, huh.”

“Yes.”

“Since you’re looking for them here... Are you trying to rebuild the Jewel of Truth?”

Tyrannus’s sharp question made Lloyd flinch in surprise. “Yes, you’re right. Do you know what that is?”

“I do.” Tyrannus grinned. “It’s the building of wisdom that gives the wisest answer to any question. It was also the shining treasure of the mythical age, though it was destroyed during my grandfather’s time. I suppose you are looking for the materials necessary to reconstruct the building?”

“Yes. And it’s been a lot of work.”

“Why is that?”

“They’re too difficult to find.” Lloyd put on a genuinely bitter smile.

“They’re difficult to find?” Tyrannus responded with genuine surprise. “I doubt it.”

“Excuse me?”

“I know where everything is.”

“Where are those places?!” Lloyd’s eyes shimmered. Lloyd clutched the claw of the dragon’s hind leg.

Ice Dragon Tyrannus nonchalantly replied, “One is in your kingdom’s capital, Magenta. Another one is at the peak of a nearby mountain. Two of them are in my house, the ice cave. The last one is quite far away. Anyway, I’ve stolen and brought two home a long time ago.”

“You’ve brought home two of them?”

“Yes. They were perfect to use as firm pillows.”

“...”

“But I began to prefer softer pillows about 800 years ago. It’s been a while since I last slept on a firm one. Do you want them?”

“Yes! Yes!” Lloyd nodded at lightning speed. Lloyd didn’t forget to poke around to check the dragon’s heart. “I am truly thankful, but I wonder as to why you are helping me...”

“Hmm?” Tyrannus asked as if he didn’t get what Lloyd was getting at.

“You don’t need money from me or anything like that, do you?”

“Tsk,” tutted Ice Dragon Tyrannus. “Do you think I am helping you because I want something in return?”

“Pardon? No.”

“Yeah, right.”

“...”

“I am simply acting out of curiosity. I am intrigued as to how you managed to empty my stomach with your powerless and mana-free punch. Yet, if you die early from the side effect of consuming the Heart of Winter, I will have no way to settle my curiosity."

"Oh, yes..."

"I am offering my help so you won't die early."

"In summary, are you helping me to make more time for you to settle your curiosity?" Lloyd questioned the dragon.

"That's exactly right."

"..."

"The thing is, even if I help you, humans only live up to 100 years at best. It'll be easier for me to retrieve the Heart of Winter when that time comes for you."

Lloyd clamped his mouth shut. Now, he was enlightened of the reason behind the dragon's generosity. Nothing was free in this world, indeed. However, it wasn't time for Lloyd to be picky.

I should be thankful he's even willing to give me all the key materials for the jewel.

It was rather time for him to bow down to the floor in utter gratitude. Right now, he needed to focus on the pressing matter in front of him, which was stopping the damned restoration of destiny by building the Jewel of Truth. Who cared if Tyrannus forced him to resolve his curiosity later on or performed experiments on him?

"Understood. Thank you. By the way, Your Excellency..." Lloyd's voice faded as he spoke.

"What is it this time?"

"You said two of the materials are in your ice cave, and the other one is somewhere quite far."

“Oh, the last one? Do you want to know where it is?”

“Yes. If you could extend your kindness to me...”

“Kindness?” Tyrannus snorted. By now, it was clear to Tyrannus. This human was brazen and audacious. But something was marvelous about him as well, which made him hard to hate despite his shameless character. Lloyd was somehow ridiculous yet cute at the same time. He made Tyrannus feel the same emotions as he did while watching a pill bug struggle to climb a small hill. Naturally, his voice softened.

“Well, that won’t be too difficult to do. Actually, there was a time when my son was engrossed in researching dimensional shifting magic.”

“Dimension... shifting, you say?”

“Yes. Dimensional shifting. Anyway, he used to send stuff to other dimensions for experimental purposes. He tried it on everything he could lay his hands on that wasn’t a valuable good. And the last key material for the jewel you’re looking for was one of them.”

“Woah.” Lloyd gaped. Another dimension? He suddenly felt like a thick, murky cloud was hanging over him. How on earth was he supposed to find that?

“Then, which dimension was the last key construction material sent to?” asked Lloyd, feeling bleak.

Tyrannus grinned. “Seoul.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 302: How to Allure the Dragon King (1)

Seoul. The capital of South Korea. It was one of the busiest cities in the world, where ten million people lived crammed in the confines of an urban jungle. Life in this city was quite a dynamic one.

Even before the sun rose, cleaners went out to sweep the litter on the streets away. When the sun rose, salespeople rushed to their offices to close an important deal, white-collared employees hurriedly crossed the crosswalk to be at their office on time, and bus drivers drove them all to work. Taxi drivers weaved into several lanes to get a head start over the buses as fried chicken business owners watched the traffic war from afar. Students would send a text to those business owners about an interview application for part-time jobs, while the reports they submitted to their professors would be received with tongue-clicking. Delivery men, on the other hand, would receive credit cards from those professors to buy them lunch. Seoul. It was the city where everyone strove to live their best life, each in their own special way.

And now, several dimensions away, in the guest chamber of the Frontera family's manor that sat on the eastern mountain range of the Lorasian continent, was Dragon King Verkis, roughly scratching his side. S*nore... Phew...*

His sleeping position was impeccable. It was the perfect image of leisure and relaxation in every respect. When the morning sunlight streamed through the curtains, Verkis slowly scratched his side in an andante tempo. When the soft breeze blew, he scratched his belly in allegretto. And when the sound of servants was heard from the outside, his hand went further up to his chest and scratched flashily in prestissimo as though he was Jimi Hendrix.

However, he never ever opened his eyes throughout his entire scratching session. They were too heavy to be opened up, and it would be bothersome to allow light in them. But more than anything else, sleeping was his passion. And that was why he had been dozing off in bed for the past couple of months now. His relaxed and leisurely lifestyle was something the people of Seoul would sorely envy.

Dragon King Verkis cared about nothing at all. He never allowed himself to be awakened. No one in Frontera County could dare wake him up. Many, including the Skeleton Corps, took up the challenge and dutifully followed Lloyd's instructions to wake him up. They yelled, hit drums and zings, and partied and danced around in the room. But Dragon King Verkis never woke up. The dragon merely slept in the guest chamber like the bum he was.

And on this ordinary, sunny morning today, on behalf of those who failed to accomplish the mission for the past few months, a man with a meaningful smile on his face quietly opened the door and entered the room.

"Ha... My dragon king. He's still sleeping like a baby." Lloyd chuckled. He couldn't help it.

He looks exactly the same as when I left him to find the Jewel of Truth.

It really was. The sight was so stupendous that it was almost admirable. Lloyd soon shook off the feeling. It wasn't time to just stare at the dragon in admiration.

I have to go to Seoul to find the last key construction material.

The smile on his face was now gone. Memories of the past few days flooded back to him, the events that took place right after he won the bet against Ice Dragon Tyrannus on the Klamath Plain.

***

"Seoul."

"Excuse me...?" Lloyd cocked his head in puzzlement when he heard the dragon's answer.

What did he just say?

Could it be that he heard him wrong? Could it be that his ears had gone mad after the pent-up tension in him disappeared? Lloyd unwittingly cast a doubtful gaze and wanted to ask Tyrannus if he could repeat himself. But it looked like the latter noticed Lloyd's shock. He gave his response once more to Lloyd's gratitude.

"I said, Seoul. Did you hear me this time?"

"Yes..." mumbled Lloyd. "I heard you."

"It's a city in a different dimension from ours. It is a bustling and luxurious capital of a country with a dense population. Have you ever heard of it?" asked Tyrannus.

"No," Lloyd immediately replied. Observing Javier quietly, Lloyd added, "I have never heard of the place. But in another dimension... What do I have to do?"

Even though Lloyd couldn't outwardly express his dismay as Javier was beside him, he felt dumbstruck.

What is happening? Why is Seoul even mentioned in this world? And how on earth am I supposed to get there?

Lloyd felt stuck. He couldn't think of any way to cross to the other dimension. In fact, he hardly wanted to go there. What if he travels and can never return to this place ever again? Tyrannus, completely unaware of Lloyd's internal conflict, flashed a meaningful smile at him.

"What should you do? Hmm. How about you follow me first?"

"By that, you mean..." Lloyd left his words hanging.

"The best course of action would be to unfreeze the flow of time first, gather the rest of the key materials you can find here, and then hear my answer to your question. Wouldn't it?"

"You're right." Lloyd nodded. The dragon was right. Now that he learned where all the key construction materials were located, with some of them stashed in the dragon’s ice cave, getting his hands on them was his first priority.

“In that case, please excuse me.”

Lloyd closed his eyes. He focused on his manaheart and unfroze the flow of time. The domed ice wall that covered the region vanished. The frigid air that froze the flow of time around the world also dissipated.

[Time Freeze has been deactivated.]

Ziiing... Just then, his manaheart jerked. No, technically speaking, the Heart of Winter embedded into his manaheart started to feel drastically frigid.

Argh.

It felt like his heart was stuck next to a tub of frozen ice cream. His chest jerked and flinched by reflex. The frigid air, which used to melt away in a snap, lingered inside him like a piece of ice in the corner of a freezer and stayed glued to Lloyd’s heart. The frigid feeling persisted even after he employed the Asrahan Core Technique.

Tsk.

Lloyd sighed and opened his eyes. Now, it was clear to him.

The side effect Tyrannus told me about was real.

The side effect was real. Lloyd didn’t need an elaborate explanation of the mechanism behind it. He could simply feel it from the frigid air flowing inside him that refused to melt away. In addition, he could also foresee that it was going to worsen every time he used the Time Freeze skill.

Tsk. For now, I should absorb some heat using the Asrahan Core Technique and suppress this particular side effect as much as possible.

The most important matter at hand was stopping the restoration of destiny from happening. Reminding himself of this, Lloyd cranked into action. He bid farewell to the centaurs and flew to the icy mountain with Draggy, where he could grab hold of the Taupo. The reward that came to him was as sweet as he expected.

Ding dong.

[You have attained all sixteen pieces of the Taupo, a key construction material for the Jewel of Truth.]

[You have succeeded in excavating the key material of Aotearoa that was destroyed during the mythical age.]

[This is truly an impressive excavation that will be remembered in history.]

[When the Jewel of Truth is restored, your name will be remembered in history as the excavator who found this key material for its construction.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 2,200 RP.]

[Current RP: 3,955]

Yes!

Lloyd clenched his fists. This time, he earned 200 more RP than he expected. But Lloyd wasn't satisfied with that.

There are two more construction materials left that I can collect. So...

"Ice Dragon, I mean, Father of Great Dragon King Tyrannus?"

"Tsk... Let's go then!" urged Tyrannus right away, instantly catching what Lloyd was planning to say next.

Truly, the dragon's magic was amazing. One whisk of his finger, and everyone was teleported to another space. A pang of mild nausea hit Lloyd, and by the time he opened his eyes, he found himself in a completely different place. He was no longer standing on the icy mountain with biting winds. Instead, he was in the middle of a completely silent cave of ice where two key construction materials for the jewel were stashed.

“Do you see that?” asked Tyrannus as he pointed his finger at an area.

“Yes, I do,” answered Lloyd.

There were large and beautiful chunks of stones in the deepest part of the cave. “Hauraki” and “Takapuna” were the third and fourth key construction materials for the jewel. This time, Lloyd was awarded 2,400 and 2,600 RP, respectively. In total, they added up to 5,000 RP. Thanks to that, he now held 8,955 RP in his inventory.

But Lloyd was barely satisfied. It didn’t matter if he had 5,000 RP or 50,000 RP. It was useless at this point in time. Right now, there was a more urgent and pressing matter.

Of course. The last key material for construction. I have to find that.

He had the last one to find. If not, the other key construction materials would be rendered useless. The strenuous efforts he had put into unearthing all of them would go down the drain. Lloyd wanted to avoid such a disastrous turn of events. He wanted to get his hands on the last key construction material, come hell or high water.

“So,” Lloyd said, “I have been thinking since a while ago... Does this mean that your son, Dragon King Verkis, can send me to Seoul...?”

“Ha. Is that what you guessed?” Tyrannus appeared to be genuinely impressed.

“Yes, since you said your son sent one of the key materials for the jewel to another dimension.”

“So, you guessed that he’d be able to similarly send you off to a different dimension?”

“Yes,” answered Lloyd casually.

“What a good guess. And a right one, too.”

“Oh, excuse me. Then...”

“What?”

“Can he send me back to Seoul and bring me back here?”

“Hmm. Maybe?” Tyrannus shrugged. “Dimension shifting is a complicated type of magic. It’s more difficult than you can possibly imagine. I can’t even properly use it, but Verkis can. He was the one who discovered it in the first place.”

“He did?”

“Indeed.” Tyrannus nodded. “Anyway, there are only two individuals in this world who can teleport something to another dimension at the exact time period and location as they desire and bring them back to where they came from.”

“There are two individuals?” Lloyd tilted his head to the side.

“Verkis and my daughter, Flores.”

“Verkis and Flores...”

“That’s right. My two genius children. Flores is on a trip right now, so I have no idea where she is. So, Verkis is the only one who can safely send you over to another dimension. For your information, he’d be sleeping lazily in his dragon cave in Gape-”

“No, he’s at my house now.”

“Eh?” Tyrannus stopped and looked at him as though he needed some elaboration. This time, Lloyd shrugged.

“He is probably relaxed in bed and asleep in my house at the moment. It’s a long story.”

“What happened?”

“Well, long story short...” Lloyd then went on to walk him through how he got the sponsorship from the Dragon King and how Verkis ended up in his fiefdom. The story made Tyrannus chuckle.

“Ha. Well. It’s like him. Very much so. Anyway, it’s time for you to go back home now, isn’t it?”

“I should, My Lord,” answered Lloyd, “Speaking of-”

“I’m not going,” Tyrannus retorted flatly.

“But I didn’t ask you to go to the Frontera Fiefdom with me yet.”

“You just did now in a very sneaky way.”

“...”

“Do not take my generosity for granted. It’s not something you’re entitled to,” adamantly warned Tyrannus.

“Please forgive me.” Lloyd inwardly clucked his tongue in remorse. He was about to ask Tyrannus if he could join him and convince Verkis to use his dimension-shifting magic on Lloyd. He figured things would be easier that way since Tyrannus was Verkis’s father. Tyrannus was right that Lloyd secretly expected to be given his help for a second there. But when the matter was brought out open, Lloyd realized what he had to do.

I should back off.

Lloyd gleaned from Tyrannus’s attitude that he might be crossing the line here, so he backed off clean and neat. But before that, he gently asked for one more favor to teleport them back to the fiefdom in one go.

And that was how Lloyd managed to arrive at the door of the guest’s chamber from the ice cave in mere seconds.

And how I came to see Verkis dawdling and idling around.

Lloyd chuckled. He instantly realized from the chamber and Verkis's state that this sleepyhead had never woken up while he was away. The latter must have slept to his heart's content, skipping the call to his wife every morning.

Well, that's a good thing for me. I have something to leverage against him for cooperation.

Lloyd grinned. After clearing his throat, he softly announced, "Dragon King Verkis... I brought your wife, the Dragon Queen, here."

The moment his soft whisper traveled into Verkis's eardrum… The Dragon King's closed eyes flew open.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 303: How to Allure the Dragon King (2)

“Um, my great king,” called Lloyd. “I brought your wife, the Dragon Queen, here.”

Thump!

What was that noise? The sound of his heart sinking? The tsunami of destruction charging at him? If not, was it a bell that tolled to announce the end of his lazy life of rotting in bed?

What?!

The Dragon King panicked in alarm. His wife was here? He brought her here? But there was some time left before my sweetheart came back from her trip! Yet, she’s here already?

She was, according to the voice. And instead of their cave, his wife arrived at the guest chamber of the Frontera Fiefdom where he was lazing around. What would happen next was obvious.

I can’t be scolded so openly like this!

Dragon King Verkis was an almighty and powerful dragon. However, right now, he was no different than all the other married men in the world. To save himself from the scolding of his enraged wife, he bolted upright from his bed as though he was never asleep. In 0.1 seconds, he rubbed his eyes which were swollen from sleep. In 0.2 seconds, he flipped his hair as he turned to the voice nearby. And in 0.3 seconds, his face froze.

“Eh...?” She wasn’t here. He couldn’t find his wife. Instead, he saw a man with a greasy face looking at him.

“My, dear Dragon King! Are you awake?!”

Verkis stared hard at the human before blurting, “Who are you?”

“Hahaha. It’s been a long time, my king. Do you not remember me?”

“No.”

“It’s Lloyd. Lloyd Frontera. You’re reliable! Beneficiary!” Lloyd uttered in a groveling tone.

“Oh, you,” replied Verkis as if it was all coming back to him now.

“Thank you for remembering me.”

“Don’t be. What are you doing here?”

“My, of course, I am here to wake you up to have a great morning.” Lloyd had a sickeningly sweet smile on.

Verkis’s eyes turned icy just as much. “And what about my sweetheart?”

“Eh?”

“My sweetheart,” replied Verkis, evidently annoyed.

“Oh, the Dragon Queen?”

“Yeah. I thought you brought her here.”

“I actually lied.”

Verkis dangerously glared at Lloyd, who didn’t lose his composure regardless. In a more brazen and shameless manner, Lloyd instead put on a genuine expression of a loyal man, “Yes, I know. I know how grave my sin is for daring to lie to you and interrupting your sweet nap. But the thing is, I didn’t have any other choice.”

“What do you mean?”

“The thing is, I am just an insignificant man who hopes that your heart will always be as peaceful and tranquil as a lake. For that reason, I could tell the moment I laid my eyes on you.”

“What?”

“That…” Lloyd said dramatically. “You have not woken up a single time in the past few months. And during this time, you have not called your wife in the morning either.”

“T-that’s-”

“It’s a disaster.” Lloyd interrupted. “Yes, yes, of course it is.”

“...”

“That was why I did it!” Lloyd raised his hands in the air as if he were doing an act. “I wanted to protect you!”

“Hey, hey,” Verkis said as he swayed his hands.

However, Lloyd was unperturbed. “Even if I got scolded! I believed I had the duty to wake you up! Even if it brought about a terrible punishment! As long as you can find happiness by calling your wife every morning! I thought that was enough!”

Verkis shot a confused look at Lloyd. “Why... are you crying?”

“That is right! I believe that the happiness of a family is of the utmost importance! I uphold the teachings of my wise ancestors’ who said that the peace of a family is the key to maintaining the order of life! For the happiness and wellness of your family! I risked any type of danger, suffering, and tribulation to act on my holy mission to wake you from your deep slumber!”

For a moment, Verkis didn’t say anything. “That’s why you resorted to lying?”

“Indeed,” Lloyd replied as he stood upright.

“As there will be a disaster if I don’t call my sweetheart every morning?”

“Yes.”

“Were you concerned that I’d get scolded?”

“I did, my king.”

“Really?”

“Of course.”

“Tsk,” Verkis tutted as he frowned. “I don’t think so.”

“I am being sincere. Truly. I mean what I said.”

“Breathe while you talk.”

“My sincerity leaves me with no room to breathe.”

“What if I say that you’re lying?”

“Don’t kill me, please.”

“What if I say no?”

“Still, don’t kill me, please.”

“What if I don’t feel like it?”

“Forgive me...” Lloyd fell face down. But he was still smiling because he was convinced that Verkis would never hurt him.

Of course. He hasn’t woken up a single time in the last few months while I was away to search for the jewel. I’m not the one in trouble. He is.

Just then, Lloyd recalled the event a while ago. When he was teleported to the corridor, he coincidentally overheard the conversation between his maid, Emily, and the others as they passed by.

They said that there was a man who had been asleep in the guest chamber for several months and that they were worried about him. Troubled, they say. But the count only told them to take good care of him.

Their chatter overheard by Lloyd allowed him to grasp what had been going on for the past few months.

The dragon king was so lazy he couldn't be bothered to wake up even once in the past few months. And so, there's no way he's been calling his wife in the morning. But seriously, what's wrong with this dragon? I even left stern instructions for Turtle Neck, Frozen Shoulder, and the other skeletons. They were to dance and party every morning to wake him up. How could he have still stayed asleep despite that?

A pang of admiration rushed through Lloyd. It was marvelous how the dragon could remain in a comatose state with what would have been going on. On one hand, Lloyd figured he could use this to his benefit. "My dear Dragon King, do you not feel troubled right now?"

"Me? Feel troubled? Why would I?"

"Haven't you not called your wife a single time while I was gone?"

At that, Dragon King Verkis clamped his mouth shut. It felt like Lloyd hit the nail on the head.

Lloyd smiled from ear to ear. "I believe I can assist you with this problem."

"Assist? Me?"

"Yes."

"How?" asked Verkis doubtfully.

"It's simple. If you could help me teleport to another dimension, I would be more than happy to offer my help in return, Dragon King."

Verkis huffed. "Are you trying to strike a deal with me now? How dare you."

Lloyd's smile broadened. "That's how important the deal will be to you, my king."

“So, how will you assist me?” Verkis crossed his arms.

“I will vouch for you.” Lloyd wiggled his brows.

“Vouch for me?”

“I mean when the Dragon Queen starts to scold you.”

“And?”

Lloyd adopted that theatrical tone again. “When that happens! I will do my best! To defend your actions.”

“You? Me? Against my sweetheart?”

“Yes.”

“You think you could do that?”

“I will try my best.”

“Hmm.” A look of doubt came over Verkis.

Lloyd immediately added, “My king, please think about it. I know you may not be fully awake from your sleep, but you’re in a massive predicament right now.”

“I am?”

“Yes.”

“How so?”

“Because you stopped trying to contact her after a few calls.”

Verkis couldn’t say anything.

Lloyd smoothly continued, “So, to put things into perspective, you tried to call her every morning a few months ago, but she ghosted, no, ignored you,

right?”

“Yes, she did.”

“But what did you do afterward?” asked Lloyd meaningfully.

“I just slept.”

Lloyd clapped. “That’s the problem!”

“...”

“Dragon King Verkis!” bawled Lloyd. “Consider her perspective. It seemed you were trying to contact her for a bit and showing remorse for breaking your promise. Then boom! You disappeared again after she rejected your calls for a few days to teach you a small lesson! She’s probably thinking, ‘Fine! Let’s see how far you can take this.’

“...”

“In other words,” Lloyd emphasized the latter words to make his point, “You’re in an even worse situation than not calling her at all.”

Slowly starting to get the situation he was in, Verkis muttered, “Then what am I supposed to do?”

“Beg on your knees. If possible, find a reliable ally who can vouch for you as well.”

“Are you suggesting that you’re that ally?”

“Yes.” It was working. He had fallen for his plan. Confident, Lloyd rattled on, “I’ll use all the wisdom and talent that’s in me. Your overflowing passion to bring peace to your family! The effort you’ve exerted to painstakingly open your eyes that are heavy with sleep every morning! The divine sacrifice you made of raising your body from bed! I will report everything in detail to the queen!”

“...”

“How does that sound?” asked Lloyd.

“Hmm, I’m a little touched.”

“Aren’t you?”

“Yeah,” remarked Verkis expressionlessly. “My heart is fluttering a bit from seeing an irrelevant human like you trying to defend me. It’s like watching a fruit fly declare it’ll protect me…or a roach.”

Lloyd raised an eyebrow.

“All right. Okay. It’s a deal. I’ll teleport you to another dimension.”

“Thank you!” Lloyd bowed his head. Lest the dragon king changed his mind, he immediately revealed his desired destination, “Then please send me to Seoul, South Korea in the early 21st century.”

“What am I, a taxi?”

“You know what a taxi is?”

“I’ve ridden it before. Anyway, 21st-century Seoul?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Oh, I see. You’re searching for one of the key construction materials for the jewel, aren’t you?”

“Ah, that is correct.”

“All right. Do you want me to send you now?”

“That would be my honor. Please make it a roundtrip.”

“Tsk. How meticulous of you,” the dragon muttered and got up from his bed. It looked like he was about to get ready to enable the dimension shifting. He started to draw something in the air. Lloyd waited with bated breaths to be teleported away. This was really happening. He was going to Seoul.

I will return no matter what.

While a part of him was excited, another part was scared that he might not be able to return. He hoped the dimensional shifting would be ready for operation as soon as possible. He wanted to travel alone this time without any company. The reason was...

“My dear Dragon King, please forgive me for asking you this, but please send me with him.”

It was because of Javier. The owner of the voice came into the room without any warning.

Ah.

Lloyd groaned to himself under his breath. And before the dragon could say something, Lloyd immediately spoke first.

“Javier? Are you planning to join me?”

“Yes, Master Lloyd.”

“But why?”

“I have to protect you,” remarked Javier matter-of-factly.

Lloyd grimaced. But only in his head. Now, he was doomed. Lloyd’s plan was to teleport to Seoul before Javier showed up. But now that Javier was here, the situation had become complicated.

Tsk. Seoul is a safe city, so I don’t need his protection. It’ll be a real fix if he joins me and sees that I’m familiar with the city...

Lloyd didn’t feel too comfortable with it. He was afraid that Javier would notice that he was familiar with the city, no matter how much he tried to hide it. He could unconsciously reveal his identity. Lloyd was worried. The problem, however, was that he had no excuse to prevent him from coming.

“What is wrong, Master Lloyd? Is there a problem?”

“Oh, no. It’s not that.” Lloyd masked his frustration.

“Then what is it?”

“We’re talking about traveling to another dimension. I’m afraid it might take a toll on the dragon king if both of us go together.”

Verkis, who was getting ready to cast the spell, happily interrupted their conversation. “That won’t be a problem at all.”

Crap! Lloyd’s face turned sulky. Upon seeing him, Javier thought to himself, I knew it. Seoul. That place must have something to do with fake Master Lloyd.

Javier received the feeling that it was the case when Tyrannus first mentioned Seoul.

That’s when Lloyd’s heart started racing.

Javier could sense it from his transcendental sense unique to grandmasters. Lloyd’s heartbeat rocketed at that moment. His hair bristled, and he broke out in a cold sweat. His reaction was too drastic for the location to be unfamiliar.

I should go with him.

For all he knew, Seoul could be the hometown of this fake Lloyd. If so, Javier risked the chance of exposing Lloyd to the temptation of settling in the world he belonged to. That was Javier’s biggest concern.

I have to stop that from happening.

Javier felt apologetic for thinking so, but he couldn’t allow Lloyd to leave this place. Settling back in Seoul was the last thing Javier would allow since he had become the pillar of the family. Losing him now was impossible. As such, Javier decided to surveil him just in case and use force to take him back, if necessary.

Javier casually asked, “Then do you have a reason why I should not join you to this place called Seoul?”

“Eh?” Lloyd scratched his head. “Of course not.”

“Aren’t you?”

“Truly.”

“Then I will go you. Like I always have,” Javier stressed the last words for effect.

Lloyd’s lips twitched while Javier suppressed his mile. At last, everything was all set for the dimension shifting.

“Everything is set. Are you guys ready?” asked Verkis.

Swaa....!

A magic circle with sixteen different layers appeared mid-air as Verkis moved his fingers, and each layer rotated, spun, and zoomed around until all of them wrapped around Lloyd and Javier.

Fwoosh! The starlights enveloped both of them until they burst, spread apart, and reproduced. They chatted, shouted, and chanted until they were absorbed into an unknown time and place and led them through the crevice of their new dimension.

Argh!

Lloyd’s stomach churned at the pang of nausea incomparably more serious than the teleportation magic. He couldn’t tell which side was up or down or which was light or darkness. But it was only short-lived.

Fwoosh! Amid the ripple of mana, as it dissipated, there appeared a familiar sight.

Honk, honk! Honk! A twelve-lane road with loud honking cars. Shiny neon signs and streetlamps were everywhere. Lloyd and Javier found themselves in the middle of rush hour at the Gwanghwamun intersection.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 304: Home Sweet Home (1)

Seoul was a busy city. The population was extremely dense for its small land mass, and everything was so centralized in the capital that it had become a societal issue. It was also the beacon of Korean culture or the so-called “hurry culture” that encouraged speediness whenever possible. When all of these elements came together during rush hour, several roads in Seoul transmogrified into a hellish congestion of traffic. One of these roads was in the central part of Seoul, the Gwanghwamun intersection.

Honk! Honk! Honk!

Inter-city bus drivers coming in from Paju and Goyang cities laid on the horns, and taxis joined the noise pollution as they weaved into the lanes. Countless drivers who wished to get home fast altered lanes here and there and turned on the blinking signal to thank the driver behind for their kindness in butting into the lane. As they did so, however, the road on the Sungnyemun Gate became more congested, and the screeching noise of the car honks grew louder. The plumes of smoke rose thicker. And for the first time ever, Javier Asrahan was confronted with the global issue of air pollution. The result?

“Ack! Hack!”

Javier suddenly broke out into a coughing fit that couldn’t be controlled. Right after he was teleported into another dimension, the air he breathed in this new world was...

It smells like the air inside a century-old bathroom.

It was horrendously awful. His throat stung each time he sucked in the terrible air, and his lungs heaved in terror.

The air here is comparable to... Hell.

Just then, Javier recalled the last time he was in Hell with Lloyd and its volcanic ash-filled air. The air quality in Seoul was exactly the same. No, in some ways, it was worse than how it was in Hell.

Honk! Honk! Vroom! There were honking sounds coming from every direction around him to Javier's dismay. Moreover, the metal carriages nearby were blinding him with their lights, and the bright streetlamps on the wide roads were also hurting his eyes. And the buildings here were so tall, he wondered how they were built.

It's a bleak and savage place.

Javier suppressed his grandmaster-level senses that were in a frenzy, trying to catch all the new sounds and simulations around him. Immediately turning off his senses to save himself from the overwhelming chaos, he studied how Lloyd was doing.

Lloyd, too, looked similar. His eyes widened in shock, his mouth was slightly open, and the muscles around him were tense. He was equally lost watching the scenery spanned in front of him. But Javier could feel the subtle difference.

He's acting.

That was what he looked like in Javier's eyes. Even though Lloyd was checking out this strange place with curiosity in his eyes, there wasn't innocent wonder in them. Instead, it seemed as if he was feeling nostalgic about the sight in front of him. And Javier was correct that was the exact emotion Lloyd was feeling.

Woah. Is this for real?

Lloyd's gaze surveyed around. He was in Seoul. The place he thought he had forgotten and would never come back to. The inter-city buses, taxis, and cars passed the Gwanghwamun intersection. And the flood of people clothed in all familiar styles. The throng of tourists. Unconcerned local passersby. This was a much too familiar scene for him but one he hadn't missed.

Tsk.

A strange feeling gripped Lloyd. He couldn’t show it because Javier was by his side and had to act as if it was his first time in the city. However, he couldn’t shake off the wistful feeling that rushed into his heart.

This needlessly reminds me of the past.

Lloyd didn’t have many good memories in Seoul even though he once lived in the city. His childhood wasn’t too bad. However, the last few years he spent there before his departure were the worst. Life had been particularly harsh for him back then.

Room rental. Construction site. Part-time. Room rental... My life was stuck in an endless cycle.

To earn his Civil Engineering License after graduating from college. That was the only goal that allowed Lloyd to endure through those harsh years, which didn’t even allow him to dream of relaxation or leisure. Lloyd had only recently escaped from leading that sort of life and put it all in the past. However, now that he was back here...

Those feelings from back then resurfaced again.

Lloyd felt pissed. If there was one, the good thing was that he was back as Lloyd Frontera.

It’s really a relief.

Lloyd looked at his hands and body. He was Lloyd Frontera in body and clothes. The same went for Javier. Lloyd immediately signaled to Javier, “Hey, wrap your sword tightly so it can’t be seen.”

“Yes, Young Master.”

They were in Seoul. No one wore a sword around their waist, and that was what Lloyd had told Javier before coming here. That was why he made Javier cover his sword with a cloth. Lloyd actually wanted to avoid bringing a sword altogether, but that would be too telling of his knowledge of Seoul.

As such, he simply instructed Javier to cover his sword with a cloth. Aside from the sword, several more things he had to check over.

“Remember what I told you? Don’t be too obvious,” reminded Lloyd. “Don’t walk around gaping awkwardly at everything you see like a country bumpkin.”

“I see,” said Javier. “But Master Lloyd.”

“What?”

“Isn’t it your first time here as well?” asked Javier accusingly.

“Obviously,” huffed Lloyd. “You won’t believe how out of place I feel too.”

“Is that so?”

“Yeah. Particularly because of those people. I don’t know why they keep holding out such strange things toward us.” Lloyd pointed to one side with his chin. Javier’s gaze followed and saw what he meant.

“Look at those foreigners,” one of the locals said.

“Oh, my goodness. They’re super hot,” a girl beside him chimed.

“Looks like they’re wearing cosplay.”

“Yeah, it’s so cool seeing foreigners do cosplay.”

Click! Click! Dozens of smartphone cameras clicked to capture their image. Dozens of curious eyes focused on them at the same time.

Javier’s face hardened. “Master Lloyd, it looks like they have found out that we are outsiders. What should we do?”

“What else?” Lloyd shrugged innocently. “Walk normally. Don’t grab your sword.”

“All right, Master Lloyd.”

Javier obeyed Lloyd. Even though his surroundings were too noisy, and the strange sights and people were almost frightening to him, he didn't sense any danger nearby. Javier was relieved by this. He felt even more at ease seeing Lloyd's reaction.

I knew it. He's familiar with this place.

Lloyd's attitude, gait, and gaze were too telling. Even though he was pretending to be in a strange land, there was a subtle familiarity that couldn't be hidden. It was especially the case with his gaze that surveyed the whole place. It belonged to the one who came back to his hometown after a long while.

Javier decided quietly. If fake Lloyd's nostalgia and joy prompted him to refuse to leave this city, he'd forcibly take his young master back home even if he had to be dragged back. However, this was the exact opposite of what was going on in Lloyd's head.

I hope I can go back safely.

Despite being in Seoul for the first time in a while, he didn't particularly feel joyful about returning. He wanted to go back to the Lorasian continent as soon as possible. He was scared that something would go sideways and force him to remain here.

Well, anyway, I just have to keep what the Dragon King reminded me. This is the destination spot, so I just have to return here and say the words within twenty four hours. Then I'll be able to go back safely.

Just then, Lloyd recalled what Dragon King Verkis told him before he stepped inside the magic circle for the dimensional shifting.

He told me I could be rest assured since this was a round trip. He also said that this item would be helpful in finding the key material for the Jewel of Truth.

Lloyd opened his palm, revealing what was inside. It was a small compass.

“Master Lloyd, do we simply have to walk where the compass takes us?”

“Yeah. That’s what the Dragon King said. He said it directs us toward where his traces of magic are coming from.”

It was true. The compass was a tracker to find the key material for the Jewel of Truth that Verkis manufactured on the spot. To be more precise, it was the tool that traced the magical mana that had been used when the key construction material was sent to Seoul in the past.

“So, this compass will teach us where the construction material is. We just have to follow it.”

“I see. But there is just one thing.”

“Hmm?”

“What is Sir Ppodong doing here?”

“Eh...?” They were walking in the direction of the Gwanghwamun Plaza when Javier pointed to Lloyd’s chest. That was when he saw. His eyes met Ppodong poking his head out from Lloyd’s inner pocket.

“Ppodong?” Lloyd called in surprise.

“Ppodong!” Ppodong flashed a smile at Lloyd as he answered cheerfully.

Flustered, Lloyd spoke. “When did you get in there? I told you all to leave my pocket before I was teleported.”

“Ppodong!”

“You did get out with everyone else at the time?”

“Ppo-do-dong!”

“Okay. You sneaked into my inner pocket when I was conversing with Javier and the Dragon King. I see.”

“Ppodong!”

“You really don’t have to be so concerned about me...”

“Ppo-do-dong! Ppodong!” Ppodong made a grand gesture with his tiny paws.

“Thank you for wanting to protect me in a foreign land.”

“Ppodong!”

“Ahaha.” Lloyd let out a flustered laugh. It never occurred that Ppodong would follow him to Seoul. “Listen, Ppodong. This is a foreign place, so we don’t know how they’ll react when they see you here. Do you understand what I’m saying?”

“Ppodong!”

“Okay,” Lloyd said gently, “Answer me quietly. Lower your voice.”

“Ppodong...” whispered Ppodong.

“Good job,” complimented Lloyd. “Right. Don’t come out of my inner pocket, so no one will see you.”

“Ppodong...” Ppodong cast his gaze down.

“You want to look around Seoul?” A smile appeared on Lloyd’s face.

“Ppodong!”

“Aha!” Lloyd’s danced with mirth. “That was your reason for sneaking here with me in the first place.”

“Ppo-do-dong? Ppodong!” Ppodong waved his hands defensively.

“Come on. I think I’m right.”

“Ppodong! Ppododong!” protested Ppodong.

“All right, all right! I’ll believe you. But you can’t be seen. You have to be careful. Got it?”

“Ppodong!”

Lloyd sternly warned Ppodong. Afterward, he resumed his walk with Javier in the direction the magical compass guided them toward. They continued walking past the statues of Great King Sejong and General Lee Soon-shin, Cheonggye River, Seoul Plaza, and Sungnyemun Gate. The entire time, they caught everyone’s attention around them.

It was impossible for them to be not noticed. Why? They were wearing Lorasian clothes. There was also Javier’s ridiculously handsome appearance, transforming every path he treaded into a fashion runway. People murmured among themselves, most of them dazed by Javier’s looks. Lloyd sighed.

Tsk. This is bad. We can’t be seen like this. What should we do after finding the jewel?

When Lloyd thought about it, he felt slightly stuck. Since the key material was quite large, the sight of such a dashing-looking man dragging it around would eventually garner attention and possibly prompt a police report. Lloyd shook off his concerns.

Well, it won’t matter if we create a little fuss. I’m not coming back to Seoul anyway. Plus, even if the railing is large, Javier will be able to run carrying it. So even if we gain traction and the police, whatever. We just have to rush to the intersection and say the word.

They might appear on the news. But since they’d be back in the Lorasian continent by then, who cared? And just like that, they kept walking, past the three-way junction, and reached the foot of the Namsan mountain.

“It appears the material is somewhere on this mountain,” remarked Javier.

“Yeah. That seems to be the case.”

Out of all the places, it had to be in Mount Namsan, which was the center of the city. Lloyd hiked the mountain feeling dazed. From then on, he intentionally avoided paths with more people. Luckily, it was also nighttime and dark outside, so they managed to clandestinely move while not being seen by anyone except for those riding the cable cars above them. As they climbed higher, Lloyd's eyes focused on the compass.

It looks like the material is indeed somewhere on this mountain. Hmm. But the compass keeps pointing up. Why is that? It wouldn't be pointing in this direction if the material was in the side or foothill of the mountain.

Lloyd felt odd. He was already high in the mountain, but the compass kept pointing upward. This made his heart flutter but in a bad, nervous way.

Haha, no way. It can't be near the Namsan Tower or somewhere nearby.

Lloyd prayed that it wouldn't. He wished it with faith and hope. But the heavens turned a blind eye on Lloyd. The magical compass clearly pointed to the Namsan Tower as they walked up.

Ah. I've got a bad feeling about this.

Lloyd continued to walk with that bad feeling until they were out of the woods and found themselves on the wooden stairs. They went up, mixed with a group of couples and tourists, who all peered at them with marvel in their eyes, and passed Haechi, the Seoul city character, until they arrived at the outdoor observation deck of the Namsan Tower.

Just then, Lloyd heaved a deep, heavy sigh. The compass finally revealed the last core material.

For Pete's sake... So, the last key material is the Love Lock Railing, the landmark of the Namsan Tower?

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 305: Home Sweet Home (2)

Eons of years ago, in a dimension entirely different from South Korea, there was a material called “Kiaora” that once illuminated the Jewel of Truth. Placed at its peak, the ornament broadcasted the jewel’s existence to every corner of the world as if it was radiating the light of truth.

However, Kiaora was a shapeless material. It merely copied the quality and shape of anything it touched and was impressed with. This was the case when the Kiaora sat at the peak of the jewel. It took on the appearance of something it duplicated, so no one ever saw its true form.

Even Dragon King Verkis didn’t see its true form either. But he was only interested in moving the material to another dimension. When the Kiaora was transferred to South Korea, it revealed its true form: a metal cube. Like a dice thrown in the hands of a god, it fell into a railing factory warehouse in South Korea.

Clang!

The warehouse was stocked with finished rails, and Kiaora had landed on one of them. At that moment, it decided that the railing it touched was remarkable and wished to copy it.

Crackle...! Right after that, something eerie took place in the middle of the night. The Kiaora copied and transformed into the shape of the rail. It then stayed in the warehouse for a few days until it was transferred by the Seoul city government and installed as part of the railings that decked out the city landmark, Namsan Tower. It eventually became used as part of the “The Love Lock Rails,” where couples hung locks together as a promise of their love and future together. And thus, that was what led these two men from the Lorasian continent into this conundrum today.

“What... are we supposed to do with that?”

Lloyd sighed heavily as his gaze cast in the direction. A throng of couples stood on the observation deck, inhaling the fresh mountain air and basking in the nighttime view of Seoul below the mountain. Some rested their heads on their partners' shoulders and whispered sweet words into their ears as they fastened their locks in the metal railing. Everything was good except that this very railing was the last key material for the jewel, the Kiaora!

Crud. This is driving me nuts.

Lloyd wanted to clap his hand over his forehead. He was flustered. It never crossed his mind that the last key material for the jewel would take this form. Since the Jewel of Truth resembled The Tomb of the General, he presumed that Kiaora would be a special-looking stone, just like how all the others had been. As such, Lloyd believed that the material he was looking for would be buried beneath the mountain or found on the floor of the observation deck.

Tsk. That was why I thought it would be pretty easy to obtain the material and leave. But right now…

There were too many eyes watching him here. Worse, the Kiaora sat in the most crowded section of the deck. Lloyd felt a shaft of dismay. Could it be that Javier grasped the situation through Lloyd's mood?

"Master Lloyd," Javier called as he cocked his head to the side.

"Yeah."

"Could it be... The railing you are looking at with dismay...." muttered Javier.

"You are right," sighed Lloyd. "That's it."

"I see."

"Yeah."

"So, what will you do?"

"I'm not sure." Lloyd nibbled his lips. "I was hoping it would be somewhere without many people. That way, it'd be easy to take out, and no one would throw a fuss from seeing us remove the Kiaora. I thought we could quietly carry out the job."

"I never expected it to be in such a crowded place," remarked Javier.

"Yes, I agree. If we try to take this out here, we'll attract everyone's attention." That was why Lloyd was flustered. Actually, there was nothing wrong with being noticed itself. The problem arose once people went further than that. "The people would surely start an uproar. They'll report us to the police and whatnot. The situation has become troublesome."

"Tell me about it, Master Lloyd," remarked Javier with equal remorse. "Why don't we wait for now?"

"Yeah, that's what I think we should do." Lloyd looked around. Though it was hard to tell the exact time since he wasn't carrying a watch or smartphone, it looked like it was around eight o'clock at night. "I think this is the most popular time for visitors. Let's wait a little and start moving when the crowd gets smaller."

"Understood."

"Let's sit down and rest in the meantime."

"Good idea, Young Master."

As luck would have them, there was a bench nearby. Lloyd sat down and collected his breath as he cooled off the sweat. The cool breeze softly brushed against his chest and brought back his past memories with the scents that it carried. Lloyd became sentimental.

The people stealing glances at them and those who were looking at Javier with desire. They all felt like friends and family he missed from his hometown. He suddenly became curious about trivial matters. For example, he wondered what shows and songs were trending these days, what slang teens used nowadays, and what new Galactica and iFone models had been released.

The view and the people here. Despite everything, I want to remember it all.

Though they were complete strangers who just lived in Seoul, Lloyd surprisingly felt close to them just because they used the same language and ate kimchi and doenjang like him. He figured it was because this was his hometown. Even the various couples fastening locks in the Kiaora couldn't look any more loving and kind in Lloyd's eyes.

"Honey," a young lady said in a high-pitched voice, "It's so nice up here. Isn't it?"

"Um, I don't know," the guy remarked coolly.

"Why?" She looked up at him in wonder. "The nighttime view here is so pretty."

"I don't think it's pretty at all. My eyes are completely blinded by something else that's entirely too bright."

"What's too bright?"

"You, babe."

Blushing, she whispered, "Baby, stop that. Kiss me now."

Lloyd clenched his teeth.

No. I take that back. Kind and loving my ass!

Lloyd reflexively clenched his fists. Feeling that the morals of this world were going down in shambles and wanting to re-establish righteousness, he shot a deathly glare at the couple in pure jealousy.

"You," Lloyd murmured under his breath.

"Yes, Young Master."

"Let's just take it out now."

“I am with you on that matter.”

Silently understanding one another, Lloyd and Javier jumped to their feet in rage. They trudged toward the Kiaora, the love lock railing, pushing against the shoulders of couples and ignoring their protests. The two then stood before the key construction material for the jewel and grabbed its bottom half after stooping down at the same time. The gazes they exchanged then burned with sincere anger to purify this filthy corner of the world. And inwardly giving their middle fingers to the couple, Lloyd and Javier rotated their three-strand mana circles at full speed.

Ziiing! Their manaheart became full as giant waves of mana grew inside them and bestowed great strength on their muscles, which bulged with determination to take revenge against the sickeningly cheesy couples around them. As a result, both of them possessed strength that went well beyond that of an ordinary human.

Crunch! The railing was taken out with one try.

People’s eyes widened. They had thought of Lloyd and Javier as a good-looking yet odd pair of foreigners, seeing them roughly approach the railing. However, they never even imagined the two would take the entire rail out. And they were even more taken aback by how they ran away with the stolen rail.

“W-wait a minute!”

“Huh? Huh?”

“Hold on!”

They heard countless couples shouting at them, saying to stop for a second, that they had just fastened their locks, or was just about to propose to their girlfriend! Their shouts grew more frantic. But Lloyd and Javier, carrying the Kiaora together on their shoulders, didn’t stop. Like a wild boar, the two hurtled right through the thick crowd down the stairs of the Namsan Mountain.

“Haah! Huff! Haa! Don’t stop!” yelled Lloyd.

“Understood.”

It was water under the bridge. The two continued to dash off, syncing their steps and pace together. At times, they jumped down several flights of stairs at once, almost sliding down the mountain. Soon, their surroundings grew noisier.

“There! There they are!”

“The tourists over there! You can’t take that!”

Whistle! Whistle!

It looked like people reported the matter to the authorities. A number of men, who appeared to be mountain rangers, rushed toward Lloyd and Javier. Their dismayed shouts and whistles echoed through the mountain. The two, however, were not deterred from running in the slightest.

“Ignore them and keep going!”

“Yes.”

The two continued to run. Hundreds of locks clanged loudly against the metal railing, and the din continued to sound even after they were out of the mountain premises. This time, they were met by two police cars. It looked like they received calls from people. What did Lloyd do this time?

“Ah! Whatever! Keep running!”

Zoom! Zoom!

Lloyd turned a deaf ear to whatever the police were bawling through their megaphones. He didn’t have any reason to listen to them.

Obviously! What would happen if I listened to their shouts and stopped? They would throw us behind bars for vandalism and whatnot. We’d be investigated, and the Kiaora would be confiscated. Moreover, Javier and I don't have any paperwork on us like an ID card or a passport.

They fit the exact definition of an undocumented immigrant. As such, happily cooperating with the police with a smile on their face would only bring detrimental consequences to them.

"This way!"

Lloyd raced through the areas near the Namsan library and the statue of Korea's national hero, An Jung-geun. Lloyd took the lead, and Javier followed him, all the while carrying the Kiaora on their backs. Of course, the police were avidly chasing them from behind.

"Stop! Stop right there!"

The noise of the siren and megaphone boomed behind them, but it fell on Lloyd's deaf ears. He intentionally ran toward the Hoehyeon-dong district and dove into the twisted alleys in the residential area to lose the chasing police. The view of old residential homes and low-rise commercial buildings came into his eyes. Lloyd was familiar with this area.

"Follow me. Over here."

Since it was late at night, the back of the residential areas was relatively quiet. Avoiding the people's gazes and running along the dim streets, Lloyd and Javier ran through the maze-like alleys until they finally managed to lose the police. Once they were safe, the two decided to slow down and catch their breath as they walked.

After a while, Javier, who was looking at Lloyd walking ahead of him, called, "By the way, Master Lloyd."

"What is it?"

"Did you know all along?"

"Know what?"

“That we could lose the people pursuing us if we take this path.”

Lloyd scoffed. “Did you not know?”

“Master Lloyd?” Javier stopped, not knowing what to say.

Lloyd stopped walking and swiveled. Giving Javier a reproachful look, Lloyd said, “Didn’t you survey the nearby terrains when we were up in the mountain? When everything was out in the open?”

“That is—”

“Whew,” sighed Lloyd half-jokingly and half-seriously. He added in a playful tone, “My Javier. You have a lot to learn. The first thing you must do when you’re in a foreign land is to closely survey your surroundings. That way, you’ll know which area is dangerous or safe. Otherwise, determine where to move in case something happens and which terrains could be used to your advantage in specific situations. Don’t you think?”

Javier remained silent.

“That’s why I scanned the area in advance,” Lloyd said proudly.

“This street, Young Master?”

“Yeah. It looked perfect. The low-rise buildings were compacted together, and the alleys were almost like a labyrinth down here. So, I thought that this place would be a good hiding spot should we ever face a situation like now. And ultimately? It’s as you can see.” Lloyd shrugged and lifted his chin higher. “When you’re in a foreign land such as this place, all you’ve got to do is just trust this big brother of yours and follow my lead. Okay?”

“I understand...”

“Eh?” Lloyd lifted his brow. “It’s rare of you to accept my words so easily.”

“Am I not allowed to?”

“No. You can’t. It’s strange. I have the chills right now.”

“...”

“You. Who are you?” asked Lloyd in astonishment. “The Javier I know is far from being a docile, humble, or loyal fellow. He’s even farther away from being someone who would just nod at my words without snapping back.”

“...”

“You better tell me honestly. Where did you hide my dear Javier?”

“Haah... Seriously...” Javier broke into laughter. “Who else could possess such a dashing appearance but me? On another note, I have one more thing I am curious about.”

“What is it?”

“What’s a phone number?”

“What...?” A look of mild surprise came over Lloyd.

“While you went away for the restroom, a lady came up to me and asked me about it.”

“And then?” Lloyd gulped.

“I was nervous, so I said nothing. I was scared that I might give us away.”

“Yes, good job. I don’t know what this phone number or whatever is, but it’s best to play dumb during those kinds of situations.”

“As I thought, that is the case.”

“Yes, yes.” Lloyd then resumed walking. Looking at the young master’s back, Javier thought to himself...

Play dumb? Like what you’re doing right now, Young Master?

Now, Javier was convinced. Even if Lloyd was pretending not to be, this place called Seoul was his hometown. The way he spotted the alleys and the direction of his steps told Javier the truth. It was equally so when Lloyd enlarged Ppodong.

“Hey, Ppodong. Over there. You’ll find two large statues. We’re going to run past them and straight in that direction. That’s where our return point will be.”

“Ppodong!”

Lloyd and Javier got on Ppodong’s back with the Kiaora. Ppodong then through the boulevard in the middle of the night, so openly and nonchalantly that the panic-stricken cars driving on the twelve lanes across the road honked their horns. The police cars that lost them were now chasing them again. But Ppodong was uncatchable, except for the security cameras and mobile cameras filming him. But Lloyd concluded that none of that mattered.

I don’t plan to come back ever again anyway.

As such, it wouldn’t be a problem for Ppodong to sprint in the middle of the twelve lanes. Even if the video went viral on the news and social media, it would be an event that happened in a world Lloyd had nothing to do with. Furthermore, not a single person would even recognize him.

So, there’s no reason to remain here.

Lloyd encouraged Ppodong harder until they arrived at their return point in the Gwanghwamun intersection. Their arrival immediately spelled the dimension-shifting magic to react. A three-dimensional magic circle emerged, emitting brilliant light all around. The door of dimension opened, and the sight of his hometown, Seoul, started to grow hazy.

Meanwhile, Lloyd stared at the fading view of the city. He only had to say the word that would activate the magic circle. He thought he wouldn’t miss anything about this place. He wouldn’t get carried away by meaningless sentimentality. He would go back without any regrets. He repeated those thoughts over and over again.

Seoul was just a city he once lived in. The fading streetlamps, hubbub from the crowds, car lamps, flashy neon signs, and the musty air. His childhood neighborhood he had just passed through, in the poorer residential areas opposite the apartment complex where he once lived with his parents. The alleyways were filled with memories. All of it was nothing but a memory that would fade away in the hazy light.

So...

Lloyd bit his lip without realizing it. He whispered the magic word to himself as though bidding farewell to the nostalgic memories of his past.

“Home sweet home...”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 306: Changing the Construction Site (1)

Swaa...! The mystifying starlight obscured Lloyd's view, and the dimensional magic circle devoured the entire space around him. Soon, gravity disappeared, and everything became weightless as if it was a piece of feather or a bubble. The darkness and starlight dizzily danced around them for a while until Lloyd and Javier felt their feet touch the firm ground.

"Haah..." Lloyd sucked in breath involuntarily. He felt sick and dizzy. His stomach churned.

Goodness. Couldn't something be done to make dimensional shifting and teleportation more comfortable?

These two magic spells never failed to give its passengers motion sickness every time it was used. Lloyd took deep breaths to calm his stomach while reminiscing about the anti-nausea pills that were available back in Korea. Soon, his vision returned to normal.

The Gwanghwamun area of Seoul was gone now. Instead, Lloyd caught sight of a vintage-style bedroom with a half-open window and curtain that was swaying against a soft breeze. He also saw a sleeping man on the bed inside, who continued to be asleep despite the strong sunlight that made his eyes squeeze. The man was Dragon King Verkis, the sleepyhead who couldn't even be bothered to cover his eyes with his hand or turn over to the other side to avoid the sunlight. When Lloyd saw him, he finally realized something.

I'm back safely.

Lloyd felt it all the more now that he was really back at the Frontera Manor's guest chamber. On top of Verkis, there was one more thing that made his return feel more real.

"Master Lloyd, have you been crying?"

His piercing voice. His chilly voice hardly seemed to rise in any situation. Javier was intensely staring at Lloyd with an observant gaze. Lloyd flinched, feeling exposed.

“Cry?” denied Lloyd hastily. “I don’t know what you mean.”

“The reason is beyond me, but your eyes are wet.” Javier’s gaze fixed on Lloyd’s eyes.

“My eyes?” Lloyd widened his eyes to prove Javier was wrong. “No way.”

“It’s true. They are red and puffy as well,” pressed Javier.

Lloyd cleared his throat, thinking of some excuses to save himself.

“Your nose as well. It is red.”

Lloyd cleared his throat again, still thinking.

“There. You just sniffed your runny nose.”

“It’s a cold,” Lloyd finally managed.

“Excuse me?” Javier tilted his head to the side.

Lloyd looked straight into Javier’s eyes and said, “We’ve just visited a foreign land, haven’t we?”

“Yes, we did.”

“The air over there was too murky and unfamiliar to me, so I must have caught a cold.”

Javier shook his head defiantly. “I seriously do not think that is the case.”

“Why?”

“Because you are fine now.” Javier was unconvinced.

“It looks like the cold is going away then.”

Javier didn’t respond to this. He only shot Lloyd an accusatory gaze.

“We’ve returned home. The air is clean. The wind is refreshing,” Lloyd said cheerfully.

“And so, you are getting better because of all of this?” asked Javier.

“Yeah,” Lloyd argued shamelessly. “You saw how Seoul was a while ago. It was the worst. The air was dirty, and metal carriages made noises as they were wheeled around. There were some individuals dressed in weird clothes, thrusting something flat and square toward other people as they made clicking sounds. Don’t you agree?”

“Hmm,” Javier observed, “You looked terribly comfortable there though.”

“What?” Lloyd squealed. “Me?”

“Yes.” This time, Javier nodded. “If I may, you looked like a person who returned to their hometown for the first time in a while.”

“The heck? Nonsense,” Lloyd gaped in disbelief as if the idea was outrageous.

“Is that so?”

“Of course.”

“Well, if you say so,” acknowledged Javier at last.

“Indeed.” Lloyd felt guilty and also slightly suspicious about the questions Javier was asking him now.

It feels like he’s testing me out.

Does Javier know that I am fake? Did I unconsciously do stuff in Seoul that gave me away? Even though Lloyd considered those questions, there was no way for him to know what Javier was thinking. Lloyd decided to change the subject.

“Anyway, let’s put this down. Isn’t it heavy for you?”

“Oh.”

Both of them were still carrying the love lock railing or the Kiaora on their shoulders. Hundreds of locks clanged aloud as they dropped the railing to the ground.

“Whew,” grumbled Lloyd, “It’s beyond me why people hung these locks up when they look so ugly.”

“Perhaps they contain a promise between two lovers of a long future together. That appeared to be the case from what I observed,” remarked Javier.

“That’s the problem,” huffed Lloyd annoyingly. “Promise of a long future together, my foot. Do you think those lovers will stay together forever just because of these things? Not at all. So, this is what needs to be done. This!”

Crack! Crack! Lloyd grabbed a lock using the Asrahan Core Technique and gave it a twist. The lock cracked in his hand, giving him the same pleasing feeling you get when you pop bubble wrap. Just then...

Ding dong.

An unexpected message popped in front of him with a notification sound.

[You are currently getting rid of the impurities installed in Kiaora.]

[The Kiaora rejoices over it.]

[The Kiaora will return to its true shape and capacity when all of its impurities are removed.]

Hmm?

The messages were uncalled for. But Lloyd understood what he had to do right away.

“Hey,” He said as he looked up at Javier. “Let’s tear these down.”

“Come again?”

“I said, let’s tear them down. These locks aren’t part of the Kiaora anyway.”

“So, are you saying we should rip them off?” asked Javier.

“Yeah,” acknowledged Lloyd. “Think about it. It’ll be troublesome if these weird locks are left dangling on key construction material for the Jewel of Truth.”

Javier crossed his arms. “Come to think of it, you have a point, Young Master.”

“Right?”

“Yes, although I slightly pity and feel sorry for your petty and narrow-minded attitude that has even come to envy couples living in another dimension.”

Lloyd clutched his heart. “Damn... You don’t pull back your punches even in this situation, do you?”

“I did not throw any punches, Master Lloyd,” stated Javier coolly.

“Don’t you know? Hurting someone with your words is also a form of violence.”

“Well,” Javier replied casually, “Then you should end your life as a bachelor if you feel wronged.”

“It’s not that I can’t do it. I’m just choosing not to.”

“Yes, yes. I’m sure it is.”

Lloyd stared at Javier in disbelief.

“Are you not going to take these off?” Javier asked, turning a blind eye to Lloyd’s reaction.

Lloyd lifted his head and forced a big smile to make sure that the tears in his eyes wouldn’t fall down his cheeks.

Haah. Today is a good day. A good day, indeed. Damn it.

Lloyd crouched before the Kiaora as he held back his tears and began to remove the locks on it beside Javier. Thankfully, their strength allowed them to finish the job in no time. The moment the last lock was removed, the Kiaora started to transform. Bzzt! Bzzt!

The ordinary metal railing suddenly grew soft, almost as if it was melting. Then, it transformed into a sleek cube that was a shade larger than a basketball. It was the true form of the Kiaora.

Ding Dong! A message appeared with a clear, ringing sound.

[You have attained the Kiaora, a key material for the Jewel of Truth.]

[You have succeeded in excavating all five key materials of the Aotearoa that were destroyed during the mythical age.]

[This is truly an impressive excavation that will be remembered in history.]

[When the Jewel of Truth is restored, your name will be remembered in history as the excavator who found these key materials.]

[For that achievement, you have been awarded a large amount of bonus RP.]

[You have acquired 2,800 RP.]

[Current RP: 11,755]

This is what I’m talking about!

Lloyd clenched his fists. But there were more rewards for him to come.

[You have excavated and collected all of the core materials of the Jewel of Truth scattered across the world.]

[This was not an ordinary excavation but an honorable accomplishment that largely contributed to the reconstruction of a relic of the mythical age.]

[For that, you have earned a special award.]

[You have earned the right to select the land upon which the Jewel of Truth will be constructed.]

[You can now build the Jewel of Truth on the venue of your choice.]

What...?

Lloyd read the messages several times as he couldn't believe it. At last, he understood what the words in front of him meant.

Wow!

Lloyd could build the Jewel of Truth on the venue of his choice. This meant that he didn't have to travel all the way to build it in the Mermaid Kingdom.

I can build it in my fiefdom! He naturally concluded.

I mean, why not? I should keep everything good at home! In my neighborhood!

Lloyd screamed inwardly. I have to get my hands on the good stuff before anyone else. My neighborhood deserves all the amazing facilities that are available. Everything good has to be mine, whatever that is. Even if this line of thinking explicitly captured the "Please In My Front Yard (PIMFY)" mindset, Lloyd believed he deserved it.

I've built great facilities for countless other neighborhoods up to this point!

Of course, it was done for the sake of money and came with a generous amount of compensation. But still, Lloyd couldn't help but feel jealous as he recalled his previous construction projects.

For starters, there's the suspension bridge I built to curry favor with the queen! And the railroad in Hell, the jjimjilbang in the Mermaid Kingdom, and the coliseum for the centaurs. The seokbinggo for the orcs. The Qanat in the desert. Imagine if I built all of these things inside my fiefdom! Our land value would have soared through the roof!

If Lloyd had constructed all those facilities in his fiefdom, the land price would have rocketed for its advanced technology. But he had to painfully give them up to other fiefdoms. Recalling those bitter days, he made a decision without a hint of hesitation.

I busted my gut to find all the key materials. And I'll have to bust my gut again to construct the Jewel of Truth. You know what? Come to think of it, it was me who did everything. Me, myself, and I. So, I deserve this. The Jewel of Truth has to be built in my fiefdom, and to do that. Hmm... I've got to meet with the queen of the merpeople.

Originally, the Jewel of Truth was promised to be erected in the Mermaid Kingdom in exchange for the queen's cooperation. But now that there was a change of plans, Lloyd had to convince the queen.

I needed to make a trip down there to collect the tauranga that I tossed under the sea anyway.

Lloyd briefly walked Javier through the plan. Javier widely welcomed the idea of building the Jewel of Truth in the fiefdom. Truly, he put the interest of the fiefdom before anything else. At the same time, he was worried.

"Are you sure this is all right, Master Lloyd? The queen will surely oppose the plan," Javier said.

"Don't worry. I'm confident that I can convince her."

"Convince her?" Javier asked inquisitively. "How?"

“I’m going to offer a deal that will make the queen joyfully cheer and accept the moment she hears about it.”

“A deal?” Javier gave him a look that demanded further explanation.

“You’ll find out once you get there. Let’s get moving.”

Lloyd left the Kiaora beside the Verkis’s bed and slipped out of the chamber. Afterward, he got on Ggoming’s back and flew northward. Midway, he met Draggy and got on its back, flying half a day more until he arrived at the Arctic Sea. It wasn’t as cold as before. The climate was warmer now, mainly because of the Hell Gate in the sky. There was dry, hot air continuously blowing through the gate.

It has gotten warmer.

The floating glaciers had visibly dwindled in number. But Lloyd paid no attention to it.

“All right, let’s go!”

Lloyd jumped high and dove into the sea. The [Upper Abdomen! Upper Abdomen! Upper Abdomen!] and [Underwater Breathing] skills were put into effect immediately.

When he swam further into the sea, he soon arrived at the kingdom and met the muscular merpeople who easily recognized Lloyd. He was quickly led to speak with the even more muscular queen.

“It has been a long time, my queen. It’s me, Lloyd Frontera,” he greeted.

“Yes, it has been a long time. It appears that your forearm muscles have grown thicker.”

“Haha, your traps have gotten larger as well.”

“Is that so?” the queen replied. “I am sure you do not mean it, but thank you.”

“Please do not mention it. May I reveal why I came here?”

“Of course, you can.” This time, as well, the queen was easygoing as always.

Suppressing the worry that his plan might dampen her spirit, Lloyd went on, “My queen, I have found all of the key construction materials for the Jewel of Truth at last.”

“You did?” She rose from her reefed throne.

“Yes,” said Lloyd, “With that, I am thinking of changing the location of the construction site.”

“You can’t be wanting to build it on your own land, are you?”

“Unfortunately, that is right.” Lloyd acknowledged right away. It was better to be honest and straightforward when breaking bad news to someone. The best way to preserve their relationship was to be truthful and avoid beating around the bush. “To be honest, I earned the right to select where to construct the Jewel of Truth once I discovered all of its key materials. Therefore, I wish to build it in a place where I can easily manage it.”

“More like you have become greedy and want to have the Jewel all to yourself.” Her voice was sharp.

“I would be lying if I said that was not a part of my decision,” conceded Lloyd.

“So? What is your plan?” The queen narrowed her eyes.

Without backing down, Lloyd continued speaking, “I am thinking of offering you massive assistance on something in exchange for building the jewel in my fiefdom."

“What kind of assistance?”

“Your Majesty, the climate of the Arctic Sea has changed recently, hasn’t it?”

“Hmm.” The climate of the Arctic Sea. A faint look of concern came over her the moment she heard Lloyd’s words.

Lloyd inwardly exclaimed when he caught it on her face. He knew he was right. Confident, Lloyd reeled off, “It should be alarming. The Hell gate continues to belch out hot and dry air, but no one knows why it opened in the first place.”

“You’re right...” affirmed the queen. “It’s been a headache for me. I was worried about it before, but now, things have spun out of control. There is no way we can stop what’s happening. We don’t know why the gate opened up in the first place.”

“You haven’t found the cause behind the situation?” inquired Lloyd.

“No, we haven’t, nor do we know how to. The glaciers are melting away by the day. The Arctic Sea’s changing temperature and salinity have put many marine animals at risk of losing their habitats. Despite that, nothing comes to mind to mend the situation.” The queen’s face darkened.

It was true. The Hell Gate suddenly emerged and started emitting hellishly hot air, warming the Arctic Sea with every passing second. The melting glaciers and the dramatic temperature and salinity changes put countless animals in the Arctic in danger.

Lloyd clucked his tongue. “I knew that would be the case.”

Lloyd shamelessly pretended to feel sympathetic as if the story was breaking his heart or the opening of the Hell gate was unrelated to him. And as if he didn’t cause the issue in the first place, Lloyd offered the queen a deal that would make her joyfully cheer.

“If I can make the Arctic air turn cold again... Will you then allow me to change the location for building the Jewel of Truth?”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 307: Changing the Construction Site (2)

“If I can make the Arctic air turn cold again... Will you then allow me to change the location for the Jewel of Truth’s construction?”

“Excuse me?” She twitched at Lloyd’s question. Cocking her head, she added, “You’re going to turn the air cold again?”

“Yes,” said Lloyd in a firm voice.

“How?”

“I have a plan. If you give me permission, I can jump into action today.”

“Immediately? Are you serious?” she asked in dismay.

“I am serious,” he answered confidently.

She stared hard at him. “You’re a mysterious human being.”

“Am I?” He raised a brow.

“Obviously. I felt that there’s something unusual about you compared to other humans since before.”

“Ahahaha,” He force-laughed. “That is very flattering-”

“Sometimes, I want to punch you for no particular reason,” interrupted the queen.

“What... was that?” He widened his eyes.

“You’re very clever and competent, yes, but that is also what makes you so spiteful.”

“Um, well.” He frowned. “Is that a compliment or an insult...?”

“Both,” replied the queen with a wry smile on her face. The smile indicated that she somewhat had an idea of his intentions. “Come to think of it, you should be quite familiar with my kingdom since you’ve spent quite a time here. In other words, you should have identified what kind of situation we are in.”

“Yes,” affirmed Lloyd. “I will not deny that.”

“And that must be how you came to bring me this offer that I can’t refuse, right?”

“Please forgive me.” He cast his head down.

“No,” the queen replied, shaking her head. “You don’t have to. I should confirm whether you’re speaking the truth first. So, you can cool the temperature of the Arctic air immediately? Today?”

“Yes, my queen.”

“Good. Prove it.”

“I will.” A faint smile hung on Lloyd’s face. Things were going according to his plan.

The mermaid queen’s heart is as large as her muscles. I did the right thing by going for a direct confrontation instead of beating around the bush.

He had made a direct offer without pulling any punches. He plainly and honestly revealed his thoughts on solving her dire dilemma. The plan was to zero in on that exact point.

Thankfully, my plan worked.

He felt relieved. “Then please come up to the surface with me.”

He went out of the kingdom with her and rose up to the surface. They saw the Hell Gate blazing in the sky.

“I will get to it right away. Oh, please stay far away from me, my queen.”

“Why?”

“You might get swept away by the frigid air.”

“Hmm, I see.” She swam many yards away.

Once Lloyd was sure that she was away, he took a deep breath.

Haah. Carefully. Slowly.

Ziiing... Lloyd circulated a three-strand mana circle, absorbing and amplifying the mana around him. In the process, he awakened his manaheart. To be exact, Lloyd stimulated the Heart of Winter’s frigid air that was stuck to his manaheart when he used the Time Freeze skill. The mass of frigid air reacted right away. Bzz...

Eek!!

The mass of frigid air jerked and awakened its spiky energy. That invoked a feeling inside Lloyd like he had kicked a beehive or accidentally woke up a sleeping porcupine. It recklessly sprayed cold mana into his manaheart and around him. This, however, was something Lloyd expected.

The Ice Dragon told me. He said that the Heart of Winter would continue growing and its frigid energy would spread like cancer throughout my body after settling in my manaheart.

Just then, Lloyd recalled how Tyrannus had warned him about the Heart of Winter. He wasn’t to use it recklessly if he wanted to live a long life. At the same time, he also recalled briefly practicing how to employ a mana circle on his way here behind Javier’s back.

It’s okay. I have already tested its safety. I’m using the frigid air that appeared as the result of using the Heart of Winter. Not the item itself!

Focusing himself, Lloyd used the mana circle to carve the frigid energy and absorb it. Afterward, he adjusted the direction of his mana circle from absorption to discharge. He then thrust his hands up and clashed the three strands of his mana circle against each other. Its collision created a fierce shock wave that jetted out from his hands. More precisely, the shockwave came from the triple mana blast he created from the frigid energy absorbed by him.

Fwoosh! He wondered if this was what becoming a smart converter air conditioner felt like. An oppressive volume of frigid air gushed toward the sky like a giant ice spear, as though it was aiming to destroy the sun. Relentlessly, it rose into the sky and spread out like a fountain of water.

Fwoosh! Trillions of ice particles spread into the air like pollen, each speck freezing the air molecule it touched in the air. The result was an icy storm that carpeted the sky and dropped the air temperature by dozens of degrees. The frigid air spread across the Arctic sky and sea beneath it.

Craaack...! Crack! Soon, the larger part of the sea thickened like a yogurt smoothie until it merged and solidified into an icy glacier. The terraforming, no, Arctic forming, was a success.

Huff, huff! Lloyd breathed heavily once he finished discharging the frigid air. He brought his shaky hands to his thigh and pinched it hard.

“Ouch!”

The bruising pinch on his inner thigh sharpened his senses. He hurriedly shook his head and inspected his insides.

Whew. I almost passed out on the spot. Dang, I should avoid using this again if I can.

It gave him the shudders. Lloyd had believed that discharging the frigid air in his system, which came as a side effect of possessing the Heart of Winter, would be possible if he amplified it with his mana circle. And that was why he had tested it on his way here on top of Draggy, rotating his mana circle and triggering the frigid air inside him. Now that he used it in real life, he learned the experience was poles apart from what he tried in practice.

I almost died there.

Lloyd clicked his tongue. It felt like his internal organs were being pulled out for display the moment the frigid energy left his body. On top of that, he even felt like his soul was being taken out as well. However, his efforts weren't without results.

Thankfully, the frigid energy stuck to my manaheart was reduced to a significant degree.

The amount of frigid air that came as a side effect of possessing the Heart of Winter was reduced by one-third. Lloyd figured it was because he had discharged a portion of it.

Well, this is an effect I didn't expect.

It looked like so. The frigid energy building inside him was an ill effect of absorbing the Heart of Winter. It stuck to his manaheart like cancer. But once he risked gushing some out through his mana circle, he was able to significantly decrease the amount of frigid energy inside him.

This could be useful if I put it to good use. I may be able to significantly delay or prevent this side effect from getting worse.

But since it would strain his body and could be only discharged when it was built up in his system, Lloyd couldn't release the frigid energy whenever he pleased.

Come to think of it, this might be the same as those aircraft games when you save up all your bombs before blasting them off simultaneously.

A wry smile escaped Lloyd as the thought popped into his head. On further thought, it really was like those kinds of games. Using the Time Freeze skill would build up frigid energy in his manaheart, but he could always discharge it through a mana circle.

So, in a way, I've gained one more lethal move I can use during emergencies.

This wasn’t a bad outcome. With that, Lloyd concluded his thoughts. He turned and found the queen approaching his side.

“What do you think?” asked Lloyd as he crossed his arms.

“...”

“Do you... feel that the air is still not cold enough?”

“No, it’s not that.” The queen spoke, feeling slightly dumbstruck. “Who on earth are you?”

“My name is Lloyd Frontera. A friend of yours, the jjimjilbang constructor who looks quite handsome if you look closely and whose charming presence can be felt with a mere glance—”

“Cut the bullcrap. Are you a magician?”

“Well, something like that,” Lloyd said with a wry smile on his face. There was no other way to explain what he just did. “It’s all because I recently came to absorb a divine item that has proved to be quite useful. Though it puts a slight toll on my body, it allows me to utilize this trick. Anyway, what do you think? The way I see it, the weather has become quite cold.”

“More than quite, it’s excellent.”

“Really?”

“Of course.” She nodded as she surveyed around with a satisfying gaze. “It has been a long time since I enjoyed such a cool breeze up here on land. I feel cool. Refreshed, and also relaxed. But at the same time, I’m still concerned.”

“Concerned?”

“I am assuming this cold breeze is only going to last a few months. Is that correct?”

“Yes, it probably will.” Lloyd nodded. Acknowledging her as he stared at the Hell gate, he said, “Since that thing is still hanging there.”

“It should be. Even though the air has become cooler for now, the hot breeze will continue to come out of the Hell Gate.”

“You are right, My Queen,” Lloyd said. “What I did was a temporary solution that will only last a few months.”

“Then what’s the permanent solution?” There was eagerness in her voice.

“The Hell Gate will likely need to be closed. I can take care of that for you,” he promised.

“Is there a way?”

“I will find it out once the construction for the Jewel of Truth is completed. I can ask for a solution then.”

“Excellent.” Now, the lines on her forehead have disappeared. But her eyes were still discreet. “Then are you going to make sure that the Hell Gate will be shut off once and for all? In exchange for building the Jewel of Truth in your fiefdom?”

“Yes, that is right. That is if your majesty is willing to cooperate.”

“Hmm.” The queen pondered, but not for long. “Okay. I will trust your words.”

“Thank you, My Queen. Now, moving on...”

As soon as she nodded, Lloyd fished out two oiled pieces of paper from his pocket.

“This is a contract. Please check over it thoroughly.”

“...”

“In exchange for constructing the Jewel of Truth in my fiefdom, I, Lloyd Frontera, will solve the warming phenomenon in the Mermaid Kingdom and Arctic Sea and close off the Hell Gate. In addition, once the Jewel of Truth is constructed, your kingdom and the mermaid queen will enjoy fair access to the jewel. That’s what the content of the contract is about.”

“Hmm. A contract.”

“It’s always better to make certain of everything. That way, our promise will be left as evidence.”

“Well, you are right.” Queen’s gaze carefully went over the contract. Truly, its content was pretty much what Lloyd had said it was. She fell into contemplation.

I’ll be closing off the Hell Gate in exchange for foregoing the construction site of the jewel to him. On second thought, this is not a trade-off. No, this deal will certainly be beneficial for our kingdom.

That was her conclusion. Although the Jewel of Truth was a treasure that belonged to her kingdom, it was now nothing but an ancient legend. The jewel was completely non-existent in everyone’s minds after the mythical age, and they did just fine the past countless years without it. They didn’t even feel the need for it even now.

However, then this human came to unearth it.

Without Lloyd Frontera, the queen believed that the jewel wouldn’t have ever been brought to light again.

Furthermore, there will be an equal amount of risk to the reward we gain by building the jewel in the kingdom.

Queen looked back on the lessons that came from the mythical age. During this period, every creature in existence yearned to get their hands on the Jewel of Truth because it offered the wisest answer to any question that was asked. It was regarded as the most powerful weapon in the world. Thus, everyone fought to monopolize the jewel, and a war broke out that eventually led to the end of the mythical age. It was a terrible war.

In the end, the jewel was destroyed. The war was said to have taken away the land of my ancestors. Yet, if the jewel is built inside my kingdom today... There's no guarantee that history won't repeat itself.

It may not happen soon. But once the news of the jewel spread, there would be greedy forces awaiting them. Then, the Mermaid Kingdom could turn into a battlefield.

But if I give it to Lloyd's fiefdom...

The risk could be passed over to him. But since the ownership over the jewel would be a joint one, they would enjoy its benefit just as equally. A wry smile escaped the queen when her thought reached that far.

My. His suggestion took these considerations of mine into account.

A scoff escaped her at the realization that she was fooled really well. But strangely, she didn't feel bad as she could feel Lloyd's consideration of his offer.

In all honesty, he could have unilaterally made a decision for himself without informing us. No, that is what most of those selfish humans would have done.

But Lloyd didn't. It was likely bothersome for him to come all the way here, and he had to have some greed creeping inside him. But he nonetheless requested a proper negotiation and offered a nice deal that pleased both parties. As such, this wasn't something she should refuse. It was instead a contract she should happily accept.

"All right. I like it. Let's sign the contract." The queen beamed in satisfaction.

A similar smile appeared on Lloyd's face. This marked a crucial moment in history. The most powerful treasure of the mythical age was going to be built in the Frontera fiefdom.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 308: Changing the Construction Site (3)

“Good. I like it. Let’s sign the contract.”

The queen reached out and shook hands with Lloyd. Even though the strength in her forearm and grip almost crushed his hands, he managed to put on a big smile.

Okay. It’s done. The contract was successfully signed.

A sense of relief rushed through him, whose heart surged with the joy of closing a deal.

It was surprisingly harder than I expected.

Lloyd did offer a sweet deal to the queen. Even still, however, a part of him was worried that the contract might not pull through. It was because of the innate greed that everyone possessed.

The queen could have acted avariciously to monopolize the Jewel of Truth all to herself. That was a possibility I couldn’t rule out.

Greed came without any warnings. Even though it was Lloyd who had dug up the Jewel of Truth and brought it out to light, the prospect of using the jewel might have changed things for her. If so, greed would have crept into her mind at least once—desires to monopolize the jewel at the opportunity for her to stake her claim. No deal in the world would have appealed to her, and any contract from him would have been rejected. However, to Lloyd’s relief, the result was good.

It’s good that she’s a big-hearted woman.

It turned out that she was much more generous than he had pegged, and such quality must have prompted her to objectively weigh her options and look at the bigger picture. This outcome was very ideal for Lloyd.

And this way, I’ll be able to work without a guilty conscience.

To be honest, Lloyd, too, had some greed in him. How could he not? He was tempted to bypass the Mermaid Kingdom and construct the Jewel of Truth in his fiefdom without any input from them. Who cared if the queen protested? He could have ignored her. That was the convenient way of doing things. Frankly, it was a temptation that was almost too sweet to resist.

That wouldn't have been difficult to do. As for the pieces of tauranga, I could have ordered Draggy to fish them out from the Mermaid Kingdom.

The merpeople were ignorant of Draggy's connection with Lloyd. As such, even if Draggy sneaked in and stole the stones, he wouldn't be subjected to any suspicion.

Plus, there wouldn't have been any hardships in secretly carrying out the construction in my fiefdom. It would be a struggle for the merpeople to come up on land. And since my fiefdom sits in the inland area of the east, there would be no way for them to notice the construction was happening in my fiefdom.

Therefore, Lloyd simply had to listen to the voices of his greed to proceed with the construction behind their backs. But he didn't. Why? Simple. He regarded it to be a trashy thing to do.

If I did that, I'd be the same as those construction companies that suck their subcontractors dry while they stuff their big bellies.

If Lloyd broke the promise to build the Jewel of Truth in the Mermaid Kingdom in exchange for their cooperation and stabbed their backs by secretly building it in his fiefdom, he would be the same as the construction companies that promised their subcontractors with new jobs as long as they endured poor working conditions, low payment for their current project, and then replaced them with other cheaper subcontractors afterward.

Lloyd would be doing just what the evil construction companies do. Sure, even though Lloyd frequently went around duping people with his words, he didn't want to become someone who abandoned those who helped him. That was a line he wouldn't cross. So...

Thank you for recognizing my sincerity.

Lloyd felt thankful to the queen. At the same time, he felt guilty about opening up the Hell Gate. It was his fault that it opened up. Even though the Lava Giant made it inevitable and even though he didn't tell the queen about it since he was afraid of getting beaten to a pulp, he was determined to help her.

I'm sorry. I'll close the gate for you, come rain or shine.

Once the Jewel of Truth became operational, there was a chance he could find a way to convince the King of Hell to close the gate, Lloyd thought. Anticipating such, he buckled down and got to work. Now that he managed to earn the queen's approval and signature on the contract, he didn't want to waste any time.

"Thank you, Queen. In appreciation of your cooperation, I shall do my best to construct the Jewel of Truth."

After a quick greeting, Lloyd and Javier swam into the deep sea until they arrived at the site of the jewel. They took the pieces of tauranga and the sculpture, which Lloyd had plugged into the lot when they first unearthed it. The merpeople provided them with help in this process.

Numerous muscular merpeople transferred the pieces of tauranga and sculptures to the land above them. Everything after that was smooth sailing. Lloyd summoned Draggy once the merpeople swam back into the sea and threw both of the materials on its back. With that, he flew southward to his fiefdom.

Large sedans offer the best ride comfort, and large vehicles offer the best seats.

Thanks to Draggy's giant body, their ride back home was extremely smooth despite the high-altitude flight. Several hours later, he arrived at this fiefdom.

"I-It's the Bone Dragon!" A farmer howled in the Maritz Wetland.

Lloyd passed the shouting farmer and directed Draggy to circle his fiefdom before landing at the peak of a small hill, which housed the Frontera manor.

Boom!

A commotion broke out in the manor's front yard. It was unsurprising as the Bone Dragon had emerged abruptly in front of the manor. But the uproar wasn't that of fear or chaos. It was the opposite.

"It's the Bone Dragon! It's really the Bone Dragon!"

"Master Lloyd is here with the Bone Dragon!"

"Master Lloyd! Hurray!"

"Hail to Her Majesty!"

The first to erupt in joy were the fiefdom guards, who were joined by the quick-footed residents who flocked over together the moment they saw the Bone Dragon in the sky. Even though the Bone Dragon produced a giant dust storm as it landed and manifested menacing force, hardly anyone was scared of it. Lloyd realized something from this.

The news from the capital must have spread here, too.

Abruptly, Lloyd's mind flew back to his visit to the capital to find the Taurangas. Lloyd became the queen's meritorious retainer for saving her face. The banquet was held wherein Draggy made a debut, announced to be under the queen's guidance, and then dispatched to Lloyd's fiefdom.

The news must have spread here. But, come on. What's wrong with these people? Even if they heard the news, aren't they supposed to be scared, or at least flinch, in the presence of a giant dragon?

Such a thought came to him. But the villagers weren't afraid at all. Lloyd could take a guess why.

Ppodong, Bangul, Hamang, and Bibeong. These people have been overexposed to giant creatures on a regular basis.

A wry smile escaped Lloyd at the thought. It deepened when he got off Draggy's back.

"Hey, Explain yourself. How did a menial human like you come to rule over the Bone Dragon?" Faster than anybody, with a frightened look on his face, Red Dragon Solitas welcomed Lloyd. The question was so demanding that Lloyd didn't have time to return his greeting.

Lloyd smiled. "Well, it just happened somehow. Let's say that I saved the soul of the owner of this skeleton from being damned to Hell. Anyway, have you been able to overcome your awful craftsmanship skills?"

"That goes without saying," huffed Solitas arrogantly. "I am a great dragon. Nothing is impossible for me."

"Oh, is that so?" replied Lloyd with amusement in his voice.

"Obviously. I've completely mastered wood carving. I'm now onto carving pebbles."

"Wow." Lloyd raised his thumb.

"Once I finish that, I plan to move on to metal, animal bones and horns, and gemstones."

"Oh, wow." Lloyd raised another thumb.

"Then I should be able to collect mountains of gems and get married.

"Woah! That is excellent," expressed Lloyd.

"Isn't it?"

"Yes," affirmed Lloyd. "And until you do, please burn the sludge for us with all of your might."

"..."

“One more thing,” Lloyd asked, “Considering your great lineage as a dragon, um, have you recently felt anything strange?”

“Feel something strange? What do you mean?” asked Solitas.

“For example, like the energy of a massively powerful creature nearby or something similar.”

“No, I didn’t feel anything like that.”

“Is that so?”

“Of course,” Solitas puffed insolently. “There is no way I will detect a creature that’s more noble and greater than me in this good-for-nothing fiefdom of humans.”

“Oh, sure, sure,” drawled Lloyd. “You’re probably right.”

Lloyd couldn’t help but smile again. He had thrown the question just to see how Solitas answered. But it turned out that Solitas, who was still wet behind the ears, had not noticed the presence of Dragon King Verkis. Regardless, before Solitas could probe further, he was met with pushback from the fiefdom’s guards.

“How dare you! No way! Get away from Master Lloyd, you lowly apprentice blacksmith!” Sir Bayern, the senior knight and commander of the Engineering Corps, bellowed.

Solitas flinched at their shout, and a look of rage appeared on his face. But it dissipated a second later when he remembered the terms of his contract with Lloyd. He quickly became relaxed again.

When Solitas moved away, Sir Bayern sincerely expressed his respects to Lloyd. “Master Lloyd, it has been ages.”

“That’s right,” replied Lloyd. “It has been ages, Sir Bayern. Have you been well?”

“Of course, Young Master. The waterways, apartment complexes, and other facilities have been being maintained without any issues.”

“Perfect. You have been doing a great job.”

With that, Lloyd moved on to the crowds of guards, Engineering Corps, Skeleton Corps, and residents. Everyone showered him with gazes of warmth, reverence, and admiration. This weirded Lloyd out.

When I first came here, all I received were glares of contempt and hatred.

Lloyd recalled the first time he came to possess this body. Everyone gave him the cold shoulder. It was so chilly and glacial, and beneath their superficial respects due to his noble status, there was contempt on their faces and gazes. Some even convulsed in shock and turned around when they saw Lloyd walk in their direction.

But not anymore.

The gazes of contempt were now replaced with gazes of admiration. The looks of disgust had transformed into that of welcome and admiration. This change was also manifested in Count Arcos and Countess Marbella, who chucked their gardening gadgets and rushed to his side.

“Lloyd!”

“My, are you all right?!”

Both of them were completely out of breath as they wrapped their arms around Lloyd. Their hands were caked with dirt that they failed to shake off on their way to him. Lloyd was grateful for that. He was overwhelmed with gratitude toward them for regarding him as their son and always warmly welcoming him with open arms. And he was more appreciative that their concerns preceded their warm welcome and joy to see him.

“Let’s see,” the countess said. “Are you well? Lloyd?”

The countess clapped over Lloyd’s cheeks with her hands. It looked like the Bone Dragon behind Lloyd was completely invisible in her field of vision.

Lloyd wondered if that was what mothers were like. Their children came first even in the presence of a giant and oppressive creature. The way she looked at Lloyd was filled with motherly concern.

“I heard about the news. It must have been terribly cold. My boy. Why did you have to get involved in such a dangerous endeavor?”

“Ahahaha,” laughed Lloyd awkwardly. “Wait, news of the frigid air leak spread all the way here?”

“Of course. Do you have any idea how shocked we were at the news?”

“Um, I am sorry.”

“No need for apologies.” She replied as she rubbed his cheeks. “Are you all right? Are you hurt?”

“Oh, that incident happened a long time ago. I am perfectly fine as you see.”

“Any aftereffects? Did you see your doctor?”

“Oh, yes. They said that I am fine.”

“What about the trial? Were you not scared?”

“Hahaha...”

“You shouldn’t have done something so dangerous.”

“Well, it just happened before I realized...”

Lloyd found himself letting out a chuckle. Mothers were the same. No matter what extraordinary feat their sons notched up, for example, riding the Bone Dragon, they were nothing but a mere child in the eyes of the mothers. This touched him.

Mother.

Suddenly, Lloyd's brain summoned his mother in South Korea. He felt that if she were alive and saw him now, she would be asking the same questions with the same look of concern on the countess's face. Touched, Lloyd grabbed the count and countess's hands, and he looked at the count, his eyes wet with tears.

"I am proud of you," Count Arcos encouraged as he patted Lloyd's shoulder. "Good job."

"Thank you."

Lloyd choked up once more. He then made a decision. He would protect them. He would work harder from now on as he wanted to be with them for as long as possible. With that resolution, he flashed a big smile as he held back his tears. Then he spoke the words he always yearned to say when he had a family.

"I am home..."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 309: The Need for a Dam (1)

“Bibeong!”

Like any other day, Bibeong acted as an alarm and woke everyone in the peaceful Frontera fiefdom that sat at the eastern mountain range.

Farmers rubbed their eyes and got ready for the morning, and bulls drooled as they waited for the morning fodder. Hens that pecked on the ants in the backyard received insults over their incapacity to cuckoo-doodle-doo the heck of out every morning. Everyone was at peace. It was the start of yet another ordinary day. But as for Lloyd, who had returned to his own bed for the first time in a while...

Peaceful day, my ass!

As soon as Bibeong went off, Lloyd jumped out of his bed, threw on some clothes, and darted out of his room. He ran his hands through his disheveled hair on his way to the guest’s chamber and woke the Dragon King with his screeching singing. Afterward, he had breakfast with the count and countess before immediately jumping into work.

Duh. I don’t have any time to spare for rest!

Lloyd was completely serious. Now wasn’t the time to rest or laze around.

I busted my ass off to collect all the key materials needed for construction and even managed to sign a contract with the merpeople’s queen. So, it’s time to build the Jewel of Truth.

He had to stop the restoration of destiny from dooming them all. Lloyd had about two years left to do so. The mere thought of it made him antsy.

There’s more to do after building the Jewel of Truth. That’s just the means to find the answer for how to stop the restoration of destiny.

Lloyd would have to take action based on the answer he was given, which could require an immense amount of time and effort. As such, at this juncture, he had to put his nose to the grindstone.

“And so... You are climbing up a mountain this early in the morning to hurry the construction of the Jewel of Truth?” asked Javier.

“Yeah, why else? Then did you think I suddenly had found an affinity for hiking or something?”

Javier was forced to hike the eastern mountain range with Lloyd. His grouch made Lloyd smile.

Javier furrowed. “Yes, Master Lloyd. I wondered why you were hiking when you could have easily flown up to the summit with Sir Ggoming.”

“That did cross my mind,” replied Lloyd as he took another step up.

“Then why do you insist on climbing up the mountain yourself?”

“Ggoming’s sick.”

Javier looked at Lloyd.

“I’m not lying,” Lloyd replied as he jumped over a big rock. “Ppodong, Bangul, and Hamang. They’re all sick. You know how they’ve been dragged around lately without getting any time to rest.”

Lloyd’s smile turned bitter. What he just said was true. Last night, starting with Ppodong, everyone started to groan in pain, alongside developing a mild fever. They seemed to have muscle aches as they started to whine. It was a cold outbreak

“Well, that does make sense,” Javier seconded. “They’ve been kept on their toes until suddenly returning to the comfort of their home.”

“Yeah. That should be it. All the tension in their bodies must’ve been released when they got here,” agreed Lloyd.

“How about you, Master Lloyd? Are you okay?”

“Yeah, as you can see. I have a lot of work to do ahead of me.”

Of course. It wasn’t the time to loosen up just yet, so there was no reason for him to get sick. Javier’s gaze narrowed. “Then what is my role in your abrupt morning hike?”

“You still don’t know?” asked Lloyd genuinely as he stopped.

“No.” Javier stopped, too.

Lloyd shrugged. “I brought you with me for fun. Hiking alone is boring.”

Javier shot him a look.

“There it is again,” accused Lloyd. “You’re glaring at me. I’m doing all of this with your best interest in mind.”

“My best interest? How?”

“The air here is refreshing.” Lloyd inhaled as he spoke.

“So?” demanded Javier.

“Think about it. When we were in Seoul, you know, the place in that other dimension. The air there was horrifying. Remember?”

“Yes, it was.” Javier did remember it very well.

“That’s why I took you here to cleanse your lungs.”

“I would rather you stick to your first answer and say you were bored.”

“You see, I still meant I brought you with me because I was bored either way.”

“It’s not like I can give him a punch…” Javier mumbled.

Lloyd stopped dead in his tracks. “What was that?”

“Nothing.” Javier continued to move.

“I heard everything,” Lloyd said as he followed.

“Why are you listening to my genuine, inner thoughts without permission?”

“Your genuine, inner thoughts?” huffed Lloyd. “Shamelessly revealing your violent desires out in the open now, I see.”

“Everyone has their own sincere desires and hopes they keep to themselves.”

“Tsk. Whatever you say. Anyway, we’re here,” Lloyd announced. “Woah.”

As the two prattled, their destination came into view. They stepped over the last mound in front of them, and soon, the marvelous landscape of the mountain lake spanned in front of them. It was Lake Kapua, the place they once hiked to build the waterway and where Bibeong used to hibernate.

This is bringing back memories.

Recollections of the past rushed back to his mind while visiting the mountain after such a long time. However, he came today to do work. Lloyd tensed his eyes.

Surveying! Crackle!

[Scanning will begin.]

The terrains of the lake were scanned inside his head as soon as the familiar message popped up, each piece of information being translated into the design space. Of course, he had scanned this area before, but Lloyd decided to see if there were any changes made in the terrain.

This time, I have to also check the underwater terrains.

Lloyd removed his boots and shirts.

“I’m going to look around further into the lake. Sit tight and stay here. Don’t play around while you do.”

“Sit tight?” Javier retorted curiously.

Lloyd scoffed. “You should be surveying the ground while I’m busily working my butt off in the water. How else will you protect me?”

“Hmm, why do I feel that you are simply being mischievous because you can’t stand seeing me relax while you work?”

“No...” denied Lloyd. “Your accusation is false.”

“Noted. I will play hard as per your instruction.”

“Tsk. You sly man.”

“Speak for yourself, Master Lloyd.”

With that, Lloyd jumped into the lake. Splash!

To Lloyd’s relief, the lake was clear. He could see a fair distance ahead of him, even without any goggles.

Let’s see. Where should I build the Jewel of Truth?

Relying on his underwater breathing skill, Lloyd studied the bottom of the lake with a studious look on his face. There were several flat surfaces that seemed to be viable candidates.

The Jewel of Truth only operates under flowing water.

Just then, Lloyd recalled the conversation with the mermaid queen the day before. She notified him that the Jewel of Truth had to be constructed in a flowing body of water. Unless it was built under a sea, river, or lake, the jewel wouldn’t activate.

I confirmed this myself.

Based on what he learned, Lloyd activated his design skill on his bed the previous night and observed the Jewel of Truth in his virtual design space. The queen was right. Lloyd saw a cautionary warning in the design description: "Must be built under flowing water with a depth of at least 230 feet to properly activate."

The only body of water that meets those conditions is here. Lake Kapua.

The Prona River that cuts across the fiefdom wasn't deep enough. The water depth requirement could be met only in this lake. Lloyd's observant gaze grew more careful.

Let's see. The floor here is flat and stable... But the current is too rough and strong. Not here. That one... is good, but I'll need to do something about how unstable the ground is. Okay, taking all factors into account and—gotcha. This is the best spot.

One hour into the job, Lloyd finally discovered the best spot to build the Jewel of Truth.

Now, it's time to run a test.

Lloyd transferred the site's data into his virtual design space and overlayered it with data from the Jewel of Truth.

Thud! Twang! Boom! The Jewel of Truth was constructed in the simulation space, the final output standing tall on the very spot Lloyd had just selected.

Great. It's standing tall and also beautiful. The 230-foot water level requirement is met. The water current is gentle. The water level will rarely go below 230 feet unless a severe drought strikes. Okay, should I try activating it?

Curiosity aroused in Lloyd when the construction was finished in the simulation space. He wondered what it would be like when the Jewel of Truth was operated. He clicked on the "Virtual operation" button in the space.

[You are operating the Jewel of Truth in the simulation space.]

The moment the message appeared, the Jewel of Truth emitted a great shock wave. Kaboom!

An explosive shock wave was produced at the peak of the building and blasted across the surrounding area. Its vibration suddenly created a tidal wave that was 200 feet tall. It then charged at the speed of a bullet train toward the border of the waters until it hit and destroyed the natural dam Bibeong had built when he first created this lake. The tsunami then continued to travel down the mountain.

Fearlessly and recklessly, like a raging bull, it swept everything in its way, the valleys, rifts, and the entire mountain. Finally, it hurtled into the terraced rice fields and coal mines until it annihilated everything in the Frontera fiefdom with its destructive current.

What the heck?

His eyes widened in horror. He turned off the simulation. He clearly understood what he saw and what would happen if he activated the Jewel of Truth in Lake Kapua.

Wow. You've got to be kidding me.

Lloyd heaved an unwitting sigh. But he felt relieved at the same time.

It's a good thing I ran a simulation out of simple curiosity. If I didn't... Whew. I don't want to even think about it.

His body was covered in chills. He had regarded building the Jewel of Truth as the final step of the job. That was why he had carefully inspected the bottom of the lake as though he were performing land valuations. It never occurred to him that such an outrageous event would happen once he activated Jewel of Truth.

What should I do now?

He felt stuck. One glimpse at the simulation was enough for him to understand the destruction the Jewel of Truth would bring when it was put to use.

It's a smaller version of the Vajont Dam in Italy.

In 1963, a landslide above the Vajont Dam created a powerful wave that eventually developed into a tsunami that swept several villages behind the dam. It was a shocking event that resulted in thousands of casualties.

I build the Jewel of Truth here in this lake, and it's going to happen right here in my fiefdom. The wave I saw was unbelievably high. At that height, I won't be able to prevent the tidal wave from developing no matter where I build the Jewel of Truth in this lake.

This only meant one thing.

This lake won't work.

Lloyd heaved a sigh. This time, it was heavier than before. Lloyd was flustered.

Tsk. What should I do? The Prona River is too shallow. And building a reservoir won't do since there will be no water current. Should I search for lakes in other regions? But I don't want to do that since I signed a contract to construct the building in my fiefdom. And besides, I hate the thought of putting this precious structure on top of someone else's land.

Lloyd thought building it in the Mermaid Kingdom was a hundred times better than doing so. Lloyd racked his brain, and he only sunk deeper into thought as he went down the mountain with Javier.

What should I do?

The tidal wave. This was an unexpected stumbling block. Even when he was back at the manor, after sending Javier away, resting his back against the bed as he stared at the opposite wall, Lloyd continued to think.

Build a wall in the lake that would stop the waves? Will it prevent any damage? No. For that to work, the wall has to be extremely high and sturdy. And besides, it's impossible to put up a wall on just one side. It has to be erected along the corners of the lake.

Lake Kapua was a mountain lake that was as large as Lake Chuncheon in South Korea. To enclose the lake, he would have to build a wall that was several miles long, even for just a portion of it.

It's ridiculous. Just imagine building a wall that's several miles long to stop a 200-foot-tall wave. I can't begin to imagine how thick it will need to be to withstand the impact of such a wave.

It was a terribly unrealistic and large-scale project. Moreover, it was even less likely that the walls could be maintained over time.

This isn't a viable method. Not a chance.

Lloyd crossed out the method in his head. Even after that, Lloyd continued to rack his brain. Past lunchtime and afternoon, the sun dipped down as it set the sky on fire. Then Lloyd heard someone knocking on his room. It was Emily. Tap tap tap.

"Master Lloyd, please excuse me. It's Emily," she said from the other side of the door.

"Yeah, what's going on?" Lloyd said aloud.

"I'm here to collect your laundry. May I come in?"

"Sure, come on in."

As soon as he permitted, the door opened and revealed a grinning Emily. "Good afternoon, Master Lloyd. Please excuse me for a second."

"Sure, no problem."

Lloyd remained seated against the bed as he stared at Emily get to work. Of course, he was absolutely engrossed in the Jewel of Truth situation. But his gaze, though blank, must have affected Emily, for a blush appeared on her cheeks as she collected his laundry. Slightly flustered, she started to stammer.

“Um, I will bring them back all nice and neat. These shirts. Your pants, too.”

“Yes, thank you,” replied Lloyd blankly.

“I actually have become better at washing clothes.” She twisted her body as if she was overcome with embarrassment. Her eyes were fixed on the ground. “A long time ago, I just scrubbed the laundry as best as I could before rinsing them off. Completely unaware of what the others were doing, especially the other servants situated higher up the stream.”

“Higher up the stream. Other servants?” Lloyd asked.

“Yes,” Emily said shyly as she grinned. It looked like she was glad to see Lloyd respond to her. “The thing was, no matter how hard I washed the clothes, it was all pointless if those up the stream released the lye into the water at a different time than me.”

“Hmm. That makes sense. After all, you’ll have to wash the clothes all over again if the detergent, no, lye, gets into what you just washed.”

“Yes, that’s right,” she affirmed, her voice sounding more cheerful. “So, these days, I’ve learned to sync with the others. I can now wash the shirts faster and better. It’s all because I keep an eye on the water coming down from upstream.”

“Keep an eye on the water coming down from upstream, you say... You’re right. Up... Hm? Hold on right there.”

Lloyd stopped. He was just blankly repeating what Emily said when something, an epiphany, struck his mind. An idea started to circulate in his head.

Upstream water. Higher. Flowing. Wait, if that’s the case... Downstream?

Before he knew it, Lloyd was already standing up. Then he began to trudge around the room, nibbling his underlip, developing the idea in his head. He inspected, studied, measured, and made predictions until an answer came to him.

“This is it... Thank you!” exclaimed Lloyd triumphantly.

“Excuse me? Young master?”

Overcome with joy, Lloyd grabbed Emily’s hand and jumped up and down several times. Afterward, he rushed out of the room before Emily could even make sense of what was happening. He darted along the corridor, jumped down the stairs, and entered the dining room, wherein he found Count Arcos about to eat dinner.

At the sight of him, Lloyd blurted, “Um, I am thinking of building a gravity dam downstream of the Prona River.”

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

Chapter 310: The Need for a Dam (2)

“Um, I am thinking of building a gravity dam downstream of the Prona River.”

“Hmm?”

Count Arcos was about to take a spoonful of his soup when his son abruptly emerged and made an equally abrupt suggestion. But he wasn’t taken aback. Instead, he offered Lloyd a seat first.

“Son, you must be here because you have something to say. Am I right?”

“Oh, yes, you are.”

“Then take a seat first.” Count Arcos could tell from the look on Lloyd’s face that his son came to make a slightly over-the-top request. But he wasn’t in the least bit worried.

I can trust him.

Lloyd had proved his diligence countless times up to this point. He would undoubtedly continue to do so throughout the future as well. But more than that, Lloyd was his son, the count thought. He was ready to accept whatever favor his son would request of him.

“Build a dam downstream of the river?” asked Count Arcos. “A gravity dam? I have never heard of such a thing.”

“I am sure you haven’t,” acknowledged Lloyd.

“Before that,” the count went on. “Have you eaten dinner?”

“Not yet,” Lloyd replied.

“Care to join us? We can talk while eating.”

“Yes, thank you.” Seated across from the count, Lloyd stared at the dishes the servants prepared for him as he organized his thoughts in his head. He held his fork and started, “Um, first... I believe I have confused you by barging in on you like this. I know this all sounds new to you, but there’s something grave I must tell you today.”

“We are your mother and father. Do not worry. Do speak.”

Count Arcos smiled gently. Countess Marbella did the same. This soothing atmosphere relieved Lloyd, who was about to reveal the need for the dam. That, however, was only possible with talking about the Jewel of Truth, which was equally impossible with mentioning the restoration of destiny. This conversation, no doubt, was burdensome to Lloyd.

That is why their reactions comforted Lloyd. Their composure and warmth assured him that all of his requests would be accepted, and they would be there to hold his hands during times of trouble. Lloyd felt encouraged and touched, and he was able to bring up the subject more comfortably.

“Okay,” revealed Lloyd. “So, to tell you the reason behind this, everyone here, including me, will be gone in five years.”

“What?” The count’s eyes widened in surprise.

Lloyd continued to speak.

“It is the truth,” emphasized Lloyd, “A giant inescapable catastrophe is heading in our direction. Since about a year ago, I have had the same nightmare every night wherein everyone dies. I simply regarded it as a nightmare and nothing more at first. One day, however, Dragon King Verkis advised me that it wasn’t a simple nightmare. It is really the future that is ahead of us.”

Lloyd couldn’t tell the count and countess about the Ending Spoiler and the restoration of destiny as they were. So, he had to come up with this story of his nightmares.

“I was able to confirm that it wasn’t just a dream,” Lloyd went on to speak, giving no time for them to ask questions. “Thanks to the Dragon King’s advice. I asked him what I should do to stop the arrival of such a dreadful future. Then he told me.”

“What did he say?” asked Count Arcos, his voice breaking.

“That the future I saw was a wretched disaster I cannot easily change. Even if I could foresee what would happen and when, it would be useless to try to prevent the events from happening. In any case, another accident would occur at another time in some other way. Our impending doom would be inevitable.”

“That is terribly wretched. And so?”

“I asked him again. Is there any other way to stop these nightmares from happening? Then he enlightened me with the sole solution to this disaster.”

Lloyd stopped there and stared at both. The two of them were intently listening to him with forks in their hands and completely forgot about their food. This made Lloyd feel more confident.

Okay. They’re buying my words.

It looked like the diligence he had shown up to this point and the Dragon King’s authority worked together to convince them that what he was saying was true. It was a relief.

Breaking the grave ambiance hanging at the dinner table, Lloyd said, “The Dragon King told me that I need to find and build the Jewel of Truth.”

“The Jewel of Truth...?”

“That’s right.” Lloyd nodded. This was the part he didn’t need to fabricate in his story. Now that the topic of their discussion moved to the Jewel of Truth, he could speak to them without including any lies.

“He said that the Jewel of Truth was the most powerful treasure of the mythical age. The Dragon King Verkis said that it was the building that revealed the wisest solutions to any problems that it was asked. The Dragon King Verkis said that all I had to do was find this treasure and ask for a solution to stop the impending disaster. Who told me that? Dragon King Verkis."

"I-I see," replied Count Arcos, slightly dazed by the several mentions of the Dragon King. "The Dragon King is truly a kind and wise man."

"Yes, and that is actually the reason why I made the trip to Cremo."

Count Arcos set his utensils down. "To find the Jewel of Truth? Wait, are all the rocks the Bone Dragon brought..."

"Yes, you are right. They are the key construction materials required to build the Jewel of Truth. I found and brought them here."

"I see. It must have been a lot of work."

"Haha, it wasn't much."

"Please. It couldn't have been easy."

The count and the countess looked at him with pity in their gazes. To their reaction, Lloyd could only put on an embarrassed smile. It looked like they were more bothered by the hardships Lloyd had gone through rather than the incoming disaster.

Haha... Their reaction is so unexpected. How touching...

However, this wasn't the time to indulge in mushiness. It was the time to objectively go over the matter at hand. Pulling himself together, Lloyd shared the requirements for building the Jewel of Truth and the unexpected and disastrous stumbling block he encountered on the way.

"So," went on Lloyd. "I concluded that building a dam was the best solution that meets the construction requirements and saves our fiefdom from the most amount of water damage at the same time."

“Are you saying since the tsunami is unavoidable anyway, it is best to make it happen downstream?”

“Yes. That is exactly what I mean.” What the count was the crux of the matter. “Since the downstream of the Prona River touches no fiefdom. No one lives around there. So, the tidal wave will not harm anyone.”

“I understand your words. You must have rushed down here after finally coming up with this solution just now.”

“Yes, I did.”

“Ha, my dear Lloyd.” Count Arcos called, sighing heavily.

“Yes?”

“Next time,” Count Arcos said woefully, “When you encounter a problem that worries you this much, do talk to me about it. I am your father. It must be stressful to think and contemplate all by yourself every time.”

“Um, that’s—”

“I know even if you do not say it out loud,” Count Arcos put in. “You must have your reasons for why you could not disclose it to us. That is why you pretended to be okay when you were secretly worried. But next time, do give us a chance. A chance to be with you during your difficult moments.”

Lloyd cleared his throat. “Yes... I will. Then, as for the dam construction-”

“It must be done. No doubt about that. How could I reject your request after all the trouble you went through to reach this conclusion?”

“Thank you...!”

He did it. Lloyd succeeded in explaining the restoration of destiny and the need for the jewel construction. He got the permission from Count Arcos, the owner of the fiefdom. Lloyd inwardly clenched his fists.

Haah. That’s one more problem out of my way.

Lloyd expected getting approval for the dam construction to be an easy task. The hard part would be figuring out a good explanation for the restoration of destiny and the Jewel of Truth. Now that it was all over, he felt as if he finished one big assignment at school. The following day, he started the construction project.

This is the perfect spot for the dam.

Lloyd was able to find a suitable spot after observing the downstream of the Prona River on the northern border of his fiefdom.

The limestone valley touching both river sides narrows drastically. The slope for the flexure layer sufficiently cuts down as well. And the lower part of the river, that peak over there. It's supporting the pressure coming from the ground like a pair of training wheels on a child's bike.

The more Lloyd looked at it, the more perfect it was. This spot provided the most stability out of all the terrains.

To my luck, I know a dam on earth that was built somewhere with a similar terrain. The Tibi Dam was built in Alicante, Spain.

Lloyd recalled how he had researched the place back in college. The information he looked over then started to come back to him in bits and pieces.

The dam was constructed using only medieval technologies. The construction started in 1579 and was completed after fifteen years in 1594.

Of course, compared to the modern one, its size wasn't anything impressive. It was only 141 feet tall, and the radius of its arch was 351 feet.

But it's the perfect structure for me to reference since I can't rely on modern technology.

For this, Lloyd would have to rely on Javier, the fantastical creatures, the Engineering Corps, and the Skeleton Corps again. He would need to resort to all sorts of tricks in place of what modern technology had to offer. This technological limitation was exactly why Lloyd found medieval architecture to be a more useful reference for him than other modern structures. A case in point was this dam.

The terrain here is similar. So a gravity arch dam like the Tibi Dam should be a good fit for this project.

Lloyd believed that he could build a safe and sturdy dam if he combined the gravity dam that resisted water pressure by using its own weight, much like tanks in video games, with an arch structure to give it more stability.

The limestone that's necessary for dam construction is also plentiful in this area.

This environment couldn't be any more perfect for the construction in many ways. Convinced, Lloyd dutifully surveyed the terrain to determine the location to put the dam. The amount of water the dam would hold. The geographical range of the areas that would be submerged in water due to the dam. The location for the Jewel of Truth. The size and power of the wave. The impact of the wave on the dam. Details of the device that would reduce the impact of it. He considered all the information he collected, possible scenarios, and any other variables he could. For this, he actively used the simulation option in his survey skill.

Lloyd experimented, measured, considered, edited, and designed. He reviewed, revised, and then repeated this entire process. At times, he would scratch his head and rub his tired eyes while he did.

Some nights, after he put Javier to sleep, Lloyd went back to his room and worked through the night, the toil eventually bursting his nose. In the morning, Emily would find his blood-stained shirts and rush to the count and countess to tell on him. Countess Marbella became so worried that she prepared all the healthy meals she knew of to feed her son. Fueled by gratitude, Lloyd would then push himself to review his design once again. He engrossed himself in drawing up a design, making every minute and second count in his day. Ten days, fifteen days, and thirty days passed. And at last, Lloyd finished the design for the dam and the Jewel of Truth.

Haah. That took a while and was quite exhausting.

Lloyd breathed out, feeling sick to his stomach. Even though he was backed by several skills, designing was particularly strenuous on this occasion as there were too many factors to take into account.

But, oh well, like if it wasn't hard any other times.

Lloyd chuckled at the thought. Right. There never was a time when coming up with a design was easy across all of the projects he had done so far.

So, I should work hard this time too. Now that the design is finished. Hmm... Looks like the construction can start in fifteen days, considering the time it'll take to set up the construction schedule and acquire the necessary materials and people.

Lloyd crinkled his nose. Thanks to his obsessive hard work for the past month, there were only a few small preparations left to do before the actual construction could begin.

Time freeze. I need to use the skill again for this project.

The dam construction would require an extraordinary amount of time. But it wouldn't be as much as the Tibi Dam, which took fifteen years to complete. But still, even if he mobilized the fantastical creatures and Draggy, the construction would take a fair amount of time to do.

So, Time Freeze is a must for this construction. I need to save time when I can. But to do that... I'll have to inform everyone about it...

Lloyd believed he had to give everyone in the fiefdom a heads-up that there was no need to panic when the world froze outside their fiefdom as it was not the work of an evil magician. He jumped into action right away.

Oh well. This is life.

The night Lloyd finished the design, he abruptly announced at the dinner table, "I can stop time!"

The outburst shocked Count and Countess Frontera, who thought to themselves that their son must have gone through a lot lately to be this deluded.

OceanofPDF.com